The whole concept of "ecumenism" has been a source of theological division, some of which remains. Those bodies which have made exclusive claims to truth have been unable to meet with others in any such way as to suggest that they recognize the others as holding the truth. This has meant that the Eastern Orthodox, the Roman Catholics, and a large part of the evangelical churches stood aside from the movement initially. The Orthodox are now involved fully, the Roman Catholics are participating in various ways short of actual membership (even the latter had seemed likely in Britain in 1973), and evangelicals remain divided on the issue. It has been a very live issue in English evangelicalism, with Anglican evangelicals working out a theology of involvement without compromise, and of dialogue without sell-out, and expressing this in the Keele Congress Statement of 1967 and in later writings. This stance has seemed frankly incredible to non-Anglican evangelicals and has led to a thorough polarizing. A similar tension has been felt among evangelicals in the Presbyterian churches in Wales and Ireland, and in other historic, more mixed denominations in America. At the same time, some of the bodies which have been traditionally most separatist, e.g., the Salvation Army and some Pentecostalists, are becoming involved with the ecumenical movement at every level from the World Council downward.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: W.A. Visser 't Hooft, The Meaning of Ecumenical (1954); J.D. Murch, Cooperation Without Compromise (1956); M. Villain, Introduction à l'oecumenisme (1958); P.A. Crow, The Ecumenical Movement in Bibliographical Outline (1965); N. Goodall, The Ecumenical Movement (2nd ed., 1964); R. Rouse and S.C. Neill (eds.), A History of the Ecumenical Movement 1517-1948 (1967); S.C. Neill, The Church and Christian Union (1968).

COLIN BUCHANAN

ECUMENICAL PATRIARCH. The patriarch of Constantinople which since the Council of Chalcedon in 451 has been regarded as the ranking see of the Eastern Orthodox Church.* Its sphere of jurisdiction in its own geographical area has shrunk considerably, and in post-World War I days the Turks all but abolished it, alleging that it was a center of pro-Greek intrigue—an accusation reiterated in more recent times in connection with Greek treatment of the Turkish minority in Cyprus. Formerly the partriarchate had civil authority over the Greek community in Constantinople (modern Istanbul), but its function is now restricted to ecclesiastical matters.

EDDY, MARY BAKER (1821-1910). Founder of Christian Science.* Born into a Congregational family on a farm near Concord, New Hampshire, she was from infancy subject to attacks of convulsive hysteria; even as a grown child she had to be rocked to sleep in a cradle made by her father. Her first husband married her "cradle and all." She was highly sensitive, intensely religious, seeing God everywhere. Reared on the Westminster Confession, she was accepted on confession of faith at the age of twelve by her father's church, despite her rejection of the Westminster's predestinarianism. At twenty-two she married a bricklayer who died a year later. Ten years afterward she married a roving dentist, who left her because of her "fits." In 1862 Mary visited "Doctor" Phineas Quimby, an ignorant, nonreligious blacksmith who practiced hypnotism and set her free from years of suffering. Impressed by his healings through the use of mind, Mary combined Quimbyism with her understanding of Christianity and gave birth to her Divine Science of healing, which she claimed came by direct revelation from God. Her book Science and Health, with a Key to the Scripture, she claimed was dictated by God, though she hired a clergyman to edit out the bad grammar. She was so filled with the Spirit, she explained, that her "grammar was eclipsed."

In 1877 she married Asa Gilbert Eddy, a man of poor health whom she cured. Eddy also left her a widow in due course, but she kept his name. She summoned a doctor before her husband died, later explaining that his death was from "arsenic mentally administered." After his death this remarkable widow of sixty-one went on to fame, wealth, and the founding of her own church. She died at eighty-nine, after years of loneliness and mortal terror that her enemies were projecting some mental arsenic into her mind.

See bibliography under CHRISTIAN SCIENCE.

JAMES DAANE

EDERSHEIM, ALFRED (1825-1889). Biblical scholar. Born in Vienna of Jewish parentage, he entered the University of Vienna in 1841 but was forced to leave after a few months by the illness of his father. Shortly after, he came under the influence of the Scottish Presbyterian John Duncan, who was chaplain to workmen on the Danube bridge at Pesth. Edersheim accompanied Duncan to Scotland and was enrolled as a student at New College, Edinburgh, and later at the University of Berlin. In 1846 he entered the Presbyterian ministry and became a missionary to the Jews at Jassy, Rumania. Three years later he was inducted as minister of the Free Church in Old Aberdeen. In 1861 the church of St. Andrew (Presbyterian) was built for him at Torquay. In 1875 he took orders in the Church of England, and was subsequently vicar of Loders, Dorset (1876-82). Of his writings the most widely read was his Life and Times of Jesus the Messiah (1883-90). WAYNE DETZLER

EDICT OF MILAN, see MILAN, EDICT OF

EDICT OF NANTES, see NANTES, EDICT OF

EDINBURGH CONFERENCE (1937). Convened as the second Conference on Faith and Order following the first conference in Lausanne in 1927, it comprised 504 delegates representing 123 churches. The discussions between the conferences became the basis for four main reports studied at Edinburgh: the Doctrine of Grace, the Ministry and Sacraments, the Church of Christ and the Word of God, the Church's Unity in Life and Worship. While there were wide areas of agreement among the delegates, no attempt was made to conceal disagreements, and further studies were instituted on them. So wide a measure of agreement was reached in the discussion on "the grace of our Lord" that the report stated: "There is in connexion with this subject no ground for maintaining division between the Churches." Agreement could not be reached on the means of grace and their right ordering and the Communion of the Saints. The authority of the Church to interpret Scripture revealed differences of conviction, and the report on the ministry proved the most contentious of all, with the episcopacy as the center of the disagreement. The root of the differences lay in conflicting views regarding the nature of the church. The proposal of the report on the church's unity that a World Council of Churches be formed was approved by the conference. An affirmation was issued, speaking of the unity of those who confess allegiance to Christ as Head of the Church.

See L. Hodgson (ed.), The Second World Conference on Faith and Order (1938).

JAMES TAYLOR

EDINBURGH MISSIONARY CONFERENCE (1910). This ten-day gathering for discussion was significant for its representative character, its leadership, the range of its discussions, and its outcome. Previous conferences on the missionary task of the church had been undenominational in character; this was interdenominational. All churches, with the exception of the Roman Catholic, were represented. The Anglo-Catholic representatives insisted that South America, which they regarded as being Roman Catholic, be omitted from the agenda, and that matters of doctrine and church polity should not be considered, as they were the business of the churches. There were 1,355 delegates, the places being allocated on the basis of missionary society incomes. Less than a score were from the "younger churches." The chairman was John R. Mott,* the secretary J.H. Oldham.*

Discussion ranged over the reports of the eight preparatory commissions: (1) conveying the Gospel to all the non-Christian world; (2) the Church in the mission field; (3) education in relation to the Christianization of national life; (4) the missionary message in religion to non-Christian religion; (5) the preparation of missionaries; (6) the home base of missions; (7) missions and governments; (8) cooperation and the promotion of unity.

During the discussions the need became apparent for a permanent representative body, able to coordinate missionary cooperation and to speak to governments. The only resolution of the conference, that a continuation committee with a fulltime executive staff be appointed, was carried unanimously. The continuation committee was the first-ever representative, interdenominational organization to be formed and, with its originating conference, is regarded as the beginning of the modern ecumenical movement.* J.R. Mott began his closing address with the words, "The end of the Conference is the beginning of the Conquest. The end of the Planning is the beginning of the Doing."

See W.H.T. Gairdner, Edinburgh 1910 (1910).

JAMES TAYLOR

EDISON, THOMAS ALVA (1847-1931). Inventor. Born in Ohio, he was a newspaper boy at eleven and later became a telegraph operator. In 1868 he purchased Faraday's Experimental Researches in Electricity which inspired his life's work. Of his 1,100 inventions, the best known are the phonograph, the electric lamp (Edison's used a carbon filament), and the alkaline storage battery. He discovered the "Edison effect," later utilized in Fleming's thermionic valve, and was also responsible for the first industrial research laboratory. Edison was a strong believer in God: "The existence of an intelligent Creator, a personal God, can to my mind almost be proved from chemistry." He was motivated by a firm faith that, where man faced technological problems, God had in nature supplied materials necessary to solve them. Thus despite early losses, no difficulty daunted him. R.E.D. CLARK

EDKINS, JOSEPH (1823-1905). Missionary to China. When Shanghai was declared a "Treaty Port" in the settlement of the Opium War (1841), it soon became a center of missions. Edkins, sent by the London Missionary Society, arrived there in 1848. In 1860, at the invitation of Hung-ren, a convert of Hung Hsiu-ch'üan, the Taiping leader, he twice visited the Taiping rebels in Suchow and Nanking to instruct them in the Christian faith. That same year Edkins moved to Chefoo, and 1861 to Tientsin, whence he visited Peking in 1862 and baptized the first three Protestant converts in that city, which then became a new LMS base for evangelism. An eminent philologist, Edkins also wrote extensively about China's religions. LESLIE T. LYALL

EDMAN, V(ICTOR) RAYMOND (1900-1967). American college president. Born in Chicago

Heights, Illinois, he served as army medical corpsman in Europe (1918-19), then after two years at the University of Illinois and a year of biblical studies at Nyack Missionary Training Institute, he graduated from Boston University in 1923. From then until 1928 as a missionary in Ecuador, he helped found a Bible institute for training national workers. Forced by illness to return home, he became a pastor in Worcester, Massachusetts, and earned a Ph.D. degree from Clark University between 1929 and 1935. He taught for a year at Nyack and taught political science from 1936 to 1940 at Wheaton College, where he became president from 1940 until appointment as its first chancellor in 1965. Wide travel, love of the Bible, and a deep sense of God's presence made him a valued counselor and the writer of over twenty devotional books. EARLE E. CAIRNS

EDMUND (c.840-870). King and martyr. He succeeded to the throne of East Anglia at fifteen. For fourteen more years nothing is known for certain about his life, though he seems to have been an acceptable monarch. Then the invading Danes, who had gained ground in other parts of the country but had for some reason until then left his territories alone, came south. Edmund engaged them in battle, possibly at Hoxne on the Suffolk-Norfolk border. He was defeated. It is difficult to reconcile different versions of what happened on that occasion. According to some accounts, he was slain in the fighting; others say he was captured, refused to renounce his faith or to hold his kingdom as vassal of heathen overlords, was thereupon killed by the Danish archers, and then beheaded. Many legends sprang up around his memory, and his resting place at Bury St. Edmunds became one of the most famous shrines in England. J.D. DOUGLAS

EDMUND OF ABINGDON (Edmund Rich) (c.1175-1240). Archbishop of Canterbury from 1233. After graduating at Paris, he taught liberal arts there and at Oxford (where he was the first to lecture on Aristotle). In 1227 he was appointed to preach the crusade in England, and six years later became archbishop of Canterbury at the pope's behest, although the monks of Canterbury had suggested three others. Edmund unsuccessfully challenged papal exactions, and rebuked King Henry III for following the advice of foreign favorites, and for other misdemeanors threatened him with excommunication. The king submitted, but asked the pope to send him a legate. When Cardinal Otto arrived in 1237, Edmund's influence declined, for the legate took precedence over him on public occasions. Edmund protested in vain, and on further papal encroachments withdrew to Pontigny. Though he was somewhat ineffectual when challenged by great national issues, he was one of the most saintly and attractive figures of the English Church. St. Edmund Hall, Oxford, was dedicated to him in 1682

J.D. DOUGLAS

EDUCATION, CHRISTIAN. Christian education is rooted in Scripture. From its beginning the religion of the Bible has gone hand in hand with teaching. Parental responsibility for youth, the supreme worth of persons, the obligation to develop personal capabilities, the motivating power of love, the necessity of literacy, the unity of all truth in God—these and other principles basic to Christian education have biblical sources. Christianity is par excellence a teaching religion, and the story of its growth is largely an educational one.

In the Old Testament, education begins with God (Exod. 4:12), who continues to teach His people (Ps. 32:8; Isa. 48:17; Jer. 32:33). And early in His dealing with Israel, God makes parents responsible for teaching their children about Him, as the great educational principle the Jews call the Shema (Deut. 6:4-9) shows. Until the Exile, home and school were one. Parents were the teachers, except for special cases such as tutors for the royal family (2 Kings 10:1-5). Adults learned from priests and Levites, and also from the prophets. Along with their religious training, sons were taught a trade by their fathers; daughters learned household arts from their mothers. Both sexes were taught to read. Thus Hebrew education combined the two essentials of learning and doing.

The rise of the synagogue during the Exile and the growing importance of the scribes as teachers after Ezra had redirected attention to the Law (Neh. 8—10) led to expansion of Hebrew education. The synagogue was primarily a center for instructing the people in the Scriptures, and the Scribes became the professional students of the Law. The instruction of younger children, however, remained in parental hands until about 75 B.C., when elementary education, given either in the teacher's house or in the synagogue, became compulsory. The ordinary name for the elementary school was "house of the book," for the Scriptures were the only textbook. It is in its devotion to the Word of God and its relation to life that ancient Hebrew education has relevance for Christian education in modern times. Not only are the Torah (Pentateuch) and the Book of Proverbs the oldest educational handbooks, but the entire OT stands along with the NT as the chief sourcebook for an authentically Christian education.

First century. In keeping with its OT roots, Christianity is a teaching religion. Its Founder is by common consent acknowledged as the greatest of all teachers. In His ministry, teaching occupied a place second only to His work of redemption. His great commission (Matt. 28:18-20) obligates His followers to "teach all nations," and it was through the apostolic ministry, especially that of Paul and his colleagues, that the infant church grew.

The first Christian churches met in homes (Rom. 16:3-5; 1 Cor. 16:19; Col. 4:15; Philem. 2). Christian parents undoubtedly taught their children, and the church meetings fulfilled a teaching as well as worship function, as shown in the reference to "pastors and teachers" (Eph. 4:11) in Paul's list of the gifts of the Spirit, and the many allusions in his epistles (e.g., Rom. 12:7; Col. 3:16; 1 Tim. 3:2; 2 Tim. 2:2). Of great and continuing significance are the two elements in the NT kerygma (proclamation of the gospel of Jesus Christ) and didachē (moral and social teaching based on the proclamation). These are organically related, the kerygma providing dynamic motivation for the didachē and being itself a form of teaching. It is evident that Christian education, though not carried on in separate schools, went on in the first-century church, which, without its unremitting faithfulness in proclaiming the Gospel and teaching the Word, would not have grown.

Patristic age. As Christianity spread, patterns of more formal education developed. Early in the second century, the catechumenate (instruction in the Scriptures, worship, Christian conduct, etc.) began as preparation of adults for baptism and membership in the Christian fellowship. Depsite the persecutions prior to the reign of Constantine, it continued—in some places until the fifth or sixth century. One of the earliest Christian schools was founded in Alexandria about A.D. 190 (see ALEXANDRIAN THEOLOGY); others developed at Caesarea, Antioch, Edessa, and Nisibis. At the catechetical schools not only was thorough instruction in the Scriptures given, but Greek philosophy (aside from Epicureanism), literature, grammar, rhetoric, science, and other subjects could be studied. Thus a relationship in education between Christianity and classical learning began. Augustine* indeed wrote: "Every good and true Christian should understand that wherever he may find truth, it is his Lord's." Others, notably Tertullian,* who said, "What indeed has Athens to do with Jerusalem . . . we want no curious disputation after possessing Jesus," had repudiated classical learning; and Jerome* wrote of Latin literature, "How can Horace go with the psalter, Virgil with the gospels, Cicero with the apostle?"

During the Dark Ages, the alliance between Christianity and classical learning was drastically obscured but not obliterated. The barbarian invasions were largely responsible for the decline of the public schools of grammar and rhetoric, which, though formerly prevalent throughout the Roman Empire, were by the sixth century practically gone. The church, in which distrust of pagan learning was strong, began to step into the gap and, for the next thousand years and more, dominated education. Education for the people was generally in eclipse during the Dark Ages. Learning flourished, however, in some monasteries, especially in Ireland, where from the sixth to the eighth centuries there was a genuine intellectual resurgence of learning. Also, after the disappearance of the public schools of grammar and rhetoric, the bishops established schools for training clergy. These began to teach grammar as well as theology, and as time passed reached out to some of the laity. Probably the first such schools were in England. Still, education for the people was almost nonexistent. About this time, certain kings began to foster education. Most notable of them was Charlemagne* (742-814), who made Alcuin,* a former head of the school at York in England, his education minister.

Scholasticism. In the period of the Schoolmen (ninth century to the end of the fourteenth century) there came a rediscovery of Greek philosophy, particularly that of Aristotle.* During the peak of Scholasticism, Thomas Aquinas* in his Summa Theologiae reconciled Aristotelian philosophy with the historic Christian faith. And with the rise of Scholasticism and the concurrent development toward the end of the twelfth century of the universities—Bologna, Paris, Oxford, and (somewhat later) Cambridge—Europe emerged from the Dark Ages.

The Reformation brought a new day for education. Two of its principles—the full authority of Scripture and the priesthood of the believer—served as a catalyst for developments that changed the face of education. The former principle made education mandatory, so all might read the Word of God (a motivation akin to that of ancient Hebrew education); the latter shifted the responsibility for education from the priestly hierarchy to the people. Luther, Calvin, Melanchthon, and other leading Reformers were scholars of the first rank and saw the strategic importance of Christian education. Luther had a medieval rather than a humanistic (in the Renaissance sense) education. But he worked closely with the Christian humanist Melanchthon, who not only "provided the foundation for the evangelical school system of Germany" but also "put into the curricula of his schools, especially the higher schools, those subjects which would contribute most to an understanding of the Scriptures" (C.L. Manschreck). His concept of correlating the curriculum with the Scriptures points to the effort to integrate biblical faith and learning which has become a major concern for evangelical educators in our times.

The effects of the Reformation upon education reached beyond Germany to Switzerland, Scandinavia, England, and other lands. From Geneva, Calvin's powerful influence led to a burgeoning of Christian schools in France, the Netherlands, and Scotland. In England the Christian humanism of men like Grocyn, Linacre, Erasmus, Colet, and Ascham had profoundly affected education there, and when England and its schools and universities became Protestant this influence continued. In seventeenth-century England, the Reformed faith affected education through Puritanism.

In Comenius,* "the founder of modern educational theory," the Reformation bore some of its most enduring educational fruits. This Moravian bishop, who was an evangelical Christian, "stands in education in the direct line of succession from Luther" (William Boyd). Thus for him the Bible was the supreme authority and norm for all knowledge. There are elements in the teaching of Comenius that relate to the present-day emphasis in Christian educational philosophy upon the unity of all truth in God. Although this article deals primarily with Protestant Christian education, it should be noted that through the Council of Trent* (with its reaction to the Reformation), the Reformation affected Roman Catholic education, as Loyola and his followers took into the Jesuit schools ideas borrowed from such places as Geneva and Strasbourg.

The modern period. With the founding of the colonies in the seventeenth century, the impetus given education by the Reformation came to America. Here the influence of Calvin through the Puritans in New England and through the Dutch colonists was strong, though not exclusive (e.g., the Church of England also had its effect on education, though it too reflected Calvinistic influences). Up to the end of the eighteenth century, all schools and colleges in America (with the exception of the University of Pennsylvania, which though nonsectarian was not hostile to Christianity) had roots in evangelical Christianity, and the same was true for most of them until the beginning of public education in the nineteenth century.

Broadly speaking, it may be said that almost the whole of education in the Western world from the first until the nineteenth century was in one way or another Christian. But with the rise of rationalism and the French Enlightenment at the close of the eighteenth century, a shift toward secularism began. In America the roots of democracy were not only Calvinistic but Deistic, as in such leaders as Franklin and Jefferson. Here the principle of separation of church and state, laid down in the First Amendment to the Constitution, has gradually led to the exclusion of religious training and practices from public education through various decisions of the Supreme Court.* On the other hand, private schools and private colleges and universities flourish in the United States and are permitted to have complete programs of Christian education, provided that educational standards are maintained. Whether the wall of separation between church and state will in all respects remain intact is questionable, as in a time of rising costs pressures mount for federal aid to private (especially Roman Catholic) education. In England and Scotland, however, and in other countries where there is an established church, some Christian teaching continues in state schools. Yet the winds of secularism are blowing there also.

Among evangelicals in the United States, Christian elementary, secondary, and higher education has had a remarkable resurgence, particularly since about 1920. During this time, existing institutions have been strengthened and many new ones founded. Christian liberal arts colleges, theological seminaries, and both parent-controlled and parish-controlled day schools (elementary as well as secondary) have multiplied. Noteworthy has been the development of Bible institutes and Bible colleges, about two hundred being founded since the 1880s (of these, many have begun during the last five decades). These Christian institutions constitute nothing less than a new educational genre and represent one of America's distinctive contributions to Christian education.

There are, however, aspects of Christian education other than those having to do with school and college. Some of these, such as the relation of Christian education to the home and to the local church, have already been touched upon in the discussion of education in OT times and in the first-century church. Nothing that has happened in the long history of education has excused Christian parents from their primary responsibility, grounded in Scripture, for Christian training in their homes. Yet it must be said that in a day of pervasive secularism when homes are invaded by television and the mass media, their effectiveness as essential agents of Christian nurture is being eroded. Not even the development of strong evangelical schools and colleges or the renewal of the Sunday school or church school (as it is sometimes called) can make up for parental defection from their educational responsibility.

The Sunday school. In the historical development of Christian education the Sunday school is a comparative newcomer. It began with Robert Raikes,* and the movement rapidly gained ground in Britain and within a few years spread to America. Until about 1815, Sunday schools in the United States were attended mostly by children of the poor, and centered, along with Christian teaching, on dispelling illiteracy. After that date, the Sunday school became an educational arm of the evangelical Protestant churches. The length of the sessions was shortened, teaching was voluntary rather than paid, and pupils represented all social backgrounds and ages. The aim became more exclusively that of conversion and Bible teaching, and Sunday schools served as feeders for the churches. Growth was widespread not only in Britain and the United States but elsewhere, and in 1889 the First World Sunday School Convention was held in London. Subsequent developments, such as the establishment of Uniform Lessons, the shift to separate denominational and independent curricula, the relation of the movement to the International Council of Religious Education, which became part of the National Council of Christian Churches in the USA, need not be detailed here. It is, however, important to note that during the past five decades tensions respecting the Sunday schools have developed between evangelicals and more liberal Protestants. These led to the establishment in 1945 of the evangelically oriented National Sunday School Association and have led also to the development of certain independent and theologically conservative curricula.

Through the years, Sunday schools have grown until their pupils in the United States have totalled annually well up in the tens of millions, yet growth has not been without fluctuations. From 1926 to 1947 there was a decline, followed by a definite recovery which went on until about 1960, when a loss of enrollment in the American Sunday school set in. This has chiefly affected the Sunday schools of larger, mainline denominations and has reached drastic proportions. Ironically these denominations have invested millions of dollars in new Sunday school curricula, but the downward trend has not been reversed. Independent evangelical publishers have also been active in publishing new curricula (generally more biblical and Gospel-centered than the mainline denominational materials). For the Sunday schools of conservative evangelical churches—either those affiliated with larger denominations or with smaller bodies and independent churches—the enrollment situation is different. Here, while in some areas there has been decline, in others there has been marked growth. On the whole, the evangelical Sunday school has been holding its own and even showing a slight gain. Nevertheless, it is evident that in the period of revolutionary social changes during the latter part of the twentieth century the Sunday school is in serious trouble. This is true on the British as well as the American scene, so much so that the yearbooks of some of the major denominations no longer carry statistics on Sunday school work. The Church of Scotland, where the work has been strong in the past, has seen Sunday school numbers decline from close to half-a-million in 1901 to less than half that figure in 1971.

For many years, students of Christian education have recognized such problems of the Protestant Sunday school as the inadequacy of the weekly teaching period of an hour or less as compared with the time spent on secular education, the difficulties of teacher recruitment and preparation, the frequent ineffectiveness of teaching, the lack of adult Christian education in the churches, and the general failure of the Sunday school to communicate a coherent knowledge of the Bible and the elements of Christian truth. "The typical Christian of our time," says J.D. Smart, "however noble his character is, is unable to speak one intelligent word on behalf of his faith."

Other agencies of Christian education. The dramatic slippage of the Sunday school in numbers and influence has led some to question the continuing usefulness of this form of Christian education, which in the past has contributed so much to the church and society. In a time of radical change in attitudes of youth that often carries with it a reaction against organized religion, churches are venturing into new ways of ministering to young people. These include coffee houses, social action groups that work among the underprivileged, and contemporary music as a means of communicating with youth. Such para-church agencies as Daily Vacation Bible Schools, Christian camps, Youth for Christ, Young Life, Child Evangelism, Scripture Union (for college and university students), Inter-Varsity Christian Fellowship, Campus Crusade for Christ, and International Students continue to do effective work and are adapting to changing conditions without blunting their evangelical thrust. The triennial conventions of the Inter-Varsity Christian Fellowship at Urbana, Illinois (17,000 students attended the 1976 convention), Explo-'72, at which 85,000 youth met at Dallas, Texas, under the sponsorship of Campus Crusade for Christ, and the Jesus Movement (despite its vagaries) show that young people today respond to the evangelical presentation of Christ with a remarkable openness and readiness. This must be met by more effective Christian nurture through new forms of Christian education together with renewal and revision of older forms such as the Sunday school.

An aspect of education relating to the Bible concerns the American public school, from which formal worship (devotional Bible reading and prayer) have been excluded by judicial decision. Yet the same decision that did this approved the study of the Bible as literature in public schools. Accordingly Christian groups are promoting such Bible study on the ground that, while it can be neither doctrinal nor sectarian, the reading and study of portions of Scripture as great literature are not futile. The Word of God does not return to Him void, and when it is studied even under secular restrictions its spiritual power cannot be bound.

The centrality of the Bible. Whatever methods are employed in Christian education, it remains indissolubly united with the Bible. In the continuing concern for Christian education, the vital place of the pastor is too often overlooked. Pastors are called to be teachers as well as preachers (cf. Paul's reference in Eph. 4:11). The pastor who never expounds the Word of God from the pulpit has a truncated ministry. Biblically illiterate laity reflect the lack of expository preaching. No amount of topical preaching, no matter how inspirational, can build up the people of God in the knowledge of the Bible essential to spiritual growth. The incomparable educational resource of the church is the Word of God. When the Word has been truly and faithfully taught, Christian education has flourished; when it has been lost sight of and obscured, Christian education has waned; when it has been rediscovered, as in the Reformation, Christian education has been revived. This is the lesson of history. Therefore one of the most hopeful developments in the latter part of this twentieth century is the outburst of new and contemporary Bible translations and the opening of the Roman Catholic Church to Bible reading and study.

Nowhere has the educating power of the Bible been more potent than in missions.* Through the translation of the Scriptures in whole or in part into over 1,300 different languages and dialects, the door to literacy has been opened for millions who would otherwise have remained in intellectual and spiritual ignorance. No survey of Christian education can be complete without recognition of the missionary movement in which the teaching of the Bible and the establishment of schools has had a major part on an ecumenical scale reaching beyond the Western world to every continent and the farthest islands of the seas.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: F.P. Graves, A Student's History of Education (1921); S. Leeson, Christian Education (1947); E.P. Cubberly, The History of Education (1948); L. Cole, A History of Education (1950); J.D. Smart, The Teaching Ministry of the Church (1954); F.E. Gaebelein, The Pattern of God's Truth (1954); P. Le Fevre, The Christian Teacher (1958); C.L. Manschrek, Melanchthon: The Quiet Reformer (1958); M.J. Taylor, Religious Education (1960); K.B. Cully, The Westminster Dictionary of Christian Education (1963); J.E. Hakes, An Introduction to Evangelical Christian Education (1964); C.B. Eavey, A History of Christian Education (1964). FRANK E. GAEBELEIN

EDWARD VI (1537-1553). King of England. Son of Henry VIII and Jane Seymour, he reigned for six years and was only sixteen when he died. Physically frail, intelligent, and sincere, he was naive and inevitably became the tool of counselors, notably the earl of Northumberland, whose motivation was by no means religious. With a serious ferocity now difficult to imagine, the Europe of his time argued with words and tortures the mystery of the sacrament. England under Henry VIII had rejected papal authority, but retained medieval dogma. Edward's reign saw decisive moves in a Protestant direction. Most legislation against heresy was repealed, and England became a sanctuary for the persecuted. English Bibles were freely printed. The 1552 Prayer Book, going further than the already strongly Protestant version of 1549, set forth the sacrament as essentially an act of remembrance. The Forty-Two Articles* of 1553 codified in irenic terms these and other changes.

Despite his inevitable limitations, Edward was sincerely Christian. His reign saw few executions. Mary, his half sister, said her Mass and had her chaplain. The Roman Catholic bishop, Stephen Gardiner, though imprisoned and deprived of his see, was able to write six volumes of theological controversy.

See C.R. Markham, King Edward VI (1907); J.D. Mackie, The Earlier Tudors, 1485-1558 (1952). P.W. PETTY

EDWARDS, JOHN (1637-1716). Calvinist divine. Cambridge graduate, he ministered at Trinity Church, Cambridge, from 1664 and stuck to his task even when plague struck the area. Later he held a fellowship at St. John's College, where his position became untenable because of his Calvinist views. After two further brief pastorates he retired because of declining health and the anti-Calvinist temper of the times. He lived for thirty years more and published more than forty works, notably the Socinians' Creed, intended as an answer to John Locke.* J.D. DOUGLAS

EDWARDS, JONATHAN (1703-1758). "The greatest philosopher-theologian yet to grace the American scene" (Perry Miller). After a precocious childhood (before he was thirteen he had a good knowledge of Latin, Greek, and Hebrew and was writing papers on philosophy) he entered Yale in 1716. It appears that it was during his time at college that he "began to have a new kind of apprehensions and ideas of Christ, and the work of redemption, and the glorious way of salvation by him." After a short pastorate in New York, he was appointed a tutor at Yale. In 1724 he became pastor of the church at Northampton, Massachusetts, a colleague of his grandfather Samuel Stoddard until the latter's death in 1729. Under the influence of Edwards's powerful preaching, the Great Awakening* occurred in 1734-35, and a geographically more extensive revival in 1740-41. Edwards became a firm friend of George Whitefield,* then itinerating in America.

After various differences with prominent families in his congregation, and a prolonged controversy over the question of the admission of the unconverted to the Lord's Supper, he was dismissed as pastor in 1750 (though, curiously, still preached until a suitable replacement could be found) and became, in 1751, pastor of the church in the frontier town of Stockbridge, and a missionary to the Indians. He was elected president of Princeton in 1757, but was reluctant to accept because of his desire to continue writing. Finally yielding to pressure, he was inaugurated in February 1758. One month later he died of the effects of a smallpox injection.

Edwards was, and was content to be, firmly in the tradition of New England Calvinism and the Westminster Divines. Efforts to demonstrate that he consciously shifted away from this position do not carry conviction. The influence of the "new way of ideas" of John Locke was mainly confined to his anthropology and is clearest in Edwards's classic Freedom of the Will. Because of his commitment to salvation by sovereign grace, Edwards was agitated by what he considered to be the religiously destructive developments in New England, particularly incipient Arminianism and Socinianism, and revivalistic excess. The first concern prompted the Freedom of the Will and, later, Original Sin. The second inspired a group of writings, notably the Religious Affections.

In Edwards, as in Augustine, there is a union of a highly intellectual and speculative spirit and an often ecstatic devotion to God-in-Christ. The same mind deployed the relentless logic of the Freedom of the Will and resolved "to cast and venture my whole soul on the Lord Jesus Christ, to trust and confide in him, and consecrate myself wholly to him." Edwards was a complete stranger to that separation of "heart" and "head" that has often plagued evangelical religion. Edwards's influence has been widespread. Some of his successors in America, such as Emmons, Hopkins, and Nathaniel Taylor, while appealing to Edwards, developed the "New England Theology"* in directions that he would surely have disapproved of. He had a wide circle of correspondents, compensating somewhat for his cultural isolation. His writings greatly influenced Thomas Chalmers, Andrew Fuller, and Robert Hall, among others.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: O.E. Winslow, Jonathan Edwards (1941); P. Miller, Johathan Edwards (1949); P. Miller (ed.), The Works of Jonathan Edwards (1957- ). PAUL HELM

EDWARDS, LEWIS (1809-1887). Welsh Calvinistic Methodist minister. Born at Pen-llwyn, Cardiganshire, he had a patchy education in local schools, engaged in a little teaching himself, and went to Edinburgh University in 1833. In 1837 he and his brother-in-law, David Charles (1812-78) opened a school at Bala which was eventually adopted by the Calvinistic Methodists* as the institution for training its ministers. He spent the remaining fifty years of his life as principal there. Edwards was a powerful personality and became the undisputed leader of his denomination, particularly in intellectual matters. He was an eager protagonist of institutional efficiency and led the Methodists to adopt a modified form of Presbyterianism. His most substantial work, however, was done in literary and intellectual circles. He was the founder in 1845 of the quarterly magazine Y Traethodydd, in which he introduced Welsh readers to a much wider range of international ideas than had previously been available to them. He wrote books on the person of Christ and the doctrine of the Atonement, and a brief history of theology. As a theologian he sought to evade controversy while maintaining a somewhat moderate Calvinism. His son, Thomas Charles Edwards (1837-1900), first principal of the University College of Wales, Aberystwyth, is better known to English readers through his commentaries on 1 Corinthians and Hebrews. He also wrote his father's biography (1901). R. TUDUR JONES

EDWARD THE CONFESSOR (1003-1066). Son of Ethelred II ("the Unready"), he was taken into exile by his father and resided at the Norman court until recalled by his half-brother Hardicanute in 1041. Thereafter he was evidently regarded as heir to the English throne, largely through the influence of Earl Godwin, whose daughter he married in 1045. He preferred his Norman advisers to the Saxons, however, and one of his favorites, Robert of Jumieges, became archbishop of Canterbury in 1051. Civil war seemed imminent, but the king's chief adversary, Godwin, regarded as representing the cause of the nationalists, fled into exile. Soon a reconciliation was effected, the foreigners fled, and the influence of Godwin followed by that of his son was complete. The king suffered further blows to his pride, his failing health caused his absence from the consecration of his new abbey of Westminster late in 1065, and just after the new year the charming, mild-mannered ascetic died. He was canonized in 1161.
J.D. DOUGLAS

EGBERT (639-729). English monk from Lindisfarne. He lived and taught in Connaught. In 664, when afflicted by the plague, he vowed that if spared, he would never return to his native land. He was fired with missionary zeal and was largely responsible for organizing the evangelization of Germany. He spent the last thirteen years of his life on Iona,* persuading the monks to accept the Roman date for Easter and the crownlike tonsure. He died on the very day they first celebrated Easter in common with the rest of Europe.

EGBERT (d.766). Archbishop of York. Pupil of the Venerable Bede* and cousin of Ceolwulf, king of Northumbria, Egbert was ordained in Rome and appointed to the diocese of York in 732. Bede continued his interest in Egbert by giving him some good advice on that occasion. Three years later, Pope Gregory III made Egbert archbishop—only the second to be so styled at York. His position was consolidated and enhanced when his brother Eadberht succeeded to the Northumbrian throne in 738. Egbert wrote an epitome of ecclesiastical law and was correspondent and consultant of the English Boniface,* the "Apostle of Germany." As befits a churchman who added wisdom and rectitude to learning, Egbert was known for the care he took to ordain as priests only men worthy of the sacred charge. He is, however, remembered most as the founder of the cathedral school, where he himself taught theology. Numbered among his pupils was Alcuin,* who himself became master of the school in the year Egbert died. J.D. DOUGLAS

EGEDE, HANS (1686-1758). "Apostle of Greenland." Born in Norway, he became a pastor in Vagan in N Norway. Deeply concerned about the descendants of Norwegian settlers on Greenland, of whom nothing was known for about two centuries, and aware of the fact that the inhabitants were pagans who spoke an unknown language, he decided to go there as a missionary. He eventually got the king's permission to go to Greenland and arrived there in 1721. He learned the difficult language of the Eskimos, fought the witch doctors, and evangelized the people. From 1736 he lived in Copenhagen, supervising the mission work. From 1740 he was titular bishop of Greenland. Egede's publications are important contributions to the theory of missions. Influenced by H. Müller, P.J. Spener, and C. Gerber, he believed in the responsibility of the church to bring the Gospel to the pagans. His sons Paul and Hans carried on the missionary work of their father. Paul wrote a dictionary and a grammar of the language of the Greenland Eskimos and translated the NT into that language.
CARL-FRIEDRICH WISLOFF

EGERTON PAPYRUS. Among a collection of papyri purchased in the summer of 1934 and included in the Egerton collection, there were found to be some fragments from a codex of a life of Christ written in Greek. The four pieces surviving show clear affinities to a number of passages from the synoptic gospels and John's gospel. Two of them deal with questions of the relationship between Jesus and the Law, and one with the healing of a leper, while the detail of the last is uncertain. On palaeographical grounds they must be assigned to a date not later than A.D. 150, and it is possible that they may have been written some years earlier. The provenance of the fragments is unknown, though there are some similarities to the Oxyrhynchus* fragments. The fragments are of particular importance in helping to provide a limit to the possible late dating of the four gospels. They are clearly dependent upon the canonical works, and time must be allowed for the circulation and acceptance of those after writing, before another work such as this, of which we may not have the first copy, could be written drawing upon them.

See H.I. Bell and T.C. Skeat, Fragments of an Unknown Gospel and Other Early Christian Papyri (1935) and The New Gospel Fragments (1935). R. E. NIXON

EGYPT, see COPTIC CHURCH

EGYPTIANS, GOSPEL ACCORDING TO THE, see APOCRYPHAL NEW TESTAMENT

EGYPTIAN VERSIONS OF THE BIBLE. Only grudgingly have Egyptian sands and monastery ruins yielded information about the history of the Coptic (Egyptian) Bible. Of the translators we know nothing; of the time, very little. We do know that Greek was the theological language of the Egyptian Church until after the Council of Chalcedon (451), when the see of Alexandria severed its connections with Rome and Constantinople and pursued its own Monophysite paths. Although Coptic literature flowered most fully after Chalcedon, as Greek was rejected and the vernacular Coptic (the last stage of the Egyptian language) became the common tongue of cleric, monk, and layman, the beginnings of translation probably go back to the third century.

Whether the Sahidic translation from Upper (southern) Egypt or the Bohairic from Lower (northern) Egypt came first we have not yet discovered. Nor have scholars decided whether one translation was influenced by the other or whether they were made independently from the Greek.

The Sahidic version can only be pieced together from fragments and codices that range in date from the fourth to the fourteenth century. No single manuscript has been discovered covering the NT let alone the whole Bible. Though for liturgical purposes the gospels and Psalms may have been given priority by the translators, it is evident from the fragments discovered that the whole Greek Bible, as well as many apocryphal books, was available to the Sahidic-speaking Copts. The text seems to have followed the Neutral tradition prevalent in Egypt, with many affinities to the great Vaticanus manuscript (B), although with some Western readings.

The Bohairic version exists in more substantial manuscripts than the Sahidic and can be more readily reconstructed. The extant manuscripts, however, are generally younger; the earliest of the major ones (Curzon-Catena) dates from 889. The scarcity of earlier manuscripts (a fragment of Philippians from a fourth or fifth-century codex is a notable exception) is due both to the more moist climate of Lower Egypt and the frequent raids which sacked the library of the monastery of Wadi 'n-Natrun, the most productive center of Bohairic literature. The text of the NT follows closely the Alexandrian tradition, particularly Codex L, though it includes Aristion's ending of Mark.

Of the Akhmîmic version (Akhmîm in Upper Egypt) we have only fragments and scattered sections of both Testaments. Though the whole Bible may have been translated into Akhmîmic, little effort was made to preserve it once Sahidic replaced it as the language of the region.

A handful of verses from the gospels and a few fragments of Pauline epistles are our only legacy of the Faiyumic (Nile Valley, west bank) version, while a copy of the gospel of John is the chief biblical vestige of the Sub-Akhmîmic or Asyutic (Asyut, Upper Egypt) dialect.

The OT, extant mainly in Sahidic and Bohairic manuscripts, probably stems from the third century. In general it follows the so-called Hesychian recension of the Septuagint. The main value of the OT fragments is for Septuagint studies, while the various Coptic versions of the NT play a not insignificant role in helping to fill in the details of the history of textual transmission of the NT. The growing horde of fragments and codices is eloquent testimony to the vitality of Egyptian Christianity in the centuries before the Muslim invasion.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: For OT bibliography, see O. Eissfeldt, The Old Testament, An Introduction (tr. P.R. Ackroyd, 1965), pp. 713-14; for NT bibliography, see A. Vöobus, Early Versions of the New Testament (1954), pp. 211-41.

DAVID A. HUBBARD

EICHHORN, JOHANN GOTTFRIED (1752-1827). German biblical scholar. Born at Dörrenzimmern, he became professor at Jena (1775) and at Göttingen (1788). He dismissed as spurious many of the OT books and was a pioneer of "Higher Criticism."* His three-volumed introduction to the OT was influential for many years after its publication in 1780-83. Though purportedly based upon scientific study, the accuracy of some of his work has been questioned by scholars. He was one of the early advocates of the so-called primitive gospel hypothesis, which holds that all three synoptic gospels* are based on a lost Aramaic gospel.

EIGHTEENTH AMENDMENT. This amendment to the U.S. Constitution, ratified in 1919, prohibited "the manufacture, sale, or transportation of intoxicating liquors." Late nineteenth and early twentieth-century Protestantism, whether theologically evangelical or liberal, was devoted to the moral reform of society. The increase in drunkenness in growing urban industrial centers aroused reform-minded people. The temperance movement gradually grew in strength and shifted its emphasis from moderation to total abstinence enforced by law. There was widespread popular resentment against the Eighteenth Amendment, and it was difficult to enforce, especially in urban areas. Many people disregarded the law, and bootlegging became a lucrative business, bringing with it the establishment of violent, organized crime syndicates. The passage in 1933 of the Twenty-First Amendment repealed the Eighteenth Amendment, but left local or state authorities to deal with the right to make their own alcoholic beverages.

HARRY SKILTON

EKTHESIS, see ECTHESIS

ELDER, see PRESBYTER

ELECTION. In Christian theology this normally refers to the divine choice of persons to salvation. There are differences of approach to this, however. Augustine, Luther, and Calvin all held a doctrine of unconditional election, in which the choice is sovereign and in no way dependent upon anything in man. Arminius and Wesley held that it was conditional and was dependent upon the individual's faith, foreseen by God. Karl Barth* held that election applies primarily to Christ and so to mankind as seen in him. In the Barthian type of theology, therefore, election is not inconsistent with universalism, although by no means are all Barthians universalists.

In the OT, election terminology is applied to Abraham and to Israel, the election of which latter is a mystery of the divine love. The Son of God is seen in the NT to be God's Elect One (Matt. 12:18; Luke 9:35; 1 Pet. 2:4,6). Believers are chosen in Christ (Eph. 1:4), for only in him do we know God. This is a pretemporal election (Eph. 1:4; 2 Thess. 2:13). It is also according to divine foreknowledge, a term which has been understood historically in several ways. Christians are exhorted to make their calling and election sure, in a context which lays great emphasis on the moral qualities of Christian living (2 Pet. 1:10).

G.W. GROGAN

ELIAS, JOHN (1774-1841). Regarded by many as the greatest of all Welsh preachers, he was born John Jones, but adopted his grandfather's name out of respect for the spiritual nurture he had received from him. His only formal education was at a private school in his native Caernarvonshire. He was ordained a Calvinistic Methodist* minister in 1811. Although his published sermons are somewhat laborious, his power as a preacher was extraordinary. He had an overwhelming conviction of the truth and efficacy of the Gospel as a means of salvation, and of the inerrancy of Scripture. There was an intense seriousness in his preaching, and never a suggestion of humor. His voice was haunting and powerful; his finger stretched in accusation or raised in warning brought mockers to their knees. In theology he was an unreserved Calvinist and opposed with great determination the tendency to flirt with "Modern Calvinism," still less with Arminianism.

After the death of Thomas Jones* he was the unchallenged leader of the Calvinistic Methodists. He was a man of indomitable will and unyielding principle, and this produced a kind of autocracy which many younger men—and some of his contemporaries—resented. In political matters too he was a bitter critic of the radicalism that was emerging among Welsh nonconformists. He was a constitutionalist of the old school, with a decided bias in favor of Toryism. On the other hand, he was energetic in his promotion of moral virtue and social betterment. This, however, did not prevent his being nicknamed "the Anglesey Pope" because of his hostility to democratic agitation and Catholic emancipation. Even so, his influence as a preacher far exceeded that of any of his contemporaries, and the legend of his miraculous eloquence in the cause of the Gospel has not died away even yet in Wales.

See E. Morgan, Memoir (1844), and Letters, Essays ... of ... John Elias (1847).

R. TUDUR JONES

ELIAS OF CORTONA (c.1180-1253). Minister-general of the Franciscan Order. A lay brother, he and Francis of Assisi* had great mutual affection. Elias was provincial-minister of Syria (1217-20) and Francis's spokesman at the 1221 general chapter. Gregory IX entrusted him with the construction of the basilica at Assisi where Francis's body was to rest. Elias is the most controversial early Franciscan figure, gaining in his own lifetime an evil reputation among the friars which his declining years, spent with the excommunicated emperor Frederick II, could only confirm. Francis's death apparently deprived him of vital personal inspiration. His resolution weakened, Elias did display un-Franciscan pride and ostentation, but it was unjust and unhistorical of his enemies, in the light of his later deviations, to reinterpret the events of Francis's lifetime so that Elias even then appeared in a bad light. The official element in the order detested him because he favored lay brothers equally with clerics (as had Francis), did not obtain many privileges, and generally did not consult them in his decision-making. They had him deposed as minister-general by Gregory IX in 1239.

L. FEEHAN

ELIGIUS (c.588-660). Bishop and metalworker. A goldsmith in the Merovingian royal mint and master of the royal mint at Marseilles under Chlothar II, king of the Franks (613-28), Eligius became one of Dagobert I's chief advisers. He was a noted builder of abbeys and churches, including the abbey of St.-Denis, Paris. He also commissioned, or perhaps made, a number of reliquaries, though none survive. A renowned philanthropist, he was ordained in 640, consecrated bishop of Noyon and Tournai in 641, and proselytized among the many pagans in his diocese. Of the sixteen writings credited to him, only two—on Superstition and the Last Judgment—seem genuine. The Vita Eligii, supposedly written by St. Ouen, a contemporary and fellow adviser of Dagobert, is apparently a later work.

L. FEEHAN

ELIJAH OF MOQAN (fl. c.800-820). Eastern missionary bishop. As a monk of Bait Abe in the Arbil province of N Mesopotamia, he was an ascetic of simple faith and something of a mystic, achieving concentration by repeating "Hallelujah! Glory be to God!" before reciting each verse of a psalm. Appointed as missionary bishop to Moqan, on the SW shores of the Caspian, he insisted on being consecrated on the day of Pentecost, and Timothy I* agreed to this. Elijah's mission was among tree-worshipers, and culminated in his going single-handed and felling a great oak. His methods included preaching, teaching and healing, and distributing copies of prayers and hymns. He went to Bait Abe about 820 to report on his work, but died there before he could return.

WILLIAM G. YOUNG

ELIOT, JOHN (1604-1690). "Apostle to the Indians." Born in England, he graduated at Cambridge in 1622, was ordained in the Church of England, and taught for a time at an Essex school run by Thomas Hooker,* whose views were decidedly Nonconformist. Eliot came to share them, and this led to his leaving for the New World in 1631. In 1632 he became teacher to the church at Roxbury, which connection he retained until his death. Having perfected himself in the Indian dialects, he began his work among them in 1646. Having soon discovered that they preferred to live by themselves, he had by 1674 gathered his "praying Indians" (numbered at 3,600) into fourteen self-governing communities. The work at Natick, where the first Indian church was founded in 1660, was to continue until the death of the last native pastor in 1716. Eliot arranged for them to have jobs, housing, land, clothes. Teetotaler and nonsmoker himself, he did not forbid alcohol and tobacco to his converts. His fellow ministers, among whom he was held in high respect, approved his work, and money for the founding of schools and other purposes came in, even from England.

The medicine men were hostile, and when the war associated with King Philip's name broke out, a severe blow was struck to the mission cause. It was some years before enough support could again be enlisted. Eliot never despaired, and in 1689 gave seventy-five acres of land in Roxbury for the teaching of Indians and Negroes (he may have been the first to champion the latter also).

His literary zeal was not abandoned despite the incessant demands of his ministry. With Richard Mather and Thomas Welch he prepared for printing in 1640 an English metrical version of the Psalms. This *Bay Psalm Book was the first book printed in New England. He translated many works into the Massachusetts dialect of the Algonkian language; here his crowning achievement was the Bible (1661-63), the first time the Scriptures had been printed in North America. With the help of his sons he produced also an Indian grammar (1666). His translation of the Larger Catechism followed in 1669. He published also The Christian Commonwealth (1659), which curious work on government was suppressed by the authorities for its republican sympathies. Finally, his Harmony of the Gospels (1678) was a life of Jesus Christ. Renowned for learning, piety, evangelistic zeal, and practical wisdom, Eliot lived to a great age. "He that writes of Eliot," said Cotton Mather, "must write of charity, or say nothing."

See C. Mather, Magnalia (2 vols., 1820); and W. Walker, Ten New England Leaders (1901).

J.D. DOUGLAS

ELIOT, T(HOMAS) S(TEARNS) (1888-1965). Poet, dramatist, and critic. Born at St. Louis, Missouri, and educated at Harvard, Oxford, and the Sorbonne, he settled in England and worked first as a teacher and a bank clerk, afterward turning to journalism and ultimately to publishing. He edited The Criterion throughout its existence from 1922 to 1939, but his work as a critic began before this with The Sacred Wood (1920). In his later years his main creative work went into drama, but his chief fame rests upon his poetry. His early work such as "Prufrock" and "Gerontion" prepared the way for his statement of modern man's loneliness and isolation in The Waste Land (1922).

Some years later in For Lancelot Andrewes Eliot enumerated his now famous definition of himself as "classicist in literature, royalist in politics and Anglo-Catholic in religion." All his subsequent work, like that of Dryden whom he much admired, has sought to support ideas of order and authority. In particular he was concerned by the ways in which man fell short of a high ideal. Thus in Ash Wednesday he stresses appropriately the need for repentance, while in The Four Quartets he explores more subtly and more extensively man's hapless search without God, concluding impressively in the last, Little Gidding, that prayer is man's occupation even in a place of defeat. The need for sacrifice marks Eliot's drama right from the first, Murder in the Cathedral (1935), though perhaps it is most powerfully expressed in The Cocktail Party (1950)—but, as he emphasizes in the former, it must be sacrifice for the right reasons. Eliot is rigorous, and in Notes towards the Definition of Culture (1948) he argues boldly for an élitist ideal in modern mediocre and egalitarian society.

See Complete Poems and Plays (1969).

ARTHUR POLLARD

ELIPANDUS (c.718-802). Originator and exponent of Adoptianism* in Spain. In reaction against the teaching of Migetius that Jesus was one of the divine persons of the Trinity, he drew a very sharp distinction between the eternal Son, the second person of the Trinity, and the human nature of Christ. The Logos,* eternal Son of God, had adopted the humanity—not the person—with the result that Christ became the adoptive Son. Such views were condemned by the councils of Regensburg (792), Frankfort (794), and Aix-la-Chapelle (798), and by popes Adrian I and Leo III. Elipandus was metropolitan bishop of Toledo, and though his views were decisively condemned, his position was so strong—possibly because of the Muslim presence in Spain—that he was able to retain his see until his death.

HAROLD H. ROWDON

ELIZABETH I (1533-1603). Queen of England and Ireland from 1558. Daughter of Henry VIII and Anne Boleyn, she succeeded her Roman Catholic sister Mary at a time when the country was divided and nearly defenseless. Three decades later, the Armada's bid for a Spanish and Catholic England had been defeated, the flag of St. George flew in all the oceans, and the country was experiencing an extraordinary cultural flowering. It was a remarkable achievement for one who early had lost her mother (executed by her father), and had at twenty-one been imprisoned by her sister. She had learned to screen her thoughts from others and to circumvent difficulties with a resourcefulness which was just what England needed. Of rival religious dogmatisms she was impatient, but of the providence of God she had no doubt.

To the problems of state she brought a fine intellect. French, Latin, and Italian she spoke fluently, and she read Cyprian and Greek. Setting about securing a religious settlement (see ELIZABETHAN SETTLEMENT), she sensed that her subjects were now basically Protestant and prepared to move in that direction. Initially she dropped the title "Supreme Head of the Church," but left "Etc." at the end of her other titles to leave the needed loophole. In due course came the Act of Supremacy* and the Act of Uniformity.* Persecution there was, for this was an age when religion and politics could not be separated; but compared with the fury under Mary and the horrors on the Continent, it was comparatively little. It was a golden age of literature and exploration. The awakening power of the Commons was controlled by the queen with a dexterity the Stuarts could not produce. The Scottish Reformers' need for military help was met at precisely the right moment, and James's succession was prepared for. Possessed of extraordinary powers of rapid decision, she could temporize when it seemed prudent; only over the vexed and complex case of Mary Stuart did she long hesitate before consigning her to the executioner.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: A.L. Rowse, The England of Elizabeth (2 vols., 1951-55); J.E. Neale, Queen Elizabeth I (rep. 1952), and Elizabeth I and Her Parliaments (2 vols., 1953-57); J.B. Black, The Reign of Elizabeth, 1558-1603 (2nd ed., 1959).

P.W. PETTY

ELIZABETHAN SETTLEMENT (1559). The changes effected in English ecclesiastical affairs after the Protestant Elizabeth I* had succeeded the Roman Catholic Mary in 1558. Briefly, these involved: the abolition once more of papal power in England, and the restoration of Henry VIII's* ecclesiastical legislation, with penalties for recusants; an Act of Supremacy* that declared the queen to be "supreme of all persons and causes, ecclesiastical as well as civil"; an Act of Uniformity,* accepting (in the main) Edward VI's Second Prayer Book, making orders about vestments and ornaments, and reenacting Edward VI's "Articles of Religion," reduced from forty-two to thirty-nine; and the dissolution of those monasteries that had been restored by Mary.

The Settlement only gained partial success; it was opposed by papists and Puritans. Pius V excommunicated Elizabeth in 1570, but the short shrift given to priests who infiltrated the country about 1579 showed where the majority opinion lay. Protestants for their part chafed at the moderate nature of the Settlement, and some left the national church to form separate congregations; hence the origin of Independency. The outcome of the queen's policies, nevertheless, was the emergence of an essentially Protestant religion identified in English minds with patriotism, and the rejection of Spain and other foreign elements. Elizabeth never asserted the Divine Right* theory that was to prove the downfall of the Stuart dynasty; she had a sure touch in stirring up and maintaining loyalty, and was generally discriminating in furthering the Protestant cause in her kingdom. While not notably possessed of strong personal beliefs, she showed great wisdom in choosing as archbishop of Canterbury Matthew Parker* who for sixteen years from 1559 firmly resolved ecclesiastical disorder.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: C.S. Meyer, Elizabeth I and the Religious Settlement of 1559 (1960); see also bibliography for previous entry. J.D. DOUGLAS

ELIZABETH OF HUNGARY (1207-1231). Ascetic. The daughter of King Andrew of Hungary, she was betrothed to Louis IV of Thuringia at the age of four and married him ten years later when he was twenty-one. During her husband's short lifetime she gained a reputation for prayer and charitable works; on one occasion in 1225 she gave away food and money despite her officials' protests. In 1227 Louis died of plague while on crusade, leaving her widowed with three children. Louis's body was brought home in 1228 and buried at Reinhardsbrunn. That same year she became a member of the Third Order of St. Francis. From then until her premature death she led a life of rigorous self-mortification and service to Marburg's poor and sick. Her spiritual adviser, and renowned Franciscan inquisitor Conrad of Marburg,* exercised some restraint over her enthusiasm, but in other ways his methods were very extreme. Germany's first Gothic cathedral, the Elizabethskirche, was built for her body by her brother-in-law Conrad, and it was translated there in 1236 with Emperor Frederick II in the audience. In 1539 the Protestant Philip of Hesse moved her body, and its subsequent fate is unknown. L. FEEHAN

ELKESAITES. Elkesai lived about 100. It is not clear whether he was an Ebionite* who developed particular views, or whether he came from a common background. He stressed the Law, though cutting out the false pericopes, rejected sacrifices and Paul, and taught vegetarianism. His Christology seems to have been Ebionite. In addition he claimed a special revelation given him by an angel (the Son of God) and a feminine being (the Holy Spirit). There is a common background for many of his concepts and the Shepherd of Hermas. Though strongly ascetic, there was an insistence on marriage and a great stress on baptism. Because his teaching was somewhat more orthodox than that of the Ebionites and showed more Gnostic tendencies, it spread to Alexandria and Rome. We know details largely through quotations in Hippolytus and Epiphanius.

See fragments of the "Book of Elkesai" in Hilgenfeld; its main points are given by J. Daniélou, The Theology of Jewish Christianity (1964).

H.L. ELLISON

ELLERTON, JOHN (1826-1893). English hymnwriter. Educated at Cambridge where he was influenced by F.D. Maurice* but did not identify himself with any party in the Church of England, he held several parochial appointments from 1850. His last living was at White Roding, Essex. Among the hymnals he co-edited were Church Hymns (1871, with W.W. How*); The Children's Hymn Book (1881, again with How); and Ancient and Modern (1875 and 1889). His own eighty-six compositions, which he refused to copyright, were included mostly in his Hymns Original and Translated (from the Latin, 1888). Many are still sung, e.g., "Behold us, Lord, a little space"; "Saviour, again to Thy dear name we raise"; "The day Thou gavest, Lord, is ended"; and "Throned upon the awful tree." JOHN S. ANDREWS

ELLICOTT, CHARLES JOHN (1819-1905). Bishop of Gloucester. Educated at grammar schools and at St. John's College, Cambridge (elected fellow in 1845), he held an incumbency in Rutland from 1848, and was thereafter professor of divinity at King's College, London (1858-61), and Hulsean professor of divinity at Cambridge (1860-61). Dean of Exeter in 1861, he became bishop of Gloucester and Bristol in 1863. On the separation of the sees in 1897, he was bishop of Gloucester until his resignation in 1905. He was a notably energetic diocesan, chairman of the New Testament Revision Company for eleven years, wrote a series of highly acclaimed commentaries on most of the Pauline epistles, and a number of other religious and theological books.

HOWARD SAINSBURY

ELMO (c.1190-1246). Dominican preacher. The popular name for Peter Gonzalez. Of a noble Castilian family, he was educated by his uncle, the bishop of Astorga, and was appointed to a canonry while still under age. He renounced his easy life, however, and became a Dominican. As chaplain to Ferdinand III of Leon, he helped him in his crusade against the Moors, but urged generosity after their defeat at Cordova. Subsequently he left the court and began to preach among the poor and sailors of Galicia and the Spanish coast. A very popular preacher, he later came to be regarded as the patron saint of Spanish and Portuguese sailors. They called the electrical discharge sometimes seen on the decks of ships "Elmo's fire," and regarded it as a sign of his protection.

C. PETER WILLIAMS

ELVIRA, COUNCIL OF (c.305). Held in Spain after a period of persecution, it was attended by nineteen bishops and a number of presbyters. The council reveals a community facing the problems created by rapid conversion followed by something of a decline from the original fervor. The problems basically resolve themselves around the degree of compromise acceptable in a mixed pagan-Christian society. Thus the eighty-one canons deal with matters such as continued nominal attachment to the pagan priesthood, remarriage, adultery, and celibacy amongst the clergy. The penalties are severe, including lifelong excommunication, without the possibility of reconciliation, for offenses such as sacrificing and bigamy. There is also evidence of a developing asceticism in a regulation for virgins "who have dedicated themselves to God."

C. PETER WILLIAMS

EMBER DAYS. Fast days on the Wednesdays, Fridays, and Saturdays after St. Lucy's Day (13 December), the first Sunday in Lent, Whitsunday, and Holy Cross Day (14 September), which are peculiar to the Western Church. The origin of these days is obscure, but probably three of the four groups were a Christianization of the pagan religious fasts connected with seedtime, harvest, and autumn vintage. As Christian observances, they were well established at Rome by the pontificate of Leo I (440-61), but not until the eleventh century was the practice finally fixed. During the Middle Ages these fasts became associated with ordination. The Anglican Church retains this association, appoints two special collects for Ember Weeks, and normally ordains ministers on the following Sunday. It is suggested that the name "ember" is a corruption of the Latin quatuor tempora—"four seasons."

JOHN A. SIMPSON

EMBURY, PHILIP (1728-1773). Probably the first Methodist minister in America. Born in Ireland of a German Palatinate refugee family, he was a carpenter by trade. John Wesley's preaching led to his conversion in 1752, and he became a local preacher in Ireland six years later. He migrated to New York City in 1760. Barbara Heck* encouraged him to preach to migrants who were spiritually careless, and he did this in a meeting in his own home in 1766. He erected a chapel in New York in 1768. He later moved to Camden, New York, where he worked as a carpenter and preached on Sundays until his early death on the farm.

EMERSON, RALPH WALDO (1803-1882). American "Transcendentalist" minister. Descended from nine successive generations of ministers, he graduated from Harvard College and attended the divinity school there before accepting a pastorate in 1829 at Second Church of Boston, then Congregationalist and now Unitarian. For years he struggled over his faith and his vocation. Except for preaching, he disliked his work in the ministry. His sermons increasingly complained about "historical Christianity," denied the distinction between natural and supernatural, and stressed the immanence of God. In 1832, with his refusal to administer Communion as the immediate reason, he resigned his pastorate. His first book, Nature, which became a kind of Transcendentalist bible, appeared in 1836, but it was his address before the Harvard Divinity School in 1838 which clearly drew the lines of the Unitarian controversy. Emerson's Christ was strictly human; he advocated a "faith in man," not "in Christ" but "like Christ's." The battle over Christology and miracles was in the open.

Emerson's mature religious thought was essentially pantheistic and syncretistic. His essays were more suggestive than closely reasoned, and in pieces like "Self-Reliance" he advocated a religion of self. His rebellion against Lockean epistemology was an intuitionist stance strongly influenced by German Romanticism via Coleridge and Carlyle. His extreme optimism about man's moral nature and potential was tempered somewhat in his later writings. He was a successful lecturer and essayist during the 1840s and 1850s. Despite his reformist philosophy he kept aloof from the slavery controversy until the 1850s. His most famous writings were the Essays of 1841 and a second series in 1844. Other writings include Poems (1847); Representative Men (1850); English Traits (1856); and The Conduct of Life (1860).

BIBLIOGRAPHY: The twelve-volume "Centenary Edition" (1903-4) of his Works edited by his son Edward Waldo Emerson is considered standard, though it has been supplemented by several later volumes of uncollected lectures, sermons, and letters. The definitive biography is that of R.L. Rusk (1949). For the history of Emerson's role in the Unitarian controversy see W.R. Hutchison, The Transcendentalist Ministers: Church Reform in the New England Renaissance (1959).

JOAN OSTLING

EMINENCE. From a root (eminere) expressive of loftiness or prominence in a physical sense, an ecclesiastical title of honor was derived. It was limited by Urban VIII in 1630 to the grand master of the order of Malta, the three archiepiscopal electors of the Holy Roman Empire, and the cardinals in general—which latter usage alone has survived.

EMMANUEL, see IMMANUEL

EMMONS, NATHANAEL (1745-1840). Congregational theologian. Born in rural Connecticut and educated at Yale College, he entered the ministry of the Congregational Church. He served as pastor at Franklin, Massachusetts, from 1773 to 1827, during which period he published more than two hundred articles in periodicals, and personally instructed about one hundred young men in theology and preaching, many of whom attained positions of leadership in the church and in theological education. He generally followed the teaching of Jonathan Edwards* as developed by Samuel Hopkins,* but Emmons elaborated the Hopkinsian theology further into a system called "Consistent Calvinism." He affirmed that "holiness and sin consist in free, voluntary exercises"; consequently only Adam, and not mankind generally, was guilty of original sin. Yet God in His sovereignty determined to treat Adam's posterity as sinners. God executes His decision that all men must "choose evil before they choose good" by "directly operating on the hearts of children when they first become moral agents." In fact God Himself placed within Adam the first inclination to evil, which resulted in the Fall. Emmons believed it is consistent with God's righteousness to implant either sinful or holy exercises within man. Men act freely at the same time they are being determined by divine agency. Although God determines that men sin, he has the "right to require them to turn from sin to holiness." Therefore, preachers should "exhort sinners to love God, repent of sin, and believe in Christ immediately." He helped to found the Massachusetts Missionary Society, favored the abolition of slavery, was a zealous patriot during the American Revolution, and became a Federalist thereafter. HARRY SKILTON

EMS, CONGRESS OF (1786). A meeting at Ems in Hesse-Nassau of the representatives of the three elector-archbishops of Mainz, Cologne, and Trier, and the prince-archbishop of Salzburg. It sought to prevent a papal move to establish a new nunciature at Munich that would have enabled the Bavarian crown to communicate directly with Rome instead of through the archbishops as before. Another nunciature had been created at Cologne. The congress adopted the twenty-three "Points of Ems," embracing both Febronian and Josephinian principles, asserting the political and ecclesiastical claims of the elector- or prince-archbishops. They would: accept only a limited primacy of the pope, require episcopal assent to papal communications and decrees, discontinue appeals to Rome and payment of annates to the Roman Curia, hold authority over members of religious orders themselves. Joseph II approved the points, but many bishops and German princes opposed them as unwarranted usurpation of authority by the archbishops. The effect of the French Revolution in Germany terminated the controversy. C.T. MC INTIRE

EMSER, HIERONYMOUS (1477-1527). German editor and essayist, and Luther's bitterest opponent. After study at Tübingen (1493) and Basle (1497), he taught classics at Leipzig. As George of Saxony's secretary at Dresden, he was present at the 1519 Leipzig debate with Duke George. Emser broke with Luther and exposed him in a defense of papal primacy. Luther responded in the famous retort, "On the stinking Goat Emser," burning Emser's writings with the canon law and papal bull of excommunication in 1520. When Luther's "December Bible" of 1522 appeared, Emser prepared a German version identical in appearance, even using Cranach* woodcuts. Luther scorned this "correction" in On Translating: An Open Letter. In 1523 Emser wrote a Defense of the Canon of the Mass Against Huldreich Zwingli. Zwingli answered in 1524 with the Antibolon. Emser's polemics ended only with his death at Dresden.

MARVIN D. ANDERSON

ENCRATITES. The name is derived from the Greek enkrateia, "self-control," and was applied to various groups by Irenaeus, Clement of Alexandria, and Hippolytus. It was never used precisely, but included all those movements given to extremer ascetic practices. Their origins go back to Jewish Christianity, especially inasmuch as it was influenced by Qumran, to Gnosticism, and to those Docetic sects influenced by Greek philosophy. They tended to reject the use of wine (which, as among the Ebionites, would influence the celebration of the Lord's Supper) and of meat. Often marriage was repudiated. These groups were not necessarily heretical, but they were always in danger of going too far. Two of their leading figures were Tatian* (according to Jerome) and Julius Cassian, who expressed the ideals of the movement in his book Peri Eunouchias.

H.L. ELLISON

ENCYCLICAL. That which "circles around." The term is applied especially to epistolary literature: Paul's letter to the Ephesians represents the earliest example within Christian documents: his statement in Colossians 4:16 provides explication of both intention and operational mode. In the subsequent generation several of the documents now grouped under Apostolic Fathers were similarly intended, and thereafter any of the letters of a bishop to his church. Modern terminological usage distinguishes churchwide teachings of the bishop of Rome.

ENCYCLOPEDISTS. A term applied to the philosophes of the Enlightenment* who contributed articles to the Encyclopedia. Published between 1751 and 1772, and edited by Denis Diderot* and Jean d'Alembert, this was the most prodigious intellectual undertaking of the eighteenth century. The encyclopedists intended that it be a source of information and means of education in the crafts, sciences, and every area of learning, and serve as a clearinghouse for new ideas on religion, politics, and society. Prominent themes were the autonomy of man, the secularization of knowledge and thought, the natural goodness and perfectibility of human nature, and a belief in reason, science, and progress. Because it exposed abuses in the French government and Roman Catholic Church, it was officially suppressed in 1759, but continued to circulate freely.

RICHARD V. PIERARD

ENDECOTT (Endicott), JOHN (c.1589-1665). Puritan colonial governor of Massachusetts. Born in England, he emigrated to Salem, Massachusetts, in 1628, moved to Boston, and was chosen governor in 1629. After John Winthrop,* the already-appointed governor, arrived in the colony in 1630, Endecott's life was a stormy one. His hot temper and impetuous acts led to his removal from public office, fines for assault and battery, and a generally controversial career. His ineffective expeditions against the Indians may have led to the noted Pequot War in 1637. Following Winthrop's death, he served as governor for thirteen years; he was also active earlier in the founding of Harvard College. Always a zealous Puritan, he opposed the Quakers even to the extent of having some of them publicly executed. Some historians regard him as the real "Father of Massachusetts."

DONALD M. LAKE

ENERGUMENS (Gr. energoumenoi). In general ecclesiastical usage, those whose bodies were possessed by an evil spirit. The early church made special provision for such and placed them in the oversight of exorcists. Baptism was denied them until a complete cure had been effected. In cases where church members were afflicted, they were debarred from the sanctuary and restricted to the outer porch. A partial cure permitted them to rejoin public worship, but not to communicate until wholly restored. Rules regarding baptism and Communion, however, could be waived where death appeared to be imminent.

See also EXORCISM.

ENGLAND, CHURCH OF. The origins of English Christianity are unknown, but the presence of British bishops at the Council of Arles (314) indicates the existence of an organized church. Following the Roman withdrawal and the Teutonic invasions, Christianity retreated to the Celtic lands, but in the late sixth and early seventh centuries, a Roman mission under Augustine* and a Celtic mission under Aidan* began the reconversion of England. Celtic and Roman Christians disagreed over several minor customs, but the Synod of Whitby (663/4) secured the observance of Roman forms. Theodore of Tarsus,* archbishop of Canterbury (668-90), united and organized the church on a diocesan basis, but though continental monastic reform influences were felt during the tenth century, under Dunstan* the English church was largely isolated from continental ecclesiastical affairs until the Norman invasion of 1066. William I and his archbishop, Lanfranc,* brought the church into line with the main features of the Hildebrandine reform, though William himself managed to avoid a complete subservience to the papacy. The Investiture Controversy* had repercussions in England in the conflict between Anselm* and first William II and then Henry I; the church-state struggle for supremacy produced its most dramatic example in England with the quarrel between Henry II and Thomas Becket* over the trial of criminous clerks, resulting in Becket's martyrdom and consequent victory. The triumph of papalism was clearly seen in King John's recognition of the kingdom as a papal fief in 1213, after the lifting of the papal interdict, and during the thirteenth century the extension of canon law gave the papacy wide influence in England. However, distance from Rome, the conflict between England and France (which in the fourteenth century controlled the papacy), and also papal decline made English submission more nominal than real in the later Middle Ages.

By the sixteenth century the situation was such that it was an easy matter for Henry VIII* to use his divorce from Catherine of Aragon as grounds for detaching England from the papal obedience. The parliament of 1532-36 created Henry "Supreme Head on earth of the Church of England" and severed the financial, judicial, and administrative bonds between England and Rome—a move supported by the majority in the church. For financial more than religious reasons, the monasteries were dissolved (1536-39), but otherwise the church retained a Catholic position. Under Edward VI* (1547-53), the church underwent a liturgical and doctrinal reformation, linked particularly with the two Prayer Books of 1549 and 1552, the latter being distinctly Protestant in character. The accession of Mary Tudor* (1553-58) inaugurated a period of Roman reaction, during which many of the Edwardine reformers were martyred, including Thomas Cranmer,* Nicholas Ridley,* and Hugh Latimer,* as well as many ordinary people. Elizabeth I* (1558-1603) restored a Protestant settlement, but her aim was a comprehensive, national, episcopal church, with the monarch as Supreme Governor. The Elizabethan Prayer Book was based on the 1552 Book, but with significant changes to assist comprehension, and the same moderate Protestantism was reflected in the church's doctrinal basis, the Thirty-Nine Articles of Religion.* A Puritan party, wanting to influence Anglicanism in a Calvinistic direction, emerged under Elizabeth, but the queen would allow no interference in the Elizabethan Settlement,* and in the writings of John Jewel* and Richard Hooker,* Anglicanism gained its classic Via Media statements. Puritan hopes were dashed when James I* maintained Elizabeth's policy, and further conflict resulted from the emergence of a High Church "Laudian" party, with Arminian emphases, and a stress on the Church of the Fathers, worship, and ceremonial. The dispute between Laudians and Puritans was the religious counterpart of the conflict between Charles I* and Parliament, and with the Civil War, Parliament abolished episcopacy and the Prayer Book, and executed Archbishop William Laud* (1645). Though proscribed during the Commonwealth and Protectorate, Anglicanism survived and with the Restoration of Charles II* in 1660 the Church of England was restored to its position as the national church. The Prayer Book, with Laudian alterations, came into force again in 1662, and the Clarendon Code* imposed legal disabilities on all who would not conform to the national church.

The post-Restoration church had its High and Low wings, the High Churchmen maintaining Laudian emphases, and Low Churchmen (or Latitudinarians), inspired by the Cambridge Platonists,* stressing the place of reason in religion. Like most Protestant denominations, the Anglican Church was affected by Deism* in the eighteenth century, but the key movement of this period was the Evangelical Revival (see REVIVALISM), with its emphasis on justification by faith, personal conversion, and the Bible. Though the Wesleys and Whitefield increasingly worked outside the Anglican system, a sizable Evangelical party emerged in the church, valuing the Prayer Book and the parish system, gaining its leadership from laymen such as William Wilberforce and the members of the Clapham Sect.* Eighteenth-century Anglicanism also produced important philosophers in George Berkeley* and William Paley.*

The early nineteenth century with its movements for Catholic Emancipation, the removal of Nonconformist disabilities, utilitarian reform of the church, and parliamentary reorganization of the Irish Church, saw the position of the Establishment threatened. A financial, administrative, and diocesan reform of the church, bringing it into line with a modern world, was undertaken by Parliament and the newly created Ecclesiastical Commissioners, under Bishop Blomfield, but spirituality was revived by the Oxford Movement,* led by J.H. Newman,* John Keble,* and E.B. Pusey,* with an emphasis on the church, apostolic succession, sacramental grace, and ascetic holiness. By many the movement was seen as a Romanizing tendency, a suspicion which seemed to be confirmed by the secession of Newman and others to Rome in 1845; but the majority in the movement were loyal in their Anglicanism and weathered persecution within the church, though until the mid-twentieth century party conflict has been rife.

In 1854 the convocations of the clergy were revived, thereby giving the church a forum for debate. But though laymen began to be more involved in church affairs in the later part of the nineteenth century, it was not until the passing of the Enabling Act (1919) and the creation of the church assembly* and parish church councils that laymen gained an official place in church government; and not until the introduction of synodical government in 1970 have clergy and laity achieved an equal footing in the councils of the church.

Since the mid-nineteenth century, due to the activity of the Christian Socialists,* the church has become increasingly aware of its social responsibilities, and a number of Anglicans, particularly Archbishop William Temple,* have played a prominent role in this sphere.

Having both Catholic and Protestant features, the Anglican Church has had an important function within the ecumenical movement, but to date her attempts at union negotiations with other churches have not achieved success. Like other denominations, the Anglican Church has been affected by the Liturgical Movement,* and despite the abortive attempt to revise the Prayer Book in 1928, liturgical reform has gone ahead since 1965, by the use of alternative services for experimental periods. Theologically, neo-biblicalism dominated the church from the thirties until the early sixties, but radicalism has had a growing influence since, as has conservative evangelicalism, which has grown numerically since World War II.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: H. Gee and W. Hardy, Documents Illustrative of English Church History (1896); W.R.W. Stephens and W. Hunt, A History of the English Church (9 vols., 1899-1910); J.R.H. Moorman, A History of the Church in England, (3rd ed., 1973). JOHN A. SIMPSON

ENHYPOSTASIA. While the term itself does not appear in patristic citation, and even the English lexicon knows only the rare verbal form "to enhypostatize" as late nineteenth-century encyclopedic jargon, the doctrinal concept is descriptive of the effort by the sixth-century theologian Leontius of Byzantium* to recast the formula of Chalcedon in an Aristotelian framework under the political pressure from Justinian's demand to settle the Monophysite question. Leontius's term ("intrahypostatic"), from which derives the descriptive heading, is meant to define the unity of substance (hypostasis) one nature may achieve with another, so that its own peculiarity (eidos) is retained. To Leontius and his time the analogy of soul and body, or fire and torch, provided examples, which then permitted the divine-human life of Christ to be described in terms made famous by Cyril of Alexandria. CLYDE CURRY SMITH

ENLIGHTENMENT (Aufklärung), THE. A movement seen in particularly clear-cut form in eighteenth-century Germany. Karl Barth characterized it as "a system founded upon the presupposition of faith in the omnipotence of human ability." Immanuel Kant defined it in his Religion Within the Bounds of Reason Only (1793): "The Enlightenment represents man's emergence from a self-inflicted state of minority. A minor is one who is incapable of making use of his understanding without guidance from someone else ... Sapere aude! Have the courage to make use of your own understanding, is therefore the watchword of the Enlightenment." According to F.A.G. Tholuck, the theological and philosophical pacemaker of the Aufklärung was Christian Wolff (1679-1754), who sought the path to absolute truth through "pure reason." A more radical form is seen in H.S. Reimarus.* Influenced by English Deists, he rejected supernatural revelation and expressed this in his Wolfenbüttel Fragments, published after the author's death by G.E. Lessing.* The latter held that man had developed beyond the need for Christianity (Education of the Human Race, 1780). In Lessing's best-known work, Nathan the Wise (1779), he argued that truth was found in Christianity, Islam, and Judaism, therefore toleration was imperative.

Predicated upon the reliability of reason, the Aufklärung rejected both supernatural revelation and man's sinfulness. God, the all-wise creator, had implanted in man a natural religion which taught both morality and immortality.

WAYNE DETZLER

ENNODIUS, MAGNUS FELIX (c.473-521). Bishop of Pavia. He was born at Arles, but with the invasion of the Visigoths was brought up either in Pavia or Milan. He married in 489, and this saved him from poverty, but by mutual consent the marriage was subsequently renounced when he was ordained deacon by Epiphanius, bishop of Pavia, about 493. In the years that followed he taught rhetoric at Milan. In 494 he accompanied Epiphanius on an embassy to Gundebaud, king of the Burgundians, to procure the ransom of prisoners. In the dispute over the succession to Pope Anastasius II (d.498), he defended Symmachus and the synod of 501 acquitted him. Somewhat later he composed a panegyric to Theodoric who had confirmed Symmachus's election.

Ennodius succeeded Maximus II in the see of Pavia about 514, and in 515 and 517 he was sent by Pope Hormisdas on an embassy to the emperor Anastasius I to oppose the Monophysite heresy and to effect a reconciliation between Rome and the East necessitated by the Acacian Schism.* Neither embassy was successful, and the schism continued until the succession of Justin in 518. The abundant writings of Ennodius are strongly imbued with pagan culture and are unattractive in style. They throw valuable light, however, on the age in which he lived.

DAVID JOHN WILLIAMS

EPARCHY. While Greek of the fifth century B.C. (Aeschylus) could identify a commanding officer as eparchos, significant usage began with observation of the expansion of Roman jurisdiction. From Polybius the term equates the Latin praefectus (1 Clem. 37.3) and eparchia, the province under his jurisdiction (Acts 23:34). Patristic citation, while noting the variations of third century A.D. Roman imperial reform, retained the basic meaning, adding only to it the awareness of Christian ecclesiastical presence directly within the imperial framework. Hence "eparchy" became also the jurisdiction of the metropolitan,* that bishop of a province being referred to as eparchiotēs.

CLYDE CURRY SMITH

EPHESIANS, EPISTLE TO THE, see EPISTLES, PAULINE

EPHESUS. The chief city of the Roman province of Asia, it stood at the crossroads of the coast route between Smyrna and Cyzicus and the interior route up the Maeander and Lycus valleys. It has a long history traceable to one of the twelve cities of the Ionean Confederation, first founded by early Greek colonists about 1044 B.C. About 560 B.C., the city was relocated to low ground and henceforth the great temple of Artemis became a focal feature of Ephesus. In 287 B.C. the city site was changed again, and this Hellenic foundation lasted for another thousand years. The plan was shaped like a bent bow between Pion and the hill of Astyages. Many fine buildings were added by the Romans, especially in the time of Augustus when a destructive earthquake in A.D. 17 had occurred. At its peak Ephesus possibly reached 500,000 inhabitants. By the tenth century A.D., however, the city had become completely deserted.

Christianity possibly first reached Ephesus with the visit of Paul, Aquila, and Priscilla (Acts 18:18,19). On his third missionary journey Paul stayed there for two years (Acts 19:8,10), attracted no doubt by its strategic importance, its large Jewish colony, its nodality and wealth. During this second visit, Christianity spread to the other churches of the Lycus valley (Col. 1:7; 2:1). At Ephesus the cult of Artemis was extremely popular. It is a cult known from archaeological evidence to have been widespread in over thirty places of the ancient world, but her temple in Ephesus was one of the Seven Wonders of the World. The temple's riches were such that it was the biggest bank of Asia (cf. Acts 19:27). It is no wonder that the economic effects of Paul's preaching there are highlighted (Acts 19:10,26), and a large church established (1 Cor. 16:9).

BIBLIOGRAPHY: W.M. Ramsay, The Historical Geography of Asia Minor (1890) and The Letters to the Seven Churches (1908); D.G. Hogarth, Excavations at Ephesus. The Archaic Artemisia (1908); E.F. Campbell and D.N. Freedman (eds.), The Biblical Archaeologist Reader, vol. 2 (1964), pp. 331-52.

JAMES M. HOUSTON

EPHESUS, COUNCIL OF (431). Summoned by Emperor Theodosius II to solve the problems raised by the Nestorian controversy, it has become known as the Third General Council. With sixty bishops present, it was opened by Cyril,* bishop of Alexandria. Neither the Syrian bishops (who were expected to support Nestorius) nor the representatives of the bishop of Rome were present. Nestorius was deposed from his see and excommunicated; his theology was condemned, the faith of Nicea reaffirmed. *Theotokos was approved as a right title for the Virgin Mary; Pelagianism, the Western heresy that had been gaining ground in the East, was anathematized; and Chiliasm was condemned. When the Syrian bishops arrived they held a rival meeting where Cyril and Memnon, bishop of Ephesus, were excommunicated. But it was Cyril's assembly that was eventually endorsed by the papal legates when they arrived. John of Antioch (the Syrian leader) and Cyril were reconciled two years later, but the Nestorian schism gained momentum and led to the separate Nestorian Church, although the emperor tried to prevent this.

PETER TOON

EPHESUS, ROBBER SYNOD OF (449). It is often called "Latrocinium," a name derived from an expression in Pope Leo's letter to Empress Pulcheria where he described the synod as being non iudicium sed latrocinium. (Latrocinium = robber or band of robbers.) The purpose of this council, called by Theodosius II, was to consider the implications of the condemnation of Eutyches* at the Synod of Constantinople in 448. In fact, under the influence of the Monophysite Dioscorus, patriarch of Alexandria, the synod reinstated Eutyches and deposed his opponents. The papal legates who carried the famous Tome of Pope Leo were insulted. The decisions were reversed at the Council of Chalcedon in 451.

PETER TOON

EPHOR. From a verbal root ephoraō already in Homer conveying general vision and specific supervision, there emerged the designation for a specific office of overseer, ephoros. By the time of Herodotus the five annual eponymous ephors at Sparta were understood to constitute its government. General usage is also known, since it is but a rarer, alternate Greek derivation with little essential distinction from episkopos. Hence, by the fifth century A.D. Philostorgius can make the equation, apply a verbal form to the bishop's rule, and identify by nominal derivative the diocese of Tyre. "Ephor" takes on a restricted use after the tenth century, when it is applied to the lay overseer of Byzantine monastic property.

CLYDE CURRY SMITH

EPHRAEM THE SYRIAN (c.306-373). The great classical writer of the Syrian Church, he was born at Nisibis. It is uncertain whether his parents were Christian. After baptism in early manhood he was made deacon about 338. At some time he probably lived as a monk, but apparently never entered the priesthood. After the Persian occupation of Nisibis, he fled to Edessa where his life was spent in teaching, preaching, and literary activities. Details of his life are few: there is no contemporary biography, and much legendary accretion. His writings are many, covering differing aspects of theology and church life. In exegesis, commentaries on Genesis, Exodus, the "concordant gospel" (i.e., harmony, viz. the Diatessaron), Paul, and Acts have survived, with fragments of other work in the catenae and elsewhere. His dogmatic works are all in polemical form, against Bar-Daisan, Marcion, and Mani, against Julian the Apostate, and other topics. The ascetic life also is his theme, both in spiritual teaching and in the praise of famous ascetics, while he also composed many hymns and poems, among the latter the Nisibene hymns which reflect contemporary conditions and events up to 363. Many polemical and ascetic works are in the metrical form "memre" (the poetical form is called "madrash").

Ephraem's teaching is orthodox, but conveyed in flowery rhetoric, and a definitive study of his theology is still lacking. His poetic gifts were much prized among the Syrians, however, and they named him "the lyre of the Holy Spirit." To this is due the wide popularity of his works, of which there is a rich and complex tradition; in Syriac much has been lost, but early translation into Armenian has preserved much. The Greek tradition is also fairly early, and from it stems translation into Latin and Christian Oriental languages. Much spurious matter has also been attributed to him, and the whole tradition still represents an important area of patristic research.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: F.C. Burkitt, Early Eastern Christianity (1904), pp. 95-110; O. Bardenhewer, Geschichte der altkirchlichen Literatur, vol. IV (1924), pp. 342-75; I. Ortiz de Urbina, Patrologia syriaca (2nd ed., 1965), chap. 3.

J.N. BIRDSALL

EPHRATA SOCIETY. A cloistered, Protestant commune founded at Ephrata, Pennsylvania, by German Pietist mystic J.K. Beissel* and his Dunker disciples. By 1750 some 300 Brethren and Sisters lived in monastic austerity within the cloister, practicing celibacy and pacifism, keeping Saturday as the Sabbath, sharing agricultural and trade labor, and holding all property and profit in common. The society printed about 200 books from 1745 to 1800, most notably Martyr's Mirror by Mennonite J.V.T. Braght and the first American edition of Pilgrim's Progress. The first music printed in America was published at Ephrata, often embellished in the European monastic tradition by the Sisters. Led by scholar and linguist Peter Miller after Beissel's death (1768), the society, with its monastic features deteriorating, incorporated as the German Religious Society of the Seventh-Day Baptists in 1814, finally dissolving in 1934.

D.E. PITZER

EPICTETUS (c.50-c.130). Stoic philosopher. Born a slave, probably at Hierapolis in Phrygia, he was permitted to sit under Rufus, a teacher of Stoicism, and later was given his freedom. As a young teacher in Rome, Epictetus met with some success until expelled by Domitian about A.D. 90. He wrote nothing, but some of his lectures were taken down by a disciple and are entitled Discourses of Epictetus and Encheiridion (the latter is shorter and more popular). While his conception of God is more akin to that posited in Christian theology than in Stoic pantheism, his discourses reveal only one reference to the Christians. Thus it is difficult to argue that the Christian viewpoint was a significant factor in the formulation of his philosophy, although there is a close similarity in statements relating to morality.

WATSON E. MILLS

EPICUREANISM. Popularly this is taken as equivalent to hedonism. More strictly, however, Epicureanism regarded some pleasures as unnatural, and some unnecessary, emphasizing the need for practical wisdom to secure pleasure. This ethical emphasis was part of an antiskeptical philosophy in which knowledge was derived from sense-experience which gave rise to skepticism-defeating "anticipations." Epicureans advocated the avoidance of political and public responsibilities, and the cultivation of friendship. Epicureanism was revived by Gassendi and became popular with the English Deists and French encyclopedists. Paul encountered Epicureans at Mars Hill (Acts 17). The teaching of Epicurus (341-270 B.C.) can be found summarized in Diogenes Laertius's Life of Epicurus (Book X of the Lives).

PAUL HELM

EPIPHANIUS (c.315-403). Bishop of Salamis. After a brief visit to meet Egyptian monks, he founded at Eleutheropolis in Judea (c.335) a monastery. In 367 he was elected by the bishops of Cyprus as bishop of Constantia (Salamis) and metropolitan of the island. His qualities included orthodoxy, scholarship, linguistic ability, and austerity. His weaknesses included an unenlightened zeal for orthodoxy and an inability to understand the points of view of others. He died at sea after a visit to Constantinople on behalf of Theophilus bishop of Alexandria. In contrast with the Cappadocian Fathers,* Epiphanius denied any right or place in the church to Greek learning, theological speculation, and historical criticism. Despite his dogmatism, however, his works have importance, for in them are found extracts from earlier sources now lost. The Ancoratus is a compendium of the doctrine of the church, and includes several baptismal creeds. The Medicine Box (Panarion) was intended to heal those Christians who had been bitten by poisonous snakes (heresies). This work contains many extracts from earlier authors, Christian and pagan. Other works included a Bible encyclopedia—De mensuris et ponderibus.

PETER TOON

EPIPHANY. The feast of the epiphany is celebrated on 6 January, to commemorate (in the West) the visit of the wise men to Jesus (Matt. 2) and (in the East) the baptism of Christ. The name derives from the Greek epiphaneia (manifestation), and it recalls the spiritual significance of the occasion when Gentile magi came from the East (Matt. 2:1) to adore the infant Messiah. The birth of Christ concerns the whole world. The (Eastern) origin of the festival is clear; for Clement of Alexandria, in the third century, refers to a Gnostic commemoration of the baptism of Jesus on 6 January. The date was probably chosen under Egyptian influence. The object of the feast is less easy to determine, since by the fourth century Epiphany celebrated the birth of Jesus, His baptism, His adoration by the wise men, and the miracle at Cana (John 2:1-11). In the East, baptismal water was blessed on that day; and this is still the custom in the Eastern Church. The River Jordan itself is blessed in Palestine at Epiphany. In the Roman liturgy, from the fourth century onward, the feast became primarily a recollection of the manifestation of Christ to the world after his birth; although subordinate themes are included to commemorate any disclosure of His divine power.

See H. Usener, Das Weihnachtsfest (RU I, 1889), esp. pp. 18-213. STEPHEN S. SMALLEY

EPISCOPACY. From the Greek episkopos (overseer), this denotes the system of church government in which a bishop possesses the chief ecclesiastical authority. The NT evidence appears inconclusive. Episkopos and presbuteros (presbyter) are used interchangeably (cf. Acts 20:17, 28). The threefold order of bishop, priest, and deacon seems likely to have emerged in the second century. The subject has provoked wide divergence of opinion and bitter controversy.

EPISCOPALIAN. Strictly, a member of any church governed by bishops (episcopi), but popularly applied to churches when contrasted with other nonepiscopal bodies. The existence of the Episcopal Church in Scotland over against the presbyterian government of the Church of Scotland, and that of the Methodist Episcopal Church in the USA, are examples of this usage.

EPISCOPIUS, SIMON (Simon Biscop) (1583-1643). Dutch Protestant theologian. Educated at Leyden under Arminius,* who taught a softened version of predestination, he and Uyntenbogaert were prominent among his former teacher's followers who issued the Remonstrance* of 1610. After taking part in an abortive conference at the Hague with Contra-Remonstrant leaders, Episcopius at twenty-nine took the place of F. Gomar(us),* a Contra-Remonstrant leader, at Leyden. Gomarus had resigned in protest against Remonstrant influence at the university. The Remonstrant controversy became entangled with political issues, and passions ran high: Episcopius at one point was mobbed in the streets and accused of plotting with Catholics.

In 1618, Oldenbarneveldt, the political protector of the Remonstrants, was arrested, by the stadhouder Maurice of Orange, and the Synod of Dort,* convening to discuss the Remonstrant controversy, was thus filled with Contra-Remonstrants. Episcopius, though one of the few Remonstrant delegates, was cited to defend the Remonstrant position; cast as a defendant, his procedural protests were to no avail, and the synod condemned the Remonstrants, adopted the Canons of Dort as a statement of the orthodox view on the disputed issues, ousted Remonstrant ministers, and arranged for the exile of Remonstrant leaders.

After stays in Antwerp, where he helped organize the Remonstrants in exile, and France (Paris and Rouen), Episcopius returned to Rotterdam in 1625 at the death of Maurice. He worked as a Remonstrant preacher, and later as professor at the Remonstrant college in Amsterdam. His own theological views went considerably beyond those of Arminius, but in the next generation became common among the Remonstrants. He denied predestination and election, interpreted the Trinity in a symbolical sense, viewed Christ as basically an ethical model for man, and stressed right conduct rather than dogma. His main works are collected in his Opera theologica (2 vols., 1650-55) and Institutiones theologica (1650).

See A.H.W. Harrison, Arminianism (1937).

DIRK JELLEMA

EPISCOPI VAGANTES. In the second century A.D. all concepts of episcopacy seem to have related the person of the bishop closely to the structure of the church. In the third century Cyprian held this so strongly that he denounced as not being bishops at all those who, although they had been duly consecrated, were not "in communion" with him. On this view, a bishop who was excommunicated ceased to be a bishop. Cyprian was opposed by Stephen of Rome, and in the fourth and fifth centuries Stephen's view prevailed, being adopted by Augustine in his dealings with the Donatists.* Augustine held that, although from the Catholic standpoint the Donatists were no church (there being only one church, and it fully in communion with itself), yet their orders were validly transmitted and their ministers did not need to be ordained if they were received into the Catholic Church. In some sense they remained true ministers, able to perform true ministerial actions (such as bishops ordaining), even though outside the fold of the church.

Augustine's doctrine paved the way in time for bishops to take actions contrary to the discipline of Rome, and it is on the basis of Augustine's doctrine that Anglicans have always claimed that even from the Roman Catholic standpoint the consecrations and ordinations performed by Cranmer and Parker and their successors ought to be recognized as true ministerial actions, though outside the communion of Rome. The Roman reply has always conceded the Augustinian doctrine, but declared Anglican orders null and void on the grounds that the rites used did not have the intention of conferring true orders.

In the case of the Old Catholics,* originating in a hostility of Rome toward the see of Utrecht in the early eighteenth century, not only were orders initially conveyed by a Roman bishop using the Roman rite, but even with a century-and-a-half of "single-bishop" consecrations true orders have been conferred, and recognized as such by the Church of Rome. The Church of England had a similar case with the Nonjurors* in the eighteenth century, and the Scottish succession springs from bishops who were simply a "college" without dioceses or parishes to oversee in the days of the repressing of Jacobites.

It is but a short step from these cases to the thoroughgoing "Episcopi Vagantes." Once validity is suspended solely upon pedigree, without regard to ecclesial context, then a line of bishops may arise without any real church connections at all. In the twentieth century such lines of succession have in fact sprung from clandestine or ill-advised consecrations, the most famous, that of A.H. Mathew, being by the Old Catholic bishops in Holland; and others, notably of J.R. Vilatte and Vernon Herford, being by schismatic bishops of the East in Ceylon. In each instance the recipient of episcopal orders seems to have deceived his consecrators to greater or lesser degree.

The final states are both tragic and comic. The recipients of episcopal orders of this sort have suffered from megalomania, due to the validity of their orders even in the eyes of Rome. They have themselves conferred "valid" orders recklessly. Very often the recipients have in turn quarreled with the donors of orders, and have started new lines of succession. Congregations, or other reasons for being pastors, have been absent. The "valid" orders have been their own justification. Some such "bishops" have clandestinely given "valid" orders to Anglican clergy doubtful of their own. Others have lapsed into infidelity (without giving up ordaining and consecrating). Most have adopted grandiose titles (e.g., Mar Georgius, patriarch of Glastonbury, whose titles run to ten lines of print in Anson's book). Brandreth reckoned there were 200 or more alive in 1961.

See H.R.T. Brandreth, Episcopi Vagantes and the Anglican Church (1961); and P.F. Anson, Bishops at Large (1964). COLIN BUCHANAN

EPISTLES, GENERAL. This name is given to seven short epistles of the NT, namely James; 1 and 2 Peter; 1, 2, and 3 John; and Jude. They are also known as the Catholic epistles. It is usually held that "general" means much the same as "catholic" and that the reason for the name is that these letters, unlike the Pauline epistles, are not addressed to specific churches or individuals. This is not true of 2 and 3 John, which carry specific addresses, nor is it quite true of 1 Peter, though the address there covers quite an area. It may well be that writings like 1 John, which is in fact general and not addressed to anyone at all, were first given the name and it afterward attached to the group as a whole. Some seek another explanation of the name, and maintain that "catholic" was originally equivalent to "canonical"—i.e., it signified epistles received in the Catholic Church. Against this is the fact that this would apply equally to the Pauline epistles. Further, some of the seven had not come to be regarded as canonical at the time the expression was first used. It seems that "general" is the way we should understand the term.

The church was slow to accept all the letters in this group. The Muratorian Fragment, regarded as giving us the canon accepted at Rome in the second half of the second century, lists two epistles of John, and also Jude, but none of the others. 1 Peter appears to have been accepted in Africa at this period. In the East there was a greater readiness to welcome these writings, and Origen uses all seven (though with doubts about James, 2 Peter, and 2 and 3 John). His attitude was not universal, for in the early fourth century Eusebius of Caesarea regarded only 1 Peter and 1 John as canonical. He put the five others into the category of disputed books. However, they steadily made their way and by the end of the century seem to have been accepted in most places, East and West alike, except in the Syrian Church. The Peshitta of that church included James, 1 Peter, and 1 John. But it never did include the four others. They were added only in the Philoxenian revision of A.D. 508.

James is usually held to have been written by James the brother of the Lord, but the attribution is uncertain. So is the date, though the epistle seems early. It is concerned with the way the Christian faith is to be lived out in daily life, perhaps the most important section being that in which James opposes a corruption of the Pauline teaching that a man is justified by faith alone. While he does not espouse a doctrine of justification by works, he denies that faith without works is viable. Faith shows its presence by works (2:18).

Traditionally the Apostle Peter is held to have written 1 Peter, and while this has sometimes been denied it seems the preferable view. This is a letter written to Christians facing suffering, and it encourages them to a steadfast and joyful endurance of what confronts them, together with a steady insistence on the importance of living out the Christian faith in innocence and purity.

In recent times many have been prepared to deny the apostolic authorship of 2 Peter, partly on the grounds of style, partly on those of the nature of the teaching given and opposed. This has been met by pointing to the possibility of the use of an amanuensis in one or both epistles and to our ignorance of the kind of teachers that arose in the early church. This letter addresses itself to refuting heretics of unsound doctrine and immoral life and to pointing its readers to the coming of Christ as the hope of the church.

2 and 3 John are written by "the elder" but he remains unnamed and there is no author mentioned in 1 John. The style of all three, however, is much that of the fourth gospel, and this has led to the general acceptance of all three of these letters as from the Apostle John. This is denied by some, but is widely accepted among conservative Christians. 1 John is concerned to insist on the reality of the Incarnation. It is important to recognize that "Jesus Christ has come in the flesh" (4:2). The epistle insists just as strongly on the importance of the Christian virtues, especially love. The same concern for sound doctrine and upright living runs through 2 and 3 John.

Jude is written by the "brother of James" (v. 1), but unless we can identify James this does not help. It is usually taken that this is the James who wrote the epistle which bears his name. Jude sternly denounces heretics for their false teaching and for their immoral lives. He speaks of the divine punishment which awaits such men and urges believers to build themselves up on their most holy faith.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: B.F. Westcott, The Epistles of St. John (1883); J.H. Ropes, A Critical and Exegetical Commentary on the Epistle of St. James (1916); E.G. Selwyn, The First Epistle of St. Peter (1946); D. Guthrie, New Testament Introduction: Hebrews to Revelation (1962); E.F. Harrison, Introduction to the New Testament (1964); Bo Reicke, The Epistles of James, Peter and Jude (1964); W.G. Kümmel, Introduction to the New Testament (1966); J.N.D. Kelly, A Commentary on the Epistles of Peter and of Jude (1969).

LEON MORRIS

EPISTLES, PAULINE. Of the twenty-seven documents making up the NT canon, thirteen are epistles or letters bearing the name of Paul. Possibly the majority of these letters are the oldest writings in the NT. Since Paul was called from the day of his conversion to be Christ's Apostle to the Gentiles, his letters form our primary sources of information about primitive Gentile Christianity, and they shed some incidental but welcome light on the early Jewish mission too. Yet the earliest of them dates from a time when Paul had been a Christian and herald of the Gospel for fifteen years; his extant correspondence comes from the second half of his apostolic career.

In the traditional order of his letters, those to churches precede those to individuals, and within these two groups they are arranged in (approximately) descending order of length. Here it is more convenient to adopt a grouping which is more nearly chronological.

(1) The Thessalonian Correspondence. The two letters to the Thessalonians were written in the early stages of Paul's Aegean ministry, soon after the Council of Jerusalem (Acts 15) which decreed that circumcision should not be imposed on Gentile Christians. Rioting in Thessalonica compelled Paul to leave that city (c. A.D. 50) before he had given the newly formed church there all the teaching it required; the two letters, sent from Corinth, were designed largely to supply what was lacking in this regard. In 1 Thessalonians he (with his colleagues Silvanus and Timothy who had shared in the evangelization of Thessalonica) congratulates the church on remaining steadfast in face of opposition and propagating the Gospel (1:2—3:13), he reminds them of the ethical standards of Christianity, especially in sexual relations (4:1-12), and clears up some difficulties concerning the Parousia, particularly concerning the status of those believers who had died before that event (4:13-18).

In 2 Thessalonians, written very soon afterward—some (e.g., T.W. Manson) have argued it was written earlier—he clears up further eschatological difficulties. There was a tendency to imagine that the Parousia was so imminent that there was no point in going on working. Those who took this attitude are reminded that certain developments associated with the rise of Antichrist must precede the Parousia (2:1-12) and that for able-bodied men to give up working and live at the expense of others is quite inconsistent with the demands of the Gospel and the example set by the apostle and his companions (3:6-12).

(2) The Capital Letters. This designation is commonly applied to the epistles to the Galatians, Corinthians and Romans, which are our most important sources for Paul's teaching.

Galatians. While in subject matter Galatians goes closely with 2 Corinthians and Romans, there are features which suggest it may be eight or nine years earlier, possibly even the earliest of Paul's extant epistles. The life-setting—an attempt to persuade the churches of Galatia that circumcision is not essential to the Gospel—could be anterior to the Council of Jerusalem, which settled that question, especially if the churches addressed are those of Pisidian Antioch, Iconium, and Lystra (cities of S Galatia), planted by Paul and Barnabas before the council (Acts 13:14—14:23). News of this situation impels Paul to make an uncompromising defense of the gospel of justification by faith, as opposed to legal works, and incidentally to vindicate the independence of his apostleship and Gentile mission in relation to the leaders of the Jerusalem church. Occasional as his defense of justification is, this is no subsidiary or accidental element in his gospel, but its very pith and core, and however vigorously he asserts his independence of Jerusalem, he plainly attaches great importance to maintaining fellowship with the mother-church and its leaders.

1 and 2 Corinthians. These two epistles are the surviving parts of a larger correspondence revealing Paul's pastoral concern for the church which he had planted during his eighteen months' stay in Corinth (A.D. 50-52). The correspondence belongs to the later part of his Ephesian ministry and the months immediately following (55-56).

1 Corinthians, which followed a "previous letter" (1 Cor. 5:9) warning the recipients against the proverbial sexual laxity of Corinth, begins with an admonition deprecating a tendency to party-spirit (chaps. 1-4) and goes on to deal with ethical problems (chaps. 5-6) and then to answer questions raised in a letter sent by the church to Paul, concerning marriage and divorce, food consecrated to idols, the exercise of spiritual gifts in their meetings, etc. (chaps. 7-16).

After the dispatch of 1 Corinthians, Paul appears to have paid the church a painful visit (2 Cor. 2:1; 13:2), which was followed by a letter of such severity that the church was stung into disciplinary action against the leadership of the anti-Pauline faction and into a desire for full reconciliation with Paul (2 Cor. 2:3ff., 7:8ff.). 2 Corinthians (at least chaps. 1-9) is Paul's response to the news of this welcome change of heart—welcome because it reached him at a time when to his anxiety over Corinth had been added some especially deadly peril in proconsular Asia. In his relief Paul pours out his heart to the Corinthians and enlarges on the glory of the ministry of reconciliation committed to him and his fellow-preachers of the Gospel (chaps. 1-7). He judges the atmosphere favorable for an exhortation to participate generously in the gift being collected in the Gentile churches for the relief of their brethren in Jerusalem (chaps. 8-9). That the mood of reconciliation did not last long is indicated by chapters 10-13—unless (which is unlikely) they are a displaced fragment of the earlier severe letter—for the denigration of Paul is more vigorous than ever, fomented (it appears) by visitors from Judaea claiming the authority of the Jerusalem leaders.

Romans was sent by Paul to the Christians of the capital at the beginning of A.D. 57, when his plans were maturing for launching in Spain a missionary program such as he had just completed in the Aegean world, and for visiting Rome on the way and making it (as he hoped) his base for the evangelization of Spain. He writes to prepare the Roman Christians for his visit and takes the opportunity of setting before them a statement of the Gospel as he understood and proclaimed it, in its bearing on Israel and the Gentiles alike. Many of the themes of his earlier epistles are repeated here, especially of Galatians, but more dispassionately and systematically, Galatians being related to Romans "as the rough model to the finished statue" (J.B. Lightfoot).

(3) The Captivity Letters. In Romans 15:25ff. Paul says that before setting out for Rome he must visit Jerusalem with the Gentile churches' gift for the Christians there. Events in Jerusalem led to his detention for two years at Caesarea (Acts 24:27), after which he was sent under armed guard to Rome, where he remained under house arrest for two years more (Acts 28:30). The four "captivity letters"—Philippians, Philemon, Colossians, and Ephesians—are traditionally assigned to these two years at Rome, but arguments have been put forward for assigning them to his Caesarean detention (e.g., by E. Lohmeyer, J.J. Gunther) and even to an earlier undocumented but probable imprisonment in Ephesus (e.g., by G.S. Duncan). All four captivity letters need not come from the same period: Philemon, Colossians, and Ephesians are closely interrelated, and the development of Pauline themes in the last two bespeaks a later date than the "capital letters"; but certain affinities between 2 Corinthians and Philippians might suggest an Ephesian provenance for the latter, if it is a literary unity.

Philippians (on the assumption that it is a unity and not an editorial construct of two or three letters sent by Paul to Philippi) was in intention written to thank the Philippian church for a gift sent to Paul in prison by the hand of Epaphroditus (4:10-20). But first he expresses pleasure at the progress of the church (1:3-11), tells them how his imprisonment has turned out for the furtherance of the Gospel (1:12-18), invites their prayers (1:19-26), and urges them to maintain a spirit of concord among themselves, following the example of humility shown by Christ (1:27—2:5). This exhortation is reinforced by the quotation of what is commonly regarded as a pre-Pauline hymn or confession celebrating Jesus' self-denial and His consequent exaltation by God (2:6-11). Further personal news (2:12-29) is followed by a warning against troublemakers such as had threatened to disrupt his churches elsewhere, Judaizers at one extreme and libertines at the other (3:2-16), and renewed injunctions to rejoice and be of one mind in the Lord (3:1; 4:1-9).

Philemon is a charming personal letter to a Christian of that name in Colossae, a city of the Lycus valley in Asian Phrygia. Onesimus, a former slave of Philemon, whom Paul had befriended and won for Christ, is sent back to be reconciled with his master, to be received "no longer as a slave, but . . . as a dear brother" (v. 16), and (as Paul strongly hints) to be sent back in order to continue making himself useful to the imprisoned apostle as he had already begun to do.

Colossians was sent at the same time to the whole church of Colossae to put it on its guard against a form of Judeo-pagan syncretism which was flexible enough to take some elements of Christianity into its system, but in effect undermined the Gospel by robbing Christ of His uniqueness as the one who embodied the fulness of deity, and by its ascetic demands imposed a yoke of bondage on those who should enjoy the emancipation which was theirs by faith-union with the crucified and risen Lord. In his reply to this false teaching Paul develops more fully than in his earlier epistles his conception of the church as the body of which Christ is the head, together with the doctrine of the cosmic sovereignty of Christ, and draws out their practical implications for Christian life.

But if the church is the body of One who wields cosmic sovereignty, what is the cosmic significance of the church? This question, arising out of the argument of Colossians, is dealt with in Ephesians, where Paul unfolds his vision of the church as being not only God's present masterpiece of reconciliation but also God's pilot scheme and agency for the reconciled universe of the future, when He has achieved His purpose of uniting all things in Christ. This letter was sent by the hand of Tychicus (the bearer of Colossians) to Ephesus and other churches in proconsular Asia to serve in some way as Paul's testament to them.

(4) The Pastoral Letters. 1 and 2 Timothy and Titus have been known since 1703 as the "Pastoral epistles" because so much of their contents consists of directions to Paul's colleagues and lieutenants, Timothy and Titus, for the organization of church life and ministry in Ephesus and Crete respectively. In their present form they have been widely, but not universally, regarded as post-Pauline, partly because of the difficulty of finding an appropriate setting for them in Paul's career, but mainly because of deviations in style and vocabulary. Some have attempted to account for these deviations in terms of freedom granted to a confidential amanuensis (such as Luke); others have thought of a posthumous editor collecting disiecta membra of Paul's correspondence and instructions. 2 Timothy 4:6-18 envisages his death as imminent.

Pauline Corpus. Even in Paul's lifetime, and occasionally (it appears) at his own instance, some of his letters circulated outside the territories to which they were primarily addressed. This process was well advanced by the end of the first century, when Clement of Rome so readily quotes 1 Corinthians. Early in the second century Paul's letters were gathered together into one corpus, perhaps in two stages—the first comprising ten letters, the second adding the three Pastorals. The extant textual tradition of the letters is almost entirely derived from the collected corpus; only rarely does it bear independent witness to the pre-corpus phase.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: K. Lake, The Earlier Epistles of St. Paul (1911); H.A.A. Kennedy, The Theology of the Epistles (1919); P.N. Harrison, The Problem of the Pastoral Epistles (1921) and Paulines and Pastorals (1964); H.N. Bate, A Guide to the Epistles of St. Paul (1926); G.S. Duncan, St. Paul's Ephesian Ministry (1929); J. Knox, Chapters in a Life of Paul (1950) and Philemon Among the Letters of Paul (2nd ed., 1959); C.H. Dodd, "The Mind of Paul" in New Testament Studies (1953), pp. 67-128; G. Zuntz, The Text of the Epistles (1953); C.L. Mitton, The Formation of the Pauline Corpus of Letters (1955); D. Guthrie, The Pastoral Epistles and the Mind of Paul (1956) and New Testament Introduction: The Pauline Epistles (1961); J. Munck, Paul and the Salvation of Mankind (ET 1959); A.M. Hunter, Paul and His Predecessors (2nd ed., 1961) and The Gospel According to St. Paul (1966); F.W. Beare, St. Paul and His Letters (1962); T.W. Manson, Studies in the Gospels and Epistles (1962); A.T. Hanson, Studies in the Pastoral Epistles (1968); B. Rigaux, The Letters of St. Paul (ET 1968); J.J. Gunther, St. Paul: Messenger and Exile (1972). F.F. BRUCE

EPISTULA APOSTOLORUM, see TESTAMENT OF OUR LORD

ERASMUS (c.1466-1536). The leading Christian humanist, who wished to reform the church through scholarship and instructions in the teachings of Christ. Born the illegitimate son of a Dutch priest, he was educated by the Brethren of the Common Life* at Deventer (1475-84). When his father died, Erasmus transferred to another school and eventually became a monk. Later he secured the position of secretary to the bishop of Cambrai, thus escaping the secluded life. An opportunity arose for him to study at the Collège de Montaigu in Paris, and after this experience he visited England. Here he met John Colet,* who influenced him to apply his humanistic interests to biblical scholarship and the revival of primitive Christianity. After a visit to Italy and another trip to England Erasmus settled in Basle (1514-29) where, except for some short excursions, he was to live and work for many years. When the reform in the city became too radical for him, he moved to Freiburg-im-Breisgau, but returned to Basle to die.

Erasmus was the first best-selling author in the history of printing. Some examples of his popularity include The Praise of Folly, which has appeared in more than 600 editions, and the Colloquies, more than 300 editions. Among his publications, in addition to these satirical works, are a critical edition of the NT based on Greek manuscripts; a paraphrase of the NT (except for the Book of Revelation); editions of the Greek and Latin Fathers; Adages (a collection of sayings taken from the Greek and Latin classics); the Enchiridion Militis Christiani (Handbook or Weapon of a Christian Knight); and De Libero arbitrio (on the freedom of the will, an attack on Luther's ideas).

There are many interpretations of the career of Erasmus. Some say he was weak—a Lutheran at heart, but for fear of the church a conforming Catholic. Others have pictured him as a devotee of reason, a precursor of the eighteenth-century Enlightenment.* Another interpretation makes him the forerunner of Luther. "Erasmus laid the egg that Luther hatched," it has been said. According to this view, Erasmus with his critical work, his emphasis on the original texts of Scripture, and on the teachings of Christ took the first step toward the Reformation. Luther, with his stress on Paul's presentation of the Gospel, took the second and left Erasmus behind.

There is truth in each of these positions, yet another view comes nearer to an understanding of the man. Erasmus had his own reform program, partly critical but for the most constructive. He believed it was necessary for reform to use the tools of scholarship and the materials provided by Christian antiquity. Philology, a critical sense, and diligent labor would enable the scholar to reveal the truth in the Bible and in the Church Fathers. The philosophy of Christ thus recovered when taught to the learned and to the simple would infuse new spiritual life into all Christendom. As he stated in his most famous lines, "I would to God that the plowman would sing a text of the Scripture at his plow and that the weaver would hum them to the tune of his shuttle ... I wish that the traveler would expel the weariness of his journey with this pastime. And, to be brief, I wish that all communication of the Christian would be of the Scriptures" (Opera, V, 140). It is the tragedy of Erasmus that history passed him by, leaving him doggedly defending his position against Reformers and Counter-Reformers.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: P.S. Allen, The Age of Erasmus (1914); J. Huizinga, Erasmus (1924); M.M. Phillips, Erasmus and the Northern Renaissance (1950); P. Smith, Erasmus (1962); W. Kaiser, Praisers of Folly: Erasmus, Rabelais, Shakespeare (1963); R. Bainton, Erasmus of Christendom (1969). ROBERT G. CLOUSE

ERASTIANISM. The doctrine that the state has the right to intervene and overrule in church affairs; it takes its name from Thomas Erastus. Born in 1524 in Switzerland, Erastus studied theology at Basle and then medicine and philosophy at Bologna and Padua. In 1558 he became physician to the elector Palatine and professor of medicine at Heidelberg. In the city there was a strong Calvinist party led by Kaspar Olevianus* which wanted to introduce the Presbyterian polity and discipline in the church. Erastus, a Zwinglian in theology, opposed this and eventually had to leave the city. Six years after Erastus's death, G. Castelvetro, who married Erastus's widow, published a work found among his papers and entitled, Explicatio gravissimae quaestionis utrum excommunicatio (1589). In this Erastus argued against excommunication being practiced by the church and for the rights of the state in ecclesiastical matters. An English translation appeared in 1659 as The Nullity of Church Censures. Its teaching was far from new in England. Richard Hooker* had given supremacy to the secular power in his Ecclesiastical Polity (1594), and there were both in the Long Parliament and in the Westminster Assembly of Divines those (e.g., Selden, Lightfoot, Coleman) who claimed the right of the civil magistrate to control to a large extent the administrative and disciplinary machinery of the church. The Church of England is sometimes described as Erastian in that bishops are appointed by the Crown and major liturgical changes must have the agreement of Parliament.

PETER TOON

ERDMAN, CHARLES ROSENBURY (1866-1960). Presbyterian minister. Graduate of Princeton, he was ordained in 1891 and held two pastorates in Pennsylvania (1890-1905). He was then professor of practical theology in Princeton Seminary, simultaneously pastor of First Church (1924-34), and was moderator of assembly in 1925, and president of the Board of Foreign Missions (1928-40). Balancing academic with keen pastoral concern, Erdman was a popular preacher who aided the Bible Conference Movement. He published thirty-five books, and all of his NT expositions were translated into Korean and other languages.

EREMITE, see HERMIT

ERIGENA, JOHN SCOTUS (c.810-c.877). Irish scholar. Noted chiefly as an interpreter of Greek thought in the West, he entered also into the religious controversies of his day, notably on predestination and the Eucharist. He translated the Neoplatonist author known as Pseudo-Dionysius and also Greek theologians such as Gregory of Nyssa. Erigena is of importance in the period between Augustine and Anselm. His work De Divisione Naturae (produced about 862) is markedly ambiguous and was exploited by various parties. It was condemned by Pope Honorius III in 1225. He makes no distinction between theology and philosophy, and he attempts a rational demonstration of the substance of Christian truth. This seems, however, to lead him in the direction of pantheism. The opposed tendencies in his work can be seen in the fact that he insisted on both a sharp distinction between God and the creation and on the emanation of the created order from God. Similarly he wishes to deny that creatures are a part of God, but claims, in Neoplatonist fashion, that God is the only true reality. Though he was not himself a mystic, there is thus a strong mystical strain in his writings. PAUL HELM

ERNESTI, JOHANN AUGUST (1707-1781). German Lutheran theologian. Born in Thuringia and educated at Wittenberg and Leipzig, his early career was given to classics; he was later to produce famous editions of Homer, Polybius, Aristotle, Xenophon, Tacitus, Suetonius, Cicero, and others. In 1742 he became professor of ancient literature at Leipzig, to which post was added in 1758 a chair in theology, which dual role he sustained until 1770. As a grammarian and philologist he discarded dogma for historical evidence in theological studies, and he tried to reconcile traditional Lutheran beliefs with biblical scholarship. Ernesti's most important work is Institutio interpretis Novi Testamenti (8 vols., 1761).

C.G. THORNE, JR.

ERSKINE, EBENEZER (1680-1754). Founder of the Secession Church* in Scotland. Son of a minister ejected in 1662 for nonconformity, he graduated at Edinburgh University in 1697, and in 1703 was ordained to Portmoak, where for twenty-eight years he ministered faithfully and imaginatively. His preaching was such that regular adjournment to the open air became necessary when the church could not contain the congregation. He was one of those who protested his general assembly's condemnation of Edward Fisher's Marrow of Modern Divinity.

Just after he moved to a Stirling charge in 1731, Erskine as synod moderator preached against assembly legislation on patronage, convinced that it took away the right of Christian people to elect and call their minister. Rebuked by synod and assembly, Erskine with three others handed in a formal protest. This led in 1733 to the suspension of the four and to their constituting the "Associate Presbytery." They nevertheless continued their parish work. The 1734 assembly admitted that its 1732 predecessor had acted illegally, but the breach had widened too far. In 1740 Erskine and seven other ministers were deposed. Within five years the Seceders were ministering to more than forty congregations in Scotland. When they themselves split over a Burgess Oath imposed by the state, Erskine adhered to the Burgher* majority.

J.D. DOUGLAS

ERSKINE, THOMAS (of Linlathen) (1788-1870). A qualified advocate who had never practiced law, this landed proprietor of distinguished ancestry and ample means lives in the history of Scotland as the most outstanding lay theologian that country has ever produced. Alike by his personality and writings he influenced profoundly some of the ablest men of his day—among those who came regularly to sit at his feet in Linlathen, his beautiful Forfarshire home, being Dean Stanley, Thomas Carlyle, Benjamin Jowett, and Charles Kingsley. Well known also in western Europe, his Internal Evidence for the Truth of the Christian Religion passed rapidly through nine editions, while books like The Brazen Serpent and The Unconditional Freeness of the Gospel introduced to thousands a daring thinker of deep spiritual insight with something new and compelling to say about the Fatherhood of God, the nature of the Atonement, and the doctrine of election. His Letters (2 vols.) have long since taken their place as a minor religious classic and have been used as a textbook on practical Christianity in many college classrooms. D.P. THOMSON

ERSKINE OF DUN, SIR JOHN (1509-1591). Scottish Reformer. It has been said that while there might have been a Protestant Reformation in Scotland without John Knox, it could not have happened without Sir John Erskine of Dun, its distinguished lay leader. Destined to become after 1560 one of the church's seven area superintendents, and five times elected moderator of its general assembly, this well-known Scotsman introduced the teaching of Greek into the country, befriended George Wishart,* and later gathered the lairds of Angus and Mearns to his home at Dun to sit at Knox's feet. Championing the Protestant cause on many dramatic occasions, and living to become the "Grand Old Man" of the movement, he won the respect even of Mary Queen of Scots. D.P. THOMSON

ESCHATOLOGY. The doctrine concerning the "Last Things," among them being the resurrection of the dead,* the Second Coming* of Christ, the final judgment,* and the creation of the new heaven and the new earth. Traditional Christian theology continues to apply passages like those in Daniel, Isaiah, Zechariah, and Christ's teaching in parables—such as that of the Tares among the Wheat, along with Mark 13 and Matthew 24—as well as 1 and 2 Thessalonians and the Revelation to these coming events. Liberal Protestants, however, led by Albert Schweitzer,* have given eschatology a new meaning. Schweitzer argued that the eschatological teachings of Jesus were central, and that He believed that by sending out the twelve apostles He would bring history to an end. When this failed, He felt He must focus in His own person the troubles of man and offer Himself as a ransom to God so that the new age could begin. He went to Jerusalem with this conviction, but the statements made from the cross made Schweitzer doubt whether He maintained this conviction to the end.

This thesis has had a powerful effect upon twentieth-century scholarship. Critics have arisen not only from the traditional groups, but also among the liberals. It has been pointed out that Schweitzer overstressed Jewish apocalyptic sources, did not accept rabbinical teachings, and that since the discovery of the Qumran documents scholars realize that Messianic expectations were much more complex than Schweitzer pictured them. As early as the 1930s C.H. Dodd* introduced the idea of "realized eschatology," i.e., that in Jesus' ministry the kingdom in all its essentials had already come. Christ, according to his interpretation, was not particularly interested in the future, and the apocalyptic prophecies are in reality additions made to His statements by the early church. Dodd's outlook has been accepted by some scholars, but other more radical critics such as R. Bultmann* followed Schweitzer in believing that Jesus felt there was to be no interval between His death and the start of the New Age.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: S.D.F. Salmond, The Christian Doctrine of Immortality (1895); T.F. Glasson, His Appearing and His Kingdon (1933); J. Baillie, And the Life Everlasting (1934); C.H. Dodd, The Apostolic Preaching and Its Development (1936); J.A.T. Robinson, In the End God (1950); R.H. Fuller, The Mission and Achievement of Jesus (1954). ROBERT G. CLOUSE

ESSENES. According to Josephus (War, II.viii.2) the Essenes were the third of the main Jewish philosophies, but unlike the Sadducees and Pharisees they kept their main tenets secret among their adherents. Hence the details given by him and Philo of Alexandria are of necessity suspect. They are mentioned by the elder Pliny in a way that links them unmistakably with Qumran.* Philo connects them rather dubiously, with the Therapeutae,* a contemplative Jewish group in Egypt. From these sources it appears that they were marked out by asceticism, communism, and rejection of animal sacrifices, but the more exaggerated forms suggested by Philo seem to have been derived from the Therapeutae. Josephus acknowledges that some of them married and seems to suggest they were prepared to bring sacrifices, if they could be kept separate from those they regarded as polluted.

Their name is probably derived from hasidim (the loyal ones); they probably claimed to be the true representatives of the pious in the time of Antiochus IV Epiphanes. If that is so, their main peculiarities will have resulted from a conviction that they were living in an end-time condition of virtually complete apostasy. After A.D. 70 many probably joined the Palestinian church and helped to produce most of its characteristic heresies. There seems virtually no doubt that we must equate them with the Qumran sect, though it may be that by the time of Christ there were a number of groups bearing the name Essene. The differences between the Qumran documents and our other information are reconcilable, if we remember that our informants based their statements on hearsay knowledge.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: C.D. Ginsburg, The Essenes (1864); J.B. Lightfoot, St. Paul's Epistles to the Colossians and to Philemon (1875); E. Schürer, Geschichte des jüdischen Volkes im Zeitalter Jesu

Christi (4th ed., 1907); M. Dupont-Sommer, The Jewish Sect of Qumran and the Essenes (1954); H. Kosmala, Hebräer-Essener-Christen (1959); M. Black, The Scrolls and Christian Origins (1961): relevant material from Josephus and Philo quoted in appendix. H.L. ELLISON

ESTIENNE, ROBERT ("Stephanus") (1503-1559). Scholar-printer. He was appointed in 1539 as printer in Latin, Greek, and Hebrew to Francis I. Becoming a Protestant, he provoked severe attacks from the Sorbonne because of his Bible annotations. In 1551 he fled to Geneva, embracing the Reformed faith. In his Latin Bibles (1527-28, 1532, 1540) he followed as closely as possible the text of Jerome. He produced editions of the Hebrew OT (1539, 1544-46). As royal printer he published first printed editions of Eusebius (1544), Alexander of Tralles (1548), Justin Martyr (1551), and others. In 1544 he began to print Greek and, helped by his son Henri, published the NT in two tiny volumes (1546). The text was taken chiefly from the fifth edition of Erasmus (1535), although the Alcalá edition of Ximenez was also used. His large edition (1550) was the first to contain a critical apparatus, which is in general the source of the Textus Receptus. He was responsible also for the verse division of the NT, first printed in his fourth edition in Geneva in 1551. According to Henri, he did most of the work on a horseback journey between Paris and Lyons. Estienne subsequently published several of Calvin's works. J.G.G. NORMAN

ESTIUS (Willem Hessels van Est) (1542-1613). Dutch biblical exegete. Born in Gorcum he studied at Utrecht and Louvain, where he was deeply influenced by Michel Baius.* Seminary professor at Douai from 1582 and chancellor of the university there from 1595 till his death, he was respected by colleagues and students alike for his learning, discernment, and saintliness. He played an important part in the predestinarian controversies which led to the Congregatio de auxiliis (1597-1607). Wide theological reading and fine judgment made his commentaries widely used.

ETHERIA, PILGRIMAGE OF, see PILGRIMAGE OF ETHERIA

ETHICAL MOVEMENT. A quasi-religious movement having as its motto "Need, not Creed," and as its goal a society embracing the ideals of love, loyalty, brotherhood, and peace. Instigated in 1876 by Felix Adler as the New York Society for Ethical Culture, its central purpose, as stated in the constitution adopted in 1906 at an international conference at Eisenach, was "to assert the supreme importance of the ethical factor in all the relations of life—personal, social, national and international, apart from theological considerations." An outgrowth of the movement was the International Humanist and Ethical Union formed in 1952 "to promote an alternative to the religions which claim to be based on revelation on the one hand and to totalitarian systems on the other." MILLARD SCHERICH

ETHICS, see CHRISTIAN ETHICS

ETHIOPIA. An East African empire that dates its acceptance of Christianity from the fourth century, and its dynasty from Solomon. It was said that Frumentius* and Edesius of Tyre were taken prisoners to Abyssinia, but on gaining favor with Emperor Ezana were set free and began to evangelize the country. About 340 Frumentius was consecrated bishop of Ethiopia by Athanasius in Alexandria. At the close of the fifth century, nine monks reportedly came from Syria, and the Ethiopian Church was confirmed in the Monophysitism that had characterized the original link with Alexandria. The Christian influence declined as Islamic influence spread in Africa, and the church was cut off from contact with other Christians, except for the Coptic Church.* Both the Coptic connection and the isolation are significant factors in the history of a land long shrouded in mystery, beset even today by paganism in the interior, and with a church overlaid by superstition and syncretism, one in which Judaism is still a potent feature.

In 1268 the old dynasty was restored; the church took new life, but excesses of zeal led to the forcible baptism of conquered tribes. Attempts to bring the church into communion with Rome ended with the martyrdom of Dominican missionaries. Only the Abyssinian monastery in Jerusalem retained relations with the West.

When the Muslim onslaught was renewed early in the sixteenth century, an appeal to Rome brought further attempts at reunion in exchange for Portuguese aid, and during the pontificate of Julius III (1550-55), Portuguese Jesuits entered the country. They impressed the court, but alienated the clergy. In 1614 belief in Christ's two natures was imposed on pain of death. The Monophysites resisted but were defeated, and the emperor Susenyos became a Roman Catholic. In 1626 this was proclaimed the official religion, but in 1632 Susenyos's son succeeded him, the old religion was restored, the Jesuits ousted.

In 1634 Peter Heyling* introduced Protestantism into the country, but he too was finally expelled. Later Franciscan efforts proved to be not only unrewarding but dangerous, and the indigenous church was to reach its nadir from the mid-eighteenth to the mid-nineteenth century because of doctrinal difficulties and isolation. The church was suspicious of change as interference with God's established order, and with education controlled by the clergy they wielded immense power. The isolation continued until 1935 when Ethiopia was opened up, not by missionaries, but by the military might of Mussolini. Many clergy, including two bishops, suffered martyrdom, and almost all non-Italian missionaries were expelled.

After World War II, the Ethiopian Church broke with the tradition that its *abuna should be a Copt sent from Egypt. In 1951 the patriarch of Alexandria consecrated an Ethiopian catholicos-patriarch, and in 1959 the church became independent of Egypt. It is distinctive in several ways. Its canon includes some of the apocryphal books; it observes the Sabbath, circumcision, and the difference between clean and unclean meats. The ark is to be found in every church and at every outdoor festival. The church holds that Christ has one nature, but insists He is perfectly human as well as perfectly divine (though it has known divisions on this point). There are two kinds of clergy: the somewhat illiterate priests responsible for administering the sacraments; and the educated lay clerks who chant the church offices in the long-dead Ge'ez tongue, and teach in the schools. Monasticism is widespread. Each church has its school, and until about 1900, church schools were the sole source of education. A translation of the liturgy has now been made into Amharic, in which language a revised version of the Scriptures was authorized in 1960. More than one-third of Ethiopia's twenty-four-million population belongs to the Ethiopian Orthodox Church. Priests number some 170,000, parishes more than 11,000.

The country is now open to foreign missionaries, albeit with some restrictions in this very tradition-conscious land. Emperor Haile Selassie moved resolutely in advancing national education. He participated in the 1966 Berlin World Congress on Evangelism and was host to the meeting of the World Council of Churches central committee in Addis Ababa in 1971. Deposed and imprisoned in 1974, he died in 1975.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: J.M. Harden, Introduction to Ethiopian Christian Literature (1926); H.M. Hyatt, The Church of Abyssinia (1928); DeL. O'Leary, The Ethiopic Church (1936); A.F. Mathew, The Teachings of the Ethiopian Church (1936); D. O'Hanlon, Features of the Abyssinian Church (1946); J.S. Trimingham, The Christian Church and Missions to Ethiopia (1950); M. Daoud (tr.), The Liturgy of the Ethiopian Church (1954); R. Crummey, "Foreign Missions in Ethiopia," Bulletin of the Society for African Church History, II, 1 (1965); E. Isaac, The Ethiopian Church (1967); M. Abir, Ethiopia: the Era of the Princes (1968); E. Ullendorff, Ethiopia and the Bible (1968); M. Geddes, Church History of Ethiopia (1969). J.D. DOUGLAS

ETHIOPIC VERSIONS OF THE BIBLE. Although the process of translation into Ethiopic (i.e., Ge'ez, the classical Semitic tongue) may have begun in the late fourth century soon after the conversion of King Ezana, the major impetus probably began in the middle of the fifth century with the flight to Ethiopia of numbers of Syrian monks (particularly the Nine Saints) who sought haven for their Monophysite faith which had been banned by the Council of Chalcedon* (451).

The process of translation probably continued into the seventh century and included both Testaments. The literary revivals of the Solomonic dynasty (1270) produced the only biblical manuscripts now extant. Not only are these manuscripts late, but they show the marks of considerable revision that took place about the fourteenth century under the influence of Arabic versions from Alexandria. It is impossible to tell when the canon of the Ethiopian Orthodox Church was expanded to include not only all the books of the Septuagint, including the Apocrypha, but pseudepigraphical works like Enoch, Jubilees, Ascension of Isaiah, Paralipomena of Baruch, and the Apocalypse of Esdras. The long history of translation and revision produced manuscripts so varied that Ludolf, the great seventeenth-century pioneer in Ethiopian studies, posited several independent translations.

Doubting this, the majority of scholars, following the lead of A. Dillmann, have voted for a Greek original similar to the text used in Antioch. According to A. Vöobus, the Ethiopic NT is based on a Syriac original (akin to the Sinaitic and Curetonian texts as well as quotations from Syrian fathers) which was later revised with an almost slavish dependence on Greek and then further modified by Arabic and Coptic intrusions and wildly free readings.

Though there is general agreement that the OT was based largely on a Lucianic recension of the Septuagint, the verdict, then, is not in on the NT, virtually a virgin field for textual critics. A thorough investigation would enrich our knowledge of textual development and, more, would enhance our understanding of the variegated and unique structure of Ethiopian Christianity.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: F. daBassano (ed.), Ethiopic Old Testament (4 vols., 1926); Ethiopic New Testament (1949; rep. from 1899 Leipzig edition); A. Vöobus, Early Versions of the New Testament (1954), pp. 243-69; E. Cerulli, Storia Della Letteratura Etiopica (1956). DAVID A. HUBBARD

EUCHARIST, see COMMUNION, HOLY

EUCHERIUS (d. c.449). Bishop of Lyons. Engaged at first in public administration and married with two sons, he retired in middle life to Lerins, where he pursued an ascetic life of study and worship. His reputation for sanctity became widespread, and about 434 he was elected bishop of Lyons. Very little is known of his episcopate. In 441 he presided over the Synod of Orange jointly with Hilary of Arles.* His writings include two ascetic treatises and two exegetical works which display an extensive biblical knowledge and anticipate many favorite usages of medieval mystics and hymnwriters.

EUCHITES, see MESSALIANS

EUDES, JEAN (1601-1680). French missioner and pastor. Educated by the Jesuits in Caen, he became an Oratorian* in 1623. Appointed superior of the Caen congregation in 1639, his pastoral concern was demonstrated by the foundation of the Order of Our Lady of Charity of the Refuge (1641), dedicated to rehabilitation of reformed prostitutes. In 1643 he left the Oratory to found the Congregation of Jesus and Mary (or Eudists). Despite their work as missioners and seminary teachers, the congregation never gained papal approval. Eudes was also an influential pioneer in devotion to the Sacred Heart of Jesus and the Sacred Heart of Mary, to further which he wrote offices and devotional and theological works, and actively fostered lay confraternities. He was canonized in 1925. IAN BREWARD

EUDOXIUS (d.370). Bishop of Constantinople. Native of Cappadocia and an Arian, he became bishop of Germanicia and in 358 of Antioch (Constantius later denied his nomination of Eudoxius). His extreme views led to his deposition by the Council of Seleucia in 359, but with the adjustment of his declared views he was elected bishop of Constantinople in 360. Eudoxius declared then that the Father was impious and the Son pious, explaining to the angry assembly that the Son reverences the Father, but the Father has no one to reverence.

EUGENIUS III (d.1153). Pope from 1145. Born Bernardo Pignatelli of Pisa, he was a Cistercian monk at Clairvaux and subsequently abbot of SS. Vincent and Anastasius at Rome. Bernard of Clairvaux dedicated De Consideratione to him and preached the Second Crusade over his Bulla cruciata (1145/6). Though dejected over the crusade's failure he would not participate in the wave of anti-Byzantine bias sponsored by Roger of Sicily and Louis VII of France, wanting good relations with Conrad III and his successor Frederick Barbarossa, which the Treaty of Constance (1153) secured for the church. In England Eugenius deposed William of York, supported Theobald of Canterbury even to the extent of not banning King Stephen, and named Nicholas Breakspear (later Adrian IV) cardinal bishop and legate to Scandinavia. He held synods at Paris, Trier (1147), and Cremona (1148), and in Ireland, and a council at Reims (1148) on Gilbert de la Porrée's heresy and Hildegard's visions. Reform canons were issued to strengthen the Lateran decrees (1139), and an examination of papal revenues foreshadowed the Liber censuum (1192).

C.G. THORNE, JR.

EUGENIUS IV (1383-1447). Pope from 1431. Born Gabriele Condulmaro, of a wealthy Venetian family, he entered an Augustinian monastery at an early age. Brought to the papal court by his uncle, Gregory XII, he was appointed cardinal priest of San Clemente in 1408. Under Martin V he governed the March of Ancona and Bologna for a time. On his election as pope he dismissed the Council of Basle convoked by Martin which had sought to limit papal power. The council refused to dissolve, and reasserted and extended the principle of conciliarism enunciated at the Council of Constance. Eugenius was forced to withdraw his dissolution in 1433. A popular insurrection in Rome led by the Colonnas caused him to flee to Florence. His relations with the council worsened. It tried to destroy papal authority completely and in 1439 elected Amadeus VII, duke of Savoy, as antipope (Felix V). Eugenius had, however, called a council at Ferrara, transferred later to Florence. He concluded a short-lived reunion of Eastern and Western churches (1439) and excommunicated the bishops at Basle. In 1443 he returned to Rome, and in 1444 promoted a crusade against the Turks which ended in defeat at Varna.

J.G.G. NORMAN

EUNAN, see ADAMNAN

EUNOMIANISM. A theological heresy propagated by Eunomius (d.395). Born in Cappadocia, he went to Alexandria where he became a follower of Aetius,* the Anomoean, who carried the principles of Arianism to their logical limit, asserting the complete unlikeness of the Son and Father. The extreme Arianism of Eunomius remained latent until he became bishop of Cyzicus in Mysia. Here, after openly expounding his heresy, he was forced to resign his see and return to Cappadocia. But later, after the death of Aetius (370), he became the leader of the Anomoeans.* Through lecture tours and by means of books he ardently propagated his views. His chief work was an Apology which was answered by Basil the Great. He also wrote a commentary on the epistle to the Romans.

For Eunomius, God was the ungenerated Being, the single, supreme, ultimate, and simple Substance. He held that the "Son of God" was actually created by the Father, and though possessing creative power was not of His essence; further, the "Holy Spirit" was created by the Son in order to be the Sanctifier of souls. Putting great emphasis on doctrine, he depreciated the value of the sacraments and the ascetic life. His teaching had no permanent success, and it was refuted by Gregory of Nyssa in Contra Eunomium (c.382).

PETER TOON

EUSEBIAN CANONS. A system devised by Eusebius of Caesarea to facilitate the location of parallel passages in the gospels. Each gospel is divided into sections, numbered consecutively (355 in Matthew, 233 in Mark, 342 in Luke, 232 in John), and the sections, indicated by these numbers, are listed in parallel with the corresponding sections of other gospels. There are ten lists or canons. The system may have been suggested by the work of Ammonius of Alexandria (c.200)—they are sometimes called the Ammonian Sections*—and is explained by Eusebius in a letter to Carpianus.

EUSEBIUS (d.341/2). Bishop of Nicomedia; latterly patriarch of Constantinople. As a young man he studied with Arius under Lucian of Antioch. After ordination he was bishop of Berytus and later of Nicomedia. When Arius was deposed in 320, Eusebius decided to support and defend his friend. Though he signed the creed at the Council of Nicea* (325), where he was a prominent figure, he later led a widespread reaction against its teaching. His personal contacts with the imperial household, situated at Nicomedia, allowed him to engineer the deposition and exile of the principal opponents of Arianism*—Athanasius,* Eustathius, and Marcellus—and to propagate Arian views. He had the honor of baptizing Constantine just before the latter's death in 337 and then exercised great influence over Constantius. His leadership of the anti-Nicene party was so well recognized that his followers were called Eusebians. In 339 he became patriarch of Constantinople.

PETER TOON

EUSEBIUS (d. c.359). Arian bishop of Emesa. Of a noble Edessan family, he studied theology under Eusebius of Caesarea and, subsequently, philosophy at Alexandria. He then settled in Antioch and became intimately acquainted with the bishop, Flacillus. As he was a man of considerable learning, high personal character, with a theology acceptable to the Eusebian party (see previous entry) and with a knowledge of Alexandria, it is not surprising that the Council of Antioch (341) offered Eusebius the bishopric of Alexandria, made vacant through the exile of Athanasius.* He refused, having no great desire for preferment, and certainly not for the unpopularity the usurper of Athanasius was certain to encounter. He was, however, persuaded to become bishop of Emesa. There he successfully overcame the opposition of the people who had heard he was a sorcerer. He was a friend and adviser of Emperor Constantius. Only fragments of his writings have survived, the most important being seventeen sermons recently discovered. C. PETER WILLIAMS

EUSEBIUS (d.371). First bishop of Vercilli. A strong upholder of the Nicene orthodoxy, he was respected for his holiness. As the leading spokesman for Pope Liberius at the Council of Milan (355), he courageously resisted efforts of the powerful pro-Arian bishops, who were supported by Emperor Constantius, to join in a condemnation of Athanasius.* He requested that before anything was decided there should be an acceptance of the Nicene Creed. He was defeated and exiled in the East. When released, he was one of the instigators of the Council of Alexandria (362). With Athanasius he was responsible for its conciliatory tone, and was the bearer of its letter attempting to end the schism in Antioch between the Eustathians and the Melitians. He was, however, frustrated by the impetuosity of Lucifer of Cagliari in consecrating Paulinus as bishop, thus perpetuating the conflict. On returning to the West, Eusebius joined with Hilary of Poitiers in an unsuccessful attempt to oust the Arian bishop of Milan, Auxentius. After this he devoted himself to the needs of his large diocese. Three of his letters survive, unlike his Latin translation of Eusebius of Caesarea's commentary on the Psalms. He may have written the "Codex Vercellensis"—a pre-Jerome text of the gospels.
C. PETER WILLIAMS

EUSEBIUS (d.380). Champion of the Nicene faith; bishop of Samosata from 361. He was a member of the synod held under Melitius of Antioch in 363 which accepted the formula homoousios ("of the same substance") as describing the relationship of the Son and Father. He was associated with Basil of Ancyra and Gregory of Nazianzus in opposing Arianism, but in 374 was banished first to Cappadocia and then to Thrace. He has the reputation of being one of the few bishops of the fourth century of whom nothing evil is known. He is reckoned a saint because he was killed by a missile thrown at him by a woman supporter of Arianism at Doliche in Syria.

EUSEBIUS (fifth century). Bishop of Doryleum from 448. A Constantinople lawyer, he posted there in 429 a document comparing excerpts from the sermons of Nestorius (see NESTORIANISM) with the utterances of the third-century heretic Paul of Samosata,* thus directly accusing Nestorius of denying the divinity of Christ. After becoming bishop he presented formal charges of heresy against Eutyches* before a synod at Constantinople presided over by Flavian. In 449, along with Flavian, he was deposed and exiled by the Robber Synod held in Ephesus. He was restored to his see by the pope and by the emperor Marcion in 451, and subsequently took a prominent part in the Council of Chalcedon* that year, principally in helping to draft its Definition of the Faith. JAMES TAYLOR

EUSEBIUS OF CAESAREA (c.265-c.339). "The Father of Church History." Born probably in Palestine, of humble parentage, in early youth he became associated with Pamphilus,* founder of the theological school of Caesarea, assisting him in preparing an apology for Origen's teaching. After Pamphilus's martyrdom (310), he withdrew to Tyre, naming himself "Eusebius Pamphili" in honor of his master. Later he went to Egypt, where he was apparently imprisoned for a short time. He was subsequently accused by Potammon at the Synod of Tyre with having escaped martyrdom by sacrificing, but this seems unlikely, unless he had been forced by the soldiers to go through the motions of burning incense (as J.W.C. Wand suggests).

Eusebius was unanimously elected bishop of Caesarea about 314, and in 331 declined the patriarchate of Antioch. At the Council of Nicea* in 325 he led the large moderate party, submitting the first draft of the creed which was eventually accepted after important modifications (notably the homoousios clause). He seems to have discovered during the council that Arius's subordinationism was more radical than he had supposed, and he veered toward the Alexandrian position, though he never accepted the extreme views of the Athanasian party which, he believed, tended to Sabellianism.* He presided over the Council of Caesarea in 334 which endeavored to draw Athanasius into negotiation, and took part in Athanasius's condemnation at Tyre (335). On the occasion of Constantine's thirtieth anniversary (335) he delivered at Constantinople an encomium setting forth the political theory which came to be embodied in the Byzantine Empire. He was chief prosecutor of Marcellus of Ancyra* at a synod in Constantinople (336). He was the ecclesiastical and spiritual voice of the Constantine era, and the heir and master of the Origen tradition in that age.

A diverse author, his histories are most notable. First to appear was Chronicon, a history of the world to 303 (later to 328); in this he "liberated Christian chronography from the bonds of apocalypticism ... basing it on purely logical foundations" (H. Lietzmann). Best known of all his works is his Historia Ecclesiastica, the most important church history of ancient times, invaluable for its wealth of material, much of it preserved here only. The definitive edition in ten books appeared in 325. Apologetic books include Contra Hieroclem (against a pagan governor of Bithynia); Prae- paratio evangelica (explaining why Christians accept the Hebrew tradition); Demonstratio evangelica (trying to prove Christianity by the OT); and Theophania (on the Incarnation). Among other writings are a collection of Origen's letters; a biography of Pamphilus; a Life of Constantine; De Martyribus Palestinae (an account of the Diocletianic persecution); Eclogae Propheticae (a general elementary introduction); Contra Marcellum (against Marcellus of Ancyra); Onomasticon (a biblical topography); and commentaries on Psalms and Jeremiah.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: H.J. Lawlor, Eusebiana (1912); D.S. Wallace-Hadrill, Eusebius of Caesarea (1960); H. Lietzmann, A History of the Early Church, vol. III (1961). J.G.G. NORMAN

EUSTATHIUS. Bishop of Antioch 324-c.326. Prior to his elevation to Antioch he had been bishop of Berea and also a confessor. A prominent and eloquent opponent of Arianism at the Council of Nicea* (325), he attracted the opposition of the Eusebians, the more so because of his strong criticisms of Origen* and because after his return to Antioch he refused to accept Arian clergy and entered into a bitter correspondence with Eusebius of Caesarea.* Perhaps as early as 326 his opponents were able to depose him at a synod in Antioch. Various reasons are given for the deposition. Theodoret's suggestion that it was because of immorality with a prostitute seems very unlikely. His sharp tongue, however, makes more probable Athanasius's statement that he was accused of insulting the emperor's mother, Helena. He may also have been charged with Sabellianism.* Constantine banished him to Thrace, and this further suggests nontheological factors. His followers formed the Eustathian sect which survived for some eighty years. His developed Christology is an anticipation of Nestorianism.* His only complete surviving work is a sermon on the witch of Endor (an attack on Origen).

C. PETER WILLIAMS

EUSTATHIUS (c.300-c.377). Bishop of Sebaste. The ascetic practices of Eustathius and his followers were extreme enough to earn the condemnation of several synods, but he was nevertheless sufficiently respected to be elected bishop of Sebaste in Armenia Minor in 356. Famous as an exponent of asceticism, he attracted and became a formative influence in the development of Basil the Great.* He was a prominent member of the Synod of Ancyra (358)—which stood for the Homoiousion* position in the Arian controversy—and was consequently deposed in 360. He was one of the delegates from the East who appealed to the Western emperor Valentinian and Pope Liberius in 366. Later he became a leader of the Macedonian heresy, and his relations with Basil the Great were completely severed.

C. PETER WILLIAMS

EUSTOCHIUM, JULIA (c.370-418). First Roman lady of noble birth to take the vow of perpetual virginity. She was the third of five children to her mother Paula,* the friend of Jerome.* It is from the latter's writings that we gather all that is known of Eustochium. It was to her that Jerome addressed his famous letter in which he discusses the motives that ought to actuate those who devote themselves to a life of virginity, and the rules by which they ought to live. The animosity aroused by this and other letters in which he satirizes Roman society was largely responsible for his departure from Rome in 385. He was followed by Paula and Eustochium, and after joining company in Antioch, they traveled together through Palestine to Egypt, visiting the monks of Nitria and Didymus the Blind.* They returned to Palestine in the autumn of 386 and settled at Bethlehem. A monastery was built of which Jerome was head, and a convent for women of which Eustochium was head from the time of her mother's death in 404. Jerome speaks glowingly of Eustochium's devotion to the ascetic life, to the study of the Scriptures, and to the training of the virgins. He attributes the writing of many of his commentaries to her thirst for knowledge of the Scriptures.

DAVID JOHN WILLIAMS

EUTHALIUS. He appears to have been a deacon, devoted to the study of the NT, and is now best known as the supposed author of a collection of editorial material on the NT. This consists of an arrangement of the text in short lines to facilitate its reading aloud; a division of the books into chapters with summary headings of their contents, extended over the Pauline epistles, the Acts, and the Catholic epistles; a table of OT quotations in the epistles; a list of place names at which the epistles were thought to be written; and a list of names associated with Paul's in the headings to the epistles. There is also a lengthy sketch of Paul's life, writings, and chronology, and a brief statement of his martyrdom. It has been argued that Euthalius lived in the seventh century and is identifiable with a bishop of Sulca of the same name. The name "Evagrius" also occurs in some Euthalian MSS. More commonly he is thought to have been a deacon of Alexandria about the mid-fifth century (J.A. Robinson thinks a century earlier). The system is not due entirely to one hand. The Euthalian apparatus seems to have been known fairly early in the library at Caesarea.

DAVID JOHN WILLIAMS

EUTHYMIUS ZIGABENUS (eleventh/twelfth century). Byzantine monk, exegete, and theologian. Emperor Alexis Comnenus commissioned him to write a work against heresies; the result was Panoplia Dogmatica. This work contains twenty-eight chapters, of which the last six are devoted to the contemporary heretical movements; these chapters are our only sources for some such as the Bogomiles.* In addition, Euthymius wrote extensive commentaries on the Psalms, the four gospels, and the Pauline epistles. Although he depends heavily upon patristic sources, especially Chrysostom, these exegetical works are noteworthy for their hermeneutical approach, especially in the emphasis that Euthymius gives to the literal meaning of the text—and this in an age when allegorical exegesis dominated most commentaries.

DONALD M. LAKE

EUTYCHES (c.378-454). Early Monophysite.* After the third Ecumenical Council at Ephesus in 430, Cyril* of Alexandria, worked out a compromise between the theologians advocating two natures of Christ and those holding to one nature. On Cyril's death in 444, however, open opposition broke out against the compromise, with Cyril's successor leading the opposition along with Eutyches, who was an archimandrite of a monastery in Constantinople. Eutyches had come out of retirement to contest the error of Nestorianism toward which he felt the compromise leaned, but went to such an extreme in stressing the single nature of Christ that the supporters of orthodoxy in Constantinople became uneasy. The obstinacy of Eutyches in refusing to recognize the two natures of Christ brought the condemnation of Patriarch Flavian, who declared Eutyches's views unorthodox. Eutyches would not accept this condemnation and maneuvered the bringing about of the scandalous Robber Synod of Ephesus* (449) to support his views.

GEORGE GIACUMAKIS, JR.

EUTYCHIANISM, see MONOPHYSITISM

EVAGRIUS (c.536-600). Eastern church historian. Born probably in Syria, he seems to have been a lawyer by profession. His history of the church begins where Eusebius's Ecclesiastical History stops, with the Council of Ephesus (431), and brings the account of the church to his own lifetime, about 590. His six books contain both valuable and now nonexistent source materials as well as worthless legends. He generally reflects the speculative theology of the period and especially the curious interest in the miraculous. His ecclesiastical history can be found in England in Bohn's Ecclesiastical Library (1854), pp. 251-467; and in the Greek text in J.P. Migne, Patrologia Graeca, vol. 86:2, pp. 2415-2906.

DONALD M. LAKE

EVAGRIUS PONTICUS (345-399). Eastern writer. Born at Ibora in Pontus Galaticus, he was ordained reader by Basil and deacon by Gregory of Nazianzus at Constantinople. He attended the council in 381, and on Gregory's departure from Constantinople remained to assist the new bishop, Nectarius, in dealing with theological questions. Because of a developing relationship between himself and a married woman, Evagrius left Constantinople for Jerusalem. There he was influenced by Melania to adopt the ascetic life. At her instigation he went to Egypt, where he practiced and taught the ascetic life in Nitria and Cellia, north of Nitria, until his death. He numbered among his pupils Palladius, Rufinus, and Heraclides of Cyprus, later bishop of Ephesus.

It seems probable that John Cassian* met Evagrius during his visit to Egypt, and certainly Cassian's own writings on monasticism reveal the influence of Evagrian ideas. Although his extant works show little evidence of Origenism,* he was condemned by Jerome for this and for his association with Melania and Rufinus. Jerome speaks contemptuously of his writings, especially his book Peri apatheias, when combating the tenet ascribed to the Origenists that a man can rise above temptation and live without sin. In the same context Jerome refers to another work by Evagrius on monks, but as this book is not referred to by anyone else, Jerome may have wrongly attributed Palladius's Historia Lausiaca to Evagrius. The latter's works are largely lost or extant only in Latin or Syriac translations. They include works on the ascetic and spiritual life and commentaries on the Psalms and Proverbs.

For a list of Evagrius's known writings see H. Wace and W.C. Piercy, A Dictionary of Christian Biography and Literature (1911). His extant works are given by J.P. Migne, PG, XL, pp. 1213-86, also LXXIX, pp. 1165-1200 (De Oratione of "Nilus of Ancyra").

DAVID JOHN WILLIAMS

EVANGELICAL. The term means pertaining to the Gospel (as expounded by the four gospels) or conforming to the basic doctrines of the Gospel (as enunciated by the NT as a whole). By extension it signifies one who is devoted to the Good News—or "Evangel"—of God's redemptive grace in Jesus Christ. The Apostle Paul summarizes the Christian evangel in 1 Corinthians 15:1-4. There he affirms, as the central preaching-content of the primitive missionary churches, that Jesus Christ died for our sins and was buried and rose the third day, and was seen, and that all this eventuated in fulfillment of the prophetic-scriptural disclosure of God's gracious salvational purpose to provide redemption for sinful man.

In its secular Greek sense the word euaggelion could refer not simply to news or ordinary events, but could be used even of a false story of victory fabricated in wartime to boost military morale. But the Word-Event Jesus Christ—His incarnation, teaching, death, resurrection, and exaltation —particularized euaggelion as "good news." Related terms depict the messenger or bearer (euaggelos) of these good tidings, and the evangelist, one who proclaims the good news, designated by the rare word euaggelistēs which occurs three times in the NT (Acts 21:8; Eph. 4:11; 2 Tim. 4:5).

In subsequent Christian history a distinction evolves between "evangelical" and "evangelistic," the former stipulating conformity to the fundamental facts and truth of Christianity, the latter designating a sense of missionary compassion and urgency. But primitive Christianity had no category of believers who were not at the same time missionary-minded. Nor was Christian evangelism compatible with defection from the truth of revelation. To deny the vicarious death and historical resurrection of Jesus Christ is to forfeit the Gospel and the central theme of Christian faith and preaching, the exclusive sufficiency of Christ and His work for our salvation.

The term "evangelical" therefore categorizes a commitment, not a negation or divisive attitude. Its original content is supplied by the apostolic preaching, at first in vocal and then in written form, so that the substance of the Good News is conveyed by the gospels and in the NT as a whole. Evangelical Christians are thus marked by their devotion to the sure Word of the Bible; they are committed to the inspired Scriptures as the divine rule of faith and practice. They affirm the fundamental doctrines of the Gospel, including the incarnation and virgin birth of Christ, His sinless life, substitutionary atonement, and bodily resurrection as the ground of God's forgiveness of sinners, justification by faith alone, and the spiritual regeneration of all who trust in the redemptive work of Jesus Christ.

CARL F.H. HENRY

EVANGELICAL ALLIANCE. Formed in 1846 after Christian leaders had felt the need to present a more united front in the face of political upheaval in Europe. It was stressed at the inaugural conference in London that those present had met "not to create Christian union, but to confess the unity which the Church of Christ possessed as His body." Those who formed the Alliance declared they were "deeply convinced of the desirableness of forming a Confederation on the basis of great evangelical principles held in common by them, which may afford opportunity to members of the Church of Christ of cultivating brotherly love, enjoying Christian intercourse and promoting such other objectives as they may hereafter agree to prosecute together; and they hereby proceed to form such a Confederation under the name of the Evangelical Alliance." They drew up a basis of faith expressing their convictions as evangelical Christians.

One of the first difficulties encountered was a difference of opinion within the ranks regarding the rights and wrongs of slavery. The progress of the Evangelical Alliance during the nineteenth century was significant. Great and inspiring conferences were held in most of the capital cities of Europe and in America, and the Alliance quickly established itself as a body worthy of respect in the religious world. In the course of the first century of its existence the Alliance concentrated its attention on a number of different projects, including the relief of persecuted Protestant minorities, the promotion of a united week of prayer throughout the world during the first full week of January, the defense of biblical Christianity, and the promotion of missionary work.

Between the wars the Alliance went through a somewhat quiescent period, but blossomed into new life after World War II. The first notable postwar project it sponsored was the United Evangelistic Exhibition in the Central Hall, Westminster, in 1951, which coincided with the Festival of Britain and which enjoyed the support of 180 different societies. In 1952 the Alliance opened its first hostel for overseas students in central London; another was opened in 1963. It sponsored also the crusades led by Dr. Billy Graham in 1954-55 and again in 1966-67. Thereafter the Alliance embarked on the work of film evangelism, which brought the Gospel message to, among others, numerous prisoners and to members of the armed forces. Another outcome of the crusades was the Alliance's organizing of ministers' conferences in which ministers of different denominations have been encouraged in the work of evangelism in their own locality. Yet another Alliance project was the launching of the religious monthly Crusade. This has proved widely acceptable to the Christian public, particularly to young people.

Other notable developments during the postwar years include the formation of the Evangelical Missionary Alliance (1958) which links together almost all the evangelical missionary societies, whether denominational or interdenominational, and the holding of two united Communion services in London's Royal Albert Hall. There have also been several National Assemblies of Evangelicals, when delegates from churches and societies affiliated with the Alliance have met together to discuss matters of vital concern. Reports on such subjects as evangelism, the missionary task of the church, and church extension in new housing areas have been produced for consideration at these assemblies. Probably one of the most publicized of the Alliance's recent activities has been the launching of the Relief Fund (TEAR), which provides a channel whereby evangelical Christians are able to send gifts for relief work in particularly needy areas of the world.

Though the Alliance appears to have embarked on numerous projects, its real raison d'être has remained unaltered—fellowship in the Gospel. The Alliance has always stressed that evangelical Christians should enjoy such fellowship regardless of any denominational allegiances which they may have. When the Alliance was founded, membership was on an individual basis and it remained so for many years. Until 1912, prospective members were required to assent to the full doctrinal basis of the Alliance as agreed upon at its inception. In that year, however, the council opted for a simplified form as follows: "All are welcomed as members of the Evangelical Alliance (British Organization) who acknowledging the divine inspiration, authority and sufficiency of the Holy Scriptures, believe in One God—the Father, the Son, the Lord Jesus Christ our God and Saviour who died for our sins and rose again; and the Holy Spirit by whom they desire to have fellowship with all who form the One Body of Christ." In 1970 the doctrinal basis was revised and expressed in terminology more appropriate to the times without in any sense departing from its traditionally conservative evangelical position. Membership of the Alliance is now open to local evangelical fellowships, societies, denominations, and individual churches in agreement with the basis of faith and with the aims and objects of the Alliance. Those who attend national assemblies do so as delegates from different societies and churches.

The Evangelical Alliance was one of the founder members of the World Evangelical Fellowship* formed in 1951. Through this means it enjoys fellowship with similar bodies across the world such as the National Association of Evangelicals* in the United States, the Evangelical Fellowship of India,* and the various Alliances in Europe. The revitalization of the Alliance after World War II coincided with the rise of the ecumenical movement and the formation in 1948 of the World Council of Churches. From the outset, evangelical Christians have not spoken with one voice about their attitudes toward the WCC, and this fact has been reflected in tensions within the Alliance at various times over this issue. The Alliance has consistently adopted the policy of seeking to unite all evangelical Christians regardless of their denominational affiliations. This policy has not proved acceptable to some, with the result that the British Evangelical Council has tended to attract those who wish to have no connections, directly or indirectly, with the WCC or with denominations affiliated with it, while the Alliance covers a somewhat wider spectrum.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: J.W. Ewing, Goodly Fellowship (1946); J.E. Orr, The Second Evangelical Awakening in Britain (1949); J.B.A. Kessler, A Study of the Evangelical Alliance in Great Britain (1968). GILBERT W. KIRBY

EVANGELICAL AND REFORMED CHURCH. An American Protestant denomination formed by the merger of the Evangelical Synod of North America with the Reformed Church in the United States in 1934. The union brought together Lutheran and Reformed Christians of predominantly German, Swiss, and Hungarian ancestry. At the time of the merger the denomination had 2,648 pastors, 2,929 congregations, and 631,271 communicant members. The new church adopted as its doctrinal standards the Augsburg Confession, the Heidelberg Catechism, and Luther's Catechism, allowing freedom of interpretation where those standards differed, and subjecting every theological judgment to the norm of the Word of God. Because of its own history and theological heritage, the church was concerned to promote ecumenical relations and the reunion of separated churches. It supported hospitals and homes, educational institutions, and missionary work in Africa, China, Honduras, India, Iraq, Japan, and South America. In 1940 the body began merger negotiations with the Congregational Christian Church, which led in 1957 to the creation of the United Church of Christ. DAVID C. STEINMETZ

EVANGELICAL ASSOCIATION, see EVANGELICAL CHURCH (ALBRIGHT BRETHREN)

EVANGELICAL CHURCH (Albright Brethren). An American Protestant denomination founded by Jacob Albright (1759-1808), a Pennsylvania tilemaker and farmer. Following his conversion to evangelical Christianity in 1791, Albright, though raised as a Lutheran, associated himself with a class meeting of the Methodist Episcopal Church and was licensed as a lay preacher. In 1796 he undertook a preaching mission in German throughout E Pennsylvania. Though he and his followers were on friendly terms with the English-speaking Methodists led by Francis Asbury,* the language barrier made it necessary for the Evangelicals to create their own independent organization.

Stressing a personal and experiential relationship with God, the Evangelicals held their first council in 1803. The first annual conference of preachers was in 1807, and a book of Discipline was adopted in 1809. In 1816, eight years after the death of its founder, the first general conference of the "so-called Albright People" named its new denomination the Evangelical Association. In 1891 controversies led to a schism and the birth of the United Evangelical Church (1894). In 1922 the two groups were reunited in the Evangelical Church. Negotiations with another Wesleyan denomination of predominantly German background, the United Brethren in Christ,* led in 1946 to the creation of the Evangelical United Brethren Church.* In 1968 this body merged with the Methodist Church to form the United Methodist Church,* healing the division caused by the old language barrier and bringing together into one body the church of Francis Asbury and the church of Jacob Albright.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: W.W. Orwig, History of the Evangelical Association (1858); R. Yaekel, History of the Evangelical Association (2 vols., 1892-95); R.W. Albright, A History of the Evangelical Church (1942). DAVID C. STEINMETZ

EVANGELICAL COVENANT CHURCH OF AMERICA. Founded in Chicago in 1885, it traces its origins to the Reformation, biblical instruction in the Lutheran State Church of Sweden, and the awakenings of the nineteenth century. It took the name Evangelical Mission Covenant Church of America until 1957. It has traditionally cherished the historic confessions and creeds, but recognizes the sovereignty of the Word of God over their interpretations. The constitution states that "the principle of personal freedom, so highly esteemed by the Covenant, is to be distinguished from the individualism that disregards the centrality of the Word of God and the mutual responsibilities and disciplines of the spiritual community." It allows divergent views of baptism, though traditionally it is paedobaptist. Its chief institutions are North Park College and Seminary in Chicago, and it has an extensive missions outreach. Membership in the mid-1970s has been about 70,000 in more than 500 churches.

EVANGELICAL FELLOWSHIP OF INDIA, see INDIA, EVANGELICAL FELLOWSHIP OF

EVANGELICAL FOREIGN MISSIONS ASSOCIATION. Both denominational and nondenominational, this American association has sixty-four members representing nearly 7,000 missionaries in 120 fields. It was organized in Chicago in 1945 "to provide a medium for voluntary united action among the evangelical foreign missionary agencies." It represents the missions before governments through its Washington, D.C. office and conducts annual retreats for mission executives where subjects of common interest are discussed. In cooperation with the Interdenominational Foreign Mission Association* it has sponsored the Wheaton Congress of 1966, the Summer Institute of Missions at Wheaton College, the Evangelical Missions Information service with news releases and the Evangelical Missions quarterly, the Committee to Assist Missionary Education Overseas, and area committees such as those on Latin America, with its congresses on communications and evangelism, and Africa, which initiated the Association of Evangelicals of Africa and Madagascar. HAROLD R. COOK

EVANGELICAL FREE CHURCH OF AMERICA. This body developed from the seventeenth-century Pietistic free church movement in Scandinavia which was carried to the United States by immigrants from 1870 to 1914. The Midwest churches coalesced to form the Evangelical Free Church (Congregational) and the eastern churches to form the Eastern Association in 1891 for fellowship and mutual aid. These two Norwegian-Danish groups merged to form the Evangelical Free Church in 1909. The Swedish Evangelical Free Church, organized at Boone, Iowa, in 1884, merged with the Norwegian-Danish group at Medicine Lake, Minn. in June 1950 to form the Evangelical Free Church of America. Trinity College and Seminary at Deerfield, Illinois, are its major educational centers, and it carries on an extensive missions program. In 1970 it had a membership of 59,041 in 539 churches with 762 ordained clergymen. EARLE E. CAIRNS

EVANGELICALISM. A term in common use only in the twentieth century, used to describe the international movement which is committed to the historic Protestant understanding of the Evangel. Its adherents should be distinguished from those of three other broad groupings within professing Christianity: nonevangelical Protestantism; Catholicism; and the so-called sects and cults. Evangelicalism has become the defender of the historically orthodox Protestant theologies (and their subsequent variations) and the underlying biblical exegesis; as a result, some have labeled the movement "Conservative Evangelicalism."

Because of its emphasis on personal commitment (rather than comprehension of all of a given population) and acceptance of the Bible as the basis for its authority (rather than institutional bishops in supposed apostolic succession), Evangelicalism has remained clearly distinct from Catholicism, both Roman and Orthodox, despite their common Trinitarian supernaturalism in the face of naturalistic trends in Protestantism. Evangelicalism's acceptance of historic Trinitarianism, however, distinguished it from various non-Protestant sectarian movements—Mormonism, Christian Science, Jehovah's Witnesses, etc.

Since it is usually missionary-minded, Evangelicalism is found almost everywhere in the world. Its manifestation is primarily to be found within the histories of the various Protestant denominational families, chiefly Lutheran, Anglican, Reformed (Presbyterian and Congregational), Mennonite (Anabaptist), Baptist, Quaker, Moravian, Dunker Brethren, Wesleyan (including parallel movements among non-English-speaking people), Plymouth Brethren, Campbellite, Adventist, Pentecostal, Bible Churches, and some of the Third World denominations rising indigenously or resulting from transdenominational missions. The diversity is best accounted for by the differences in time, place, and context of independently originating evangelical awakenings which become institutionally self-perpetuating. Amid all the organizational confusion, evangelicals recognize each other by the common message of eternal salvation which they proclaim. They work also in many nondenominational enterprises—faith missions, Christian education, Evangelical Alliance, world congresses on evangelism, etc.

See A.S. Wood, "Evangelicalism: a Historical Perspective," Theological Students' Fellowship Bulletin, 60 (Summer 1971), pp. 11-20.

DONALD TINDER

EVANGELICAL UNITED BRETHREN CHURCH. This American Protestant denomination was formed in 1946 by the union of the Church of the United Brethren in Christ* with the Evangelical Church.* Both these churches originated among the German-speaking people of Pennsylvania and Maryland during the Second Great Awakening.* Both groups had their roots in German Evangelical Pietism, were Arminian in theology, and had an episcopal form of polity similar to that of Methodism. The Church of the United Brethren in Christ arose in 1800 from the impact of the revivalist preaching of P.W. Otterbein* and Martin Boehm.* The Evangelical Church was founded in 1807 by Jacob Albright.* Only their usage of the German language kept these two groups from joining with the Methodist Church during the nineteenth century. In 1968 the Evangelical United Brethren Church merged with the Methodist Church to form the United Methodist Church.* HARRY SKILTON

EVANGELISCHE BUND, DER. This "evangelical league" was an alliance of German Protestants founded in 1886-87 by Willibald Beyschlag* and others. Its purpose was to defend Protestant interests against the growing power of Roman Catholicism. It issued its own literature and furthered its purpose by other methods such as making good use of contacts with the secular press. In the years preceding World War I the movement took on a strongly nationalistic emphasis. By 1914 it had gained 540,000 members. Since that time, however, its influence has declined considerably.

EVANGELISM-IN-DEPTH. A cooperative mass evangelistic effort. It originated in Latin America and later extended in different forms to other parts of the world. It was started by R.K. Strachan* of the Latin America Mission. After some years of study and observation of apparently successful movements, he developed the theorem: "The growth of any movement is in direct proportion to the success of that movement in mobilizing its total membership in the constant propagation of its beliefs." Basically E/D attempts to make a Christian impact on a single country in an all-out, yearlong campaign that mobilizes the whole Christian constituency of that country under local leadership. Local committees make preparations, organizing multitudes of neighborhood prayer-cells and programs of visitation, and setting up training classes for witnesses. Communitywide evangelistic services culminate in a great rally and parade in a principal city for maximum impact on the country. The first campaign in Nicaragua (1960) was followed by numerous others.

HAROLD R. COOK

EVANGELIST. One who proclaims the Gospel ("good news") or Evangel. The task of proclamation was committed by Christ to the apostles as representatives of the church throughout the entire Christian era (Matt. 28:18-20; Mark 16:15). The NT references to evangelists (Acts 21:8; Eph. 4:11; 2 Tim. 4:5) are therefore to be understood of those who are divinely gifted specialists in the work to which the entire church is called. The term has perhaps wrongly been employed sometimes of those who do virtually the work of a pastor but with a lower status, usually on educational grounds. In fact, in the NT the roles of evangelist and pastor seem to be distinct but related, one being a "fisher of men," the other a shepherd of Christ's flock. The use of the term in reference to the gospel writers dates from the close of the second century. Modern emphasis on the Gospel or kerygma as basic to the whole NT and on the four gospels as detailed expansions of this Gospel has served to show the appropriateness of this derivative use of the term. G.W. GROGAN

EVANS, CHRISTMAS (1766-1838). Welsh Baptist preacher. Born at Esgairwen, Llandysul, Cardiganshire, on Christmas Day, son of a cobbler, he served as a farmhand in the neighborhood, and the only education he enjoyed was informal instruction by the well-known schoolmaster David Davis, Castellhywel (1745-1827), and a short period at his school. Evans joined the Baptist church at Aberduar. He went as a missioner to Caernarvonshire and was ordained in 1789. From 1791 to 1826 he ministered in Anglesey, and after two brief periods at Caerphilly and Cardiff he returned north to Caernarvon in 1832 and spent his remaining years there. He died in Swansea while on a journey, and is buried there in Bethesda churchyard.

Together with John Elias* and William Williams* of Wern, he is enshrined in Welsh tradition as one of the three greatest figures in the history of the nation's preaching. Like Elias, his formal education did not amount to very much, and he was virtually self-educated. This is not without significance for the historian seeking to demonstrate how Nonconformity* developed into a large-scale working-class movement in Victorian Wales. These men were exceptionally able communicators with the largely uneducated public of the period.

Evans's great strength as a preacher lay in his oratorical imagination. To call it baroque would be no exaggeration. His sermons on such themes as the Prodigal Son or the Last Judgment became existential dramas of the most poignant kind at his hands. This method of preaching he had learned from Robert Roberts of Clynnog (1762-1802), and Roberts was (indirectly) indebted to George Whitefield. Evans's preaching was inspired by a profound personal godliness and a "passion for souls." Although he was a busy writer of theological pamphlets, he tended to be somewhat wayward in his theological opinions.

R. TUDUR JONES

EVANS, JAMES (1801-1846). Missionary and linguist. He entered Canada as a Methodist missionary from England in 1823, and in 1828 began teaching at the Rice Lake Indian Mission School in Upper Canada. Ordained a Methodist minister in 1833, he went to the Ojibwa Indians, and in 1837 published an Ojibwa grammar and translated biblical extracts and some hymns into Ojibwa. In 1840 he became general secretary of all the Wesleyan Missionary Society's Indian Missions in the northwest. Extensive travel from Norway House made him realize the need for a written Cree language. After inventing a Cree syllabic alphabet in 1840, he published a Cree Syllabic Hymnbook in 1841 and organized a group of translators who by 1861 had translated the Bible into Cree. Opposition from the Hudson's Bay Company and false charges led to his recall to England and death in 1846.

ROBERT WILSON

EVANS, OWEN (1829-1920). Welsh divine. Born in Penybontfawr, Montgomeryshire, of the same family stock as Ann Griffiths,* his only education was at elementary school. He served as minister at several Congregational churches, and finally at King's Cross (Welsh) Tabernacle (1881-1906). He was chairman of the Union of Welsh Independents in 1887. Apart from being a successful pastor, he was a prolific author. He specialized in books of a popular nature dealing with biblical themes and written in a clear and interesting style. Some of these had a substantial circulation. Throughout his life he was an assiduous defender of the Reformed faith against the attacks of modernism and liberalism, yet was his stand in no way weakened by the tendency of liberals in theology to poke fun at him as "an old fossil." He represents one of the connecting links in Wales between the Calvinism that was in decline by the end of the last century and the biblical theology of our own day.

R. TUDUR JONES

EVANSTON ASSEMBLY (1954). The second international meeting of the World Council of Churches, held at Northwestern University, Evanston, Illinois; 132 member denominations were represented at the gathering, the theme of which was "Christ—The Hope of the World." The program was divided into four parts: (1) the theme was presented and debate focused on varying views of eschatology, the part that evangelism of the Jews plays in hastening the return of Christ, and the relationship of the other-worldly to this world's problems; (2) the assembly was split up to study the six subthemes, the most controversial of which were those on the evangelizing church and on racial and ethnic tensions. The group on the evangelizing church recommended day schools as a means of providing Christian nurture, and that on racial tensions condemned segregation, urging member churches to renounce it (it also condemned anti-Semitism); (3) structural changes in the WCC were considered; (4) routine business was undertaken.

If many agreed that there ought to have been fewer plenary sessions and more time for personal interaction, it was because the machinery was so complex that some felt the Holy Spirit was hampered by seemingly insurmountable restrictions.

Many also agreed that the concerns of the assembly were generated from the top down and that some delegates, especially non-English-speaking lay people, had difficulty sharing the concerns. A hint of the machinery may be seen in the fact that six-and-a-half tons of mimeograph paper were used to print official news releases and to record assembly speeches. Optimism about the assembly lay in the fact that Christians of a variety of backgrounds were listening to one another and interacting over differences, including theological ones, and that even without agreement on theological issues they could carry out a program of world relief and refugee help.

As council presidents for the ensuing seven-year period the assembly elected Dr. John Baillie of Scotland, Bishop Sante Barbieri of Argentina, Bishop Otto Dibelius of Germany, Metropolitan Juhanon of the Mar Thoma Syrian Church, Archbishop Michael (Greek Orthodox) of New York City, and Bishop Henry Knox Sherrill of the USA.

See J.H. Nichols, Evanston. An Interpretation (1954). ROBERT B. IVES

EVELYN, JOHN (1620-1706). Diarist and author. Fourth son of a landed gentleman in Surrey, he remained a pious Christian, loyal Anglican, and Royalist all his life. In the Commonwealth period he refused office, often traveling abroad. After the Restoration he enjoyed Charles II's confidence, but was assigned difficult and unremunerative appointments such as the care of prisoners. Evelyn consistently sought the good of the realm, suggesting remedies for air pollution, dirt in streets, traffic congestion, deforestation of the land, and other things. He held it is man's duty to study God's handiwork in nature. He was a co-founder of the Royal Society. "Whatever you love besides God only, pray you may not love too much" summarizes his attitude to life. His Diary (6 vols., ed. E.S. de Beer) was published in 1955. His own books number more than forty.

See biography by F. Higham (1968).

R.E.D. CLARK

EVENING PRAYER; EVENSONG. Evensong was the medieval English name for Vespers,* one of the two evening hours of prayer. Cranmer retained the title for his reformed daily office in the 1549 Prayer Book, changing it to Evening Prayer in 1552. His service made use of elements from both Vespers and Compline,* including recitation of the psalter, and the canticles Magnificat and Nunc dimittis, which in the Prayer Book follow readings from OT and NT. A penitential introduction was added in 1552, and further prayers (known as the State Prayers) at the end in 1662, following an anthem "in quires and places where they sing." It is now the practice on Sundays to supplement the service with additional hymns and intercessions and a sermon.

JOHN TILLER

EVERARD, JOHN (c.1575-c.1650). English clergyman. Cambridge D.D. and excellent preacher, his preaching on the unlawfulness of matching with idolaters was taken as criticism of the projected Spanish marriage, and he several times went to prison (once for six months) until he apologized. Meanwhile, as reader in St. Martin's-in-the-Fields, he attracted fashionable congregations, although he averred that his sermons were aimed at his less sophisticated hearers. By 1636 he had a parish in Essex, but later summoned before the Court of High Commission for heresy, he was found not guilty, yet was later deprived of his benefice, and in 1639 was fined £1,000. He was no favorite of Archbishop Laud,* who "threatened to bring him to a morsel of bread because he could not make him stoop or bow before him." Those of Everard's sermons that escaped confiscation were published in 1653 as Some Gospel Treasures opened. Their mystical flavor suggests the influence of John Tauler.*

J.D. DOUGLAS

EVOLUTION. A theory of organic development by natural processes of descent, in which modifications are selected by environment. Ancient Greece speculated upon the origin of man and animals, and Aristotle (382 B.C.) made a classification. Some in the early church, influenced by Genesis 1, speculated on the progression of living things. Julian (A.D. 331) held that man had been modified by soil and climate. Augustine (354) believed creativity operated within matter over long ages. Speculation was renewed in the seventeenth century. Linnaeus, son of a Swedish pastor, introduced modern taxonomy (1735) and believed he was cataloging God's creation. The problem of the mechanism of transformation occupied the eighteenth century. Buffon thought it was by environment perpetuated by heredity. Erasmus Darwin (grandfather of Charles) and Lamarck postulated the inheritance of acquired characteristics.

Many distinguished clergy were evolutionists. Charles Darwin* felt indebted to Thomas R. Malthus, who wrote on the struggle for existence. It was a clergyman, also, who recommended Darwin for two appointments. The agnostic T.H. Huxley saw the advantage of championing Darwin's Origin of Species (1859). Cuvier opposed this, arguing that the fossil record showed catastrophes followed by re-creations.

Christian reactions varied. Orthogenesis received wide support, seeing evolution as directed by an internal force. Later Ambrose Fleming founded the Evolution Protest Movement, which became a useful critique of plausibility. The genetics of G.J. Mendel, the Austrian Augustinian monk, ignored until 1900, showed that acquired characteristics could not be inherited. Evolution was soon extended to culture, morals, sociology, and religion. Bible Christianity suffered harm by Julius Wellhausen's* reshuffle of Scripture to present an evolution of religion from animism to polytheism to monotheism, instead of one of God's revealing Himself to man. Anthropologists and theologians have long since abandoned these concepts of Wellhausen, J.G. Frazer, and Herbert Spencer.

Evidence adduced for evolution includes comparative anatomy, fossil succession, ramifications of like organisms, and geographical distribution. Contrary to evolution are the inability of mutations to produce higher orders of life, and the lack of successive bridging fossils between the main orders (they have major organic differences).

Attention has recently shifted to molecular biology and life's origins. Previously the cell was regarded as simple (Teilhard de Chardin thought this), but the smallest viable life unit is more complex than any manmade machinery.

E.K. VICTOR PEARCE

EWALD, GEORG HEINRICH AUGUST VON (1803-1875). German biblical scholar. Born in Göttingen, he studied there under J.G. Eichhorn* and thus was put in touch with the first generation of modern critical studies of the OT. His interest in the poetic and prophetic materials of the OT reveal strong reactions to the romantic interpretations of J.C. Herder* and Eichhorn, just as his conservative historical bent made him an opponent of F.C. Baur* and D.F. Strauss.* Ewald succeeded Eichhorn at Göttingen, and among his pupils were C.F.A. Dillmann* and Julius Wellhausen.* Ewald's place in the history of biblical scholarship is fixed by his initiating role in two of its major dimensions: Semitic linguistics in a historical vein (from 1827) and the history of Israel as Volk (from 1843). Political views forced him to leave Göttingen in 1837, and for ten years before he could return he taught at Tübingen. In later life he was deeply involved in political affairs.

CLYDE CURRY SMITH

EXARCH. In Homeric Greek, the one who takes the lead or makes a beginning, presumably militarily, could be called exarchos, but until the Christian era the term seems to have disappeared. Plutarch called the pontifex maximus by the term exarchos tōn hiereōn. Synodical canons from the fourth century used the term interchangeably with "metropolitan,"* or provincial bishop (see EPARCHY), and from the fifth century the term could be applied to the supervisor of a council or of a monastery (see ARCHIMANDRITE). In the Byzantine ecclesiastical state, "exarch" can designate also a viceroy with civil and military powers, or an archdeacon, as well as the founder of heresy.

EX CATHEDRA. The Greek noun hedra from Homer, kathedra from Thucydides, designates a chair or seat. In the Roman architectural form—the basilica, built with or without permanent seats, exedras, and used for the operation of government or court—a moveable chair could be brought in for the presiding officer. The chair, like the more specialized "throne," came to represent the authority of the office. In the church secular it is the seat of the bishop, in the church regular that of the abbot, who are understood when seated to preside; the cathedral is simply the place of the chair. The notion ex cathedra, "out of the chair," conveys the voice of authority or its codified or written pronouncements. In the Roman Catholic Church at Vatican Council I the status of the bishop of Rome was confirmed in that, when speaking as the successor of Peter, his words concerning faith and morals had the infallible character of apostolic doctrine.

CLYDE CURRY SMITH

EXCEPTIONS, THE. The objections to the existing Prayer Book (that of 1604) made by the Presbyterian Puritans (e.g., R. Baxter) in 1661 after the restoration of Charles II. They were made at the Savoy Conference* which met that year. The Presbyterian ministers composed a document, The Exceptions against the Book of Common Prayer, to which the bishops replied in The Answer of the Bishops. The Exceptions falls into two parts: a tabulation of the historic Puritan objections to the Prayer Book and religious ceremonies (e.g., no lessons to be read from the Apocrypha, and saints' days to be abolished), and a catena of critical comments and suggested amendments to parts of the Book. Among the latter was the request that the famous Black Rubric (Declaration on Kneeling of 1552) be restored, and that modifications be made in the Communion and Baptismal Services. Very few of the exceptions were in fact taken notice of and incorporated in the 1662 Book of Common Prayer.

PETER TOON

EXCOMMUNICATION. This involves varying degrees of exclusion from the community of the faithful because of error in doctrine or lapse in morals. The term excommunicatus first appears in ecclesiastical documents in the fourth century. Discipline in the primitive church followed the Jewish model; cf. the threefold warning recommended for an offending brother in Matthew 18:15-17 (privately, before two or three witnesses, before the whole assembly), which conforms to Jewish practice.

The origin of excommunication in Christian terms is normally traced to the saying of Jesus about "binding and loosing" in Matthew 16:19 (to Peter) and 18:18 (to the disciples; cf. John 20:23). Even if such legislation were relevant at the time when the Evangelists wrote, there is no need to regard it as post-Easter invention. Paul advocates degrees of sanction to deal with offenders in the church, ranging from social deprivation (2 Thess. 3:10,14f.) to full exclusion from the community (1 Cor. 5:13; cf. v. 5 and 2 Cor. 2:5-11). The punishment in this case was the responsibility of the whole assembly (1 Cor. 5:4) and intended for the good of both the offender and the church (vv. 5-7; cf. 1 Tim. 1:19f.). With the growth of the church, the problem of the authority to excommunicate also arose (cf. 3 John 9f.).

In the primitive Christian community, excommunication as such ("hand over to Satan," 1 Cor. 5:5) implied complete isolation from the faithful. By the fifteenth century, a distinction had been introduced between excommunicates who were to be shunned for gross error (the vitandi) and those to be tolerated (the tolerati, who were rigidly excluded only from the sacraments). This distinction still operates in the Roman Catholic Church. In modern Protestant circles, despite the Anglican canons, formal excommunication is rarely imposed.

See also ANATHEMA, DISCIPLINE, and HERESY.

STEPHEN S. SMALLEY

EXCOUNTIANS, see ANOMOEANS

EXEMPLARISM (Lat. exemplum, "pattern or example"). The theological doctrine that finite things are copies of originals existing in the divine mind. Plato's archetypal ideas or forms were located by later Greek Platonist philosophers in the divine mind. Christian philosophers (Augustine and his school) made this a central point of their metaphysics and used the theory to distinguish God's free and intelligent creation from that of purely spontaneous production. The theory was prominent until its peak in the thirteenth century with Bonaventura.* The term "exemplarism" is sometimes used also to describe the "moral influence" view of the Atonement, originating with Abelard and developed by Hastings Rashdall.*

HOWARD SAINSBURY

EXISTENTIALISM. The term has been defined as an attempt to philosophize from the standpoint of the actor, rather than, as in classical philosophy, from that of the detached spectator. The word derives from the German Existenzphilosophie. The movement grew in Germany after World War I and flourished in France from the time of World War II. It is best regarded as indicating an approach rather than a fixed body of philosophical doctrines. Its leading exponents have tended to coin their own vocabulary of technical terms and to develop their thought in their individual ways. Some are atheists, others profess Protestant or Catholic faith. The existentialist protest against philosophical systems has in the hands of some of its advocates been transformed into highly elaborate systems.

The origins of existentialism have been traced back to S. Kierkegaard* with his attack on absolute idealism and concern for individual existence, to the atheism of F.W. Nietzsche,* and to the disenchantment of F.M. Dostoevsky* with rationalistic humanism and his saying: if God did not exist, everything would be permitted. The premise of atheistic existentialism is that God does not exist, therefore man must fend for himself. He must work out his own values and create his own existence. At the same time he has a sense of the absurdity of it all. The choices he has to make are often impossible, giving rise to profound anxiety.

Existentialism represents a revolt against external authority, ready-made world views, authoritarian and conventional moral values and codes of conduct. Man has been dumped into the world whether he likes it or not. He has to make his own way in it, creating his own values and determining his existence as he goes along. It is this which distinguishes man from things and animals. But if he refuses he relapses into the kind of existence that things have, instead of living an authentic human existence.

In Germany, Karl Jaspers* and Martin Heidegger are the best-known existentialist thinkers. The latter's Being and Time (1927; ET 1962) was a seminal work which set out what was virtually an existentialist metaphysics. Leading French existentialists have not only written philosophical treatises, but have expressed their ideas in plays and novels. Among them are the communist Jean-Paul Sartre, the atheist Albert Camus, and the Catholic Gabriel Marcel. Sartre's philosophical studies include Being and Nothingness (1943; ET 1957) and Existentialism and Humanism (1946; ET 1948).

In his demythologizing program, Rudolf Bultmann* has made use of Heidegger's existentialism, interpreting the gospel of the death and resurrection of Christ as a challenge to men to choose between authentic and inauthentic existence. In their different ways Paul Tillich* and John Macquarrie have combined existential analysis with ontological speculation in an attempt to provide a new metaphysical basis for interpreting the Christian faith.

Although existential analysis has yielded rewarding insights into aspects of human existence, the speculative systems have been sharply criticized from the standpoint of linguistic analysis for category mistakes in the use of language. The attempt to restate Christian belief in existentialist terms has tended to eliminate the transcendent and divine personal element of biblical theism.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: H.J. Blackham, Six Existentialist Thinkers (1952); J.M. Spier, Christianity and Existentialism (1953); F.H. Heinemann, Existentialism and the Modern Predicament (1954); J. Macquarrie, An Existentialist Theology (1955), The Scope of Demythologizing (1960), Studies in Christian Existentialism (1966), and Existentialism (1971); W. Kaufmann (ed.), Existentialism from Dostoevsky to Sartre (1956); F. Copleston, Contemporary Philosophy (1956); W. Barrett, Irrational Man (1961); M. Warnock, The Philosophy of Sartre (1965); S. Keen, Gabriel Marcel (1966); C. Brown, Philosophy and the Christian Faith (2nd ed., 1971).

COLIN BROWN

EXORCISM. The practice of expelling evil spirits by means of prayer, divination, or magic. There is one example of this in the Apocrypha (Tobit's expulsion of a demon), but in the NT the casting out of evil spirits by Christ and His apostles is common (cf. Mark 1:25; Acts 16:18). Since that time exorcism has been practiced by the church until the present day. In the early church it became common to exorcise catechumens from pagan and Jewish backgrounds before baptism. This practice was mentioned at the Council of Carthage in 255.

In the Middle Ages exorcism formed part of infant baptism; the service included the exsufflatio—the thrice-repeated breathing on the face of the infant with the accompanying words, "Depart from him, thou unclean spirit, and give place to the Holy Spirit." This was condensed in the Rituals Romanum of 1614. Early Lutheran baptismal services, however, as well as the First Prayer Book of Edward VI (1549), contained a brief exorcism. The title of "exorcist" described in the early church a minor order* of the ministry, whose office included laying hands on the insane, exorcising catechumens, and helping at Holy Communion. Today in the Roman Catholic Church the order is retained as a stepping-stone to the priesthood, but it has no real significance. The Eastern Church has no order of exorcists. Within the Pentecostalist movement the casting out of devils is often practiced by charismatics, and the Church of England has several licensed exorcists.

See D. Omand, Experiences of a Present Day Exorcist (1970). PETER TOON

EXPIATION. This term employed in connection with atonement and sacrifice means to render satisfaction for sin. It has replaced "propitiation" in some modern translations of the Bible. It is an unexceptionable term in itself, yet is not adequate to translate the Greek Hilaskomai word-group or its Hebrew equivalents (see L. Morris, The Atonement in New Testament Teaching [1955], pp. 125-185). Expiation treats sin as something to be dealt with, while propitiation lays stress on the fact that it merits the wrath of God. Expiation is impersonal, propitiation is personal. The commentaries and translations of C.H. Dodd (chairman of the New English Bible translators) reflect modern opposition to ideas of wrath and propitiation, and modern preference for the weaker term "expiation." G.W. GROGAN

EXTRAVAGANTES. Originally applied to papal decretals* not included in Gratian's collection, and then to those excluded successively from collections by Gregory IX (1234) and Boniface VIII (1298), the term strictly applies to all decretals after 1298, including the Clementinae (1317). Normally, however, it applies to decretals of John XXII and those covering the pontificates of Urban IV to Sixtus IV, known respectively as the extravagantes and extravagantes communes.

EXTREME UNCTION, see UNCTION, EXTREME

EYCK, see VAN EYCK

EZNICK (fifth century). An Armenian writer and bishop, he was born at Kolb and was a disciple of the patriarch Isaac and of Mesrob. Besides Armenian, he understood Persian, Greek, and Syriac and was familiar with the theological literature of those languages. As bishop of Pakrewand in the province of Airerat he took part in the synod of Artashast in 450 which rejected the Persian demand that the Armenians adopt Zoroastrianism. He also took part in translating the Armenian version of the Bible and according to tradition wrote a number of homilies, all of which are now lost. His best-known work, however, is the Refutation of the Sects, which is still preserved in the Armenian original. It consists of four books, the first dealing with the pagan idea of the eternity of matter, the second with Zoroastrianism, the third with Greek philosophy, and the fourth with the Gnostic sect of the Marcionites. The latter book is particularly interesting in that it reveals a number of later developments in Marcionite ideas.

DAVID JOHN WILLIAMS

F

FABER, FREDERICK WILLIAM (1814-1863). English hymnwriter. Although his upbringing was Calvinist, Faber was influenced at Oxford by J.H. Newman,* and collaborated in work on The Library of the Fathers. He took orders in the Church of England in 1837, became rector of Elton, Huntingdonshire, in 1843, but seceded to Rome in 1845. With others he formed a community in Birmingham, which was merged in 1848 with Newman's Oratory of St. Philip Neri. In 1849 he started a branch of the order in London, which developed into Brompton Oratory. He wrote many devotional books and several collections of verse and was an ardent propagandist for the Roman Catholic Church. His enthusiasm for Italian styles of devotion sometimes lapsed into sentimentality. His 150 hymns, collected and published as Hymns (1861), were intended to have the same popular appeal as those of Newton and Cowper. A number appear in the Roman Catholic Westminster Hymnal (1940). Among those sung also by Protestants are "Hark, hark, my soul"; "My God, how wonderful Thou art"; "O come and mourn with me awhile"; and "Souls of men, why will ye scatter." JOHN S. ANDREWS

FABER, JACOBUS (c.1455-1536). French humanist. Known also as Jacques Lefèvre d'Étaples, or Faber Stapulensis, he was a native of Picardy. He spent some years in the schools of Italy, where he was influenced by Pico della Mirandola, and in Paris, where he studied classics. This awakened in him the importance of the language for the study of the Bible, which in turn helped him to create an interest for others and thus blaze a trail for Christian humanism. His Latin translation of Paul's epistles (1512), published with a commentary, resulted in his being branded heretic, especially to theologians of medieval outlook, on the questions of transubstantiation, justification, and the merit of good works. The Pauline translations and his earlier work on Psalms (1509) had some influence on Luther. Faber was subsequently denounced by the Sorbonne (1517-18) and by the government (1525), and had to flee to Strasbourg. Later he was given the protection of the queen of Navarre. He never accepted the Reformed doctrines on grace, justification, and predestination, but there is a link between him and the Anabaptists; a volume of mystical and prophetic writings he edited (1513), later bound with sermons by Tauler, are said to have been read by Thomas Mü nzer translation of the NT (1525) was ordered to be burnt with the French translations of the treatise of Erasmus. He had an interview with Calvin about the time of Calvin's conversion (1534) which may have proved of significance in the latter's break with Rome.

GORDON A. CATHERALL

FABER, JOHANN (1478-1541). Bishop of Vienna. German by birth, he became vicar general of the diocese of Constance in 1518, and chaplain and confessor to Ferdinand I in 1524. He conducted several important missions for Ferdinand, including one to engage the assistance of Henry VIII against the Turks. He was appointed to the see of Vienna in 1530. He belonged originally to the humanistic and liberal party, and his friendship with Erasmus* led to an initial sympathy with Reformation leaders, including Zwingli and Melanchthon. In 1521 he returned from a visit to Rome to become a zealous adversary of the Reformation and its leaders, earning the title "the Hammer of the Heretics." He defended Catholic orthodoxy in conferences and disputations, and burned heretics in Austria and Hungary. He wrote against Luther and in defense of celibacy and papal infallibility. JAMES TAYLOR

FABIAN (d.250). Bishop of Rome from 235. Ruling with vigor, he furthered the tendency to a hierarchical structure by dividing Rome into seven ecclesiastical areas with a deacon over each, and a subdeacon to assist. He increased the amount of catacomb property held. He made his opinion known to the African Church with respect to the heresy of Privatus, bishop of Lambesis, and he received correspondence from Origen. He enjoyed considerable favor under the pro-Christian emperor Philip, but when Decius reversed the policy of his predecessor and seized the church leaders, he was the first to be martyred.

FABIOLA (d.399). Patrician Roman lady. The unfaithfulness of her first husband led her to divorce him. A second marriage while he was still alive, however, cut her off from the fellowship of the church. On the death of her second husband she went through extreme penitential discipline and decided to give away her great wealth. Her many acts of benefaction included building a hospital in Rome in which she herself worked. In 395 she went to the Holy Land and became a disciple of Jerome. Fear of the Huns and her own gregarious nature led her to return to Rome and continue her good works.

FABRI, FRIEDRICH (1824-1891). German mission executive. A pastor in Bavaria, he was appointed inspector of the Rhine Mission in 1857, largely because he occupied a neutral position in the confessional struggle of the time. Although he did little to change the internal structure of the mission, he did stress better training of candidates and some expansion of the work in South Africa. On his initiative the highly successful Sumatra field was opened in 1860. As an apologist he published tracts against materialism and Darwinism, and during the *Kulturkampf supported the concept of a church free from state control. Fabri also fostered German imperialism in a popular book, Bedarf Deutschland der Kolonien (1879), and founded the West German Association for Colonization and Export in 1880 to pressure for a colonial policy. In 1884 he retired from the Rhine Mission, accepted an honorary professorship at Bonn, and spent his last years in colonial agitation. RICHARD V. PIERARD

FACUNDUS. Bishop of Hermiane in Byzacena c.546-571. When Emperor Justinian published an edict in 543-44 condemning the Three Chapters,* Pope Vigilius at first refused to approve, but later in Constantinople published his Judicatum (548) in which he too condemned the Three Chapters, but explicitly upheld the Council of Chalcedon.* The Western bishops, particularly those of North Africa, were opposed to the Judicatum. A North African council excommunicated Vigilius until he should withdraw it, and Facundus, who was also in Constantinople, refused communion with the pope and published his own Pro defensione trium capitulorum, in which he defended the orthodoxy of the three men concerned and argued that to deny this was to deny the orthodoxy of the Chalcedon Christology. He laid the main blame for the present controversy on the emperor. When the Three Chapters were condemned by the Council of Constantinople in 553, Vigilius excommunicated Facundus. Facundus wrote two other works: Contra Mocianum Scholasticum and Epistola fidei catholicae in defensione trium capitulorum.
DAVID JOHN WILLIAMS

FAIRBAIRN, ANDREW MARTIN (1838-1912). Congregationalist divine. Born at Inverkeithing, Scotland, of Covenanting stock, he had little regular schooling and was earning his living before he was ten. In his spare time he read omnivorously and eventually studied at Edinburgh University. He entered the Evangelical Union* theological college in Edinburgh in 1857 and thereafter ministered at Bathgate and Aberdeen before becoming principal of Airedale Theological College in 1877. Nine years later he transferred to Mansfield College, Oxford, of which he was the first principal—a post he held for twenty-three years. An original and refreshing teacher whose theological liberalism reflected the views of German scholars, Fairbairn was much in demand as preacher and lecturer, and paid several visits to the USA. His writings include Studies in the Philosophy of Religion and History (1876); Studies in the Life of Christ (1880); Christ in Modern Theology (1893); and The Philosophy of the Christian Religion (1902). He was active also in religious and political controversy, notably in connection with the significant Education Act of 1902, and helped develop theological education in English nonconformity. J.D. DOUGLAS

FAIRBAIRN, PATRICK (1805-1874). Scottish theologian. Born in Berwickshire, he studied at Edinburgh University, and after ordination served parishes in Orkney, Glasgow, and Salton (East Lothian) where he continued as minister of the free church after the 1843 Disruption.* In 1853 he went to his church's Aberdeen college as professor of divinity, and three years later he became principal of the Glasgow college, which post he held until his death. A scholar who became widely known outside his own denomination, he was a member of the Old Testament Revision Company. He wrote a definitive work, The Typology of Scripture (rep. 1953), and his other publications included commentaries on Ezekiel and the Pastoral epistles, and the editorship of the Imperial Bible Dictionary. J.D. DOUGLAS

FAITH, DEFENDER OF THE, see FIDEI DEFENSOR

FAITH AND ORDER, see LAUSANNE CONFERENCE; EDINBURGH CONFERENCE (1937); WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES

FALSE DECRETALS. These were allegedly discovered in Spain by Archbishop Riculf of Mainz. They were really mid-ninth century Frankish forgeries interpolated into an earlier genuine collection of Conciliar Acts edited by Isidore of Seville (d.636). The forgeries (called also the Pseudo-Isidorian Decretals) reflect current mid-ninth century church reformers' views on the status of the church in general. In particular, the forgeries were most frequently used in the ninth, tenth, and eleventh centuries to establish historical grounds for contemporary papalist views on papal monarchy. For this the Donation of Constantine* and the letter from Clement I to James (the brother of Christ), both included in the False Decretals, were key documents. The forgeries also defended bishops' rights against metropolitans, which in turn effectively increased papal powers. Certain passages from the Donation of Constantine were incorporated into canon law by Gregory VII,* although the document's dangerous implication that Emperor Constantine had given power to the pope meant that the Donation was outdated by the eleventh century. The forged nature of these "Decretals" was completely demonstrated in 1558, but some like Nicholas I,* the first to use them (865), apparently knew much earlier that they were spurious. Their authenticity was, however, accepted throughout the Middle Ages.
L. FEEHAN

FAMILISTS. Alternatively named "Family of Love," the sect was founded in Emden about 1540 by a prosperous businessman, Henry Nicholas (1501-80), as a result of a series of visions. Nicholas, who never left the Roman Catholic Church into which he was born, is said to have claimed to be an incarnation of the deity and to have taught a mystic pantheism. The Familists were much persecuted on the Continent, Nicholas himself being frequently imprisoned. The group later took root in England, but laws were enacted against it under Elizabeth I in 1580, though persecution was not intense. After the Restoration it ceased to exist, the remaining members joining the Quakers and Congregationalists.

R.E.D. CLARK

FAMILY COMPACT. A term originally derived from alliances between the crowned heads of Europe during the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries. After 1828 it was applied popularly to the governing elite in Upper Canada. The Constitutional Act* of 1791 (more accurately, the "Canada Act") had created a governmental system dominated by the executive and legislative councils. The members of these were appointed by the crown from the wealthy and powerful segments of society who were usually Anglicans and Tories. Because the majority of the population had little political power, resentment against the Family Compact mounted until it erupted in the Rebellion of 1837.

ROBERT WILSON

FARADAY, MICHAEL (1791-1867). English scientist. Born in London, son of a blacksmith who had shortly before removed from Yorkshire, Faraday became a laboratory assistant to Sir Humphrey Davy at the Royal Institution (1813) and later succeeded him as professor of chemistry (1827). His discoveries in physical science were numerous and outstanding: he made, for example, the first electric motor, the first dynamo, and the first transformer. In religion he was of Sandemanian* ancestry; his grandfather Robert Faraday (1724-86) had been an Inghamite, but was converted to Sandemanianism around 1759. Faraday's parents, like himself and his wife, were lifelong adherents of the group. His outlook in science was deeply influenced by religion; in his lectures he often used science as evidence of God's power and wisdom. Believing that the universe was in some way a manifestation of the one and only God revealed through Christ, Faraday looked for and found unity in natural phenomena. His life was devoted to Christian work and to science; he was a brilliant lecturer who made science popular in his day. On Christian grounds he rejected wealth, and on retirement was very poor, but a government pension was granted and later (1858) a house in Hampton Court was provided for him by Queen Victoria.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Biographies by J.H. Gladstone (2 vols., 1872); S.P. Thompson (1898); and L.P. Williams (1963); for background, see J.F. Riley, The Hammer and the Anvil (1954); for Faraday's works, see A.E. Jeffreys, Michael Faraday, A List of his Lectures and Published Writings (1960).

R.E.D. CLARK

FAREL, GUILLAUME (1489-1565). French Reformer. Born at Gap in Dauphiné, he went in 1509 to Paris where he studied under Jacques Lefèvre d'Étaples (J. Faber Stapulensis). By about 1520 his humanist training led him to adopt reforming ideas. Soon after this he began to assist in the reform of the diocese of Meaux under Bishop Briçonnet. In 1523 he was influenced by radical ideas on the Eucharist stemming from the treatise of Cornelius Hoen, which Farel may have translated into French. In the same year growing intolerance and persecution led to his expulsion from France. In 1524 he was involved with Oecolampadius* in a disputation in Basle, but his fiery attacks on the theological faculty soon led to his expulsion. He also visited Strasbourg, Montbéliard, and Neuchâtel.

From 1526 he became the leader of a peripatetic band of evangelists preaching mainly in French-speaking Switzerland. His own fiery preaching often led to rough handling by mobs of opponents. He took part in the disputation which won the city of Berne to the Reformation in 1528. Thereafter he received support from Berne in his preaching activities in the Pays de Vaud. In 1532 he began to evangelize Geneva, and in 1535 that city accepted the Reformation. Farel was instrumental in persuading John Calvin to serve the church in that city in 1536. With Calvin, he was expelled from Geneva in 1538. Farel now made Neuchâtel his base and spent many years there working in close harmony with Calvin. In 1558 Farel married a young girl, and for a time there was coolness between Calvin and himself, but in 1564 the rift was healed on Calvin's deathbed. Throughout the long years in Neuchâtel, Farel continued to undertake evangelistic work in France, especially at Metz where he died.

NOEL S. POLLARD

FARRAR, FREDERIC WILLIAM (1831-1903). Dean of Canterbury. Born in India of missionary parents, he went to school at King William's College, Isle of Man. There the religious teaching was strongly evangelical, and Farrar was to write about it in his best-selling school story Eric; or Little by Little (1858). He studied at King's College, London, where he was influenced by F.D. Maurice,* and after graduation and ordination was a schoolmaster until his mid-forties. He had a tremendous influence on the Victorian middle classes in both religious and cultural matters. His Life of Christ (1874) went through twelve editions in a year, and his Life and Works of St. Paul (1879) also had a great vogue.

Much controversy was aroused by his Eternal Hope (1878), a collection of sermons in which he questioned the doctrine of eternal punishment for the wicked. A particular adversary here was E.B. Pusey.* Farrar was to modify his position somewhat in Mercy and Judgment (1881). In 1882 he preached at Charles Darwin's funeral. It was held that Farrar's broad outlook long hindered his ecclesiastical promotion, but eventually, after having been a royal chaplain and canon of Westminster, he was appointed dean of Canterbury, which post he held for the last eight years of his life. Farrar was a pioneer in introducing into modern education some of the results of philological research, for which he was, on Darwin's nomination, elected in 1866 as a Fellow of the Royal Society—an honor not accorded to many modern churchmen.

J.D. DOUGLAS

FASTING. Abstinence from eating and drinking. It may be complete or partial, for a set length of time or intermittently, and for religious or other purposes. It has been practiced in numerous societies for reasons as varied as to produce evidence of virility, to coerce or to appease a supposed god or spirit, and to prepare for ceremonial observance. Among Jews, the Day of Atonement was the most prominent occasion for a public fast (Lev. 16:29,31; 23:27,29,36; Num. 29:7), though the OT refers to many special fasts, both individual and public (Judg. 20:26; 1 Sam. 14:24; 31:13; 2 Sam. 1:12; 12:16-23; 1 Kings 21:27; 2 Chron. 20:3).

Jesus engaged in a prolonged fast following His baptism, but He seems neither to have expressed strong approval nor disapproval of fasting as such. He urged that, if fasting is to be practiced, it should be to the glory of God rather than to gain the acclaim of men (Matt. 6:16-18). But when He was asked expressly about fasting, He said it would be appropriate for His hearers to fast after He left them (Matt. 9:14,15). There is some evidence of fasting in the early church (Acts 13:2,3; 14:23), but it seems not to have had so much emphasis then as, in certain branches of the church, it received in postbiblical times.

MILLARD SCHERICH

FATHER (Lat. pater). A title now used in the English-speaking world to describe or to address Roman Catholic or Anglo-Catholic clergy, whether secular or religious. "Pater" was originally a description of bishops as "fathers in God" or later of confessors. It seems that due to Irish influence in the nineteenth century the term took on a much wider meaning. The pope is still called "the Holy Father," but certain classes of monks prefer the title "Dom." On the continent of Europe the term "Father" is not often used of the secular clergy.

FATHER DIVINE, see DIVINE, M.J.

FATHERS, APOSTOLIC, see APOSTOLIC FATHERS

FAULHABER, MICHAEL VON (1869-1952). Archbishop of Munich. Born at Klosterheidenfeld, Bavaria, he studied at Schweinfurt and Würzburg where he later became lecturer (1899-1903). Ordained in 1892 and thereafter in Rome (1895-98), he was professor of OT in Strasbourg until becoming bishop of Speyer (1911). He was appointed archbishop of Munich in 1917 and cardinal in 1921. He was a monarchist who favored the Wittelsbach kings, and condemned paganism, racism, and totalitarianism. In World War I he ministered to Bavarian forces in the field and later became the leader of the right-wing German Catholics. He emphasized the Jewish background in Christianity and attacked anti-Semitism. Earlier he had contributed to the patristics field, but afterward wrote much on contemporary issues.

C.G. THORNE, JR.

FAUNCE, WILLIAM HERBERT PERRY (1859-1930). Baptist minister and educator. Son of a Baptist pastor, he graduated from Brown University and Newton Theological Institution and in 1884 entered the Baptist ministry. After fifteen years as pastor, he was appointed president of Brown University, where he served until his retirement in 1929. Esteemed as lecturer and preacher, he was the greatest builder in Brown's history. Active in many social causes, he was at various times president of the World Peace Foundation, of the National Education Association, and of the Religious Education Association. A liberalizer, he moderated between modernists and fundamentalists and opened Brown to non-Baptist leadership. He was also noted for his writings, particularly Social Aspects of Christian Missions (1914) and Religion and War (1918). Contemporaries knew him as a poetic, thoughtful, and soft-spoken man.

DARREL BIGHAM

FAUSSET, ANDREW ROBERT (1821-1910). Anglican scholar. Born in County Fermanagh, Ireland, he graduated from Trinity College, Dublin, in 1843. He went to England, was curate of Bishop Middleham, County Durham (1848-59), and rector of St. Cuthbert's, York, from 1859 until his death. Evangelical and premillennialist, he was a prolific writer and editor. His works include Scripture and the Prayer Book in Harmony (1854); the editorship of the first ET of Bengel's Gnomon of the New Testament (1886); The Englishman's Critical and Expository Bible Cyclopedia (1878); and (with Robert Jamieson and David Brown) Critical, Experimental and Practical Commentary on the Old and New Testaments (1871).

H. CROSBY ENGLIZIAN

FAUSTUS OF RIEZ (d. c.490/500). Semi-Pelagian* bishop, probably of British origin. Abbot of Lérins from 437, he became involved in a dispute with the bishop of Arles, the solution of which helped to lay down the lines of demarcation between dioceses and monasteries for the future. He then became bishop of Riez and—as an ascetic, Bible scholar, and preacher of very considerable oratorical powers—he was clearly the most outstanding prelate in Roman Gaul. Resistance to the Arian king of the Visigoths, Euric, led to his exile (477-85). In De gratia Dei he argued, more strongly than Cassian,* for the operation of man's free will in obtaining salvation.

FAWCETT, JOHN (1740-1817). English Baptist theologian. After some years' engagement in a secular occupation, his early impressions of George Whitefield's preaching prevailed and he became a Baptist pastor. His ministry was spent entirely in the Halifax area of Yorkshire, where he also taught school for most of his active life. He was a vigorous preacher, zealous and much respected among his people, who might have held high office in his denomination had he been so inclined. He is best known, however, for his Devotional Commentary on the Holy Scriptures (1811). His method was to follow each expository section with a paragraph of "aspirations" to guide the feelings of his readers. Though his health had long been indifferent, he survived until his seventy-seventh year.

J.D. DOUGLAS

FAWKES, GUY (1570-1606). Prominent participant in the 1605 Gunpowder Plot.* Born into an Anglican family, he was converted to Roman Catholicism after his father's death (1579) and his mother's remarriage to a Roman Catholic. He served in the Spanish army for some years, and on his return to England in 1604 was persuaded to join Robert Catesby* and others who were conspiring to blow up the Parliament building while James I and many governmental leaders were inside. Fawkes duly planted an impressive amount of explosives, but the authorities learned of the plot, arrested Fawkes on the night before the gunpowder was due to go off, and forced him under torture to identify his accomplices. The abortive plot is still celebrated by fireworks in England on 5 November (Guy Fawkes Day). J.D. DOUGLAS

FEAST OF FOOLS/ASSES. Mock-religious festivals, often identified, which were celebrated about New Year time, notably in France (e.g., Rouen, Beauvais) but also in England (e.g., Lincoln, Salisbury), sometimes associated with Balaam's Ass or the Flight into Egypt. The festivities were controlled by subdeacons and included much buffoonery and burlesque of religious services. They flourished during the twelfth, thirteenth, and fourteenth centuries, but severe penalties for their observance were imposed by the Council of Basle (1435).

FEATLEY (Fairclough), DANIEL (1582-1645). Anglican controversialist. Oxford graduate, he became chaplain to Archbishop Abbot and, in 1619, rector of Lambeth. His anti-Roman views and his preaching impressed James I, but during an outbreak of plague Featley forsook controversy to produce Ancilla Pietatis (1626), a popular manual of devotion later a favorite of Charles I in his troubles. Featley produced also an exposition of Paul's epistles which with his marginal annotations was printed in the Bible issued in 1645 by the Westminster Assembly, from which he was the last episcopal member to withdraw. Imprisoned as a spy by Cromwell, he continued his writing against Roman Catholics and his defense of the Church of England against Puritan divines. After eighteen months he was released for health reasons, but soon died. "A most smart scourge of the church of Rome," it was said at his funeral, "a compendium of the learned tongues, and of all the liberal arts and sciences." J.D. DOUGLAS

FEBRONIANISM. A German and Austrian movement in the late eighteenth century to limit papal authority in the church. Its chief doctrines were defined by J.N. von Hontheim,* writing under the pseudonym "Justinius Febronius," The State of the Church and the Legitimate Authority of the Roman Pontiff, a Book Composed for the Purpose of Uniting in Religion Dissident Christians (in Latin, 1763). Hontheim, learning from Gallicanism,* argued with evident Catholic, not secular, devotion, that the "keys of the kingdom" (Matt. 16:19) were not given to the papacy, but to the whole church, which acts through general councils composed of all the bishops, who hold office from God, not the pope. The bishop of Rome should be understood as primus inter pares to establish the unity of the universal church and preserve its canons, while bishops should exercise most of the authority which wrongly accrued to the pope. The doctrine, although similar to some Gallicanism, differs significantly from it in its universality and in not advocating royal supremacy. It remained for proponents of Josephinism* to make Hontheim's ideas serve their own secular statist centralism; Kaunitz, Austrian chief minister, found them useful and ordered them taught in the universities. The Synod of Pistoia* (1786) and the Congress of Ems* (1786) adopted Febronian principles. I.H. von Wessenberg* succeeded Hontheim as leading advocate of Febronianism, and hoped to build a nearly independent national German church. Clement XIII condemned Hontheim's book in 1764, Hontheim later recanted (1778), and the Syllabus of Errors* (1864) and the dogma of papal infallibility (1870) made it dogmatically inconsistent with Catholicism. The Old Catholic* movement continued the doctrines after the Vatican Council (1869-70).

BIBLIOGRAPHY: O. Meyer, Febronius, Weihbischof Johann Nicolaus von Hontheim und sein Widerruf (1880); L. Just, "Febronianismus," in Lex. Theol. Kirche, IV (1960), pp. 46-47; M. O'Callaghan, "Febronianism," in New Catholic Encyclopedia, V, pp. 868-69; C.B. Moss, The Old Catholic Movements, Its Origins and History (1964). C.T. MC INTIRE

FEDERAL THEOLOGY, see COVENANT THEOLOGY

FEGAN, JAMES WILLIAM CONDELL (1852-1925). English philanthropist. His father was a leader of the Christian Brethren in Southampton. Converted at seventeen as he read in the epistle to the Romans, he was soon involved in Ragged School work in London. At twenty-one he gave up a commercial career to rescue and care for children. His first home for boys was at Deptford. His marriage to Mary Pope in 1889 brought him a loyal partner in this enterprise. Boys were trained in farming and encouraged to go to Canada, and by 1900 nearly 3,000 had emigrated. "Mr. Fegan's Homes" were established at Stony Stratford in 1900 and Goudhurst in 1912, and at present there are family homes for boys and girls in Surrey, Sussex, and Kent. J.G.G. NORMAN

FELIX OF URGEL (d.818). Bishop of Urgel in Spain. An exponent of Adoptianism,* he defended his views in the presence of Charlemagne at the Council of Regensburg (792) where he was induced to recant. Sent to Rome by Charlemagne, he was compelled to sign an orthodox confession which he subsequently repudiated. Alcuin* wrote extensively against him, opposing his use of the phrase "adopted son" with regard to Christ in His human nature. At the Council of Aix-la-Chapelle (798) Felix again acknowledged himself defeated, wrote a recantation, and called on the clergy of Urgel to follow his example. He was placed under the supervision of the archbishop of Lyons till his death. It is doubtful whether his recantation was sincere, for a treatise discovered after his death contained evidence of his former views.

HAROLD H. ROWDON

FELLER, HENRIETTA (1800-1868). Missionary and educator. A Protestant from Switzerland, she arrived in St. Johns, Quebec, in 1835, and began spreading the Gospel from house to house. In Grande Ligne she and her colleague Louis Roussy found a home to receive them, and Madame Feller began a school in the attic for local children. During the Rebellion of 1837 the two missionaries and their sixty-three converts were persecuted for being Protestants and forced to flee to New York. When peace was restored they returned, and in 1840 they erected the first building of what was to be Feller College. Henrietta was instrumental in founding the Grande Ligne Mission in 1836, the first Canadian French Baptist Church.

ROBERT WILSON

FELLOWSHIP OF INDEPENDENT EVANGELICAL CHURCHES (UK). This body, founded by the Rev. E.J. Poole-Connor in 1922 and originally named the Fellowship of Undenominational and Unattached Churches and Missions, brings together in evangelical unity isolated ministers and churches, pastors desiring legal recognition as ministers of religion and professional qualifications, and others disturbed by the spread of liberalism within their own denominations. Its Declaration of Faith is broad enough to embrace evangelicals of Calvinist, conservative Methodist, and other traditions; questions of church organization and administration of the sacraments are carefully avoided. The Fellowship has drawn up lists of churches and personal members, has an annual assembly, a permanent council and provincial auxiliaries, issues publications, and acts as a trustee of church property. At present it embraces more than 400 churches, but the number is increasing.

IAN SELLERS

FELLOWSHIP OF RECONCILIATION. Probably the most significant of the peace organizations created during World War I. It was founded in England in December 1914 by Henry Hodgkin, a Quaker, and rapidly spread to the United States in 1915. It is now an international organization and the leading American pacifist organization. It is based upon the essential unity of mankind and the power of truth and love to resolve human conflict. It has been active in nonviolent intervention on behalf of victims of injustice and exploitation, working for the abolition of war, the redemption and rehabilitation of public offenders, encouraging reverence for personality, and the maintenance of a spirit of self-giving love while engaged in the efforts to achieve these purposes.

JOHN P. DEVER

FÉNELON, FRANÇOIS DE SALIGNAC DE LA MOTHE (1651-1715). French ecclesiastic. Educated at the University of Cahors, a Jesuit college in Paris and the seminary of St. Sulpice, he was ordained in 1675, and for thirteen years conducted a mission to the Huguenots, whom he endeavored to convert with a mixture of oratory, threats, and open bribery. From 1689 to 1697 he was tutor to Louis XIV's grandson, the duke of Burgundy, for whom he wrote his famous educational novel, Télémaque. In 1695 he was at the height of his influence and was made archbishop of Cambrai, but he fell suddenly because of his association with the Quietist followers of Madame Guyon.* For a time he was banished to his see city, but on the pope's condemnation of his treatise on true and false mysticism (1699), he issued a submission which on his later testimony was insincere. In the Jansenist controversy Fénelon defended the infallibility of the church and supported the bull Unigenitus in sermons and letters. He displayed throughout a baffling mixture of ecclesiastical authoritarianism and broad humanitarian ideals: his optimism, historicism, and instinctive belief in progress make him a forerunner of the Enlightenment, while his idea of God leads directly to the Deism of the next century.

IAN SELLERS

FERDINAND II (1578-1637). Archduke of Austria, he became king of Bohemia (1617), king of Hungary (1618), and emperor of the Holy Roman Empire (1619). Zealous for the cause of Roman Catholicism, he favored the Jesuits in their aggressive endeavors to regain territories lost to Protestantism. In Austria he banished the Utraquists, the Reformed, the Lutherans, and the Anabaptists, and in 1624 required adherence to Roman Catholicism. He carried through the Counter-Reformation in Tirol. Peter Canisius* was his court preacher between 1571 and 1577. In the Thirty Years' War, Wallenstein brought him a succession of victories, so that in 1629 he considered himself strong enough to issue the Edict of Restitution, which required that properties confiscated from the Roman Catholic Church since 1555 be returned by the Protestants. The intervention of Gustavus Adolphus checked the emperor's successes, although the Treaty of Prague in 1635 resolved matters in his favor.

CARL S. MEYER

FERDINAND V (1452-1516). King of Aragon. Son of John II of Aragon, he married his cousin, Isabella of Castile in 1469, in order to unite his claims to the crown of Castile with hers. In practice, however, she asserted her own claims to authority in the government of Castile. A faithful Roman Catholic, Ferdinand was very ambitious; he helped to establish royal authority in Spain, he carried on a long struggle against France in Italy, and he supported the voyages of Columbus. He achieved acclaim in Christendom after the capture of Granada in 1491 and the subsequent expulsion of the Moors (Muslims) from Europe. Further honor came his way after the expulsion of the Jews from Spain in 1492. For his enthusiasm for the Inquisition he earned the title "the Catholic." He was succeeded by his grandson Charles.

PETER TOON

FERGUSON, JAMES (1621-1667). Scottish minister and writer. Of aristocratic lineage, he graduated at Glasgow University in 1638 and five years later became minister of Kilwinning in Ayrshire. There he was to stay for the twenty-four years of life left to him, declining invitations to richer parishes and the divinity chair of his own university. A man of notable piety, he was reckoned by his biographer to have been one of the wisest men in the land. Living in troubled times, he maintained the moderate (Resolutioner) side against the more fervent Covenanters* (Protesters), but admitted later that he had been wrong. He wrote various excellent commentaries on Paul's epistles (1656-75), commended by C.H. Spurgeon as being those of "a grand, gracious, savory divine." Ferguson produced also a Refutation of the Errors of Toleration, Erastianism, Independency, and Separation. J.D. DOUGLAS

FERRAR, NICHOLAS (1592-1637). Founder of the Little Gidding community. A brilliant academic career at Cambridge, a period of continental travel, work with the Virginia Company, and a year in Parliament all preceded his establishment at Little Gidding in 1625 of a small religious community based on biblical and Anglican principles. In 1626 William Laud* ordained him deacon, but he was never priested. At Little Gidding, Huntingdonshire, the Anglican offices were said in church, and the other canonical hours in the manor oratory. Vigils were kept throughout the night, and life was ordered by rule. Everyone learned a trade, and the community specialized in bookbinding. There was a free school for local children, and many charitable works were done in the locality. In 1633 Charles I visited the community and was greatly impressed. Puritans, however, were hostile, and the institution was attacked in a pamphlet called The Arminian Nunnery (1641). In 1647 the community was sacked by the parliamentary army. JOHN A. SIMPSON

FERRAR, ROBERT (c.1500-1555). Bishop of St. David's, Wales. Reportedly a graduate of both Oxford and Cambridge, he joined the Augustinians. Influenced by Lutheran literature, he was compelled to recant in 1528. Records are conflicting, but he became bishop of St. David's in 1548, an appointment savagely resisted by a "greedy and turbulent chapter" who opposed him on legal technicalities and absurd charges. Nevertheless, he was imprisoned and on the accession of the Roman Catholic Queen Mary was transferred to a London jail where John Bradford and other Protestants renewed his Reformation principles. Deprived of his bishopric in 1554, Ferrar was arraigned before his successor at St. David's, found guilty of heresy, and burnt at Carmarthen. He told a spectator that "if he saw him once to stir in the pains of his burning he should then give no credit to his doctrine." J.D. DOUGLAS

FERRETTI, SALVATORE (1817-1874). Organizer of the Evangelical Italian church in London. A man of great faith and deep humanity, in 1846 he founded a school in London to save poor Italian children from the exploitation of other Italians who used them to beg in the city and cruelly ill-treated them. The school, which he supported, giving private lessons in Italian, was put under the auspices of the "Society for the religious care and instruction of foreigners," founded by Lord Shaftesbury. Ferretti then edited L'Eco di savonarola, a bilingual journal intended to spread the Gospel among the Italian exiles and to expose the errors of Roman Catholicism. Returning to Italy in 1861, he founded an orphanage for girls in Florence, which is still in existence.

DAISY RONCO

FEUARDENT, FRANÇOIS (1539-1610). Franciscan preacher and scholar. A Norman by birth, he studied the humanities at Bayeux, became a Franciscan, was ordained in 1561, and later lectured at the University of Paris. He took a leading part in France's political and religious struggles, and was a prominent preacher for the cause of the Catholic League. He retired to the convent of Bayeux, where he provided a library. His works include biblical commentaries, writings against Calvinism, patristics, including editions of Ildefonsus of Toledo, Irenaeus, Ephraem; and editions also of Arnobius, Michael Psellus, and Nicholas of Lyra.

FEUDALISM. Although at varying periods its incidence was international, it was most notably present in Western Europe in medieval times, arising amid decaying central authority, civil war, invasion, and economic stagnation. Feudalism was a way of governing by the strong (lords) over the weak (vassals), from the nobility through the peasantry; property (fiefs) determined rank. Churchmen were excluded from but dependent on this stratification, and its development varied within Europe and chronologically: England, for example, did not experience it until the Normans introduced it in 1066. Whatever the degree of feudalization, there never was anarchy, and government was always local; personalness and proximity were paramount, and interdependency reigned. To be both lord and vassal was common, and there was even hope for the serf's progress. At first the vassal was the lord's fighting man, but as property was passed down, more distributed, duties and standing changed. Civilization began to replace war, and the erstwhile military class were becoming country gentlemen. Feudal institutions lasted to the Ancien Régime, and some elements still survive; but feudalism ceased to be important by 1300 when the bourgeoisie were acquiring fiefs alongside the nobility. Manors and serfdom were bound to shift, but the ideal engendered by them—chivalry—bore a timeless universal truth. A deep sense of law emerged, and the later courts of justice and the parliamentary system were but natural feudal outgrowths. Feudalism was founded on, and developed and bequeathed a commitment to aristocracy, believing that to be a law of nature.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: C. Stephenson, Medieval Feudalism (1942); F.L. Ganshof, Feudalism (tr. P. Grierson, 1952); M. Bloch, Feudal Society (tr. L.A. Manyon, 1961); F. Stenton, The First Century of English Feudalism, 1066-1166 (1961).

C.G. THORNE, JR.

FEUILLANTS. Originally a branch of the Cistercian Order, so named because they had their home at Les Feuillans. Although they were directly under Pitaea, they became an independent order under the leadership of Jean de la Barrière. He reestablished the early strict discipline of the order. In 1595 the pope forbade Cîteaux to claim any jurisdiction over the monastery, and confirmed its independence.

FICINO, MARSILIO (1433-1499). Florentine humanist. He was the son of Cosimo de' Medici's physician, and his early life is little known, but by 1456 he began the study of Greek which resulted in his translation of the complete works of Plato (1463-73), Plotinus (1482-92), and Pseudo-Dionysius (1492). Cosimo had given him the use of a villa (1462), and here the Platonic Academy was founded. Later, while teaching at this famous school Ficino wrote his major work, Theologia platonia (1469-72). In 1473 he became a priest, later writing De Christiana religioni (1476). When the Medici were forced from Florence, he retired to the country.

Ficino believed that Neoplatonism could be used to win intellectuals to Christ. His outlook presupposed that truth was found only in poetry and faith and was transmitted through a long line of ancient philosophers, the most important of whom were Plato and his followers. He thought there was no difference between divine revelation and the teachings of the ancient philosophers. In fact, the Platonic works contained all that man could know of truth, beauty, and goodness. The world of the Platonist was a hierarchy of emanations from the original essence. In this stepladder of bodies, qualities, souls, and intelligences, man occupied an intermediary role, related to the world of matter by his body and to the world of the spirit by his soul. Christ is identified as the mediator who leads man to love God and to emulate his perfection. Ficino exercised an enormous influence not only on the Renaissance, but on later European thought also. His editions of Plato were standard for several centuries, and scholars such as Colet Spenser and the Cambridge Platonists* owe much to him.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: P.O. Kristeller, The Philosophy of Marsilio Ficino (tr. V. Conant, 1943); E. Cassirer et al. (eds.), The Renaissance Philosophy of Man (1948), pp. 193-212; J.C. Nelson, Renaissance Theory of Love (1958).

ROBERT G. CLOUSE

FIDEI DEFENSOR. The title granted to Henry VIII by Leo I on 11 October 1521 as a result of his Defence of the Seven Sacraments against Luther and his persistent pursuit of a special papal title to parallel those of the "Catholic King" of Spain had "the Most Christian" King of France. Although Henry had not written the reply to Luther's Babylonian Captivity of the Church with his own hand, he had taken a considerable part in its composition and all of the credit for its authorship It tipped the scales in favor of his demand for a special papal title, despite its misrepresentation of Luther's position and its general theological weakness. Although not intended to be hereditary, Henry accepted the title for his successors, and it is still borne by the British monarch, despite the change in the "faith."

W.S. REID

FIDEISM. A view which assumes that knowledge originates in a fundamental act of faith, independent of rational presuppositions. Though the term in this form dates only from about 1885 when it was associated with and adapted by French theologians, the standpoint represented by it had several times been officially condemned during the pontificate of Gregory XVI (1831-46).

FIDES DAMASI, see TOME OF ST. DAMASUS

FIELD, FREDERICK (1801-1885). Anglican scholar. Directly descended from Oliver Cromwell, Field was a Cambridge graduate who ministered briefly in Suffolk before becoming rector of Reepham, Norfolk, in 1842. He being partly deaf from an early age, the affliction worsened, and in 1863 the scholarly bachelor retired to Norwich where he devoted himself to his books. In 1870 he was appointed a member of the Old Testament Revision Company. Age and infirmity prevented his attendance at meetings, but his meticulous notes were always welcomed by his colleagues. He was an erudite patristics scholar, specializing in the works of Chrysostom and of Origen, whose Hexapla he edited (1875). Bishop Christopher Wordsworth called him "the Jerome of the Church." In the field of NT linguistics he made a significant contribution with his Otium Norviceuse (1864-81). In theology Field described himself as holding the catholic faith of the reformed Church of England, avoiding all extremes and party labels.

J.D. DOUGLAS

FIELD, RICHARD (1561-1616). Anglican divine. Graduate of Oxford, Field continued to lecture and study there until 1592. Soon after, he became rector of Burghclere in Hampshire. He was appointed a royal chaplain, and he took part in the Hampton Court Conference* (1603). Six years later he was made dean of Gloucester, where his occasional preaching attracted great crowds. He preferred, however, to reside at Burghclere or at Windsor, of which he was a prebendary. Field's chief work, Of the Church (1606), was intended as an apology for the Church of England against Rome and was hailed as one of the best works of polemical divinity, unsurpassed even by his friend Richard Hooker.* Field drew a parallel between the Roman Catholic Church of his day and fourth-century Donatism.* He argued also that the continental Protestant bodies were part of the church of Christ.

J.D. DOUGLAS

FIELD PREACHING. Generally associated with Scotland, field preaching has passed through a number of distinctive phases in the last 450 years. Beginning with George Wishart,* in the early stages of the Reformation struggle, when churches were either not available or inadequate to hold the thronging crowds, it came into its own in the second half of the Covenanting era. It was after the restoration of Charles II, with the subsequent legislation which drove so many ministers from their parishes, that men like John Welsh and John Blackadder, Richard Cameron* and Donald Cargill,* took to the moors and the mountains where great conventicles were held, ten to fifteen thousand people attending, and where the sacraments were celebrated. With the coming of George Whitefield* and the Evangelical Revival, field preaching took on a new dimension, as many as 30,000 people gathering at Cambuslang in 1742 to hear the famous evangelist. Later came the advent of the great Highland open-air communions, which were to remain a characteristic feature of religious life in the north down to our own day. Among recent developments have been Covenanting commemoration conventicles, Easter Sunday hilltop services, and evangelistic rallies. Closely associated with these has been the growth of summer seaside missions, with their services on beach and promenade involving thousands of workers. D.P. THOMSON

FIFTH MONARCHY MEN. An apocalyptic movement that came to prominence in England during the Commonwealth and Protectorate. Its adherents hoped to see the prophecy of Daniel (cf. 2:44) fulfilled by the establishment of the rule of Christ and His saints upon earth as the successors to the Assyrian, Persian, Macedonian, and Roman empires. This was to be done by destroying all anti-Christian forms such as the established church. After the fall of the Commonwealth they supported Oliver Cromwell. The nominated or Barebones Parliament of 1653 raised their hopes of bringing in the Millennium, but the establishment of the Protectorate destroyed their hopes and they turned against Cromwell. One of their leaders, Christopher Feake, even called him "the most dissembling and perjured villain in the world." This agitation led to the arrest of their leaders, including Maj.-Gen. Thomas Harrison, Maj.-Gen. Robert Overton, Feake, and John Rogers. A Fifth Monarchist, Thomas Venner, attempted two uprisings (1657, 1661), both of which were easily suppressed, and the movement died out.

See B.S. Capp, The Fifth Monarch Men (1972).
ROBERT G. CLOUSE

FIGGIS, JOHN NEVILLE (1866-1919). Anglican historian. Son of a minister in the Countess of Huntingdon's Connexion* in Brighton, Figgis in his youth reacted against his father's evangelical religion. He had a brilliant Cambridge career as student and teacher of history, being a pupil and friend of Mandell Creighton, Maitland, and Acton. He won lasting fame through The Divine Right of Kings (1892) and Studies of Political Thought from Gerson to Grotius 1414-1625 (1907), in which he pioneered interpretation of the transition from medieval to modern periods, especially in the struggle between absolutism and constitutionalism, and emphasized the theological matrices of modern secular political theory. He came to oppose the omnicompetent state, supporting Guild Socialism and, using Gierke's idea of the real personality of groups, he argued that the freedom of the church was a bulwark of the freedom of all groups within the state (Churches in the Modern State, 1913).

Figgis surprised his friends by deciding to be ordained to the Church of England's ministry in 1892, for he had not been noticeably religious. He was not very successful as a parish priest, but as vicar of Marnhull (1902-7) he had a "middle age conversion" from a humanitarian and moralist religion, entered the Community of the Resurrection, and became a prophetic preacher of the gospel of supernatural, sacramental, and disciplined redemption in Christ, in a world in crisis where indifference and hostility—he was an early acute English interpreter of Nietzsche—threatened the faith and the Christian civilization that rested on it. More of an evangelist and apologist than a theologian, Figgis's influence hardly survived World War I and his death.

See M.G. Tucker, John Neville Figgis (1950).
HADDON WILLMER

FILASTER (Philaster) (d. c.397). Writer of the famous treatise Liber de Haeresibus, which sought to refute 128 Christian and 28 Jewish heresies. It met a real contemporary need and was used by Augustine of Hippo. Its weakness was to place side by side major heresies such as Arianism and minor aberrations such as astronomical speculation. Before writing this book Filaster traveled widely, preaching against Arianism and other heresies, and thereby ensuring personal acquaintance with heretics. Toward the end of his life he became bishop of Brescia in N Italy, and he was succeeded in that see by Gaudentius.

FILLMORE, CHARLES, see UNITY SCHOOL

FINAN (d.661). Second bishop of Lindisfarne, where he succeeded Aidan* in 652. He worked with Oswy, king of Northumbria, for the conversion of the country to Christianity of the Celtic or Irish type. Intensely missionary in his outlook, he sought to bring the Gospel to people beyond the borders of Northumbria, and did so with such success that he baptized both the kings of the East Saxons and Mercia. In the controversy with the Roman Church over the date of Easter he took the side of the Celtic tradition, but died before the matter was finally settled in favor of Rome by Oswy at the Synod of Whitby (663/4).

FINDLATER, SARAH, see BORTHWICK, JANE

FINDLAY, GEORGE GILLANDERS (1849-1919). Methodist biblical scholar. Born in Montgomeryshire, Wales, he studied at Wesley College, Sheffield, and London University. He served his denomination's theological colleges at Headingley and Richmond from 1870 until his retirement in 1917. Findlay contributed to The Expositor's Bible, The Expositor's Greek Testament, The Cambridge Bible, and The Pulpit Commentary. He also wrote Epistles of the Apostle Paul (1892); Church of Christ in the New Testament (1893); The Books of the Prophets in their Historical Succession (3 vols., 1896-1907); and Fellowship in the Life Eternal (1909).

FINLAND. Christianity was first introduced to Finland mainly through trade relations—from Novgorod in the East and from Birka in the West. In addition, the bishopric of Hamburg-Bremen did missionary work in Scandinavia. The position of the Western Church and Swedish rule were secured in 1249 through the crusade to Tavastland (Häme) led by Birger Jarl of Sweden. Åbo (Turku) was soon made an episcopal seat, and a cathedral was built there during the thirteenth century. From the beginning of the fourteenth century until the end of the Middle Ages all the bishops were graduates of foreign universities. The Reformation came peacefully to Finland when Peter Särkilax,* Mikael Agricola,* and others came from Wittenberg and became church leaders at home.

The Pietistic revivals were most important for the inner development of the church and continued to enrich it from the end of the seventeenth century until the present day (see, e.g., P. RUOTSALAINEN, H. RENQVIST, F.G. HEDBERG). During the present century new groups have arisen, such as the "Fifth Movement," and these carry on the old revival inheritance as well as receiving new impulses from revivals of the English-speaking world. These groups emphasize faithfulness to the Bible and the Lutheran Confession, in reaction to liberal theology and higher criticism. These movements enjoy much freedom within the church and have influenced it to a great extent.

The Church of Finland is a state church, but has considerable liberty. The church assembly meets every five years; its enactments must be ratified by Parliament. In 1889 a church law was passed, giving everyone the right of choosing his religion; in 1923 this was enlarged to include the right to freedom from religion. The Orthodox Church is also regarded as a state church; active mostly in the eastern parts of the country before World War II, its members were spread out over almost the entire country after the evacuation of Karelia.

The Evangelical-Lutheran Church of Finland, which still claims more than ninety per cent of the population, has rather more than four-and-a-half million members; the Orthodox Church numbers about 68,000; none of the other registered bodies has a membership in excess of 10,000, according to available statistics. Roman Catholics number only about 3,000. The so-called Civil Register (which curiously includes Pentecostals and other groups unregistered as religious bodies) numbers some 250,000.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: E. Jutikkala, A History of Finland (1962); M. Juva, The Finnish Evangelical Church (1962); K. Pirinen, L'Église de Finlande (1962); L. Pinomaa, Finnish Theology Past and Present (1963); G. Sentzke, Finland, Its People and Its Church (1963) and Reformation und Pietismus in Finnland (1963).

STIG-OLOF FERNSTROM

FINLEY, SAMUEL (1715-1766). Presbyterian minister and educator. Born in Ireland, he emigrated to America after 1730 and studied under William Tennent, Sr.* at the "Log College" in Neshaminy, Pennsylvania, for the Presbyterian ministry. He was licensed in 1739 by the pro-revivalist Presbytery of New Brunswick and sent on itinerations as the Great Awakening* grew in intensity. A fiery preacher of repentance and divine grace and forgiveness, he defended the "New Side" (revivalist) position in a pamphlet war with John Thomson. Finley was aligned with the positions on excesses held by Jonathan Dickinson* and Jonathan Edwards.* He founded an academy on the Maryland-Pennsylvania border which helped to feed the College of New Jersey with youth aspiring to the New Side ministry. He became one of the early trustees of the new college at Princeton in 1746, was elected its fifth president in 1761, and served in that post until his death five years later. KEITH J. HARDMAN

FINNEY, CHARLES G(RANDISON) (1792-1875). American revivalist. Born in Warren, Connecticut, and reared in Oneida County, New York, he entered a law office in Adams, New York, after limited formal education and was later admitted to the bar. At Adams he began attending church services conducted by a friend, George W. Gale. Although at first critical of religious dogmas, Finney after studying the Bible for himself was converted in 1821. This involved, as he said, "a retainer from the Lord to plead his cause." Turning from law, he began to preach and in 1824 received Presbyterian ordination. For the next eight years he conducted revivals in the eastern states with unusual results. In 1832 he became pastor of the Second Presbyterian Church in New York City, but dissatisfaction with the disciplinary system in Presbyterian churches soon led to his withdrawal from the presbytery. He also delivered a series of lectures on revivals during these years in New York. These were soon published (1835) and widely read.

In 1835 he became professor of theology at a new college in Oberlin, Ohio. During the remainder of his life he was linked with the school, serving as president from 1851 to 1866. Through most of these years, however, he remained active in evangelistic work, devoting a part of each year to revivals. Finney fits no theological pattern. In general he was a New School Calvinist, but he laid heavy stress on man's ability to repent, and he made perfectionism* a trademark of Oberlin teaching.

See also OBERLIN THEOLOGY.

BRUCE L. SHELLEY

FINNIAN OF MOVILLE (c.495-579). Irish monk. Probably trained at the monastery founded by Ninian in Galloway, he supposedly went to Rome where he was ordained priest. Returning to his native Ulster, he formed a religious community at Moville, about 540. From Italy he brought back to Ireland a copy of the Vulgate NT and Pentateuch. He is sometimes identified with St. Frigidian (or Frediana) who is venerated at Lucca in Italy, and sometimes confused with Finnian of Clonard (d.549), the traditional initiator of true monasticism in Ireland. Many legends surround him.

FIRMILIAN (d.268). Bishop of Caesarea in Cappadocia from about 230. A great admirer of Origen, they exchanged visits and he was able to study under him. Firmilian was clearly a man of great influence in the East, but his only surviving work is a letter to Cyprian (Cypr., Ep.75). In this he supports Cyprian's contention that baptism belongs to the church alone and is therefore invalid outside its confines. He rejects the opposing view of Stephen, bishop of Rome, with all the considerable power of scorn at his command. He presided over at least one synod to deal with the heretical Paul of Samosata, bishop of Antioch, in 264, and died at Tarsus on his way to Antioch to a further synod to decide this issue.

C. PETER WILLIAMS

FIRST AMENDMENT, THE. The First Amendment to the Consitution of the United States states: "Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press; or the right of the people peaceably to assemble and to petition the Government of a redress of grievances." The Supreme Court has held that the first phrase is not applicable when the free exercise takes a form of activity thought to be antisocial or self-destructive (e.g., polygamy, snake-handling, or refusal to be vaccinated). In the 1947 Everson v. Board of Education decision, the court interpreted the law as an intention to erect "a wall of separation between church and State." Since then, the court has invalidated religious instruction, Bible reading, and prescribed prayers in the public schools; however, the payment of public funds for the busing of children to parochial schools was ruled acceptable.

JOHN P. DEVER

FISH. There are various biblical references to fish: the OT uses the word as a figure to point to man's helplessness (Eccl. 9:12; Hab. 1:14); Matthew (13:47f.) lets the variety of fish caught characterize the kingdom of heaven. In biblical material, however, the fish is not a primary symbol. In Christian art and literature, on the other hand, ichthus ("fish" in Greek), has basically been a symbol of Christ. The Greek letters form an acrostic (Jesus Christ, Son of God, Savior), but it is not known whether the acrostic preceded the symbol or vice versa. Neither is it known how early this usage developed. In addition, the term has been used to refer to neophytes (Tertullian, De Baptismo) and to the Eucharist (as in the paintings made inside the catacombs). From early times fish has been substituted for meat on days when fasting is observed.

WATSON E. MILLS

FISHER, EDWARD (c.1601-1655). Anglican theological writer. He graduated in Arts at Oxford (1630), where he showed an excellent command of church history and the classics. While records are not clear, he is known to have been a royalist supporter and strongly anti-Puritan. Monetary difficulties set him traveling, and for a time he taught school at Carmarthen in Wales. His creditors found him, however, and he fled to Ireland, where he died. Fisher was the author of The Scriptures Harmony and An Appeale to thy Conscience, both published in 1643. Parts of another work of his, A Christian Caveat to the old and new Sabbatarians, in which he declined to regard Sunday as a Sabbath (a purely ecclesiastical device), were reprinted in New York two centuries after his death by the Seventh-Day Baptists of America. An early eighteenth-century school of thought identified Fisher with the "E.F." who wrote the Marrow of Modern Divinity, but Fisher's obviously superior education makes this highly improbable.

J.D. DOUGLAS

FISHER, GEOFFREY FRANCIS (1887-1972). Archbishop of Canterbury, 1945-1961. Born in a Midlands rectory, he was educated at Marlborough and Oxford, taught at Marlborough for three years, then in 1914 was appointed headmaster of Repton at an astonishingly young age. In 1932 he became bishop of Chester; in 1939 he was translated to London. He was appointed to Canterbury in 1945 after the untimely death of William Temple. Deeply rooted in the church-and-community of nineteenth-century rural England, Fisher always combined deep devotion to the cause of Christ, an understanding of widely different viewpoints, and a strong sense of duty and of the need for discipline. As bishop he could appreciate Evangelical and Anglo-Catholic, those two wings of his church that between them have nearly all its "life," but who do not always appreciate each other. Bishop of London in the war years, he was successful in bringing about financial reorganization, but not in bringing order in place of the eccentricities of Anglo-Catholic worship. As primate he was largely responsible for the planning by which different provinces of the Anglican Communion acquired independence. Though deeply involved in interchurch relations, he became increasingly suspicious of organic union, and in his retirement staunchly opposed the Anglican-Methodist merger scheme. During his last ten years at Canterbury he traveled extensively, and made history by meeting Pope John XXIII* in Rome, in addition to visiting Jerusalem and Constantinople.

P.W. PETTY

FISHER, GEORGE PARK (1827-1909). Church historian. Born in Wrentham, Massachusetts, he graduated from Brown University in 1847, continuing his studies at the Yale Divinity School, at Andover Seminary, and in Germany. From 1854 to 1861 he was a pastor, then he joined the faculty of Yale Divinity School, where he became professor of ecclesiastical history. He was a prolific writer whose first major work, The History of the Reformation (1873), was followed by others dealing with early Christianity and the problems of apologetics.

FISHER, JOHN (1469-1535). Roman Catholic martyr, sometimes known as St. John of Rochester. Born of a Yorkshire family, he was educated at Michaelhouse, Cambridge, of which college he became master in 1497. As the chaplain of Lady Margaret Beaufort he enjoyed her support for raising academic standards. In 1504 he became bishop of Rochester and chancellor of Cambridge. Against Lutheran ideas for reform he defended traditional Roman Catholic doctrine. He was scholarly, an admirer of Erasmus,* and genuinely interested in moderate reforms. As confessor to Catherine of Aragon he strongly protested against Henry VIII's determination to divorce her. His property was confiscated, and in 1534 he was put in the Tower for refusing to take the oath relating to the Act of Succession. Then Pope Paul III created him cardinal. This infuriated the king, and within a month Fisher was brought to trial in Westminster Hall, charged with treason. Found guilty, he was executed on 22 June 1535. With Thomas More he was canonized by Pius XI in 1936.

PETER TOON

FISHER, JOHN (1569-1641). Otherwise known as Fisher the Jesuit. A native of County Durham whose original surname was Percy, he was early converted to Roman Catholicism and was educated at the English colleges at Reims and Rome. After admission into the Jesuit Order in 1594 he returned to England, was imprisoned on several occasions, and banished. He persisted in his mission and disputations, however, and was persuasive enough to bring William Chillingworth* into the Roman Catholic Church for a time.

FISKE, FIDELIA (1816-1864). First single woman missionary to Persia. Born in Shelburne, Massachusetts, she was a niece of Pliny Fisk, one of the first two missionaries of the American Board to the Near East. She was converted at fifteen and joined the Congregational Church. A graduate of Mount Holyoke Seminary (1842), she was deeply influenced by Mary Lyon. The American Board appointed her to Persia in 1843. For fifteen years she served in that land, principally among Nestorian women and girls near Lake Urmia. She directed the first boarding school for girls. Ill health forced her return to the USA in 1858. She was offered the principalship of Mt. Holyoke, but refused in the hope, never realized, of being able to return to Persia.

HAROLD R. COOK

FISKE, JOHN (1842-1901). American philosopher, historian, and lecturer. A precocious child, he was graduated from Harvard and admitted to the bar without formal legal training. He turned, however, to propagating Herbert Spencer's evolutionary philosophy that had replaced the Calvinism of his youth. Claiming "Evolution is God's way of doing things," he infused evolutionism with religious values in such works as Outline of Cosmic Philosophy (1874), The Destiny of Man (1884), The Idea of God (1885), and Through Nature to God (1899). In his last twenty years he turned more to the study of American history. Essentially a popularizer, he was nevertheless one of the most important intellectual influences in America at the end of the nineteenth century.

DONALD W. DAYTON

FITZRALPH, RICHARD (d.1360). Archbishop of Armagh. Born at the end of the thirteenth century, he studied at Oxford, and about 1333 was chancellor of the university. In 1334 he became chancellor of Lincoln Cathedral. He was in favor with the Avignon papacy, was advanced to the deanery of Lichfield in 1337, and ten years later was consecrated archbishop of Armagh. In 1349 he visited Avignon and came into conflict with the mendicant orders. Between 1353 and 1356 he wrote De Pauperie Salvatoris in seven books. He was spokesman for the secular clergy, claiming that poverty was neither of apostolic observance nor of present obligation, and that mendicancy was without warrant in Scripture or primitive tradition. In a series of sermons at St. Paul's Cross, London, he preached against the mendicants. He was hotly opposed by the English friars, notably by Roger Conway, and was cited to Avignon where he preached a famous sermon, "Defensio Curatorum," before Innocent VI, but died before judgment was given. In his opposition to the friars, and in the doctrine of "Dominion" in De Pauperie Salvatoris he was a forerunner of John Wycliffe.

J.G.G. NORMAN

FIVE MILE ACT (1665). One of the statutes that comprised the Clarendon Code* by which Parliament sought to penalize those who did not subscribe to the liturgy and doctrine of the Church of England. The Five Mile Act forbade Nonconformist ministers and teachers to come within five miles of any city, town, or parliamentary borough. Offenders were subject to a severe fine.

FLACIUS, MATTHIAS ILLYRICUS (1520-1575). German Lutheran theologian. Born in the Adriatic peninsula of Istria, his Croatian name was Vlacic (Latinized as Flacius) and Illyricus was added later to refer to his coastal homeland. An orphan, he worked his way through school and studied with the humanist Baptista Egnatius, a friend of Erasmus, in Venice (1536-39). Through the influence of his uncle he was dissuaded from becoming a monk and persuaded to attend the university. Consequently he studied at the universities of Basle, Tübingen, and Wittenberg. At the latter school he underwent a deep spiritual crisis which ended only when he was converted to evangelical doctrine through contact with Luther. He became a professor of Hebrew (1544) and lectured on Aristotle and the Bible. He subsequently differed with Melanchthon over the compromise Augsburg Interim (1548) and then wandered from Jena to Regensburg, Antwerp, Strasbourg, and finally to Frankfurt, where he died. He was almost Manichaean in his view of sin and evil in man. His fame rests upon his Clavis or key to the Scriptures, a monument in the history of hermeneutics, and the Magdeburg Centuries, an interpretation of church history which in its extremely antipapal emphasis had a strong effect on later Protestant thought.

ROBERT G. CLOUSE

FLAD, JOHANN MARTIN (1838-1915). German missionary to Ethiopia. A saddler by trade, as a boy he enrolled in the St. Chrischona school. Bishop Gobat asked the school for four lay craftsmen to staff a new work in Ethiopia, and Flad was among those selected. In 1855 he went to Ethiopia and initially was cordially received. He became a victim of persecution by Emperor Theodorus II in 1864, and two years later, with his family held hostage, the emperor compelled him to undertake a diplomatic mission to England. After the British had forced the downfall of Theodorus in 1868, Flad was able to pursue an undisturbed ministry of literature distribution and evangelism among the Falascha (Ethiopian Jews) until his death. RICHARD V. PIERARD

FLAGELLANTS. In the Middle Ages these were groups of people, under the influence of a form of religious hysteria, who often went barefooted and inflicted beatings on their bare shoulders by scourges as an act of penance. They first appeared in Bologna in 1260 following a period of famine and strife. The prophecies of the impending end of the world by Joachim of Flora combined with the state of the times to create a mass hysteria at the possibility of divine displeasure. The orthodox belief in the efficacy of the scourge (flagella) as a sign of repentance degenerated into a depraved delight in self-torture and the conviction that flagellation was the only effective sacrament. The ecclesiastical approval given to the bands on their first appearance was later withdrawn. Clement VI repressed them, and they were condemned by the Council of Constance.

The most spectacular appearance of the Flagellants took place in N Europe in 1349 and was associated with the outbreak of the Black Death.* Their bloodletting was an attempt to stanch God's anger by sacrificial propitiation. The Flagellants believed that, because of their self-inflicted tortures, they would all be saved, that they bore on their bodies the stigmata of Christ, and that their blood mingled with his blood. They also called for the killing of the Jews, whom they believed were the enemies of God and responsible for the plague. Their language and customs were those of the commonly approved piety of their day, adapted to their desire to make a sacrifice to God of their own bodies and those of their enemies. They revealed all the signs of a mass religious reaction during a period of great popular stress.

See W.M. Cooper, Flagellation and the Flagellants (1908). JAMES TAYLOR

FLAVEL, JOHN (d.1691). English Puritan and Nonconformist divine. Educated at University College, Oxford, he was ordained by a presbytery at Salisbury and became curate of Diptford, Devon. Later he was lecturer of St. Saviour's, Dartmouth. Ejected in 1662, he became a Nonconformist. In 1672 he was licensed as a Congregational to preach in his own house at Dartmouth. Persecuted in Devon, he removed in 1682 to London, but returned to Devon where he was instrumental in promoting the "Happy Union" of Presbyterians and Congregationalists in 1690-91. He is best known for his practical writings, which were usefully collected in six volumes in the nineteenth century and have now been reprinted as The Works of John Flavel (1968).

PETER TOON

FLAVIA, DOMITILLA, see DOMITILLA

FLAVIAN. Bishop of Antioch, 381-404. He was leader of Melitius's* supporters during the latter's banishment under Constantius (360) and Valens (370), and was largely responsible for Melitius's recognition as the rightful claimant to the see of Antioch under Gratian. The rival claimant, Paulinus,* continued as bishop of the orthodox Eustathians who had separated from the Antiochene church on the deposition of Eustathius. Flavian accompanied Melitius to the Council of Constantinople in 381. Melitius died at the council, and against the wishes of Gregory of Nazianzus, the council chose Flavian as his successor, although his actual election must have taken place in Antioch. Like Melitius, Flavian was supported by the Eastern bishops, while the Egyptian and Western bishops continued to recognize Paulinus. A council was held at Rome to decide this and other matters in 382, but the Eastern bishops did not attend, holding a synod of their own at Constantinople in which they ratified Flavian's election. Theophilus of Alexandria gave his recognition to Flavian in 394, and Rome followed some time before 398. DAVID JOHN WILLIAMS

FLAVIAN (d.449). Patriarch of Constantinople. He took a prominent part in the movement for the condemnation of Eutyches and presided at a synod held in Constantinople for this purpose in 441. Eutyches was found guilty of denying the two natures in the person of Christ, but appealed from Flavian to Pope Leo I at Rome. The result of this was the meeting of the Council of Ephesus, better known as the Robber Synod,* in 449. This council then absolved Eutyches from all charges of heresy in regard to the person of Christ. It also deposed Flavian from office, and the latter was killed by his opponents there.

FLÉCHÉ, JESSE (d.1611?). Missionary priest. He was chosen by Jean de Biencourt de Poutrincourt to accompany him to Acadia in 1610. After landing in Port Royal in late May of 1610, Fléché, under pressure from Poutrincourt, baptized the Micmac chief Membertou and twenty of his tribe on June 24. The Indians were not ready for baptism, but Poutrincourt wanted to be able to present a favorable report on the progress of the mission in order to keep the support of wealthy and pious people in France. Within a year Fléché baptized over 100 Indians, but when the Jesuits arrived in 1611 they were shocked that these new converts were ignorant of the rudiments of faith. Fléché returned to France in 1611.

ROBERT WILSON

FLÉCHIER, ESPRIT (1632-1710). Bishop of Nîmes. Born at Pernes, France, he studied at Tarascon, was ordained, and went to Paris (1660) where he gained royal favor for a poem on Louis XIV, becoming tutor to the Dauphin. His preaching became famous, his panegyrics being compared with Bossuet,* and his work in history and literature flowered. Elected to the French Academy in 1673, Fléchier was made bishop of Lavaur in 1685 and of Nîmes two years later. At Nîmes he dealt with the consequences of the Edict of Nantes and won many Huguenots to Catholicism.

He was an elegant man of letters and a pretentious orator, but neither a moralist nor a humble and spiritual preacher. His works include Oraisons Funèbres, Sermons, and Panégyriques, and several histories. C.G. THORNE, JR.

FLEMING, PAUL WILLIAM (1911-1950). American missionary and founder of the New Tribes Mission. Through his mother's prayers and the ministry of Paul Rader he went to Malaya in 1937 to reach inland tribes. Repeated attacks of malaria obliged him to return to the USA, where he tried to stimulate enthusiasm for missions to unreached peoples. In 1942 he started the New Tribes Mission with headquarters in Chicago and sent out a first party to eastern Bolivia. The disappearance of the first five men in the jungle in 1943 did not dampen his ardor. Neither did the fatal crash of the first mission transport plane in Colombia in 1950. Later that year, however, came a second fatal crash on Mount Moran in Wyoming, with Fleming on board. HAROLD R. COOK

FLETCHER, JOHN WILLIAM (1729-1785). English clergyman. Born in Switzerland (his original name was de la Fléchère), he came to England with a distinguished university record from Geneva, and was appointed as a private tutor in 1752. Converted under the influence of the Methodists, he was ordained by the bishop of Bangor in 1757. After assisting John Wesley in London, Fletcher took the living of Madeley, Shropshire, in 1760, preferring it to one double its value previously offered to him. For a time he superintended the Countess of Huntingdon's ministerial training college at Trevecca. During the Calvinistic controversy Fletcher was the chief defender of evangelical Arminianism against the objections of Shirley and others. His five Checks to Antinomianism (1771-75) have been compared with Pascal's Provinçiales as models of polite controversial irony.

In his personal relationships with theological opponents Fletcher was a model of Christian reconciliation. Above all, he exemplified in his own character the holiness he preached. Herein lay the secret of his influence over the rough colliers in his parish. Robert Southey said of him: "No church has ever possessed a more apostolic minister." That Wesley recognized his worth can be seen in the fact that he designated Fletcher as his successor, had he consented, as the leader of Methodism.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Works (9 vols, 1800-4); L. Tyerman, Wesley's Designated Successor (1882); F.W. Macdonald, Fletcher of Madeley (1885); J. Marrat, The Vicar of Madeley, John Fletcher (1902). A. SKEVINGTON WOOD

FLEURY, CLAUDE (1640-1723). French church historian. Born in Paris, son of a Normandy lawyer, he was educated in the Jesuit College of Clermont and began practicing law in 1658. Bossuet and Fénelon brought him into contact with leading French personages, and his own studies in civil and canon law, history, literature, and archeology advanced. Ordained in 1669, he won positions in the French court as tutor to the Princes de Conti (1672) and then to Louis XIV's grandsons (1689), was abbot of the Cistercian Loc-Dieu (1684), elected to the French Academy in 1696, and was made prior of Notre-Dame-d'Argenteuil in 1706. Chosen confessor to Louis XV, he was averse to disputes and remained aloof from Jansenism and other movements. His great work was Histoire ecclésiastique (20 vols., 1690-1720), which he ended at 1414 and others continued. This, together with Les Moeurs des chrétiens (1682) and Grand Catechisme historique (1683) and other works, was placed on the Index* for Gallican tendencies. C.G. THORNE, JR.

FLIEDNER, THEODOR (1800-1864). Founder of the deaconess organization in the German Lutheran church. Born in Eppstein/Taunus, he was educated for the ministry at Giessen and Göttingen. As a young pastor in Kaiserswerth near Düsseldorf he became acquainted with the Mennonite practice of appointing deaconesses, and in 1833 he established a home for ex-convicts which he placed in charge of a woman. In 1835-36 he set up a school for children which also trained women teachers, and a hospital in 1836 which gave nursing instruction. By reviving the office of deaconess, Fliedner provided opportunities for unmarried women to be active in public life. He founded other mother houses in Germany, modeled after the Kaiserswerth Sisters, and introduced the idea into the United States and Palestine. RICHARD V. PIERARD

FLORENCE, COUNCIL OF (1438-45). An ecclesiastical assembly noteworthy for its attempt to unite the Greek and Latin churches. While the Council of Basle* was in session, the Greek Empire was under threat from the Turks. The emperor, John VIII Palaeologus, decided to propose to the pope, Eugenius IV, that the Greek and Latin churches unite and thereby offer effective resistance to the infidels. From Basle the council was transferred to Italy by the pope in order to bring it under his control. The sessions began on 8 January 1438 in Ferrara, and three months later the Greek representatives arrived as guests of the pope. They included the emperor, the archbishop of Nicea (John Bessarion*), and the metropolitan of Ephesus (Mark Eugenikos). The latter was an antiunionist.

When the cost of the council became too much for the pope, he accepted the offer of the city of Florence to pay for it, and it was moved there in February 1439. Here the most important discussions and agreements took place. Difficulties were encountered in four areas: the Double Procession of the Spirit, the use of unleavened bread in the Eucharist, the doctrine of purgatory, and the primacy of the bishop of Rome. Of these, the first and the last gave the most problems and were subjects discussed by commissions appointed in the council.

The famous conciliatory discourse by Bessarion on the doctrine of the Spirit, promises of help against the Turks, and the death of the patriarch of Constantinople on 10 June 1439 all helped to make an agreement possible. The union document was prepared by Ambrose Traversari, and the decree of union, beginning with the words Laetentur Coeli, was signed on 5 July 1439. A few, led by Mark Eugenikos, did not sign. On face value it seemed the Latins had won on all points of doctrine, but the Greeks did not believe they had conceded any important points. On 6 July, in the cathedral of Florence, divine service was held to celebrate the union. Cardinal Cesarini read the decree in Latin, and Bessarion in Greek; then the pope celebrated Mass.

In August the Greek emperor left. The fall of his capital was not prevented, however, and in addition the Greek Church renounced the union made at Florence. With the Greeks gone, the council dealt with the continuing irregular Council of Basle and excommunicated its members; also it sought union with other Eastern churches (Mesopotamian, Chaldean, and Maronite). The pope's ascendancy over councils was affirmed in the bull Etsi non dubitemus of 20 April 1441. In 1443 the council was moved to Rome, where it concluded its sessions in 1445. It is regarded as either the sixteenth or seventeenth ecumenical council, due to the fact that the status of Basle (1431-49) is debated.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: J.D. Mansi, Concilia (1789), vol. XXXI and Supplement; Hefele-Leclercq, Histoire des conciles d'après les documents originaux (1916), vol. VII, part 2; J. Gill, The Council of Florence (1959) and Eugenius IV (1961).

PETER TOON

FLORENTIUS RADEWIJNS (1350-1400). Follower of Gerard Groote,* he helped found the Brethren of the Common Life.* He studied at Prague, became a canon at Utrecht, and was converted to a serious Christian life by Groote's fiery preaching. At his suggestion, and with his help, Groote founded the Brethren, to be devoted to the cultivation of practical piety. After Groote's death in 1387, Florentius became leader of the movement and formed the Congregation of Windesheim, with regular canons, associated with the Brethren. Under his leadership the Brethren expanded rapidly. If Groote founded the movement, Florentius was its organizer. During the 1400s it was to become a major devotional and educational force in the Low Countries. Florentius also wrote several brief devotional works (e.g., Tractatus devotus de extirpatione vitiorum).

DIRK JELLEMA

FLORILEGIA (Lat. flores legere, "to gather flowers"). Collections of quotations, particularly from patristic sources or from Scripture. Such anthologies were common in early Christian times when books were not readily available. Reformation collections of "proof-texts" (ranging from dogmatics in outline to oratorio librettos) and their related precedent medieval collections of passages from the Church Fathers in addition to Scripture belong to this class of literature. They show the degree to which subsequent thought in the history of the tradition included as an essential element the direct commentary upon its predecessors.

FLORUS (d. c.860). Scholar and controversialist. Nothing is known of his early life before he became a deacon of Lyons during the period when Agobard* was its bishop (816-40). After Agobard's deposition (he was later reinstated) in 835 because of his opposition to the schemes of Empress Judith, Florus defended the rights and independence of the Church of Gaul in De iniusta vexatione ecclesia Lugdonesis. His other writings included a defense of moderate predestination against the extreme views of Gottschalk, three treatises on liturgy, a commentary on the epistles of Paul, some additions to the Martyrology of Bede, and a collection of poems.

FLUE, NIKOLAUS VON, see NICHOLAS OF FLUE

FLÜGEL, OTTO (1842-1914). German Herbartian philosopher and theologian. Born at Lützen, he studied at Halle and was strongly influenced by C.S. Cornelius, a disciple of J.F. Herbart, and so became himself an Herbatian and opponent of monism. He served as a Lutheran minister at Laucha, Schochwitz, and Wansleben, but ended his life as a free-lance writer. He was involved in the publication of the journal Zeitschrift für exokte Philosophie which later was entitled Zeitschrift für Philosophie und Pedagogik in 1894.

FOAKES-JACKSON, F.J., see JACKSON, F.J.F.

FONT. A container of baptismal water, usually made of stone but sometimes of metal. Early fonts were basically pits in which the baptismal candidates could actually stand and be immersed. Later, in the Middle Ages, when infant baptism was common custom, fonts were raised above the ground so that babies could be immersed. Later still, when pouring or sprinkling replaced immersion, fonts were made smaller and raised on higher pedestals. Often wooden or metal lids covered fonts to preserve the purity of the water. Groups that practice only believer's baptism prefer the term "baptistry," associating "font" with infant baptism.

FONTANA, DOMENICO (1543-1607). Italian architect. Born at Melide near the Swiss-Italian border, he worked in Rome before his appointment as chief architect by Sixtus V in 1585. During the latter's five-year pontificate, Fontana's many works included the Laleian Palace and the Quirinal, and a significant contribution to the completion of the dome of St. Peter's. Dismissed for alleged misconduct be Clement VIII (1592), he later built the royal palace at Naples, in which city he died.

FOOLS, FEAST OF, see FEAST OF FOOLS

FORBES, ALEXANDER PENROSE (1817-1875). Bishop of Brechin. Of Scottish aristocratic descent, he was educated at Glasgow University, then after three years with the East India Company in Madras, he returned to Britain and in 1844 graduated from Oxford. Ordained in the Church of England, he served a Leeds parish briefly before consecration in 1848 to the Scottish see of Brechin. Close friend of E.B. Pusey,* he advocated the doctrine of the Real Presence, a stand which brought censure from his episcopal colleagues. It was at Pusey's instigation also that he wrote An Explanation of the Thirty-Nine Articles (2 vols., 1867-68). His other works include Kalendars of Scottish Saints (1872) and an edition of Lives of St. Ninian, St. Kentigern, and St. Columba (1875). J.D. DOUGLAS

FORBES, JOHN (1593-1648). Most prominent of the Aberdeen Doctors.* After studying at continental universities he was appointed professor of divinity at King's College, Aberdeen, in 1620. A man of great integrity, he was a defender of episcopacy and a notable theologian. He was deposed in 1639 after disagreeing with the policies of the Covenanters,* and was evicted from the residence which, formerly his own, he had made over to the university. Worse was to follow. Being reluctant later to sign the Solemn League and Covenant,* he felt compelled in 1644 to leave the country for Holland, where he spent two years. Even after his return to Scotland the more extreme among the Presbyterians had not forgiven his opposition: it was Forbes's wish to be buried beside his wife and father in St. Machar's Cathedral, Aberdeen, but this was refused, and he rests in the kirkyard at Leochel. Among his works was Instructiones Historico-Theologicae de Doctrina Christiana (1645). J.D. DOUGLAS

FORGED DECRETALS, see FALSE DECRETALS

FORM-CRITICISM (Ger. Formgeschichte, "Form-history"). This is a method of literary study, applied both to secular and religious literature, which seeks to classify the forms which underlie written documents, and to reconstruct the process by which they reached their present shape. The pioneer in using this method for study of the Bible was Hermann Gunkel,* who first applied it to the narratives of Genesis. Among the more significant forms which were found to be present in the OT were "legend" and "myth." A "legend" was a story with a historical base which was recounted for an instructional or devotional purpose. A "myth" was a story to explain in pictorial form some supernatural truth. The presuppositions of some form-critics and the use of the words "myth" and "legend" (which were generally taken to indicate a lack of historical reliability) tended to give form-criticism of the OT a negative bias. But much useful work has been done, particularly in the classification of various kinds of poetic and prophetic literature.

The application of form-criticism to the NT, though dependent upon the work of Gunkel and that of J. Wellhausen* and E. Norden, was specifically made almost simultaneously between 1919 and 1921 by K.L. Schmidt, M. Dibelius,* and R. Bultmann.* The particular area of study was the synoptic gospels and, as source-criticism had suggested Mark to be the earliest of these, form-criticism, seeking to go a step further back, concentrated particularly on Mark. Schmidt sought to show that the paragraphs of Mark were units on their own, and that the gospel was "a heap of unstrung pearls." The main classifications involve those stories which are told principally for a saying of Jesus ("apophthegms," "paradigms," or "pronouncement stories") and those which are told principally for an action of His ("miracle stories" or Novellen).

Form-critics have tried to find the Sitz im Leben ("setting in life") of the various units, and so a great deal of study has been directed to the understanding of the everyday life of the early church, including its liturgical and evangelistic activity. There has been a tendency among many form-critics to suggest that the early church created the gospel material to serve its own needs and thus to find its original Sitz im Leben after the ministry of Jesus. But this is due, not to the method itself, but to philosophical presuppositions held about the nature of the gospel history. The method may equally well be used to suggest that incidents from the life of Christ were not created, but preserved by the church because of their usefulness, and thus provide a genuine double Sitz im Leben for the gospel material.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: V. Taylor, The Formation of the Gospel Tradition (1933); M. Dibelius, From Tradition to Gospel (ET 1934); C.F.D. Moule, The Birth of the New Testament (2nd ed., 1966); R. Bultmann, History of the Synoptic Tradition (ET 1968). R.E. NIXON

FORMOSUS (d.896). Pope from 891. Probably born in Rome, he became cardinal bishop of Porto in 864 and was entrusted with papal missions by Nicholas I and Hadrian II. Papal legate to Bulgaria (866-76) to promote the country's conversion, and emissary to France (869) and Trent (872, to deal with the question of Louis II's successor), Formosus was dismissed as prince of Boris in 876 for opposing the policies of John VIII after serving ten years. He lived at Sens until 882 when Pope Marinus restored him to the diocese. Elected pope, he asked the German king Arnulf to protect Italy against Guido, former duke of Spoleto, and named him emperor in 896. His pontificate witnessed strife over Photius of Constantinople, the suffragan of Bremen, and the successor to the French crown (he supported Charles the Simple). Beholden to the Spoletanian party, the new pope Stephen VI exhumed Formosus's body, conducted a posthumous trial, declared him deposed, and allowed his decomposed body to be thrown into the Tiber. JOHN GROH

FORMULA OF CONCORD, see CONCORD, FORMULA OF

FORSYTH, PETER TAYLOR (1848-1921). Congregationalist theologian. A postman's son in Aberdeen, he was educated at the university there, then studied at Göttingen under A. Ritschl.* After serving various Congregational churches in England, he became in 1901 principal of Hackney College, London, a post he retained until his death. Keenly interested in historical critical theology, and concerned to open the way to a "better, freer, larger Church," he took part in the Leicester Conference which had such aims in 1877, and was suspected in his denomination of heterodoxy.

Although he never went back to the earlier conservative scholastic theology, Forsyth gave increasing emphasis to the need for using the new theological critical freedom to live by and for the evangelical realities, not to supplant them. Writing with learning, passion, and an idiosyncratic style, he argued that man must not take God's central place in theology; that God's love, being holy, was necessarily wrathful against sin, which could not be explained away. He stressed that atonement was by the cross, in which God as well as man was reconciled at cost. In his greatest work, The Person and Place of Jesus Christ (1909), he made a creative contribution to Christology in suggesting that kenosis (self-emptying) and plerosis (fulfilling) are the two movements from God to man and from man to God which savingly occur in Christ.

In this later period he was increasingly respected as a Congregationalist leader. He developed a high doctrine of the church, ministry, and sacraments (including preaching), and was a sharp critic of the laymindedness, individualism, and tendency to nondoctrinal religion prevalent in the Free churches. He opposed the "New Theology" of R.J. Campbell. His churchmanship was not an imitation of Anglican or Roman Catholic forms, but a disciplined working out of Christian truth according to basic Congregationalist principles.

See G.O. Griffith, The Theology of P.T. Forsyth (1948); and R.M. Brown, P.T. Forsyth: Prophet for Today (1952). HADDON WILLMER

FORTY MARTYRS OF SEBASTE, see SEBASTE

FORTY-TWO ARTICLES ACT (1553). The accession of Edward VI to the throne in 1547 marked an important step in the development of the Reformation in England. Under the influence of Thomas Cranmer the young king began to exercise a direct influence on the church. As a result Cranmer drew up the Forty-Two Articles Act, which became the first truly Protestant confession of faith for the Church of England. Promulgated in 1553, they reflected the position of the Augsburg Confession in their statement of the doctrines of the Trinity and justification, but in their position on predestination and the Lord's Supper they were clearly Calvinistic. They were revised in 1562 by the Convocation of the Anglican clergy, and in 1563 they were promulgated by Elizabeth as the Thirty-Nine Articles Act.
C. GREGG SINGER

FOSDICK, HARRY EMERSON (1878-1969). American Baptist minister. He was a pastor in Montclair, New Jersey (1904-15) and taught practical theology (especially homiletics) at Union Theological Seminary (1908-46). From 1918 he served as guest minister at First Presbyterian Church, New York City, where he played a prominent role in the fundamentalist-modernist controversy when his 1922 sermon "Shall the Fundamentalists Win?" led to his 1925 resignation. Soon thereafter he became minister of the influential Riverside (then Park Avenue Baptist) Church, where he remained until retirement (1946). A popularizer of evangelical liberalism, biblical criticism, psychology of religion, and psychologically oriented "personal religion," Fosdick greatly influenced American preaching through his "problem-centered" homiletical style. Among his thirty widely read books were The Modern Use of the Bible (1924), A Guide to Understanding the Bible (1938), and devotional books The Manhood of the Master (1913), The Meaning of Prayer (1915), and On Being a Real Person (1943). His autobiography, The Living of These Days, was published in 1956. DONALD W. DAYTON

FOSSORS (Fossarians) (Lat. fodere, "to dig"). Gravediggers; officers of the early church charged with the burial of the dead. They were initially regarded as inferior clergy and in late fourth or early fifth centuries became powerful corporations, with the management of the catacombs in their hands. They had the power to sell grave-spaces, and numerous inscriptions recording such sales survive. Included in the corporations were the artists who adorned Christian tombs. After the fall of Rome (410), burial in the catacombs becoming impossible, inscriptions of the fossors virtually cease, but a later chronicle (possibly sixth century) includes them among the clergy. Other names for them were lecticarii (from lectica, "bier") and copiatae (from Gr. kopos, "labor"). J.G.G. NORMAN

FOSTER, GEORGE BURMAN (1858-1918). Baptist scholar. Born in West Virginia, he graduated from West Virginia University and Rochester Theological Seminary, he taught at McMaster University before becoming one of the early members of the "Chicago School of Theology," where he was named professor of systematic theology in 1897, and of the philosophy of religion in 1905. For his views on the relation between Christianity and such subjects as Darwinian evolution, comparative religion, and relativistic physics, he was "excommunicated" by fellow Baptists in the fundamentalist-modernist controversy of the early twentieth century. He even wrestled with the "death of God" as voiced in the thought of F.W. Nietzsche,* despite criticism from conservatives. CLYDE CURRY SMITH

FOUCAULD, CHARLES DE, see DE FOUCAULD

FOURSQUARE GOSPEL, see MCPHERSON, AIMEE SEMPLE

FOX, GEORGE (1624-1691). Founder of the Society of Friends. Born in Leicestershire and apprenticed to a shoemaker, he apparently had no formal schooling. In 1643 he parted from family and friends and traveled in search of enlightenment. After long, painful struggles he came in 1646 to rely on the "Inner Light of the Living Christ." He forsook church attendance, dismissed contemporary religious controversies as trivial, and in 1647 began to preach that truth is to be found in God's voice speaking to the soul—hence, "Friends of Truth," later abbreviated to "Friends." In 1649 he was jailed for interrupting a Nottingham church service with an impassioned appeal from the Scriptures to the Holy Spirit as the authority and guide. In 1650 at Derby he was imprisoned as a blasphemer, and there a judge nicknamed the group "Quakers," after Fox had exhorted the magistrates to "tremble at the word of the Lord."

The prospect of a new government more sympathetic to his views did not attract Fox, for he declined a captaincy in the parliamentary army. NW England he found specially responsive, and it was there at Swarthmore Hall, near Ulverston, that he established his headquarters. His irenic spirit was more highly developed than that of many of his associates, and his discipline of religious silence had a sobering influence. Fox spent six years in different prisons, sometimes under terrible conditions. He campaigned against the latter and against other social evils. His later years were spent in the London area, working to the end in helping others, promoting schools, and campaigning for greater toleration—and all this despite poor health caused by prision severities. His famous journal was published posthumously in 1694.

See also FRIENDS, SOCIETY OF.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: J. Smith (ed.), Descriptive Catalogue of Friends' Books (1867); T. Hodgkin, George Fox (1896); A.N. Brayshaw, The Personality of George Fox (3rd ed., 1933); H.J. Cadbury, George Fox's Book of Miracles (1948); editions of Fox's Journal by N. Penney (1911) and J.L. Nickalls (1952). J.D. DOUGLAS

FOXE, JOHN (1516-1587). Protestant historian and martyrologist. Born at Boston, Lincolnshire, he studied at Brasenose College, Oxford, and was fellow of Magdalen (1539-45). He became tutor to Thomas Lucy of Charlecote, and later to the earl of Surrey's children, when he met John Bale,* who stimulated his interest in history. He was ordained deacon by Nicholas Ridley in 1550.

On Mary's accession (1554) Foxe fled to the Continent, taking a manuscript designed to be the first part of a history of the movement for the reformation of the church, published eventually in Strasbourg with the title Commentarii Rerum in Ecclesia Gestarum.... By September 1555 he was at Frankfurt, where he met other refugees, including Edmund Grindal,* who was recording the stories of the martyrs. Foxe joined Bale at Basle, where he found employment at the printing establishment of Oporinus; he also turned Grindal's martyr stories into Latin. At Mary's death, Grindal and his associates hurried to England, but Foxe remained to complete his book, bringing his history up to date and making use of Grindal's materials. Oporinus published it in 1559.

Returning to England, Foxe was ordained priest by Grindal, now bishop of London. He joined forces with John Day, the printer, who published the first English edition of his book in 1563 as Actes and Monumentes (popularly known as Foxe's Book of Martyrs). Four editions appeared in his lifetime, profoundly influencing Elizabethan England. More recent editions have often been truncated, unrepresentative versions. Foxe spent the rest of his life in London with Day, and was buried in St. Giles', Cripplegate.

See J.F. Mozley, John Foxe and His Book (1940); and W. Haller, Foxe's Book of Martyrs and the Elect Nation (1967). J.G.G. NORMAN

FRA ANGELICO, see ANGELICO, FRA

FRANCE. The Christian faith made its appearance in Gaul at an early date, probably in the first century. Missionaries and merchants from the East brought the Gospel to Marseille from which town it spread up the Rhone River valley to Vienne and Lyons. The greatest impact was made initially in the cities, among the Roman and Greek populations. Progress was much slower in rural areas among the native Celts. Martyrdom became the lot of many Christians in Gaul in the second and third centuries. Under the vigorous leadership of Irenaeus* and others, however, the faith spread northward, reaching Paris in 250. By the time religious toleration was granted throughout the Roman Empire in the early fourth century, Christianity was established in the cities of Gaul, but had only begun to penetrate the countryside.

When the Germans overran the empire beginning in the fifth century, the Christians of Gaul were faced with the task of converting and civilizing them. Since the church was the strongest surviving institution in the West, the invaders sensed its importance. A turning point in the history of French Christianity came in 496 when Clovis,* king of the Franks, was baptized. Genuine or not, his conversion made the task of the further evangelization of his people much easier for Christian missionaries.

During the early centuries, Gallic Christianity produced a number of illustrious saints such as Martin of Tours,* Hilary of Poitiers,* the talented scholar-poet Paulinus of Bordeaux (d.431), Germanus of Auxerre (d.448), and Genevieve.* The work of Gregory of Tours* also adds luster to the history of Christianity in Gaul in this period.

By about 500, Frankish Gaul had been divided into dioceses. Although the history of the Christian faith in this period is obscure, one important service which the Franks rendered to the Western Church was their firm stand against the Muslim invasion from the south which in the eighth century threatened all of Christendom. Charles Martel* stemmed the tide of Muslim advance with his victory over them near Tours in 732.

It was, however, the grandson of Charles Martel, Charlemagne,* who proved the major benefactor of the Christian Church in Frankland in the early Middle Ages, doing all he could to further it, even using force to convert the heathen when necessary. But by 843 his former empire was divided into three parts, and this date marks the beginning of the modern kingdom of France. After a protracted power struggle, the Capetians, with the support of the French clergy, were enthroned to replace the ineffectual Carolingians as the kings of France.

The history of Christianity in medieval France was marked by great vitality and achievement in the realms of piety, reform, learning, and politics.

No other kingdom of Europe surpassed the French in medieval times in their leadership and enthusiasm for piety and reform. The Capetians supported the French Church and, in turn, the church greatly influenced the affairs of state to an extent that it has never attained either before or since. One of the most devout of all Christian kings in history was Louis IX,* and under his reign the alliance of church and state in France reached its highest point of development.

Medieval France was also the home of the Cluny reform movement (see CLUNIACS), which began in 910 and was to contribute a host of reformers to the church, including several popes. Bernard of Clairvaux* was another whose influence extended to every part of the Christian world. It was he who preached the Second Crusade so effectively that he himself later noted it had reduced the ratio of women to men in France to seven to one. Significantly, the First Crusade had been preached and organized at Clermont in 1095. The history of the Crusades, indeed, was so inexorably linked with French leadership that in the Holy Land the Crusaders as a whole were known simply as "Franks," and the Christians of those lands until very recently looked to France as their protector.

In addition, medieval France was the home of many popular medieval heresies. A majority of the people of S France may have been "heretics" during the twelfth and thirteenth centuries. The major heretical groups were the Albigensians* and Waldensians (see WALDENSES). The former outnumbered the latter, but their exact beliefs were not known because both they and their records were destroyed with ruthless thoroughness. The Waldensians survived and flourish today in Italy and other parts of the world. Both groups represented vigorous protest movements against the lax Christianity which they felt existed in their day.

Christian piety in medieval France expressed itself also in the building of magnificent Gothic cathedrals in the later Middle Ages. Illustrative of this great outburst of church construction in the period was the celebrated Notre Dame cathedral of Paris which was begun in 1163. Medieval Paris, moreover, was the home of the first and greatest of the universities of N Europe. Sponsored and protected by the church, the University of Paris was chartered in 1200. Even before the official founding of the university, Paris had been the site of a celebrated cathedral school. Many of the most famous teachers of the day were either French or taught in the French schools: Anselm,* Peter Abelard,* and Thomas Aquinas.*

Finally, the church in France in the Middle Ages played a major role in the development of both French and papal politics. The part of Joan of Arc* in restoring the credibility of the French monarchy, the challenge of Philip IV* to the papacy, and the subsequent removal of the latter to Avignon* for two generations all testify to this fact. But perhaps the most important of all was the development of what later would be called the "Gallican Church" (see GALLICAN ARTICLES; GALLICANISM).

The history of French Christianity in the modern period begins with the Renaissance,* the Reformation,* and the monumental figure of John Calvin.* Christian humanism and sympathy for reform permeated France in the early sixteenth century. For reasons not yet fully understood, however, Protestantism never captured the allegiance of the majority of Frenchmen. Calvinism came close. At one time as many as one-tenth of the population had embraced the Calvinist doctrines, with perhaps as many as twice that number in sympathy with their cause. Popularly known as Huguenots,* political complications deflected their original aims, plunging the country into a long and bitter period of civil war. In the end the Calvinists lost, but managed to salvage a certain amount of toleration when their political leader, Henry of Navarre, converted to Roman Catholicism in order to receive the crown as Henry IV.* His Edict of Nantes* in 1598 gave Huguenots a measure of religious freedom for more than two generations. The scars of the civil wars, however, lingered for a long time, and the Protestant churches of France have never recovered fully from their impact.

The Catholic Reformation was successful in seventeenth-century France, producing an era of Catholic piety and a battery of saints: Francis of Sales,* Vincent de Paul,* Quietism,* Jansenism,* and the expulsion of many Huguenots with the revocation of the Nantes edict in 1685.

The eighteenth century brought a dramatic reaction to the growing power of the church in the life of the nation. Voltaire,* Diderot,* and other men of the Enlightenment* flourished where once the seventeenth-century French saints had walked. Hostility to organized religion, Deism, naturalism, and materialism spread along with other ideas spawned by the Enlightenment. These religious trends culminated with the French Revolution of 1789. When the Revolution triumphed, it tried to abolish the church in France as well as the dynasty. From 1793 vigorous attempts were made to remove all traces of the Christian past from France: Notre Dame cathedral became the Temple of Reason, and Fanny Aubry danced there, "natural religion" was encouraged by the state, and the Roman Catholic Church was outlawed. The church persisted, however, and regained its freedom and some of its former privileges under Napoleon I (d.1821). The French emperor and the pope reached an understanding in the Concordat of 1801.*

Nevertheless, the reverberations of the bitter struggle between the revolution and the church echoed throughout the century. Anticlericalism* became widespread, and the Catholic Church in France found itself constantly on the defensive. A phenomenon known as "Catholic atheism" made its appearance among those who remained within the church, but who had lost their faith. Leo XIII* tried to accommodate Catholicism to the increasingly liberal and secular mood of the nation, without much success. The anticlericalism of the period climaxed with the anti-Roman Catholic legislation of the early twentieth century, including the law of 1905 which decreed complete separation of church and state.

France today is deeply secular, but no longer as hostile to Christianity as it was previously. Roman Catholic Christianity continues to flourish among the peasantry, the Reformed Church (Calvinist) still claims more than a million adherents, and various other non-Roman Catholic groups have grown recently despite certain disabilities still attached to religious nonconformists. Further, many nonpracticing Catholics maintain their ties with the church despite their anticlericalism.

Modern French Christianity is virile enough to produce such first-rate thinkers as Teilhard de Chardin* and Jacques Ellul (b.1912), and the worker-priest movement. It is still powerful enough to help mold international politics, as when great progress was made in Franco-German relations after Chancellor Konrad Adenauer and President Charles de Gaulle attended Mass together.

Thus, despite the curious paradox of a France divided into various shades of belief and unbelief, into practicing and nonpracticing Catholics, into a growing interest in Christianity on one hand and a widespread and historical hostility toward organized religion on the other, the Christian faith remains an important ingredient in French civilization. As it has been central to French history in the past, so it continues to be a significant force even in the secular twentieth century.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: There is no satisfactory general history of Christianity in France available in either French or English. Treatment of various periods can be found in the following generally reliable works: C.S. Phillips, The Church in France, 1848-1907 (1907) and The Church in France, 1789-1848 (1929); T.S. Holmes, The Origin and Development of the Christian Church in Caul During the First Six Centuries of the Christian Era (1911); H. Bremond, Histoire littéraire du sentiment religieux en France (8 vols., 1916-33); F.V.A. Aulard, Christianity and the French Revolution (1927); R.R. Palmer, Catholics and Unbelievers in Eighteenth Century France (1939); E. Amann and A. Dumas, L'Église au pouvoir des laïques (1948); S.W. Herman, Report from Christian Europe (1953); J.W. Thompson, The Wars of Religion in France (1956); G.R. Cragg, The Church in the Age of Reason, 1648-1789 (1960); A.R. Vidler, The Church in an Age of Revolution, 1789 to the Present (1961); G. Mollat, The Popes at Avignon (1963).

ROBERT D. LINDER

FRANCIS BORGIA, see BORGIA, FRANCIS

FRANCISCANS. An order founded by Francis of Assisi* in 1209, when he gave his followers a simple rule advocating a life of apostolic poverty, preaching, and penance. The order was officially recognized when Francis and eleven others went to Rome in 1209 where Innocent III gave his oral approval and the brothers became known as the Order of Friars Minor. At first the primitive rule and the life of Francis provided enough cohesiveness for the order, but as the numbers increased with astonishing rapidity problems of administration became apparent. In 1221 Francis composed a second rule which reflected more the needs of a larger community, but was still not workable. In 1223 the third rule written by Francis and Cesarius of Speyer was confirmed by a papal bull of Honorius III and became known as Regula bullata. This rule maintained some of the spirit of the early rule but was more concerned with the official character of the order and its organization in accordance with church hierarchy. Francis expressed his regret for the loss of the freedom of the early rule in his Testament, which he wrote in 1226 reaffirming the need for a life of apostolic poverty and the imitation of Christ.

The conflict within the order which lasted for almost four centuries arose between those who wished to adhere strictly to the admonitions of the saint and those who felt modification was necessary in the practical administration of a large organization. Elias of Cortona* was instrumental in expanding the order, but was disliked for his worldliness and overbearing methods. During these formative years two schools of thought arose: the zelanti, or Spirituals, wished to follow the rule and Testament to the letter, while the Conventuals advocated moderation. Eventually John XXII decided in favor of the less strict interpretation in 1317-18, causing many Spirituals to rebel and form the schismatic Fraticelli.*

As the Franciscans grew in material wealth, laxity increased and a general decline ensued in the fourteenth century, aided by the Black Death* and the Great Schism.* Reform movements were in force, however, and a group of friars known as the Observants, who wished to live austere lives, were granted ecclesiastical recognition in 1415 and became a separate order in 1517. The Capuchins* also adhered to a doctrine of absolute poverty, adding an eremitical element. Altercations and divisions within the branches continued throughout the next three centuries, and culminated in the decree of Leo XIII which united all the different factions under a uniform constitution in 1897. Today the Franciscans consist of three orders: the Conventuals, the Observants, and the Capuchins.

The Franciscans have contributed much to the development of the Roman Catholic Church. Five of their members have been pope (Nicholas IV, Sixtus IV, Julius II, Sixtus V, Clement XIV). Franciscan scholarship has had great significance (Bonaventure, Duns Scotus, William of Ockham, and numerous educational institutions). The missionary and social work carried out has been outstanding.

See also POOR CLARES and TERTIARY.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: A.G. Little, A Guide to Franciscan Studies (1920); E. Hutton, The Franciscans in England 1224-1538 (1926); R.M. Huber, A Documented History of the Franciscan Order (1944); H. Holzapfel, History of the Franciscan Order (tr. A. Tibesar; 1948); I.C. Brady (ed. and tr.), The Marrow of the Gospel: A Study of the Rule of St. Francis of Assisi (1958).

ROBERT G. CLOUSE

FRANCIS OF ASSISI (1182-1226). Founder of the Franciscan Order. Son of Pietro de Bernar-done, a wealthy textile merchant, he was christened Giovanni, but supposedly nicknamed Francesco by his father upon returning from a trip to France. He received the usual education for his time and enjoyed a carefree life as a popular youth of Assisi. While taking part in a feud with the nearby city of Perugia he was imprisoned for a year in 1202. He joined the army upon his release, but could not complete a campaign against Apulia because of illness.

Francis's thoughts gradually began to turn to serious reflections, and in 1205 he made a pilgrimage to Rome, after which he had a vision wherein God told him to rebuild the church of St. Damian near Assisi. Selling his horse together with some of his father's cloth goods, he gave the proceeds to the priest for that purpose. His father disowned him, and Francis renounced his worldly possessions, taking up begging to provide for the reconstruction of more churches. In 1209 a sermon on Matthew 10:7-10 impressed him as being a personal admonition to take up a life of apostolic poverty, and he began preaching brotherly love and repentance. Attracting a number of followers, he composed a short rule in 1209 and succeeded in gaining the approval of Innocent III in 1212. Since Innocent required that the brothers receive minor orders, they called themselves the Friars Minor.

Embarking on a course of preaching and caring for the sick and the poor, the Friars came together each year at Pentecost for a meeting at Portiuncula in Assisi. In 1212 the Second Order was founded when an heiress of Assisi, Clare, was invested by Francis and formed the order for women, the Poor Clares.* Francis began missions to Syria (1212) and Morocco (1213-14), but was unable to complete them due either to illness or other misfortune, and traveled to the Middle East in 1219 in an unsuccessful attempt to convert the sultan Kameel. Since the order was growing out of the bounds of the early simple rule, Francis requested Pope Honorius to name Cardinal Ugolino as protector of the order. A new rule was approved by Honorius in 1223, and the character of the order began to move away from the simple ideal of Francis, especially when an ambitious, politically minded brother, Elias of Cortona,* was appointed vicar-general in 1221.

After his abdication of leadership in 1223, Francis spent the remaining years of his life in solitude and prayer, retiring to a hermitage on Monte Alverno in 1224. During this period he composed his "Canticle to the Sun," his Admonitions, and his Testament. In 1224 he allegedly received the stigmata. He was canonized by Gregory IX two years after his death. Revered by Protestants and Catholics alike, the ideal of St. Francis is still a vibrant force on the current religious scene, as the professions of the "Jesus freaks" and recent biographies of him indicate.

BIBLIOGRAPHY; P. Sabatier, Life of St. Francis of Assisi (1917); O. Englebert, St. Francis of Assisi (1966); L. Cunningham (ed.), An Anthology of Writings by and About St. Francis of Assisi (1973); J.H. Smith, Francis of Assisi (1973); M. Habig (ed.), St. Francis of Assisi, Writings and Early Biographies (1973). ROBERT G. CLOUSE

FRANCIS OF PAOLA (1416-1507). Founder of the Minims* Order. After a year at the Franciscan friary of San Marco, a pilgrimage to Rome and Assisi, and living as a hermit at Paola, he started the mendicant order in 1435; a church and house were built for them in 1453, and further foundations came later. Sixtus IV urged him to leave Italy for France, the court of Valois, where he ministered to Louis XI and became tutor to his son Charles VIII. He helped restore peace between France and Brittany by advising the marriage of the Dauphin and Anne of Brittany, and between France and Spain by urging Louis to return the counties of Rousillon and Cerdagne. Many miracles were attributed to Francis; he was declared patron of seafarers by Pius XII (1943); was honored in Latin countries by the devotion of the "Thirteen Fridays"; was a subject for paintings by Murillo, Velasquez, and Goya. He was canonized in 1519. His letters have been preserved.

C.G. THORNE, JR.

FRANCIS OF SALES (1567-1622). Counter-Reformation leader. Born in Savoy of aristocratic family, he read law at Paris and Padua, but soon abandoned legal studies for theology, and became priest in 1593. As missioner among the Calvinists of the Chablais (an arduous and dangerous project), he is credited with 8,000 conversions in two years. In 1599 he was appointed bishop-coadjutor of Geneva, succeeding to the see three years later. With Jane Frances de Chantal* he founded the Visitation Order in 1610. Francis achieved considerable success in his campaign to win the erring Swiss back to the Roman fold. An indefatigable worker, he organized clergy conferences and there insisted on simple teaching and preaching. "Love alone," he declared, "will shake the walls of Geneva." He established a seminary at Annecy, near his birthplace. Among his writings is the classic Introduction to the Devout Life (1608). Canonized in the mid-seventeenth century and declared a Doctor of the Church in the nineteenth, Francis was made patron saint of Roman Catholic journalists in 1923.

J.D. DOUGLAS

FRANCIS XAVIER (1506-1552). Jesuit missionary to the East Indies and Japan. Son of an aristocratic Spanish-Basque family, he was born at the castle of Xavier in Navarre. He studied law and theology at the University of Paris, where he met and befriended Pierre Favre and Ignatius Loyola.* Together with five others, Favre and Xavier became Loyola's associates in the founding of the Society of Jesus in 1534. The society vowed to follow Jesus in poverty and chastity, and to evangelize the heathen. It was in the latter activity that Xavier excelled and earned fame as an outstanding missionary pioneer and organizer.

He was ordained in Venice in 1537, and in 1539, at the request of John III of Portugal, he was appointed papal legate and sent to evangelize the East Indies. He arrived in Goa in 1542 and spent three years preaching to and serving the sick. He was very successful in evangelizing the pearl fishermen of SW India, who were baptized in thousands. He extended his missionary activity to Japan, where he arrived in 1549, accompanied by Hachiro whom he met at Malacca and converted. He studied the Japanese language and within two years established a flourishing Christian community of 2,000 but he was driven out by Buddhist monks while his community endured great persecutions. He paid a short visit to China, but returned to Goa in 1552 and worked at the Goa college. During the same year he left for China, was refused entry, and died on the island of Sancian. His body was brought back to Goa and lies enshrined in the Church of Jesus the Good.

The success of Xavier's evangelization has not exempted his methods from criticism. He has often been accused of lack of understanding of oriental religions—a situation which he did little to remedy. His use also of the Inquisition has detracted from the glory of numerous conversions. He seems also to have made use of the government of Goa in proselytizing. Nevertheless, his outstanding missionary work aroused much interest in overseas missions in Europe. More than 700,000 conversions have been attributed to him by the Jesuits; Pius X conferred upon him the name "Patron of Foreign Missions." He was canonized in 1622.

See J. Brodrick, St. Francis Xavier, 1506-1552 (1952). S. TOON

FRANCK, SEBASTIAN (1499-1542). Humanist and Spiritual Anabaptist. Born at Donauwörth, he studied at Ingolstadt and Heidelberg, was ordained priest (1524), became a Lutheran (1525), and married Ottilie Behaim (1528), whose brothers had Anabaptist leanings. He mildly opposed Johannes Denck, translating into German a Latin work directed against him, but subsequently left the Lutheran ministry and moved to Strasbourg (1529), where he began his friendship with Caspar Schwenkfeld. He now advocated complete freedom of thought and undogmatic Christianity, views which were expressed in his most important book, Chronica, Zeitbuch und Geschichtsbibel (1531). He also wrote A Letter to John Campanus, expressing his spiritual conception of the church, which marked him off from normative evangelical Anabaptism. Expelled from Strasbourg for his views, he eventually settled in Basle as a printer in 1539. J.G.G. NORMAN

FRANCKE, AUGUST HERMANN (1663-1727). German Lutheran minister, professor and early advocate of Pietism. Born in Lubeck, he studied at Erfurt and Kiel and became professor of Hebrew at Leipzig in 1684. Converted in 1687, he began to conduct Bible classes at Leipzig which led to a revival among both students and townspeople. When the theological faculty objected to his religious endeavors, he left and eventually became a minister at Glaucha and professor of oriental languages at the nearby University of Halle (1692). By 1698 he was professor of theology and in this post made important contributions in the scientific study of philology. He was concerned also for poor children, founding an orphanage, common school, teacher training school, and high school. In the course of time he added a drugstore, bookstore, bindery, and other industries, to train his wards and to help finance his work. He helped make Halle a center of piety and missionary enthusiasm. ROBERT G. CLOUSE

FRANK, FRANZ HERMANN REINHOLD VON (1827-1894). German Lutheran theologian. A professor at Erlangen from 1857, he was the systematizer of the Erlangen School. In his basic work System der christlichen Gewissheit (1870-73) he proceeds from the experience of rebirth as a certainty in self-consciousness. There are certain necessary objects of belief in this experience, namely, the immanent (sin, righteousness, certainty of perfection), transcendent (church, means of grace, revelation, inspiration). By working from the subject to the necessary reality, the Christian's experience is validated. In System der christlicher Wahrheit (1878-80), Frank moves from the ultimate principles of the spiritual world to the subject. In both his approach was apologetic, i.e., to make the certainty of faith secure in face of modern doubt. RICHARD V. PIERARD

FRANK, JACOB (1726-1791). Founder of the sect called "Frankists." Born Jankiev Lebowicz, son of a rabbi in Poland, he early came under the influence of the Sabbatarians (the Shabbetai-Tzevi) and later also, when visiting Turkey, of the Jewish Donmeh sect. He declared himself to be an embodiment of the Messiah and adopted a doctrine of the Holy Trinity in which he was the holy king. Returning to his homeland, he was attacked by the Talmudists and eventually he and his followers became Catholics, professing conversion to Christianity. After Frank allowed himself to be worshiped as the Messiah, however, he was imprisoned and released only when the Russians partitioned Poland in 1773. He then resided in Vienna and other places before his death in Offenbach. His daughter Eve continued to lead his followers. PETER TOON

FRANKFURT, COUNCILS OF. Frankfurt was the scene of a number of councils during Carolingian times. The most famous of them was held in 794 to condemn the Spanish Adoptianist heresy. The two foremost Adoptianists were Felix,* bishop of Urgel, and Elipandus,* archbishop of Toledo. Felix was ultimately imprisoned until his death, while Elipandus remained free but stubbornly recalcitrant. The council in 794 issued fifty-five other canons. One repudiated the Second Council (787) of Nicea's decree on icon worship, and the others dealt with a variety of matters, including metropolitan jurisdiction and monastic discipline.

FRANKLIN, BENJAMIN (1706-1790). Inventor, author, and diplomat. Born in Boston, he left school at the age of ten to help with his father's candle and soap business. Two years later he was apprenticed to a printer, his half-brother. He achieved great success in several fields—as publisher, author, businessman, philanthropist, moralist, inventor, scientist, civil servant, and statesman. He influenced American religious thought and popular morality through his writings, especially through the widely read Poor Richard's Al- manac (1732-57) which extolled the virtues of hard work, thrift, moderation, and common sense in a humorously homespun way.

Though he contributed money to many religious institutions and valued the churches insofar as they promoted individual and social morality, he personally rejected the distinctive doctrines of orthodox Christianity in favor of an optimistic and undogmatic natural religion. He was a Deist who believed that nature rather than Scripture is the place where human reason recognizes God. He admired Jesus and His teachings, but doubted His divinity, and believed the essence of religion is to do good to men. He advocated separation of church and state and helped write the Declaration of Independence, which he also signed, and the U.S. Constitution. He helped to found the University of Pennsylvania, the first circulating library in America, and the American postal system.

HARRY SKILTON

FRANSON, FREDRIK (1852-1908). Evangelist and founder of The Evangelical Alliance Mission. Born in Sweden, he migrated in 1869. He was influenced by Moody to become an evangelist to Swedish immigrants in north-central and western United States. He was ordained in 1881 and engaged in successful evangelism in Scandinavia and Germany from 1881 to 1890. In the latter year he led in the founding of the Scandinavian Alliance Mission, known as The Evangelical Alliance Mission since 1949, and was its general director from 1896 to 1908. In his evangelism on every continent he stressed Christ's second coming.

FRANZELIN, JOHANNES BAPTIST (1816-1886). Roman Catholic scholar. Born at Aldein, Tyrol, he received his early training in the Franciscan college in Bolzano and entered the Jesuit novitiate at Graz in 1834, teaching for six years in Austrian Poland. He studied theology at Rome and Louvain, was ordained in 1849, and was prefect of studies and confessor at the German College, Rome. He lectured in oriental languages, then held the chair in dogmatic theology (1857) in the Gregorian University. Papal theologian at Vatican I and prefect of the Sacred Congregation of Rites, he was made cardinal (1876). He wrote a number of theological works and, in addition, his Examen doctrinae Macarii Bulgakov (1876) arose from his participation with Greek Orthodox and Protestants on the work of the Holy Spirit.

C.G. THORNE, JR.

FRATICELLI. A group within the Franciscan Order during the Middle Ages which insisted on a very strict observance of the rule of poverty and vigorously opposed the decrees of John XXII which held that Christ and His apostles owned property. They were quite active in Italy and S France. Wherever they appeared they were hunted down by the Inquisition and were regarded as heretical.

FREDERICK I (Barbarossa) (c.1122-1190). German king and Roman emperor. Nephew of the weak Conrad III, he was elected king in 1152. Although a Hohenstaufen, his mother was a Guelph, and it was hoped he could mediate between the two parties. Frederick's endeavor to restore the rights of the German monarchy and expand his territorial control while reviving the imperial authority made him a controversial historical personage. He conciliated the Guelphs by recognizing Duke Henry the Lion's position in Saxony and granting him the duchy of Bavaria. Frederick issued a proclamation of peace (Landfriede) in Germany (1152) and built up an efficient royal government based upon the non-noble ministeriales. He gained control over the German church, utilized feudal obligations to strengthen the monarchy, and enlarged his own family domains.

The wealth of the Italian cities and the political disorder there tempted the ambitious Frederick, who decided to embark upon restoring the empire. He invaded Italy in 1154-55, repressed the Lombard communes, allied with Pope Adrian IV to oust Arnold of Brescia, and was crowned emperor. The uneasy alliance collapsed at the Diet of Besançon (1157) when Frederick firmly rejected the concept of papal feudal overlordship. Imperial documents began referring to the Holy Empire (sacrum imperium), an indication that secular authority was divinely sanctioned, not bestowed by papal coronation.

In four subsequent Italian campaigns Frederick had only limited success. Pope Alexander III (1159-81) turned against the emperor, who then supported an antipope, and the schism lasted until Frederick's defeat at Legnano in 1176 by the Lombard League and reconciliation with Alexander. After the Peace of Constance in 1183 (the communes recognized the emperor's suzerainty but were granted self-government), Frederick arranged a marriage alliance with the kingdom of Sicily, thus depriving the papacy of secular allies in Italy. In 1180 he exploited the legal technicalities of feudal practice and the hostility of Henry the Lion's many enemies to eliminate the Saxon rival and diminish Guelph power in Germany. At the pinnacle of success he died while taking part in the Third Crusade.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: J.W. Thompson, Feudal Germany (1928); G. Barraclough, The Origins of Modern Germany (1947); Otto of Freising, The Deeds of Frederick Barbarossa (ET 1953).

RICHARD V. PIERARD

FREDERICK II (1194-1250). King of Germany and Sicily, and Roman emperor. The Sicilian-born grandson of Frederick Barbarossa,* his father had him elected German king in 1196. When, however, Henry VI died the next year, the princes refused to accept the youthful Hohenstaufen heir. The ensuing struggles in Germany and Italy, abetted by French and English pressures and Innocent III's endeavors to restore papal power, resulted in a decline of imperial authority. In 1212 Frederick was again named king through the contrivance of Innocent and Philip Augustus. The French victory at Bouvines (1214), followed by the deposition of the Guelph emperor Otto IV (1215) and Frederick's own imperial coronation (1220), placed him in a dominant position.

In the next three decades he was involved in a continuous struggle with the papacy. His primary interest lay in Italy, and Germany (under the regency of his sons) occupied a clearly subordinate role. In 1213 he relinquished authority over German church personnel and recognized those rights acquired by the nobles since 1197, while his privilege of 1220 eliminated all royal power over the internal administration of ecclesiastical principalities. In 1231 these concessions were extended to all secular princes and included control over local courts and coinage. This signified the victory of princely particularism over the monarchical ideal in Germany. In Sicily, Frederick had by 1224 restored the power of the Norman monarchy, and after a crusading interlude in 1228-30 sought to extend his absolutistic rule to northern and then central Italy, actions which incurred papal opposition. In 1245 Innocent IV excommunicated and preached a crusade against Frederick which had little effect. The execution of Frederick's grandson Conradin in 1268 ended the Hohenstaufen dynasty.

Frederick was a patron and student of mathematics, astronomy, medicine, zoology, and poetry. His court at Palermo, noted for its oriental splendor, was the leading cultural center of southern Europe. A skeptic in religion, he was tolerant of Jews and Muslims. In his dealings with Christian and Muslim leaders alike, he proved to be a brilliant diplomat, administrator, and general. Frederick's achievements and interests were so many that some called him the "wonder of the world."

BIBLIOGRAPHY: E. Kantotowicz, Frederick II (1931); G. Barraclough, The Origins of Modern Germany (1947); D.P. Waley, The Papal States in the Thirteenth Century (1961).

RICHARD V. PIERARD

FREDERICK III (the Wise) (1463-1525). Elector of Saxony. Born in Torgau, the eldest son of the elector Ernst and Elizabeth (daughter of Albert, duke of Bavaria), he was later called "the Wise" because of his reputation for fair play and justice. He succeeded his father as elector in 1486. Before this his education had been influenced by Renaissance ideals. His court at Wittenberg was a center of artistic and musical activity: Albrecht Dürer and Lucas Cranach were patronized. Nevertheless, he was a devout Catholic, interested in the cult of relics: the catalog produced by Cranach in 1509 revealed that he had 5,005 particles.

Always insisting on the need for constitutional reform in the empire, Frederick became president of the newly formed council of regency (Reichsregiment) in 1500, but later (1519) refused to stand as a candidate in the imperial election. In 1502 he founded the University of Wittenberg. To it in 1511 came Martin Luther and in 1518 Philip Melanchthon. When Luther was required by the pope to go to Rome in 1518, Frederick intervened and had the trial transferred to Augsburg on German soil. Two years later the elector refused to execute the bull Exsurge Domine against Luther. After the Diet of Worms (1521) had imposed the imperial ban, he provided a refuge for Luther at Wartburg. There is no firm evidence that he totally accepted the Lutheran faith, but just before his death at Annaberg he received Communion in both kinds from George Spalatin,* who had acted on so many occasions as an intermediary between the elector and Luther. The latter preached at Frederick's funeral, and Melanchthon gave an oration in which he highly commended the elector's work in promoting the Gospel.

PETER TOON

FREDERICK III (the Pious) of the Palatinate (1515-1576). Eldest son of Duke John II of Palatinate Simmern, he received his princely education and various administrative experiences before succeeding his father in 1557. In 1537 he married Mary, daughter of Margrave Casimir of Brandenburg, who had been reared a Lutheran. Eleven years later he announced his conversion to the Evangelical cause. He opposed the Augsburg Interim (1548). In 1559 he became heir to the electorate of the Palatinate. Here not only Lutheranism but also Calvinism had found a strong foothold, and under the leadership of the Lutheran Tileman Hesshusius a controversy raged about the correct doctrine of the Lord's Supper. Frederick and his wife plunged into a thorough theological study of the question and in 1541 came to the conclusion that Article X of the Augsburg Confession* was popish. With the help of various divines Frederick supported Calvinism in Heidelberg and commissioned Ursinus and Olevianus to write the "Heidelberg Catechism"* (1563). His support of Calvinism brought opposition from Frederick of Saxony and others. A request from the princes at Augsburg in 1566 that he abide by the Peace of Augsburg (which recognized only Lutheranism or Roman Catholicism) did not turn him from his convictions. In 1570 the presbyterian form of church government was introduced in the Palatinate. Frederick aided the French Huguenots and the Dutch Calvinists. His son, Louis VI (elector, 1576-83), returned to Lutheranism.

CARL S. MEYER

FREDERICK IV (1671-1730). King of Denmark and Norway. From his accession in 1699 he was continually at war, but he did introduce reforms in the treatment of peasants, the administration of justice and public finances, military organization, and commercial relations. While crown prince, he was greatly influenced by Pietism and decided to emulate Roman Catholic rulers by caring for the spiritual welfare of his subjects in the South Indian dependency of Tranquebar. Finding no suitable candidate in Denmark, he secured Bartholomaeus Ziegenbalg* and Heinrich Plütschau* Over the objections of several Danish theologians Frederick obtained their ordination as missionaries in November 1705, and they immediately sailed for India. In 1718 he approved the mission of Hans Egede* to Danish-owned Greenland.

RICHARD V. PIERARD

FREE CHURCH OF ENGLAND (otherwise called the Reformed Episcopal Church). A Reformed and Protestant church established in 1844 as a reaction to the doctrines and development of the Oxford Movement* in the Church of England. Its constitution was formally registered in 1863. It is pledged to the Thirty-Nine Articles, and its Prayer Book is, for all practical purposes, the 1689 revision of the 1662 Book of Common Prayer—a revision acceptable at the time to the Puritans, but not adopted in the Anglican Church. The Free Church of England recognizes and adheres to episcopacy "not as of Divine right, but as a very ancient and desirable form of Church polity," but its ministry is presbyterian. A similar organization called the Reformed Episcopal Church was formed in the USA in 1873 and in England from 1877. The two English bodies maintained close relations and were finally united in 1927. There are two dioceses, north and south, each with its own bishop. The existence of a vigorous evangelical wing in the Church of England has militated against the development of the Free Church of England, but it has persisted in the face of many difficulties. In 1971 there were thirty-three congregations and thirty-nine clergy.

HOWARD SAINSBURY

FREE CHURCH OF SCOTLAND. Popularly known as the "Wee Free" Church, it represents the minority of the former Free Church of Scotland who in 1900 refused to enter the union with the United Presbyterian Church to form the United Free Church of Scotland. The United Presbyterian Church when constituted in 1847 had accepted the principle of voluntaryism* and the minority felt that union with it would compromise the Free Church belief in the national recognition of the Christian religion. The original Free Church was constituted in 1843 after the Disruption* when about one-third of the ministers and members seceded from the Church of Scotland rather than submit to what they regarded as state control of the church. But their leader, Thomas Chalmers,* declared: "We quit a vitiated establishment and would rejoice in returning to a pure one."

After the majority of this Free Church entered the union of 1900, the dissenting minority laid claim in the civil courts to the entire property of the Free Church on the grounds that they alone were true to the Disruption principle of a free established church. After losing in the Scottish courts they appealed to the House of Lords, which decided in their favor in 1904. This judgment caused a sensation, and a parliamentary commission was appointed to distribute the property in accordance with the relative strengths of the two parties. The present Free Church, though not established, holds to the principle of establishment. Conservative in theology, it affirms its loyalty to the whole of the Westminster Confession of Faith.* Strongly Sabbatarian, it has no instrumental music and uses only the metrical psalms in congregational praise. It is strongest in N and NW Scotland, with a total of just under 6,000 members and more than 17,000 adherents.

HENRY R. SEFTON

FREE METHODISTS, see METHODIST CHURCHES, AMERICAN

FREE PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH OF SCOTLAND. This originated in a group in the Free Church of Scotland which objected to the Declaratory Act of 1892. The act stated that the Free Church disclaimed intolerant or persecuting principles and did not consider her office-bearers, in signing the Westminster Confession of Faith, committed to any principles inconsistent with liberty of conscience and the right of private judgment. This Scottish secession is unique in that it turned primarily on a doctrinal issue and not on relationships between church and state. The post-1900 Free Church repealed the Declaratory Act, but in such a way that the Free Presbyterians have felt constrained to continue a separate witness, although the two churches are similar in most other respects. Their numerical strength is officially estimated at 10,000 members and adherents.

HENRY R. SEFTON

FREEMAN, THOMAS BIRCH (1809-1890). First Wesleyan Methodist missionary in Ghana to survive for more than a short period. Born near Winchester, son of a West Indian father and an English mother, he worked as a gardener and botanist, offering for overseas service in 1837. He arrived at Cape Coast at the beginning of the following year and started work single-handed after the death of all his predecessors. His interests extended to architecture, botany, agriculture, and education, but his dominant concern was the geographical expansion of Christianity. He visited Kumasi, capital of Ashanti, in 1839, and Badagry and Abeokuta, now in Nigeria, in 1841-42, calling at Abomey, the capital of Dahomey, during his return journey. By 1856 he had built up a strong church and an educational system which included thirty-five schools, four of them in Nigeria and Dahomey. He had also, however, incurred cumulative over-expenditure of more than £10,000, and in 1857 he resigned from the ministry. For some time he worked in government service in Ghana, returning to the ministry in his later years.

PAUL ELLINGWORTH

FREEMASONRY. An international organization, claiming adherents of all faiths, whose principles are embodied in symbols and allegories connected with the art of building and involving an oath of secrecy. The origins of Freemasonry probably lie in the twelfth century, when English masons founded a fraternity to guard the secrets of their craft. The "lodge," the name given to the meeting place of modern masons, was not only a workshop, but a place to exchange views, air grievances, and discuss craft matters. Hence their secrecy.

There are two elements in the masonic tradition: (1) the Old Charges. Two manuscripts, now in the British Museum, dating from 1390 and about 1400, detail the customs and the rules of the craft. Rules apply to the master in charge, the journeymen, and the apprentice who is learning the trade; (2) the Masonic Word. This is probably a Scottish institution and is somewhat obscure in origin and development. It is a distinguishing secret sign, either a word, a handshake, or both.

The development of Freemasonry falls into three periods. In the first, all members were operative masons. During the age of "Accepted Masonry," nonoperative masons either joined existing lodges or formed new ones. From the eighteenth century there developed "Speculative Masonry," Freemasonry as it is known today. The Grand Lodge was founded in 1717 principally to maintain communication and harmony among lodges. Following 1721, many of the highest offices were filled by members of the aristocracy. The origins of the modern masonic ceremonies are obscure, though they probably derive from seventeenth-century practices. The influence of speculative masonry on these practices has almost obscured their operative origins. There are ceremonies for entry into each grade—entered apprentice, fellow of the craft, and master mason. These grades, and their associated secrets and rituals, are fundamental to modern Freemasonry.

Freemasonry places considerable emphasis on social and welfare activities. It is to be found throughout the world, though it is proscribed in Communist countries. Freemasonry claims to be based on the fundamentals of all religions held in common by all men. Among many reasons for its criticism by Christian bodies are the following. Freemasonry was closely connected with the upsurge of Deism in eighteenth-century England, and this outlook continues to prevail. Freemasonry calls for a "common denominator" God who incorporates Assyrian and Egyptian elements. The name of God in masonic rituals veils the doctrine of a blind force governing the universe. In its elaborate ritual Freemasonry omits the name of Jesus Christ, Savior and Lord. The masonic vows involve a depth of commitment which Christians should give only to Jesus Christ. The masonic initiation is to an unknown course of action and is often for this reason held in grave suspicion. The bloodcurdling vows, if taken seriously, are at best rash, and if not taken seriously, are frivolous.

Because of its invitation to men of all faiths, Freemasonry does not hold to the uniqueness of Jesus Christ. It does not teach the necessity of salvation through Christ alone. Good works, it believes, will cause a man to ascend to "the Grand Lodge Above." It accords no preeminent place to the Bible and claims that masonic initiation gives a measure of illumination unattainable elsewhere. The Roman Catholic Church has frequently condemned Freemasonry, mainly for its masonic secret. Six papal bulls have been directed against it—by Clement XII in 1738, Benedict XIV in 1751, Pius VII in 1821, Leo XII in 1826, Pius IX in 1864, and Leo XIII in 1884.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: A.G. Mackey, Encyclopedia of Freemasonry (rev. ed., 3 vols., 1946); W. Hannah, Darkness Visible (5th ed., 1953), and Christian by Degrees (1954). JAMES TAYLOR

FREER LOGION. The saying ascribed to Christ in an addition to the text after Mark 16:14 in Codex W. This is a late fourth or early fifth century MS of the four gospels discovered in 1906 by C.L. Freer and now in the Freer Museum in Washington. It runs: "And they excused themselves, saying, 'This age of lawlessness and unbelief is under Satan, who does not allow the truth and power of God to prevail over the unclean things of the spirits. Therefore reveal thy righteousness now'—thus they spoke to Christ. And Christ replied to them, 'The term of years for Satan's power has been fulfilled, but other terrible things draw near. And for those who have sinned I was delivered over to death, that they may return to the truth and sin no more; that they may inherit the spiritual and incorruptible glory of Righteousness which is in heaven.' " It has some affinity with the general style and content of the longer ending of Mark's gospel as a whole.

See V. Taylor, The Gospel according to St. Mark (1952). R.E. NIXON

FREE THINKERS. Those who refuse to submit reason to the control of authority in questions of religious belief. The term which seems to have appeared first in 1692, was used by Deists and other opponents of orthodox Christianity in the early eighteenth century in their emphasis on reason above all else. In A Discourse on Freethinking published in 1713, Anthony Collins assailed ministers of all denominations and asserted that free inquiry was the only means of attaining truth—and that this procedure was, indeed, commanded by Scripture. It can be seen from this that in its earlier manifestations the term was not chiefly involved with a direct attack on religion as such, but rather on the exclusive claims of, and the stress on revelation by, the Christian religion. Coupled with this was an attempt to throw doubt on the authority of the Bible. Freethinking has now come, however, to be a general description of any agnostic or atheist whose rejection of theism is conscious and real rather than stemming from apathy or indifference. Its weakness as a description comes from its fallacious assumption that freedom of thought must inevitably involve rejection of the supernatural.

It has been associated with a great number of movements. Modern secularism in its militantly atheistic form claims the term brings together many different strands of thought. Among these would be listed modern Unitarianism (1825); Mexican secularism (1833); the German free-religious movement (1848); organized positivism (1854); New Zealand rationalism (1856); Australian secularism (1862); the Belgian Ligue de l'Enseignement (1864); the English religion (later the ethical) society (1864); Italian anticlericalism (1869); Vosey's theistic church (1871); American free thought (based on the Truth Seeker, 1873); American ethical culture (1876); the Dutch Dageraad (dawn) as a national movement (1881); Argentinian secularism (1883), and Austrian secularism (1887). One could legitimately add to these the more radical groups within the major denominations and extend the list even to include political revolutionaries. J.D. DOUGLAS

FRELINGHUYSEN, THEODORE JACOBUS (1691-1747). Dutch Calvinist and pietist. Born at Lingen in East Friesland, steeped in the pietistic emphases then current in Dutch Calvinism, he served as a pastor in the Netherlands. He became aware of the need for trained ministers among the Dutch congregations in America and emigrated to New Jersey in his late twenties. From 1720 he served in the Raritan Valley area. An eloquent preacher, he stressed the need for spiritual revival, and he found in the Great Awakening* that swept the colonies a similar emphasis. He was in active touch with Gilbert Tennent* and other revivalistic leaders. Frelinghuysen aroused some opponents among the Dutch settlers, who appealed to Amsterdam; he, meanwhile, was working for a separate organization for the American Dutch Calvinist churches. He organized an assembly (coetus) which asked approval from Amsterdam; in 1747, the year he died, this approval was given. He is thus an important figure in the history of the Dutch Reformed in America.

DIRK JELLEMA

FRIAR (from Old French frere, "brother"). Title of a member of one of the Mendicant ("Begging") Orders founded during the Middle Ages. They are distinguished from monks in that, though they have a local headquarters in a "friary," their work is an active ministry in the world. Part of a highly organized, widespread body with a central authority, they also are often distinguished, in England, by the color of their habits, e.g., "Grey Friars" (Franciscans), "Black Friars" (Dominicans), "White Friars" (Carmelites).

FRIEDRICH, JOHANNES (1836-1917). Church historian. Born in Upper Franconia, Germany, he was educated at Bamburg and Munich and ordained in the Roman Catholic Church. He lectured in the theological faculty at Munich, first in ecclesiastical history, then in philosophy, until his retirement in 1905. Secretary to Cardinal Gustav von Hohenlohe at Vatican I, he considered papal infallibility historically indefensible and joined in opposing such a dogma. Leaving Rome before the council ended, he refused to accept the decrees, and in 1871 was excommunicated. The Bavarian government gave him protection in respect of his university appointment at Munich. He continued as a priest with the Old Catholics,* whom he influenced profoundly, but left them because they did not uphold clerical celibacy. Among his many writings were Johann Wessel (1862); Kirchengeschichte Deutschlands (2 vols., 1867-69), completed only to the Merovingian period; Geschichte des Vatikanischen Konzils (3 vols., 1877-87); Beiträge zur Geschichte des Jesuitenordens (1881); and Ignaz von Döllinger (3 vols., 1899-1901), his teacher and intimate friend, for whose Letters from Rome (1869-70), published under the pseudonym "Quirinus," he was a major informant.

C.G. THORNE, JR.

FRIENDS, SOCIETY OF (Quakers). A religious group whose origins are traced to the radical wing of English Puritanism of the 1640s. The term "Quaker" was used from 1650, partly because people were expected to tremble before the Word of God, partly because a sect of women in Southwark had previously been so called. The first leader was George Fox,* who in the 1650s preached the message of the New Age of the Spirit. The Seekers of Westmorland were converted, and with their help Fox and others moved south in their aggressive evangelism, opposed by Puritans and Anglicans alike. In Scotland many espoused Quaker views introduced into the country during the Protectorate, and they, like the Covenanters,* suffered persecution for their beliefs.

From their emphasis on realized eschatology and the presence of the Spirit emerged the typical Quaker meeting wherein people waited for the Spirit to speak in and through them. The "Inner Light" was as important as Scripture; sacraments, ceremonies, and clergy were abandoned. Persecuted at home, they evangelized North America which they reached in the mid-seventeenth century. Two decades later, another of their leaders, William Penn,* established the colony of Pennsylvania. In 1796 they opened the first asylum in England, where also Elizabeth Fry* began notable work in prison reform. In America in 1827 a schism developed under the influence of the Hicksites.* During the nineteenth century there was a steady move westward in which Quakers participated; the first yearly meeting in Canada was established in 1867.

Their theology was given classic expression by Robert Barclay* in Apology for the True Christian Divinity (1678), and their meetings were regulated by Fox's "Rule for the Management of Meetings" (1668). The body believes in the priesthood of all believers and holds that women equally with men have a share and responsibility in worship and organization. Many in modern times have abandoned the traditional form of worship in favor of a service led by a pastor. Called upon to act toward others in the way most likely to lead to a response of goodness, the Friends have obeyed with great consistency. Early in the eighteenth century they began to oppose slavery, and their efforts contributed much to Wilberforce's ultimate success. Their well-known opposition to war is not based primarily on Scripture, but on the conviction that warlike feelings are a sign something is wrong in men's thinking and attitude toward one another. Although refusing combatant duties, Quakers have a notable record of valiant service on and off the battlefield. "Walking in the light" means speaking the truth, so Quakers refused to take oaths. To them is due credit also for our system of fixed price trading—they held it wrong to ask a higher price than one was willing to take.

There are now estimated to be some 200,000 Friends throughout the world, of which more than 60 percent are in the USA, 11 percent in the British Isles. They maintain missions and international centers in several countries.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: R.M. Jones et al., The Quakers in the American Colonies (1911); W.C. Braithwaite, The Beginnings of Quakerism (1912, rev. 1955), and The Second Period of Quakerism (1919, rev. 1961); A.N. Brayshaw, The Quakers, Their Story and Message (1921, rev. 1953); R.M. Jones, The Faith and Practice of the Quakers (1927; 7th ed., 1949); H.H. Brinton, Friends for 300 Years (1952); D.E. Trueblood, The People Called Quakers (1966).

P.W. PETTY

FRIENDS OF GOD (Gottesfreunde). A term used in Scripture, by the Fathers, and in medieval writings, which refers also to a group of German mystics and other Christians in the fourteenth century. They exchanged visits, letters, and writings for their own spiritual growth and service. Some lived alone, others in groups, and several were nuns in the convents to whom the mystics preached and ministered. Profoundly influenced by Meister Eckhart's* works as well as the ideals of earlier German prophetesses, they cultivated intense prayer, austerity, and self-renunciation. Fully supporting the church, they were concentrated in Bavaria, the Rhineland, Switzerland, and the Low Countries, with Basle, Strasbourg, and Cologne as chief centers. Their number included Dominicans, Franciscans, and lay people of every estate. Associated with them were John Tauler,* Henry Suso,* Jan van Ruysbroeck,* and the author of the Theologia Germanica, and there were links also with the Brethren of the Common Life. The Friends are to be distinguished from the heretical Beguines* who took their name. The decline of mysticism brought the end of their association, but their influence long continued. C.G. THORNE, JR.

FRITH, JOHN (c.1503-1533). Protestant martyr. Born at Westerham and educated at Eton and King's College, Cambridge, he was made junior canon by Wolsey of his newly founded Cardinal College (Christ Church), Oxford. He was briefly imprisoned in 1528 for his Lutheran views. In Marburg he helped Tyndale* in his translation work. He returned to England in 1532 where his writings against the doctrines of purgatory (A Disputation of Purgatory, 1531, combating Sir Thomas More and Bishop Fisher) and transubstantiation precipitated his arrest on the orders of More on a charge of heresy. He refused to recant, was condemned to death, and burned at Smithfield. Some ten works are credited to him, including one of the first antipapistical books in English, An Epistle to the Christian Reader: Antithesis wherein are compared together Christ's Acts and our Holy Father the Pope's (1529). Several were written in the Tower or in Newgate Prison in defense of his views. HOWARD SAINSBURY

FROMENT, ANTOINE (1510-1584). Reformer of Geneva. Born at Tries, near Grenoble, he was educated at Paris, met Lefèvre d'Étaples,* and received a canonry on an estate of the queen of Navarre. He accompanied Guillaume Farel* on his evangelistic tours through Switzerland. He went to Geneva (1532), opened an elementary school to teach French, but turned his lessons into sermons. His followers daily increased. In 1533 he protested publicly after an attack on evangelical doctrine by Guy Furbiti, a Sorbonne theologian; he was forced into hiding, but returned with Farel and Pierre Viret.* He became pastor of St. Gervais Church (1537) and was engaged by Bonivard, the republic's historian, to help in his Chronicle (1549). He renounced his ministry and became public notary (1553) and a member of the "Council of the Two Hundred" (1559). He had domestic troubles, was banished after adultery (1562), but was permitted to return in view of past services (1572), and reinstated as notary (1574). J.G.G. NORMAN

FRONTIER RELIGION. A reference to the character of Christianity on the American frontier during the century of western expansion (1790-1890). Pioneer religion tended to encourage an individualistic faith, emotion-filled meetings, and democratic church government. Employing revivals and camp meetings* freely, Baptists and Methodists proved to be the most effective denominations in winning frontiersmen to the Christian faith. Baptist ministers, usually farmers during the week and preachers of the "simple gospel" on Sunday, readily identified with the homesteader; while the Methodist circuit-riding preachers with their message of free will and free grace seemed to offer the right combination of method and message for the scattered, democratically minded frontiersmen. BRUCE L. SHELLEY

FROST, HENRY WESTON (1858-1945). Mission director. Born in Detroit, reared in New York, and educated at Princeton, Frost joined his father in oil production. Originally his was a Danish family who moved to Cambridge, England, his mother being descended from a long line of English and Flemish knights. To his immediate family and a quickening evangelistic and missionary experience he owed his Christian vocation, being much encouraged by his wife. He founded the North American branch of the China Inland Mission and served as its director in Philadelphia for over forty years. Presbyterian, a premillennialist, and active in the Bible Conference Movement, he wrote numerous pamphlets, three books of poetry, and a dozen volumes on devotional, doctrinal, and missionary subjects. C.G. THORNE, JR.

FROUDE, RICHARD HURRELL (1803-1836). Tractarian* leader. Son of the archdeacon of Totnes and elder brother of J.A. Froude the historian, he was educated at Eton and Oriel College, Oxford, served as tutor at the latter, and was ordained priest in 1829. In 1831 the first signs of consumption appeared, and he traveled widely in search of healthier climes. On one of these journeys, to Italy (1832-33), he was accompanied by John Newman* whom he influenced greatly, being responsible for bringing Newman and John Keble* together—hence he is sometimes known as the "third man" of the Oxford Movement.* He died in obscurity. In 1838-39 his friends published his Remains, consisting of extracts from his essays, sermons, and letters, in the mistaken belief that readers would admire the exemplary High Church piety of the deceased. In effect the book revealed that Froude, beneath a debonair and cavalier exterior, was melancholy, self-torturing, cruel, arrogant, and somewhat schizophrenic. He bitterly hated the Reformation, and he was devoted to clerical celibacy and the cult of the Virgin. The Remains convinced many that Tractarianism's real goal was reunion with Rome. IAN SELLERS

FRUCTUOSUS (d.259). Bishop of Tarragona in Spain, Fructuosus with two deacons was arraigned before Roman officers for refusing to offer sacrifice to Roman state gods. They contravened the edicts of Valerian and Gallienus in A.D. 257-58, requiring nonpagans to join in Roman religious ceremonies. He was burnt to death.

FRUMENTIUS (fourth century). First bishop of Axumis. According to Rufinus, the brothers Frumentius and Aedesius accompanied their teacher Meropus on a voyage from Tyre to Ethiopia. Here, probably at Adoulis, Meropus was killed by the Ethiopians and the brothers taken captive to the king at Axumis. He made Frumentius his secretary and Aedesius his cupbearer. The brothers were Christians, and when they were persuaded by the queen mother to remain after the death of the king and to help with the education of the prince and with the government during the prince's minority, they were able to promote the Christian faith. On the prince's majority they were permitted to return to their own country. Frumentius visited Alexandria to report on his work and was consecrated bishop of Axumis there by Athanasius, either shortly before 339 or shortly after 346. He took the title "Our Father" (abuna) which was retained by primates of the Ethiopian Church. He was apparently opposed to Arianism.
DAVID JOHN WILLIAMS

FRY, ELIZABETH (1780-1845). Quaker prison reformer. Born in Norwich, daughter of John Gurney, a Quaker banker, she married a London merchant in 1800 and had a large family. Her religious upbringing created in her a deep concern over social issues, and in 1808 she was in a position to found a Girls' School at Plashet, East Ham. In 1811 she was admitted as a Quaker "minister." It was not until 1813 that she became interested in prison work and began her welfare work at Newgate Prison among the women prisoners, visiting them daily, teaching them to sew, and reading the Bible to them. In 1817 she began her campaign for the separation of the sexes in prisons, classification of criminals, women warders to supervise women prisoners, and provision of both secular and religious instruction. In 1818 she gave evidence before a select committee of the House of Commons on the subject of prisons, and her views played a significant part in the design of subsequent legislation.

Later, in 1839, realizing the necessity for the care and rehabilitation of discharged criminals, she formed a society with this as its prime concern. She did much to foster prison reform on the Continent by frequent visits. Other philanthropic causes also occupied her time and attention. In an attempt to deal with mendicancy she sponsored the "Nightly Shelter for the Homeless in London" (1820), as well as visiting societies in Brighton and other places. In 1827, with her brother, she produced a report on social conditions in Ireland, and in 1836 she secured the provision of libraries at coastguard stations and certain naval hospitals. Her husband went bankrupt in 1828, however, and this curtailed her work. Throughout her life she combined an evangelistic zeal with her social work, and her Texts for Every Day in the Year (1831) had a very wide circulation. Her maxim was "Charity to the soul is the soul of charity."

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Her two daughters published a two-volume Memoir in 1847; her numerous biographers include G.K. Lewis (1910) and J.P. Witney (1937).
JOHN A. SIMPSON

FULGENTIUS (468-533). Bishop of Ruspe. Born at Telepte in Byzacene, he later left Hunneric's court for the monastic life, first under the exiled bishop Faustus and then under Abbot Felix. He visited Rome in 500 and on his return to Byzacene founded his own monastery, from which he soon retired to practice a more ascetic life on an island. At the instigation of Felix he was ordained presbyter by Faustus, and in 508 was consecrated bishop of Ruspe by Victor of Byzacene. His first task was to build a monastery of which Felix became abbot. Soon after, Fulgentius was banished by Thrasimund to Sardinia with sixty other Catholic bishops, but was recalled to Carthage in 515 to answer objections to the Catholic faith. He returned into exile in 517 and remained in Sardinia until Thrasimund's death in 523. Hilderic allowed him to return to Ruspe, where he died. Fulgentius was a devotee of Augustine, as seen in his letters, sermons, and treatises against the Arians and the Pelagians. DAVID JOHN WILLIAMS

FULKE, WILLIAM (1538-1589). Puritan divine. Born in London, he studied at St. John's College, Cambridge, and Clifford's Inn. He became a friend of Thomas Cartwright and took a prominent part in the Vestiarian Controversy* in the university. For his extremism he was deprived of his fellowship and expelled. Later he was readmitted. He became chaplain to the earl of Leicester and through his help received the livings of Warley and Dennington in Essex-Suffolk. He became head of Pembroke Hall in 1578 and vice-chancellor in 1580. The last decade of his life was taken up with literary activity in defense of Protestantism and against Roman Catholicism, especially against Cardinal Allen and other leaders of the Counter-Reformation. His defense of the English translation of the Bible ("Bishops' Bible"*) against the attacks of Gregory Martin of Reims revealed Fulke's wide learning and ability. It also helped to make known the Douai-Reims NT in England, so that its language influenced the AV of 1611.
PETER TOON

FULLER, ANDREW (1754-1815). Baptist theologian. Son of a Cambridge farmer and a powerful wrestler in his youth, Fuller was ordained as minister of Soham Baptist church in 1775 and inducted to the Kettering church in 1783. Entirely self-taught and possessed of a blunt, incisive style, Fuller was the greatest original theologian among eighteenth-century Baptists. Reared in an atmosphere of deadening hyper-Calvinism, he was led through vigorous independent study of Scripture, the encouragement of Robert Hall, John Ryland, and others, and his reading of Jonathan Edwards to evolve, or rather revive, an evangelical Calvinism which was the substance of his greatest work, The Gospel Worthy of All Acceptation (1785).

This involved him in various controversies: with hyper-Calvinists like John Martin and William Button who denounced "Fullerism" as "Duty-faith" and led their churches apart from the evangelical Baptists (and thus created the Strict and Particular Baptist denomination); with Dan Taylor the Arminian Baptist; with Archibald McLean's Scotch Baptists (whose eccentricities Fuller deplored and whom he countered by encouraging the Haldane brothers and R.C. Anderson to establish orthodox Baptist churches in Scotland); with William Vidler the Universalist; and with various Unitarian apologists. As the Baptist churches of Britain responded increasingly to his evangelicalism, Fuller's role in denominational affairs grew more important: his was a profound influence on William Carey* and the Baptist Missionary Society (of which he was secretary, 1792-1815), and he was a loyal servant of the infant Baptist Union and the Baptist Irish Society.

IAN SELLERS

FULLER, CHARLES E. (1887-1968). American Baptist radio evangelist. He graduated from Pomona College in 1910 and engaged in orange-growing. Following his conversion under Paul Rader, Fuller for three years studied at the Bible Institute of Los Angeles where he came under R.A. Torrey's* influence. He was ordained at Calvary Church, Placentia, California, in 1925, where he was pastor until 1932. Two of his early radio programs were "The Pilgrim Hour" and "Heart to Heart Talks." His "Old Fashioned Revival Hour" was aired nationwide over the Mutual Broadcasting System beginning in 1937 and later switched to CBS. The program reached its coast-to-coast peak in the 1940s with live broadcasts over 625 stations from the Municipal Auditorium in Long Beach where Fuller spoke to several thousands every Sunday. His wife pioneered the technique of reading excerpts from listeners' letters on the air. He was a co-founder of Fuller Theological Seminary in 1947. His "folksy" style produced great numbers of converts.

ROBERT C. NEWMAN

FULLER, THOMAS (1608-1661). Divine and historian. Son of the rector of Aldwincle St. Peters in Northamptonshire, and nephew of Bishop Davenant, he studied at Queens' College, Cambridge. Through his uncle's help he had access to good livings at Broadwinter, Waltham Abbey, and Cranford. As a preacher he was very popular in the 1630s and 1640s. During the Civil War he spent most of his time at Oxford, although he was only a moderate Royalist. His fame rests on his books. In 1650 he published A Pisgah Sight of Palestine, in 1655 A Church History of Britain. A year after his death his Worthies of England was published. Into these three books went years of research, and they have often been reprinted. A less famous and more popular work was his The Holy and Profane State (1642), a book on the Christian life. He is reputed to have been one of the first authors to make an income by his pen.

PETER TOON

FUNDAMENTALISM. A conservative theological movement in American Protestantism, which arose to national prominence in the 1920s in opposition to "modernism."* Most interpretations of the movement try to explain it in socioeconomic or psychological terms, but the movement was rooted in genuine theological concern for apostolic and Reformation doctrine growing out of American revivalism.* Further confusion has arisen from repeated reference to five basic doctrines (or "five points") of fundamentalism, supposedly springing from the Niagara Bible Conference of 1895.

Fundamentalism should be understood primarily as an attempt to protect the essential doctrines or elements (fundamentals) of the Christian faith from the eroding effects of modern thought. Such doctrines include the Virgin Birth, the resurrection and deity of Christ, His substitutionary atonement, the Second Coming, and the authority and inerrancy of the Bible.

The roots of fundamentalism go back into the nineteenth century when evolution, biblical criticism, and the study of comparative religions began to challenge old assumptions about the authority of the biblical revelation. At the same time new ethical problems accompanied the emerging urban-industrial society in America. Men such as William H. Carwardine and Washington Gladden appealed to the Christian conscience and advocated what came to be called a "social gospel."* The so-called higher criticism* (historical and literary, in contrast with textual) of the Bible entered the mainstream of American Protestantism following the Civil War. By World War I higher criticism was generally accepted in seminaries and colleges. This success came, however, only after strong resistance. Heated debates took place in scholarly journals. Baptists dismissed professors such as C.H. Toy and E.P. Gould, and Presbyterians held heresy trials of C.A. Briggs and A.C. McGiffert. By the turn of the century, major conflict between progressives and conservatives appeared certain.

A significant offensive against modernism was launched in 1910 with the publication of the first of *The Fundamentals. By 1918 the term "fundamentals" had become common usage, but "fundamentalist" and "fundamentalism" were coined in 1920 by Curtis Lee Laws, Baptist editor of the Watchman-Examiner. Laws proposed that a group within the Northern Baptist Convention adopt the name "fundamentalist." During a conference in Buffalo, New York, in 1920, Laws and his associates accepted the title. This group, popularly called "The Fundamentalist Fellowship," were moderate conservatives, who believed that the modernists were surrendering the "fundamentals" of the Gospel, namely, the sinful nature of man, his inability to be saved apart from God's grace, the indispensability of Jesus' death for the regeneration of the individual and the renewal of society, and the authoritative revelation of the Bible. This group, the first to apply the name "fundamentalist" to itself, was identified neither with dispensationalism nor with a crusade against evolutionary teaching. They asserted repeatedly that they were concerned only about the preservation of the central affirmations of the Christian faith.

Historians have often portrayed fundamentalists as "losers." While it is true that the conservatives were unable to gain the adoption of a confession of faith in any of the northern denominations, Laws and his associates did not consider their cause a lost one. Laws wrote in 1924 that certain schools of his denomination had checked the inroads of liberalism and that the investigation of the mission societies, as advocated by the fundamentalists, resulted in certain changes which made the creation of a new mission unnecessary.

A more militantly conservative voice had been raised in 1923 with the formation of the Baptist Bible Union. Composed of Baptists from the South and Canada, as well as the North, the union broadened the fundamentalist cause to include the struggle against evolutionary teaching.

Among Presbyterians, the conservative position was championed by J.G. Machen* of Princeton Theological Seminary. When he refused to break his ties with the Independent Board of Presbyterian Foreign Missions, he was tried and found guilty of rebellion against superiors. Thus evolved the Orthodox Presbyterian and Bible Presbyterian churches.

Gradually "fundamentalism" came to be used loosely for all theological conservatism, including militants, moderates of the Laws type, and a scholarly type represented by Machen. Due to the tactics of certain leaders, the fundamentalist image eventually became stereotyped as close-minded, belligerent, and separatistic.

In the 1950s a growing number of conservatives attempted to set aside the fundamentalist label. Harold John Ockenga was one of the first to propose "new evangelical" as an alternative. He called for a conservative Christianity which held to the central beliefs of the Christian faith, but which was also intellectually respectable, socially concerned, and cooperative in spirit. Since the late fifties this perspective has deepened and broadened. Carl F.H. Henry, Edward John Carnell, the periodical Christianity Today, the Billy Graham Evangelistic Association, and other individuals and groups have been identified with the new evangelicalism, which considers itself the heir of the spirit and purpose of the original fundamentalists.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: S.G. Cole, A History of Fundamentalism (1931); N.F. Furniss, The Fundamentalist Controversy (1954); J.I. Packer, Fundamentalism and the Word of God (1958); E.R. Sandeen, The Roots of Fundamentalism (1970).

BRUCE L. SHELLEY

FUNDAMENTALS, THE. A series of twelve small books published from 1910 to 1915, containing articles and essays designed to defend fundamental Christian truths. Three million copies of the books were sent free to every theological student and Christian worker whose address was obtainable. The project arose in the thinking of Lyman Stewart, a wealthy oilman in Southern California, who was convinced that something was needed to reaffirm Christian truths in the face of biblical criticism and modern theology. After listening to A.C. Dixon* preach in 1909, Stewart secured Dixon's help in publishing The Fundamentals. Stewart then enlisted the financial support of his brother, Milton, and Dixon chose a committee, which included the evangelist R.A. Torrey,* to assist in the editorial work.

Sixty-four authors were eventually chosen. The American premillennial movement and the English Keswick Convention were well represented. Other conservatives such as E.Y. Mullins* of Southern Baptist Seminary and B.B. Warfield* of Princeton Seminary were also among the contributors.

BRUCE L. SHELLEY

FUNERALS, see BURIAL SERVICES

FUX, JOHANN JOSEPH (1660-1741). Musical composer. Although chiefly remembered today for his Gradus ad Parnassum, the most influential eighteenth-century treatise on counterpoint, he was also perhaps the greatest Catholic composer of church music in the Germanic cultural sphere of his day. He strove to keep alive the tradition of church style stemming from Palestrina and the Counter-Reformation. He was active at court in Vienna, and for a time at St. Stephen's Cathedral. His influence continued to be felt by composers down into the nineteenth century.

G

GABRIEL SEVERUS, (1541-1616). Greek theologian. Born in Morea and educated at Padua, he later lived in Crete and Venice. In 1577 he was consecrated metropolitan of Philadelphia (Ala-Shehr) in Asia Minor (Turkey). Much of his time was spent in Venice ministering to the Greek-speaking people there. His proximity to the Roman Catholic Church led him to feel the need to expound and defend the principles of his own church. Two of his major works were explanations and defenses of the Orthodox custom of venerating the elements of the Eucharist before the actual consecration had taken place. Another treatise, An Exposition against those who... teach that the members of the Eastern Church are schismatics ..., defended the validity of his church against the critical remarks of leading Jesuits such as Bellarmine.* He was known to scholars in England and helped in the edition of Chrysostom's works prepared by Henry Savile in 1610-13.

PETER TOON

GABRIELI, GIOVANNI (1557-1611). Italian composer. Giovanni is the most important of several composers named Gabrieli. He was the last great composer to cultivate the Renaissance polychoral style at St. Mark's Cathedral in Venice. He also was a key figure in developing some aspects of music that are thought of as distinctly Baroque. He almost completely abandoned the composition of Masses in favor of motets, these often for two or three choirs and in up to nineteen voice parts. He gave instruments a new role, not only combining them on equal terms with voices in many of his motets, but also writing magnificent canzoni for wind instruments to be played in the great cathedral. He was a pioneer in the new "concertato" style that dominated the Baroque era and had a direct influence on almost all the leading figures among his younger contemporaries.

J.B. MAC MILLAN

GAEBELEIN, ARNO C(LEMENS) (1861-1945). Writer on prophecy. Born in Thuringia, Germany, he went to America at eighteen and was later ordained in the Methodist Episcopal Church, holding pastorates in Baltimore, Hoboken (New Jersey), and New York City where he began a remarkable ministry to the Jews. He founded and edited Our Hope magazine (published 1894-1958), and a press by that name, to provide literature for Jews, chiefly on prophecy and biblical exposition. Its distribution was worldwide. A student of biblical and major national, including Middle Eastern, languages, he wrote nearly fifty books and numerous pamphlets, mostly on prophecy. He lectured and preached widely and was active in the Bible Conference Movement.

C.G. THORNE, JR.

GAIRDNER, JAMES (1828-1912). Historian and records scholar. Born in Edinburgh, he worked as a clerk and an editor in the Public Record Office, London (1846-93). From 1856 he first collaborated with J.S. Brewer in the preparation of The Letters and Papers of Henry VIII, then became editor after Brewer's death. He also edited collections of documents for the Rolls Series and the Camden Society and prepared the definitive edition of the Paston Letters. He wrote the volume for the period 1509-59 for Stephens and Hunt's History of the Church of England, closing his career with the four-volume work Lollardy and the Reformation in England. Always strongly Protestant in his outlook, he also sought to be objective in his editing and writing.

W.S. REID

GAIRDNER, WILLIAM HENRY TEMPLE (1873-1928). Anglican missionary and scholar. Born in Ardrossan, Scotland, he was educated at Trinity College, Oxford, and was associated with J.R. Mott* in work among British students. He went with the Church Missionary Society to Cairo in 1898, with a "special view to work among students and others of the educated classes of Moslems." He was ordained in 1901. A gifted linguist, he broke new ground by teaching missionaries and native teachers colloquial Arabic, produced a handbook on phonetics and two textbooks on the subject, and wrote hymns, poems, plays, and popular biblical literature in Arabic. He founded an English and Arabic Christian magazine, Orient and Occident, in 1904. He collected some three hundred Near Eastern tunes for use in Christian worship. His deep study of Islamics and Arabic literature is revealed in The Reproach of Islam (1909) and The Values of Christianity and Islam (with W.A. Eddy, 1927). He worked to make the Arabic Anglican Church into a welded group of believers, to train indigenous leaders, and to improve relations with the Coptic Church.* He believed that Islam could be won by a living exemplification of Christian brotherhood. His deep awareness of beauty is seen in his love of music, poetry, and the world of nature. Zest characterized his life and his faith; he seemed to have the ability to enjoy everything intensely.

HOWARD SAINSBURY

GAIUS (Caius) (third century). Roman presbyter and author of a Dialogue in which he maintained a debate with the Montanist Proclus* during the pontificate of Zephyrinus. Proclus defended the prophesying of his sect by referring to Philip's prophesying daughters (Acts 21:9), who were buried with Philip at Hierapolis. Gaius defended the authority of Rome by referring to the tombs of the apostles in the Vatican and on the Via Ostia. Gaius accepted thirteen epistles of Paul, but denied the Pauline authorship of Hebrews. It appears also that he rejected the fourth gospel and the Apocalypse as the work of Cerinthus. Two later Syriac writers, Dionysius Bar-Salibi (twelfth century) and Ebedjesus (fourteenth century), mention a treatise of Hippolytus in which he defends the apostolic authorship of these works against Gaius. Eusebius may not have been aware of Gaius's attitude toward these works, as he calls him a "churchman," a title usually reserved for the orthodox. DAVID JOHN WILLIAMS

GALATIA. (1) A region and Roman province in central Asia Minor, named after a Celtic tribe that migrated into the valley of the Halys River in the third century B.C. from central Europe. Although never the majority, these "Gauls" ruled the indigenous tribes of Phrygians and Cappadocians. Three different tribes were involved, each of whose Celtic tribes were divided into four classes, called "tetrarchies" by the Greeks. Their military prowess made the Galatians desirable as mercenaries.

(2) Hellenistic Galatia was the central plateau of Asia Minor that is bounded by the upper Sangarius and middle basin of the Halys River, limited to the north by the kingdoms of Bithynia and Pontus. After the fall of the Hittite Empire, this area was called Phrygia, and later Galatia. The Galatians did not dwell in towns, but lived tribally, until finally crushed by the Romans in 25 B.C.

(3) Roman Galatia was created from Galatia proper and major extensions to include Lycaonia, Isauria, Pisidia, as well as the cities of Iconium, Lystra, Derbe, Apollonia, and Antioch. A variety of peoples was thus added, and the city of Ancyra* was selected as the capital. Further extensions were added to this vast territory in 6-5 B.C., A.D. 64 and 72, to a size approaching the former Hittite Empire.

(4) NT usage, A subject of dispute has been Paul's usage of the term "Galatia" (Gal. 1:2). Does he refer to the original ethnic sense or to the Roman province? The latter is now more favored. Acts 16:6 seems to imply that Paul visited those ports of Phrygia which had been incorporated into the Roman province of Galatia. Likewise, in Acts 18:23 it is doubtful if Paul ever visited the northern area of Galatia. Two other references to Galatia likewise imply the territory of the Roman province: 2 Timothy 4:10; 1 Peter 1:1, while 1 Corinthians 16:1 will be interpreted according to one's view of the "Galatia" meant in the other passages. JAMES M. HOUSTON

GALATIANS, EPISTLE TO THE, see EPISTLES, PAULINE

GALERIUS, VALERIUS MAXIMIANUS (d.311). Roman emperor. A native of Illyricum and of humble origin, he was invested with the title of Caesar in 293 by Diocletian, whose daughter he married, and was given responsibility for the Danube frontier. Here he won several victories over the Germans (293-95). When Diocletian decided on measures against the Christians, the severity with which this decision was implemented in the series of edicts after 303 was due largely to the influence of Galerius. As the emperor's health failed, Galerius's power increased, and in 305 he persuaded both Augustuses to abdicate and himself became the Augustus of the East while Constantius became that of the West. The church in the West enjoyed comparative peace after this, but Galerius and his Caesar, Maximin, continued their policy of persecution. After 307 there was some remission, but it was not until his own health failed and he was under the threat of an alliance between Constantine and Maxentius that Galerius published his Edict of Toleration from Nicomedia in the same year that he died. DAVID JOHN WILLIAMS

GALESBURG RULE. "Lutheran pulpits for Lutheran ministers only; Lutheran altars for Lutheran communicants only" was adopted by the Lutheran General Council meeting at Galesburg, Illinois, in 1875. It was intended to preserve confessional distinctiveness threatened by practices of some Lutherans that seemed to promote unionism and Americanization. The rule, suggested by president C.P. Krauth, was enacted at Akron, Ohio, in 1872, with carefully worded provisions for exceptional cases. One party within the council demanded an exclusive interpretation of the Galesburg Rule, without exceptions; another insisted on the understanding reached at Akron. It was finally decided (Pittsburgh, 1889) that the Galesburg Rule had not annulled the Akron statement. ALBERT H. FREUNDT, JR.

GALILEO GALILEI (1564-1642). Italian astronomer and physicist. He studied at the University of Pisa, and after teaching at Siena and Florence returned to Pisa as professor of mathematics (1589). Two years later, because of his opposition to Aristotelianism, he moved to the University of Padua. Here he conducted mechanical research, made mathematical instruments for sale, and wrote several articles that were circulated in manuscript to his pupils and friends. In 1610, with the aid of his newly invented telescope, he discovered four moons that revolve around Jupiter. By analogy he reasoned that the planets revolve about the sun. This led him to support the Copernican explanation of the solar system. He also noted in his book The Starry Messenger many other observations which could not be accounted for with the Ptolemaic view of the universe. His publication of these ideas gained him Europe-wide fame, and appointment as philosopher and mathematician to the duke of Tuscany.

He also came into conflict with the Inquisition,* and when the Copernican theory was condemned Galileo was forbidden to teach it (1616). In 1624 he visited Rome and obtained permission to write on the Copernican and Ptolemaic systems provided that the treatment was impartial. The book which resulted from his work, Dialogue

Concerning the Two Chief Systems of the World (1632), caused him to be brought to trial by the Inquisition. The work was condemned, Galileo recanted, and he was sentenced to life imprisonment. He was, however, permitted to live under house arrest till his death.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: G. de Santillana, The Crime of Galileo (1955); L. Geymonat, Galileo Galilei (tr. S. Drake, 1965); C.L. Golino (ed.), Galileo Reappraised (1966). ROBERT G. CLOUSE

GALL (c.550-640). Irish monk and missionary. He was one of the twelve monks who accompanied Columbanus from Ireland to Gaul, remaining there with him until 612. Then he settled with a few friends in a waste place to the west of Bregenz, in Austria near Lake Constance. Many legends surround him—e.g., that he was the founder of the Benedictine monastery at St. Gallen. In fact he died a century before its foundation.

GALLA PLACIDIA (c.390-450). Roman empress. Daughter of Theodosius I by his second wife Galla, she was captured by Alaric in 410 and married Alaric's successor, Ataulf, at Narbonne in 414. On Ataulf's death she returned to Italy, and in 417 married Constantius. When he died in 421, she retired to Constantinople, but when her brother Honorius died in 423, Theodosius II recognized her son Valentinian III as Honorius's successor and she returned to the West, establishing her court at Ravenna. An uncompromising Catholic, her influence may be seen in the edicts against all "Manicheans, heretics, and schismatics, and every sect opposed to the Catholic faith." She also supported Leo against the Council of Ephesus in 449. She died shortly after this council and was buried at Ravenna.

DAVID JOHN WILLIAMS

GALLICAN ARTICLES, THE FOUR (1682). A declaration concerning the respective authorities of the crown, papacy, and French bishops, adopted at Paris by a special assembly of the French clergy. The immediate occasion was a conflict over the regalia, involving opposing claims by Louis XIV and Innocent XI to fill vacant French bishoprics and to control their revenues. The declaration, drafted by Bishop Bossuet, was intended to avoid outright break with Rome while acknowledging the supremacy Louis XIV wanted. The crucial first article asserted that the king was not subject "in temporal things" to any ecclesiastical power, he could not be deposed, nor could his subjects be relieved from obedience to him by papal authority. The second claimed that while the pope enjoyed full spiritual authority, he was subject to general councils as decreed by the Council of Constance (1414-18). The next added that the exercise of papal authority was further subject to the canons and constitutions of the French kingdom and church. The fourth allowed the pope "the principal part in questions of faith," but claimed that his judgments were not above correction. Louis XIV later denounced the declaration (1693), although its principles remained the core of Gallicanism* throughout the eighteenth century. C.T. MC INTIRE

GALLICANISM. A movement, triumphant in the seventeenth century, defining the authorities of, and relations among, the French king, the French Church, the papacy, and indirectly the French Parlements. The central event was the French bishops' declaration of the Four Gallican Articles* of 1682, at the insistence of Louis XIV. Common to the varieties of Gallican theories and practices are three assertions, as shown by Victor Martin: the sovereignty of the crown in temporal things, the authority of general councils over the pope, and the authority of crown and bishops to regulate papal interference in France.

Gallicanists professed to recognize the universal spiritual authority of the pope, but with these qualifications. The secular absolutist statism of Louis XIV de facto subjugated the French Church to the Crown, and completed the reversal of the pre-1300 relations between papacy and Crown. The progress of this reversal and the assertion of Gallicanism was marked by the resistance of Philip the Fair to Boniface VIII,* the Pragmatic Sanction of Bourges* (1438), the Concordat of Bologna* (1516), the nonreception of decrees of the Council of Trent in France, and similar events, whereby the Crown claimed rights in control of episcopal elections, liturgy, canon law, education, and in many other ecclesiastical matters. The Crown made such successful claims often in conflict with contrary claims by the bishops and the Parlements, as the modern self-sufficient sovereign state emerged by the late eighteenth century. Pierre Pithou's Les Libertés de l'Église gallicane (1594) served as the standard handbook until the nineteenth century.

The French Revolution and the Civil Constitution of the Clergy (1790) effected an even more radically secularist Gallicanism, only somewhat modified by the Napoleonic Concordat of 1801* as unilaterally amended in 1802 by Napoleon's Organic Articles. The Ultramontane Catholic revival aroused among the French faithful and clergy a devotion to the unity and teachings of the church under the pope. This provided a core support for the reception of the Syllabus of Errors* and the dogma of papal infallibility (1870), which effectively rendered Gallicanism an unacceptable doctrine.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: V. Martin, Les Origines du gallicanisme (2 vols., 1939), Le Gallicanisme et la réforme catholique (1919), and Le Gallicanisme politique et le clergé de France (1929); F. Mourret, History of the Catholic Church, VI (1947); C.B. du Chesnay, "Gallicanism," in the New Catholic Encyclopedia, VI, pp. 262-67; A.-G. Martimort, Le gallicanisme de Bossuet (1953).

C.T. MC INTIRE

GALLICAN PSALTER. At different times Jerome made three versions of the Psalter, known respectively as the Roman, the Gallican, and the Hebrew. The first, produced about 383 at the request of Pope Damasus, was a revision of the Old Latin version, in which Jerome made use of the Septuagint. This version remained in use in the Roman Church until the time of Pius V (1566-72). Outside of Italy, however, the Roman Psalter was superseded by the Gallican, a version which

Jerome made in Bethlehem about 389, using the Septuagint, Theodotion's Greek version, and the Hebrew, by means of Origen's Hexapla. This version was taken to Gaul by Gregory of Tours. Later it was removed to England, where it gradually replaced the Old Latin version and ultimately became the basis for the Prayer Book version of the Psalms. DAVID JOHN WILLIAMS

GALLICAN RITE. Although there was no uniformity of worship in the churches of Merovingian Gaul, there was a basic pattern to the liturgies. Thus it was possible to distinguish a Gallican rite from the Roman Rite. The Gallican forms for the Mass, baptism, and ordination were less austere and more oratorical than the Roman, and had important differences of order and of content. For example, in the baptismal service the confession of faith preceded immersion or affusion, and part of the ceremony was the washing of feet. Also in the Mass the Trisagion ("Holy, Holy, Holy") was sung in Greek and Latin before the Kyries ("Lord, have mercy") as well as before and after the Gospel, and a Trinitarian hymn (the Trecanum) was sung during the actual Communion. Various theories have been put forward to explain these differences. The most ancient of these is that the Gallican Rite came from Ephesus through the influence of Irenaeus. A more recent view (e.g., that of Louis Duchesne) is that it came from Milan. The Gallican Rite was formally abolished by Emperor Charlemagne; however, the present Roman Rite shows signs of being influenced by or conflated with that of Gaul. PETER TOON

GALLIC CONFESSION (1559). The French Calvinist Confession of Faith. Its history begins with the statement of faith sent by the Reformed churches of France to Calvin in 1557 during a period of persecution. Working from this, and probably with the help of Beza and Pierre Viret, Calvin wrote a confession for them. This took the form of thirty-five articles. When persecution subsided, twenty delegates representing seventy-two churches met secretly in Paris from 23 to 27 May 1559. With François de Morel as moderator, the brethren produced a Constitution of Ecclesiastical Discipline and a Confession of Faith. Calvin's thirty-five articles were all used in the confession, apart from the first two which were expanded into six. Thus the Gallic Confession had forty articles.

Scholars point out that the revisions of the delegates in the first part caused the introduction of natural theology into Reformed creedal statements. Article II speaks of God revealing Himself firstly in creation and only secondly through His Word. In 1560 the Gallic Confession was presented to Francis II with a preface requesting that persecution should cease. The confession was confirmed at the seventh national synod of the French churches at La Rochelle in 1571, and recognized by German synods at Wesel in 1568 and Emden in 1571. The original draft of Calvin's articles is in the Genevan Archives; for the confession, see P. Schaff, Creeds of Christendom (4th ed., 1905), vol. I; and A. Cochrane Reformed Confessions of the Sixteenth Century (1966). PETER TOON

GALLITZIN, DEMETRIUS AUGUSTINE (1770-1840). Roman Catholic priest and missionary to the Alleghenies (also known as Smith or Schmet). Son of a freethinking Russian scientist and ambassador to Holland, he was, after his mother's return to the faith, converted to Catholicism. He came to America in 1792, and after attending Baltimore Seminary he was ordained. Refusing offers of prestige, both in the church and by the Russian government, he devoted his life to upbuilding the church in the Alleghenies. In this effort he exhausted his personal fortune. He was honored by the church for his success in establishing a large Catholic settlement in the area, also for his writing A Defense of Catholic Principles. MILLARD SCHERICH

GAMBLING. This may be defined as an agreement between two or more parties in which the transfer of something of value from one party to another is made to depend solely on an event the outcome of which is unknown, and perhaps unknowable, to the parties. Covered by the definition are betting, lotteries, and financial speculation. Insurance is excluded, being understood as a way of minimizing insecurity in the face of what are regarded as inevitable risks.

The dominant view in the church has been that though it is not wrong to make decisions depend on the outcome of a "chance" event such as a lottery, gambling is wrong because it involves covetousness, the seeking of gain at another's expense, and financial irresponsibility. Objections to gambling based on the view that all events are, or ought to be, within the control of "rational" human decisions are obviously incompatible with a serious recognition of divine sovereignty and so are unsound from a Christian standpoint.

On the above definition, gambling is not a greater evil than other abuses that the church has been more reluctant to condemn, for example, financial and economic exploitation. Further, where the amounts of money or objects of value are small, where the practice is carefully regulated, and where it has the unconstrained agreement of all parties, the evils of gambling are sometimes regarded as at a minimum. Many Christians, however, regard gambling as intrinsically evil.

Where gambling is uncontrolled and large amounts of money become involved, or where poor people are pressed into parting with what they have in the belief they may easily win large amounts of money, it can interfere with family life and with work. It can attract crime and lead in some cases to addiction and compulsive neuroses. In evaluating gambling from a Christian point of view, attention should be focused not only on gambling as an activity that is socially evil, but also on the conditions, moral and social, that give rise to it. OONAGH MC DONALD

GANSFORT, W.H., see WESSEL OF GANSFORT

GARDINER, STEPHEN (c.1490-1555). Bishop of Winchester. After graduating in canon and civil law, he became master of Trinity Hall, Cambridge, in 1525, and private secretary first to Wolsey and then to the king. He was employed in legal proceedings against heretics and in negotiations with Rome for annulling the king's marriage. In 1531 he was made bishop of Winchester. In a famous oration, De Vera Obedientia, in 1535 he argued that the pope has no legitimate jurisdiction over other national churches and that kings and princes are entitled to supremacy in their respective churches. Unsympathetic with Protestant doctrines, he was generally regarded as responsible for the Six Articles* of 1539. In Edward VI's reign he was deprived of his offices and imprisoned, but Mary restored him, making him lord high chancellor. With Bonner* he organized vigorous proceedings against Protestants, securing the reenactment of the statute de heretico comburendo and taking a leading part in the trials of John Bradford and John Rogers. Though jealous of Archbishop Pole, he approved the submission of the English Church to Rome, despite his earlier views, and aimed at the reestablishment of ecclesiastical courts. He died a wealthy man, and was buried in Winchester Cathedral. His Letters (ed. J.A. Muller) were published in 1933.

See also J.A. Muller, Stephen Gardiner and the Tudor Reaction (1926). JOYCE HORN

GARNIER, JEAN (1612-1681). Jesuit* scholar. Native of Paris, he entered the Jesuit Order at Rouen in 1628 and taught philosophy at Clermont-Ferrand for ten years from 1643, and theology thereafter at Bourges until his death. A church historian, patristics scholar, and moral theologian, he published in 1648 Libellus fidei, arising from the Pelagian controversy, providing critical and historical notes. At Paris he edited all the works of Marius Mercator, with important treatises on Pelagianism (see PELAGIUS) and Nestorianism* (1673), and the Breviarium causae Nestorianorum et Eutychianorum with his own reflections on the Fifth Council (1675). He wrote on scholastic philosophy and moral and doctrinal theology, as well as a library manual, Systema bibliothecae collegii Parisiensis S.J. (1678), and made a critical edition of the papal Liber Diurnus (1680). C.G. THORNE, JR.

GASCOIGNE, THOMAS (1403-1458). English theologian. Son of the lord of the manor of Hunslet, he was educated at Oriel College, Oxford, where he spent the rest of his life, refusing outside appointments and often appearing as either the chancellor or vice-chancellor of the university. Wealthy and somewhat conceited, Gascoigne was a strong defender of the established order in church and state, and a foe of Lollardy. He was, however, very concerned about current abuses in the church, especially pluralism and monastic decline, and his Dictionarium Theologicum (written between 1431 and 1457) is, theological interest apart, a highly personal guide to the affairs of the English Church and government and to the Oxford of his day. IAN SELLERS

GASQUET, FRANCIS NEIL AIDAN (1846-1929). Benedictine* scholar. Born in London of French and Scots parentage, he was educated at Downside, was made prior there in 1878, but resigned in 1885 because of ill health. Convalescence led him to historical research. The result was his Henry VIII and the English Monasteries (2 vols., 1888-89), which won acclaim for its vindication of English monastics at the Reformation, and Edward VI and the Book of Common Prayer (1891), which led to his nomination to the Commission on Anglican Orders (1896). Abbot-president of the English Benedictine Congregation (1900-1914), he was also the first president of the International Commission for the Revision of the Vulgate (1907). He was created cardinal in 1914, negotiated for a British minister to the Vatican, and became prefect of the Vatican Archives in 1917 and librarian in 1919. His other works included A History of the Catholic Church in England (2 vols., 1897) and Monastic Life in the Middle Ages (1922). C.G. THORNE, JR.

GAUDENTIUS (fourth/fifth centuries). Bishop of Brescia in Italy. While on pilgrimage to the Holy Land he was elected about 387 to succeed Philaster as bishop of Brescia and was persuaded by Ambrose and some Eastern bishops to accept the election. Little is known of his episcopate, but in 404-5 he was sent to Constantinople by Honorius and Innocent I to plead the cause of Chrysostom to Emperor Arcadius. He achieved nothing, but nevertheless was thanked by Chrysostom. Rufinus dedicated his Latin translation of the Clementine Recognitions to Gaudentius and refers in particular to the latter's knowledge of Greek. A number of Gaudentius's sermons survive which reflect this knowledge and show a propensity to allegorization.

DAVID JOHN WILLIAMS

GAUL, see FRANCE

GAUSSEN, FRANÇOIS SAMUEL LOUIS (1790-1863). Swiss Reformed pastor. While studying theology in Geneva, he found personal faith through the student group influenced by the orthodox Scot, Robert Haldane.* After becoming minister of the Satigny church, Gaussen underwent a long period of conflict with the heterodox Vénérable compagnie des pasteurs, which finally dismissed him in 1831. He republished the Second Helvetic Confession of 1566, helped found the Evangelical Society of Geneva (1831), and with Merle d'Aubigné* and others formed an independent and orthodox Reformed theological seminary in Geneva (1834). The author of many generally Calvinistic works, Gaussen is best known for his widely circulated Theopneustia, a statement of verbal biblical inspiration which drew fierce attacks. ROBERT P. EVANS

GAVAZZI, ALESSANDRO (1809-1889). Italian patriot and religious reformer. Born at Bologna of a large and very religious family, he joined the Barnabite* Order and taught in their schools in various Italian cities. Endowed with great oratorical ability, he soon began to preach sermons, mainly political, championing the cause of liberalism and Italian freedom against ecclesiastical authorities and the Jesuits, who tried vainly to silence him. Threatened and enclosed in a convent, he was liberated at the election of Pope Pius IX, who sent him as chaplain with the papal volunteers fighting with Charles Albert against Austria in the first war of independence (1848). Influenced by Vincenzo Gioberti* and deeply disappointed after the pope's volte-face, he took an active part in the Roman republic of 1849, organizing hospital assistance during the siege. After the defeat, pursued by papal police, he fled to Britain, joining the many Italian exiles, some of whom had founded an Italian evangelical church in London.

It is impossible to determine when Gavazzi left Roman Catholicism and whether he was genuinely converted. Soon, however, he became known as an eloquent speaker, and Lord Palmerson suggested hiring a hall in Oxford Street where crowds went to hear him denounce papal abuses and Jesuit politics. During the next ten years (spent in Britain, apart from ten months in North America) he traveled widely in England, Scotland, and Ireland, making many friends. In 1859 he returned to Italy to join Garibaldi in the wars of independence, the expedition of the Thousands, and the various attempts to conquer Rome, his main object now being the destruction of the papacy and the foundation of one great reformed Italian church.

Disagreeing with the organization and policy of the Waldensians, he tried to join the Free Italian Church (see GUICCIARDINI), meeting with Mazzarella* and Desanctis,* preaching in Genoa and Florence, but his political approach and his lack of spirituality made him suspect and led to a division in 1863. Aided by J.R. McDougall, minister of the Free Church of Scotland in Florence, he devoted himself thereafter to the establishment of a new Free Italian Church, which by 1870 comprised twenty-two congregations and a theological school.

Gavazzi's last years were spent in frequent journeys to Britain to collect funds for his church and in repeated attempts to join with the Waldensians, a move much opposed by McDougall. (At the turn of the century the various congregations were absorbed by the Methodists.) Disillusioned and embittered, rejected by all his friends, Gavazzi died in Rome. Author of innumerable and often contradictory pamphlets (some in English) written to propagate his views and attack his enemies, Gavazzi was, in the words of his most objective biographer, "the greatest intruder of Italian evangelism."

See L. Santini, Alessandro Gavazzi (1955).

DAISY RONCO

GEDDES, JENNY. The supposed instigator in 1637 of a riot in St. Giles', Edinburgh, against the imposition of "Laud's Liturgy." A little investigation might suggest that the only historically authenticated Jenny figured in the High Street of Edinburgh at the Restoration of Charles II more than twenty years later, as a staunch Royalist. It may, of course, be that the lady, older and wiser, had had a change of heart, but it is hard to avoid the conclusion that despite the memorial in St. Giles', the monumental Jenny is a myth.

J.D. DOUGLAS

GEDDIE, JOHN (1815-1872). Pioneer Presbyterian missionary to the New Hebrides Islands. Born in Banff, Scotland, his family emigrated to Nova Scotia in the following year. He became interested in missions at a very early age. After ordination he was instrumental in getting his small denomination to undertake a mission of its own. He became its first missionary, sailing from the USA in January 1847. As founder of the New Hebrides Mission, he labored amid great difficulties on the island of Aneityum. After his death in 1872, a memorial was placed in the mission church with these words: "When he landed in 1848 there were no Christians here, and when he left in 1872 there were no heathen."

HAROLD R. COOK

GEILER VON KAYSERSBERG, JOHANNES (1445-1510). Roman Catholic preacher and reformer. Born in Schaffhausen, he studied at the universities of Freiburg im Breisgau and Basle, taught at Freiburg, then became people's priest in Strasbourg. In theology he was a nominalist, but highly oriented his theology to his pastoral concerns. According to the nominalists, in the covenant relationship between God and man, God is regarded as a God who is faithful to His commitments. His grace is given to those who turn to Him, disposing themselves by their natural capacities to His gracious gifts. God gives His grace to those who do their very best. God's justice, human responsibility, and the act of creation are emphasized in nominalism. Geiler is noted especially as a preacher, effective in reaching the common people through his German sermons. Although not a humanist, he stressed the need for reform and influenced Bishop Wilhelm von Honstein in his reformatory endeavors. Geiler has been called "the prince of the pulpit in the late fifteenth century."

CARL S. MEYER

GELASIAN DECREE (Decretum Gelasianum). An early Latin document referred to also by the title of its last section Decretum de Libris Recipiendis. It comprises five sections, dealing with: Christ and the Holy Spirit; the canonical books of Scripture; the Roman Church; the orthodox councils and fathers; and the works of the fathers to be accepted and those to be rejected. Hincmar of Reims in the seventh century was the first to assign the work to Gelasius (492-96), but it may include earlier material. Some MSS assign it to Damasus (366-84), and its statement concerning the Roman Church that it "has not been set above the rest by any synodical decisions" may express the reaction of Damasus's council of 382 to the third canon of the Council of Constantinople in 381, which implied that the ecclesiastical prestige of a city was directly related to that city's political power. Some MSS assign the Decretum to Hormisdas (514-23). In its present form it belongs to the end of the fifth or beginning of the sixth century, but earlier material could have been used by either Gelasius or Hormisdas to produce the Decretum as it now stands.

DAVID JOHN WILLIAMS

GELASIUS (d.394/5). Bishop of Caesarea from about 367. Nephew of Cyril of Jerusalem and a convinced Nicene, he was removed from his see during the reign of Valens, but restored on the accession of Theodosius in 378. In 381 he was present at the Council of Constantinople. According to Theodoret he "was renowned alike for lore and life." He wrote, according to Jerome, "more or less in carefully polished style, but not to publish his works." Those works include a continuation of Eusebius's Ecclesiastical History, on which both Rufinus and Socrates may have drawn for their own histories. He wrote also a treatise against the Anomoeans* and an Expositio Symboli, of which fragments survive.

DAVID JOHN WILLIAMS

GELASIUS I (d.496). Pope from 492. Although his birthplace and nationality are uncertain, it seems probable that he was a Roman citizen in Africa. It is clear he was one of the most able in a century of outstanding pontiffs. Coming to the office a decade after the Acacian Schism* began, he was constantly engaged in controversy in upholding the Roman primacy against Constantinople. His writings include treatises and letters on the two natures in Christ, Arianism, Pelagianism, and Manichaeism. His views on the relative places of church and state predated much later thinking on the subject. "There are two powers by which this world is chiefly ruled," he wrote to the emperor Anastasius I, "the sacred authority of the priesthood and the authority of kings." Each he held to be of divine origin and to be independent in its own sphere. The Decretum Gelasianum and the Gelasian Sacramentary have been wrongly attributed to him, although some scholars find traces of his thinking in the latter.

J.D. DOUGLAS

GELASIUS OF CYZICUS (latter fifth century). Church historian. Our only knowledge of him is derived from Gelasius himself. He was the son of a presbyter of Cyzicus in Asia Minor, and having found in his father's house a document which had belonged to Dalmatius, bishop of Cyzicus, containing an account of the proceedings of the Council of Nicea, he was prompted to write a history of the council. He appears to have used other sources—such as Eusebius, Rufinus, Socrates, and Theodoret—in compiling it, and adds little of value to his earlier sources. The history contains a number of errors and anachronisms. Thus a number of chapters are devoted to disputations on the divinity of the Holy Spirit, a matter not yet in question. It is sometimes assumed that the history contains a complete collection of the synodal acts of the council, but there is no evidence of the existence of such a collection.

DAVID JOHN WILLIAMS

GELLERT, CHRISTIAN FÜRCHTEGOTT (1715-1769). German poet. Born in Saxony, son of a Lutheran pastor, he studied theology at the University of Leipzig, but was temperamentally unsuited to preaching. From 1751 he taught philosophy, poetry, and rhetoric at the university. He was greatly esteemed by his students, including Goethe* and Lessing,* for his piety and generosity. Although he wrote a novel and plays, his fame rests chiefly on his moral tales in verse, Fabeln und Erzählungen (1746-48), and his devotional poems, Geistliche Oden und Lieder (1757), which provided Beethoven with the text of six of his songs, e.g., "Die Himmel rühmen des Ewigen Ehre." Contemporary rationalism made the assertion of faith in his Easter hymn all the more impressive: "Jesus lebt, mit ihm auch ich," well known in English as "Jesus lives! no longer now." His hymns, often too didactic, were at their best full of rational piety. JOHN S. ANDREWS

GENERAL ASSOCIATION OF REGULAR BAPTISTS. Founded by twenty-two churches withdrawing from the Northern Baptist Convention in protest against modernism in 1932, the association adopted the New Hampshire Confession of Faith (1832) with a premillennial interpretation to the final article. Strictly congregational in church government, the association has grown to well over 200,000 members and is served by a Council of Eighteen. Various missions agencies and six institutions of higher learning are approved.

See AMERICAN BAPTIST CHURCHES.

GENERAL BAPTISTS, see BAPTISTS

GENERAL CHAPTER. The meeting of a religious order to determine policy for the organization and especially to elect new leaders. Although the orders vary widely in the frequency, functions, and powers accorded to the general chapter, it is generally composed of heads and representatives of the constituent communities, convoked every three or four years, and constituted as the highest authority in the order under the pope, although in some cases the head is not bound by its decrees. The institution only became standard with the Cistercians—who established an annual general chapter of all abbots as the ultimate authority within the order—and was made mandatory for all orders by the Fourth Lateran Council. MARY E. ROGERS

GENERAL CONFESSION. A set form of confession suitable for all persons and all occasions and in the Book of Common Prayer* used at the beginning of Morning Prayer and Evening Prayer. The rubric directs that it is to be said by the whole congregation, after the minister, kneeling. It is based on Romans 7:8-25 and consists of a confession of sin to God, a prayer for forgiveness, and a prayer for grace to live rightly. It dates from the revised Prayer Book of 1552 and may have been suggested by the Confession in the Strasbourg Liturgy.

GENERAL COUNCILS, see ECUMENICAL COUNCILS

GENERAL SUPERINTENDENT. Formerly the highest ecclesiastical office in many German Protestant churches, exercising authority in conjunction with the provincial consistory and synod. It was purely ecclesiastical, not being confirmed by the state. Numbers would vary in different provinces, e.g., four in Brandenburg, three in Saxony. In the west the title was replaced by that of "Präses," and in the east the bishop of Berlin has been set over them. It has also been an office among British Baptists since 1916, having pastoral and administrative care of areas in the country in an advisory capacity. It recalls the "Messenger" of the seventeenth-century General Baptists.

J.G.G. NORMAN

GENERAL SYNOD (of the Church of England). In 1969 the Synodical Government Measure replaced the Church Assembly with the General Synod, and transferred to the latter some of the Convocation* responsibilities. Like its predecessor, the synod consists of three houses: bishops (the two archbishops and all diocesan bishops), clergy (some ex officio, some elected by clergy on a diocesan basis), and laity (almost entirely elected by laity on a diocesan basis, with a few coopted). Under Parliament (so long as the Church of England remains by law established) the synod is the Church of England's central legislative body, meeting normally three times a year for week long sessions, and occasionally meeting separately by houses. It is elected (except for bishops who are all ex officio) by proportional representation on a diocesan basis, though the option of subdivision into smaller units has led to great diversity between dioceses and in some cases to the total annulment in practice of the proportional system which was designed to protect minorities.

Church assembly was set up by Parliament in 1919 by the Enabling Act, with elections every five years. Church assembly prepared measures for parliamentary approval, after which they became part of English law. The assembly rarely clashed with Parliament except on the famous 1928 draft Prayer Book, which Parliament twice rejected on doctrinal grounds. This action infuriated many bishops and a large number of High Churchmen. Evangelicals and some other High Churchmen were, on the other hand, relieved that doctrinal innovations had not been forced on the church. Later it was clear that Parliament saved the Church of England from the folly of most of its then leaders, and the 1954 Church and State Report recognized that many clergy and laity still believe that Parliament is a more reliable and impartial judge than the assembly, and perhaps even the new synod.

The general synod is much smaller than the church assembly and has been widely advocated as "bringing the laity in more." Those laymen who have observed it closely are more inclined to regard it in terms of bureaucratic streamlining designed to minimize opposition from powerful minorities (such as defeated the Anglican-Methodist union scheme) and to concentrate effective power and control in the hands of a few people.

G.E. DUFFIELD

GENEVA BIBLE. A 1560 translation of the Bible into English popularly known as the "Breeches Bible" from its rendering of Genesis 3:7 ("They made themselves breeches"—AV "aprons"). It was translated at Geneva by a committee of Protestant exiles which probably included William Whittingham and John Knox. Its Calvinistic annotations greatly irritated James I of England, but delighted and instructed his increasingly Puritan subjects. Used widely for two generations, it became the official version of the Scottish Kirk and the household Bible of English-speaking Protestants everywhere. Gradually replaced by the Authorized Version of 1611, the last Geneva Bible was published in 1644.

ROBERT D. LINDER

GENEVAN ACADEMY. This was founded in 1559 under the influence of John Calvin,* who believed that one of the great needs of the Reformed church was an educational institution that would prepare not only ministers to preach the Gospel, but men who could take their place as Christians in every walk of life. Influenced by the example of Martin Bucer and John Sturm in Strasbourg, he desired to extend the public school established in 1537 to cover the whole course of education. This he succeeded in doing in 1559, at which time Theodore Beza* became the first rector, along with three other professors. Joint control over the institution was exercised by ecclesiastical and civil authorities, although the basic law emanated from the mind of Calvin. One important characteristic of the academy was the emphasis upon the use of French as well as Latin. Physical science and mathematics also became part of the standard curriculum. In the faculty of theology, biblical studies were fundamental although much attention was also paid to preaching. From the academy in the years following its foundation many leaders of the Reformation in other countries such as France, Hungary, Holland, England, and Scotland went out to carry on the Calvinistic tradition.

See C. Borgeaud, Histoire de l'Université de Genève, (1900), I; W.S. Reid, "Calvin and the Founding of the Academy of Geneva," Westminster Theological Journal, XVIII (1955), pp. 1ff.

W.S. REID

GENEVAN CATECHISM. The first Genevan Catechism was drawn up by John Calvin in 1537, originally French and then translated into Latin. It would seem, however, to have been verbose and not easily memorized. Consequently, after his return from exile in Strasbourg in 1541, at the request of a number of people including some of the ministers of East Friesland, Calvin produced another which had a more catechetical form with crisper phrases more easily learned. Again written in French and then translated into Latin, this work sought to set forth the basic doctrines of the Christian faith. At the same time a schedule was prepared indicating how it could be learned and recited over a period of fifty-five weeks. This catechism was adopted by the French Reformed Church and in translation was used as the Scottish Church's catechism until it accepted the Westminster Catechisms in 1648. The best modern edition is in Calvin, Theological Treatises (ed. J.K.S. Reid, 1954). W.S. REID

GENEVIÈVE (Genovefa) (c.422-500). A virgin of Paris, and the city's patron saint. As a child she is said to have attracted the attention of Germanus of Auxerre and at his instigation devoted herself to a life of asceticism. From her fifteenth until her fiftieth year she ate only twice a week, and then only barley bread. Thereafter, at the command of the bishop, she added fish and milk to her diet. The diversion from Paris of the Huns under Attila in 451 was attributed to her prayers.

GENNADIUS I (d.471). Patriarch of Constantinople. While a member of a monastery in Constantinople, he wrote against the anathemas of Cyril of Alexandria during the Nestorian controversy. On the death of Anatolius in 458, Leo the Thracian made him patriarch. After a synod in Constantinople in 459 he tried to heal the schism which followed the Council of Chalcedon (451) by action as well as by sending an encyclical to his bishops and clergy. He wrote a number of biblical commentaries, e.g., on Genesis and Daniel, but parts of these only survive within catenae. A letter from Pope Leo to him is extant (ep. 170). In the East he is regarded as a saint.

GENNADIUS II, see GEORGE SCHOLARIUS

GENNADIUS OF MARSEILLES (d.496). Ecclesiastical historian. He is best known for his work de Viris Illustribus, which contains 101 short but useful and generally accurate biographies of ecclesiastics between 392 and 495, and thus provides a continuation of Jerome's work of the same name. In its commonly accepted form there is evidence of a second hand. The laudatory account of Jerome at the beginning of the book, for example, seems inconsistent with the hostile references to him in the biography of Rufinus. A presbyter, Gennadius seems to have been semi-Pelagian, as he censures Augustine and Prosper and praises Faustus. On the other hand, in his other work, Epistola de Fide mea or de Ecclesiasticus Dogmatibus Liber, while the freedom of man's will is strongly asserted, the beginning of goodness is assigned to divine grace. The work was long included among those of Augustine.
DAVID JOHN WILLIAMS

GENUFLEXION. In Roman Catholicism the momentary bending of the right knee so as to touch the ground. The body is held erect and the sign of the cross is made. In the Western Church this has largely superseded the profound bow which was general before the sixteenth century and which is still performed by some religious orders, and is almost universal in the Eastern Orthodox Churches. Genuflexion is used frequently in Roman Catholic Church ritual and is found also in the Anglo-Catholic wing of Anglicanism. A double genuflexion consists in kneeling on both knees, bowing the head and rising, and is made "before the Blessed Sacrament when it is exposed," according to a Roman Catholic source. Some early Christians who bent the knee only in sign of penance were known as "Genuflectentes."
J.D. DOUGLAS

GEORGE, BISHOP (c.640-724). Prominent Monophysite* church writer. After 676 he was chief bishop of Arab tribes in the Tigris and Euphrates area that were still Christian. Among his writings and works were a translation of Aristotle's Organon into Syriac, rhymed treatises on the sacraments, and treatments of patristic, dogmatic, exegetical, and astronomical questions in tracts and letters. He also completed the Hexameron begun by Jacob of Edessa.

GEORGE, MARGRAVE OF BRANDENBURG-ANSBACH (1484-1543). German prince and patron of the Reformation, also known as "George the Pious." A younger son in the Franconian branch of the Hohenzollern family, he had little prospect of succession and spent a long period of involvement in military ventures and family squabbles. In 1523 he gained possession of the principality of Jägerndorf in Silesia, where he brought in settlers and encouraged economic development. George also introduced the Reformation into both Jägerndorf and Ansbach, which he inherited in 1527 because of the unexpected death of his elder brother. He resisted the efforts of the Catholic king, Ferdinand I of Bohemia, to expel him from Silesia, and he stood firmly for Protestantism at the Diets of Speyer (1529) and Augsburg (1530). RICHARD V. PIERARD

GEORGE HAMARTOLOS (ninth century). Byzantine monk. He wrote a world chronicle (Chronicon Syntomon) from the Creation to the death of the Eastern emperor Theophilus in 842. It was not an original work, but an eclectic compilation whose main source was Theophanes Confessor (d.817). In turn, later writers borrowed from Hamartolos's chronicle, which had been continued up to 948 by another scribe, perhaps Simeon Metaphrastes. The work gives useful information on ninth-century monasticism, and though nothing is known about George's personal life, his chronicle reveals him as strongly anti-Iconoclast.

GEORGE OF CAPPADOCIA (d.361). Bishop of Alexandria. An Arian of the Acacian school (see ACACIUS), he was intruded into the see of Alexandria from 357, following Athanasius's flight the previous year. His arrival was accompanied by soldiers, and the cruelty that had earlier marked the eviction of the orthodox from their churches in favor of the Arians was now resumed by George. Nor was he disliked any less by the pagans of Alexandria, against whom his measures were equally violent. His tyranny ultimately brought about his death. In 358 he was rescued only with difficulty when a mob seized him. He was forced to flee and probably did not return for about a year. But when in 361 news of Julian's accession reached the city, a mob again seized him—and killed him some weeks later. Described by his enemies as unlearned, George nevertheless had an extensive library, according to Julian. Despite his cruelty, even his enemies conceded that he was a man of resolution and action.

DAVID JOHN WILLIAMS

GEORGE OF ENGLAND. Though nothing is known of his life, his authenticity is generally accepted. He is believed to have been martyred in the third century, probably at Lydda in Palestine. Mythical tales about George abound, and the best known of these is the story of "George and the Dragon." This later medieval tale from the "Golden Legend" of James of Voraigne really derives from Perseus's killing of the sea monster which threatened Andromeda. This event had supposedly occurred at Jaffa, near Lydda, and so George, through his connection with Lydda, inherited the tale. It has not been established why he became so popular in England. He was already known there in Anglo-Saxon times, and by 1222 his feast day was being celebrated. Edward III's famous Order of the Garter adopted George as its patron, and during that reign he became patron of England as well.

L. FEEHAN

GEORGE OF LAODICEA (d. probably after 360). A native of Alexandria, he was ordained presbyter by Alexander, but was later deposed by him for false doctrine and misconduct following an unsuccessful attempt to reconcile the Arians and the Catholics in Antioch. Eustathius would not receive him after this in Antioch, but when Eustathius was himself deposed, George was received there by the Arians. Later he succeeded the Arian Theodotus of Laodicea and as bishop took part in a number of councils opposed to Athanasius, who described George as one of the worst of the Arians. He was deposed by the Council of Sardica in 347 on the grounds that he had previously been deposed by Alexander, but he remained unaffected by the council's decision. A leading Arian, George played an important role in the Council of Seleucia in 359 which deposed the Anomoeans* Acacius and Eudoxius. He also wrote against heresies, particularly that of the Manichaeans.

DAVID JOHN WILLIAMS

GEORGE SCHOLARIUS (c.1400-c.1468). Patriarch of Constantinople. At first a teacher of philosophy, he became a civil court judge in Constantinople. At the Council of Florence (1439) he favored the scheme for reunion with Rome, but later became a bitter opponent, writing numerous works on the subject. He entered the Monastery of the Almighty and took the name of "Gennadius." In 1453 the Turks under Sultan Mohammed II took Constantinople; and Gennadius, now leader of the anti-union party, was appointed (as "Gennadius") patriarch with full confirmation of his rights over the Orthodox community in return for their political obedience. After two (or possibly five) years in office, he resigned and lived in the monastery of St. John Baptist at Seres in Macedonia until his death. Over 100 books are credited to him, including speeches, anti-Latin polemical works, translation of works by Aquinas, philosophical treatises, and many theological pieces, especially his Confession, an apologetic dialogue with Mohammed II.

HOWARD SAINSBURY

GEORGE SYNCELLUS (eighth/ninth century). Byzantine church historian. Almost nothing is known of his personal life except that he may have lived for a time in Palestine. He should not be confused with Syncellus of Tarasius, who was patriarch of Constantinople (784-806). He wrote a Chronicle which traces human history from Creation to the time of Diocletian (245-313). But the form in which the Chronicle is now preserved also contains an additional section probably by his friend Theophanes Confessor. The appendix covers the period 313-813. Although it does contain some original material, its value lies more as an illustrative piece of historiography than factual accuracy.

DONALD M. LAKE

GEORGIAN VERSION. The Georgians (called "Iberians" in antiquity) of the Caucasus were converted in the fourth century. Closely linked with Armenia at first, they at length separated in A.D. 608/9, adhering to the Chalcedonian orthodoxy of the Greek Church. We have evidence that at least parts of the Scriptures were known in Georgian in the fifth century, although our earliest MSS date from the sixth or seventh only. The earliest form of the gospels is known in the Adysh MS of 897, whose text shows clear signs of translation from Armenian. As with the Armenian version, this has earlier links with Syriac traditions and the Diatessaron.

Earlier fragmentary MSS in the archaic forms of Georgian known as han-meti and hae-meti contain many parts of the Old and New Testaments: where comparison is possible we find that these reveal textually a revised form, to some extent corrected to a Greek standard. In the gospels this is related to the so-called Caesarean Text* and the quotations of Origen and Eusebius. In the earliest forms of the OT, a Lucianic text is seen; some traces of the versions of Aquila and Symmachus are also known in marginal notes. In the tenth century and later, Georgian monks on Mt. Athos (Euthymius, George the Hagiorite, Ephrem Mcire) produced revised versions of various parts of the Bible upon which the editions current later depend. In the nineteenth century, however, Russian influence debased the version, which has only recently been freed from this corruption. Revelation was not translated until the tenth century, and Maccabees until the eighteenth.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: M. Tarchnishvili, Geschichte der kirkchlichen georgischen Literatur (1955); L. Leloir, "(Versions) Orientales de la Bible," Dictionnaire de la Bible, Supplement VI (1960); J.N. Birdsall, "A Georgian Palimpsest in Vienna," Orientens Christianus 53 (1969), pp. 108-113.

J.N. BIRDSALL

GERALD DE BARRI (1147-1223). Archdeacon of Brecon. Born Giraldus Cambrensis of the Welsh royal family, he originated in Pembrokeshire, and studied and lectured at Paris before becoming archdeacon in 1175. He went again to Paris to read theology, civil and canon law, was made royal chaplain in 1184, and preached the Third Crusade in Wales in 1188. He made expeditions to Ireland, accompanying Henry II's son John. He produced his Topographia Hibernica and Expugnatio Hibernica and then, having obtained no preferment, retired in 1189 to pray and study in Lincoln. He wrote an autobiography, and his complete works were published in eight volumes in 1861-91. He was buried in St. David's Cathedral. C.G. THORNE, JR.

GERARD OF ZUTPHEN (Gerard Zerbolt) (1367-1398). Associated with the early history of the Brethren of the Common Life,* he was born in Zutphen, the Netherlands, and as a youth was a pupil of the Brethren's founder, G. Groote (d.1384). An able scholar, he studied at the University of Paris, but then returned to Deventer, the headquarters of the movement. There, though in his twenties, he was highly valued as a spiritual adviser. He wrote several treatises on religion and ethics during the 1390s, stressing the value of love, the spiritual ascent of the soul to God, and the imitation of Christ. Best known are De reformatione virium animae and De spiritualibus ascensionibus. Gerard's writings were doubtless known by and an influence on Thomas à Kempis* and his Imitation of Christ. Gerard died of plague at an early age. DIRK JELLEMA

GERBILLON, JEAN-FRANÇOIS (1654-1707). Jesuit* missionary to China. Born in Verdun, France, he became a Jesuit in 1670 and taught humanities for seven years before going to China as a missionary. Sent to found a French mission there, he and a colleague, Bouvet, found favor with the emperor, Kang-Hi, with whom they shared Western scientific achievements, and who advanced in turn the mission's aims. Gerbillon was used for many scientific and diplomatic services and made extensive journeyings. He was in charge of the French college in Peking, then became superior-general of the mission. In 1692 he received an edict granting freedom for Christianity, and the emperor presented a site for a chapel and residence in gratitude for the personal kindness shown toward him by Gerbillon and Bouvet. Gerbillon was the author of several mathematical works; he wrote also accounts of his travels, and on philosophy and linguistics. He died in Peking. C.G. THORNE, JR.

GERHARD, JOHANN (1582-1637). Lutheran theologian. Born at Quedlinburg, he studied at the universities of Wittenberg, Jena, and Marburg, entered the service of Duke Casimir of Coburg whose churches he was commissioned to reorder, but was released in 1616 to become a professor at Jena. Here he joined with Johann Major and Johann Himmel; the three distinguished teachers became known as the "Trias Johannea." Though afterwards employed on numerous ecclesiastical, political, and diplomatic matters by a number of German princes, he devoted most of his time to scholarship. His Confessio Catholica (1634-37) was a strong defense of the evangelical faith, and his Loci Theologici (1610-22) are regarded as the climax of the Lutheran dogmatic theology. His fifty-one devotional Meditations written in 1606 were deservedly popular and were translated into English in 1627, a selection of fourteen of the same being reprinted in English as late as 1846. IAN SELLERS

GERHARDT, PAUL(US) (1607-1676). German hymnwriter. Born in Saxony, he studied at Wittenberg and spent some years as a tutor in Berlin. In 1651, already middle-aged, he became a Lutheran pastor at Mittenwalde. In 1657 he was appointed to the St. Nicolaikirche in Berlin. Here he won esteem as a preacher. An uncompromising Lutheran, he refused to accept even tacitly Friedrich Wilhelm I's edict restricting freedom of speech on disputed points between Lutherans and Calvinists. In 1668 he became archdeacon of Lübben where, as a widower with one surviving child out of five, he remained until his death. Among German hymnwriters he ranks second only to Luther. About one-third of his 133 hymns, first published in the collections of J. Crüger, are still sung in Germany. They mark the transition from the confessional to the devotional type of hymnody: cf. Luther's "Ein feste Burg" with Gerhardt's "Befiehl du deine Wege," which John Wesley translated as "Commit thou all thy griefs." Other translations include "All my heart this night rejoices" (Winkworth); "Jesu, Thy boundless love to me" (Wesley); "O Sacred Head! now wounded" (J.W. Alexander), a paraphrase of "Salve caput cruentatum"; and "The duteous day now closeth" (Bridges). JOHN S. ANDREWS

GERHART, EMANUEL VOGEL (1817-1904). American Reformed theologian. He studied at Marshall College (1836-38) and the Theological Seminary of the Reformed Church in Mercersburg. Ordained in 1842, he served parishes in Pennsylvania and Ohio. He was elected president of Heidelberg College, and professor of systematic theology at the Reformed Seminary in Tiffin, Ohio (1851-55). He became the first president of Franklin and Marshall College (1855-68), resigning in 1868 to become the successor of Henry Harbaugh as professor of systematic theology at Mercersburg. Editor and contributor to the Reformed Church Review (from 1854), his most important works were the Triglot edition of the Heidelberg Catechism (1863) and a general systematic theology, The Institutes of the Christian Religion (1891, 1894).
DAVID C. STEINMETZ

GERHOH OF REICHERSBERG (1093-1169). Prominent Augustinian and a leading advocate of Gregorian reforms in Germany. Born in Bavaria, he was scholasticus of the cathedral school in Augsburg (1119), but came into conflict with his simoniacal bishop, Hermann, and was forced in 1121 to surrender his post. Later reconciled to his bishop, he advised him at the First Lateran Council (1123), summoned by Callistus II to confirm the Concordat of Worms. Gerhoh attempted unsuccessfully to persuade the council to adopt his program for the reform of the secular clergy through the introduction of communal life. He returned in 1124 to Germany and entered the cloister of the Augustinian Canons* Regular in Rottenbuch. He reformed the rule of the Canons and explained his ideas in Liber de aedificio Dei (1130). As provost of the Canons Regular (Reichersberg, 1132), he traveled widely and established friendly relations with Bernard of Clairvaux.* Always a champion of theological orthodoxy—though libeled by many opponents of his reforms as a heretic—he attacked the Christology of Peter Abelard and Gilbert de la Porrée. His views on the relation of imperial and papal power were summarized in his treatise, De Investigatione Antichristi (1161), an essay which did not endear him to Frederick I, whom he further alienated in 1166 because of his unwillingness to support an imperialist antipope.

DAVID C. STEINMETZ

GERMAN BAPTISTS, see CHURCH OF THE BRETHREN

GERMAN-CHRISTIANS (Deutsche Christen). The so-called German Christian Church which at first reflected the ecclesiastical policies of the Nazi dictatorship. After World War I, nationalist and racist traditions of the nineteenth-century German Protestantism expressed themselves in a number of movements. With the rise of Adolf Hitler they achieved great influence in the church, often by force. At one extreme there were those who made a pagan religion of German blood and destiny, hostile to traditional Christianity (German Faith Movement); while on the other side the Faith Movement of the German-Christians, supported by theologians of the stature of Emanuel Hirsch and (for a time) Friedrich Gogarten,* believed that God was calling the church through the contemporary German situation to be again the church of the German people, with a living faith freed from a dead and alien past and with the organizational unity of a Reichskirche under one Reichsbischof. In this way it might be seen as a nationalist exploitation of liberal theology; its rejection of the OT and the Jewish element in Christianity was perhaps not unrelated. Nazi support for the German-Christians waned after 1934, though it was sufficient to keep many in their official positions. They had failed to realize that Hitler did not wish the Nazi state to be complemented by a nazified but still influential Christian church.

HADDON WILLMER

GERMANUS (Germain) (c.496-576). Bishop of Paris. Born at Autun, he was ordained priest in 530 and later became abbot of the monastery of St. Symphorian at Autun. In 555 he succeeded Eusebius as bishop of Paris, and from this position seems to have exercised considerable influence over Childebert, whose edict against pagan revelries on holy days is probably due to him. Germanus's influence may also be seen in Childebert's building of the Church of St. Vincent, in which Germanus was later buried. It then became the Church of St.-Germain-des-Prés. Germanus was present at the third council of Paris (555), the second council of Tours (566), and the fourth council of Paris (573). A treatise on the old Gallic Liturgy is attributed to him, as is a privilege exempting the monastery of St. Symphorian from episcopal jurisdiction, but in both cases his authorship has been disputed.

DAVID JOHN WILLIAMS

GERMANUS (c.634-c.733). Patriarch of Constantinople. Son of noble Byzantine parents, he became associated about 668 with the church of St. Sophia; later he became primate of the church and patriarch from 715 to 730. Some mystery surrounds his position regarding the Monothelite controversy and the Sixth Ecumenical Council (680-81). Under pressure he may have rejected the declarations against the heresy, but if he did, there is good indication that he returned to the Chalcedonian christological formula later, since one of his first acts as patriarch was to condemn the Monothelites.* When the Iconoclastic Controversy* began to surface about 725 (the emperor Leo III issued his edict against the veneration of icons) Germanus opposed the emperor's decree and was finally forced to leave his office. He then went to Platonium, where he spent the remaining three years probably writing.

Due to his conflicts with the emperors, most of his writings have been destroyed; however, his De Haeresibus et Synodis is extant. He may also be the author of the Historia Mystica Ecclesiae Catholicae, a liturgical work which includes several poems. His keen interest in the Virgin Mary can be seen in his seven homilies on her virtues and role in salvation. His part in the Iconoclastic Controversy is indicated by four surviving letters. Germanus is unusual as he reflects the influence of Western Christianity upon the Eastern Church at a time when the two sections of the church were being driven apart by ecclesiastical, political, and cultural issues.

For his extant works see J.P. Migne, Patrologia Graeca, vol. 98, pp. 9-454. DONALD M. LAKE

GERSON, JEAN CHARLIER DE (1363-1429). French theologian and church leader. He entered the University of Paris in 1377 and succeeded his friend and teacher Pierre d'Ailly* as chancellor in 1395. Schooled in the Nominalism of William of Ockham, he yet resisted its potential speculative and skeptical excesses. Strongly interested in practical Christian living, he sought to curb academic intellectualism by lecturing on mysticism and the spiritual life in the university; at the same time, he wrote against popular superstition and irrational enthusiasm. Such a man was naturally pained by the Great Schism.* At first he sought to moderate the hostility of factions in the church, but eventually he came to throw the authority of the leading university in Christendom behind a more radical cure for the schism. Disillusioned by the failure of the papal leadership, he held that in an emergency canon law could be set aside; in particular he followed Henry Langenstein in insisting that the pope was not absolute, but must be understood as the head, and so as part, of the body, the church, i.e., the totality of the faithful, and existing for the sake of the church. From this followed the revolutionary step, that the body has the right to call a failing head to account. So he took part in the Council of Pisa (1409) and the Council of Constance (1415-17) which burnt Hus and deposed three popes to end the schism. In all this, Gerson acted as the man of traditional order; the law could only be set aside in order to maintain the spirit of the law. His views were set out in De potestate ecclesiastica, (1416-17).

His concern for social order and morality was to be seen in his hostility to the priest John Petit, who wrote a tract on tyrannicide in order to justify the action of the Burgundian faction in France. Gerson secured the condemnation of Petit at Constance, but since the Burgundian party gained dominance at that time, his return to Paris after the council was impossible, and he ended his days in exile. As one of the chief theorists of the Conciliar Movement, Gerson has considerable importance in the history of the doctrine of the church and of Christian political thinking.

HADDON WILLMER

GERTRUDE THE GREAT (1256-c.1302). German mystic. Born at Eisleben, she was brought up from the age of five and educated in the Black Benedictine nunnery of Heltfa, Thuringia. She had her first mystical experience in 1281 and from then on led a life of contemplation. Her Legatus Divinae Pietatis is a classic of Christian mysticism. She was one of the first exponents of the devotion to the Sacred Heart. She also wrote Exercitia Spiritualia, a collection of prayers. She was never formally canonized, yet her cult was first authorized in 1606 and extended to the entire Roman Catholic Church by Clement XIII (1738). She is patroness of the West Indies.

GERVASIUS and PROTASIUS. Two brothers and protomartyrs of Milan of whom nothing certain is known. When Ambrose was about to consecrate his new church, he discovered (386) the burial place of the two in the Church of Sts. Felix and Nabor. This greatly encouraged the orthodox and discomfited the Arians, for whom Empress Justina was demanding a church in Milan at this time. The remains of the two brothers were intact, but with their heads severed. The protomartyrs were reburied two days later under the altar of the new church. A number of miracles were attributed to them. How Ambrose discovered their burial place is not clear. He says he acted on "a presentiment" (cuiusdam ardor praesagii), but as custodian of the church records his presentiment may have had some basis of knowledge.

DAVID JOHN WILLIAMS

GESENIUS, HEINRICH FRIEDRICH WILHELM (1786-1842). German Orientalist and biblical scholar. Born at Nordhausen, Hanover, he received theological training at Helmstedt and Göttingen, and was professor of theology at Halle from 1811. He concentrated on problems of Semitic philology, becoming the most outstanding Hebraist of his generation. His chief work was Hebräisches und Chäldaisches Handwörterbuch (1810-12), which passed through several editions and was the basis of the Hebrew lexicon of Brown, Driver, and Briggs (1906). In 1813 he published the first edition of his Hebrew grammar, edited and enlarged by E. Kautzsch (1899 onward; ET by A.E. Cowley, 1910). He wrote a commentary on Isaiah (1820-21), and his monumental Thesaurus philologico-criticus linguae Hebraeae et Chaldaeae Veteris Testamenti (1829-58) was completed after his death by his pupil E. Rödiger.

J.G.G. NORMAN

GESS, WOLFGANG FRIEDRICH (1819-1891). German theologian. He studied at Tübingen where he came under the influence of F.C. Baur* and J.T. Beck.* After serving as assistant minister to his father, he taught at the missionary college, Basle (1850). He became a professor at Göttingen (1864), where he was a colleague of Ritschl,* then moved to Breslau (1871). He became general superintendent of the province of Posen (1880), but retired early for health reasons. Gess came from the Württemberg pietism which stressed biblical theology and Christian experience, but which adopted a looser attitude toward biblical inspiration. He was a leading exponent of kenotic Christology which sought to explain the union of Christ's full humanity with true divinity by positing a self-emptying of the latter (Gr. kenosis) in the Incarnation. The theory was based on an interpretation of Philippians 2:5ff., as a key to explaining the orthodox view of Christ's divinity in the light of His evident humanity in the gospels and modern criticism.

Gess's chief works were Lehre von der Person Christi (1856), Christi Selbstzeugnis (1870), Das apostolische Zeugnis von Christi Person und Werk (1878-79), Das Dogma von Christi Person und Werke (1887), and Die Inspiration der Helden der Bibel und der Schriften der Bibel (1891).

COLIN BROWN

GESUATI. A congregation of laymen founded by Giovanni Colombini* about 1360, devoted to prayer, mortification, and charitable works. Officially Clerici apostolici S. Hieronymi, their popular name arose from their frequent ejaculations of "Praised be Jesus" or "Hail Jesus" in preaching. Approved by Urban V (1367), they established monasteries and adopted a white tunic and grayish-brown cloak as habit. They spread throughout Italy and established houses in Toulouse (1425), but were dissolved by Clement IX in 1668 as having lost the spirit of their order. Their female counterpart, the "Jesuatesses" (Sisters of the Visitation of Mary), was founded about 1367 by Colombini's cousin, Catherine Colombini, and existed until 1872.

J.G.G. NORMAN

GEULINCX, ARNOLD (1624-1669). Philosopher. Born at Antwerp, he studied philosophy at Louvain, and taught there (1646-52) until dismissed for his sympathy for Jansenist teachings. He moved to Leyden in the Netherlands, and after a decade of poverty, during which he turned to Calvinism, became a lecturer at the university, and (in his early forties) then professor. He died not long after from the plague. His main works were Metaphysica (1651) and Ethica (1655). As a philosopher, starting with the sovereignty of God, he stressed submission to God's will as the main virtue, and in his metaphysics tried to reconcile sovereignty with man's apparent free will. Descartes* had not fully clarified the relation of soul and body (how can an immaterial soul influence material things?), and Geulincx elaborated on this question in an almost paradoxical manner. Since God is the sole cause of all events, second causes do not exist. God is thus the immediate cause of every event, and what we take to be causal relationships are illusory. Man's free will is also thus illusory, for if God is the immediate cause of every event, man cannot will events: he can only resolve to conform to God's causal will.

See Opera Philosophica (ed. J.P.N. Land, 3 vols., 1891-93). DIRK JELLEMA

GEYMONAT, PAOLO (1827-1907). Waldensian* evangelist and scholar. Born at Villar Pellice (Waldensian Valleys), he graduated from the theological school in Geneva and was ordained pastor in 1850. His earnest desire to spread the Gospel in Italy led him to work as an evangelist in Rome, Florence, Turin, and Genoa. In 1855 he was invited with G.P. Revel to start a Waldensian school of theology at Torre Pellice, a task which he carried out with success amid many difficulties. After the unification of most of Italy in 1860, he supported strongly and successfully the removal of the school to Florence, where he lectured until 1902. He then retired and resumed his work as evangelist, founding an autonomous church in Florence. Author of several treatises and articles, his theology, missionary zeal, and piety are typical of Le Réveil,* by which he was greatly influenced. He had a more conciliatory attitude than most Waldensians; he tried throughout his life to solve the conflict between the Waldensian Church with its rigid organization and the other Italian denominations. DAISY RONCO

GHÉON, HENRI (1875-1944). French Roman Catholic writer. Born at Bray-sur-Seine, son of a chemist, his real name was Henri Léon Vangeon. Educated at Sens and Paris, he became a doctor. He lost his faith in adolescence, regaining it on the death of his niece and friends (1914). He published a collection of verse, Chanson d'aube (1897), and was a founder of the Nouvelle Revue Française. His first play, Le Fils de M. Sage—Le Pain, a popular tragedy in verse, was performed in 1912. He devoted himself to developing a Christian theater, producing his own plays and founding a company of young Catholics, "Les Compagnons de Notre-Dame" (1924), and their successors, "Les Compagnons de Jeux" (1931). Many of his works had kinship with fifteenth-century miracle plays, having as subjects the lives of saints and other sacred themes, deliberately aimed at reproducing the atmosphere of medieval hagiography. He wrote biographies, novels, and a film script. J.G.G. NORMAN

GHETTOS. Streets or sections of a city where Jewish people were compelled to reside. In more modern parlance the compulsory character of the situation may be implicit. The church continually agitated for segregation of Jews, but this was not officially done until the Third and Fourth Lateran Councils (1179 and 1215). In 1555 Pope Paul IV insisted upon the enforcement of the principles of segregation. Ghettos were established in Italy, North Africa, the Germanic countries, E Europe, and most of W Europe. The Muslim countries also enforced a rigid ghetto system. Within the ghettos the Jews experienced considerable autonomy and religious freedom, and developed some local pride. Some ghettos were enclosed with walls, and the gates were kept locked at night and during church festivals. These conditions were abolished by the end of the nineteenth century in Europe and by 1917 in Russia with the fall of the czarist regime. They continued in N Europe until the founding of Israel in 1948.

The ghettos denoted a way of life which led the Jews to a paradoxical desire for freedom and the fear of being exposed to discrimination. A type of ethnic and racial mentality has existed and still does exist to some extent in the United States. Legislation has been passed, however, which discourages these patterns of living.

See also ANTI-SEMITISM.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: I. Zangwill, Children of the Ghetto (1894); L. Wirth, The Ghetto (1928); P. Freedman, "The Jewish Ghettos of the Nazi Era," in Jewish Social Studies, vol. XVI, no. 1 (1954). JOHN P. DEVER

GHIBELLINES, see GUELFS AND GHIBELLINES

GIBBON, EDWARD (1737-1794). English historian. Born in Surrey, the son of a parliamentarian, he was of independent means throughout his life. His Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire (7 vols., 1766-88; best edition by J.B. Bury) helped to make church history a critical discipline. In some ways his work is still unsurpassed. Friend of Voltaire, Diderot, and d'Alembert, Gibbon surveyed Roman history from the second to the fifteenth centuries from the point of view of the ironic humanism of the eighteenth century. He saw it as the story of the fall, through the progressive "triumph of religion and barbarism," from the intellectual freedom evidenced in classical literature. This theme was more fitting to the Western than to the Eastern Roman Empire, and Gibbon dealt less adequately with the latter. He did not believe in the supernatural and sought to explain the growth of Christianity naturalistically, on the principle that the religious is at least a phenomenon of human experience. He was always sharply aware how religious claims could cloak ambition, incredulity, and inhumanity, though he could respect genuine piety. HADDON WILLMER

GIBBONS, JAMES (1834-1921). Archbishop of Baltimore. Son of Irish immigrants, he rose from simple surroundings in Baltimore to become "the American Cardinal," the dominant Roman Catholic prelate in United States history. Appointed archbishop of Baltimore in 1877, and named cardinal in 1886, he led the nation's first archdiocese, and thus much of the American church, until his death. Although untalented as a writer and a thinker, he extended Catholic influence in an age of intense anti-Catholicism. Faced with a church that was glutted with non-English-speaking immigrants and a nation that feared aliens, he tried to prove that loyalty to Rome actually improved

American Catholic citizenship. His leadership, which fostered such institutions as the Catholic University of America and the National Catholic Welfare Conference, also created an "Americanism" which supported the established order and ignored some church traditions like the just war.
DARREL BIGHAM

GIBBONS, ORLANDO (1583-1625). English composer. Of a family distinguished in English music for several generations, he served as organist both of the Chapel Royal and of Westminster Abbey. He was the first great composer to write church music only for the Protestant rite in England. He wrote services in the cathedral style, preces, festival psalms, and both full and verse anthems. Like Byrd,* his secular works are characterized by a notable seriousness. "Hosanna to the Son of David" and "Almighty and everlasting God" are among his best-known and most performed anthems today.

GIBSON, EDMUND (1669-1748). Bishop of London. Educated at Bampton Grammar School and Oxford, he was successively domestic chaplain to Archbishop Tenison, archdeacon of Surrey, and bishop of Lincoln before moving to London. Offered the see of Canterbury, he declined. Gibson was distinguished in several fields; his huge work on English ecclesiastical law (1713) became a standard work of reference and earned for him the nickname "Dr. Codex." He was an enemy of ecclesiastical abuses, and though a Whig was a moderate High Churchman who strove to reconcile the Tory Power Clergy and the universities to the Hanoverian Succession. He was chief adviser to Walpole in church matters till they quarreled in 1736. He wrote fiercely against Deists and freethinkers, Catholics, intemperance, and Sabbath-breaking. Toward the Methodist revival he was at first sympathetic, but later he became a hostile critic. A patron of the arts, he tried to improve the academic standards of the universities and began the cataloging of the Lambeth Library.
IAN SELLERS

GICHTEL, JOHANN GEORGE (1638-1710). German mystic and theosophist. Born in Regensberg, he studied at Strasbourg, then in his twenties was attracted by the writings of Jakob Boehme,* broke with traditional Lutheranism, attacked the established churches, got into trouble with the authorities, and settled in Amsterdam (1668). Developing his own blend of mysticism, pietism, and theosophy, he stressed the "heavenly marriage" between the spiritual man and divine Wisdom, and founded the "Angelic Brethren" who renounced earthly marriage. He gained some following in N Germany. In 1682 he edited Boehme's complete writings (11 vols.). He had some influence on Gottfried Arnold,* also a critic of orthodoxy.
DIRK JELLEMA

GIDEONS INTERNATIONAL. An association of Christian business and professional men that grew out of a meeting between John Nicholson and Samuel Hill in Central Hotel, Boscobel, Wisconsin (1898). Participating in evening devotions, they discovered they shared a common Christian faith. The next year, with W.J. Knights, they organized an association of Christian traveling men, named the "Gideons," after the OT figure who led a small band of Israelites to victory over the Midianites (Judges 6—7). From this beginning the membership has grown to more than 42,000 in ninety countries. Their primary purpose is to win individuals to faith in Christ, particularly through the free distribution of Scripture. Distribution began in 1908; copies of the Bible and NT were placed without cost in public places such as hotel rooms, and in the hands of school children, prisoners, nurses, soldiers, and others. The work is supported primarily by voluntary offerings received in local churches. By 1971 more than eleven million Bibles and ninety-one million New Testaments in some thirty-two languages had been distributed. A monthly organ, The Gideon, is published.
ALBERT H. FREUNDT, JR.

GIESELER, JOHANN KARL LUDWIG (1792-1854). German Protestant church historian. Born in Petershagen in Westphal, he was educated at Halle, and in 1819 was called to a chair of theology at the University of Bonn, where he became a colleague of K.I. Nitzsch.* His earliest book, Historisch-kritischer Versuch über die Entstehung der Evangelien (1818), attempted to examine the oral tradition on which the synoptic gospels are based. In 1831 he was appointed professor of church history and doctrine at the University of Göttingen, succeeding G.J. Planck. Gieseler was co-founder of the journal of the Vermittlungstheologie, the Theologische Studien und Kritiken (1828). His most important publication was his Lehrbuch der Kirchengeschichte (5 vols., 1824-57), valued by Hase and Bauer for its rich documentation.
DAVID C. STEINMETZ

GILBERT OF SEMPRINGHAM (c.1083-1189). Founder of the Gilbertine Order. Son of a Norman knight who had come over with the Conqueror, Gilbert as parish priest of Sempringham encouraged seven women to adopt the Cistercian Rule and with the support of the king and many nobles formed a number of houses which, however, the authorities at Cîteaux refused in 1148 to incorporate. Accordingly he arranged for them to be supervised by Augustinian Canons, and thus were born the curious "mixed" Gilbertine communities, the only purely English order. There were nine houses at the time of Gilbert's death, and twenty-five at the Dissolution of the Monasteries under Henry VIII.
IAN SELLERS

GILES OF ROME (c.1243/47-1316). Theologian and philosopher. After studies at the Paris house of the Augustinian Hermits, he read theology under Aquinas in the University of Paris. From 1285 to 1291 he was the first Augustinian master in theology there. He was a prodigious writer. In 1287 the order prescribed that his teaching be followed in its schools. He became its general in 1292. As tutor to Philip IV of France he wrote De Regimine principum; as archbishop of Bourges from 1295 his De Renuntiatione papae upheld the validity of Celestine V's abdication and Boniface VIII's election. He later sided with Boniface in a quarrel with Philip, writing De ecclesiastica potestate (1301/2) which inspired Boniface's Unam Sanctam (1302). In papal theocracy he saw fulfillment of Augustine's City of God ideal, the theology of which he defended. A witness for Aquinas's thought, though differing appreciably on some issues, Giles also commented on Aristotle's and Peter Lombard's works, and produced exegetical writings on Paul's letters and John's gospel. C.G. THORNE, JR.

GILL, JOHN (1697-1771). Baptist minister and biblical scholar. Born in Northamptonshire and educated at Kettering grammar school, he was ordained in 1718, and in 1719 entered upon a pastorate at Horsleydown, Southwark, that was to last over fifty years. A Wednesday evening lectureship was founded for him in Great Eastcheap by his admirers in 1729, and this he held until 1756. A profound scholar and voluminous writer, his works include The Doctrine of the Trinity Stated and Vindicated (1731); An Exposition of the New Testament (3 vols., 1746-48) which with his Exposition of the Old Testament (6 vols. 1748-63) forms his major work; A Dissertation on the Antiquity of the Hebrew Language (1767); A Body of Doctrinal Divinity (1767); and A Body of Practical Divinity (1770). A hyper-Calvinist, he was so zealous to maintain the sovereignty of God that he denied that preachers had the right "to offer Christ" to unregenerate sinners.

ROBERT G. CLOUSE

GILLESPIE, GEORGE (1613-1649). Scottish minister. Son of the manse, he was ordained in 1638 by Kirkcaldy Presbytery to the parish of Wemyss, despite the disapproval of the archbishop of St. Andrews (who was that year ejected with other bishops when thoroughgoing Presbyterianism was restored to Scotland). Gillespie became one of the ministers of Edinburgh in 1641, a chief apologist for the National Covenant,* a participant in the Westminster Assembly, and the champion against English opposition of the place of the elder in the kirk and of the Presbyterian system of church courts. Though a victim of chronic ill health culminating in his early death, he was one of the most learned and prolific of the Covenanter writers. His chief work, Aaron's Rod Blossoming (1646), a comprehensive study of the Erastian controversy in the light of Scripture, so stung the Episcopalians that when they regained ascendancy in 1661 they had his tombstone "solemnly broken" by the public hangman at Kirkcaldy.

J.D. DOUGLAS

GILLESPIE, THOMAS (1708-1774). Scottish minister. Trained under Philip Doddridge at Northampton, friend of Jonathan Edwards, and minister of the country parish of Carnock in Fife, he was deposed by the Church of Scotland general assembly in 1752 for refusing to take part in a "forced settlement" at Inverkeithing. Supported by the large congregation that built his Dunfermline church, he stood alone for nine years, being then joined by two other ministers, one of them Thomas Boston's son. Passing into history as the founder of the Relief denomination, Gillespie sponsored the first Presbyterian body in Scotland to espouse the cause of foreign missions, and to open its pulpits to all ministers of Christ and its communion table to all believers. "The Relief" joined with "the Secession" in 1847 to form the United Presbyterian Church of Scotland.

D.P. THOMSON

GILMOUR, JAMES (1843-1891). Scottish missionary to Mongolia. Born in Glasgow, he studied at Glasgow University and in Congregationalist theological colleges, and left in 1870 for Mongolia to reopen under the London Missionary Society work that had long been in abeyance. After language study in Peking he went on to Krechta, where in order to learn the Mongol language and customs he went to live in a tent on the plains, preferring to reach the nomads rather than the settled Chinese-speaking agriculturists whom his seniors advised him to evangelize. With indomitable perseverance, and despite an almost total lack of response from all except the Chinese, Gilmour persisted in his task for fifteen years in the face of adverse criticism. His custom was to winter in Peking, where also he sought to reach the Mongols. His last years were spent among the agriculturists. Promised colleagues failed to materialize, and his was a lonely, hard, self-sacrificing task, with seemingly little effect made on Mongolian Buddhism. LESLIE T. LYALL

GILPIN, BERNARD (1517-1583). Anglican divine. Born in Westmorland, he was educated at Queen's College, Oxford, and became thereafter a student at Christ Church. At first he had no inclination toward the Reformed faith, and disputed against John Hooper and Peter Martyr, but during the reign of Edward VI, while continuing to attack changes in and neglect of the externals of worship, he proceeded slowly toward the Reformed position. From 1552 to 1556 he resided in France, but returned home when he was presented by his great-uncle, the easy-going Bishop Tunstall of Durham, to the living first of Easington and then of Houghton-le-Spring. Now began his lifelong series of missionary tours and his social and educational work among the neglected masses which earned him the title "Apostle of the North." Arrested in 1558, he would undoubtedly have perished in the flames but for Queen Mary's timely death. Gilpin accepted Elizabeth's religious settlement, albeit with some hesitation, his most significant example being followed by most of the clergy of the north. In the 1570s the growing Puritan party made approaches to him, but his innate conservatism precluded active support. To the end he continued his tours, denouncing ecclesiastical scandals and arousing hostility.

IAN SELLERS

GILSON, ÉTIENNE HENRY (1884- ). Roman Catholic philosopher. Son of a Paris merchant, he studied at the Sorbonne and the Collège de France, and taught philosophy at Lille (1913), Strasbourg (1919), the Sorbonne (1921), and the Collège de France (1932). He lectured at Harvard (1926-28) and in 1929 became director of the Pontifical Institute of Medieval Studies, University of Toronto. He retired in 1951. An outstanding medievalist, he produced works on Descartes, Thomas Aquinas, Bonaventure, Francis, Augustine, Bernard, and Duns Scotus, but he produced also broad interpretative essays concerned with the whole of the medieval mind. These included L'Esprit de la philosophie médiévale (1931-32), Reason and Revelation in the Middle Ages (1939), God and Philosophy (1941), and History of Christian Philosophy in the Middle Ages (1955). In addition to later philosophical studies, his retirement years have seen also publications that reflect his interest in and knowledge of the fine arts. CLYDE CURRY SMITH

GIOBERTI, VINCENZO (1801-1852). Italian philosopher and statesman. Born in Turin, he was ordained priest at the age of twenty-four and was soon known for his great scholarship, leading to his appointment as professor in the theological school of Turin University. Suspected and hated for his liberal ideas, he was imprisoned and exiled to Paris in 1833. In exile his published work praised Italy and its civilization, and at the same time exhorted Italians to strive for unity and join in a confederation under papal leadership ("Neo-Guelphism"). The impact and success of his writings were great, and Pius IX's liberal policies seemed to confirm Gioberti's expectations. He returned to Turin, was elected member of parliament, and became prime minister of Piedmont during the first war of independence. Back in Paris after the Piedmontese defeat, disillusioned by the pope's volte-face and the waning of his utopian federation, he wrote a work that condemned the pope's temporal power and advocated the unity of Italy under the new Piedmontese king, Victor Emmanuel II, and his minister Cavour. His latter writings suggest the necessity of suppressing the papacy in order to renew the church.
DAISY RONCO

GIOTTO (c.1266-1337). Italian painter. A Florentine, he replaced the Byzantine cool distance of a majestic Christ with a Lord solemnly moving among men who experienced His presence. The frescoes in Padua confront an observer at real-life eye level. The saints wear golden halos but are crying, gesturing, intensely responsive; and their crowded compositional groupings bespeak daily life. The soft watercolor tones and limited range of color areas natural to fresco murals reinforce the quiet, tender simplicity of Giotto's interacting figures. Everyone about Christ assumes a kind of "sacred" (separated from the ordinary) solidity that is very "spiritually" real. Giotto antedates Boccaccio's secularizing spirit and critical developments like devotio moderna; he painted while the Divine Comedy was being written. But unlike Dante with his hell, purgatory, and heaven locations, Giotto presented Christ on firm earth. When painter Giotto was made head of the Florence Cathedral school in 1334, the appointment signaled the rising, formative influence of painting in a period (Gothic) previously dominated by stained-glass architecture and stone sculpture.
CALVIN SEERVELD

GIRALDUS CAMBRENSIS, see GERALD DE BARRI

GIRGENSOHN, KARL (1875-1925). Protestant religious psychologist. Born at Carmel auf Ösel, he was successively professor at Dorpat (1907), Greifenwald (1919), and Leipzig (1922). Concerned with the challenge of modern psychoanalysis to the Christian faith, he strove to establish the study of religious psychology on a firmly empirical basis, and in his most important work, The Spiritual Structure of Religious Experience (1921), he argued that religious experience is a synthesis of intuitive awareness of God and consciousness of self. The importance of his work was at once recognized in Germany, but far less readily in England and America. One of the leading architects of modern post-Freudian religious psychology, Girgensohn also wrote Foundations of Dogma (1924) and The Inspiration of Holy Scripture (1925) and founded the periodical Christentum und Wissenschaft (1925f.). IAN SELLERS

GLABRIO, MANIUS ACILIUS. A consul in 91, he was ordered by Emperor Domitian to fight with lions in the amphitheater at Albano, but having emerged successfully from this he was finally put to death. His execution may have been part of Domitian's general proceedings against people of senatorial rank whom he suspected of conspiring against him; but his implication in the charge of "Judaism and atheism" and the presence of his family crypt in the Cemetery of Priscilla, an early Christian burial place on the Via Salaria, suggest that he may have been put to death as a Christian.

GLADDEN, WASHINGTON (1836-1918). Liberal theologian and exponent of the Social Gospel. He received his college degree from Williams College and served churches in New York and Massachusetts from 1860 to 1882, except for some years as religious editor of the Independent. His main pastorate was at First Congregational, Columbus, Ohio, from 1882 to 1914. Here he applied Christ's teaching to social problems, upheld the rights of unions, favored profit sharing and industrial arbitration, and tried to have his denomination turn down a large gift from Standard Oil as "tainted money." He wrote the hymn "O Master, let me walk with Thee."

GLADSTONE, WILLIAM EWART (1809-1898). British prime minister. Son of a Liverpool merchant, he was educated at Eton and Oxford, distinguished himself in classics and mathematics, and would have entered the ministry had not his father, himself a member of Parliament, planned a political career for his son. He entered Parliament in 1832 and continued a member (with one brief interruption) until 1895. He was throughout a man of principle and humanity: his first speech was mainly an attack on slavery, and on many occasions he championed oppressed minorities, always aiming at a decision on moral grounds. He supported Catholic Emancipation, not because of religious indifference, but from principle. The Oxford Movement* greatly influenced him, and he opposed Archbishop Tait,* who wanted to abolish ritual. Gladstone nevertheless opposed the claims of Roman Catholicism. He knew his Bible and called one of his books The Impregnable Rock of Holy Scripture. P.W. PETTY

GLAGOLITIC. A system of forty alphabetic signs invented presumably by Cyril about A.D. 863 for writing Slavonic. Though reminiscent of some other alphabets, it is largely original. It was supplanted probably in the tenth century by the Cyrillic alphabet, the basis of modern alphabets for Russian, Bulgarian, Ukrainian, etc. Several important manuscripts survive written in these characters, two gospel manuscripts (Zographensis, Marianus), a lectionary (Assemanianus), psalter (Sinaiticum), prayer-book (Euchologium Sinaiticum), and fragments of homilies (Clozianus).

GLAS, JOHN (1695-1773). Founder of the Glasites, or Sandemanians.* Born in Scotland, he graduated from St. Andrews, pursued theological studies at Edinburgh, and became minister of the Angus parish of Tealing in 1719. There his able preaching rapidly increased his congregation. Later, while lecturing on the Shorter Catechism, it struck him that since Christ is king of the church, power cannot be exercised over it by the state or magistrates. These views led to his final deposition in 1730; on returning to his church he found it locked against him. He continued to preach in the nearby fields; most of his congregation remained loyal to him. Soon he moved to Dundee, and later to Perth where he met Robert Sandeman, who became his son-in-law, and where he was to minister in a church built by his followers.

Glas's writings are scholarly, kindly in spirit, and devout. He took the Bible more literally than most of his day: Christians were forbidden to eat blood or to store wealth; they should practice foot-washing and the holy kiss. Creeds and catechisms he regarded as useless: it was easier to learn from the Bible itself. Attempts to enforce uniformity in the church, or to permit domination by single individuals, he looked upon as utterly wrong. Glas's meek and gentle spirit ill befitted him to become leader of the sect he had unwittingly founded, and the role was taken over by the contentious and vigorous Sandeman. In old age Glas himself became bitter and controversial, as extant correspondence plainly shows.

See H. Escott, A History of Scottish Congregationalism (1960). R.E.D. CLARK

GLEGG, ALEXANDER LINDSAY (1882-1975). British lay evangelist. Born in London of Scottish parents, he trained as an electrical engineer at London University and subsequently became director of several companies. But while he worked hard in business, his great love was evangelism. Converted while at the Keswick Convention* as a young man, he soon became involved in mission work in Wandsworth, and for nearly fifty years was responsible for the ministry at Down Lodge Hall. He was a regular speaker at campaigns and conventions, and many thousands throughout the British Isles became Christians through his lucid and winsome presentation of the Gospel. He was known particularly for his Albert Hall meetings in the 1940s, his leading part in beginning the Christian holiday camp which annually draws thousands to Filey, and for his active support of numerous missionary societies. He encouraged many young evangelists, both spiritually and financially—and counseled them to play golf for their soul's good. Billy Graham is among those who acknowledge a great debt to Glegg who in his nineties was still preaching. His published works, which went all over the world, include Life with a Capital "L" and Four Score and More. J.D. DOUGLAS

GLOSSOLALIA. The term as such is not found in the Bible, though its hybrid form is built from glōssa and lalein which occur, e.g., in Acts 2:4. They are usually translated "speaking in tongues" (1 Cor. 12—14; Acts 2:3ff.; 10:46; 19:6; Mark 16:17). Apparently glossolalia is the spontaneous utterance of uncomprehended and seemingly random vocal sounds. It appears to describe a form of spiritually affected speaking which is of particular value to the individual. It has been (and is) a feature of religious, especially revivalist, activities at many periods of church history. It was not, however, until the late seventeenth century that the phenomenon occurred among numerous people of one locality. In S France the Cevenols, who lived in constant fear of death, had ecstatic experiences which included speaking in tongues. In the nineteenth century a second major outburst of tongue-speaking occurred in England, among the followers of Edward Irving* who himself strangely never "received" the gift of glossolalia. Aside from sporadic instances during these same centuries among the several revival movements in England and America, glossolalia was relatively infrequent until its phenomenal rise in connection with Pentecostalism.

Several Pentecostal revivals sprang up in the United States just after the turn of the twentieth century. The earliest recorded instance of glossolalia in this century was in Topeka, Kansas, in 1901, when the "baptism of the spirit" fell upon Agnes N. Ozman, a student at the Bethel Bible College. From Kansas the movement spread to Missouri and Texas. By 1906 tongue-speaking was being practiced in Los Angeles, and "the movement began to take on international proportions" with twenty-six contemporary church bodies (two million plus in membership) tracing their origin to Los Angeles.

In the last decade, glossolalia scored great gains among the non-Pentecostal groups. Laymen also, in large numbers, have become involved. The movement has been given a considerable boost by the Full Gospel Business Men's Fellowship International, founded in 1953 by a group of Pentecostals. Today, however, its membership includes virtually all denominations. In 1959 this organization began publishing a periodical entitled View, which is by far the intellectual superior to the other publications, Voice and Vision.

Another organization particularly interested in glossolalia is the Blessed Trinity Society of Van Nuys, California, which was started by Episcopalians. Between 1962 and 1966 it published a handsome, slick magazine entitled Trinity, which was distributed among the historic denominations. It carried testimonials which were aimed at "proving" tongues to be more than a mere religious fad.

By far the most common association in which tongue-speaking flourishes is the small Holy Spirit Fellowships which have sprung up throughout Christendom. Usually these groups are small and relatively unstructured. They often have prayer, testimonials, and singing as well as speaking in tongues.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: M. Barnett, The Living Flame (1953); A.A. Hoekema, What About Tongue Speaking? (1960); W.H. Horton (ed.), The Glossolalia Phenomenon (1966); I.J. Martin III, Glossolalia: A Bibliography (1970).

WATSON E. MILLS

GLOVER, TERROT REAVELEY (1869-1943). English Baptist scholar. Son of a Baptist minister in Bristol, he graduated from Cambridge, became fellow of St. John's College there, then in 1896 went to Ontario as professor of Latin in Queen's University, Kingston. He returned to teach at Cambridge in 1901 and later became university lecturer in ancient history (1911-39). He traveled widely, particularly in the United States. His classical scholarship refused to segregate the emergent Christian tradition from its environment. Thus he was at home in The World of the New Testament (1931) as much as in the Greek world (From Pericles to Philip, 1917). As a teacher who loved the classics he sought their instructive discipline, yet he willingly assisted in the editing of Scripture for little children (1924). Among his many other works were The Conflict of Religions in the Early Roman Empire (1909) and The Jesus of History (1917). CLYDE CURRY SMITH

GNOSTICISM. The term designates a variety of religious movements in the early Christian centuries which stressed salvation through a secret gnōsis or "knowledge." These movements are most clearly attested in the writings of the church fathers of the second century. They viewed the various Gnostic movements as heretical perversions of Christianity. Modern scholars conceive of Gnosticism as a religious phenomenon which was more independent of Christianity. There is no clear consensus, however, as to how it originated. German scholars, who define Gnosticism rather loosely, are able to find Gnostic traces wherever there is an emphasis upon "knowledge" for salvation, as in the Dead Sea Scrolls.* Other scholars who define Gnosticism more strictly would require the presence of a cosmological dualism before conceding that a document is Gnostic.

Sources. (1) Patristic. Until the nineteenth century we were entirely dependent for our knowledge of the Gnostics upon the writings of the church fathers of the second and third centuries: Justin Martyr, Irenaeus, Hippolytus, Origen, and Tertullian, together with the later descriptions of Epiphanius (d.403). Some of the church fathers preserved extracts of primary Gnostic documents, but for the most part their accounts are highly polemical. Scholars were thus not sure how accurate a picture of the Gnostics they had in the patristic accounts. E. de Faye, writing early in this century, was extremely skeptical. He viewed any information relating to movements earlier than Justin's writing, the lost Syntagma (c.150), as completely legendary. Scholars have recently gained more confidence in the patristic sources as the Nag Hammadi* treatises have confirmed some of their materials.

Although the NT itself in Acts 8 does not describe Simon Magus* as a Gnostic, the patristic accounts are unanimous in regarding Simon as the fount of all heresies. Unlike the later Gnostics, Simon claimed to be divine and taught that salvation involved knowledge of himself rather than any self-knowledge. Simon was followed by a fellow Samaritan, Menander, who taught at Antioch toward the end of the first century. He taught his followers that those who believed in him would not die. In Justin's time (c.150) it seemed that almost all the Samaritans had become followers of Simon. But by the year 178 Celsus no longer attributed any importance to the Simonians. Teaching in Antioch at the beginning of the second century was Saturninus,* who unlike Simon and Menander held that Christ was the redeemer. In Asia Minor, Cerinthus* was a contemporary of Polycarp of Smyrna. Somewhat of an atypical Gnostic was Marcion* of Pontus, who taught at Rome from 137 to 144. Other Gnostic teachers include Basilides* and his son Isidore, and Carpocrates* and his son Epiphanes—all of whom taught at Alexandria. The most famous Gnostic teacher was Valentinus,* who taught at Alexandria and who came to Rome about 140. He had a number of able disciples, including Ptolemy and Heracleon* in the West, and Theodotus in the East.

(2) Coptic. In the nineteenth century, two original Gnostic codices in Coptic were translated: the Codex Askewianus containing the Pistis Sophia, and the Codex Brucianus containing the Books of Jeu. A third codex, Codex Berolinensis 8502, though acquired late in the nineteenth century, was not fully published until 1955. It contains a Gospel of Mary (Magdalene), a Sophia of Jesus, Acts of Peter, and an Apocryphon of John, a work mentioned by Irenaeus (A.D. 180).

In 1946 a cache of thirteen Coptic codices was discovered near Nag Hammadi in Upper Egypt. These contain some fifty-three treatises, of which more than one-third have now been published. The cache was deposited about A.D. 400. Among the works which have been published are: (a) The Gospel of Truth, which some have ascribed to Valentinus; (b) The Epistle of Rheginos, which is a discourse on the resurrection as a nonphysical phenomenon; (c) The Gospel According to Thomas, which contains sayings attributed to Jesus; (d) The Gospel of Philip, which reflects a Valentinianism similar to that of the Marcosians of the late second century; (e) The Apocryphon of John, which gives a cosmogony similar to that ascribed to the Sethians and Ophites by the church fathers; (f) The Hypostasis of the Archons, which gives a cosmogony similar to that of the Apocryphon of John; (g) The Apocalypse of Adam, which the editor A. Böhlig considers to be a document representing non-Christian Gnosticism. There are no explicit references to Christianity in the Apocalypse, but according to other scholars there are some clear allusions to Christianity.

(3) Mandaic. The Mandaean* communities in Iraq and in Iran are the sole surviving remnants of ancient Gnosticism. Their texts, although quite late, have been used by German scholars such as R. Reitzenstein and R. Bultmann* to reconstruct presumably earlier Gnostic traditions. Three major Mandaic texts were translated by M. Lidzbarski early in the twentieth century: (a) The Ginza, which presents a detailed cosmology; (b) the Johannesbuch, which contains some late traditions about John the Baptist, whom the Mandaeans revere; (c) the Qolasta, which is a collection of Mandaic liturgies. More recently E.S. Drower has published a number of other manuscripts, including the Haran Gawaita, which is a legendary account of the sect's migration from Palestine. In addition to these late manuscripts (sixteenth to nineteenth century) there are earlier Mandaic magic bowl texts (c. A.D. 600) and some lead strips which have been dated as early as the third/second century by R. Macuch. Macuch, Drower, and K. Rudolph have argued for a pre-Christian origin of the Mandaeans. The present writer has suggested an origin in the second century A.D. for the Mandaeans.

(4) Other sources. Mani (A.D. 216-75) was born near Seleucia-Ctesiphon in Babylonia. He established a highly syncretistic form of Gnosticism called Manichaeism,* which became widespread and which even included Augustine among its converts. R. Reitzenstein and G. Widengren have assumed that the late Manichaean texts preserve early Gnostic Iranian elements. A new codex from Cologne has now shown that the baptist sect to which Mani and his father belonged was not the Mandaean sect but that of the Elchasaites, a Jewish-Christian group. Other texts which have been adduced as evidence for early forms of Gnosticism, but whose Gnostic character has been disputed, included the "Hermetica," the "Syriac Odes of Solomon," and the "Hymn of the Pearl" (in the Acts of Thomas), the writings of Philo of Alexandria, the references to the minim in rabbinical sources, Jewish Merkabah mysticism, and the Dead Sea Scrolls.

Teachings of the Gnostics. In Gnostic systems there is an ontological dualism—an opposition between an ineffable, transcendent God and an ignorant, obtuse demiurge (often a caricature of the OT Jehovah), who is the creator of the cosmos. In some systems the creation of the material world results from the fall of Sophia. The material creation is viewed as evil. Sparks of divinity, however, have been encapsuled in the bodies of certain pneumatics destined for salvation. These pneumatics are ignorant of their celestial origins. God sends down to them a redeemer, often a docetic Christ, who brings them salvation in the form of secret gnōsis. Thus awakened, the pneumatics escape from their fleshly bodies at death and traverse the planetary spheres of hostile demons and are reunited with the deity. Since salvation is not dependent upon behavior but upon the knowledge of an innate pneumatic nature, some Gnostics manifested extremely libertine behavior. They held that they were "pearls" who could not be sullied by any external "mud." On the other hand, many Gnostics took a radically ascetic attitude toward marriage, deeming the creation of woman the origin of evil and the procreation of children but the multiplication of souls in bondage to the powers of darkness.

Gnostic Origins. There is no unanimity as to how, where, and when Gnosticism originated. S. Pétrement follows the church fathers in holding to a post-Christian and an inner-Christian development of Gnosticism. Many German scholars assume a pre-Christian origin of Gnosticism, though the evidences which they adduce to support this position are all either early texts which are not clearly Gnostic or very late Gnostic texts. An increasing number of scholars, including G. Quispel and G. MacRae, assume an important Jewish role in the origin of Gnosticism, though the Gnostic texts themselves are openly anti-Jewish. R. Grant has suggested that the disappointment of Jewish apocalypticism at the fall of Jerusalem in A.D. 70 may have resulted in Gnosticism.

Gnosticism and the New Testament. German scholars such as R. Bultmann and his disciples assume a pre-Christian origin of Gnosticism. They believe they can detect both direct and indirect references to Gnosticism in the NT, especially in the writings of John and of Paul. But the primary evidence which is used are NT passages themselves, which can be interpreted in a non-Gnostic sense. Bultmann has held that the NT was dependent upon a pre-Christian Gnostic myth of a "redeemed redeemer." C. Colpe has made some devastating criticisms of the work of the history-of-religions scholars that was responsible for the formulation of this myth. Most scholars today are now convinced that such a Gnostic redeemer myth is a post-Christian development patterned after the person of Christ. It seems safest to agree with the judgment of R. McL. Wilson, who accepts the existence of a rudimentary Gnosticism at the end of the first century, combated in the later NT books, and who warns against reading back traces of the fully developed Gnosticism of the second century into earlier texts.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: I. General: F. Burkitt, Church and Gnosis (1932); G. Quispel, Gnosis als Weltreligion (1951); R. Wilson, The Gnostic Problem (1958); H. Jonas, The Gnostic Religion (2nd ed., 1963); R.M. Grant, Gnosticism and Early Christianity (2nd ed., 1966); J.M. Robinson and H. Koester, Trajectories Through Early Christianity (1971).

II. Patristic Sources: E. de Faye, Gnostiques et gnosticisme (2nd ed., 1925); R.M. Grant, "The Earliest Christian Gnosticism," Church History, XXII (1953), pp. 81-98; V. Corwin, St. Ignatius and Christianity in Antioch (1960); R.M. Grant, Gnosticism, A Sourcebook ... (1961).

III. Coptic Sources: J. Doresse, The Secret Books of the Egyptian Gnostics (n.d.); A. Helmbold, The Nag Hammadi Gnostic Texts and the Bible (1967); J.M. Robinson, "The Coptic Gnostic Library Today," NTS, XIV (1968), pp. 356-401; D.M. Scholer, A Classified Bibliography of the Coptic Gnostic Library and of Gnostic Studies 1948-1969 (1971).

IV. Mandaic Sources: M. Lidzbarski, Das Johannesbuch der Mandäer (rep. 1966) and Ginza: Das Grosse Buch der Mandäer (1925); E.S. Drower, The Haran Gawaita . . . (1953) and The Canonical Prayerbook of the Mandaeans (1959); idem, The Secret Adam (1960); K. Rudolph, Die Mandäer I and II (1960-61); E. Yamauchi, Gnostic Ethics and Mandaean Origins (1970).

V. Gnostic Origins: U. Bianchi (ed.), The Origins of Gnosticism (1967).

VI. Gnosticism and the New Testament: J. Dupont, Gnosis: la connaissance religieuse dans les epîtres de St. Paul (1949); C.H. Dodd, The Interpretation of the Fourth Gospel (1953; rep. 1968); R. Bultmann, Theology of the New Testament I and II (1952, 1955); G. Quispel, "Gnosticism and the NT," The Bible in Modern Scholarship, (ed. J.P. Hyatt, 1965), pp. 252-71; R. Wilson, Gnosis and the New Testament (1968). E. YAMAUCHI

GOBAT, SAMUEL (1799-1879). Bishop of Jerusalem. A French-speaking Protestant, he entered the Basel Mission Society school in 1821 where he showed considerable linguistic aptitude. After studying Arabic in Paris, he transferred to the English Church Missionary Society for service in Ethiopia. He spent two terms there in the 1830s and then went to Malta to do translation work. In 1845 the Lutheran Gobat was ordained in the Anglican Church and a year later King Frederick William IV appointed him to the joint English-Prussian bishopric of Jerusalem. In Palestine he founded hospitals, schools, and orphanages, and brought in German workers from the Kaiserswerth Sisters and the St. Chrischona Mission to assist in his ministry. Gobat's proselytizing activities among the Eastern churches aroused so much controversy that in 1853 several Anglican bishops publicly affirmed their confidence in him. After his death Prussia withdrew its support from the bishopric, leaving it a purely Anglican post. RICHARD V. PIERARD

GOD. For the ancient Greeks, the divine plenitude of life was reflected in a full Pantheon of gods, and it was to these "gods many" (1 Cor. 8:5) that the ordinary man looked for the supply of his religious needs. Though they were beyond the reach of death, the common lot of mortal men, the gods could not alter the dark counsels of fate, for they were themselves of the same order of being as men. Inasmuch as the Greeks conceived of the divine majesty in terms of man—the highest creature in the hierarchy of being—the noblest qualities with which they endowed their gods were human also.

For the Greek philosophers, the word "God" (theos) was a general term gathering up into itself all the impersonal, metaphysical forces and powers whereby order struggles out of chaos. God was the great sustaining Reality, the final necessary and adequate Condition of the existence of world order. In this process of rationalizing and ethicizing the Olympian deities, the philosophers did not necessarily deny the presence of the divine in the world; rather, in many instances they affirmed it. But they thought of God in terms of the regularity of being and immanent righteousness, more than in terms of the personal categories which dominated the Homeric world.

There was no possibility, therefore, in Greek philosophic thought, that man should enjoy a personal relationship with God, much less that God should assume our human mode of existence. That God should be a God-who-is-for-man is a view alien to Greek thought. By the same token it was unthinkable that man should address God in prayer as a loving Father. Man, indeed, may be moved by erotic attraction to the perfection residing in the diving Being, but this experience is not prayer in any sense of personal communion. Rather, since the thought of the philosophers about God and the cosmos tended toward identity, religious experience became the inner freedom and blessedness of self-fulfillment through striving toward higher forms of existence.

In contrast with Greek religious speculation, where the movement of thought is from the world to God, the biblical view of God is the other way. The Bible always speaks of God as a personal God who comes to man in his self-revelation.

In the OT, the general word for God is "El," denoting a personal object of religious perception and pious awe having to do with power, a power which man cannot master, but which fills his religious consciousness. Hence "El" is contrasted with "man" in passages like Ezekiel 28:2 and Hosea 11:9. Significantly the term is interchangeable with God's personal name "Jahweh" (commonly translated "LORD" in our English versions) in a way that makes it clear that the two are synonymous. Note the expression, found from time to time in the OT, "Jahweh Elohim," where Elohim is in explanatory apposition: "Jahweh, that is, God." The use of the plural when referring to Jahweh can have no numerical significance, since "Elim" occurs as the plain plural of "El," while "Elohim" is used of other individual gods in the OT such as Baal of Sidon. We may therefore regard Elohim as a "plural of amplitude in addressing God"; to speak of Jahweh as Elohim is to confess that the God whose name is Jahweh possesses the quality of El in the fullest measure.

Though her faith in Jahweh was confronted by a plurality of deities in the surrounding world, through many a crisis Israel came to leave behind all thought of a tribal, national God and to recognize that God by His power fashioned and rules the whole world. Faith in this one, personal, allpowerful God was pledged in the covenant established between Jahweh and His people by the hand of Moses. This sense of Jahweh's absolute uniqueness was not obtained by rational argument, but by the impelling experience of the divine reality. Jahweh is He who helps, delivers, judges, and consoles His people. Hence He must be taken seriously in His transcendent power and steadfast love. Israel's monotheism, in other words, is not the end product of polytheism, driven by some inner motif of unity to a more satisfying concept, but a confession of God's overpowering reality in the lives of his people. "I am the LORD your God, who brought you out of the land of Egypt, out of the house of bondage. You shall have no other gods before me" (Exod. 20:2,3 RSV).

Since faith in Jahweh, the God of Israel, is the only proper response to His mighty acts of redemption, the prophets attacked the power of heathen piety by noting the obvious fact that the gods of the heathen can neither hear nor speak. Fashioned in wood and stone, the symbols of nature's forces numinously conceived, they are of no avail to help in time of trouble. They are a silent mystery and their devotees deluded fools (Isa. 44).

This monotheism (confessed in Deut. 6:4) comes to its finest expression in the second part of Isaiah. The overthrow of the nation of Israel, in the natural course of things, would have marked the demise of the worship of Jahweh. But Israel's history is not natural, as is evidenced by the fact that her national tragedy was the occasion for the prophet to affirm Jahweh's sovereign lordship over all the nations of the earth. Jahweh is God alone, unique and incomparable in His power and wisdom, the almighty Creator of heaven and earth, the Lord of all human history (cf. Isa. 41:1-5; 43:10,11; 44:7,8; chaps. 45,46).

The OT doctrine of God is the presupposition of all that the NT writers teach about Him. The God of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, almighty, holy, living, and faithful, is the God who is uniquely revealed in Jesus the Christ. Only now man's reverence and awe as a worshiper of the true God is informed by a heightened intimacy of relationship. This is because Jesus taught His disciples to call God "Father" (Matt. 6:9; Luke 11:2) and gave them His Spirit, by whose inner witness they were enabled to cry, "Abba, Father" (Rom. 8:15, 16). Since Jesus is uniquely God's Son (Luke 10: 22), and since His Spirit indwells His followers, Christians could hardly conceive God's unity, so stressed in the OT and reiterated in the New, in terms of an undifferentiated monad. The great events of redemptive history, incarnation, and Pentecost which precede the writing of the NT explain why the doctrine of the Trinity, though not expressly elaborated in the NT, is nonetheless there in primordial form. Hence the spontaneous use of threefold expressions when speaking of God on the part of the apostolic community (Matt. 28:19; 2 Cor. 13:13; Eph. 4:4-6; 2 Thess. 2:13,14; 1 Pet. 1:1,2).

In the early Christian mission to the Gentiles, biblical religion confronted Greek philosophy, and of this encounter Christian theology was born. So far as the Christian doctrine of God is concerned, we may say that the OT revelation of God, culminating in the work of Jesus Christ, provided the church with the substance of its faith, while Greek philosophy supplied the intellectual categories and concepts for the systematic articulation of this faith. The marriage of Greek and biblical thought is a fact to be accepted, but not with uncritical approval. On the one hand, "the fullness of time" may be seen in that Greek philosophy had prepared men's minds for the theological task confronting the church. This task was to work out the implications of God's final self-revelation in the person and work of Jesus Christ, so as to meet the need of the catechumen and the challenge of the heretic and pagan. On the other hand, there was always the threat of distortion, since Greek thought is not only other than, but in a sense alien to, the thought world of the Bible.

As we have seen, the accent in Greek philosophy was on the impersonal Ideal, whereas the Bible is concerned with a personal God who speaks to His people and acts in history to redeem them. Because of this essential difference, philosophy can never be more than the handmaid of theology. Some Christian thinkers have sought to deny even this modest place to abstract, rational thought about God, but this is patently an overreaction. It is a fact that philosophy has provided the critical categories of thought with which Christian theology has gone about its task, and indeed, if one accepts the providence of God and the ultimate unity of truth, it is difficult to see how the theological task of the church could have been pursued in any other way.

There have been persistent theological problems; these concern the being and existence of God and his relationship to the world, especially His relationship to man. In an article of such limited scope one can do little more than offer the briefest survey of the answers Christian thinkers have suggested to these problems. It must always be remembered that these Christian answers which take the form of doctrinal formulations of the church are the extension of faith. Dogmatic pronouncements about God define truths concerning which there is a broad consensus and concerning which the church has an obligation to preach and teach as it upholds the faith once for all delivered to the saints. The central confession of the church is that Jesus is Lord, and the elaborated, explicit form of this confession is the doctrine of the Trinity.*

The church answers the question of God's being by the fundamental affirmation that God is a Trinity. Although the dogma of the Trinity contains no definition or classification of the attributes nor inference of specific attributes from the nature of the divine Being, yet when discussed, the attributes describe the Trinity in Unity which is the Godhead.

The above position is stated as preferable to that of the medieval Thomists and Protestant scholastics who discussed the doctrine of the Trinity only after they had defined God's essence as pure actuality (actus purus) and established His existence and attributes on general principles of reason. Such a metaphysical approach has its merits and is certainly to be preferred to the antimetaphysical stance of German liberalism whereby pronouncements about God are turned into pronouncements of religious experience (Schleiermacher) or statements of the ethical values of the kingdom of God (Ritschl). Such a theological method can hardly escape the criticism of Feuerbach that all theology is anthropology. On the other hand, metaphysics tends to alter pronouncements about God from confessional statements to be used in worship, to general statements of reason, uniting God and the world in a rational system in which the doctrine of God is more philosophic than biblical (see NATURAL THEOLOGY). Because of our reservations about such an approach, in this article we shall first discuss the divine attributes and only then raise the question of the proofs of God's being and existence.

The theologians' difficulty in classifying and ordering the divine attributes confirms one in the opinion that our understanding of God is inadequate to comprehend His essence, though we may postulate a genuine analogy between His being and the properties which we ascribe to Him. The more metaphysical attributes are God's aseity or independence, which means that God is unlike anything He has made; God's infinity, which includes both His eternity (He is beyond temporal limitations) and His immensity (He is beyond spatial limitations, i.e., omnipresent); and finally, God's impassibility (He is pure actuality, devoid of mere potentiality). As Augustine has said: "To God it is not one thing to be, and another to live, as though he could be, not living; nor is it to him one thing to live, and another to understand, as though he could live, not understanding; nor is it to him one thing to understand, another to be blessed, as though he could understand and not be blessed. But to him to live, to understand, to be blessed, are to be."

The more religious attributes describe God in the perfection of His intelligence, will, and holy love. His perfect intelligence we call omniscience; His perfect will omnipotence; while holy love refers to His justice (wrath) and His grace (mercy). Since these attributes are based on God's self-revelation in history, they should always be understood in the light of that revelation. God's infinity, for example, is not simply His independence from time and space, but His lordship over them as displayed in the Incarnation, wherein He freely reveals Himself in time and space.

Of equal importance to faith with the question of God's attributes is the question of how we should conceive and speak of God's relationship to the world of which man is a part. This is the question of God's immanence and transcendence. Pantheism tends to press the divine immanence to the point of identity between God and the world. Whatever is, is God, and nothing can be conceived apart from God. Deism takes the opposite tack and stresses the divine transcendence. God is so apart from the world as to be an absentee Lord, the laws of nature being sufficient unto themselves. The biblical view is described by the word "providence," which is the doctrine that God preserves and governs all His creatures and all their actions, by a personal exercise of His power, freely, according to the counsel of His will and for His own glory. Classically, this providential rule of God has been construed in terms of causality. But to affirm that God is the ultimate "cause" of everything that comes to pass has raised difficult questions, so far as evil is concerned, for no theologian will say that God is the author of evil. In contemporary thought, moreover, causality is an impersonal category of science, which makes it especially problematical as describing the divine agency in the area of the free and responsible acts of men. It is best, therefore, to think of God's providence in such personal categories as are suggested by the biblical titles of Ruler, King, Lord, and Father.

Traditional theology has been much concerned to prove the existence of God. While such an effort is entirely understandable, it has no express biblical warrant. For the writers of Scripture, God's presence and power in the world were as self-evident as the axioms on which the traditional demonstrations of His existence were supposed to rest. It is possible, therefore, to view the traditional arguments for God's existence as clarifications of mental concepts derived from revelation.

Contemporary theology is marked by efforts, not to prove God's existence as an eternal and absolute Being, but to reconstruct our thought about God in terms of evolutionary process. Such "Process Theology" stresses the thought that God is not only eternal, but also eminently temporal, affected in His being by all that transpires in the creation. Since the universe is a changing, dynamic, living reality, God must also be conceived as changing, dynamic, and living; open to the possiblities of creation, actualizing his potentialities. Many modern existentialist theologians have gone further than this in their departure from the traditional thought of the church about God (see EXISTENTIALISM). If God is transcendent in any sense, it is a hidden transcendence in the depth of Existence. To speak about God is to speak about man's existence. His transcendence is the transcendence of man's inner life. Hence the complaint of God's "silence," "absence," "concealment," "eclipse," even "nonbeing" and "death" on the part of many religious existentialists. Much of the disarray of contemporary theology could be due to the fact that modern man does not want a sovereign God to rule over him. As Augustine once pointed out, however, man's freedom is not preserved by banishing God, but by serving Him.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: J.S. Candlish, The Christian Doctrine of God (1888); H.M. Gwatkin, The Knowledge of God and its Historical Development (1908); G.S. Hendry, God the Creator (1937); J. Baillie, Our Knowledge of God (1939); E. Gilson, God and Philosophy (1941); E. Brunner, Dogmatics I: The Christian Doctrine of God (1949); H. Bavinck, The Doctrine of God (ET 1951); G.E. Wright, God Who Acts (1952); K. Barth, Church Dogmatics II: The Doctrine of God, I (1957); W. Eichrodt, Theology of the Old Testament (ET 1967). PAUL KING JEWETT

GODET, FRÉDÉRIC LOUIS (1812-1900). Swiss Reformed theologian and exegete. Educated at the universities of Neuchâtel, Bonn, and Berlin, he became chaplain to the king of Prussia and tutor of Prince (later Kaiser) Frederick Wilhelm (1838-44). He was pastor (1851-66) and professor of biblical exegesis (1851-73) in Neuchâtel and then professor of NT exegesis in the Free Evangelical Faculty of the same city (1873-87). He was one of the most influential Reformed scholars of his day, his works being translated into various languages. He defended the orthodox Christian position against the growing theological liberalism in academic Protestant theology, and combined a deep, Christian piety with positive biblical and historical criticism. He is best known in the English-speaking world for his commentaries on John (1864-65; ET 1877), Luke (1871; ET 1875), Romans (1879-80; ET 1880-81), and 1 Corinthians (1886; ET 1886-87).

W. WARD GASQUE

GODFREY OF BOUILLON (c.1060-1100). French Crusader. Member of the French nobility, he led a German contingent in the First Crusade of Urban II in 1096. Three years later, after Raymond of Toulouse had marched on Jerusalem, he took a leading part in the siege and capture of the city. When Raymond refused the offer to rule Jerusalem, Godfrey was chosen and took the title "Protector of the Holy Sepulcher." After his death his successor and brother Baldwin established the Latin Kingdom of Jerusalem. In later legend Godfrey was often depicted as the personification of the ideal Christian knight. The Assizes of Jerusalem, a law-book claiming to contain the laws of the kingdom of Jerusalem laid down by Godfrey, was in fact a fifteenth-century work by John of Ibelin.

PETER TOON

GODPARENTS. Also called "sponsors," they act on behalf of infants at baptism, and in their stead pronounce the renunciation of Satan, the confession of faith, and assist during the baptism itself. The sponsor either touches or holds the person being baptized and receives him from the hands of the minister following the ceremony. Sponsors act as witnesses on behalf of adults too. For solemn baptism there can be no more than two sponsors, a man and a woman, who must not be closely related to the person baptized. Sponsors themselves must have been baptized, have reached the age of reason, must intend to execute the office of sponsor, must not be an excommunicate, a heretic, father, mother, or spouse of the subject, and must be designated to the role by the recipient, his parents, his guardian, or the minister.

HAROLD LINDSELL

GOETHE, JOHANN WOLFGANG VON (1749-1832). German poet, novelist, and scientist. As a student of law at Leipzig and Strasbourg he became interested in occult philosophy and mysticism. In 1775 he was appointed to the court at Weimar and had at this time an increasing interest in scientific questions. In 1794 he became friendly with Schiller, which friendship lasted until Schiller's death in 1804. Goethe died in Weimar and was buried beside his friend. To summarize his career and work briefly is impossible. The central philosophical influences on him were Spinoza, Jacobi, and Kant. He was attracted by Spinoza's pantheism and his ethics; like Kant, he held that God is unknowable. Man, a part of nature, has a natural impulse to develop and fulfil ideals inherent in himself. Goethe's religious views were ambiguous, for he was a pantheist when studying nature, a polytheist when poetizing, and a monotheist in morality.

OONAGH MC DONALD

GOFORTH, JONATHAN (1859-1936). Canadian Presbyterian missionary to China. Educated at Knox College, Toronto, he was ordained in 1886 and with his wife went to China (1887) where they were pioneers in the Canadian Presbyterian work in Honan Province. Theologically conservative and a firm believer in preaching, he became famous for his leadership and participation in the revivals which swept over China in the early twentieth century. Though he lost his eyesight during his final years in China, he continued to minister there until 1934. He wrote By My Spirit, which told of the remarkable revivals in China and which inspired much support for missions.

GOGARTEN, FRIEDRICH (1887-1967). German Protestant theologian. A native of Dortmund, he established his reputation with an essay on Fichte as a religious thinker (1914), was pastor at Stelzendorf and Dorndorf, and from 1927 taught systematic theology at Jena. Reacting like Barth from religious liberalism, but unlike others of the new orthodoxy from a Lutheran rather than a Calvinist background, he believed he had recaptured the true insight of Luther by upholding an existential interpretation of sacred history which sees it not as an objective series of happenings to be accepted from the outside, but as dynamically to be apprehended by ourselves who are within the same historical process. Two of his numerous theological writings to be translated into English are Demythologizing and History (1955) and Christ and Crisis (1970).

IAN SELLERS

GOMAR, FRANCIS (also "Gomarus") (1563-1641). Low Countries Calvinist theologian. Born in Bruges as the revolt of the Lowlands against Spanish rule was imminent, he studied as a boy at Strasbourg under Johann Sturm, went on in theology under Zanchius at Neustadt, continued at Oxford and Cambridge, and received his doctorate at Heidelberg in 1593. In his thirties he became professor of theology at Leyden. An ardent and skilled defender of Calvinist orthodoxy, he protested against the teachings of Arminius (see ARMINIANISM), from 1603 his colleague at Leyden, seeing these as effectively denying the doctrine of election. The growing controversy soon spread through the Dutch Calvinist churches, with "Gomarist" and "Arminian" factions in increasingly bitter debate. Arminius's death (1609) was followed by the Arminian Remonstrance of 1610 and by the Contra-Remonstrance of 1611.

Meanwhile, when the Remonstrant Conrad Vorst (Vorstius) was appointed at Leyden to replace Arminius, Gomar resigned in disgust. As the Remonstrant controversy raged, increasingly mixed with political factionalism, Gomar taught in the Huguenot seminary at Saumar (1614-18) and was then called back to be professor of theology at Groningen. Known for his Contra-Remonstrant* views, he was chosen as a delegate to the Synod of Dort,* played a prominent role there, and rejoiced at the condemnation of the Remonstrants. The rest of his career was spent at Groningen. He held to a scholastic version of Calvinism, stressed the importance of doctrine, and took a supralapsarian position regarding predestination (Dort left the question open). His Opera theologi- ca omnia were published soon after his death (2 vols., 1645).

See G.P. Van Itterzon, Franciscus Gomar (1930). DIRK JELLEMA

GOMEZ, MARIANO (c.1788-1872). Chinese-Filipino priest and martyr. He had long defended his fellow priests in their just grievances against the friars. When in January 1872 Filipino soldiers and workers at the Cavite arsenal mutinied and killed their Spanish officers, the government and the friars used this as an opportunity to suppress all dissent. In this connection Gomez, with his colleagues Jose Burgos and Jacinto Zamora, was arrested, and following a secret trial with perjured witnesses, the three were garrotted before a large crowd in Manila. The governor-general requested Archbishop Martinez to unfrock them first, but he refused. The three martyred priests rapidly became a symbol of united nationalism. In 1904 they were canonized as saints of the Philippine Independent Church. RICHARD DOWSETT

GOOD FRIDAY. The title used in many English-speaking countries for the day on which Christ's death is particularly remembered. In other countries it was known as Long Friday, Day of Preparation, Day of the Lord's Passion, and the Passion of the Cross. It is called "Good" because of the benefits which flow from what the day commemorates. It came to be observed as a result of the development of the calendar in the fourth century. In the Pilgrimage of Etheria* is a first-hand account of the ceremonies practiced in Jerusalem at the end of the fourth century, with a description of the veneration of the Cross which still continues in the Roman rite. Popularly known as "creeping to the Cross," this was condemned by the Reformers. Holy Communion was not usually celebrated on Good Friday. When weekday masses began in the sixth and seventh centuries, Friday was already a special fast day with Bible readings and prayers, and this tradition was left undisturbed.

The Reformers provided in the Book of Common Prayer an Epistle and Gospel for Good Friday, and in England there is some evidence that up to and including Queen Victoria's reign some churches held Communion on Good Friday, though generally it has dropped out. In its place normally is a devotional service based on the Seven Words from the Cross. PETER S. DAWES

GOODELL, WILLIAM (1792-1867). Pioneer American Congregational missionary to the Near East. Born in Templeton, Massachusetts, he became one of a succession of notable scholarly missionaries in the Near East. He served there forty years, not counting one furlough. Appointed by the American Board in 1823, he helped establish the work in Beirut, which became the center of the Syrian Mission. In 1828 the mission was obliged to move to Malta, where for three years he supervised the press and worked on his Armeno-Turkish translation of the Bible. Sent with H.G.O. Dwight to Constantinople in 1831, he helped found the work in Turkey. His major accomplishment was the translation of the Bible into Armeno-Turkish from the Hebrew and Greek. HAROLD R. COOK

GOODRICH, CHAUNCEY ALLEN (1790-1860). American Congregational clergyman, educator, and lexicographer. Graduate of Yale (1810) and student of Timothy Dwight,* Goodrich at the former's suggestion published Elements of Greek Grammar (1814). He was ordained in that year, engaged in pastoral work, then in 1817 became professor of rhetoric at Yale, where he helped to establish the theological department in 1822. He was professor of preaching and pastoral work from 1838 until his death. As editor of the quarterly Christian Spectator (1828-36) he promoted Nathaniel Taylor's "New Haven Theology."* He published also several other writings, the most important of these being Select British Eloquence (1852). He also worked on an abridgment of the Webster Dictionary. ROBERT C. NEWMAN

GOODSPEED, EDGAR JOHNSON (1871-1962). NT scholar. Born at Quincy, Illinois, he studied at Denison University, Yale, and the universities of Chicago and Berlin. He taught biblical and patristic Greek at Chicago (c.1900-1937), and pioneered in collating NT manuscripts and in the study of Greek papyri in America. He translated into American idiom The New Testament (1923), The Apocrypha (1938), and The Apostolic Fathers (1950), and was an original member of the committee that produced the RSV New Testament (1946). He taught history at the University of California, Los Angeles (1938-51). He wrote over sixty books, some of the more important being An Introduction to the New Testament (1937), History of Early Christian Literature (1942), How to Read the Bible (1946), A Life of Jesus (1950), and an autobiography, As I Remember (1953). ALBERT H. FREUNDT, JR.

GOODWIN, JOHN (1594-1665). Puritan divine. Educated at Queens' College, Cambridge, he became a fellow there. He was rector of East Rainham, Norfolk (1625-33), then moved to London as vicar of St. Stephens, Coleman Street. Though nominated as a member of the Westminster Assembly, he did not attend. He was an ardent supporter of Parliament against the king in the Civil War, and became known as a leading republican thinker and defender of religious liberty. In the 1640s he attacked the Presbyterians as a persecuting party. He formed a gathered church in his parish (c.1644) and for a brief period was removed from his vicarage. Goodwin was one of the few Puritans who were also Arminian. This fact involved him in much controversy. He opposed Cromwell's National Church, and printed his opinions about the Triers in Basaoistai, or The Triers (Or Tormenters) Tried (1657). He was one of those exempted from the Act of General Pardon of Charles II in 1660, but he was not executed. PETER TOON

GOODWIN, THOMAS (1600-1680). Congregational divine. Born in Norfolk and educated at Cambridge, he became a fellow of St. Catherine's and vicar of Holy Trinity Church, Cambridge. On becoming a Congregationalist in 1634 he resigned and moved to London. In 1639 persecution drove him to Holland, where he was a pastor of a church at Arnheim. He returned to London when the Long Parliament began to sit and formed a gathered church in London. Nominated as a member of the Westminster Assembly,* he became the leader of the Dissenting Brethren in it. In 1649 he was appointed a chaplain to the Council of State, and in 1650 president of Magdalen College, Oxford. Goodwin was a leading member of both the Board of Visitors in the university and the Cromwellian Triers. From 1656 he enjoyed the confidence of Oliver Cromwell. He was a prominent member of the Savoy Assembly of Congregational elders in 1658 and was much esteemed among the gathered churches of the nation. After the Restoration he moved from Oxford to London and was pastor of a gathered church in the City. His works were published in five folio volumes between 1682 and 1704 and have often been reprinted. They include devotional, expository, doctrinal, and ecclesiastical studies and are Calvinistic in outlook.

PETER TOON

GORDON, ADONIRAM JUDSON (1836-1895). Baptist minister, educator, and author. Born in Hampton, New Hampshire, he decided for the ministry when entering preparatory school. He graduated from Brown University (1860) and Newton Theological Seminary (1863), and for six years was minister of Jamaica Plain (Massachusetts) Baptist Church. In 1869 he went to Clarendon Street Baptist Church, Boston, a center of evangelistic and philanthropic work. He founded a school for training missionaries for home and foreign service, and for pastors' assistants, from which came Gordon College and its divinity school. A student of prophecy, for a time he edited Watchword, a monthly given to biblical exposition. His writings include The Ministry of Healing (1882), Ecce Venit (1890), The Ministry of the Spirit (1894), and When Christ Came to Church (1895). He also helped to compile two hymnals: Service of Song and Coronation Hymnal.

C.G. THORNE, JR.

GORDON, CHARLES WILLIAM (1860-1937). Presbyterian minister and writer, better known by the pseudonym of "Ralph Connor." Born in an Ontario manse, his The Man from Glengarry gives an interesting picture of his boyhood Highland community, including the intense spirit of revival that gripped many evangelical Presbyterian congregations during the 1860s. After ordination in 1890 he carried out mission work in the lumber camps and mines of W Canada, then accepted a call to St. Stephen's Church, Winnipeg, where he remained, apart from a period of chaplaincy service, until retirement in 1929. Among his other novels were Sky Pilot (1899) and Glengarry School Days (1902). With considerable powers of description and an understanding of certain types of men, his stories found a large readership. His avowed reason for writing he stated thus: "Not wealth, not enterprise, not energy, can build a nation into true greatness, but men and only men with the fear of God in their hearts."

IAN S. RENNIE

GORDON, GEORGE ANGIER (1853-1929). Congregational minister and writer. Scottish-born, he graduated from Bangor Theological Seminary and Harvard University, proving himself a brilliant student of philosophy. A preacher of great power, during a long and influential pastorate at the Old South Church in Boston (1884-1927), and through numerous books, and lectures in all the leading American universities, he was a leader in introducing liberalism into Congregationalism. He called Calvinism "the ultimate blasphemy of thought" and held that moral progress was the key to history. He nevertheless, with other liberals, rejected the contemporary drift toward a merely human view of Jesus. His works include Ultimate Conceptions of Faith (1903), Religion and Miracle (1909), Through Man to God (1906), and Aspects of the Infinite Mystery (1916).

KEITH J. HARDMAN

GORDON, SAMUEL DICKEY (1859-1936). American devotional writer. Born and educated in Philadelphia, he was for ten years an assistant secretary and later state secretary of the Ohio YMCA. He then began to preach and lecture on religious subjects in America, and traveled for four years in the Orient and Europe holding Bible conferences and missionary conventions. He wrote more than twenty devotional books under the title "Quiet Talks," such as Quiet Talks on Power (1901), ... on Prayer (1904), and ... on Jesus (1906). These books were well received and widely used.

GORDON RIOTS (1780). These broke out in London on 2 June, when Lord George Gordon led a mob to the House of Commons with a petition for the repeal of the Catholic Relief Act of 1778. Lord George, an eccentric Scot and fanatical anti-Papist, had become president of the Protestant Association in 1779. The demonstrators soon became violent. Roman Catholic chapels were destroyed. On 6 June Newgate and other prisons were burned down and the following day attacks made upon the Bank. While the magistrates were acting feebly, the crowd had been swollen by released criminals and resorted to wholesale looting. George III personally ordered in the troops to quell the riots, in which nearly three hundred people died. Dickens graphically described the events in Barnaby Rudge. Many of the rioters were convicted and twenty-five executed. Arrested on a charge of high treason, Gordon was nevertheless acquitted. Later he became a Jew, was convicted for libel, and died in Newgate Prison in 1793.

J.W. CHARLEY

GORE, CHARLES (1853-1932). Anglican bishop. Educated at Oxford where he proved to be a brilliant scholar, he was ordained in 1875 and was elected a fellow of Trinity College. He was vice-principal of Cuddesdon Theological College from 1880, and three years later became the first principal of Pusey House. During those years in the Oxford area he exercised a strong influence on the religious life of the university, mainly through personal relationships. A lifelong Anglo-Catholic, he nevertheless brought a more conciliatory and liberal spirit to the Oxford Movement.* He was active on behalf of the Christian Social Union and was the founder in 1892 of the Community of the Resurrection. He upset some of his friends by inferring from Philippians 2:7 that Christ's humanity involved certain limitations.

Gore became canon of Westminster (1894) and a royal chaplain (1898); bishop of Worcester (1902); and, when the new diocese of Birmingham was formed largely through his efforts, he became its first bishop in 1905. In the latter place he formed excellent relations with civil authorities, non-Anglicans, and evangelicals (this despite his unyielding views on the episcopal system). He supported also the Workers' Educational Association. In 1911 he became bishop of Oxford, but found it more resistant to his masterful personality. It may be that some there had not forgotten his views expressed in the symposium *Lux Mundi (a volume he edited also), which created a sensation and caused the High Church movement increasingly to take account of modern developments in scholarship. In 1919 he resigned and settled in London. Gore's many works include The Sermon on the Mount (1896), The Body of Christ (1901), The Ministry of the Christian Church (new ed., 1919), The Holy Spirit and the Church (1924), and Christ and Society (1928). He was the most versatile, and probably the most influential, churchman of his generation.

J.D. DOUGLAS

GÖRRES, JOHANN JOSEPH VON (1776-1848). German Roman Catholic publicist and lay theologian. Born in Coblenz, he was deeply influenced by the Enlightenment, hostile to religion, and an enthusiast for the French Revolution. As he became increasingly disillusioned, he moved in the direction of Catholic mysticism and German romanticism. He was first a teacher, but then became a scholar of religious history and a journalist. His early works included Glauben und Wissen (1805) and Mythengeschichte der asiatischen Welt (1810).

During the Napoleonic Wars Görres was a vocal supporter of German nationalism. Now a popular figure, in 1814 he started the Rheinische Merkur, the first important German newspaper. Although suppressed by the Prussian government in 1816, it established his reputation as a founder of modern political journalism. He published controversial tracts in 1819 and 1837, demanding more freedom for the Catholic Church in public life. He accepted a professorship at Munich University in 1817, and there dominated a circle of noted scholars who promoted a Catholic renewal emphasizing romanticism and mysticism. His major work, Die Christliche Mystik (4 vols., 1836-42), was a vague, sentimental, and even fanciful treatment of mysticism. The Görres-Gesellschaft, founded in 1876, is a leading German Catholic society devoted to scholarly research and publication.

RICHARD V. PIERARD

GORTON, SAMUEL (1592/3-1677). Early American colonist. Born in England, he migrated in 1637 to Massachusetts. His opposition to the union of church and state, an ordained ministry, and the sacraments, his denial of heaven and hell, and his advocacy of unorthodox views of the Trinity and inner illumination of the Holy Spirit soon forced him to flee to Rhode Island in the winter of 1637-38. After some years of wandering in Rhode Island and Massachusetts, in 1643 he founded Shawomet which he later renamed Warwick. He was in England from 1644 to 1648 and secured religious liberty for his colony from the earl of Warwick. He served several times as a member of the Massachusetts Assembly between 1649 and 1666, and was a member of the Warwick town council in 1677, the year of his death.

EARLE E. CAIRNS

GOSPEL (OE godspel, "good tidings"; Gr. euangelion, "good news"). The message of God's redemption in Jesus Christ, which lies at the heart of the NT and the church's faith. In the NT it is, first, the proclamation by Jesus that the kingdom has drawn near and, then, the proclamation by His disciples that in His life, death, and resurrection the kingdom has been established and that salvation and forgiveness are offered to all who believe. At a later date the term came to be used of those early Christian writings which tell the story of that unique manifestation of the "good news" in the person and work of Jesus Christ (cf., Justin Martyr, First Apology 66.3; Clement of Alexandria, Stromata iii.13). Strictly speaking, there is only one Gospel: the four writings called "gospels" are really only variations on a single theme. It would be more accurate to speak of the "fourfold gospel" (Irenaeus) than of the "four gospels": the gospel according to Matthew ... Mark ... Luke ... John.

The background of the use of the noun euangelion and the related verb euangelizomai in the NT is the Greek translation of the second part of the prophecy of Isaiah (40:9; 52:7; 60:6; 61:1), which is quoted or alluded to many times in the NT (e.g., Mark 1:3; Rom. 10:15; Luke 4:17-21; Matt. 11:5/Luke 7:22).

In Lutheran theology the term is used to represent the NT revelation as contrasted with "law" (the old dispensation).

W. WARD GASQUE

GOSPELS, see SYNOPTIC GOSPELS; JOHN, GOSPEL OF

GOSSE, PHILIP HENRY (1810-1888). Son of an itinerant painter of miniatures, he was born in Worcester and worked as a clerk and a farmer in North America (1827-38). On returning to England he was poverty-stricken until his Canadian Naturalist (1840) was accepted by a publisher. After a brief spell with Methodists he associated himself with Brethren. He visited Jamaica in 1847 and soon became a prolific writer and lecturer on natural history. He invented and popularized the aquarium and was a sensitive, accurate illustrator. His Actinologia Britannica (1858-60) is a standard history of sea anemones and corals. After his first wife's death in 1857 he retired to St. Mary-church, remarried, and shepherded a Brethren assembly on individualistic lines. His attempt in Omphalos (1857) to reconcile Genesis with geology satisfied no one. His failings were those of an intellectual recluse, not a bigot.

JOHN S. ANDREWS

GOSSNER, JOHANNES EVANGELISTA (1773-1858). Founder of the Gossner Missionary Society. Born at Hausen near Augsburg, he studied at the University of Dillingen and then enrolled in the seminary at Ingolstadt. In 1796 he was ordained priest and assigned to a curacy at Neuburg, where he became an evangelical. From 1797 to 1804 he officiated at Augsburg and then was parish priest at Dirlewang (1804-11). Thereafter he accepted a benefice and engaged in literary pursuits at Munich. In 1819 he followed his friend Martin Boos to Düsseldorf. Gossner served a German congregation at St. Petersburg, Russia, from 1820 to 1824, until doubts regarding the celibacy of the clergy forced him to resign. In 1826 he joined the Lutheran Church and was appointed in 1829 to the pastorate of the Bethlehem Church in Berlin, where he remained seventeen years. During his tenure at Berlin he founded schools and asylums and a missionary society bearing his name in 1836. Missionaries with it served mainly among the Khols of East India. After resigning from the Bethlehem Church in 1846 he devoted the remainder of his life to the hospital which he founded. WAYNE DETZLER

GOTHIC VERSION. The Goths, a Germanic people of the Balkans who later moved westward, already had Christians among them in the third century, and in the fourth their countryman Bishop Ulfila is said to have been instrumental in gaining their adherence to the Arian heresy and in translating the Scriptures into Gothic, for which he had formed an alphabet. The main witness is the gospel Codex Argenteus, Stockholm; and there are about nine other fragmentary MSS, eight of them palimpsest. The gospels and Pauline epistles are fairly well represented, but of the OT only words of Genesis 5:11; 2 Esdras 15—17 (viz., Neh. 5—7); and two verses of Psalm 52 survive. The basic textual complexion in the NT is early Byzantine; the westward wanderings of the Goths, however, brought Old Latin influence to act upon the text, while Gothic influence upon the Old Latin is also known. J.N. BIRDSALL

GOTTESFREUNDE, see FRIENDS OF GOD

GOTTSCHALK (Godescalus) (c.805-869). Theologian and monk. He was compelled by his father, the Saxon Count Bruno, to enter the Benedictine abbey of Fulda. The Synod of Mainz (829) released him from his vows, but this dispensation was canceled on an objection by Rabanus Maurus,* the newly elected abbot, and he was moved to the Franciscan monastery of Orbais. He devoted himself to theological study, particularly to the teaching of Augustine and Fulgentius on predestination. He appears to have been the first to teach "double predestination," i.e., the elect are predestined "freely" to bliss, while the wicked are predestined "justly" to condemnation, on foreknowledge of their guilt.

Gottschalk was opposed by Rabanus Maurus, whom he charged with Semi-Pelagianism, and by Hincmar, archbishop of Reims, who accused him of denying the universal saving will of God as well as human free will. He was defended by Walafrid Strabo, Prudentius of Troyes, Servatus Lupus, Ratramnus, and others, but was condemned by the Synods of Mainz (848) and Quiercy (849), deprived of priesthood, flogged, and imprisoned for life at the monastery of Hautvilliers. There he continued his controversy with Hincmar, accusing him of Sabellianism, and expounded his own views in two confessions. He died unreconciled in a disturbed mental state as a result of his privations. He was also a lyric poet, and is accepted as the author of the The Eclogue of Theodolus, a colloquy between Truth and Falsehood, with Reason as umpire. Falsehood cites incidents from pagan mythology, giving a quatrain to each. Truth caps every incident with a contrast from Scripture. The work survived as a school book into the Renaissance period.

See K. Vielhaber, Gottschalk der Sachse (1956).

J.G.G. NORMAN

GOUDIMEL, CLAUDE (c.1510-1572). French composer. Little is known of his early life, and much misinformation is found in older accounts. He was apparently converted to the Huguenot faith before 1565, but had already shown great interest in the metrical psalms and their tunes being compiled under Calvin's influence at Geneva. Starting in 1551, he published at intervals eight books, each containing a selection of eight of these Genevan psalms in extended motet settings. As part-singing was not permitted in church by Calvin, these ambitious works must be regarded as Huguenot madrigals. Many other composers, Catholic as well as Protestant, published arrangements of these evidently popular psalms, until Catholic reaction forbade them. Goudimel published also the 150 Genevan psalms in 1564 in very simple four-part settings, and again in more elaborate versions in 1568. These had a wide circulation in the Netherlands and Germany as well as in France and Switzerland. Goudimel was also the composer of Masses and secular chansons in his earlier days. He perished in the St. Bartholomew's Day massacre in Lyons.

J.B. MAC MILLAN

GOUNOD, CHARLES FRANCOIS (1818-1893). French composer. While he is remembered today almost exclusively for his popular opera, Faust, Gounod maintained throughout his career a great interest in sacred music. He spent several years in England, where he attained much popularity as a choral conductor and composer. He wrote a number of anthems and sacred songs, some of which still enjoy a measure of popularity, and he had a very strong influence, like Spohr and Mendelssohn before him, on the lesser Victorian church composers, much to the distaste of later critics. His best-known oratorio, Redemption, has passed out of the repertory, although parts of his St. Cecilia Mass are still heard. While he often exemplified what is least favored today in music of the Victorian era, he was a highly gifted composer and had a fine gift of melody. He was at his best in the operatic and orchestral mediums.

J.B. MAC MILLAN

GOVETT, ROBERT (1813-1901). Theological writer (pseudonym "Mathetees"). Reared in Staines, Middlesex, he entered Worcester College, Oxford, in 1830, and after graduation was awarded a life fellowship in 1835. Ordained (1836-37), he became curate at St. Stephen's Church, Norwich, where his preaching attracted great crowds until in 1844 he confessed that he had forced his conscience on the matter of infant baptism and forthwith resigned his curacy and his fellowship. Most of the congregation left the Church of England and made Govett their pastor; services were held in Victoria Hall, Norwich, and by 1848 he had baptized 300-400 former Anglicans. Surrey Chapel, Norwich, was opened in 1854, and Govett ministered there to the end of the century. This nondenominational church still flourishes.

Govett's writings are extensive, of varying quality, and often marked by a high level of scholarship, a superbly logical approach, extraordinary originality, and complete faithfulness to biblical revelation. Much concerned with eschatology (Apocalypse, 1864, and other works), he held that much of the Book of Revelation is to be understood literally.

R.E.D. CLARK

GRABE, JOHANNES ERNST (1666-1711). Anglican scholar. Born and educated at Königsberg, where he was appointed privatdocent in 1685, he questioned the validity of Lutheran orders and contemplated becoming a Roman Catholic. On P.J. Spener's recommendation, he went to England in 1697, seeking a church possessing apostolic succession. Ordained into the Anglican priesthood, he had close links with the Nonjurors.* On receiving a pension from William III, he gave himself to biblical and patristic research. He published Spicelegium S.S. Patrum ut et haereticum seculi post Christum natum I, II et III (1698-99), editions of Justin Martyr's First Apology (1700) and of Irenaeus (1702), and a transcript of Codex Alexandrinus (Septuagint) with numerous emendations (1707-9).

J.G.G. NORMAN

GRACE. The favor shown by the Sovereign Creator to human sinners. In the OT, two words are basically used to convey the idea of God's mercy and free favor: chesed (e.g., Lam. 3:22) and, more importantly, chen (Gen. 33:8,10,15; Jer. 31:2). Grace is revealed in God's choice of and care for Israel. In the NT, the two equivalent Greek words are eleos (e.g., Rom. 9:15-18) and charis (e.g., 1 Cor 1:4). The divine love and initiative reached its greatest manifestation in the person and work of Jesus Christ (2 Cor. 8:9; Phil. 2:6ff.). Sinners, having transgressed God's law, cannot expect anything from God. In that He freely moves toward them and offers to them reconciliation, fellowship, and salvation, God is said to be the "God of grace" and Christianity to be "a religion of grace."

Since grace is so fundamental and many-sided a concept, it is to be expected that Christians will have had partial or unbalanced understanding of it. In church history there have been important controversies over the nature of grace. Of these we may note those between Augustine and the Pelagians and between Roman Catholicism and Protestantism. For Augustine, grace was absolutely necessary in order to begin, continue, and complete the salvation of an individual sinner. God must give the desire, the faith, and the perseverance. The Pelagians understood grace not as a supernatural power at work in the human soul, but as the normal functioning of the human faculties. So a man could freely accept salvation and later, if he wished, renounce his salvation.

Within Roman Catholicism, grace has usually been portrayed as a power conveyed through the priestly ministry and sacraments by which justification and sanctification are achieved. So personal faith and works go hand in hand. For Protestants, the connection between grace and faith has been central. As the sinner believes in God through Christ, the grace of God is active in that his sins are forgiven, a declaration of justification is made on his behalf, and he is reconciled with God. Works follow as the believer, accepting God's help through the means of grace (prayer, worship), continues to trust in his Lord.

In dogmatics, various adjectives are sometimes added to "grace" in order to describe aspects of it: e.g., Actual Grace is used by Roman Catholics to describe any supernatural help given in order to avoid sin or do a good work. Habitual (Sanctifying) Grace is used by Roman Catholics to describe the divine power which assists men to perform righteous acts; for Protestants it describes the sanctifying work of the Holy Spirit in the heart of the justified believer. Irresistible Grace is used by Calvinistic Protestants to describe the sovereign activity of God in regeneration and conversion. Prevenient Grace is used by Roman Catholics of God's work in the heart of the infant who is baptized, and by Protestants of God's secret, preparatory work in the heart of a sinner before he actually believes. Sufficient Grace is used by Roman Catholics to describe God's offer of help made to all Christians; when used it becomes Efficacious Grace.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: N.P. Williams, The Grace of God (1930); J. Moffatt, Grace in the New Testament (1931); D. Hardman, The Christian Doctrine of Grace (1947); H.D. Gray, The Christian Doctrine of Grace (1949); C.R. Smith, The Bible Doctrine of Grace (1956); J. Daujat, The Theology of Grace (1959); P.S. Watson, The Concept of Grace (1960).

PETER TOON

GRACE AT MEALS. The custom of giving thanks at meals. Not an exclusively Christian practice, it has its roots in the religious instincts of humanity, witnessing to the solemnity which attaches to every meal as an act of maintaining life. The Jews consecrated their meals with the "blessing," the Mishna describing the procedure (cf. Deut. 8:10; 1 Sam. 9:13). Our Lord followed the custom (e.g., Matt. 14:19; 15:36), as did the early Christians (e.g., 1 Cor. 10:30; 1 Tim. 4:3-5). In the second century Clement of Alexandria (Paedagogus 2.4) and Tertullian (Apologeticum 39) witness to the practice, and the church generally has kept the custom. W.T. Brooke (Julian's Dictionary of Hymnology) gives examples of metrical graces.

J.G.G. NORMAN

GRAFFITI. Inscriptions and drawings that often give graphic expression to thought or feeling, made upon whatever convenient surface is available. Some of the most ancient examples appear to be those of mercenaries or forced labor serving in foreign lands; subsequent usage reflected all groups and occupations of society. Ossuary graffiti from Jerusalem, claimed as mid-first century, pray to/for some Jesus, among others, for help, and petition that the bones contained may rise from the dead. Also noteworthy is the crudely drawn anti-Christian sketch with label from the plaster of a wall of the Paedagogium on the Palatine hill of the third century, deriding one Alexamenos about the worship of a crucified figure with an ass's head—the oldest representation of the centrality of the crucifixion. CLYDE CURRY SMITH

GRAFTON, RICHARD (d.1572). Chronicler and printer. A prosperous London merchant and a member of the Grocers' Company, Grafton, a convinced Protestant, arranged in association with Edward Whitchurch for the printing of "Matthew's Bible," produced under royal license at Antwerp in 1537. The following year Grafton was in Paris supervising the printing of the "Great Bible"—Coverdale's revision of Matthew's Bible without the extensive and overtechnical critical aids. Halted in his efforts by the Inquisition, he escaped to England where a year later the Great Bible was published. In its revised edition of 1540 this remained the official Bible of the English Church until the "Bishops' Bible" of 1568. In disfavor after the fall of Thomas Cromwell, Grafton prospered under Edward VI, receiving appointment as official printer of statutes and acts of Parliament as well as of Bibles and Service Books. Briefly imprisoned by Queen Mary, he retired from business but was subsequently a member of Parliament for London, and later for Coventry. In the 1560s he produced a rather pedestrian and controversial chronicle. Grafton's love for the Reformed faith, his zeal for the printing of the Bible in English, and his heroism in Paris in 1538-39 are undoubted. His rather sharp and occasionally dishonest business methods are a reproach.

IAN SELLERS

GRAHAM, WILLIAM FRANKLIN ("Billy") (1918- ). Evangelist. Born in North Carolina, he was educated at Bob Jones University, Florida Bible Institute, and Wheaton College, Illinois. After ordination (Southern Baptist) and a brief pastorate, he became in 1943 the first evangelist of the newly founded Youth for Christ.* In 1949, while president of Northwestern College, Minneapolis, he acquired national fame through his Los Angeles Crusade. He founded the Billy Graham Evangelistic Association with headquarters at Minneapolis. In 1954 he grew world famous through his first Greater London Crusade, extending for three months and creating a more profound impression on the United Kingdom than any mission since those of Moody and Sankey seventy years before. After 1954 he crusaded, with songleader Cliff Barrows, singer George Beverly Shea, and a team of associates, in most parts of the world.

Graham crusades have always been cooperative evangelism between his team and staff and the churches. Planned on a big scale, they involve great numbers of laity and ministers in an invigorating enterprise over a long period before and after. Despite the huge attendance figures, the emphasis has been on the decision of individuals, carefully counseled and followed up by specially trained local people in the context of the church. The number of lasting converts probably runs into millions.

Graham has developed also subsidiary evangelistic ministries. The weekly "Hour of Decision" radio broadcast began in 1950. His films have included Souls in Conflict, Two A Penny, and His Land. He has a weekly syndicated column, My Answer; was a co-founder of the fortnightly Christianity Today; and in 1960 founded the monthly magazine Decision. Television has greatly extended his evangelism, especially in the USA. His books, Peace with God (1952) and World Aflame (1965), have been worldwide best sellers.

In 1966 he inspired the World Congress on Evangelism* in Berlin, which in turn inspired similar congresses in various parts of the world. Each crusade includes a school of evangelism. He has always had a strong appeal to youth. He has also been the close friend and counselor of several heads of state, including U.S. presidents.

His personal character, his power to preach a fully biblical Christ-centered message in terms that simultaneously reach the most varied hearers, and his skill at using modern techniques of mass communication have made him one of the twentieth century's best-known religious figures.

JOHN C. POLLOCK

GRANT, GEORGE MONRO (1835-1902). Canadian minister and educator. Born in Nova Scotia and educated at Pictou Academy, he studied afterward at West River Seminary and Glasgow University. Ordained a minister in the Church of Scotland in 1860, he became pastor of St. Matthew's Church, Halifax, in 1863. In 1877 he was appointed principal of Queen's University, Kingston, Ontario, and held that office until his death. Emphasizing very strongly the practical social and political aspects of Christianity, he became a national figure because of his involvement in national and imperial interests, and because of his book Ocean to Ocean (1873). In 1899 he was moderator of his denomination's general assembly, and in 1901 became president of the Royal Society of Canada. Described as "the most influential churchman in Canada of his day," Grant was known as author, educator, politician, and minister, and was regarded almost as a national institution. ROBERT WILSON

GRATIAN (twelfth century). Called the father of canon law, he composed the Concordia discor-

dantium canonum, better known as the *Decretum. Very little is known about him except that he was born in Chiusi, Italy, probably became a Camaldolese monk, and lived in the monastery of SS. Felix and Nabor.

GRATRY, AUGUSTE JOSEPH ALPHONSE (1805-1872). French Roman Catholic scholar. Born in Lille, he was irreligious until in 1822 he awoke to the folly of worldly ambitions. He studied theology at Strasbourg, was ordained (1834), was a college director and chaplain, then in 1863 was appointed professor of moral theology in the Sorbonne. He was elected to the French Academy four years later. He first opposed papal infallibility, but submitted to the decrees, being much concerned for a renewal in French church life which led to his work in restoring the Oratory.* His works are apologetic, even to including a proof for the existence of God with the aid of mathematics: De la connaissance de Dieu (1855), Les Sources (1862), Les Sophistes et la critique (1864), and La Morale et la loi de l'histoire (1868).

C.G. THORNE, JR.

GRAVEDIGGERS, see FOSSORS

GRAY, GEORGE BUCHANAN 1865-1922). English OT scholar. Born at Blandford, Dorset, son of a Congregational minister, he was educated there and at Exeter, was a schoolmaster, then matriculated at London University (1882). He went on to Mansfield College, Oxford, and completed his studies at Marburg. He became tutor at Mansfield (1891), was ordained a Congregational minister (1893), and from 1900 was professor of Hebrew and OT exegesis at his college. His books include commentaries on Numbers, Isaiah 1—27, and Job (with S.R. Driver). In Sacrifice in the Old Testament (published posthumously in 1925), he made a notable contribution to OT theology. An independent and original thinker, though accepting the views of the Wellhausen* school of biblical criticism, he had a positive, constructive approach, and his preaching and teaching were permeated by the devotional spirit of the OT.

J.G.G. NORMAN

GRAY, JAMES MARTIN (1851-1935). Author and Bible teacher. Born in New York City, he was educated in New England schools, served as rector of First Reformed Episcopal Church, Boston (1879-94), and lectured at Reformed Episcopal Seminary, Philadelphia, and A.J. Gordon's Boston Missionary Training School (Gordon College). He lectured also at Moody Bible Institute summer sessions from 1893 until he became permanently associated with it as dean in 1904. He was president for nine years from 1925. Guiding the institute through a period of growth, he developed and popularized the synthetic approach to Bible study which greatly influenced Bible institute and Bible college curricula. He wrote many books, including How to Master the English Bible (1909) Synthetic Bible Study (1920), and Prophecy and the Lord's Return (1917), was one of the editors of the Scofield Reference Bible, and produced a number of popular hymns.

HOWARD A. WHALEY

GRAY, ROBERT (1809-1872). First Anglican bishop of Cape Town. Born near Sunderland and educated at Oxford, he was consecrated in 1847. He found South African Anglicanism weak and disorganized. Under his leadership it developed into the Church of the Province of South Africa—an independent, disestablished province of the Anglican Communion with five synodically governed dioceses (1870). This was not achieved without difficulty. His High Churchmanship aroused antipathy. Some local Anglicans resented their loss of independence and opposed his introduction of synodical government. This conflict, and the case of J.W. Colenso,* led to costly and confusing litigation which overshadows his more positive achievements. Despite delicate health Gray traveled widely in his diocese and overseas, organizing the church, promoting missions, enlisting recruits, and raising money. He favored the appointment of missionary bishops to unevangelized areas and inspired the formation of the Universities' Mission to Central Africa. The tragic failure of Bishop Mackenzie's Zambesi mission was a great disappointment. D.G.L. CRAGG

GREAT AWAKENING, THE. A series of revivals in the American colonies between 1725 and 1760. The earliest stirrings occurred among the Dutch Reformed in the Raritan Valley of New Jersey, through the fervent preaching of T.J. Frelinghuysen.* This early revival reached a peak in 1726 when, encouraged by Frelinghuysen, Gilbert Tennent,* a Presbyterian pastor in New Brunswick, began to preach for "conviction." Within a short time several Scotch-Irish Presbyterian churches around New Brunswick were experiencing conversions and fresh excitement. Simultaneously in New England in 1734-35 a recovery of heartfelt religion appeared in Northampton, Massachusetts, through the preaching of the able theologian and preacher Jonathan Edwards.*

The one man more than any other, however, who linked these regional awakenings into a "Great Awakening" was the English evangelist George Whitefield.* By traveling throughout the colonies and calling men to repentance and faith in Christ, Whitefield after 1740 helped to plant evangelical Christianity on American shores and to prepare the colonies religiously for the trials of the revolutionary age.

Through the "Reading houses" of Samuel Morris, and the preaching of William Robinson and Samuel Davies,* Presbyterians experienced revival in the South. Methodism with the preaching of Devereux Jarratt and the Baptist movement through the work of Daniel Marshall and Shubal Stearns grew rapidly in the era of the Great Awakening.

The revivalists soon met resistance. The established clergy, led by Charles Chauncy* in New England, criticized the revivalists' preaching and practices. The encouraging of lay preaching or "exhorting," the criticisms of revivalists who charged the established clergymen with "spiritual darkness," the uninhibited "enthusiasm," and the divisions within churches after the revivalists had swept through them—these taken together erected a sizable barrier to the spread of the revival.

In Edwards, however, the awakening had a vigorous defender. In his work Some Thoughts Concerning the Present Revival and in his later treatise on Religious Affections, Edwards discriminates between revivals' beneficial and detrimental effects and argues that nothing deserves the name religion that falls short of a remarkable change of disposition, created in the heart by the Holy Spirit, and showing itself in unselfish love for the things of God and in a burning desire for Christian conduct in other men.

In New England those who followed Edwards and other defenders of the Great Awakening were known as New Lights, and became proponents of the New England Theology*; those who opposed it were known as Old Lights. The Presbyterians also split into New Side and Old Side groups between 1741 and 1758, and the Baptists into Separate and Regular Baptists.

In spite of its faults, the Great Awakening made its impact upon the American colonies. Dissenting groups growing from the revival in Virginia helped to overthrow the established Anglican Church in that colony. Early antislavery sentiment was fostered, and increased missionary activity among the Indians arose from the movement, as represented by the work of David Brainerd,* Eleazar Wheelock,* and Samuel Kirkland.

The movement made also a great contribution to education. Princeton University, the University of Pennsylvania, Rutgers, Brown, and Dartmouth were some of the more significant schools created as a result of the awakening. Of equal importance was the mood of tolerance that cut across denominational lines. This attitude not only contributed to a national spirit of religious tolerance that helped to make the First Amendment to the U.S. Constitution a workable arrangement; it also provided for an evangelical consensus that is traceable to the present.

See M. Gewehr, Great Awakening in Virginia, 1740-1760 (1936); and E.S. Gaustad, Great Awakening in New England (1957).

BRUCE L. SHELLEY

GREAT BIBLE, see BIBLE, ENGLISH VERSIONS

GREAT SCHISM, THE. This may designate either one of two unrelated events which disunited Christendom. The schism of 1054 ("Eastern Schism") formally ruptured communion between the churches under the pope at Rome, Leo IX, and those under the patriarch at Constantinople, Michael Cerularius, until then considered second in the hierarchy. Already two very different churches, both culturally and theologically, they have since developed their separate ways: a Byzantine-Greek church became Eastern, Greek, and Russian Orthodoxy, while a Roman-Latin church became Roman Catholicism.

The schism of 1378-1417 ("Western Schism"), following the pope's Avignon residency (1309-77), divided allegiances in disintegrating Western Christendom between first two, then three, simultaneous popes, each excommunicating the other. A line with seat in Rome began with Urban VI, backed by the German Empire, England, Hungary, Scandinavia, and most of Italy. An Avignon line began with Clement VII, backed by France, Naples, Savoy, Scotland, Spain, and Sicily. Attempts (1409) to end the schism brought a third Pisan line. Martin V's election (1417) ended the schism. The crisis partially arose out of tensions between the authority of the papacy and feudal monarchies, and of the papacy and cardinals.

C.T. MC INTIRE

GREBEL, CONRAD (1498?-1526). Leader of the Swiss Brethren movement (commonly called Anabaptism*). He was educated at Basle, Vienna, and Paris, where he encountered humanism. Returning to his home in Zürich he made contact with Zwingli and other humanists, and studied Greek with them. About 1522 he was converted to biblical Christianity and began to work for reform in Switzerland. He became dissatisfied, however, with the incomplete reformation advocated by Zwingli. With friends he diligently studied the Bible, searching for the true doctrine of the church. On 21 January 1525 the Anabaptist movement was born when Grebel baptized Georg Blaurock* and then Blaurock baptized others present, making thereby a gathered church. This action provoked the wrath of the city council and led to persecution of the Brethren. Grebel himself, weakened by imprisonment, died at Maienfeld.

PETER TOON

GREECE. When the good news of God's love to man began to be spread, Greece was under Roman domination. But Greeks were to be found everywhere; in a sense Achaia in Paul's time was "Greece"—but the Greek world was dominant throughout the Mediterranean countries and beyond.

The colonies of the Jews, on the other hand, were scattered throughout the old country from the very north to the extreme south. Thus when Paul with his companions crossed the sea from Troas and put his foot on the soil of Europe there were already bridges prepared for the transfer of the Good News. From Philippi—where the first convert was won in the person of Lydia—to Thessalonica, Berea, Athens, and Corinth, there were synagogues where not only the Jews but large numbers of devout persons, the proselytes, offered to the apostles a most receptive soil for the good seed.

The old religion of the Greeks was on the decline. The efforts of the Neoplatonists to revive paganism were made in vain. The temples remained magnificent, but the wealth that belonged to them had become private. Christianity gained a victory, though not without a long struggle, against paganism. Such terms as "ecclesia" and "liturgy" were not unfamiliar to the popular mind, and this undoubtedly was a contributing factor.

When Paul stood in the midst of the Areopagus (A.D. 51/52) proclaiming "Jesus and the resurrection" in the face of the Epicureans and the Stoics, he got a favorable response at least from a few individuals (Acts 17). It is significant that no serious opposition is reported on the part of the Greeks; the opposition was always raised by the intolerant Jews. This was the case in Thessalonica, Berea, and Corinth. Very shortly after Paul's preaching, churches were organized so that the apostle addressed himself not only to the principal church at Corinth, but to "all the saints throughout Achaia" (2 Cor. 1:1).

According to tradition, Andrew the apostle came to Achaia and suffered martyrdom there. In the second century two Athenian philosophers, Aristides and Athenagoras, became apologists of the Christian faith. Origen, the great Alexandrian teacher, visiting Athens in the middle of the third century, found the church flourishing there.

By the sixth century all opposition to the Christian faith ceased. Only the mountainous tribes of Mane insisted on the old heathen religion. They were converted in the ninth century and then perhaps only nominally.

When Constantine the Great removed the capital of the Roman Empire to Constantinople (330), Greece proper continued in oblivion, but the Greeks were so dominant that the Byzantine Empire became eventually "greater" Greece. Christianity became the religion of the state, the Greek language was the language of the empire, and Greek philosophy and dialectic came to contribute to the shaping of Christian doctrine and teaching. This had such extended implications that the question was raised whether Christianity converted Hellenism or Hellenism absorbed the Christian faith, covering under the Christian mantle much of the old heathen practice. It was out of this situation that reformation movements appeared during the eighth and ninth centuries, known as "iconoclastic," which after a long struggle culminated in the prevalence of icon worship and the subsequent shaping of Orthodox Christianity.

The Crusades of the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries tried hard to convert the Eastern Church to Rome, but in vain. The only remnant of the Crusades in Greece was a small Roman Catholic element and a bitter animosity toward the Western invaders.

The great Reformation of the church in the West in the sixteenth century found Greece and the Greek Church struggling under the Muslims who had swept away the Byzantine state and captured Constantinople in 1453. With the Reformation, the Greek Orthodox Church remained untouched—though not entirely so. The Greek patriarch of Constantinople, Cyril Lucar,* embraced the doctrines of Calvin and attempted to introduce the Reformation in his own Greek Church. He was strongly opposed both by the majority of his clergy and by the Jesuits. He suffered martyrdom by the Turks, and eventually was formally anathematized by the Synods of Constantinople and Jerusalem.

In the nineteenth century part of Greece was liberated from the Ottoman Empire (1827). About the same time, Protestant missionaries from the West and from America came to Greece for relief, educational, and evangelistic work. The Protestant minority that exists today in the country has been the direct and indirect fruit of the activities of the missionaries. But the Greek Orthodox Church, claiming over 95 percent of the people and following the Byzantine pattern, is the state church. One of the interesting facts is that the first two monarchs of modern Greece who undertook officially to protect the Orthodox Church were not themselves Orthodox. The first, the Bavarian Otto (1832-186?), was Roman Catholic; the second, George I from Denmark (1863-1912), was Protestant.

See also EASTERN ORTHODOX CHURCHES.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Much of the literature is in Greek only, but see W. Smith, A History of Greece (1857); G. Hadjiantoniou, The Protestant Patriarch (1961); C.M. Woodhouse, The Story of Modern Greece (1968). MICHAEL KYRIAKAKIS

GREEK, HELLENISTIC. The spoken and written language of Hellenistic times, a period that begins with the conquests of Alexander the Great, covers NT times, and reaches the time of Constantine the Great. Within this period, the Hebrew text of the OT was translated into the Greek of the Septuagint, and the books of the NT were written. Hellenistic Greek became the language used by Greeks and non-Greeks, including Jews of the diaspora of pre-Christian and NT times. It was also the common language in Palestine at the beginning of the Christian era. The seven deacons mentioned in Acts (6:5) belonged to the Hellenistic party. Saul of Tarsus was a Hellenist, and it is most probable that the Lord had been familiar with some words and sentences of Hellenistic Greek.

In ancient times the Greek language was not a single, uniform tongue. Each of the divided Greek city-states developed its own dialect according to its progress and achievements. There were numerous dialects; four of them were prominent: Attic, Ionian, Doric, and Aeolic. Little by little the variety of dialects gave way to a "common" dialect. The great classical writers on one hand and the pan-Hellenic athletic games and festivals (Olympic, Delphi, Corinth) on the other contributed to this development.

This common Greek was based mainly on the Attic dialect. Athens being the great center of letters and arts, it became natural that the language of Athens became the universal language of the Greeks. In time the Attic dialect was no longer the pure language of the past. Elements from the other Greek dialects were mixed to form the common Attic.

The common Attic Greek was the language adopted by the Macedonian kings. It became the official language of the court and subsequently was brought with the conquests of Alexander to the conquered lands and peoples of the East. Thus it became the language of the Egyptians, Syrians, and Jews as well as of the Greeks who moved with the military forces and as merchants, educators, etc. From this the language termed Hellenistic or Koine emerged. In the new cosmopolitan centers such as Alexandria, Pergamos, and Antioch the new international language was molded.

In the course of time, beside the changes that are inevitable in every living language, expressions and words were added to Hellenistic Greek, not only from the variety of Greek dialects, but also from the languages and dialects of the "barbarians." In addition, during the Roman domination, Latin elements were introduced. It is a universal law that those who learn and use a language not only acquire but also give elements of their own modes of expression: idioms, local words. The Hellenistic Greek of the Septuagint and of the NT books is a demonstration of this fact. The variations of the language in the sacred books are easily explained when we consider the ethnic and cultural backgrounds of translators and authors.

The OT translation of the Septuagint was made under one of Alexander's successors, King Ptolemae (third century B.C.). Philo, Josephus, and early church fathers support the idea that the translation was made in Greek understood by the king and by Greeks in general. Becoming international, Hellenistic Greek was gradually simplified in grammar and syntax while the distinction between long and short vowels tended to disappear. The refined and highly cultured philologists despised as "barbarian" the Septuagint version of both OT and NT books.

The Septuagint, with apparent Semitic elements, might be said to belong to the Alexandrian version of Hellenistic Greek, while the NT language is the Palestinian version of the same. The Septuagint translators in their attempt to render the text as accurately as possible could not avoid hebraisms, while the NT writers, as original authors, were freer from such elements.

MICHAEL KYRIAKAKIS

GREEK EVANGELICAL CHURCH. This body has been from the first a national movement. Its first leader, Michael Kalopothakes, a native of Areopolis, near Sparta, had come under the influence of Protestant missionaries, having attended a missionary school run by two missionaries of the Southern Presbyterian Church in the USA. As a student in Athens he attended the meetings of Jonas King,* but the missionaries had no intention of establishing a Protestant church in Greece—and only strong opposition compelled Kalopothakes and other Greeks to organize an Evangelical church. After graduating in medicine he studied at Union Theological Seminary, New York, and in 1858 organized the First Church in Athens, opened the first Sunday school, and in 1871 erected the first Evangelical building at the foot of the Acropolis. He became the first agent of the British and Foreign Bible Society, and editor of the weekly paper Astir Tis Anatolis which is still being published by the church as a monthly magazine. Within a few years several churches were organized in other parts of the country.

Parallel to this movement was a similar Evangelical effort among the Greeks in Asia Minor, Turkey, where a number of churches were organized. When in 1922-23, as a result of war, the Greeks had to evacuate Asia Minor, the Evangelicals in Turkey went to Greece as refugees, joined the local church, and also formed new congregations in different areas. Today under the general synod there are some thirty congregations with a membership of 12,000. There are seventeen ordained pastors and a few lay workers. There is an Evangelical orphanage in Katerini, Macedonia; a Bible school; two summer camps for the church's children (in Attica and Macedonia); and a family camp in Thrace. MICHAEL KYRIAKAKIS

GREEK ORTHODOX CHURCH, see EASTERN ORTHODOX CHURCHES

GREENHILL, WILLIAM (1591-1671). English Nonconformist* minister. Matriculating at Oxford when only thirteen, he graduated four years later, and for eighteen years from 1613 held the living of New Shoreham in Sussex. John Howe and others were later to speak highly of his pastoral gifts and dedication. He became afternoon preacher to the congregation ministered to in the morning by Jeremy Burroughes*; they were known as the "Morning Star" and the "Evening Star" of Stepney. As a member of the Westminster Assembly he opposed the Presbyterian party, and in 1644 became the first pastor of a Congregational church in Stepney. His first volume of a commentary on Ezekiel was dedicated to a daughter of Charles I (after the king's execution Greenhill became chaplain to three of his children). He found favor with Cromwell, however, and was made one of the "Triers" for the approbation of public preachers. Ejected in 1660 from his vicarage of St. Dunstan's-in-the-East, he retained the congregational pastorate till his death. The four other volumes of his Ezekiel had been published by 1662, a work described as being full of erudition and practical wisdom. J.D. DOUGLAS

GREENWOOD, JOHN (d.1593). English separatist. Educated at Corpus Christi College, Cambridge, he became a zealous Puritan and a chaplain in the Essex home of Lord Robert Rich. Moving to London, he associated himself with those who were taking Puritanism to its logical conclusion, and becoming separatists and critics of the idea of the state church. He was arrested in 1586 for holding an illegal conventicle and was examined before Archbishop Whitgift. Other men imprisoned with him were Henry Barrow* and John Penry; with them he composed tracts defending separatism and some of these were printed in Holland. Released in 1592, he formed a church with Francis Johnson; this church later migrated to Holland and was known as the "ancient church." But Greenwood was arrested in 1592 and charged with Barrow for writing and publishing seditious books. At Tyburn in April 1593 they were hanged. PETER TOON

GRÉGOIRE, HENRI (1750-1831). Bishop of Blois. Born in Lorraine, he first won a reputation as a scholar, but became especially known for his role as a Roman Catholic bishop of the constitutional church during the French Revolution. He led the marathon session of the Third Estate during the attack on the Bastille (1789), and was elected by Nancy to the states-general. Grégoire was the first priest to sign the loyalty oath of the civil constitution of the clergy demanded by the constituent assembly (1790). As bishop of Blois (1790-1801) he ruled the Loire-et-Cher diocese and was elected president of the national assembly (1792). At the height of the Terror of 1793 Grégoire refused to abjure his faith or doff his robes. His Gallican opposition to Napoleon's conciliation with the Vatican stirred Ultramontane reaction and caused his resignation as bishop in 1801. ROBERT P. EVANS

GREGORAS, NICEPHORUS, see NICEPHORUS GREGORAS

GREGORIAN CALENDAR, see CALENDAR

GREGORIAN SACRAMENTARY. Early Roman liturgy. The liturgy itself is probably based on a liturgy from the papacy of Gregory the Great (590-604). Pope Hadrian I sent the Sacramentary to Emperor Charlemagne probably about 790. It was widely used in the Frankish Empire during and after the Carolingian period. A ninth-century manuscript of the Sacramentary is extant as well as several later editions and translations.

GREGORY I (the Great) (540-604). Pope from 590. Born in Rome, he was brought up in a household that encouraged piety and enabled him to receive a thorough education in grammar and rhetoric. His outstanding performance as a student of law led to his appointment as prefect of the city about 570. Later he decided to renounce worldly things and provided for the founding of seven monasteries, including one in his family home which he dedicated to St. Andrew and entered about 575. The experience in business affairs gained by his service as prefect and his predilection for the contemplative life were valuable in shaping the policies of his pontificate. Gregory was brought back into public life by Benedict I, who ordained him a Roman deacon. He was active as a papal representative to Constantinople and was successful in some instances, but failed to obtain aid for Rome against the Lombards. He reluctantly accepted his election as pope and was consecrated in 590.

His term in office had important and far-reaching consequences for the future of the papacy. In an effort to secure Rome against invasion by the Lombards he entered into a factional dispute with the church at Ravenna and the imperial exarch. Unable to reach an agreement which would unify Italian peacemaking efforts, Gregory sent his own troops against Lombard forces and made a truce with the Lombard duke, Aruilf of Spoleto, in 592. When the Lombard king entered Rome in 594, Gregory moved to save Rome by paying a large ransom and committing himself to an annual tribute. Gregory continued to work for peace throughout Italy, but this effort was not fruitful until 598. Revenues from the papal patrimony (lands in Italy, Sicily, Corsica, Sardinia, Gaul, North Africa, and Illyricum) were administered by Gregory to care for poor families, ransom captives, and pay for the campaigns against and peace settlements with the Lombards. Since it was Gregory and not the emperor who undertook these duties usually assumed by the civil government, this was an important step in the formation of the Papal States,* thus making the pope a temporal ruler.

In ecclesiastical affairs, Gregory strengthened the position of the Roman pontificate through his handling of the church in both East and West. While recognizing the jurisdictional rights which the other churches had over their own territories, he maintained that the See of Peter had been entrusted with the care of the entire church and therefore had universal jurisdiction. He reversed a decision against two priests made by the patriarch of Constantinople (John IV the Faster) and strongly objected to the patriarch's use of the title "ecumenical (universal) bishop." Gregory also asserted his position in the Western Church by seeing that the bishops were elected according to correct canonical procedure and by working to heal the Donatist* schism. He was not always successful in his attempts to enforce Roman primacy, especially in Aquilia where a previous schism remained unhealed until after his death. Gregory was able to link the independent Frankish Church to Rome by restoring the vicariate. He rejoiced over the conversion of the Arian Visigoths in 589 and was able to place the Spanish Church in the care of his friend Bishop Leander of Seville. Missionary work began in England under Augustine of Canterbury in 597 and succeeded in converting the Anglo-Saxons.

Gregory's importance is that of a transmitter of the wisdom of the ancient world to the medieval world. He is considered one of the four great doctors of the Roman Catholic Church in moral theology, not so much for the originality of his thought as for his didactic method. His works include forty Homilies on the Gospel (590-91), aimed at preparing his subjects for the Judgment; twenty-two Homilies on Ezekiel (593), profound and masterful pieces on many aspects of Christian life, including historically important accounts of Italy and the Lombards; the Book of Morals, a commentary on the Book of Job, his longest work and highly valued in the study of ethics during the Middle Ages; Pastoral Care, an exposition on the duties and qualities of the bishops of the church; fourteen books of Letters, which contain valuable information on his pontificate; and The Four Books of Dialogues on the Life and Miracles of the Italian Fathers and on the Immortality of Souls (593-94). The Dialogues are especially significant in that they simplified the doctrines expressed in Augustine's The City of God, and were thus very influential during the Middle Ages. Gregory was also active in the reform of the liturgy of the Roman Rite.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: F.H. Dudden, Gregory the Great (2 vols., 1905); C. Butler, Western Mysticism (2nd ed., 1927); P. Batiffol, St. Gregory the Great (tr. J. Stoddard, 1929); N. Sharkey, St. Gregory the Great's Concept of Papal Power (1956).
ROBERT G. CLOUSE

GREGORY II (c.669-731). Pope from 715. Born to a noble Roman family, he served as the first papal librarian known to us by name, during the pontificate of Sergius I. His first task as pope was to repair the walls of Rome destroyed by the Lombards. Then among other duties he commissioned Boniface to convert the Bavarians, consecrating him a bishop in 722. This positive mission bore fruit as Gregory interested Charles Martel the Frankish leader in the mission. The defense of Rome against Muslim advance and Lombard intrigue, the reception of important pilgrims, and the encouragement of the Bavarian mission, as well as the growing alienation of the papacy from Byzantium—all mark the importance of Gregory's eighth-century pontificate. The rift with the Eastern Church opened when Gregory condemned the policy of Emperor Leo III in two famous letters about 726, and in a council at Rome (727) proclaimed that images should be maintained. The two letters are now considered authentic, apart from errors of translation and interpolation. G. Ostrogorsky concludes that since the letter to Patriarch Germanus is unquestioned, Gregory's attitude of opposition is clear. Since Leo III acted with caution by not promulgating any iconoclastic laws until 730, perhaps Gregory reacted as strongly to Leo's tax policies in Italy. Gregory II was known in the West as Gregory the Younger.

ROBERT G. CLOUSE

GREGORY VII (Hildebrand) (c.1023-1085). Pope from 1073. Born in Saona, Tuscany, he was educated at a school of the Lateran in Rome. When Gregory VI was exiled to Germany after the Synod of Sutri, Hildebrand accompanied him and came in contact with many proponents of church reform. At some time he became a monk, either before or after his stay in Germany. In 1049 Leo IX brought Hildebrand back to Rome, ordained him a subdeacon, and appointed him administrator of the monastery St. Paul-Outside-the-Walls. Increasingly active in the Curia, he was very influential in the pontificates preceding his own and was elected pope by popular acclamation in 1073. Although this method of the election was in violation of the law of 1059, its validity was not questioned until after 1076.

Gregory believed that the foremost function of the papacy was to serve as a governmental institution, and that to fulfill this capacity the law must be given an important role. In order to achieve his goals for the papacy he felt it necessary to purify the higher clergy, and Gregory renewed decrees against simony and clerical marriages. The execution of such a reform program necessitated action against lay investiture, since this practice lessened the legal allegiance which bishops owed the Roman See. In 1075 Gregory entered into a dispute with the German king, Henry IV, over the question of lay investiture which was to last throughout his pontificate. When Gregory threatened Henry with excommunication for violation of the reform decrees in 1075, Henry retaliated by having the diet at Worms depose Gregory in 1076. Gregory then excommunicated Henry and released his subjects from their oaths of allegiance to the king. At Canossa (1077) Gregory received Henry as a submissive penitent, but did not reinstate his royal powers.

A short while later, when a group of German princes elected Rudolph of Swabia as king, Gregory did not oppose the move. Civil war ensued in Germany, and Gregory excommunicated Henry for the second time. On this occasion, however, popular opinion was against the pope. At the Synod of Brixen in 1080, Henry encouraged the election of a counter pope, Clement III, and formally deposed Gregory in 1084. In that year a Norman prince, Robert Guiscard, carried Gregory into exile at Salerno.

In addition to the conflict with Henry, Gregory was concerned with other matters. He felt he was the vicar of Peter and in this position thus had the responsibility of governing the church, whose officers included both bishops and kings. He attempted to maintain this position of governor in his relations with the temporal powers of Christendom, such as Hungary, Russia, and England. He wished to lead a crusade to the Holy Land which would result in the unification of Western and Eastern Christians, but was unable to accomplish this goal. He also introduced several liturgical reforms. His program of papal reform as set down in his Register consists of twenty-seven short sentences known as the Dictatus papae which contained both traditional and innovative applications of the doctrine of papal authority. Gregory's important contribution to the development of the papacy was in the influence he exerted on canon law which shaped both ecclesiastical and political policy for many years.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: A.J. MacDonald, Hildebrand: A Life of Gregory VII (1932); G. Tellenbach, Church, State and Christian Society at the Time of the Investiture Contest (1940); W. Ullmann, Growth of Papal Government in the Middle Ages (2nd ed., 1962).

ROBERT G. CLOUSE

GREGORY IX (c.1170?-1241). Pope from 1227. Born at Anagni of the noble house of Segni, he studied at Paris and Bologna and in 1198 was made cardinal deacon by his uncle, Innocent III, and cardinal bishop of Ostia in 1206. Made papal legate for a series of diplomatic missions to Germany, he was commissioned in 1217 to preach a crusade in northern and later central Italy, with a vow of assistance from Frederick II. As pope (1227) there was constant difficulty between him and the emperor, with two excommunications because of not carrying through the crusade (1227) and invading Lombardy and usurping the rights of the church in Sicily (1239). The election of an anti-king was plotted, and a general council summoned to Rome in 1241 which Frederick prevented from convening.

Heresy, too, preoccupied Gregory because of Albigensian* activity in France, Italy, and Spain. In a Paris treaty (1229) Raymond VII of Toulouse pledged assistance in suppressing Waldenses* and Cathari,* and the punishments included death. As the heresy spread to Italy, with a Cathar bishop in Florence and Rome, then in Spain, an inquisition was established. Gregory made special use of the Dominicans for this work, having canonized St. Dominic (1234), and supported the Camaldolese, Cistercians, and the followers of Joachim of Fiore. A close friend of Francis of Assisi, whom he canonized (1228), Gregory protected the order and fostered the Third Order and the Poor Clares. He sent both Franciscans and Dominicans as missionaries from Finland to Rumania. He labored at length, but unsuccessfully, to unite the Greek and Latin churches.

C.G. THORNE, JR.

GREGORY X (1210-1276). Pope from 1271. Born Teobaldo Visconti of Piacenza, he succeeded Clement IV (d.1268) after a vacancy of three years which ended when Bonaventura, Franciscan minister general, forced the cardinals into action. Canon of Lyons, then archdeacon of Liège, the future pope studied in Paris, then went to England in 1270 before setting out for the Holy Land. Unlike his predecessors, he concentrated less on secular concern than on spiritual revival and reunion. Interested in the affairs of the Latin East, the Kingdom of Jerusalem, he also established monarchical authority in Germany by inviting electors to designate a king of the Romans, persuading Alfonso of Castile to resign his claims. In 1273 at Lausanne he confirmed their election of Rudolph I of Hapsburg. He convoked the Second Council of Lyons to resume talks with the Greek Church, asking Michael VIII Palaeologus to send his ambassadors; agreement was reached, but the reunion was short-lived. A new crusade was discussed and financial preparations made, but nothing happened. Knowing the difficulty of his own election, Gregory had the council establish rules for papal election, for which he constitutionally created the conclave with Ubi periculum, 1274.

C.G. THORNE, JR.

GREGORY XI (1329-1378). Last of the Avignon popes. Born Pierre Roger de Beaufort, he was created a cardinal in 1348 by his uncle, Clement VI, and studied law at Perugia. Faced with arbitration between the houses of Anjou and Aragon concerning territorial rights and papal homage, he was compelled to wage a painful war against Florence and the Visconti which unleashed a general revolt in the Papal States (1375); Florence ended it by negotiation in 1377. He was concerned with reform in the religious orders, especially the Dominicans and Hospitallers, and with heresy. The Inquisition was reactivated, principally against the Waldensians, and certain of Wycliffe's* theses were condemned. As with Urban V before him, he wanted to take the papacy back to Rome, where he arrived in January 1377. Unable to settle the disturbances, he considered returning to Avignon, but death intervened—and the Great Schism* was to follow.

C.G. THORNE, JR.

GREGORY XII (c.1326-1417). Pope, 1406-1415. Angelo Correr was born in Venice, and was named Latin patriarch of Constantinople in 1390. From secretary and cardinal (1405) under Innocent VII he became pope in 1406. He promised to resign if elected so that his dual resignation with the antipope at Avignon could end the Western Schism caused by the double papal election of 1378. Gregory's envoys had reached Paris, where at Notre Dame in 1407 a solemn service of thanksgiving took place. Benedict XIII agreed to meet, but Gregory lost interest when Benedict changed his mind. Angry cardinals met at Pisa in 1409 to depose both popes and elect a third, Alexander V. Gregory though forsaken was still true pope and was supported by King Ladislaus of Naples, among others. When the Council of Constance recognized Gregory as true pope in 1415, he resigned his office. Benedict XIII refused to accept the conciliar decision, and in 1417 Constance named him heretical. Gregory became cardinal bishop of Porto and legate of the March of Ancona until his death.

MARVIN W. ANDERSON

GREGORY XIII (1502-1585). Pope from 1572. Born at Bologna, Ugo Buoncompagni became a professor of law at Bologna from 1531 to 1539. When Cardinal Parisio brought him to Rome in 1539, Paul III made him first a judge, then responsible to the Council of Trent, and finally vice-chancellor in the Compagna. He was ordained at forty, and under Paul III became bishop of Viesti. After the Council of Trent, Pius IV named him cardinal-priest in 1565. The papal election after Pius's death quickly resulted in Buoncompagni's elevation. Gregory XIII took as his motto the words, "Confirm, O God, what thou hast wrought in us." He was acceptable to Philip II, for in 1565 he had been sent to Spain for the Inquisition's trial of Carranza, archbishop of Toledo.

Barely three months after his election, Gregory celebrated the massacre of St. Bartholomew's Day* with a Te Deum at Rome. His election in 1572 and political events conspired to make him a restorer of Catholicism. Though he failed against England, the Turks, Sweden, and Russia, his pontificate is known as a high point of the Catholic revival. Charles Borromeo* inspired him, while Jesuit support from abroad and founding of the Gregorian University at Rome were solid achievements. The Quirinal Palace and the fountain in the Piazza Navona speak of the Baroque splendor which implemented the ideals of Trent. By 1585 all five points announced at Gregory's first papal consistory of 1572 had been started. Consolidation of the League against the Turks, fight against heresy by use of the Inquisition, and internal reform by employing Tridentine legislation were realities. In addition there were now friendly relations with the Catholic princes and improved supervision of papal states.

MARVIN W. ANDERSON

GREGORY XVI (1765-1846). Pope from 1831. Born Bartolomeo Alberto Cappellari, he devoted his reign to the consolidation of the papacy as the locus of authority in the church and as definer of religious principles for society. The Revolution of 1831 at Rome faced him immediately with revolutionary principles; he called in Austrian troops to put it down. He determined to implement the ideas he published earlier in Il trionfo della Sante Sede e della Chiesa (1799), which claimed that the church was divinely ordained with an independent and unchanging constitution with the pope the infallible head; the Papal States* were an unchanging patrimony to ensure spiritual independence from all states. Gregory's two secretaries of state, Cardinals Bernetti and Lambruschini, helped him hold his own, with help from Austrian troops, against intervention by the powers of revolution. The holocaust only broke in 1848 under Pius IX.* In numerous encyclicals he tried to pinpoint the religious errors animating movements against, or at least unsympathetic with, his own religious-cultural ideal. Mirari vos (1832) and Singular nos (1834) were his most significant, occasioned by the troubles in the Papal States and the writings of Lamennais.* He condemned revolution, liberalism, traditionalism, and separation of church and state, and mandated support of the "alliance between Throne and Altar," and his Temporal Power. In promotion of the Catholic Church he stimulated enormous missionary activity worldwide, especially in Asia and Latin America. He named nearly 200 missionary bishops, as he managed to centralize Catholic missions directly under the papacy. Before election as pope he became a monk (1783), procurator-general (1807) and vicar general (1823) of the Camaldolese Order, prefect of the Propaganda Fide (1826), and cardinal (1826).

See J. Leflon, La crise revolutionnaire, 1789-1846 (1949), and E.E.Y. Hales, Revolution and Papacy, 1769-1846 (1966). C.T. MC INTIRE

GREGORY OF AGRIGENTUM (c.559-c.638). Byzantine prelate. Born near Agrigentum, Sicily, he traveled in North Africa and the Near East when he was only eighteen. He was ordained deacon by the patriarch of Jerusalem and was consecrated bishop in Rome at the age of thirty-one. Accused and imprisoned by enemies, on appeal to Pope Gregory I he was declared innocent and received with honor by Emperor Maurice. His ten-volume commentary on Ecclesiastes has been preserved, and he had an influence on the development of Byzantine ecclesiastical and literary styles. His life was written by Leontius, hegumen of the St. Sabas monastery in Rome.

GREGORY OF ELVIRA (d. after 392). Bishop of Elvira (Eliberis) near Granada, and greatly esteemed as a defender of Nicene orthodoxy and an opponent of Arianism. After the death of Lucifer of Calaris (whose decision not to pardon those who became Arians at the Council of Arminum [359] he approved), he became head of the followers (Luciferians) of Lucifer. Later he also attacked Priscillianism.* Recent research has restored his claim to literary fame by ascribing to him books that were thought to have been written by others: e.g., De fide orthodoxa, a defense of the use of homoousios; Tractatus Origensis, twenty essays (homilies) each arising from a text of Scripture; and Tractatus de epithalamio, homilies on the Song of Solomon. Gregory's exegesis of the Bible was allegorical. PETER TOON

GREGORY OF NAZIANZUS (330-389). Cappadocian Father.* Brought up on the family estate near the town in Cappadocia where his father, also named Gregory, was bishop and whence he derived his title, he was educated at Caesarea where he met Basil* and eventually the two friends, about 350, went on to the University of Athens. Gregory returned home about 358, and after a short career as a teacher of rhetoric he spent some time helping his aged father at Nazianzum and the remainder at Basil's monastic retreat. In 362 against his will his father had him ordained priest. Ten years later he reluctantly agreed with Basil's wish that he be bishop of Sasima, a position he never in fact fulfilled, and a place he never visited, preferring to assist his father at home. After the latter's death in 374 he retired to Seleucia in the province of Isauria.

Gregory was summoned out of his monastic peace to Constantinople to defend the Nicene faith against Arianism.* His ministry at the "Church of the Resurrection" in Constantinople made a significant contribution to the final establishment of the orthodox faith. During the council he was appointed bishop of Constantinople, but characteristically resigned the see when his election was disputed. After the council he went back to Nazianzum, where he took charge of the church, but from 384 he retired to his family estate where he finally died.

Although of unimpressive personal appearance and bearing, Gregory had an outstanding power of oratory which was used to great effect in his ministry at Constantinople. Most worthy of note are the famous five Theological Addresses against the Arians. After dealing with the Eunomians in the first oration and the nature of God in the second, he develops in the third and fourth the doctrine of God the Son. He shows that the orthodox teaching concerning the equality of Father and Son is much more Christian and more logical than the Arian concept of the Godhead. In the fifth oration Gregory treats the doctrine of the Holy Spirit and argues for the consubstantiality of the Spirit with the Father and the Son. Other writings include the Philocalia, a selection from the works of Origen which he compiled with Basil; several writings against Apollinarianism; and 242 letters and poems.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: P. Gallay, La Vie de Saint Grégoire de Nazianze (1943); J.H. Newman, Essays and Sketches, vol. III (1948); S. Plagnieux, Saint Grégoire de Nazianze théologien (1952).

G.L. CAREY

GREGORY OF NYSSA (330-c.395). Bishop of Nyssa, Cappadocian Father,* and younger brother of Basil* of Caesarea. A shy, gentle man of studious disposition, Gregory was totally dominated by his forceful brother whom he sometimes called "the Master." After a brief spell as reader in the church, he became a teacher of rhetoric and thereby incurred Basil's great displeasure at entering upon a secular life. In penitence he entered a monastery founded by Basil. In 371 he accepted Basil's invitation, although rather unwillingly, to become bishop of Nyssa.

Because he supported the Nicene faith Gregory was deposed by a synod of Arian bishops in 376, but regained his see in 378 when Emperor Valens died. Gradually his fame spread; about 379 he was asked to visit the Church of Syria to help solve the problem of schism in that see, and at the Council of Constantinople he took a leading part, not only delivering the inaugural address which is not extant, but also the funeral oration of Melitius of Antioch, the first president of the council. Very little is known of the later years of Gregory's life, but he appears to have traveled extensively.

In some respects Gregory was the most gifted member of a distinguished family. Although deficient in practical ability so clearly marked in the career of Basil, in originality and intellectual ability he was not only superior to his brother but an outstanding thinker of the fourth century. His theological views were more profoundly influenced by Origen than by any other teacher. His idealism, allegorical interpretation of Scripture, and doctrine of human freedom and the final hope indicate the extent of Origen's influence. But Gregory was no mere plagiarist; each subject was worked out carefully. In general his theology turned on the assumption that the world was ruined by the Fall which was a consequence of man's free will. Redemption is made possible by a remedial process both human and divine in the incarnation of Christ, the beneficient results of which are communicated through the sacraments. He was the first theologian to interweave firmly the doctrine of the sacraments into a systematic theology of the Incarnation.

His chief apologetic work was the Sermo Catecheticus, a manual of theology in which he deals at length with Christology and eschatology. The latter doctrine is based upon the views of Plato and Origen which Gregory believed to be consonant with Scripture. He took Paul's statement literally that God will eventually be "all in all," and saw hell as a process of ultimate purification rather than a place of eternal suffering. Gregory was a staunch supporter of the Nicene faith and was among the first to distinguish between ousia and hypostasis. The former he used to express essence, and the latter the distinctive peculiarity which was equivalent to prosōpon, "person." His supposed marriage to Theosobeia based upon allusions in his treatise on Virginity cannot be proved and must remain only a conjecture until fuller evidence comes to light. Such was Gregory's fame that at the Seventh General Council of the church he was entitled "Father of Fathers."

BIBLIOGRAPHY: S.M. Shea, The Church According to St. Gregory of Nyssa's Homilies on the Canticle of Canticles (1966-67); Gregorii Nysseni Opera (1967); R. Staats, Gregor von Nyssa und die Messialianer (1968); C.W. Macleod, "Allegory and Mysticism in Origen and Gregory of Nyssa," JTS, XXIII (October 1971). G.L. CAREY

GREGORY OF RIMINI (d.1358). Augustinian philosopher. Born at Rimini, he joined the Augustinian Hermits, studied in Italy, Paris, and England, and subsequently taught at Paris, Bologna, Padua, and Perugia. In 1340 he lectured on The Sentences in Paris, and in 1345 was made a doctor of the Sorbonne by Clement VI. He was elected vicar general of his order in 1357 and spent the last eighteen months of his life in Vienna. Considered by his contemporaries as one of the most subtle of philosophers, he furthered the Nominalist teaching of William of Ockham, though he was less skeptical. He held it was possible to demonstrate philosophically the spirituality of the soul, and he rebutted the Ockhamist assertion that God could cause a man to sin. He defended Augustinianism vigorously, teaching that works done without grace are sinful, and that unbaptized infants are damned. This last earned him the nickname tortor infantium ("infant torturer").

J.G.G. NORMAN

GREGORY OF TOURS (c.538-594). Frankish bishop and historian. Born Georgius Florentius Gregorius of a noble Roman family at Arverna (now Clermont-Gerrand), he was in 573 appointed bishop of Tours, and carried out his immense tasks with zeal and devotion. He saw to the administration of an important diocese, disciplined an unruly clergy and members of religious orders, defended Catholicism against Arianism, kept order in Tours (the site of a pilgrimage center), and attended to secular judicial duties. Except for a short period of antagonism by King Chilperic (576-84), Gregory was on amiable terms with all four rulers of Tours during the time he was bishop, and often advised them on matters of state.

Gregory's writings consist of ten books of history, seven of miracles, a book on the lives of the Fathers, a commentary on the Psalms, and a treatise on offices of the church. His best-known work, Historia Francorum, treats the history of the world to 511 in the first two books, and the history of the Franks to 591 in the remaining eight books. Some of the latter give an almost exhaustive account of Gregory's activities around Tours. The dominant theme of his history is concerned with the spread of Christianity through the exploits of Catholic kings and the work of missionaries and martyrs. Although he wrote in crude Latin and his historical methods were questionable, his works provide an invaluable knowledge of sixth-century Gaul. His writings and life reveal him to be a sincere and eloquent spokesman for the developing early church.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: O.M. Dalton (ed. and tr.), The History of the Franks (2 vols., 1927); W.C. McDermott (tr.), Selections from the Minor Works (1949); J.M. Wallace-Hadrill, The Long-Haired Kings (1962). ROBERT G. CLOUSE

GREGORY OF UTRECHT (c.707-c.775). Missionary and abbot. Son of noble Frankish parents, he was educated at the abbey of Pfalzel where his widowed mother was abbess. Hearing Boniface speak on the apostolic life in 722, he immediately joined him and remained associated with him as a fellow-laborer for more than thirty years, accompanying him to Rome in 738, where Gregory acquired valuable manuscripts. He became abbot of St. Martin's at Utrecht in 750, establishing there a kind of missionary college to which students flocked from almost all the German tribes and even England. He was appointed administrator of the diocese of Utrecht, but was never consecrated bishop, and following the death of Boniface was commissioned by Pope Stephen III to convert the Frisians. His biography as recorded by his pupil Liudger, first bishop of Munster, stresses his contempt of riches, seriousness, forgiveness, and charity. MARY E. ROGERS

GREGORY PALAMAS (c.1296-1359). Greek theologian. After a broad education in Constantinople, at twenty years of age he became a monk on Mt. Athos in Greece. It was during his stay at Athos that Palamas developed much of his thinking on the subject of the mystical communion with God. He is reported to have excelled all his fellow monks in the area of asceticism. He was not able to isolate himself completely from the world, for he was called to be archbishop of Thessalonica after he became well known for his defense of Hesychasm.* The Hesychasts were attacked both for their mysticism and for their physical positions in relationship to prayer. Their opponents felt that God could not be known through mystical communion with God in intense meditation. They considered this as bordering on the deification of man. Some even thought the doctrine of Uncreated Light held by the Hesychasts was close to a doctrine of pantheism.

Gregory Palamas strongly defended the Hesychasts. He affirmed the theology of experience through meditation with God. God's essence could not be known, but His energies could. Palamas was not presenting something totally new, for Basil and the Cappadocian Fathers had earlier proposed this. By coming into contact with God's energies, man could have a direct relationship with God. Since God is light, the experience of God's energies takes the form of light. It is the same uncreated light of the Godhead which appeared on Mt. Tabor at the Transfiguration, according to Palamas. A council was held on this subject in Constantinople in 1341, and it sanctioned the doctrine of Uncreated Light relating it to the divine energy. It thus upheld the ideas of Gregory Palamas. GEORGE GIACUMAKIS, JR.

GREGORY THAUMATURGUS (c.213-c.270). Bishop of Neo-Caesarea. One of Origen's pupils during the first half of the third century, Gregory had been a pagan lawyer from Neo-Caesarea in Pontus when he came under the influence of Origen. He was converted and became an enthusiastic supporter of Origen's emphasis: that the church should attempt to use all wisdom and literature for its own use. The good of heathen learning should be used, the evil cast away. Gregory, like all of Origen's students, was led through various academic disciplines, culminating in theology. Soon after leaving Origen, who was in Caesarea of Palestine, Gregory was consecrated bishop of Neo-Caesarea. As bishop he made attempts to draw the Christian believers away from their pagan festivals by instituting martyrs' festivals which could substitute as times of celebration. His ministry appears to have been successful on a numerical scale, for there was a marked increase in the number of Christians on the completion of his ministry in Neo-Caesarea. His biography was written in the fourth century by Gregory of Nyssa. GEORGE GIACUMAKIS, JR.

GREGORY THE ILLUMINATOR (or "Enlightener") (c.240-332). Known as the "Apostle of Armenia." He is reported to have been the son of a Parthian who murdered King Khosrov I of Armenia. As a baby Gregory was removed to Caesarea in Cappadocia where he eventually became a Christian. He married and had two sons before returning to Armenia where he converted King Tiridates III to Christianity. He was consecrated bishop (catholicos) of the Armenians by the metropolitan of Caesarea. For several generations the episcopate remained in his family. His son and successor, Aristakes, attended the Council of Nicea (325). Agathangelus,* the first historian of Armenia, wrote a biography of him.

PETER TOON

GRELLET, STEPHEN (1773-1855). Quaker missionary. Étienne de Grellet du Mabillier was born in Limoges, France, and educated at the College the Oratorians, Lyons, becoming skeptical of Roman Catholic dogmas, however. During the revolution he joined the royal army, but was taken prisoner. Escaping to Amsterdam, he sailed for Demerara in Guyana, South America, and in 1795 went to New York. By this time a disciple of Voltaire, he was moved by William Penn's book No Cross, No Crown and later converted while hearing Deborah Derby, a Friend from Coalbrookdale, England. He joined the Friends in 1796. Speaking and "travelling in ministry" followed in America and Europe. In England (1813) he visited Newgate Prison and introduced Elizabeth Fry* to her life-work among prisoners.

J.G.G. NORMAN

GRENFELL, GEORGE (1849-1906). Baptist missionary. Born in Cornwall, he grew up in Birmingham, and after a short apprenticeship in the Cameroons (1875-78) he led a pioneer party to the Congo in 1878. By inclination an explorer, he traveled 15,000 miles on the Congo and its tributaries (1884-86), winning recognition from the Royal Geographical Society. For over twenty years he supervised Baptist Missionary Society work, and continued exploring in two steamers he himself assembled. His base after 1889 was Boloba, where he engaged in conventional missionary work. He considered European rule preferable to intertribal conflict and Arab slave-raiding. He therefore welcomed the Congo Free State and was at first highly regarded by its authorities. King Leopold consulted him in 1887 and appointed him to an international boundary commission in 1892-93. Later Grenfell condemned official atrocities and was treated with marked disfavor. This prevented him from completing a chain of stations linking up with the Church Missionary Society in East Africa. D.G.L. CRAGG

GRENFELL, SIR WILFRED THOMASON (1865-1940). Medical missionary and author. Born near Chester, England, his life of Christian service began in 1885 in response to a challenge presented by D.L. Moody at an East London tent meeting. After graduating in medicine he joined the Mission to Deep Sea Fishermen, became its superintendent in 1890, and cruised from the Bay of Biscay to Iceland, ministering to the physical and spiritual needs of the fishermen. In 1892 he went to Labrador and devoted the rest of his life to the welfare of its inhabitants. Before he retired in 1935 he had founded five hospitals, seven nursing stations, three orphanage boarding schools, cooperative stores, industrial centers, agricultural stations and, in 1912, the King George V Seaman's Institute in St. John's, Newfoundland. He annually cruised along the Labrador and Newfoundland shores with a hospital ship to minister in remote communities. Honored by numerous medical societies, geographical societies, and universities, he was knighted in 1927.

ROBERT WILSON

GREY FRIARS, see FRANCISCANS

GREY NUNS. A name given to "Sisters of Charity." The North American "Grey Nuns of Charity" were founded by Madame d'Youville in Montreal in 1737 as a small community of women devoted to the care of the sick. Their Rule (1745), besides the usual three vows, included the promise to devote their lives to the relief of suffering. They persisted in their dedication despite hostility and invective. They were called les soeurs grises ("the drunken sisters"), so they deliberately chose grey (gris) as the color of their habit (1755). They spread to other parts of North America, forming separate congregations, e.g., "Grey Nuns of the Cross" at Ottawa (1845), "Grey Nuns of Quebec" (1849), "Grey Nuns of the Immaculate Conception" (1926). The name is given also to Sisters of Charity in France, and to the "Grey Sisters of St. Elizabeth" in Germany. J.G.G. NORMAN

GRIESBACH, JOHANN JAKOB (1745-1812). NT scholar. Born at Butzbach, he was educated at Frankfurt-am-Main, Tübingen, Leipzig, and Halle, and became professor at Halle in 1773, and professor of NT at Jena in 1775. He was the first critic to make systematic application of literary analysis to the gospels, maintaining that Mark was the latest synoptic gospel, and basing his work on Matthew and Luke (the "dependence theory"). His major work lay in NT textual criticism. He published a critical edition of the Greek NT based on Elzevir (1774-77). He collated a great number of MSS, and developed Bengel's "family" theory, classifying the authorities into three classes or "families," Alexandrian, Western, and Byzantine (or Constantinopolitan). Subsequent NT criticism has built on his work.

J.G.G. NORMAN

GRIFFITHS, ANN (1776-1805). Welsh hymnwriter. Born Ann Thomas, she joined the Methodist society at Pontrobert in 1797 after experiencing evangelical conversion. She married John Griffiths of Meifod in 1804 and died the following year after the birth of a child. She was in the habit of composing hymns which she recited to her servant, Ruth Evans, who later married Methodist minister John Hughes. Between them they preserved and published the hymns of Ann Griffiths, comprising a remarkable literary phenomenon characterized by a masculine strength, complex biblical allusions, and a profound Christocentric mysticism.

GRIGNION DE MONTFORT, LOUIS-MARIE (1673-1716). Missionary, trained at the Jesuit College, Rennes. After a life devoted to prayer and poverty, he was ordained priest in 1700. From 1701 to 1703 he was chaplain to the hospital at Poitiers where he founded the "Daughters of Wisdom," a congregation devoted to the nursing of the sick and the education of poor children. In 1704, however, he regarded his true vocation as the missionary in W France. During the initial period he suffered from the jealousies of the Jansenists, who envied him his influence. Several years before his death he founded a second congregation, the "Company of Mary," a congregation of missionaries. Both foundations suffered severe numerical losses during 1715, but they have since been revived. His most famous work on devotion and mariology, Traité de la vraie dévotion à la Sainte Vierge, first printed in 1842, was popular with some English Catholics and was translated in 1863 by F.W. Faber. It has since been reprinted several times. Pius XII canonized him on 20 July 1947. GORDON A. CATHERALL

GRIMSHAW, WILLIAM (1708-1763). Anglican clergyman. Born in Lancashire of obscure parentage, he was educated at Christ's College, Cambridge, and became a typcial curate of his times until a long spiritual struggle culminated in a conversion experience in 1742. He knew nothing then of Whitefield or Wesley, but like the former was converted through reading Scripture and seventeenth-century books. He was incumbent of Haworth, Yorkshire (afterward famous for the Brontes), in a wild country with rough, illiterate people. His uncouth, racy preaching with plenty of humor; his athletic prowess that won their respect; his affection for sinner and saint; and his passionate sense of Christ as Savior made him a powerful evangelist. He transformed the whole place. Before sermon he would go out and round up shirkers with a riding crop, and his preaching brought many hearers from a distance. He took particular pains with the very poor, the isolated, and the sick. Because neighboring parishes never heard the Gospel, he went around preaching, and when their own slack clergy protested, his archbishop supported him. Grimshaw was an ally of both Whitefield and Wesley, but disapproved of the Wesleys' movement toward separating the Methodists from the Church of England. He trained many curates, and was a fine example of the Evangelical Revival in parish life.

JOHN C. POLLOCK

GRINDAL, EDMUND (1519?-1583). Archbishop of Canterbury from 1575. Born in Cumberland and educated at Cambridge, he adopted the Protestant views which were widespread in the university, and became vice-master of Pembroke Hall in 1549. Two years later he became chaplain to Ridley, then to Edward VI, and a canon of Westminster in 1552. During Mary's reign he was in exile, chiefly at Strasbourg, although he visited Frankfurt and was involved in the liturgical disputes there. Elizabeth made him bishop of London in 1559, whence he proceeded to York in 1570 and Canterbury five years later. In 1576 he rebuked the queen for ordering him to suppress the meetings of clergy known as "prophesyings," which he believed were an important means of improving the standard of preaching in the church. For his disobedience he was sequestered from his jurisdiction. Despite efforts at mediation, no real reconciliation with the queen was achieved before Grindal died, a blind and pathetic figure. Though his primacy has often been judged a disastrous failure, it is now coming to be viewed as an interesting and important attempt to establish a Reformed type of episcopacy in which the bishop sought a much closer working relationship with his brother clergy.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: J. Strype, The History of the Life and Acts of... Edmund Grindal (1821); E. Grindal, Remains (ed. W. Nicholson, 1843); S.E. Lehmberg, "Archbishop Grindal and the Prophesyings," Historical Magazine of the Protestant Episcopal Church, xxxiv (1965), pp. 93-97; P. Collinson, "Episcopacy and Reform in England in the Later Sixteenth Century," Studies in Church History, vol. III, ed. G.J. Cuming (1966), pp. 91-125. JOHN TILLER

GRONINGEN SCHOOL. A theological movement which flourished in the Dutch Reformed Church in the middle third of the nineteenth century. Dissatisfied with the formalistic religious establishment of the day, but opposed both to the conservative and pietistic approach of the "Awakening" (Réveil)* and to the rising influence of dogmatic liberalism, it tried to revive the humanistic and evangelical emphasis of earlier figures such as Coornheert* and Erasmus.* P.W. Van Heusde, who taught philosophy from a Christian Platonist standpoint at Utrecht, inspired most of the leaders of the movement, who gathered at the theological faculty at Groningen. Petrus Hofstede De Groot was the leader of the group; other prominent figures included W. Muurling, H. Muntinghe, L.G. Pareau, and J.F. Van Oordt.

After 1835, when the synod refused to censure them for their rejection of traditional Calvinism, their influence steadily widened. In its heyday around mid-century, the "Groningen School" was perhaps the dominant influence in the church. Its teachings emphasize walk of life rather than dogma. Man is characterized by an innate spiritual feeling which relates him to the divine. God has revealed Himself in Christ, who has taught us that our spiritual nature is fulfilled in love. The Gospel calls us to follow Christ, which we can do if we so will. God is to be seen as loving Father. Love of neighbor is more important than dogmatic system (the Trinity, e.g., is interpreted as a valuable symbolic insight rather than a statement of fact).

Such teachings were expounded in the movement's periodicals, Waarheid in Liefde ("Truth in Love") from 1837, and Geloof en Vrijheid ("Faith in Love") from 1867. The Groningen School was reluctant to deal in dogma and metaphysics, and this left it exposed to attacks, during the last third of the century, from "scientific" modernism, and from the Kuyperian revival of Calvinism, both of which stressed world-view as well as personal ethics.

See J.H. Mackay, Religious Thought in Holland During the 19th Century (1911); and Th. L. Haitjema, De richtingen in de Nederlandse Hervormde Kerk (2nd ed., 1953). DIRK JELLEMA

GROOTE, GERARD (Geert) (1340-1384). Founder of the Brethren of the Common Life.* Born of a wealthy family at Deventer, he studied law and theology at Paris. During his twenties, holding benefices at Aachen and then Utrecht, he led a worldly life, which did not satisfy him. He was attracted by the ideas of the mystic J. Ruysbroeck,* whom he met and conversed with. After a serious illness, Groote about 1374 was influenced by the Carthusian Hendrik Van Calkar and turned to a devout Christian life. Monastic life at the Carthusian house near Arnhem did not meet his needs, and he gained permission to preach in the diocese of Utrecht. He immediately gained wide popularity. His attacks on clerical abuses aroused some opposition. In 1380 Groote with his younger friend Florentius Radewijns* decided to form a group in Deventer for the cultivation of piety; this was the nucleus of the Brethren. He turned his own house over to a similar gathering of devout women, for whom he wrote a Rule. In 1383 his enemies were able to have permission to preach withdrawn from him. Groote started an appeal to Rome, but died in 1384 of plague. As an admirer of Ruysbroeck, Groote translated the mystic's Horarium into Dutch, and his Brulocht ("Marriage") into Latin.

See Th. Van Zijl, Geert Groote, Ascetic and Reformer (1963). DIRK JELLEMA

GROPPER, JOHANN (1503-1559). Roman Catholic theologian. Born in Soest, Westphalia, he studied in Cologne, and his chief activities were in the service of Hermann von Wied,* archbishop of Cologne. At the provincial synod in 1536, Gropper's reform program did not receive approval. In 1538, together with the canons of the Cologne council, he published a handbook of Christian doctrine which contained an exposition of the Decalogue, the Creed, and the seven sacraments. At the Colloquies of Hagenau and Worms (1540-41) he took a mediating position between Roman Catholics and Lutherans, setting forth the doctrine of double justification (justness by faith and justness by love), in which he evidenced the influence of Erasmus. His Liber Ratisbonesis became the basis of negotiations at the Colloquy of Ratisbon* (1541). However, he prevented Hermann von Wied from carrying through the Protestantization of Cologne as advocated in the Consultatio by Martin Bucer and Philip Melanchthon. Gropper participated in the Council of Trent, especially the third and fifth sessions (1546) and the thirteenth and fifteenth sessions (1551-52). He declined the appointment as cardinal by Paul IV. CARL S. MEYER

GROSSETESTE, ROBERT (c.1168-1253). Bishop of Lincoln and initiator of the English scientific tradition. Little is known of his life, but he was born of poor parents and studied at either Oxford or Paris. He became a member of the Arts faculty at Oxford and was made chancellor sometime between 1214 and 1221. He then became lecturer to the Oxford Franciscans (1229), leaving this post to take the bishopric of Lincoln (1235), England's largest diocese, where he remained till his death. He was a zealous bishop, deposing many abbots and priors because they neglected to staff adequately the parish churches in their care. He attended the Council of Lyons (1245) and in 1250 visited Rome, where he delivered a sermon in which he declared that the papal court was the origin of all the evils in the church; he objected also to the appointment of Italian friends and relatives of the pope to rich English benefices. The last years of his life were spent in a struggle to stop one of these appointments.

Grosseteste was just as independent in his dealings with the English monarch. He believed churchmen should not hold civil office and asserted that a bishop did not in any way derive his authority from the civil power. At times he refused to carry out royal orders in his diocese and threatened the king with excommunication.

He combined the churchman's active life with a variety of scholarly interests. He lived at a crucial period in the intellectual history of W Europe when the philosophic and scientific works of Aristotle were being recovered from the Muslims. As a teacher, commentator, and translator he took an active part in this movement. Although basically Augustinian in outlook and relying on standard authors, he was heavily influenced by Muslim, Jewish, and Aristotelian works. He never wrote a comprehensive philosophical work or devised a system, but his views had a profound effect upon later scientific thought. The most important of his many works are De Luce ("Light"), De Motu Corporali et Luce ("Corporal Motion and Light"), Hexameron, and commentaries on Aristotle's Posterior Analytics and Physics. Basic to Grosseteste's view of the universe is his metaphysics of light. He believed light was the first form to be created in prime matter, and from it all else developed. He also taught that God's existence could be proved from the argument of motion. Twentieth-century scholars have been interested in his recovery and elaboration of scientific method.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: S.H. Thomson, The Writings of Robert Grosseteste, Bishop of Lincoln, 1235-1253 (1940); A.C. Crombie, Robert Grosseteste and the Origins of Experimental Science (1953); D.A. Callus (ed.), Robert Grosseteste, Scholar and Bishop (1955). ROBERT G. CLOUSE

GROTIUS, HUGO (1583-1645). Dutch jurist and statesman. He entered the University of Leyden at the age of eleven and was practicing at the bar at The Hague at sixteen. In 1612/13 he became pensionary of Rotterdam and worked with Oldenbarnevelt in his struggle with Prince Maurice and the Calvinist party. In 1618 he was imprisoned for life by Maurice, but escaped to Paris in 1621, where in relative poverty he produced De jure belli et pacis (1625), the fruit of twenty years' thought, on which his fame largely rests. He served as Swedish ambassador in Paris, and was disappointed that because of religious prejudices he was never recalled to the service of Holland.

Grotius was a man of undeniable piety and prodigious learning, yet in the history of Christianity he has the ambiguous significance of a transitional figure, a humanist placed between Scholasticism and Enlightenment. He sought to interpret the Bible by the rules of grammar without dogmatic assumptions, but he had inadequate philological resources for the task. As a Christian and a statesman he sought to moderate the dogmatic controversies then rife in Europe, praying God in his last testament "to unite the Christians in one church under a holy reformation." He had tried to get ecclesiastical peace in Holland by preventing preaching on disputed points in the Calvinistic controversy, and he was often suspected —unfairly—of tendencies to Roman Catholicism.

Grotius did not look for a return to the Christian Middle Ages. The truth about him can be seen rather in his De veritate religionis Christianae (1627), a defense of basic Christianity for sailors meeting other religions. It is a simplification of parts of the Scholastic theological tradition, presenting Christianity as the true religion in harmony with God's rationally ordered world. Grotius thus points forward to the writers of Christian evidences in the eighteenth century. His faith in the orderliness of the world is basic to his work in theology as in jurisprudence. He sought amid disorder to realize and extend this order. He believed there was a law of nature deriving from God's will and known by reason. It was both to guide and to be upheld by the processes of law; where there was no judge, as in war, conflict was to be seen as a form of litigation. Thus human strife properly understood was at once limited by law and directed toward its realization. Grotius is regarded as a father of international law. He believed that the law of nature is intrinsic to the social being of man, and that God cannot alter it, any more than laws of number; the skeptical question, whether God therefore is unnecessary to the law of nature, was not pressing at this time and Grotius did not tackle it.

This problem lies near the heart of his defense of the Catholic doctrine of the Atonement against Socinus. He argues that God is free to relax the law that death follows sin, but not in such a way that the fundamental order of the universe, for which he is responsible as Moral Governor, is subverted. The sufferings of Christ are a penal example by which God upholds this order while remitting sin. This theory had considerable influence in Protestant theology into the nineteenth century.

See W.S.M. Knight, The Life and Works of Hugo Grotius (1925). HADDON WILLMER

GROVES, ANTHONY NORRIS (1795-1853). Plymouth Brethren* leader. After studying chemistry, dentistry, and surgery in London, Groves settled in dental practice first in Plymouth (1813), then in Exeter (1816). In 1826 he entered Trinity College, Dublin, to prepare for ordination, but came to see that "ordination of any kind to preach the gospel is no requirement of Scripture." In Dublin he associated with the group that included J.G. Bellett and J.N. Darby.* He influenced Bellett to the view that the principle of union among Christians was "the love of Jesus, instead of oneness of judgment in minor things. . . ." In Christian Devotedness (1825) he advocated complete dependence on God for temporal needs. This influenced George Müller toward his lifelong principle of faith, and through him a host of others.

Groves sailed with his party for Baghdad in 1829, remaining there three years, during which time his wife died of plague. He remarried in 1835. For nineteen years from 1833 he labored in India and was latterly joined by others. Watching with concern Darby's tendency to domination, Grove's letter to Darby in 1836 struck a prophetic note of the results of setting more store on correctness than love. Unwell in 1852, he returned to England and died in George Müller's house in Bristol (Müller's wife was Groves's sister). Groves's views strongly influenced early Brethren; he was probably the pioneer of simpler, apostolic missionary principles. His eldest son Henry, a gifted Bible teacher, was also a leader among early Brethren.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: H. Groves (his widow), Memoir of the late Anthony Norris Groves (1869); G.H. Lang, Anthony Norris Groves (1949); see also books listed under article PLYMOUTH BRETHREN. G.C.D. HOWLEY

GRUBER, F.X., see MOHR, JOSEPH

GRUNDTVIG, NIKOLAI FREDERIK SEVERIN (1783-1872). Danish bishop and hymnwriter. In his youth he experienced a personal crisis that led him first to the Romantic view of nature and religion, later to a personal Christian faith and more clarified biblical convictions. Except for short periods of service as a pastor, he lived as an independent writer (1810-25), struggling for the reintroduction of an orthodox Lutheran Christianity. About 1824 he once more experienced a religious crisis, caused by biblical criticism, which seemed to him to make his former orthodox view of the Bible untenable. It was during this crisis that he made his "unique discovery." This he published in 1825 in a pamphlet called Kirkens Genmaele ("The Church's Reply"), which argued that the sure foundation of faith is not to be found in the Bible, but in the living Word of God in his living congregation, i.e., in the risen Christ Himself, who lives and works in His congregation, when it gathers around the sacraments.

About 1830 Grundtvig three times visited England and was strongly impressed by the spirit of liberty and activity which he found characteristic of English society. This made him in later years an indefatigable advocate of liberty in both church and society. It is also reflected in his fairly optimistic view of man and in his educational ideals which made him one of the fathers of the Danish folk-high-school movement. From 1825 he was the leader of an ever-increasing following. In 1839 he was appointed clergyman of the Vartov Foundation in Copenhagen, where he worked until his death. He was given the rank of bishop in 1861. Through his views of church and sacraments, through his educational and liberal ideals, and as an unsurpassed writer of innumerable hymns, he left a lasting mark upon the Danish Church as a whole and on Danish society.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: N. Davies, Grundtvig of Denmark (1944); E.L. Allen, Bishop Grundtvig: a Prophet of the North (1947); P.G. Lindhardt, Grundtvig: an Introduction (1951).

N.O. RASMUSSEN

GUARANTEES, LAW OF. This defined the relationship between the Roman Catholic Church and the Italian kingdom after the annexation of the States of the Church. Passed by the Chamber on 13 May 1871, it determined the papal rights and prerogatives. The law declared the pope's person was inviolable, he would be accorded sovereign honors, he would receive an annual state grant, the Vatican, Lateran, and Castel Gandolfo properties would remain in his possession and be tax-exempt, the freedom of conclaves and general councils was assured, the seminaries in Rome and the Suburbicum were solely under papal control, foreign envoys to the Holy See were to enjoy the usual rights under international law, and the pope was guaranteed freedom of communication with the Catholic world. Pius IX categorically rejected the law, refused the financial offer, and withdrew into the Vatican as a voluntary "prisoner." It was formally abrogated by the Lateran Treaty (1929).

RICHARD V. PIERARD

GUELFS and GHIBELLINES. The two main party groups in medieval Italian politics. "Guelf" is derived from the name Count Welf (d.825), father-in-law of Louis the Pious and founder of the great German family of Welf; "Ghibelline" comes from Waiblingen, seat of the Hohenstaufen in Swabia, and from the battle cry Hie Weibling. Thus in the struggle between Frederick II and the papacy, the imperialists were termed Ghibellines and the pope and papal party Guelfs. From use in Tuscany in the thirteenth century the names spread throughout Italy and were used of opposing parties in many cities and towns. Hence diverse social, political, and religious factors contributed to the creation of the parties of Guelfs and Ghibellines. The exact meaning of each term thus differed somewhat from city to city—so much so, that in the sixteenth century the French kings and their supporters in Italy were called Guelfs, while the supporters of Charles V were called Ghibellines. PETER TOON

GUEUX. A nickname used during the revolt of the Low Countries against Spanish rule. As revolt neared (1566), a group of nobles including William of Orange and Henry of Brederode presented a list of grievances to the Spanish regent, Mary of Parma; one of her advisers jeered at the petitioners as ces gueux ("those beggars"). Brederode adopted the name proudly, and it soon was widely used for the rebels. It was applied more particularly to the "Sea Beggars," hit-and-run sea raiders, to whom Orange granted letters of marque (1569). Bitterly anti-Catholic (cf. their motto, "Sooner the Turk than the Pope"), they gained a reputation for desperate courage and cold-blooded plundering. When refused refuge in English ports, they took the port of Brill in Zeeland from the Spanish; it was thus the first "liberated" territory. As the revolt proceeded, the Sea Beggars were gradually merged into the growing rebel fleet. DIRK JELLEMA

GUICCIARDINI, FRANCESCO (1483-1540). Italian historian and statesman. Born into an aristocratic Florentine family, he studied law at Florence, Ferrara, and Padua, established a legal practice, then in 1511 became ambassador to King Ferdinand of Aragon. From 1516, three years after Leo X became pope, he served as governor of part of the Papal States, carrying out this and subsequent public positions with distinction. The changing face of the political scene and the differing attitudes of successive popes saw fluctuations in Guicciardini's fortunes thereafter, and finally he retired into private life, spending his last years in completing his History of Italy, regarded as a most significant source, especially for contemporary events. J.D. DOUGLAS

GUICCIARDINI, PIERO (Count) (1806-1886). Italian Protestant leader. Born in Florence of a noble and ancient family which included in its history Francesco Guicciardini,* he received a good general education and was at once attracted by the spiritual revival spreading in Tuscany. There, under Leopold II, there was a certain religious toleration. Invited to participate in the educational project directed by Lambruschini,* he founded the first kindergarten in Florence, showing marked organizing ability, intelligence, and common sense. The contacts with the Swiss Protestant Church in Florence and the study of the Bible led to his conversion in 1836, a date which he desired to be remembered on his tomb. Actively involved in preparing a religious reform, in the reaction and repression after 1848 (see RISORGIMENTO), he was imprisoned and exiled with many others, and took refuge in Britain. There he was warmly received by many noble families and came in close touch with the Open Brethren. At the invitation of the Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge he collaborated in a revision of the Italian Bible which had been translated by Diodati. The Guicciardini Bible of 1853 remained for a long time the best Italian translation.

A year later he returned to Italy at Nice, then part of the Sardinian kingdom, followed in 1857 by his great friend and collaborator Pietrocola-Rossetti,* with the purpose of preaching the Gospel to their compatriots. Guicciardini was the organizer of the movement, administering the gifts which came from Britain and adding much of his fortune. The communities formed were called Free Italian Churches, so anxious were the leaders to vindicate their antidenominational character and their Italian origin. The spreading of the movement occurred simultaneously with the liberation, and by 1870 there were more than thirty churches scattered throughout Italy. Guicciardini spent his last years in Florence. He had gathered a rich collection of religious works from Savonarola to the Italian reformers of the sixteenth century, which he bequeathed to the National Library in Florence. DAISY RONCO

GUILLAUME DE PARIS; GUILLAUME D'AUVERGNE, see WILLIAM OF AUVERGNE

GUINNESS, HENRY GRATTAN (1835-1910). Evangelist and writer. Born near Dublin and educated at New College, London, he was ordained an evangelist (1857), preached in Europe and America (1857-72), and had a part in the conversion of Dr. Barnardo in Dublin (1866). He founded the East London Institute for training missionaries (1873), the Livingstone Inland Mission in the Congo (1878), and other missions in South America and India, and all of these societies were in 1899 amalgamated into the Regions Beyond Missionary Union, which supported nearly one hundred and sent out more than one thousand missionaries. In 1903 he made a missionary tour of the world. His books include The Divine Programme of the World's History, Romanism and Reformation, History Unveiling Prophecy, and grammars of the Congo language.
C.G. THORNE, JR.

GUNKEL, HERMANN (1862-1932). German Protestant biblical scholar. Born at Springe (Hanover), he taught NT exegesis at Göttingen (1888), OT exegesis and history of Israelite literature at Halle (1889-93), Berlin (1894-1907), Giessen (1907-20), and Halle again (1920-27). He was a leading member of the Religionsgeschichtliche Schule (i.e., comparative religion school), and one of the first to develop the Form-Critical method in relation to the OT. His writings include Schöpfung und Chaos in Urzeit und Endzeit (1895), studying popular mythology underlying biblical ideas of the beginning and end of the present world order, commentaries on Genesis (1901) and 1 Peter (1907), and the influential Die Psalmen (1926-28), in which the Psalms are dated and interpreted on the basis of classification according to literary form. J.G.G. NORMAN

GUNPOWDER PLOT (1605). A conspiracy to blow up James I and the Parliament at the palace of Westminster, evidently with the aim of restoring Roman Catholic supremacy in England. Chief mover in the affair was Robert Catesby,* a zealous Catholic disappointed that his co-religionists had not received the greater toleration promised by James before his accession in 1603. Having gained access to the palace from a neighboring cellar, Guy Fawkes planted a considerable quantity of gunpowder some months before Parliament was due to assemble. Ten days before the opening on 5 November, the plot was revealed through an anonymous letter. Of the thirteen conspirators, four were killed resisting arrest, one died in prison, and the others were in due course executed.
J.D. DOUGLAS

GUNTHER, ANTON (1783-1863). German religious philosopher. Born at Lindenau in Bohemia, he studied law and philosophy at Prague, where his faith was shaken by his study of Kant, Fichte, and Schelling; but his appointment as tutor in the household of Prince Bretzenheim brought him under the influence in particular of C.M. Hofbauer* and his Christian convictions were restored.

He then began the study of theology and in 1822 entered the Jesuit novitiate at Starawicz, Galicia, but left in 1824. He lived at Vienna for the rest of his life, propagating his system of philosophy and speculative theology. He refused chairs at Munich, Bonn, Breslau, and Tübingen in the vain hope of a professorship at Vienna.

In the interests of apologetics he tried to combat the contemporary pantheistic idealism of Schelling and Hegel. His approach was rationalistic. He argued that the fundamentals of the Christian faith could be established by reason alone, that revelation was not an absolute necessity, and hence that faith should be changed into knowledge. Although his work was supported by a number of influential scholars and clerics, his writings were condemned by the Index in 1857 for their basic rationalism and its application to Christian doctrine. Gunther's system is implicit rather than explicit in his main writings: eight works in a collected edition, Gesammelte Schriften (9 vols., 1882); with J.E. Veith, Lydia, Philosophisches Jahrbuch (5 vols., 1849-54); Anti-Savarese, published posthumously (1883). After the definition of papal infallibility at the Vatican Council in 1870, many of his followers joined the Old Catholics.* HOWARD SAINSBURY

GURNEYITES. An American Quaker group named after Joseph John Gurney (1788-1847), a Quaker philanthropist. Born near Norwich, England, he briefly attended Oxford University, and became a Quaker minister in 1818. Many American Friends had by that time become intrigued by evangelical concepts and the revivals sweeping the country, when most of the Protestant denominations were engaged in the Second Great Awakening.* The Friends experienced a schism in 1827 when Elias Hicks of Long Island rebelled against a thoroughly evangelical statement of faith adopted by most of the Philadelphia Quakers (see HICKSITES). During 1837-40 Gurney toured America and the West Indies, preaching widely and becoming a rallying point in conforming to the revivalistic pattern, and eventually giving his name to the movement. His followers in time took on the characteristics of normative Protestantism, using the sacraments and having a minister preach at worship services. On his return to England, Gurney helped his sister, Elizabeth Fry,* in her work, and collaborated with Thomas Clarkson* and others for the abolition of the slave trade. He also wrote tracts on temperance and other subjects. KEITH J. HARDMAN

GUSTAV-ADOLF-WERK. This project of the German Evangelical Church, known until 1946 as Gustav-Adolf-Verein, originated in 1832 with G. Grossman of Leipzig who envisaged a living memorial to King Gustavus Adolphus of Sweden. It was popularized by R. Zimmermann in Darmstadt from 1841. Its purpose was to help Protestants in predominantly Roman Catholic areas like Bohemia, providing resources for all kinds of church buildings and activities. Since it was not exclusively Lutheran, stricter Lutherans preferred their own Lutherischen Gotteskasten. It was not a movement directed against Roman Catholicism, though it has been so interpreted. Its inspiration has been found in Galatians 6:10, and the application of the concept of the Diaspora (the dispersed people of God) to isolated groups of evangelical Christians in various kinds of alien societies, first made in 1855 by H. Rendtorff, has been influential. Since World War II, the work has been extended to cover the refugees from East Germany. A new concept of diaspora recognizes that in East Germany congregations live in the midst of Marxist atheism, and elsewhere they are scattered amid the godlessness of the world. HADDON WILLMER

GUSTAVUS ADOLPHUS (Gustav II) (1594-1632). King of Sweden (1611-32) and one of the most influential leaders of the seventeenth century. Soon after his accession he was forced to lead his armies into battle, defeating in turn Denmark (1611-13), Russia (1613-17), and King Sigismund of Poland (1621-29). His goal was the establishment of a Swedish empire in the Baltic area. When the Thirty Years' War* was going badly for the Protestants, Gustavus decided to intervene (1630). At first the German Protestant princes were frightened by the Swedish armies, but after the sack of Magdeburg (1631) they rallied to his cause. With their support Gustavus defeated Tilly, the imperial commander, at the Battle of Breitenfeld (1631) and at the Lech River (1632). Following these victories he restored the freedom of the Protestants in S and SW Germany. The worried Holy Roman Emperor reinstated Wallenstein, the mercenary commander, who met the Swedish menace at the Battle of Lützen. Although victorious, Gustavus was mortally wounded and died on the battlefield.

He is considered among the greatest military leaders in history. His field tactics, including the use of small, mobile, well-disciplined units skilled in musketry, were revolutionary. Within Sweden itself, with the support of his chancellor, Oxenstierna, he reformed the judiciary, established schools, encouraged industry, and built a strong economy. His intervention in Germany has been described by some as an attempt to become emperor, while others have felt that the "Lion of the North" wished only to save Protestantism.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: G.F. Macmunn, Gustavus Adolphus: The Lion of the North (1931); N.G. Ahnlund, Gustav Adolph the Great (tr. M. Roberts, 1940); M. Roberts, Gustavus Adolphus: A History of Sweden 1611-1632 (2 vols., 1953-58). ROBERT G. CLOUSE

GUSTAVUS VASA (Gustav I) (1496-1560). King of Sweden from 1523. He not only led Sweden to independence from Denmark, but established the Lutheran state church in his domain. During the Swedish war of independence the Roman Catholic Church made several ill-advised moves and stirred great opposition to Catholicism among Swedes at a particularly sensitive period in their history. For instance, Gustavus Trolle, archbishop of Uppsala, placed himself firmly on the side of Denmark; for his political activities he became known as the "Swedish Judas Iscariot." Though Gustavus Vasa (who led the independence movement after 1520) had some leanings toward Lutheranism, the issue that especially led him to break with Rome was his great need for money. His main support was the poor peasants; most of the nobles had been massacred by Denmark in 1520. The Roman Church controlled a great percentage of Sweden's wealth; some claim it owned as much as two-thirds of the land. The Diet and Ordinances of Westeras* (1527) confiscated most church property, ordered teaching of the Gospel in the schools, and provided for royal confirmation of the higher clergy. Lutheranism henceforth gained rapidly, especially under the influence of Lars Petersson, professor of theology at Uppsala and translator of the NT into Swedish (1526), and Lars Andersson, archdeacon of Uppsala, royal chancellor, and publisher of the entire Bible in Swedish (1540-41). HOWARD F. VOS

GUTENBERG, JOHANN (1398?-1468). Regarded as the inventor of printing in Europe. Born in Mainz, he moved to Strasbourg in the 1430s. Evidence given by witnesses in a lawsuit there seems to indicate he had constructed a printing press with movable type, although there are no printed specimens to support the claim. Having returned to Mainz by 1448, he borrowed money from Johann Fust who later became his partner. In 1455 Fust foreclosed on his loans and took over the printing operation in association with Peter Schoeffer. Although their appearance postdates this foreclosure, Gutenberg probably played an important part in the production of the 42-line Bible (the "Gutenberg Bible") which appeared in 1456 and is frequently considered to be the first book printed in Europe, and in the production of the Psalter of 1457 which apparently was the first dated book to appear in print in Europe.

T.L. UNDERWOOD

GUTHRIE, JAMES (c.1612-1661). Scottish minister. Son of an Angus landowner, he at first favored episcopacy, but at St. Andrews University he became a Presbyterian, and in 1642 was ordained at Lauder in Berwickshire. In 1646 he was one of the Scots commissioners sent to press upon Charles I the claims of Presbyterianism and the Solemn League and Covenant.* In 1649 he became minister of Stirling, where he confirmed his stance as a strong Covenanter* by declining Charles II's judgment in matters of doctrine. Later during the Cromwellian regime, however, he upheld the principle of the kingly office. In 1653 he published Causes of God's Wrath against Scotland which governed all conduct by "the duty of preserving and defending true religion." After the Restoration in 1660, Guthrie with others reminded Charles of his covenant obligation, but the petitioners were seized and imprisoned. Guthrie continued to deny the king's authority in ecclesiastical affairs, and was hanged in Edinburgh. J.D. DOUGLAS

GUTHRIE, THOMAS (1803-1873). Scottish minister and social reformer. Born in Brechin, he had an extensive university education at Edinburgh (1815-25), then, refusing to renounce evangelical principles in order to obtain a parish, studied medicine and social conditions in Paris. In 1830 he became minister of Arbirlot and in 1837 collegiate minister at Old Greyfriars, Edinburgh. His concern for the poor and for improving environment was expressed in The City: Its Sins and Sorrows (1857). He felt that the 1843 Disruption* was the inevitable response to the law that enslaved the church of Christ, and he became minister of Free St. John's until 1864. His "Manse Fund" within a year gathered £116,370 for those who had sacrificed home for conscience in joining the Free Church of Scotland.* His social reform proposals were numerous, and he championed especially the cause of Ragged Schools. He was one of the earliest supporters of the Evangelical Alliance.* His preaching attracted rich and poor in great numbers. His writings include The Gospel in Ezekiel (1855) which sold 50,000 copies. Guthrie's funeral in Edinburgh brought out some 30,000 mourners. J.D. DOUGLAS

GUTHRIE, WILLIAM (1620-1665). Scots Covenanting divine. He graduated in 1638 from St. Andrews, where he studied under his cousin James and in divinity under Samuel Rutherford.* Licensed to preach in 1642, he was a tutor before being called in 1644 to the Ayrshire parish of Fenwick. His preaching filled the church, and in pastoral visitation he was most diligent. In 1651, with Scotland divided between Resolutioners* and Protesters,* he supported the latter group. Under Cromwell he was one of the Triers. Such affiliations were inevitably suspect at the Restoration, yet when Charles II forced episcopacy on Scotland, Guthrie was overlooked until 1664, perhaps because of influential friends. Even then he was not hustled summarily out of his parish, like so many, but left Fenwick in 1665, only to die that year in Brechin of the kidney disease that had long afflicted him. Guthrie is best known for his little book The Christian's Great Interest (1658) which has passed into many libraries and languages. John Owen called him "one of the greatest divines that ever wrote." J.D. DOUGLAS

GUTZLAFF, KARL FRIEDRICH AUGUST (1803-1851). Missionary to China. Born in Pomerania, he was sent by the Netherlands Missionary Society to Singapore in 1823, and some three years later went on to Batavia, where he met W.H. Medhurst* and began the study of Chinese. In the 1830s he traveled along the Chinese coast distributing Christian literature before succeeding Robert Morrison* as Chinese secretary to the East India Company at Canton. He helped negotiate the Treaty of Nanking, and in Hong Kong elaborated a plan for the evangelization of China, writing voluminously to Germany urging support for his scheme. Unhappily, he became a victim of dishonest Chinese assistants. He died at forty-eight in Hong Kong, but not before inspiring others to form missions for China's evangelization. The Chinese Evangelistic Society, under which Timothy Richard* and J. Hudson Taylor* originally went to China, was one of those which owed its beginnings to Gutzlaff. LESLIE T. LYALL

GUYARD, MARIE (1599-1672). Roman Catholic missionary to Quebec. Born in Tours, France, she married to please her parents, though her real desire was to become a nun. After four years, during which she had a son, her husband died. In 1631 she decided to enter the Ursuline Convent in Tours. Eight years later she agreed to the request of her archbishop to go with two other nuns to the Jesuit mission in Quebec and there found a community of nuns. She became the first superior. The work was primarily educational and social among both Indians and French. She showed great fortitude, determination, and bravery. Throughout her life, both in France and Quebec, she received visions which on the instruction of her confessors she recorded. Her letters have been published in several French editions. In 1911 Pius X pronounced her Venerable.

PETER TOON

GUYON, MADAME (1648-1717). French Quietist.* Born Jeanne Marie Bouvier de la Mothe, she was an introspective and deeply religious girl who after a conventual education desired to enter a religious order, but was forced by her mother to marry in 1664 Jacques Guyon, a middle-aged invalid dominated by a tyrannical mother. Mme. Guyon's response was to retreat more deeply into a life of private contemplation, aided by excruciating forms of mortification and a mystical espousal to Christ.

Guyon died in 1676, but his widow now came under the spell of Molinos's writings and of a neurotic Barnabite friar, Lacombe. In 1680 she achieved a "unitive state" with the divine: "God-me" had supplanted "self-me," and a year later she began to receive visions and revelations. During her "Lacombe period" (1681-88) she wandered from place to place, often with the friar, seeking to found an "interior church" and give birth to "spiritual children," and writing some of her best-known mystical essays. She was arrested in 1688, but was freed on the intervention of Mme. de Maintenon. She began to exchange a series of spiritual letters with Fénelon,* who admired and later defended her, and she became prominent in court circles, lecturing in the Girls' School at St. Cyr. Bossuet,* alarmed by the nature and effects of her teaching and rumors of her private life, examined her writings in 1694. Thirty of her propositions were condemned, but though she recanted, a year later she was again imprisoned and spent six years first at Vincennes and then in the Bastille. Released in 1701, she spent the rest of her life in Blois.

IAN SELLERS

H

HABIT. Distinctive dress of religious orders. The practice of wearing a special habit goes back to the earliest days of monasticism in Egypt, possibly having its origin in the rough clothes of the anchorites, or even in the rough cloaks of the wandering Cynics (first century). It normally consists of tunic, belt or girdle, scapular, hood (men) or veil (women), and a mantle for use in choir or outdoors. Colors are usually white, brown, or black. Worn by all the old orders (monks, friars, nuns), it is dispensed with by some modern orders.

HADRIAN (76-138). Roman emperor from 117. At his accession as adopted heir to Trajan, Publius Aelius Hadrianus was already in his forties, a mature man with considerable humanistic concern for things Greek, for which he was to be known and ultimately judged. The decade of the 120s saw him tour almost all the empire. The Jewish Revolt of 132-35 was the sole severe strain within the state during his administration; one result was the distinguishing of Christianity from its roots. Hadrian's awareness of Christianity seems negligible, and he was certainly no persecutor; at most he maintained the policy enunciated by Trajan, while his reign saw the first Christian apologist Quadratus,* and the expansion of Gnosticism with Basilides. The story that he built temples without images for Christ is a fallacious product of later syncretistic concerns.

CLYDE CURRY SMITH

HADRIAN, for popes of that name see ADRIAN

HADRIAN THE AFRICAN (d.709). Monk and scholar. Native of Roman Africa, he became abbot of Niridan, a Benedictine house near Naples. Proficient in Greek and Latin learning and adept in canon law, he resisted his appointment by Pope Vitalian, a personal friend, to the vacant archbishopric of Canterbury. He did agree, however, to accompany his suggested nominee, Theodore of Tarsus, to England as adviser and defender of Roman orthodoxy. As abbot of SS. Peter and Paul's monastery and head of the school in Canterbury, he introduced a variety of disciplines, taught pagan and patristic literature, founded other schools, and educated students—notably Aldhelm—from as far as Ireland and the Continent. His contributions helped assure the dominance of Roman Christianity in Britain.

JAMES DE JONG

HAGENAU, COLLOQUY OF (1540). Called by the emperor Charles V in an attempted reconciliation between his Lutheran and Roman Catholic subjects. Hermann von Wied, Johann Gropper, and Martin Bucer were among the participants. The Colloquy had no permanent results. It was adjourned to meet in Worms in November 1540.

HAGIOGRAPHY. That special category of biographical literature centering upon those regarded as "holy." Such hagiography ranges from the life of one saint to the complex collections of lives of saints encyclopedically arranged. Hagiographic literature within the Hebrew-Christian tradition belongs already to the literature of the OT. It is further embellished in the Apocrypha and Pseudepigrapha, plays little part in the NT (unless one includes in it certain aspects of the gospels or the Acts of the Apostles), but is of increasing importance from the second century on, including much of the Apocryphal New Testament,* with Eusebius of Caesarea representing the first major collector and illustrating the close alliance with "martyrology."

CLYDE CURRY SMITH

HAGUE, DYSON (1857-1935). Clergyman, educator, and author. Graduate of arts and divinity at the University of Toronto, he was ordained in 1883, was curate at St. James' Cathedral, Toronto, rector of St. Paul's, Brockville, Ontario, and of St. Paul's, Halifax, Nova Scotia. In 1897 he became professor of apologetics, liturgics, homiletics, and pastoral theology in Wycliffe College. In 1901 he returned to pastoral work. He wrote numerous pamphlets, and several books on Anglican liturgy.

HALDANE, JAMES ALEXANDER (1768-1851). Scottish evangelist. Born in Dundee two weeks after his father's death, he lost his mother when he was six; he and his brother Robert* were placed under the guidance of two kind and understanding uncles. After schooling in Dundee and Edinburgh, he studied at Edinburgh University, then in 1785 joined the navy, and at an early age attained command of an East Indiaman, achieving fame as an officer of coolness and resource. After spiritual self-questioning he left the sea in 1794 and settled in Scotland. Later he was converted, and this led eventually to a series of remarkable itinerancies during which he preached the Gospel in every part of Scotland. In 1797 he founded the Society for Propagating the Gospel at Home, after discovering that the Church of Scotland was as little interested in home as in foreign missions. In 1799 he became the first Congregational minister in Scotland, and two years later was installed in the new "Tabernacle" in Edinburgh—an impressive building with seating for more than 3,000, where he was to minister for almost fifty years. Like his brother Robert, he embraced Baptist principles. Concerned with restoring the life and conditions of the apostolic church, he was an advocate of the kind of church fellowship which in the next generation was developed by the Christian Brethren.

See A. Haldane, The Lives of Robert ... and James Alexander Haldane (1856).

J.D. DOUGLAS

HALDANE, ROBERT (1764-1842). Scottish evangelist, writer, and philanthropist. Born in London of an ancient Scottish family, he lost both parents by the time he was ten years old. Educated in schools at Dundee and Edinburgh, he joined the navy in 1780, but soon abandoned that career to return to his Stirlingshire estate, where he gained a reputation as a farmer and landscape gardener. Converted in 1795, he resolved to devote life, talents and fortune to the Christian cause. He sold his estate, determined to finance and participate in missionary work in India, but that door was closed through opposition from the East India Company. The 1796 Church of Scotland general assembly, controlled by Moderates,* also decided against foreign mission work, and much of Robert's money went into establishing preaching "tabernacles" and theological seminaries.

Although not best known for his preaching, he greatly furthered the work of evangelism, in cooperation with his brother James.* He was the moving spirit behind the bringing of twenty-four children from Sierra Leone to be educated in Britain for five years, and was himself prepared to assume complete financial responsibility for the project. As an active friend of the Bible Society, he challenged its circulation of the Apocrypha with the Bible in continental Europe, thus beginning a controversy that lasted for many years. His written works include Evidences and Authority of Divine Revelation (1816), and a commentary on the epistle to the Romans, based on lectures given to students in Geneva during a period of evangelistic work in Switzerland and France (1816-19).

J.D. DOUGLAS

HALES, ALEXANDER OF, see ALEXANDER OF HALES

HALF-WAY COVENANT (1662). The admission to New England church membership of more than the dedicated elite. The Massachusetts Synod of 1662 asserted that baptized adults who professed faith and lived uprightly, but who had had no conversion experience, might be accepted as church members. Their children, baptized as "half-way" members, could not receive the Lord's Supper or participate in church elections. This dual conception of membership, forced on churches by declining power and widely modified by 1700, opened the churches to a cross-section of New Englanders. That practice prompted attempts, notably that of Jonathan Edwards, to restate Calvinist orthodoxy. DARREL BIGHAM

HALL, JOSEPH (1574-1656). Bishop of Norwich. He gained early distinction by publishing satirical verse, meditations, and (in 1610) a controversial work against the Brownists, John Robinson and John Smyth. James I made him dean of Worcester and in 1618 sent him as his representative to the Synod of Dort, where he advocated moderation and mutual charity. Though brought up a Calvinist, he regarded the Church of Rome as corrupt but still catholic. As bishop of Exeter from 1627, he secured conformity by a conciliatory policy toward the Puritans which was regarded with suspicion by Archbishop Laud.* In 1640 Hall published his Divine Right of Episcopacy, and his Humble Remonstrance to the High Court of Parliament (1640-41) brought a reply from five Puritans whose initials made the name "Smectymnuus." In 1641 he was translated to Norwich, but the revenues of his see were sequestrated by Parliament. His Hard Measure relates his subsequent poverty and sufferings. JOYCE HORN

HALL, ROBERT (1764-1831). English Baptist minister. Born in Arnesby, Leicestershire, where his father was a Baptist pastor, he was a precocious boy, writing hymns before he was nine and preaching his first sermon at eleven. He was educated at the famous Nonconformist academy run by John Ryland, baptized in 1778, studied at the Baptist Academy, and graduated in 1785 from Aberdeen University. Hall began his ministry as an assistant in Bristol and very quickly established a reputation as an eloquent preacher and a shrewd apologist for Christianity. Theologically he moved his position from an early Calvinism to a basically Arminian system. He was deeply interested in the rapid progress of scientific research and was friendly with Joseph Priestley, the leading Unitarian. In 1791 he moved to Cambridge, where he succeeded Robert Robinson in the pastorate, and continued to cultivate his scientific acquaintances. A period of ill health included two periods of mental breakdown, and at this time, like many others, he sought alleviation in drugs. Then during a period of prescribed rest he had a profound religious experience which he himself described as his "conversion," and in 1807 moved to become minister of Harvey Lane Baptist Church, Leicester, where his ministry was wide and influential.

Like many evangelicals of the time, Nonconformist and Anglican, he took a close interest in social need. He published a pamphlet appealing for help for a fund to provide relief for the distressed stocking-makers of Leicester during periods of unemployment: the germ of the trade union movement could be seen in this development. In 1825 he returned to Broadmead Baptist Church, Bristol. His influence on the Baptist denomination, particularly in moving it away from the at-times sterile Calvinism of the eighteenth century, left its permanent mark. His Works, extending to six volumes, were published with a biography by O.G. Gregory a year after his death.

A. MORGAN DERHAM

HALLBECK, HANS PETER (1784-1840). Moravian missionary to South Africa. Born in Sweden, he studied theology at Lund before joining the Moravian Brethren.* From 1817 until his death he was superintendent of their mission in the Cape Colony. This was a period of consolidation and expansion. Five new missions were established, two of them among Africans, and pastoral work was extended from the closed settlements to neighboring farms. Hallbeck laid stress upon Christian education and established a training school at Genadendal to provide indigenous helpers for the mission (1838). He was a gifted administrator. The regulations governing mission settlements were improved, giving communicant householders a share in the administration. After 1838 many emancipated slaves were successfully integrated into the communities. Hallbeck maintained the good reputation of the Moravians and cooperated wherever possible with the colonial government. He detested the pass laws which restricted Hottentot freedom, but did not oppose them publicly. In 1836 he attended the Moravian Synod, at which he was elected and consecrated bishop. D.G.L. CRAGG

HALLELUJAH. From the Hebrew word meaning "praise ye Yah(weh)"; the Greek and Latin versions transliterated it as alleluia, whence the alternative English spelling. In the Bible it occurs only in the latter part of the Psalter and in Revelations 19:1-6. The precise phrase is found only in hymnic context, and only as the beginning or conclusion of a cultic acclamation (with a single exception). All the Psalms containing the phrase appear to be relatively late (none is ascribed to David), and it seems evident that the term became a fixed part of the later temple liturgy. The preponderance of occurrences is at the beginning of individual psalms, and it may be inferred from Psalms 135:19ff. that the Levites had special responsibility for uttering it, probably as a summons to praise. 1 Chronicles 16:36 suggests that the congregation uttered it in response, at the close of hymns of praise. Revelation 19 (as also Tobit 13:18) uses the term in eschatological context. The Hallelujah Psalms had considerable use in the synagogue liturgy by NT times, and the Christian Church also adopted the term (in transliteration) from the earliest times. It has played its part throughout the history of Christian liturgy (for which see s.v. "Alleluia" in the New Catholic Encyclopedia) and in Christian hymnody.

D.F. PAYNE

HALLER, BERCHTOLD (1492-1536). Swiss Reformer. Born at Aldingen, he studied theology at Cologne, taught for a time, became a spiritual notary in 1517, and assistant and then successor to Thomas Wyttenbach at the Church of St. Vincent, Berne. Here he became imbued with Zwinglian ideas. One of a circle of Evangelical clergy in Berne, he was left alone when the rest were forced to flee in 1523, he himself being tried but acquitted of heresy. With popular backing he gradually won the town council to his Reformed views, defending his actions at the conferences of Baden and Berne (1526 and 1528), compiling with Kolb a Protestant liturgy, and issuing a reformatory edict in 1528. By now the acknowledged spiritual leader of his town, he spent his later years in a round of preaching, visiting and catechizing, in efforts to strengthen the Reformed cause diplomatically, and in controversy with the Anabaptists. IAN SELLERS

HALLESBY, OLE KRISTIAN (1879-1961). Norwegian theologian. Son of a farmer and originally deeply rooted in the Lutheran piety of the "Haugean" tradition (see HAUGE, H.N.), he studied theology and adopted the outlook of the liberal school. In 1902 he experienced a conversion and reverted to the biblical faith and piety of his fathers. For some years he worked as an itinerant lay preacher and was the means of awakenings in several places. He was called to the chair of dogmatics at the Free Faculty of Theology and took the post after acquiring his doctorate in Berlin. From 1909 to 1952 he lectured on dogmatics and in a sense became the teacher of a whole generation of Norwegian ministers. As chairman of the Norwegian Lutheran Home Mission he exerted a great influence on lay Christians all over the country.

Hallesby was the leading light in the opposition of conservative pastors and laymen to the liberal theology. In 1920, on his initiative, a meeting of representatives of home and foreign mission societies decided to cease cooperation with liberal theologians. During the years of German occupation in World War II (1940-45) he was one of the leaders in the church's resistance to the Nazi government. He was arrested in 1943 and lived in a concentration camp until liberation came in 1945. Hallesby wrote textbooks on dogmatics and ethics, and many devotional books, including Prayer (ET 1948) and Why I am a Christian (ET 1950), some of which were translated into many languages. He was also the first president of the International Fellowship of Evangelical Students (1947). CARL FR. WISLOFF

HALO (Gr. halōs, "nimbus"). A circle or disc of light with which the head of Christ, the Virgin Mary, or a saint is surrounded in Christian art. This usage was taken over from religious symbolism within Hellenism and the Roman Empire, wherein gods and some emperors were represented with halos around their bodies or heads. Since the third century there has been a gradual development of usage within Christendom. At first it was deemed proper only to use the halo, whose usual color was blue, for Christ, but from the time of Leo I it was extended to include the Virgin and the saints. During the Middle Ages several types were in currency, but the color now was usually yellow or gold. A plain, round halo was used for angels and saints; a round one with a suitable distinguishing characteristic (e.g., a cross or monogram) for Christ; and a rectangular one for living dignitaries—e.g., that of Gregory the Great in the monastery of Clivus Scauri at Rome. Within contemporary Catholicism the halo is used only for the saints and those of the "blessed" who are venerated. PETER TOON

HALYBURTON, THOMAS (1674-1712). Scottish theologian. Born near Perth, son of a Presbyterian minister ejected in 1662 for nonconformity, he was educated at Rotterdam and at St. Andrews University, was minister of Ceres (1700-10), then became professor of divinity at St. Andrews two years before his early death. Halyburton was a champion of Reformed theology in the controversy over Deism, and this prompted his chief work which was reissued in 1865 as Essay on the Ground of Formal Reason of a Saving Faith. His other writings include Memoirs which have been frequently reprinted. Archibald Alexander of Princeton spoke most highly of Halyburton, who was regarded by others as one of Scotland's greatest theologians. J.D. DOUGLAS

HAMANN, JOHANN GEORG (1730-1788). German religious thinker. Born in Königsberg, he had an irregular education, became a private tutor, and underwent a religious experience in 1758 during a business trip to London. Returning to Königsberg, he secured a minor customs post and in his spare time began to study as extensively as possible. Soon, despite his eccentric, angular style of writing, he was an acknowledged leader of the literary Sturm und Drang movement. The most evangelical of this school, Hamann rediscovered in Luther's work a spontaneous personal faith, a universal concern, and a vastly widened field of religious experience which rose superior to Protestant scholasticism, pietistic subjectivism, and rationalistic philosophy, and which in a series of notable works, particularly Golgotha und Schehlimini (1784), he strove to commend to his countrymen. As a self-appointed rejuvenator of German Christianity he exercised an important influence on Herder, Schleiermacher, and Kierkegaard. IAN SELLERS

HAMARTOLOS, GEORGE, see GEORGE HAMARTOLOS

HAMILTON, JOHN (1512-1571). Archbishop of St. Andrews; the last Roman Catholic to hold that office. Born in Edinburgh, he became abbot of Paisley when only fourteen and held the post until his death. Few details of his early career are known for certain. He matriculated at St. Andrews University (1528), later spent some time studying in France, and through influential family connections was appointed in 1543 as privy seal, to which was later added the lord treasurership. After protracted controversy he was in 1546 consecrated as bishop of Dunkeld, but was soon translated to the primacy. In 1552 there was published Archbishop Hamilton's Catechism, a highly regarded product of St. Andrews University, the precise authorship of which cannot be determined. Even after the Reformation in 1560 he maintained his opposition, continued to be known as archbishop of St. Andrews though latterly a political figure only, retained his seat in Parliament, and baptized the future James VI after the Roman form. A supporter of Mary, Queen of Scots, in her trials, he was finally indicted as a traitor and hanged at Stirling. J.D. DOUGLAS

HAMILTON, PATRICK (1503-1528). Generally regarded as the proto-martyr of the Scottish Reformation. Of aristocratic lineage, he was sent to Paris University about 1515 and graduated five years later, soon after Luther had posted his theses. He matriculated at St. Andrews University in 1523, fired up by the Lutheran opinions expressed by those for whom the Word of God had become a living force. Hamilton probably taught in St. Andrews, but in 1527 he fell foul of Archbishop Beaton and was compelled to flee to the land of Luther. Later that year he returned to Scotland, intent on preaching the Gospel. Early in 1528 Beaton summoned him to St. Andrews, ostensibly to debate, but in reality to put him to death hurriedly before influential friends could muster support. Sentence was passed by the ecclesiastical court, and Hamilton was burnt in St. Andrews, His murderers expected by summary treatment of one of high rank to intimidate others and suppress the rising tide of Reformation. The opposite effect was produced; great discussion ensued, and as one bystander said, "The reek [smoke] of Mr. Patrick Hamilton has infected as many as it did blow upon." J.D. DOUGLAS

HAMLIN, CYRUS (1811-1900). American Congregational missionary and educator. Born near Waterford, Maine, he graduated from Bowdoin College (1831) and Bangor Theological Seminary (1837). He went to Turkey under the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions. In 1840 he founded a seminary at Bebek. He resigned from the American Board and in 1863 opened Robert College, later moving it to Constantinople. Roberts, the school's benefactor, was persuaded because of a misunderstanding to dismiss Hamlin as college president in 1877. Hamlin then taught at Bangor Seminary for three years, became president of Middlebury College, Vermont, in 1881, and retired in 1885. He published Among the Turks (1878) and My Life and Times (1893). ROBERT C. NEWMAN

HAMMOND, HENRY (1605-1660). Anglican divine. Born at Chertsey, Surrey, and educated at Eton and Magdalen College, Oxford, he was ordained in 1629 and in 1633 was appointed rector of Penhurst, Kent. His ten years of parish ministry helped to prepare him to defend and explain the doctrine and practice of the Church of England in the revolutionary period, 1640-60. Returning to Oxford during the Civil War, he was appointed by the king, whose faithful servant he became, to a canonry at Christ Church in 1645. During the Parliamentary Visitation he lost this, and eventually settled down at Westwood in Worcestershire. He excelled as a writer and is chiefly remembered for his Practical Catechism (1644) and Paraphrases and Annotations on the New Testament (1653). Most of his numerous controversial tracts are printed in his Miscellaneous Theological Works (4 vols., 1847). PETER TOON

HAMPTON COURT CONFERENCE (1604). Following the presentation of the Millenary Petition* by the Puritans, James I agreed to the suggestion of a conference between representatives of the bishops and the Puritans. He decided to be the chairman. The conference, lasting four days, took place in January 1604 at Hampton Court Palace; the leading participants were Bishops Bancroft and Bilson on one side, J. Reynolds and L. Chaderton on the other. Though many of the Puritan demands were dismissed, the king did admit the justice of some of them. He agreed to allow minor changes in the Book of Common Prayer, to attenuate the power of the High Commission, to improve parish livings and eliminate plurality, to change the methods of suspension and excommunication, and to gain a new translation of the Bible. In reality only the latter—the famous Authorized Version—ever came to fruition. PETER TOON

HANDEL, GEORGE FRIDERIC (1685-1759). Music composer. Unlike Bach, who was born in the same year, Handel was not of a musical family, and his father only grudgingly acknowledged his musical talent and destined him for law. He received his early musical training from the distinguished organist and composer Zachow, in Halle. The greater part of his career was concerned with dramatic music, opera, and oratorio. His only music written for the church consists of his early German passions, the Latin psalms written during his sojourn in Italy, the cantata-like anthems composed for the British duke of Chandos, and occasional festal works for coronations and national celebrations. In the last category are the magnificent "Utrecht" and "Dettingen" Te Deums. The failure of his Italian opera enterprises in London led him to turn more and more to oratorios based on biblical themes. These appealed to a wider public in England because of the vernacular text and familiar plots. With the exception of Messiah and Israel in Egypt, which draw entirely upon direct biblical texts, the oratorios employed versified librettos, not always of great poetical merit.

Handel completely overshadowed his English contemporaries with the dramatic grandeur of his style and his instinct for excellent choral effect. The nobility of his melody, together with these other attributes, places him among the greatest composers of all time. The classical masters, Haydn, Mozart, and Beethoven, admired and drew inspiration from his choral style. Oratorio was conceived as edifying Lenten entertainment, but numerous extracts from Handel's works of this sort found their way into the repertory of church choirs. Messiah (written 1741, first performed 1742), became the most performed major choral work in history, and continues to be. Handel was also an outstanding composer of chamber music and concertos.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: R.M. Myers, Handel's Messiah: A Touchstone of Taste (1948); W. Dean, Handel's Dramatic Oratorios and Masks (1959); P.H. Lang, George Frideric Handel (1966).

J.B. MAC MILLAN

HANNINGTON, JAMES (1847-1885). Anglican missionary to East Africa. Born at Hurstpierpoint, Sussex, he was educated at Brighton and then entered business and the army. In 1868 he enrolled at St. Mary Hall, Oxford, to train for the Anglican ministry, to which he was ordained in 1874. In 1882 he offered to the Church Missionary Society and was appointed to Uganda. He reached Lake Victoria on his way out, but was forced to return to England suffering from malaria and dysentery. On his recovery he again offered to the CMS and was consecrated the first bishop of Eastern Equatorial Africa at Lambeth in 1884. In 1885 he reached Mombasa, and after superintending the work at Freretown near Mombasa he set off on foot with porters for Uganda. He reached Busoga on Lake Victoria, and there he was arrested and later killed on the orders of Mwanga, the treacherous Kabaka (ruler) of the Baganda. JOHN WILKINSON

HARDENBERG, ALBERT RIZAEUS (1510-1574). German Reformer. Born at Emden in East Friesland, his early education was at the school of the Brethren of the Common Life in Groningen, where he became an admirer of Wessel Gansfort.* As a student at Louvain he aroused suspicion by his humanistic-evangelical leanings. While gaining a doctorate at Mainz he came into contact with the Polish Calvinist Jan Laski* (John à Lasco). After briefly teaching at Louvain, he returned to the Groningen area, keeping in touch with Laski and Melanchthon. After a visit to Wittenberg he became actively involved in the Reformation. In 1544 he went to Cologne, aiding Archbishop Hermann von Wied in his short-lived attempt to reform the Catholic Church there. After appearing at the Diets of Speyer and Worms (1544, 1545) he became military chaplain to the count of Oldenburg, and was wounded in battle. The count made him the first evangelical preacher at the cathedral in Bremen. Expelled from Bremen for Calvinistic views of the Eucharist, Hardenberg later became pastor of a Calvinist church in his birthplace of Emden. He edited for publication the works of Wessel Gansfort.

DIRK JELLEMA

HARDENBERG, F.L.F. VON, see NOVALIS

HARDING, STEPHEN (d.1134). Abbot of Cîteaux. Harding was born at Sherborne, Dorset, and as a young man traveled widely, visiting Scotland, Paris, and Rome. He joined the community at Molême in Burgundy where he failed to secure acceptance of the Rule of St. Benedict. Departing in 1098 with twenty others, including the abbot and the prior, he established a strict and austere religious house at Cîteaux, a very desolate spot. Here he was successively subprior, prior, and third abbot. The community flourished, and another thirteen houses of this new Cistercian* Order were founded largely by Stephen himself. He drew up the rule, instituted a general chapter, and introduced the famous white habit for his communities, obtained papal support and a large measure of freedom from episcopal control, and must along with Abbot Robert and Alberic the Prior be regarded as the founder of the Cistercian Order. IAN SELLERS

HARDOUIN, JEAN (1646-1729). Classicist and polemicist. Born at Quimper in Brittany, son of a bookseller, he joined the Jesuits, studied theology at Paris, and became librarian of the Jesuit Col-

lège Louis-le-Grand in 1683. He was a gifted numismatist, philologist, classical scholar, and editor, but his wild assertions earned him a certain notoriety. He claimed that, with a few salient exceptions, the Greek and Latin classics were the productions of thirteenth-century monks, and he asserted that some of the works of the Fathers were likewise spurious. Though he declared that all the church councils before Trent were fabrications, he nonetheless prepared careful transcripts of the texts for his excellent editions of the church councils from the year 34 to 1714, including a number never before published. This definitive work, Conciliorum collectio regia maxima, cosponsored by Louis XIV and his clergy, was suppressed by the French clergy for ten years until 1725 because it countered their Gallican pretensions. Hardouin rejected the Greek NT, insisting that Jesus had preached, and the NT had been written, originally in Latin. MARY E. ROGERS

HÄRING, THEODOR (1848-1928). German theologian. Born at Stuttgart and educated at Urach and Tübingen, he became professor at Zurich (1886), Göttingen (1887), and Tübingen (1895). In a series of theological treatises, particularly The Righteousness of God in Paul (1896), The Ethics of the Christian Life (ET 1909), and The Christian Faith (ET 1913), he showed himself with his Pietistic background among the more conservative of Ritschl's* followers, reaffirming traditional Christian doctrine and trying to save the system from immanentism and mere moralism. At the same time he strongly emphasized the kingdom of God and an ethical system closely patterned on doctrine, and was one of the first German theologians to apply in detail Christian ethics to political and social questions.

IAN SELLERS

HARKLEAN VERSION, see SYRIAC VERSIONS OF THE BIBLE

HARLESS, GOTTLIEB CHRISTOPH ADOLPH VON (1806-1879). German Lutheran theologian. Born in Nuremberg, he studied philology and law at Erlangen and Halle, where he was influenced by F.A.G. Tholuck* toward theology and particularly Luther's doctrine of justification. He was professor of NT exegesis and university preacher at Erlangen (1829-45), where he considerably raised the standard of theological teaching and founded the Zeitschrift für Protestantismus und Kirche (1838-76). He was professor at Leipzig (1845-50) and court preacher at Dresden (1850). Called to Munich (1852) to become president of the supreme consistory of Bavaria, he reorganized the Lutheran state church and gave it a new hymnbook and a new order of services. He was one of the most influential representatives of Lutheran orthodoxy of his generation. Among his writings was Christliche Ethik (1842), translated as System of Christian Ethics (1865). J.G.G. NORMAN

HARMONIES. Efforts to make explicit the close proximity or exact relationship of parallel pieces of literature. Within the NT, the special relationships of the "synoptic" gospels provide not only the basic and best-known example for harmony, but the classic instance of the historical problem related to priority. While Tatian harmonized, and Augustine understood the need for viewing the gospels synoptically, the ancient church produced no "harmony" in the modern literary sense. The earliest modern usage of the analogous concept "synoptic" in the context of printing a "harmony" was that resulting from the textual studies of J.J. Griesbach.*

HARMONY SOCIETY. A Protestant communal society established in 1805 north of Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania by 500 Pietist dissenters from Württemberg, Germany, seeking religious freedom. Led by George Rapp (1757-1847) and his adopted son Frederick, the group moved to 30,000 acres on the Wabash River at New Harmony, Indiana, in 1815. In 1825 the society sold New Harmony to British socialist Robert Owen for his communal experiment, and moved to Economy (now Ambridge), Pennsylvania, where it survived until 1916. Practicing first-century Christian communism, Harmonists labored cooperatively as farmers, brewers, millers, and spinners, making their communities showpieces of economic growth and security. They pioneered in prefabricated buildings, oil refining, and underwriting railroad construction. Well-ordered lives, uniform dress, and simple, nonceremonial religious observances characterized "Rappites." Believing that Father Rapp would present them personally to Christ on His imminent second coming, they became perfectionists, by 1807 adopting celibacy, a factor in the society's ultimate demise.

D.E. PITZER

HARMS, CLAUS (1778-1855). Lutheran preacher and theologian. After helping his miller father at Fahrstadt/Holstein, he went to the university of Kiel in 1799 where he became an evangelical through reading Schleiermacher's Monologues. Elected deacon at Lunden/Holstein in 1806, Harms rapidly gained fame as a preacher. Ten years later he became archdeacon at St. Nicolai's Church in Kiel and was elevated to the position of provost in 1835. In 1834 he had declined an offer to succeed Schleiermacher* as pastor of the Church of the Holy Trinity in Berlin. On the occasion of the tercentenary of Luther's Ninety-Five Theses, Harms wrote his Ninety-Five Theses. These attacked rationalism with its attendant Pelagianism. The union of Reformed and Lutheran churches proposed by the Prussian monarch Frederick William III was also criticized by him. His writings contributed significantly to the advancement of Lutheran piety. His further writings included a Pastoraltheologie and collections of sermons. WAYNE DETZLER

HARMS, LUDWIG (1808-1865). Mission organizer in Germany. Son of a pastor in the Lüneburger Heath, he was at first influenced by rationalism, but in 1830 was converted to a strongly biblical Christianity. After serving for some years as a teacher at Lauenburg, he succeeded his father in the tiny village of Hermannsburg. A natural outgrowth of his deeply pietistic orientation was an interest in foreign missions, and he assisted in forming the North German Mission in 1836. Although his parishioners were simple peasants, they founded a missionary training school in 1849 and sent a group of missionary colonists to Ethiopia in 1853. Forbidden to land there, they located in Natal and established a settlement named Hermannsburg. They stressed a strongly confessional Lutheranism and trained the Africans in agricultural techniques. Harms himself never left Germany, but continually fostered the work at home and dispatched more agricultural missionaries to open new stations elsewhere in South Africa. RICHARD V. PIERARD

HARNACK, ADOLF (1851-1930). German scholar. Son of the Lutheran scholar Theodosius Harnack (1817-89), he taught at Leipzig (1874) before becoming professor at Giessen (1879), Marburg (1886), and Berlin (1889-1921). The last appointment was challenged by the church because of Harnack's doubts about the authorship of the fourth gospel and other NT books, his unorthodox interpretations of biblical miracles including the Resurrection and his denial of Christ's institution of baptism (see his History of Dogma, 7 vols., 1894-99). The appointment was, however, upheld by the Prussian cabinet and the emperor. But the dispute cast a shadow over the rest of his career, and he was denied all official recognition by the church, including the right to examine his own pupils in church examinations. Nevertheless, Harnack was perhaps the most influential church historian and theologian until World War I.

Harnack's main field was patristic thought, on which he published numerous monographs. His standpoint was a form of Ritschlianism that regarded metaphysics in early Christian thought as an alien intrusion ("Hellenization"). In the winter of 1899-1900 he delivered a course of public lectures assessing Christianity in the light of modern scholarship. They were taken down in shorthand and published as Das Wesen des Christentums (ET, What is Christianity?, 1901). Jesus was depicted as a man who had rest and peace for his soul and was able to give life and strength to others. The gospel that he preached was not about himself, but about the Father. It concerned the kingdom, the fatherhood of God, the infinite value of the human soul, the higher righteousness and the command to love. The work was a best seller and the center of much controversy.

In many ways Harnack was positive. Though liberal in theology (later clashing with his former pupil Barth*), he was conservative and perceptive in his studies on the NT. He held that Acts was written by Luke while Paul was a prisoner in Rome, assigning an early date to "Q," the synoptic gospels, and Acts. Such views would undermine much contemporary liberal and radical scholarship. His studies were published in English as Luke the Physician (1907); The Sayings of Jesus (1908); The Acts of the Apostles (1909); and The Date of the Acts and of the Synoptic Gospels (1911). English translations of other works include The Mission and Expansion of Christianity in the First Three Centuries (2 vols., 1904-05), and The Consitution and Law of the Church in the First Two Centuries (1910).

In 1906 Harnack was appointed director of the Prussian Royal Library (the largest in Germany), and he became also president of the Kaiser Wilhelm Gesellschaft for learning and science. His numerous honors included the title "von Harnack" in 1914. He was interested in social questions and published with W. Hermann Essays on the Social Gospel (ET 1907). He declined the post of German ambassador to Washington (1921).

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Agnes von Zahn-Harnack (his daughter), Adolf von Harnack (1936); G.W. Glick, The Reality of Christianity: A Study of Adolf von Harnack as Historian and Theologian (1967); W. Pauck, Harnack and Troeltsch: Two Historical Theologians (1968). COLIN BROWN

HARPER, WILLIAM RAINEY (1856-1906). Semitics scholar. Born in Ohio of Scotch-Irish ancestry, he held a Ph.D. from Yale by 1875, and in 1879 became professor of Hebrew at the new Baptist Union Theological Seminary at Morgan Park, Illinois. He returned in 1886 to teach Semitics at Yale, to which was added in 1889 the chair of biblical literature. Two years later he became head of the new University of Chicago, into which the Morgan Park seminary was integrated with Harper assuming responsibility also for the Semitics department. Over the next fourteen years his enormous energies burnt out his life, but not before he had created a great graduate university. He produced a major commentary on Amos and Hosea (1905), and from 1884 edited the periodical Hebraica. CLYDE CURRY SMITH

HARRIS, HOWEL (1714-1773). Welsh preacher. Born at Talgarth, Brecon, of humble parents, Harris intended at an early age to enter the ministry of the established church; for a time he supported himself as a schoolmaster, undergoing a vital conversion experience in 1735. He went to Oxford but spent only a week there, returning to Wales to begin a campaign of tireless evangelism. He aroused first the south by his stately appearance, powerful voice, and overwhelming passion, and though often threatened by mobs and magistrates he extended his activities with equal success to the north in 1739.

Though he must be regarded as the principal founder of Welsh Calvinistic Methodism and the greatest spiritual force in the principality of his day, Harris was shy and awkward in the presence of other evangelical leaders, and quarreled with both Rowland and Whitefield.* Many influences —Wesleyan, Moravian, and even Antinomian and Universalist—molded his thought, but he always remained loyal to the Church of England, and deplored any tendency to break away from it. But his excursions into theology are not impressive—he was a revivalist, not a systematizer, and scenes of wild enthusiasm accompanied his preaching. In 1752 he retired to a house at Trevecca Fach which he built up as a center for revivalist activity. He was supported by the Countess of Huntingdon who after 1768 sent her own students to train at Trevecca Isaf. Harris died in 1773, leaving behind a small number of very popular Welsh hymns and numerous letters and journals, some of which are still unpublished. IAN SELLERS

HARRIS, JAMES RENDEL (1852-1941). Biblical scholar and Orientalist. Born in Plymouth, he was educated at Clare College, Cambridge, and taught mathematics at the university until 1882, when he migrated to the USA and taught at Johns Hopkins University. After denouncing vivisection, he was compelled to leave. He then joined the staff of Haverford College in Pennsylvania. On returning to England he gained the reputation of a brilliant but unorthodox scholar who specialized in textual problems. His final post was that of curator of MSS at the John Rylands Library, Manchester. He edited and published many ancient texts, but is best known for his discovery in 1889 of the long lost Apology of Aristides (published in 1891). In early life Harris was a Congregationalist, but in 1880 he joined the Society of Friends. In 1896 he organized relief for Armenians at the time of the massacres. Throughout his life his work output was enormous. Theologically he was a "liberal" Christian, scornful of "fundamentalism." R.E.D. CLARK

HARVARD, JOHN (1607-1638). Benefactor of Harvard University. Born in Southwark, he studied at Emmanuel College, Cambridge, and because of the religious situation in England under Archbishop Laud he joined the Puritan emigration to the New World. He settled in Massachusetts and was admitted a member and teaching elder of the Congregational church at Charlestown; he was also a freeman of the colony. In his will he left half his estate with a library of about 400 volumes to the new college, recently founded by the colony in 1636. The General Court of Massachusetts named the college after him in 1638/39, and with the aid of his legacy buildings were erected. PETER TOON

HASSLER, HANS LEO (1564-1612). Probably the ablest German composer of the Renaissance. He studied in Venice with Andrea Gabrieli and was much influenced by the latter's distinguished nephew, Giovanni.* His music is notable for its melodic charm. Hassler was active in Augsburg and Nuremberg. He wrote music for both Lutherans and Catholics, some of which might have been used in either form of worship. Notable are his settings of great Lutheran chorales in both simple and elaborate motet style. The well-known Passion chorale (sung now to "O Sacred Head") is his melody, originally composed for secular words, but adapted by him as a church tune.

HASTINGS, JAMES (1852-1922). Scottish minister and editor. Born in Huntly and educated in arts and divinity at Aberdeen, he held charges in the Free Church and (after the 1901 union) the United Free Church (1884-1911) before retiring to engage in editorial work. In 1889 he had founded the monthly Expository Times, which he edited until his death. His many other works as an editor and writer include a five-volume Dictionary of the Bible (1898-1904), a two-volume Dictionary of Christ and the Gospels (1906-8), and a two-volume Dictionary of the Apostolic Church (1915-18). He is probably best known, however, for successfully undertaking a daunting project: the Encyclopaedia of Religion and Ethics (12 vols., 1908-21; an index volume appeared later). Hastings was also a magnificent preacher, a man whose message was always unmistakably evangelical, spoken without the aid of notes and with that eloquent simplicity which is not infrequently associated with a wide range of knowledge. J.D. DOUGLAS

HATCH, EDWIN (1835-1889). Anglican divine. Born at Derby, he graduated from Oxford and in 1859 was appointed professor of classics at Trinity College, Toronto. He became rector of Quebec High School (1862), vice-principal of St. Mary's Hall, Oxford (1867-85), rector of Purleigh, Essex (1883), and reader in ecclesiastical history at Oxford (1884). His most important work was his Bampton Lectures on The Organization of the Early Christian Churches (1880), which aroused considerable controversy, especially in High Church circles. They argued that the Christian episcopate derived from the financial administrators (episkopoi) of Greek religious associations. Hatch continued the subject with The Growth of Church Institutions (1887). He produced also Essays in Biblical Greek (1889) and Concordance to the Septuagint (with H.A. Redpath, published posthumously in 1897). His Hibbert Lectures, The Influence of Greek Ideas and Usages on the Christian Church (1888), reflect his philosophical interests. HOWARD SAINSBURY

HATFIELD, COUNCIL OF (679). This provincial synod or meeting of the bishops and teachers of the English Church at Hatfield (or Heathfield) was summoned and presided over by Archbishop Theodore. It met at the wish of Pope Agatho, who hoped for and secured the church's condemnation of the Monothelite* heresy, its acceptance of the decrees of the first five general councils of the church, and a profession of faith in the Double Procession of the Holy Spirit. At a council in Rome in the following year, Wilfrid* attested this decision of the Church in England as bishop of York and legate of the synod of Britain.

HAUGE, HANS NIELSEN (1771-1824). Norwegian lay preacher. A farmer's son, he was brought up in a pious Lutheran home, and in 1796 had a religious experience in which he felt called by God to exhort the people of Norway to repentance. He traveled throughout the country (1796-1804), usually on foot, preaching his message and gathering followers wherever he went. At the same time he started factories and other industrial enterprises. Itinerant preaching was not lawful, and his economic efforts were looked on with suspicion. Arrested ten times, he was in prison from 1804 to 1811. After a prolonged trial he was sentenced in 1814 to pay a fine for unlawful preaching and strong criticism of the clergy. Helped by friends, who came to be called "Haugeans," he bought a farm near Oslo. During his last years relations with the authorities were friendly. Hauge wrote many books which had a large circulation. His preaching was pietistic inasmuch as it stressed personal holiness. Hauge is generally regarded as the initiator of the powerful Christian laymen's movement in Norway.

CARL FR. WISLOFF

HAUSRATH, ADOLF (1837-1909). German Lutheran theologian. A leading liberal scholar, he served as a pastor and later professor at Heidelberg and belonged to the consistory of the Baden state church. Stimulated by the ideas of the Tübingen School,* he transformed and popularized its historical picture of primitive Christianity. Hausrath was a founder and the secretary of the German Protestantenverein, the group which represented a distinctly liberal position in the Lutheran Church. He was also noted for his biographical and epic writings, and believed the novel was an effective means of making history live.

HAVERGAL, FRANCES RIDLEY (1838-1879). Hymnwriter. Born in a Worcestershire rectory, she early gave evidence of possessing great gifts. She became very proficient in Latin, Greek and Hebrew, but her main interest was the writing of poetry, which she began when she was only seven. Converted at fifteen, she spent the rest of her life in various Christian activities. Her first accepted poem was "I gave my life for thee," but even more popular is the well-known "Take my life and let it be." She published several volumes of poems and hymns, the best known of which is Kept for the Master's Use.

HAWEIS, THOMAS (1734-1820). Co-founder of the London Missionary Society and trustee-executor of Lady Huntingdon. Son of a Redruth solicitor, he attended Truro Grammar School during the mastership of George Conon, through whom he was first introduced to the doctrines of the evangelical revival. He was converted and called to the ministry under Samuel Walker, curate of St. Mary's. At Oxford he started a second holy club among the undergraduates, and later served as curate to Joseph Jane at St. Mary Magdalene. After assisting Martin Madan, chaplain to the Lock Hospital in London, Haweis took the living of All Saints, Aldwincle, Northamptonshire, in 1764. His church quickly became a center of evangelical influence throughout the area. In 1774 he was appointed chaplain to Lady Huntingdon. When the London Missionary Society was formed in 1795 he was instrumental in ensuring that Tahiti was the first field to be evangelized.

A. SKEVINGTON WOOD

HAWKER, ROBERT STEPHEN (1803-1875). English poet. Educated at Cheltenham and Oxford, he spent most of his life as vicar of Morwenstow on the north coast of Cornwall. Although his Anglo-Catholicism was marked by his own eccentricities, he was undoubtedly sincerely attracted to the lore of the Celtic saints, and "A Rapture on the Cornish Hills" seems to record a genuine mystical experience. His most ambitious work is The Quest of the Sangraal (1864), in which he brings out the explicit Christian associations of the Arthurian legend and records the quest as one full of spiritual vitality. There is some controversy as to whether or not he was accepted into the Roman Catholic Church on his deathbed.

ARTHUR POLLARD

HAWTHORNE, NATHANIEL (1804-1864). American writer. Born in Salem, Massachusetts, he attended Bowdoin College, where one of his classmates was the poet H.W. Longfellow.* After college he returned to Salem for a period of reading, reflection, and writing—training in the craftmanship that was to make him the first major American novelist. In 1837, the same year in which he married Sophia Peabody, he published his first collection of stories, Twice Told Tales. He spent two years in a Boston customs house and seven months in the utopian community of Brook Farm. Neither was a pleasant experience. Nor did he feel any enthusiasm for the transcendentalism of his friends Emerson and Thoreau. His first novel, The Scarlet Letter (1850), acclaimed by many as the greatest American novel, won him literary success for its masterful structure, beauty of style, and penetrating assessment of the Puritan moral conscience. The House of Seven Gables (1851) examines the decadence of Puritanism. From 1853 to 1857 he served as U.S. consul in Liverpool. He spent the next two years in Italy, the setting of his last complete novel, The Marble Faun (1860). Among his best tales are "Young Goodman Brown," "The Birthmark," "Rappaccini's Daughter," and "My Kingsman, Major Molineaux." Together with Poe, Hawthorne did much to shape the short story as a distinctive American form. His art tended toward the projection of moral ideas through symbol and allegory. In American literature he is the classic interpreter of Puritanism.

PAUL M. BECHTEL

HAYDN, FRANZ JOSEPH (1732-1809). Music composer. Son of a humble wheelwright in lower Austria, he rose to be the Kapellmeister of the dazzling princely court at Esterhaz, Hungary, and one of the most sought-after composers in Europe. In his later years he wrote his greatest symphonies for London audiences, and received an honorary doctorate at Oxford. He spent his last years in Vienna. Although his greatest energies were spent in the realm of the symphony and the string quartet, he wrote at least a dozen Masses, the last six postdating his symphonic output and considered by some critics his crowning achievement. He also wrote a variety of works for the Catholic rite in the classical, symphonic style, a setting of The Seven Last Words, and his magnificent oratorio, The Creation, inspired by his experiences with Handel's* music in England. His church music has been frequently criticized unjustly as being too lighthearted for the sanctuary; it simply represents the taste of the classical era. His younger brother Michael was also a distinguished and voluminous composer of Catholic church music in the classical vein.

J.B. MAC MILLAN

HAYMO OF FAVERSHAM (d.1244). English Franciscan. Born at Faversham, Kent, he became a Master of Divinity at Paris, and entered the Order of Friars Minor (c.1226). Returning to England, he lectured at Oxford before 1229. He was sent as a deputy by the general chapter of his order at Assisi to Pope Gregory IX to seek official explanation of the Rule (1230). Gregory sent him on a mission to Constantinople (1233) to negotiate reunion with the Eastern Church. He took a leading part in the deposition of Elias of Cortona,* and was himself elected provincial of the English province, succeeding Albert of Pisa. In 1240 he was elected fourth general of the Franciscan Order, the only Englishman ever to hold the position. He was called Speculum honestatis. At the request of Innocent IV he revised the ordinals for the Breviarum Romanum (1243-44). He died at Anagni. J.G.G. NORMAN

HEADLAM, ARTHUR CAYLEY (1862-1947). Anglican bishop and theologian. Educated at Winchester and New College, Oxford, he was successively fellow of All Souls (1885-96), parish priest at Welwyn (1896-1903), principal and professor of theology at King's College, London (1903-18), regius professor of divinity at Oxford (1918-23), and bishop of Gloucester (1923-45). His early work was concentrated in the area of NT, where he is best known for his collaboration with W. Sanday* in a classic commentary on Romans (1895). His theological position was that of a moderate conservative; one of his chief concerns was Christian unity. In addition to important essays in Hastings's Dictionary of the Bible (1898-1902), Headlam wrote St. Paul and Christianity (1913), The Miracles of the New Testament (1914), The Doctrine of the Church and Christian Reunion (1920), The Fourth Gospel as History (1948), and numerous other books and essays.
W. WARD GASQUE

HEALING, see SPIRITUAL HEALING

HEAVEN. The word is used in the Bible in a twofold sense: as the visible heaven over our heads, including all that is apart from the earth (Gen. 1:1; 2:1), and as the invisible heaven, the dwelling place of God, the holy angels, and the redeemed of all ages. Some Jews held that there are a number of heavens—as many as seven—although this is nowhere taught in Scripture. Paul, however, speaks of being caught up into the third heaven (2 Cor. 12:2-4), but he probably meant by this nothing more than the invisible heaven. The invisible heavens are the abode of God (Deut. 26:15; 1 Kings 8:30; Job 22:12; Matt. 12:50), although they cannot contain God, who is omnipresent (Ps. 139:8-10). By metonomy the word "heaven" comes to be used for God Himself (Matt. 16:19; 18:18). The Jews had a scruple against the use of the divine name, and therefore used substitutes, one of which was "heaven" (Mark 11:30; Luke 15:18,21). In the incarnation Christ descended from heaven (John 3:13; 6:38), and at His ascension He returned to heaven (Mark 16:19; Acts 1:11), in which He prepares a place for His own (John 14:2-4) and from which He shall come to judge the living and the dead (Matt. 24:30).

The invisible heavens are also the dwelling place of the holy angels (Matt. 22:30; 24:36) and of the righteous dead. The souls of the latter enter heaven directly after death (Phil. 1:23; 2 Cor. 5:6-8), but at the second coming of Christ they will receive new spiritual bodies, adapted for existence in their new environment. In heaven there is an end of death, pain, tears, sin (Rev. 21:4,27; 22:3,5). The redeemed sing songs of redemption (Rev. 14:3) and they serve God (Rev. 7:14). At the end of time God will create new heavens and a new earth (Isa. 65:17; 66:22, 2 Pet. 3:13; Rev. 21:1). Some theologians regard heaven as a state of the soul rather than a place, but there is no warrant for this opinion in the teaching of the Bible.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: R. Baxter, The Saints' Everlasting Rest (1650); F.E. Marsh, What is Heaven? (n.d.); U.E. Simon, Heaven in the Christian Tradition (1958); W.M. Smith, The Biblical Doctrine of Heaven (1968).
STEVEN BARABAS

HEBER, REGINALD (1783-1826). Bishop of Calcutta and hymnwriter. Educated at Oxford, he was appointed to the family living at Hodnet, Shropshire, in 1807. He published an edition of Jeremy Taylor* in 1822, and the next year he became bishop of Calcutta, a see that then included all of British India. He worked tirelessly to spread Christianity there, but after three years of travel and administration, during which he ordained the first Indian, he died suddenly. His fifty-seven hymns, all written at Hodnet, were collected and published in 1827 as Hymns written and adapted to the Weekly Church Service of the Year, the title indicating pioneer work. Heber led a movement toward a literary type of hymn and helped popularize the use of hymns in the Church of England. His compositions include "Bread of the world," "Brightest and best," "From Greenland's icy mountains," "Holy, Holy, Holy," and "The Son of God goes forth to war."
JOHN S. ANDREWS

HEBICH, SAMUEL (1803-1868). A founder of the Basel Mission work in India. Born near Ulm in Württemberg, Germany, son of a pastor, he went to Mangalore in 1834, but later moved south to Malabar. Hebich had a remarkable ministry to British soldiers, making converts despite his poor English and eccentric manners. One regiment was termed "Hebich's Own." At the same time he was truly a missionary to the people of India. He left in poor health in 1859 and died at Stuttgart.

HEBREW. Semitic language in the Canaanite branch and the language of the OT, except for short Aramaic portions chiefly in Daniel and Ezra. It is called "the language of Canaan" (Isa. 19:18) and "Jewish"/"Judean" (2 Kings 18:26, etc.). Canaanite glosses in the fourteenth-century B.C. Amarna letters as well as the Ugaritic texts from the same period have thrown light on the early history of the language adopted by the Israelites after the Exodus. In common with the other Semitic languages the majority of Hebrew roots are triconsonantal, with a certain amount of evidence to suggest the priority of a biconsonantal theme.

The alphabet has twenty-two letters; in the absence of a written vowel-system, certain consonants were used to represent pure long vowels. The ancient Phoenician script was replaced by the Aramaic square script about 250-150 B.C. By this time Aramaic had become the vernacular language in Palestine. From about the fifth century A.D. the Massoretes set about providing the consonantal text of the Hebrew Bible with a written vowel-system. Much of the early rabbinical literature (Mishnah, Midrash, etc.) is written in Hebrew, and the chain continues through the medieval era to Modern Hebrew, the language of the state of Israel.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: W.J. Martin, "The Genius of the Language of the Old Testament," Journal of the Transactions of the Victoria Institute, LXXIV (1942); W.L. Moran, "The Hebrew Language in its Northwest Semitic Background," in The Bible and the Ancient Near East (ed. G.E. Wright, 1961); D.W. Thomas, "The Textual Criticism of the Old Testament," in The Old Testament and Modern Study (ed. H.H. Rowley) 1951, 1961.

ROBERT P. GORDON

HEBREWS, EPISTLE TO THE. For long the early church doubted the canonicity of Hebrews, largely because of uncertainty regarding its author. Although it was not written by Paul, nobody today would deny its authenticity of content and spiritual worth. Its author remains unknown, the best guess still being Apollos or his spiritual twin. Its readers, also unknown, who may have lived in Italy, were in danger of losing their earlier Christian zeal, or even perhaps of giving up their faith, partly through the pressure of persecution. Possibly they were being tempted to retreat into Judaism. Their spiritual ennui occasioned this unique document, which is more of a written sermon than a letter (except in ch. 13), a brilliant piece of rhetoric with a carefully wrought theological argument, mingling doctrine and exhortation in alternating sections.

The basic theme is the finality of the Christian revelation, God's last word, to turn aside from which is spiritual suicide. Christians are called to a persevering faith, similar to that of OT saints, but with the added incentive of already enjoying the partial fulfillment of the promises. The writer offers an elaborate proof of the superiority of the Christian revelation to the OT revelation, and in particular of Jesus to the angels, Moses, and the Jewish high priests. The OT system of worship, valid for its time, was inherently defective, only a reflection of the true spiritual reality; it has now been superseded by the coming of Jesus, the Son of God, as high priest to offer Himself once-for-all as the perfect sacrifice in the heavenly tabernacle. Stressing that the old has given place to the new, the writer brings out the continuity between the old and new covenants and the oneness of God's pilgrim people in all ages.

This argument could scarcely have been addressed to other than "Hebrew" (Jewish) Christians, although the case for a Gentile Christian audience is not lightly dismissed. The author's developing theology suggests a late rather than a very early writing; it antedates 1 Clement (c. A.D. 96), and the absence of indication that the Jerusalem temple no longer exists points to a date before A.D. 70. The author's theology here leaves some gaps, such as the lack of teaching on faith-union between the believer and the Lord, but nothing can diminish the worth of this noble witness to the Jesus who is the same unchanging Savior, yesterday, today, and forever.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: W. Manson, The Epistle to the Hebrews (1951); R. Williamson, Philo and the Epistle to the Hebrews (1970); commentaries by B.F. Westcott (2nd ed., 1892), J. Moffatt (1924), F.F. Bruce (1964), H.W. Montefiore (1964), J. Héring (1970), G.W. Buchanan (1972).

I. HOWARD MARSHALL

HEBREWS, GOSPEL ACCORDING TO THE, see APOCRYPHAL NEW TESTAMENT

HEBRONITES, see HEPBURN, JOHN

HECK, BARBARA (1744-1804). "Mother of American Methodism." Born in Ireland of a German Palatinate refugee family, she migrated to New York with her husband in 1760. She encouraged her cousin Philip Embury* to hold the first Methodist meeting in America in his home, and encouraged him further in the building of the first Methodist chapel in America. The family moved to Canada early in the Revolutionary War because of their Tory views.

HECKER, ISAAC THOMAS (1819-1888). Founder of the Paulist Order Born in New York City of Protestant German parentage, he worked in a bakery with his brothers until Transcendentalist ideas led him to the communal Brook Farm and Fruitland in 1843. He became a Roman Catholic in 1844 and entered the Redemptorist Order. After studying in Belgium, Holland, and England, he was ordained in 1845 and worked with Roman Catholic German immigrants after returning to the USA in 1851. Because of an unauthorized trip to Rome, he was excluded from his order, but freed from his vows by Pius IX to found in 1858 the Missionary Priests of St. Paul the Apostle to convert Protestants. Hecker was superior of the order until 1888. He also founded and edited The Catholic World (1865) and the Young Catholic (1870).

EARLE E. CAIRNS

HEDBERG, FREDRIK GABRIEL (1811-1893). Finnish pastor; founder of the "Evangelical movement." As a schoolboy he experienced his first spiritual revival through influence from Herrnhut groups. He studied the Bible together with pietistic revival literature, which books through their strictness extinguished his spiritual life. In 1834 he was ordained as pastor of the Church of Finland, at which time he was completely a theologian of the Enlightenment and mainly tried to improve people's ability to read. He soon found this foundation inadequate, for it had nothing to offer souls in need. He came into contact with Pietism* and this influenced him decisively, but in 1844 he published The Doctrine of Faith Unto Salvation, indicating a complete break with the Pietists. He then founded and became leader of the Evangelical movement, based on the writings of Luther. In the center are the grace and forgiveness of God, the redemption of Christ, and the appropriation of it through the means of grace. Hedberg speaks less about sanctification and prayer, but with more boldness about the universal grace of God, which grace is given to man already in (infant) baptism.

STIG-OLOF FERNSTROM

HEERMANN, JOHANN (1585-1647). Silesian hymnwriter. Son of a furrier, he was dedicated by his mother to the ministry in early childhood. After studying at Fraustadt, Breslau, and Brieg and holding various teaching posts, he became in 1611 pastor of Köben an der Oder. He suffered during the Thirty Years' War, and in 1634 had to give up preaching, at which he excelled. His health was always poor. His 400 hymns, many inspired by suffering and many still sung in Germany, are ranked by some as second only to those of Gerhardt.* Although many exist in English, only two are commonly used: "Ah, holy Jesu, how hast thou offended" (Bridges), and "O Christ, our true and only Light" (Winkworth).

JOHN S. ANDREWS

HEFELE, KARL JOSEPH (1809-1893). Roman Catholic bishop and historian. Born in Unterkochen bei Aalen, he was ordained priest in 1833. After serving in minor academic posts he was called in 1840 to succeed his own teacher, J.A. Möhler,* as professor of church history at Tübingen. His most famous work as a church historian was his monumental Conciliengeschichte (1855-74) in seven volumes. His study of the councils and his joint editorship of the Theologische Quartalschrift (from 1839) established him as one of the most important Roman Catholic scholars of his day. He was appointed a consultant to the preparatory commission for Vatican Council I* (1868) and, following his consecration as bishop of Rottenburg (1869), returned to Rome to take his seat as a council father. He was a leader of the minority opposed to the doctrine of papal infallibility, though he submitted eventually to the decision of the council. His last years were spent principally in pastoral work in his own diocese.

DAVID C. STEINMETZ

HEGEL, GEORG WILHELM FRIEDRICH (1770-1831). The dominant figure in German idealism, and one of the great philosophical system-builders. He studied at Tübingen (1788-93), and after holding teaching positions at various universities, including Jena and Bern, was professor of philosophy at Berlin (1818-30). Hegel rejected both realism (the view that reality exists independently of the mind) and subjective idealism (that reality is the product of individual consciousness) because, in his view, they involved unavoidable contradictions. Rather, true knowledge is only possible of ultimate reality, the product of the Spirit which, in a dynamic development, reconciles the self-contradictions that permeate every aspect of human experience. The ideas of the unity and comprehensiveness of thought, and of its dynamic development, are dominant.

In claiming that realism and subjective idealism embodied fundamental contradictions, Hegel held that all experience presupposes the unity of the knower and the known. This unity, however, is not achieved, but is in the process of fulfillment in human experience, becoming explicit in aesthetic and religious experience, and fully developed in truly philosophical thinking. The dialectical method is the only true philosophical method, since it alone corresponds to the process of nature and history and of all reality. Error lies in partiality and incompleteness. This basic view underlies his diverse philosophical productions. Some of the most notable of these are The Phenomenology of Mind (1897), an account of various stages of human consciousness from sense awareness to absolute knowledge; Logic (1812-16), the analysis of categories basic to all discourse; Philosophy of Right (1821), in which Hegel's view of the state, as the synthesis of the family and civil society, is given.

Hegel is important in any account of the development of Christian thought, with which his philosophy is fundamentally incompatible. Religion for Hegel is simply an imaginative, pictorial way of representing philosophical truth. His overall position obviously has strong affinities with pantheism. Hegel's system was the inspiration behind the destructive biblical criticism of D.F. Strauss,* and, in more complicated ways, Hegel influenced both Feuerbach and Marx.

OONAGH MC DONALD

HEGESIPPUS (second century). Church historian. A terminus a quo is provided for him by his reference to Hadrian (117-38) establishing certain games in his day; and a terminus ad quem by his addition of the names of Soter and Eleutherus (175-89) to a succession list of the bishops of Rome which he had drawn up in Rome in the time of Anicetus (156-67). Jerome corroborates these dates when he says that Hegesippus lived near the time of the apostles. Eusebius draws the conclusion that Hegesippus was a Jew and says his work comprised five books of "Memoirs." These appear to have been directed against the Gnostics and to have ranged over the whole of church history to his day in a random fashion (James is dealt with in the last book) and an unpretentious style. The "Memoirs" survive now only in fragments, nearly all in Eusebius. One fragment in Photius has been taken as an attack by Hegesippus on Paul's words in 1 Corinthians 2:9. It is more likely, however, to be an attack on the misuse of Paul's words by the Gnostics.

DAVID JOHN WILLIAMS

HEIDELBERG CATECHISMS, see CATECHISMS

HEILER, FRIEDRICH (1892-1967). German theologian. A Roman Catholic, he studied theology, philosophy, and oriental languages at Munich. Under the influence of N. Söderblom* he became a Protestant, joining the Lutheran Church at Uppsala (1919). He was appointed professor of comparative history of religions at Marburg (1922). Influenced by the writings of Friedrich Von Hügel,* he took a more Catholic line and became a leader of the German High Church Union from 1929. He founded an Evangelical order of Franciscan Tertiaries. He edited the Hochkirche from 1930. His finest work was Das Gebet (1918; ET Prayer, 1932), a study of prayer from its most primitive forms to mystical contemplation. Other works include Der Katholizismus (on Roman Catholicism, 1923); Evangelische Katholizität (1926), and Die Wahreit Sundar Singha (1927). J.G.G. NORMAN

HEILSGESCHICHTE. German term meaning "salvation history." It was coined in the mid-eighteenth century and employed by J.T. Beck* who combined Hegel's philosophy with the notion that God's dealings with mankind required a logical connection between the various events composing that revelation. Heilsgeschichte emphasized the importance of each stage of the process because each became a part of the whole.

As new approaches to history developed, the Lutheran theologian J.C.K. Hofmann* offered some revisions in his use of the term. Against Beck, he noted that in a teleological view of history the earlier elements could not serve the same function as the later ones; nonetheless, Hofmann stopped short of rejecting the OT as inferior to the New. Rather, he maintained that superiority of the New is lost when it is studied in isolation.

More recently the idea of Heilsgeschichte has served to help theologians out of the corner into which historicism had forced them. Refusing to relegate the Bible to a purely human and therefore completely relative phenomenon, theologians such as Oscar Cullmann have once again turned to the Heilsgeschichte approach. According to this view, the events in the biblical narratives point to an increasing awareness of God's saving work in history, and confront the believer in the present with divine challenge.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: E.C. Rust, Salvation History: A Biblical Interpretation (1962); idem, Towards a Theological Understanding of History (1967); O. Cullmann, Christ and Time (1964); idem, Salvation in History (1967). WATSON E. MILLS

HEIM, KARL (1874-1959). Lutheran theologian. Native of Württemberg and of Pietistic background, he studied at Tübingen, was for some years pastor and schoolmaster, taught at Halle (from 1907), at Münster (1914), and returned in 1920 to Tübingen as professor of theology. While fully appreciating the achievements of recent scientific civilization, he was anxious to restate faith in a transcendent God in a manner intelligible to modern minds. In his early writings he stressed the Ritschlian contrast between faith and reason, but later under the influence of existentialist thinkers, and especially of Martin Buber,* he developed his notion of spaces: impersonal relations of an I-It character and personal ones of the I-Thou sort can only subsist within an archetypal or suprapolar space where the very presence of God is to be found. Recognized as one of Germany's leading postwar theologians, he defended his theological system against both scientific secularists and Nazi perversions of the Christian faith. His monumental work is Der evangelische Glaube und das Denken der Gegenwart, two sections of which were translated into English as God Transcendent (1935) and Christian Faith and Natural Science 1953). IAN SELLERS

HELENA (c.248-c.327). First wife of Constantius and mother of Constantine.* Of humble origin, her relationship with Constantius may have been that of concubinatus and not wife. In any case Maximian required that she should be divorced in favor of his stepdaughter Theodora. Nothing is known of Helena's life during the subsequent reign of Constantius, but after Constantine's accession in 306 she was at his court, where she was greatly honored. Through Constantine she became a Christian and aided by his bounty did great works of charity. In her old age she visited the Holy Land, where her name is associated with the erection of churches on sites connected with Jesus. There is no basis, however, in the tradition either that the Cross was discovered or that it was discovered by her. The place of her death is unknown, but she was probably buried at Constantinople. DAVID JOHN WILLIAMS

HELL (Gr. geena, from Aramaic ge-hinnam and Heb. ge-hinnom). The Hebrew derivation is an abbreviation of the full title "valley of the son of Hinnom," probably after the original Jebusite owner of the property which divided ancient Jerusalem from the hills to the south and west. Today the area is known as Wadi er Rababi and joins the valley of the Kidron at the S extremity of the hill of Zion. During the monarchy this ravine was the location of an idolatrous cult which practices human sacrifice (2 Kings 23:10; Jer. 32:35) and the passing of children through fire 2 Chr. 28:3; 33:6; Jer. 7:31). In the first century "the valley of Hinnom" was used as a metaphor to denote a fiery punishment which awaited the wicked after death or ultimately after the last judgment (Rev. 19:20ff.; 2 Pet. 2:4; Jude 6). The general idea of a raging destructive fire may be found in the earlier portions of the OT, but it is only during the Graeco-Roman period of Jewish history that the specific concept of a lake or abyss of fire begins to emerge (cf. Dan. 7:10). The ancient biblical toponym—"Gehenna"—was first made in the gospels, possibly in the light of Jeremiah's prophecy against the notorious valley.

In Christian theology, virtually without exception, "hell" signifies the state to which the unrighteous pass at death. Its character is inferred from certain biblical teachings, especially the words of Jesus concerning those who reject the kingdom of God. He notes these will be cast "into the darkness" (Matt. 25:30) or into "eternal fire prepared for the devil and his angels" (Matt. 25: 41). The punishment of fire is mentioned elsewhere in Matthew and Luke. Also, Isaiah 66:24 is applied with its suggestion that what is already corrupt will be destroyed: that God is able to "destroy both soul and body in hell" (Matt. 10:28). Paul suggests that the fate of the unrighteous is

"death" (Rom. 6:21) or simply destruction (2 Thess. 1:9; Phil. 3:19). WATSON E. MILLS

HELLENISTIC GREEK, see GREEK, HELLENISTIC

HELVETIC CONFESSIONS. Two creedal standards of the Swiss Reformed churches. The First Helvetic Confession (1536) is remembered primarily as an attempt to reconcile Lutheran and Zwinglian views, before the spread of Calvinism. Aimed at the German-speaking Swiss cantons, the confession was drawn up by the young H. Bullinger, M. Bucer, and L. Jud. Also taking part were Megander, Myconcius, and other theologians. The first draft of the confession was modified by Jud after complaints that it was too Lutheran. The statement on the Eucharist, however, made it unacceptable to the Lutherans. The confession was accepted by the Swiss Zwinglian churches, which soon merged with the Calvinist movement.

The Second Helvetic Confession (1566) was a major Calvinistic or Reformed confession, accepted as a standard not only in Switzerland, but also in the Palatinate, France, Scotland, Hungary, and Poland, and well received in the Netherlands and England. The Elector Palatine, Friedrich III, who had recently turned Protestant and published the Heidelberg Catechism (1563), important as a Calvinistic statement, desired a confession of his personal beliefs to aid him against charges of fomenting religious dissension which were to be made at the upcoming diet, and turned to Heinrich Bullinger for help. Bullinger had drawn up a lengthy statement of his own personal beliefs which, with slight modification, became the Confession. It had an immediate and warm reception.

A product of Bullinger's mature thought, this second confession presents Calvinism as evangelical Christianity, in conformity with the teachings of the ancient church. Though scholastic and lengthy, it is moderate in tone. Harmony with the teachings of the ancient church is important; variety in nonessentials is allowable. The teachings of the Greek and Latin theologians of early days are valuable, though tradition must always be subordinated to Scripture. The ecumenical creeds of the early undivided (pre-Roman) church are scriptural. The Roman claim to be the true successor of the early church is vigorously assailed. The doctrine of election from eternity is affirmed, as befitted a Calvinistic confession. Against the Anabaptists, the Confession defends baptism of children, participation in civil life, and taking up arms under certain conditions (only in self-defense and only as a last resort). DIRK JELLEMA

HELVIDIUS. A Western writer of whom nothing is known except that he was in Rome at the same time as Jerome, during the papacy of Damasus (366-84). He wrote a tract in which he asserted that, after the birth of Jesus, Mary had other children by Joseph, who are referred to in the Scripture as Jesus' brothers and sisters. "And why not? Are virgins in any way superior to Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, who were married men?" He sought the authority of Tertullian and Victorinus for this attack on the ascetic ideal and in favor of marriage. He was not known to Jerome, but his tract was strongly opposed by the latter, who maintained that Joseph was not really Mary's husband, that those whom Helvidius regarded as brothers and sisters were in fact cousins, and that virginity is a better state than marriage.
DAVID JOHN WILLIAMS

HELWYS, THOMAS (c.1550-c.1616). Founder and pastor of what was probably the first General Baptist church in England. He joined the English Independent ("Brownist") Church in Amsterdam, founded by John Smyth* in 1606. In 1609 he and Smyth, probably influenced by the Mennonites, were expelled because they advocated believer's baptism, and they were Arminian in theology. Smyth became pastor of a Baptist church in Amsterdam; when he died in 1610, Helwys succeeded in the pastorate. In 1611 the church issued a "Declaration of Faith," notable for its definition of baptism: "the outward manifestation of dying with Christ and walking in newness of life; and therefore in nowise appertaineth to infants"; and its declaration—perhaps the first ever—of the right of full individual freedom of conscience: "the magistrate not to meddle with religion or matters of conscience, nor compel men to this or that form of religion." In 1611 Helwys and his flock returned to England and established their church in Newgate Street. Although practicing believer's baptism, they did not normally immerse candidates, but used a Mennonite-style affusion. Helwys was a powerful preacher and the church grew rapidly. In 1615 he published a treatise against persecution. A. MORGAN DERHAM

HENDERSON, ALEXANDER (1583-1646). Scottish minister. Born in Fife, he matriculated at St. Andrews when he was sixteen, and shortly after graduation (1603) was appointed teacher of philosophy there. Having found favor with the archbishop, he became minister of nearby Leuchars contrary to the wishes of parishioners who secured the church doors against him. A few years later he was converted through hearing Robert Bruce preach on John 10:1, and threw in his lot with the Presbyterian party that was resisting James VI's ritualism. When that royal policy was intensified under Charles I, Henderson was prominent among those who defied the king and became co-author of the National Covenant.* Elected moderator (1638) of the first general assembly for two decades, Henderson became leader of the Covenanters,* was appointed minister of the High Kirk of Edinburgh (1639), and largely drafted the Solemn League and Covenant.* He did much to further the cause of education in Scotland, introduced Hebrew into the regular curriculum at Edinburgh University (of which he was rector during the last six years of his life), and was highly respected even by the Episcopal party. J.D. DOUGLAS

HENGSTENBERG, ERNST WILHELM (1802-1869). Lutheran scholar. Born at Fröndenberg near Hamm, he studied theology at the University of Bonn and became a private-dozent at Berlin in 1824, subsequently becoming professor there.

During his early years at Berlin he was associated with Evangelicals such as August Neander, Frederick Strauss, and Theremin, but after 1840 he developed into an outstanding spokesman of Lutheran orthodoxy. Hengstenberg's influence was enhanced by the Evangelische Kirchenzeitung which he founded in 1827 and edited until his death. This organ combated rationalism and defended confessional Lutheranism with equal vigor. He also wrote several significant works in the field of OT studies.

WAYNE DETZLER

HENOTICON. A decree of union issued by Zeno in 482. Monophysite bishops had succeeded to the sees of Alexandria (Timothy, 457) and Antioch (Peter, 470), and with Basiliscus's usurpation in 475 there was a Monophysite emperor on the throne. Basiliscus's encyclical anathematizing the Council of Chalcedon, however, had so enraged the Greeks that he had been forced to withdraw it. When Zeno regained the throne in 476 his policy, therefore, was one of conciliation between the orthodox and the Monophysites.* With the aid of Acacius he issued the "Henoticon." It took the form of a letter addressed by the emperor "to the bishops, clergy, monks, and faithful of Alexandria, Libya and Pentapolis," declaring the sufficiency of the creeds of Nicea and Constantinople (381) and the Twelve Anathemas of Cyril. It denounced any contrary doctrine to these "whether taught at Chalcedon or elsewhere," and in particular denounced the doctrines of Nestorius and Eutyches. But by tacitly setting aside Leo's Tome* and the Chalcedon Definition,* the Henoticon had made an important concession to the Monophysites which the Western Church could not accept. After an angry controversy Pope Simplicius excommunicated Acacius, Peter of Alexandria (Timothy's successor), and Zeno himself. Thus began the first ecclesiastical schism between East and West.

DAVID JOHN WILLIAMS

HENRY II (973-1024). German king and Holy Roman Emperor. Duke of Bavaria and direct descendant of Otto I, Henry was elected king in 1002 and crowned emperor in 1014. He stressed the consolidation of his position in Germany and paid minimal attention to Italy, but did regain some territory lost to the Slavs. He depended heavily on the church, and appointed churchmen to most important administrative positions. Henry made large endowments of crown lands to churches and monasteries, and founded the see of Bamberg in 1007. He put churchmen in charge of vacant counties while freeing other clerics from noble control. By zealously encouraging ecclesiastical reform, he unwittingly paved the way for the destruction of the empire, because a reformed church would not be able to reconcile its spiritual ideals with the political duties imposed on it. Canonized in 1146, many legends have grown up around Henry as the model Christian ruler. His pious wife, Kunigunde, was canonized in 1200.

RICHARD V. PIERARD

HENRY III (c.1017-1056). Holy Roman Emperor from 1039. He was responsible for "the cleansing of the papacy." The tenth and eleventh centuries were for the papacy a period of degeneracy; it had become the tool of violent Roman nobles. In 1046 there were three popes. A deeply religious man, Henry was grieved at the situation and responded to an appeal by marching on Rome, summoning the Synod of Sutri which deposed all three popes and installed a German, Clement II, and forcibly subdued the nobles. He was opposed by "high sacerdotalists," but many supported him, especially those desiring reform such as Peter Damian* and Cardinal Humbert. As a result, the papacy began the task of reforming itself and the church generally. Henry appointed the next three popes, all German, and all zealous reformers. During his life, emperor and pope worked in amicable partnership, but subsequently the papacy began to assert its independence.

J.G.G. NORMAN

HENRY IV (1050-1106). German king and Holy Roman Emperor. He succeeded Henry III in 1056 and endured a regency marked by civil strife that instilled in him a resolve to strengthen the monarchy. After reaching majority in 1065, his overly hasty actions in extending royal power in Saxony resulted in war, and he sought church backing in the struggle. Just as victory was gained in 1075, Pope Gregory VII* forbade lay investiture, thus denying Henry a voice in the selection of German church officials. He indignantly deposed Gregory, and the pope responded by excommunicating Henry in 1076. Because most German nobles supported Gregory, Henry sought to forestall his imminent deposition by going to Canossa in 1077 to obtain papal absolution just before a council was to meet at Augsburg.

Civil war followed as the nobles elected another king and Gregory supported him. In 1080 Henry again deposed Gregory (who died in exile, 1085), set up Clement III as his antipope, and was crowned by him in 1084. Henry's last years were filled with insuperable difficulties as his sons Conrad and Henry revolted and the imperial government collapsed. Resulting from these wars was the growth of feudalism and princely sovereignty in Germany and powerful urban communes in Italy.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: G. Barraclough, The Origins of Modern Germany (1947); G. Tellenbach, Church, State and Christian Society at the Time of the Investiture Contest (1959).

RICHARD V. PIERARD

HENRY IV OF FRANCE (1553-1610). First Bourbon king of France. Reared as a Protestant by his staunchly Calvinist mother Jeanne d'Albrêt, Henry inherited from her the throne of Navarre. He was related to the ruling Valois dynasty through both his father, Anthony of Bourbon, and his mother, a niece of King Francis I (d.1547). With the coming of the wars of religion in 1562, Henry's family became leaders of the Huguenot forces. In 1572 a peace marriage was arranged between Henry and Margaret of Valois, sister of Charles IX (d.1574). Four days later, on 22 August, the St. Bartholomew's Day massacre occurred, Henry was captured, forced to convert to Catholicism, and held prisoner for three and one-half years. He finally escaped, returned to his Protestant faith, and assumed leadership of the Huguenot cause.

In 1589 his cousin, Henry III of France, died without issue, and Henry of Bourbon was heir apparent. Most Frenchmen refused, however, to accept him as king because of his Calvinism. Finally in 1593, with the country on the verge of total collapse, Henry once more embraced the Roman faith and marched triumphantly into Paris. Historians have debated the real motives for his reconversion: personal advancement or the survival of France. Whatever the case, he inaugurated an era of toleration for his former Huguenot compatriots with the Edict of Nantes* in 1598. Henry was assassinated by the Catholic fanatic Francis Ravaillac. ROBERT D. LINDER

HENRY VI (1421-1471). King of England. Son of Henry V and Catherine of Valois, he became king in 1422. He was crowned twice: as king of England in 1429 and as king of France in 1431. In 1445 he married Margaret of Anjou, a woman of forceful character. Henry was an extremely devout and kindly person. He was generous to the poor and abhorred cruelty and immorality. He prayed and meditated frequently and exhorted his barons to do likewise. His interest in education led to his two foundations: at Eton College (1440) and King's College, Cambridge (1441). Yet he was not without personal courage. In 1450, during Jack Cade's rebellion, he rode openly through the streets and refused to fight against his subjects. Unfortunately his character and temperament and bouts of mental disorder made him ill-suited for the task of ruling a politically turbulent country.

When civil war came, Richard Duke of York by 1460 had imprisoned Henry and forced him to recognize Richard (rather than his own son Prince Edward) as his heir, but Richard died that same year, and Edward of York seized the throne while Henry went into exile. Captured in 1465, Henry was held in the Tower until 1470 when, although now completely mad, he was nominally reinstated, only to be sent back to the Tower on Edward's triumphant return to power in May 1471. Henry died probably that same month, reportedly murdered. Pilgrims soon started to visit his tomb in Chertsey, Surrey, and continued to do so after its removal to St. George's Chapel, Windsor. Miracles were reported, and Henry's fellow Lancastrian king, Henry VII, tried unsuccessfully to obtain his canonization. L. FEEHAN

HENRY VIII (1491-1547). King of England. Second son of Henry VII and Elizabeth of York, he was an intelligent boy who received a Renaissance education. On the issuance of a papal dispensation, in 1509 he married Catherine of Aragon, widow of his elder brother Arthur, thus continuing an alliance between the Tudors and the Spanish throne. He became king that same year, with Thomas Wolsey* managing the realm for him.

Shortly after the appearance of Luther's tracts of 1520, Henry VIII with some help replied in 1521 with Defence of the Seven Sacraments, which resulted in the papal grant of the title "Defender of the Faith." Toward the end of the decade Henry became increasingly concerned with his role as king in the spiritual welfare of his people, and with his inability to produce a legitimate male heir which could result in a civil war. The only surviving child of his marriage to Catherine was Mary Tudor. Wolsey thought he could arrange for a divorce and settle the "great matter," but the special legatine court of 1529 presided over by Wolsey and Campeggio* failed to resolve the problem.

In 1529 Wolsey was removed from office and Henry began his assault upon papal control in England. With the death of Archbishop Warham and the resignation of Lord Chancellor Sir Thomas More,* Henry moved quickly. Cranmer was named archbishop; the divorce was granted; Henry married Anne Boleyn. Parliament with the guidance of Thomas Cromwell* proceeded to pass a series of laws that placed England outside the sphere of Rome's control. Appeals to Rome were forbidden, annates and Peter's Pence were stopped, dissolution of monastic property was begun, and the clergy were required to submit to the throne. Protests arose in the Pilgrimage of Grace,* which was crushed, and in the objections of Thomas More and John Fisher, who were executed as a result.

With the birth of Elizabeth the succession question was still unresolved. Three years later Anne Boleyn was accused of adultery and beheaded. Next day, Henry married Jane Seymour who did produce a son, the future Edward VI, but twelve days later the queen died. In 1540 Henry was enticed into marrying Anne of Cleves, but upon her arrival he was so displeased with her that the marriage was not consummated and was dissolved. He next married Catherine Howard, later charged with adultery and beheaded in 1542. Finally he married Catherine Parr, who survived him.

Henry apparently remained basically Catholic, unwilling to subscribe to many Protestant doctrines. The Six Articles* of 1539 mark a return to Catholic doctrine, as perhaps did his marriage to Catherine Howard. The last years of his reign did involve some effort to reform the church while maintaining the exterior of Catholicism. His reign not only started the Reformation in England, but through the use of the Star Chamber, the employment of parliamentary law to work the reforms, the establishment of a national church under direction of the Crown, and the restructuring of the councils of the north and west, he greatly strengthened the Tudor throne in England. Yet as Scarisbrick says: "Few kings have had it in their power to do greater good than Henry, and few have done less."

BIBLIOGRAPHY: J.S. Brewer et al. (eds.), Letters and Papers ... of the Reign of Henry VIII (22 vols., 1862-1932); A.F. Pollard, Henry VIII (1951); C. Read (ed.), Bibliography of British History: Tudor Period, 1485-1603 (2nd ed., 1959); E. Doernberg, Henry VIII and Luther (1961); H.M.

Smith, Henry VIII and the Reformation (1962); J.J. Scarisbrick, Henry VIII (1968); L.B. Smith, Henry the Eighth: The Mask of Loyalty (1973).

ROBERT SCHNUCKER

HENRY, MATTHEW (1662-1714). Biblical expositor. Son of an evangelical Church of England minister, he was born shortly after his father had been ejected from his living as a result of the Act of Uniformity.* A studious boy, he dated his conversion in 1672. He studied at a Nonconformist academy in London, and then read law at Gray's Inn. He considered becoming an Episcopalian minister, but decided to be a Nonconformist and was privately ordained as a Presbyterian. His first pastorate was in Chester (1687-1712), followed by Hackney (1712-14). Greatly influenced by the Puritans, he made exposition of Scripture the central concern of his ministry. Beginning work at four or five o'clock each day, he aimed to use time to the full. In 1704 he began the seven-volume Commentary on the Bible for which he is remembered. He finished up to the end of Acts; ministerial friends completed the NT from his notes and writings. It set a style in detailed, often highly spiritualized, exposition of Scripture which has shaped evangelical ministry ever since; C.H. Spurgeon* acknowledged his debt to Henry; many others have neglected this courtesy. Critical textual problems were not within his purview. Suffice to say that he could write 190 words of comment, including a three-part sermon outline, on Genesis 26:34.

A. MORGAN DERHAM

HENRY, PHILIP (1631-1696). Puritan divine. Born in London of Welsh parents, his father being one of the king's gardeners at Whitehall, he was educated at Westminster and Christ Church, Oxford, and joined the Presbyterians. He became tutor to Judge Puleston's children at Emral in Maelor, and was ordained as a Presbyterian minister in 1657. He was ejected from Worthenbury chapel in 1660. Under the 1672 Declaration of Indulgence* his friends secured him a license to hold services at his home at Broad Oak. His diaries (ed. M.H. Lee, 1882) provide a vivid picture of life for the persecuted under the Penal Code. They also cast a revealing light on the piety and strictness of a Puritan home. He was the father of Matthew Henry.*

R. TUDUR JONES

HENRY OF BLOIS (d.1171). Bishop of Winchester. Trained in Cluny, Henry in 1126 became abbot of the wealthy Glastonbury abbey, which post he continued to hold by special dispensation after he became bishop of Winchester in 1129. Proud and ambitious, he was instrumental in his brother Stephen's accession to the throne in 1135, and was therefore aggrieved because he failed to become archbishop of Canterbury in 1139. He became papal legate, however, and as such was very powerful. Far from being an instrument of Stephen, he represented the interests of the church and papacy, and even of Matilda, against those of his brother. The appointment as legate was not renewed after the death of Innocent II (1143), and because of this Henry was prepared to support Stephen's resistance to the papal will, especially in 1148. Under Henry II, age lost him Canterbury to Becket* (1162), but in the ensuing controversy with the Crown, Henry was a steady opponent of excessive royal authority within the church. He is famous also as a builder of churches and castles.

C. PETER WILLIAMS

HENRY OF GHENT (d.1293). Theologian and philosopher. Born at Ghent, he became archdeacon successively of Bruges and Tournai, and taught in Paris where he became the most outstanding secular master for many years. Involved in the condemnation of aspects of Thomist teaching in Paris in 1277, he also opposed the privileges of the mendicant orders in 1282. His most famous philosophical and theological writings are Quodlibeta and his Summa Theologica. These are critical of Aristotle and produce a significant synthesis of Augustinian teaching and the new learning. Henry was an important catalyst to Duns Scotus,* who took much from him as well as criticizing him freely. Fundamental is his idea of being, and he holds that from this, rather than from the sense perceptions as Aquinas argued, God's existence can be proved.

C. PETER WILLIAMS

HENRY OF LANGENSTEIN (c.1325-1397). German philosopher and theologian. Born in Hesse, he was educated at the University of Paris, where he taught Nominalist philosophy and, later, theology. As the school's leading theologian and vice-chancellor, he led her four faculties to a public position advocating a general church council to heal the Great Schism.* When the French court rejected the idea, some half of the faculty and student body returned to their native Germany. Henry withdrew to the monastery of Eberbach. In 1384 he helped found a theological faculty at the University of Vienna, where he became vice-chancellor and, after 1393, rector. As a competent scholar and writer he produced works on astronomy, the Great Schism, the Immaculate Conception, asceticism, and the errors of astrology.

JAMES DE JONG

HENRY OF LAUSANNE (d. mid-twelfth century). Monk and theologian, he later lapsed into heresy. He rejected the objective efficacy of both the priesthood and the sacraments. His message was the evangelical life of poverty and penance which he himself lived. In 1101 he went from Lausanne to Le Mans, but his views on the priesthood and the sacraments led to his expulsion by Bishop Hildebert. He then preached in various parts of S France, and was condemned by the Council of Toulouse in 1119. In 1135, after arrest by the bishop of Arles, Henry recanted temporarily but soon relapsed and continued his preaching. After 1135 he was influenced by Pierre de Bruys, whose doctrines had many similarities with Henry's. In 1145 Bernard of Clairvaux was sent to combat Henry's preaching. Henry was arrested and died at Toulouse shortly afterward. Although perhaps a precursor of the Waldensians, Henry was not a Manichaean.

L. FEEHAN

HENRY SUSO (c.1300-1366). Swabian mystic. Well-born, he entered the Dominican friary at Constance when he was thirteen and had a deep conversion five years later. Completing his studies at Cologne under the influence of Meister Eckhart, he returned to Constance as lector in the friary school, then became prior. At forty he abandoned his extreme asceticism to preach and be a pastor. As an itinerant preacher, teacher, adviser, and confessor, he visited regularly the Dominican convents about Constance. His writings are essentially devotional; an important one is The Life of the Servant, which records his mystical experiences. His speculative book, The Little Book of Truth, and the more practical, The Little Book of Eternal Wisdom, discuss mysticism in detail. He settled in 1348 in the Dominican convent at Ulm.

C.G. THORNE, JR.

HENSON, HERBERT HENSLEY (1863-1947). Bishop of Durham. After becoming a Fellow of All Souls College, Oxford, in 1884, he was ordained and in 1888 became vicar of Barking. In 1895 he was appointed chaplain of Ilford Hospital, and in 1900 rector of St. Margaret's, Westminster, and canon of Westminster Abbey. In 1912 he became dean of Durham. Six years later he was consecrated bishop of Hereford, but was translated to Durham in 1920, retiring in 1939. A man of liberal churchmanship, his appointment to Hereford was strongly opposed by Anglo-Catholics. A supporter of the establishment, he changed his views after the rejection of the revised Prayer Books by Parliament in 1927 and 1928. A man of courage and wit, he was noted for his pungent utterances on a variety of subjects. His publications include Anglicanism (1921), Christian Morality (1936), Ad Clerum (1937), and his three-volume Retrospect of an Unimportant Life (1942-50).

R.E. NIXON

HEPBURN, JAMES CURTIS (1815-1911). Missionary to Japan. Born at Milton, Pennsylvania, he was converted at Princeton and decided to become a medical missionary. In 1840 he and his wife joined the Presbyterian Board, but were invalided home after five arduous years in Java, Singapore, and Amoy. In 1859 they were among the Protestant pioneers to Japan. Though preaching was forbidden, Hepburn diligently applied himself to learning Japanese while living in a Buddhist temple. A lifetime of industrious and devoted service included the opening of the first dispensary, initiating classes for medical students, inventing a system of romanizing Japanese sounds, compiling the first Japanese-English dictionary, helping to found Meiji Gakuin University, and a major part in the Japanese translation of the Bible which was completed in 1888.

DAVID MICHELL

HEPBURN, JOHN (1649-1723). Scottish minister. Brought up an Episcopalian, this turbulent son of a Morayshire farmer became one of the most contentious ministers Scottish Presbyterianism has known. Ultimately hailed as "The Morning Star of the Secession," and ordained while an exile in London, he was for some thirty-six years minister of the parish of Urr in Galloway without ever having been formally elected or inducted, and despite admonition, suspension, banishment, imprisonment, and deposition at the hands of the ecclesiastical authorities. Ranging over wide tracts of country—preaching, marrying, baptizing—he gathered several thousand followers. These Hebronites, as they came to be known, after taking part in Scotland's first agrarian rebellion, formed the nucleus of many Secession churches once that movement had taken shape under Ebenezer Erskine.*

D.P. THOMSON

HERACLAS (d.247). Alexandrian scholar and bishop. He had a pagan background, and with his brother Plutarch met Origen* at the lectures of the philosopher Ammonius Saccas, and they became Origen's disciples. Heraclas was appointed Origen's colleague in the catechetical school, took over from him the training of catechumens, and succeeded him as head when Origen went to Caesarea. He became bishop of Alexandria in succession to Demetrius in 232. During his episcopate the number of bishops in Egypt increased from four to twenty-four. Eusebius called him "an outstanding exponent of philosophy and other secular studies." He was succeeded as head of the catechetical school and later as bishop by Dionysius, another of Origen's pupils.

J.G.G. NORMAN

HERACLEAN VERSION, see SYRIAC VERSIONS OF THE BIBLE

HERACLEON (fl. c.170-180). A Gnostic teacher who is described as the most esteemed (dokimōtatos) of the school of Valentinus and had known Valentinus personally, but who differed in some points from other writers of Valentinus's school. He is the first-known commentator on the Gospel according to John, and parts of his highly allegorizing commentary (hypomnēmata) are preserved in quotations in Origen, while Clement refers to his exposition of Luke 12:8, which suggests that he had commented on that gospel also. It is not known where he taught.

HERACLIUS (575-641). Byzantine emperor from 610. His reign marked the revival of the Eastern Empire. In 611 Persian attackers captured Edessa, Apamea, and Antioch. Heraclius fought the Persians throughout his reign, reorganizing his army for efficiency and establishing the "theme" as the empire's basic military and administrative unit. Antioch was his headquarters until about 636; the center of the empire survived despite the loss of Syria and Egypt to the Arabs. Fearing that Monophysitism in Syria, Armenia, and Egypt would bring support to the Persians by alienating the indigenous population from the central government, he tried to reconcile Monophysite and Chalcedonian views on Christology by proposing a Monothelite solution in 633: Christ had one divine human will. Sergius of Constantinople was his chief religious counselor (drawing on Cyril and Dionysius the Areopagite). This effort began as early as 628, when occupied territories were freed. Negotiations pivoted on Athenasius. Jacobite patriarch of Antioch, but he died in 631. Strong opposition to the plan focused in a monk named Sophronius, later patriarch of Jerusalem, and in Honorius of Rome.

See ECTHESIS. JOHN GROH

HERBERT, GEORGE (1593-1633). English poet. Educated at Westminster and Cambridge (where he was in due course to become public orator), it seemed that he was set for a distinguished public career, but the deaths of patrons and of James I himself dashed such possibilities. These deaths and that of his mother in 1626 may have influenced Herbert's always serious mind into deciding to enter Holy Orders. He became rector of Bemerton, near Salisbury, in 1629, but died of consumption four years later. Herbert was an exemplary pastor, and A Priest to the Temple is a fine analysis of what is desirable in clerical character and care. An early Anglo-Catholic, associated with the Little Gidding community of Nicholas Ferrar,* he expresses in the poems contained in The Temple a personal piety as deep as, if less demonstrative than, that of his self-confessed mentor, John Donne,* and wider than that of his master. In much of Herbert's poetry there is that subdued, but nonetheless sincere, sense of devotion that is the very essence of Anglican worship. ARTHUR POLLARD

HERDER, JOHANN GOTTFRIED VON (1744-1803). Lutheran scholar. Born in East Prussia, he studied at the University of Königsberg (1762-64) where he came under the divergent influences of Immanuel Kant* and J.G. Hamann.* He was successively Lutheran pastor at Riga (1764-69), court pastor at Bückeberg (1771-76), and general superintendent and court preacher at Weimar (1776), where he lived, uncomfortably opposed by the official clergy, for the rest of his life. In addition to extensive literary and philosophical publications, Herder produced a study of the synoptics (1796) which recognized Mark as no epitome, and to be in parallel passages longer, and perhaps older, than the others. His study of John (1797) indicated that that gospel could not be harmonized with the synoptics, and that while a life of Jesus could come from either John or the synoptics, it could not be derived from an artificially constituted harmony of them all. Herder's collected works were critically edited by B. Suphan (33 vols., 1877-1913).

CLYDE CURRY SMITH

HERESY. In Hellenistic Greek the term hairesis meant a philosophical school or teaching (e.g., Stoicism). Its use in Judaism was similar (e.g., the "party" of the Pharisees or the Essenes). The term appears in the NT colored by this background, and is at first used neutrally (Acts 24:5; 26:5; cf. Acts 5:17; 15:5; 28:22). But the term is also used in the NT in a specifically Christian context with a pejorative sense, to mean divisions within the church which threaten its unity (1 Cor. 11:19; Gal. 5:20; cf. Titus 3:10). The problem of heresy as it was to be later defined, over against orthodoxy, shows itself in the NT at 2 Peter 2:1, referring to false teachers who will "introduce destructive heresies" in their denial of Christ. Although the term hairesis, however, is not used in this connection, the letters of Paul and John reveal early pressure on the Christian Church to resist doctrinal error within its ranks (pre-Gnosticism), as well as persecution from outside (cf. Col. 2:8-23; 1 John 2:22; 4:2f.; 2 John 7ff.).

In the early church the concept of hairesis as theological error predominated, although at first (as with Cyprian on the Novatians), "heresy" and "schism" were not always distinguished (cf. 1 Cor. 11:18f.). From the late second century, however, "heresy" usually meant doctrinal error, departure from accepted rules of faith; while "schism" implied dissent from the church for any reason whatever. The existence of heterodoxy in the early church encouraged the definition of the faith by the councils, in the creeds, and in the canon of the NT. Walter Bauer holds neverthless that diversity of belief at the local levels of the early church (in the second century, at least) was such that "orthodoxy" and "heresy" (as these came to be described eventually) originally coexisted.

The early Fathers regarded heterodoxy as sinful, because of the inflexibility of will from which (they claimed) it derived. This view of the moral aspect of heresy strongly influenced medieval Scholastic thought on the subject; although the terms "faith" and "heresy" acquired at the same time a wider meaning, related generally to Christian life and conduct, and not only to the denial of revealed truth as taught by the church (so Aquinas). In more recent times heresy has come again to denote a strictly doctrinal heterodoxy which deserves censure.

See also CANON; MARCION; EXCOMMUNICATION.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: H.E.W. Turner, The Pattern of Christian Truth (1954); A. Ehrhardt, "Christianity Before the Apostles' Creed," Harvard Theological Review, LV (1962), pp. 73-119; W. Bauer, Rechtgläubigkeit und Ketzerei im ältesten Christentum (2nd ed., 1964); S.S. Smalley, "Diversity and Development in John," NTS XVII (1970-71), pp. 276-92. STEPHEN S. SMALLEY

HERGENRÖTHER, JOSEPH (1824-1890). Roman Catholic scholar. He studied in his native Würzburg, the German College in Rome, and at Munich where he took his doctorate in theology and lectured (1850-52) before appointment as professor of canon law and church history at Würzburg. He published Photius's Liber de Spiritus Sancti mystagogia (1857), followed later by his own massive work on Photius, and the Handbuch der allgemeinen Kirchengeschichte (3 vols., 1876-80). He then became consultant in the preparations for Vatican I, cardinal (1879), and the first prefect of the Vatican archives. For the sake of his studies he declined the bishopric of Limburg. Defending papal infallibility, he refuted Döllinger in Anti-Janus (1870), having earlier attacked his liberalism with Der Zeitgeist (1861). Hergenröther also edited the register of Leo X to 1515, and wrote Der Kirchenstaat seit der französischen Revolution (1860). C.G. THORNE, JR.

HERMANN OF REICHENAU (Hermanus Contractus) (1013-1054). Author of the earliest extant universal chronicle. His father, Count Wolverad II of Altshausen in Swabia, entrusted him at the age of seven to Abbot Berno of Reichenau in Lake Constance, where he took vows in 1043. Although severely handicapped physically (hence the nickname), Hermann gained the reputation of the most scholarly man in eleventh-century Germany. He became proficient in theology, Latin, Greek, and Arabic, and achieved fame as poet, mathematician, astronomer, and musician. He was a faithful monk and a genial teacher, and students flocked to him. His greatest achievement is his chronicle, which is more interpretive and less strictly chronological in organization than its antecedents. His narrative, remarkable for accuracy, objectivity, and careful chronology, begins with the birth of Christ and ends with the year of Hermann's death. He constructed timepieces and musical and astronomical instruments, wrote mathematical treatises, poems and hymns, and has often been credited with the famous hymns Salve Regina and Alma Redemptoris Mater.

MARY E. ROGERS

HERMANN VON WIED (1477-1552). Church reformer. Trained in law, he became archbishop-elector of Cologne while only a subdeacon (1515), and later also administrator of Paderborn diocese (1532). Ardent for reform but hostile to Protestantism, especially Anabaptism, he convened a provincial council in Cologne in 1536 which, under Gropper's* guidance, enacted disciplinary and reforming canons. Disappointed at the outcome, the theologically unsophisticated Hermann welcomed the Regensburg Recess instruction to "institute and establish a Christian order and reformation" (1541), and invited Bucer, Melanchthon, and other Protestants to promote renewal and compile a new church order for his territory (1542-43). To the Cologne Ordinances or Didagma (Einfaltigs Bedencken einer Christlichen Reformation, 1543-44) Melanchthon contributed most of the doctrine and Bucer the institutional and ceremonial. The revised Latin version (Simplex ac Pia Deliberatio, 1545) greatly influenced Cranmer's 1549 Prayer Book, and an English translation followed (A Simple and Religious Consultation, 1547-48). In Cologne the proposals met increasing opposition from councillors, university and chapter (including the formerly favorable Gropper, who published an Antididagma, 1544), although the temporal estates backed Hermann. After a pivotal Catholic-Protestant struggle, he was excommunicated by Paul III (1546) and deposed by Charles V (1547). At last completely a Protestant, he died in the principality of Wied.

See C. Varrentrapp, Hermann von Wied und sein Reformationsversuch in Köln (1878); and M. Köhn, Martin Bucers Entwurf einer Reformation der Erzstiftes Köln (1966).

D.F. WRIGHT

HERMAS. Traditionally one of the Apostolic Fathers, known almost exclusively from his work The Shepherd. Formerly a (Jewish?) slave emancipated at Rome, he farmed and prospered, but lost his property and saw his sons apostatize in persecution. The Shepherd reveals a prophet of mediocre intellect, narrow concerns, and simple, sometimes unstable, piety. He was a contemporary of Clement, yet the Muratorian Canon says he wrote while his brother Pius was bishop of Rome (i.e., 140-54). Internal evidence confirms that The Shepherd was composed in stages c.90-140/150, perhaps by three different authors.

The work consists of five Visions, twelve Mandates, and ten Similitudes. Hermas receives revelations from a woman whose age turns to youthful beauty (Vis. 1-4), who is the Church (also depicted as a tower under construction), and from the "angel of repentance" in a shepherd's guise, whose appearance in Vis. 5 introduces the remaining sections. Inconsistencies, the apocalyptic and allegorical genres, and colorful imagery greatly complicate interpretation. The major themes are ethical—purity and repentance. Moral instruction largely occupies Simil. 1-5 and the Mandates, which embody a "two ways" pattern widely attested in Jewish and early Christian literature.

Debate has surrounded The Shepherd's teaching on postbaptismal repentance. The view that it was first generally countenanced by Hermas is now being overtaken by the interpretation that he assumes it from the outset but limits it, because of the approaching end, to sins committed up to the present. A rudimentary penitential system is already operative (cf. Simil. 7-10).

The Shepherd's chief importance lies in the light it throws on the beliefs of Jewish Christianity, whose literary forms it employs, and on the "vulgar catholicism" of a Christian congregation in Hellenistic Roman society. The work enjoyed high regard in the early centuries, especially in the East. It was widely included among the Scriptures until the third century and was still used for catechetical purposes in Athanasius's day. Nevertheless, it survives in a poor textual tradition.

See also APOSTOLIC FATHERS.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: W.J. Wilson, "The Career of the Prophet Hermas," HTR 20 (1927), pp. 21-62; B. Poschmann, Paenitentia Secunda (1939), pp. 134-205, and Penance and the Anointing of the Sick (1964), pp. 26-35; J. Quasten, Patrology 1 (1950), pp. 92-105; S. Giet, Hermas et les Pasteurs (1963); L. Pernveden, The Concept of the Church in the Shepherd of Hermas (1966); J. Reiling, Hermas and Christian Prophecy (1973).

D.F. WRIGHT

HERMESIANISM. A philosophical and theological system propounded by Georg Hermes (1775-1831), German Roman Catholic theologian, professor of theology at Münster. He had studied philosophy at Münster and had been deeply influenced by the rationalism and idealism of Kant and Fichte. He tried to establish the truth of Christianity by reason alone. Theology, he argued, must begin with positive doubt. Kant had held that God's existence was a postulate of man's reason in its practical or moral use. Hermes thought God's existence could be demonstrated by theoretical reason, which determines and categorizes the data supplied by sense intuition.

Hence the consciousness that "I know" and the thought that "something is there" involve variations that require a sufficient and absolute reason for their origin. From this point Hermes argued for the possibility of divine revelation. The dualism of theoretical reason and practical reason runs throughout his work. The "belief of the reason" is brought about by demonstration. The "belief of the heart" is the accepting of revealed truths by a free surrender of the will. Hermes's principal writings were Einleitung in die christkatholische Theologie (1819-29) and Positive Einleitung (1829). His followers were influential in the universities, but in 1835 Gregory XVI condemned the system, largely for its basic rationalism and tendency to skepticism. There was strong opposition to the decision, but in 1870 it was confirmed by Vatican Council I.* HOWARD SAINSBURY

HERMETIC BOOKS. This collection of writings deals with religious and philosophical subjects and reflects a degree of syncretism with reference to Platonic, Stoic, Neo-Pythagorean, and Eastern religious thought. The collection dates from the second or third century and is ascribed to Hermes Trismegistus which represents a later designation for the Egyptian god Thoth, who was said to be the source and protector of all knowledge. The literary form of the Hermetic Books is basically that of the Platonic dialogue. The single most significant of the several writings is "Poimandres," which tells of the soul's ascent to God through the various spheres of the planets.

HERMIAS. Author of the Irrisio Gentilium Philosophorum. Nothing is known of him, and his work has been variously dated from the second to the sixth century. It is an attempt to show that the opinions of the Greek philosophers are contradictory, but it is "disfigured by bold caricature and over-simplification" (H.E.W. Turner). He holds that their contradictions are due to the influence of demons and extend to such basic matters as the being and attributes of God and the nature of Providence. Although Hermias is himself called a philosopher in the title of the book, his attitude to philosophy "seems to rest upon anti-intellectualist premises" (Turner). As Neander suggests, he may once have worn the philosopher's mantle, but his enthusiasm for philosophy had turned to abhorrence. DAVID JOHN WILLIAMS

HERMIT (Gr. erēmitēs from erēmia = desert). A person seeking to please God who voluntarily adopts the solitary religious life. Within the early Church of Egypt, Christian hermits first appeared in the third century—e.g., Antony.* They lived in desert areas. Their fame was widespread, and many came both to see and to emulate them, so that in the next few centuries the number of hermits vastly increased. Some lived alone, others maintained their solitude in a community of hermits—e.g., the famous Augustinian Hermits.* Since the Counter-Reformation in the sixteenth century, hermits have disappeared from the Western Church, though their tradition is still partly retained in such religious orders as the Carthusians. The Eastern Orthodox Churches still have hermits. PETER TOON

HERODS. A Jewish family of Idumean descent prominent in the government of Palestine in the NT period, after their ancestor Antipater had been appointed procurator of Judea by Julius Caesar in 47 B.C.

(1) Herod the Great (c.73-4 B.C.) was the son of Antipater and a man of ruthless ability. He married Mariamne, who was the heiress of the Hasmonaean dynasty, so hoping to win the favor of the Jews. He rebuilt the Temple at Jerusalem, but he was never fully accepted by the Jews. He worked faithfully for the Roman authorities and was given by them the title "King of the Jews" in 37 B.C. He promoted Hellenism in Palestine. His suspicion of plots led to the murders of his wife and members of his family, and of the children in the area of Bethlehem (Matt. 2). After his death the Jews petitioned for direct Roman rule. In his will the territory was allotted to his sons—Judea, Samaria, and Idumea to Archelaus; Galilee and Perea to Antipas; and Batanea, Trachonitis, Iturea, and Auranitis to Philip.

(2) Archelaus was ethnarch in Judea from 4 B.C. to A.D. 6, but after a deputation went to Rome, he was deposed and exiled.

(3) Herod Antipas, known as "the Tetrarch," features most prominently in the gospels, which show him as a man of ability and cunning ("that fox," Luke 13:32), responsible for the execution of John the Baptist (Mark 6:14-28). Jesus was sent to him by Pilate for judgment (Luke 23:7-12). Herod was defeated in battle by Aretas IV of Nabatea in A.D. 36, and three years later was deposed and exiled by the Romans as a plotter.

(4) Philip seems to have ruled well until his death in A.D. 34.

(5) Herod Agrippa I was given by the emperor Gaius (Caligula) the tetrarchy of Philip after his death and that of Antipas after the latter's banishment. In A.D. 41 Claudius gave him the Roman province of Judea and Samaria. He was in favor with the Jews, but became extremely arrogant and was struck by sudden fatal illness in A.D. 44.

(6) Herod Agrippa II was his son, but was given less territory than his father. He was involved in the examination of Paul in Acts 25 and 26. He tried to dissuade the Jews from revolting in A.D. 66.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: in addition to traditional sources, A.H.M. Jones, The Herods of Judaea (1938); S. Perowne, Life and Times of Herod the Great (1956) and The Later Herods (1958); H.W. Hoehner, Herod Antipas (1972). R.E. NIXON

HERRNHUT, see MORAVIAN BRETHREN

HERTFORD, COUNCIL OF (673). A council of bishops summoned by Theodore of Tarsus, archbishop of Canterbury, to promote the reorganization of the English Church. Among its ten canons it reaffirmed the Roman calculation of Easter (canon 1), prohibited bishops intruding in the affairs of neighboring dioceses (2), forbade monks and clergymen from leaving their places without permission (4/5), provided for future episcopal synods twice a year (7—later amended to an annual meeting at Clovesho), established precedence of bishops according to dates of ordination (8), and recognized adultery as the only ground for divorce (10). It was the first occasion on which the English Church deliberated as a unity and has been called "the first constitutional measure of the English race" (Stubbs), representing a landmark in the development of the English constitution.

J.G.G. NORMAN

HERZOG, JOHANN JAKOB (1805-82). Swiss-German Reformed theologian. Born in Basle, he studied theology there and later in Berlin, where he was a pupil of F. Schleiermacher* and J.A.W. Neander.* Appointed to Lausanne in 1835, he served as professor of historical theology from 1838 to 1846 and authored several works on the Zwinglian and Calvinist Reformation. He assumed the chair of church history at Halle in 1847 where he published two major studies of the Waldensians (De origine et pristino statu Waldensium, 1848, and Die romanischen Waldenser, 1835), and in 1854 was named professor of Reformed theology at Erlangen. In 1848 he was invited to undertake the editorship of a comprehensive religious encyclopedia from the Protestant perspective to counter a Catholic work then being published. The editing of this twenty-two volume, Realencyklopädie für protestantische Theologie and Kirche (1853-68), was his most significant endeavor and he himself contributed 529 articles to it. He began a second edition with his colleagues G.L. Plitt and Albert Hauck which the latter completed after Herzog's death. The work was modified and condensed into an American edition by Philip Schaff in 1882-84, and subsequent editions of this were known as the Schaff-Herzog Encyclopedia of Religious Knowledge.

RICHARD V. PIERARD

HESYCHASM. The Hesychast movement made its appearance in Byzantium in the first part of the fourteenth century. The name comes from the Greek word hesychia, "quiet" or "silence." It was applied to those individuals who devoted themselves in silence to mystical meditation, attempting to come into a full unity with God. This movement in the Byzantine Church illustrates the difference between official theology and the theology of experience. The ascetic monks of Mt. Athos attempted to meditate so intensely as to isolate themselves completely from the world and so attain the Divine Light. A monk of this persuasion would usually press his chin on his chest while focusing his eyes on his navel and holding his breath until his vision became dim. He would soon enter an ecstatic trance which would be the ultimate in union with God.

An extensive controversy broke out over this issue, primarily started by one Barlaam who in the West had been involved in an attempt to reunite the Eastern and Western churches. On his return to Constantinople he immediately began to ridicule the Hesychasts for their ecstatic experience of God. Barlaam and those who took similar views against the Hesychasts felt that it was wrong to have such an experience, for God could only be known indirectly. The Divine and Uncreated Light which came through the Hesychast experience was not authentic but simply an illusion. The various physical positions of prayer carried on by the Hesychasts were also part of the attack.

Gregory Palamas,* a former monk of Athos and then archbishop of Thessalonica, took up the defense of the Hesychasts. His articulate exposition of the position that man can know God even though God is by nature unknowable won the day. This was explained by differentiating between the energies of God which are knowable and the essence of God which is unknowable. Proper meditation involves the whole body since man is a unified being and must use that total being in his communion with God. A council was summoned on this issue in 1341; it sanctioned the doctrine of Uncreated Light and thus declared in favor of the Mt. Athos monks and Orthodox mysticism. To illustrate the extremes to which the victory was taken, Nicephorus Gregoras who was against the Hesychasts was reportedly dragged along the streets of the city after his death.

This was a difficult time for the Eastern Christian world because the Byzantine Empire being greatly weakened after the Crusades was having its very existence threatened by the advancing Muslims. The Muslim Turks were constantly creeping closer to Constantinople. The Slavs were stirring and causing Byzantium difficulty in the north. In the struggle for the identity of Byzantine theology, the mystical emphasis of the theology reigned supreme at this particular time.

See J. Meyendorff, St. Grégoire Palamas et la mystique orthodoxe (1959).

GEORGE GIACUMAKIS, JR.

HESYCHIUS (third century). Egyptian bishop. He is associated with Phileas, Theodorus, and Pachumis in addressing a letter to Melitius of Lycopolis. The letter, a Latin version of which is still extant, remonstrates with Melitius on his irregular ordinations. The bishops were in prison when the letter was written and were martyred under Galerius. This Hesychius is usually identified with the reviser of the text of the Septuagint and NT, or at least of the gospels, which was extensively used in Egypt. Jerome refers to it more than once, charging Hesychius with making apocryphal additions to the text, a charge that is later repeated in the Gelasian Decree.

HESYCHIUS OF JERUSALEM (fifth century). Greek writer. Born and educated in Jerusalem, he early became a monk and was subsequently ordained presbyter by the bishop of Jerusalem. His knowledge and eloquence were held in high esteem. He wrote against the Manichaeans, Arians, Apollinarians, and others. He is said to have written a history of the Council of Ephesus (431) and to have commented on the whole of the Bible. What survives of his writing suggests that he adopted the Alexandrian style of exegesis. Cyril of Scythopolis in his Vita Euthymii mentions Hesychius as having accompanied Juvenal of Jerusalem to the consecration of the Church of the Laura of Euthymius about 428, and he is said by Allatius to have been chartophylax of the Church of the Anastasius at Jerusalem. Hesychius was a friend of Eutyches and opposed to the Council of Chalcedon (451). The date of his death is unknown. DAVID JOHN WILLIAMS

HETZER, LUDWIG (c.1500-1529). Anabaptist reformer, translator, and hymnwriter. Born at Thurgau, he matriculated at Basle (1517). From the chaplaincy at Wädenswil he came to Zurich, and wrote advocating an iconoclasm like that of Carlstadt. Disillusioned with Zwingli's caution, Hetzer, Grebel, and Manz established their own conventicles. Hetzer was expelled from Zurich (1525), led a group of Anabaptists at Augsburg, was banished to Basle, then stayed with Capito in Strasbourg (1526), where he was joined by Hans Denck. The three were gifted Hebraists, and Hetzer busied himself translating the Prophets. Expelled again, he went to Worms, and there published with Denck's help Alle Propheten verdeutscht (1527), the earliest Protestant version of the Prophets in German. By this time tending to anti-Trinitarian spiritualism, he was accused of adultery (1528) and beheaded at Constance. He composed hymns which were highly prized by the Hutterite* tradition. J.G.G. NORMAN

HEUMANN, CHRISTOPH AUGUST (1681-1764). German Protestant theologian. He studied at Jena, where he taught philosophy for some years, was director of the theological seminary at Eisenach (1709-17), and then of the gymnasium at Göttingen (1717-34). When the latter became the new University of Göttingen, Heumann became professor of the history of literature and associate professor of theology (1734-45) and then full professor of theology (1745-58). Resigning in 1758 when he came to reject the Lutheran understanding of the Eucharist, he devoted the remainder of his life to writing. He wrote extensively in theology, philosophy, linguistics, history, and literary criticism. He translated the NT (1748), wrote a twelve-volume commentary on the whole NT (1750-63), and published numerous controversial papers on the Lord's Supper.
W. WARD GASQUE

HEYLING, PETER (1607/8-1652). First German Protestant missionary. Born in Lübeck, he was from childhood noted for piety. When he began legal studies at Paris in 1628 he came under the influence of the Dutch legal scholar Hugo Grotius,* who resided there. His tract, On the Truth of the Christian Religion, was a handbook for missionaries. A member of a band of pious German students concerned about the church in the Near East, Heyling volunteered for missionary service without ecclesiastical support or connection. He studied Arabic on Malta and then went to Egypt where he encountered opposition from Orthodox and Catholic clerics. The Coptic Abuna (bishop) invited him to come to Ethiopia in 1634 where Heyling tutored children of prominent families and even gained the king's favor. He translated the gospel of John into Amharic and assisted in preparing a compendium of Roman law for use in Ethiopia. In 1652 he was martyred by a Muslim fanatic. RICHARD V. PIERARD

HEYLYN, PETER (1600-1662). Anglican polemicist and historian. Born at Burford, Oxfordshire, and educated at Magdalen College, Oxford, where he held a fellowship from 1618-29, he was ordained in 1624 and early showed strong High Church sympathies. A series of anti-Puritan treatises and debates gained him notoriety, and in 1630 he was made a royal chaplain. He basked in the favor of Charles I and Laud, receiving several livings, including a prebend of Westminster (where eventually he became subdean). He came into conflict with the dean there, Bishop J. Williams, continually slandering Williams until the latter was suspended by the Star Chamber (1637). Heylyn's inveterate anti-Puritanism brought him to grief during the Puritan revolution. W. Prynne,* perhaps in revenge for Heylyn's part in the condemnation of his Historiomastix and the subsequent personal ignominies, brought him before a Long Parliament committee. In the event Heylyn was heavily fined, his goods and library confiscated, and his life jeopardized. After 1648 he settled in Oxfordshire and, though continuing his rancorous treatises against Puritanism and Presbyterianism, lived in relative peace until the Restoration. He regained his influence in the church, but died soon after in London. His main works include Ecclesia restaurata, or the History of the Reformation of the Church of England (1661; new ed. 1849); Cyprianus Anglicus, or ... the Life and Death of ... William Laud (1668); Aerius redivivus, or the History of the Presbyterians (1670; 1672 ed. reprinted 1969).
BRIAN G. ARMSTRONG

HICKES, GEORGE (1642-1715). Nonjuror.* Graduate of Oxford where he later taught, he was ordained in 1666 and was briefly rector of St. Ebbe's, Oxford. While chaplain to the duke of Lauderdale he participated in Scottish church affairs. He was prebendary of Worcester where he later (1683) became dean, but he declined the bishopric of Bristol. Refusing allegiance to William and Mary, he was deprived of his deanery in 1690. He was in 1694 consecrated titular bishop of Thetford by the Nonjurors. His scholarship ranged from a specialized grammar and thesaurus to monographs on baptism, priesthood, and church order, editions of Thomas à Kempis and Fénelon, and a posthumously-published work, Constitution of the Catholic Church ... (1716).
C.G. THORNE, JR.

HICKSITES. In 1827-28 a number of American Quakers, following the preaching of Elias Hicks (1748-1830), withdrew from the orthodox Society of Friends and established their own yearly meetings. Hicks, an eloquent preacher and social crusader who had attacked such institutions as slavery, contended that man was capable of saving himself, and described the Bible and church dogma as functional but not authoritative. This group included those who had been influenced by Unitarianism, those who wished to resist the attempt by evangelical Quakers to unite all yearly meetings and create written doctrine, and those who believed inner experience was primary. Out of the schism, which generally included urban, progressive Quakers, came increased social activism. In 1902 the seven yearly meetings claiming Hicksite loyalties formed their own confederation, the Friends General Conference, to provide mutual help, but not coercion, for the "liberal, silent" meetings. In recent years they have cooperated with orthodox Friends.

DARREL BIGHAM

HIERARCHY (Gr. hierarchia, "the administration of sacred things"). The term has been used by Christians since the Church Fathers to denote the body of persons participating in church rule. To Roman Catholics it means collectively the organization of clerics into rank and order of position. More specifically, the Roman Catholic Church gives a twofold meaning to "hierarchy," with several subdivisions under each. In the hierarchy of order, those deriving authority directly from God comprise bishops, priests and deacons. Non-divine-right functions in this hierarchy are the subdiaconate and minor orders. In the hierarchy of jurisdiction, all grades derive authority from ecclesiastic sources, except the papacy and the episcopate, which are divinely ordained. The former grades of this hierarchy exercise authority conferred either from the pope or from the bishop.

ROYAL L. PECK

HIERONYMIAN MARTYROLOGY. A compilation comprising as its chief elements the calendars of Rome, Carthage, and Syria. The nucleus of the work is the Roman calendar, with which were incorporated in part or in whole the calendars of other Italian cities and the calendar of Carthage. To the Western calendar thus formed, a later editor added the first part of the Syrian festival list. It is noteworthy that he has taken over with the Syrian calendar its Arian coloring, the commemoration of the two bishops Eusebius being retained and even that of Arius himself, his name appearing in the corrupted forms "Arthoci," "Artotes," or "Ari Thoti" in different MSS. The preface takes the form of a letter addressed by Chromatius of Aquileia and Heliodorus of Altinum to Jerome, asking him to send them the festal calendar of Eusebius, and a reply from Jerome in which he says he is sending a shortened form of the calendar with the names of the most notable martyrs arranged according to the months and days of the year. It is from this apocryphal correspondence that the martyrology takes its name. The preface is first cited by Cassiodorus in 544. Its final compilation probably dates therefore from between the late fifth and early sixth centuries, and was probably made in N Italy. DAVID JOHN WILLIAMS

HIERONYMITES. In the fourth century certain Roman ladies at Bethlehem placed themselves under Jerome's direction. Though he founded a monastery there, it is in the fourteenth century that one looks to Fernando Pecha, who founded the Hieronymites in Spain. Gregory XI confirmed the order in 1373. In 1389 the monastery of Our Lady of Guadalupe passed into their hands. The Palace Monastery of San Lorenzo del Escorial, erected by Philip II outside Madrid, contains the richest library in Spain. A third important monastery is Belem, where the Portuguese kings are buried. Generous almsgiving marks the order, though its original strict observance of an Augustinian Rule relaxed so that in 1780 Charles III received special papal permission to solve disciplinary problems. In 1837 the Hieronymite Order as reorganized in 1585 was suspended.

MARVIN W. ANDERSON

HIGHER CRITICISM. The older term for what today is more generally known as "literary criticism." Though used earlier by students of the classics, it seems to have been first applied to biblical literature by J.G. Eichhorn* in the preface to the second edition of his Old Testament Introduction (1787). Higher criticism is so designated to distinguish it from "lower" or textual criticism. The image is that of a building: the first task in the study of any ancient document is to determine the true text insofar as that is possible; discussion of such matters as literary form, date, authorship, and purpose is "higher" in that it builds on the foundation of textual (lower) criticism. Although higher criticism is an essentially positive term, it is sometimes used by conservative Christians in a pejorative sense. W. WARD GASQUE

HILARION (c.291-371). Eastern ascetic. Born of pagan parents at Thabatha, near Gaza, he was educated at Alexandria and there converted to Christianity. For a time he was a disciple of Antony in the Egyptian desert, but soon returned to Palestine, to the desert south of Majoma, where he continued to practice the ascetic life which he had adopted in Egypt. Jerome traces the origin of the practice of the ascetic life in Palestine to Hilarion. The fame of his sanctity soon spread. He gathered disciples and organized them into societies. He also exercised an influence over the nomadic Arab tribes that came into contact with him. But his fame interfered with his life as a hermit and he returned to Egypt about 356. Some years later Julian's police forced him to flee further afield. He stayed in Sicily and Dalmatia and finally at Paphos in Cyprus. There he enjoyed the company of his disciples Hesychius and Epiphanius. He died there, and his body was taken by Hesychius back to Majoma.

DAVID JOHN WILLIAMS

HILARY OF ARLES (401-449). Bishop of Arles. Born of noble family and educated in philosophy and rhetoric, he was persuaded to renounce secular society for the solitude of Lérins by its founder, Honoratus, his kinsman. When Honoratus became bishop of Arles in 426, Hilary accompanied him there and succeeded him two years later. He presided over the councils of Riez (439), Orange (441), and Vaison (442). The canons of Riez and Orange are concerned mainly with discipline. The seventh canon of Riez is concerned with the rights of the bishop of Arles which Hilary was most energetic to further, howbeit from no selfish motives. He remained an ascetic throughout his episcopate, but he came into conflict with Leo, who was equally energetic in furthering the rights of the bishop of Rome.

At a council at Vienne in 444, Hilary deposed Chelidonius, bishop of Besançon. When the latter appealed to Rome, Hilary went there to defend his decision. Leo, however, reversed that decision, depriving Hilary of his metropolitical rights. A rescript was obtained against him from Valentinian III which also ordered provincial governors to enforce obedience to the bishop of Rome. Of his remaining years little is known. It is evident from the letters of Prosper and another Hilary that while he was a great admirer of Augustine, Hilary did not accept Augustine's teaching on predestination. From this, and from his respect for Faustus of Riez, we must regard Hilary as a semi-Pelagian.* Fragments of his works were collected in editions of Leo's works by P. Quesnel (1675) and P. and H. Ballerini (1753-57; rep. J.P. Migne, Patrologia Latina, 1, pp. 1213-92, with additions). DAVID JOHN WILLIAMS

HILARY OF POITIERS (c.315-368). Bishop of Poitiers. Born of good family, he was educated in the Latin classics, converted about 350 to Christianity, and some three years later was made by popular choice bishop of Poitiers, his birthplace. He became a leader of the orthodox in Gaul, although he confessed that he only discovered the creed of the Council of Nicea on the eve of his exile, but had held the teaching it contained on the basis of his study of the Bible. After the Council of Milan in 355 he led the protest against the banishment of those bishops who refused to condemn Athanasius and against the intervention of the civil power in questions of faith. As a result of this he was himself condemned by the council at Beziers in 356, and banished by Emperor Constantius to Phrygia. In this enforced leisure he was able to pursue his study of theology, and his De Trinitate belongs to this period. In 359 the councils of Arminum in the West and Seleucia in the East were held. Hilary was obliged to attend that of Seleucia, at which he defended the cause of orthodoxy. From there he went to Constantinople, only to find the delegates from the Western council betraying the orthodoxy which he had upheld. He appealed to the emperor for an audience, but was refused. Constantius sent him back to Gaul without annulling his banishment. The emperor's attitude provoked a bitter attack by Hilary in his Contra Constantium. Meanwhile, the emperor had forced the orthodox bishops at Arminum to subscribe to an Arian creed. On his return to Gaul, Hilary set about counteracting this Arian victory. In 362 he traveled to N Italy and Illyria for the same purpose, but was ordered back to Gaul by Valentinian after a dispute between Hilary and Auxentius, bishop of Milan.
DAVID JOHN WILLIAMS

HILDA (Hild) (614-680). Abbess of Whitby. She was the daughter of Hereric, nephew of King Edwin of Northumbria, who was converted through the preaching of Paulinus and baptized by him in 627. She served God faithfully in the secular world for a number of years, being influenced by both the Roman and the Celtic streams of Christianity. She then decided to become a nun, and was on her way to France to join a religious community when she was recalled from East Anglia by Aidan* in 649. Aidan appointed her abbess of the convent at Hartlepool in County Durham. In 659 she became the founder and abbess of the double monastery for men and women set strikingly on the cliff top at Streanshalch (Whitby) in Yorkshire. This community became famous as a school of theology and literature, nurturing five future bishops and Caedmon, the earliest known English poet. At the Synod of Whitby* in 663/4 she defended the Celtic customs, but when the decision went in favor of the Roman usage she accepted that. R.E. NIXON

HILDEBRAND, see GREGORY VII

HILDEGARD (1098-1179). German abbess, mystic, and writer, who became the leader of a convent near Bingen. She experienced visions which increased in frequency as she grew older. An investigation by the archbishop of Mainz gave a favorable verdict on the authenticity of her experiences, and he assigned a monk, Volmar, to act as her secretary. Pope Eugenius III also investigated her activities, and again a favorable report followed. Her principal work, Scivias, is an account of twenty-six visions with an apocalyptic emphasis dealing with creation, redemption, and the church. She also wrote saints' lives, two books of medicine and natural history, hymns, homilies, and a language of her own consisting of 900 words and an alphabet of twenty-three letters. Her influence extended beyond her convent through her extensive correspondence and travels in Germany and France. She spoke to people of all classes and called them to repent and obey the warnings God had given to her. Although miracles have been attributed to her and canonization procedures have been started, they have never been completed. ROBERT G. CLOUSE

HILGENFELD, ADOLPH BERNARD CHRISTOPH (1823-1907). German Protestant scholar. He taught in Jena University from 1847 until his death, and was editor of Zeitschrift für wissenschaftliche Theologie from 1858. He adopted the principles of F.C. Baur and the Tübingen School,* though he was less radical, accepting, for example, the genuineness of 1 Thessalonians, Philippians, and Philemon. He was a pioneer of research into apocalyptic literature and wrote extensively on later Judaism. He was the author of an edition of extracanonical NT books, Novum Testamentum extra Canonem receptum (4 vols., 1866). In his Die jüdische Apokalyptik in ihrer geschichtlichen Entwickelung (1857), he attempted to show, inter alia, that the Similitudes of Enoch were Christian in origin—an idea generally abandoned, and refuted by E. Sjöberg and others.
J.G.G. NORMAN

HILL, ROWLAND (1744-1833). Preacher. Educated at Eton, he entered St. John's College, Cambridge (1764), at a time when evangelical views were unpopular. He believed at first that he was the only evangelical Christian there, except for the shoeblack at the gate, but soon he led several students to Christ. He continued to visit the poor and sick, and to preach as opportunity offered, even after six of his friends were expelled from Oxford for so doing. Following ordination he was appointed to Kingston and preached to great crowds, often in the open air, for ten years. He then inherited money and built Surrey Chapel, Blackfriars, where he exerted a powerful London ministry. He welcomed advances in science, himself vaccinating the children of his congregation. He was instrumental in founding the Religious Truth Society, the British and Foreign Bible Society, and the London Missionary Society. Spurgeon described him as full of fun in the pulpit—"a childlike man in whom nothing was repressed." Sir Rowland Hill of the penny post was named after him. R.E.D. CLARK

HILLIS, NEWELL DWIGHT (1858-1929). Presbyterian clergyman and author. Born into a Quaker home in Magnolia, Iowa, he graduated in arts from Lake Forest College (1884) and in divinity from McCormick Seminary (1887). He organized Sunday schools in the west each summer for the American Sunday School Association. After serving Presbyterian churches in Illinois (1887-99) he became pastor of the Plymouth Congregational Church in Brooklyn. He organized Plymouth Institute in 1914 as a social service agency to provide educational opportunities for young people. From 1914 to 1917 he lectured in 250 cities on U.S. obligation to enter World War I, and later reportedly sold $100 million in "Liberty Bonds." He resigned his pastorate in 1924 because of ill health. EARLE E. CAIRNS

HILTON, WALTER (d.1396). English mystic. Although long considered a Carthusian, he was an Augustinian canon of the priory of Thurgarton, Nottinghamshire. Events of his earlier career and dates of his writings are still uncertain. De Imagine Peccati and Epistola Aurea he wrote as a solitary during a period between university career and his religious association. The Scale of Perfection is his most famous work, originally written for the guidance of a religious friend, an anchoress. In two parts or books, the second is addressed to no one and is more advanced. The first book has been reckoned austere and theocentric, the second of warmer christocentric piety. He distinguishes between the life of "faith" (active, ascetic) and "feeling" (contemplative, mystical), and makes wide use of Augustine, Gregory, Bonaventura, the Victorines, Rolle, and The Cloud of Unknowing. C.G. THORNE, JR.

HINCMAR OF REIMS (c.806-882). Archbishop of Reims. He was educated at the abbey of St.-Denis, Paris, under Abbot Hilduin, who in 822 introduced him to the court of Louis the Pious. Officially entering the king's service in 834, he attached himself on Louis's death to Charles the Bald, thus incurring the hostility of Lothair I. Hincmar administered the abbeys at Compiègne and St.-Germer-de-Flay. Elected archbishop of Reims in 845, he faced imperial opposition but avoided his own deposition at the Synod of Soissons (853).

In opposing the king of Lorraine (Lothair I's second son) who wanted to divorce his wife, Hincmar produced his De divortio Lotharii, which displayed a great knowledge of canon law. He was unsuccessful in his attempt to depose Rothad II, bishop of Soissons, who had long attacked his rights, but did manage to quiet his own nephew, Hincmar of Laon, who refused to recognize his authority. This occasioned his Opusculum LV Capitulorum, wherein he defended the rights of a metropolitan over his bishops. Hincmar protested episcopal appointments at Cambrai, Noyon, and Beauvais, and was able to place his own appointments in these places. When the Council of Mainz (848) condemned Gottschalk's errors on predestination, he published a refutation of the monk, Ad Reclusos et Simplices, which brought attack on himself, and later on his colleague John Scotus Erigena for the latter's De Divina Praedestinatione. The controversy continued at the synods of Quiercy (853) and Valence (855), whereupon Hincmar wrote his defense, De Praedestinatione Dei et Libero Arbitrio, arguing that if God predestines the wicked to hell then He is the author of sin. Reconciliation was finally achieved at the Council of Thuzey (860). With Lothair's death in 869, Hincmar no longer feared to support Charles the Bald, and he proceeded to crown him despite papal objection.
C.G. THORNE, JR.

HINDUISM. This is not a religion, if by that we mean a single closed system of beliefs and practices observed by all Hindus. It is rather an infinitely complex aggregate of beliefs and practices bound together by their common location on the Indian subcontinent, and by their links with the social system of caste. The word "Hindu" is derived, through the Persian, from the name of the River Indus; "Hinduism" is the European blanket term which covers all forms of Indian ethnic religion that acknowledge, directly or indirectly, the authority of those scriptures called Veda (dating from c.1200 to c.600 B.C.), and that acknowledge the dharma (law) of caste. The sacred language of Hinduism is Sanskrit.

Most Hindus would accept (1) the belief in transmigration, i.e., that every person lives many times on earth, in human or other form; (2) the belief that one's status, or caste, in any given existence, depends upon one's conduct in a previous life; (3) that man's ultimate goal is release (moksha) from rebirth, and from the phenomenal world; (4) that the priestly (Brahmin) class is worthy of special reverence; (5) that the cow should be cared for and revered as a symbol of the earth's bounty. Beyond this point it is difficult to generalize. Very many Hindus are theists, and believe in a personal God under such names as Vishnu or Shiva, who should be worshiped with love and devotion (bhakti). Others, following the philosopher Shamkara, hold the Supreme Reality to be impersonal. A few are theoretically atheists. Most would believe God to be immanent in all creation and would now consider all religions to be equally valid as means of access to God. This particular view has been expressed strongly by such prominent leaders of Hindu thought as Ramakrishna, Gandhi, and Radhakrishnan.

The Hindu scriptures fall into two broad classes: shruti (revelation) and smriti (tradition). The former comprises the Vedic hymns, commentaries (Brahmanas) and speculative writings (Upanishads); the latter includes the two great epics (Mahabharata and Ramayana), the Bhagavad Gita (part of the Mbh.), the law books, the later mythological writings, and the documents of the sects. All in all, the Hindu scriptures are of immense size and staggering diversity. Hindu worship takes place in the home and the temple, the latter being thought of as a dwellingplace of a god or goddess, and not as a place of assembly. Daily and seasonal patterns of worship are followed.

The main point at issue between Hindus and Christians is the uniqueness of Christ. Many Hindus can accept Jesus as a divine teacher (Yesuswami), but not as sole Savior. Christians for their part are not able to accept the basic Hindu belief in transmigration and rebirth, and insist that God is one and personal (a view held by some, but not all, Hindus).

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Books on Christianity and Hinduism include A.G. Hogg, The Christian Message to the Hindu (1947); E.J. Sharpe, Not to Destroy but to Fulfil (1965); K. Klostermaier, Hindu and Christian in Vrindaban (1970).

E.J. SHARPE

HIPPO, COUNCIL OF. Held in 393 with Aurelius of Carthage presiding and Augustine present as a presbyter in the entourage of Valerius of Hippo, it is chiefly important for its conciliatory measures towards Donatism.* It resolved to accept as clergy those Donatists who came over to the Catholic communion cum suis plebibus, but this should not be done before the transmarina ecclesia had been consulted. A breviarium of the canons of Hippo was read at the Council of Carthage in 397 and passed ultimately into general canon law.

HIPPOLYTUS (d. c.236). Presbyter and teacher in the Church of Rome. Origen heard him preach there in 212. Very little is known about his early life, but he was a presbyter under Bishop Zephyrinus whom he accused of compromise with the views of Sabellius. Perhaps his theological judgment was affected by his opposition to Callistus, the archdeacon, who himself became pope in 217. Hippolytus then set himself up as an antipope and continued as such until deported in 235 by Emperor Maximin during a period of persecution. In exile he was reconciled to the pope, and after his martyrdom his body was brought to Rome with honor by the church.

In the centuries following his death his identity was confused and he was equated with various people—e.g., in the Roman Breviary he is identified as a soldier converted by St. Lawrence. After many years of oblivion he was given prominence again by the discovery near his tomb in Rome of a (headless) statue of him enthroned as a bishop (erected by his followers who later merged with the Novatians?). Inscribed on the statue were a table for computing the date of Easter and a list of his writings. Among those which survive in translation are the Philosophoumena (the title given to parts 4-10 of his longer Refutation of all Heresies) which was thought to be by Origen until J.J.I. Döllinger in 1859 showed it to be by Hippolytus. And there is the Apostolic Tradition which E. Schwartz in 1910 and R.H. Connolly in 1916 demonstrated was also by Hippolytus. The Philosophoumena is of value for its description of the Gnostic sects, and the Apostolic Tradition preserves for us a conservative picture of Roman church order and worship at the end of the second century. Mention may also be made of his Commentary on Daniel which is the oldest Christian Bible commentary to survive in its entirety.

Theologically, Hippolytus taught a Logos doctrine inherited from Justin Martyr. He distinguished two states of the Logos, the one eternal and immanent, the other exterior and temporal. By his opponents he was, with some justice, called a ditheist. In disciplinary matters he was a rigorist who strenuously opposed the mitigation of the penitential system in order to cope with the entry into the church of large numbers of converts. Also he seems to have been the first scholar to construct an Easter table that was independent of contemporary Judaism.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: C. Wordsworth, Saint Hippolytus and the Church of Rome (1853); works of Hippolytus in J.P. Migne, Patrologia Graeca, vol. X (1857); translation of The Apostolic Tradition by G. Dix (1937).

PETER TOON

HIPPOLYTUS, CANONS OF. An early sixth-century collection of canons, originally written in Greek, and relating to liturgical and disciplinary matters. The Greek text is lost, and they survive in Ethiopic and Arabic MSS of the thirteenth century. These were made from a Coptic translation. They are wrongly attributed to Hippolytus,* whose Apostolic Tradition was one of the sources for them. Until this century the canons were regarded as a genuine production of Hippolytus and thus thought very valuable as a source for the early history of the church. Louis Duchesne made much use of them in his influential Origines du culte chrétien (1889). Scholars now regard them as having only minor importance.

PETER TOON

HISPANA CANONS. The lengthiest and most significant of several recensions of early conciliar and papal decisions. The material from sixty-six Eastern, African, French, and Spanish councils is arranged geographically-chronologically. The 103 papal decretals extend from the reigns of Damasus I (d.384) to Gregory I (d.604). Initially appearing in eighth-century Gaul, the collection was, according to questionable tradition, ascribed to Isidore of Seville* as compiler; hence its other name, Isidoriana. After the papacy of Alexander III (d.1181) it was recognized as the official body of Spanish canon law. It constitutes a major portion of the authentic material in the False Decretals.*

JAMES DE JONG

HOADLY, BENJAMIN (1676-1761). Anglican theologian. One of the most scandalous of the eighteenth-century bishops, he owed his ecclesiastical career and translation to the rich dioceses of Bangor (1715), Hereford (1721), Salisbury (1723), and Winchester (1734) entirely to his championship of the Whig party, and his authorship of skillful pamphlets against Tories and High Churchmen. As the leader of the "Whig" or "Low Church" Anglicans, he was a notorious Latitudinarian,* writing down all mysteries and dogma, and justifying the most generous inclusion of all groups within his church, including Arians. In 1716 a sermon which denied that there was a visible Church of Christ at all and defined Christianity as merely "sincerity" provoked the Bangorian Controversy* which led to an outcry and the government's suspension of Convocation, which did not meet for 150 years thereafter. A later essay (1735) on the merely memorialist nature of the Lord's Supper led to an accusation of Socinianism. This minimizing and controversial prelate survived for another twenty-six years.

IAN SELLERS

HOBBES, THOMAS (1588-1679). British political philosopher. Trained at Oxford as a classicist, he was a tutor to the Cavendish family, but when the civil war came to England he went into exile in France (1640-51). In Paris he was tutor to the Prince of Wales (later Charles II). By 1651 he returned to England, submitted to the Commonwealth, and published his great work Leviathan. This work propounds an absolutist government based, not on divine right, but on an analysis of human psychology. All men, according to Hobbes, possess instinctive feelings of fear and self-preservation. These instincts provide the motivation for social organization. If there were no government and if all men were equal, life would be unendurable ("solitary, poor, nasty, brutish and short," as he put it). Driven by self-preservation, men contracted with each other to transfer all their power to an absolute sovereign, who would use his unlimited power to enforce obedience and unity. The contract between ruler and people was unbreakable. Hobbes's ideas offended both the divine-right theorists and those who held to the historic rights of Englishmen. After the Restoration, however, he was granted a pension and free access to the king.

ROBERT G. CLOUSE

HOCHMANN VON HOCHENAU, ERNST CHRISTOPH (1670-1721). German Pietist mystic. Born to a customs collector in Lauenburg/Elbe, he was raised a Lutheran in Nuremberg. While studying law in Halle he was influenced by A. H. Francke* and converted in 1693. The initial radicalism of his beliefs was intensified by contacts with Gottfried Arnold* at Giessen in 1697. Hochmann taught that the church was primarily spiritual in character and minimized the importance of structures, creeds, and sacraments. Regarding the conversion of the Jews as the sign of Christ's impending return, he engaged briefly in Jewish missionary work. From 1701 to 1711 he wandered about Germany preaching the necessity of revival and frequently suffered persecution and imprisonment. He worked with Alexander Mack* in the Palatinate in 1706 and played a major role in founding the Brethren movement. While jailed in Detmold in 1702 he was compelled to prepare a statement of his beliefs which the Brethren highly regarded and had reprinted in Pennsylvania in 1743. He eventually broke with Mack, feeling that the Brethren were too sectarian. In Schwarzenau/Eder he spent his last years as an ascetic in a small hut he named Friedensburg. Besides being the spiritual father of the Church of the Brethren* and the most important separatist mystic of the early eighteenth century, he was also on friendly terms with the Mennonites.

RICHARD V. PIERARD

HODGE, ARCHIBALD ALEXANDER (1823-1886). Presbyterian theologian. Son of Charles Hodge* and Princeton-trained, he held several teaching posts before succeeding his father as Princeton's systematic theologian in 1877. Explainer of his father's ideas rather than creator of new concepts, and less prolific and scholarly, he was noted for his Outlines of Theology (1860; rev. 1878), The Life of Charles Hodge (1880), and Popular Lectures on Theological Themes (1887). Although defending the Princeton fundamentals of divine sovereignty and human depravity, he attempted to enliven those ideas through social application. He believed that America, if it respected "the Fatherhood of God, the Elder Brotherhood and redeeming blood of Christ, and the universal brotherhood of men," was placed "at the crisis of the battles on which the fate of the Kingdom for ages turns."

DARREL BIGHAM

HODGE, CHARLES (1797-1878). Leading American theologian of the nineteenth century. Born in Philadelphia, son of an army surgeon, he was educated at Princeton, graduating from the college in 1815 and from the seminary in 1819. His theological studies under Archibald Alexander* determined his life-work. He became an instructor at Princeton Seminary in 1820, and remained there for the rest of his life, except for two years' study in France and Germany (1826-28). He was professor of oriental and biblical literature (1822-40), then professor of theology. His own theology was mainly that of the Westminster Confession with obvious traces of scholastic Calvinism, notably from Turretine. His thought was governed by a high view of verbal inspiration and infallibility. While orthodox Calvinism was declining in American thought generally, and the evolutionary idea was beginning to exert unusual power, Hodge unswervingly defended a supernaturally inspired Bible and thereby placed his stamp upon what came to be called "Princeton theology." This had a powerful influence, not only in his own Old School Presbyterian circles, but in other churches as well.

His writings carried his influence beyond the 3,000 students he taught during a half-century. He started the Biblical Repertory in 1825 (later called the Biblical Repertory and Theological Review, and after 1836 the Biblical Repertory and Princeton Review) and edited it for more than forty years. His first book, A Commentary on the Epistle to the Romans (1835; 19th ed., 1880), established his scholarship. Among his later works none exerted greater influence than his Systematic Theology (3 vols., 1872-73).

He also held a commanding position in the Presbyterian Church. He was moderator of the general assembly (Old School) in 1846, and a prominent member of the missionary and educational boards. In the controversy of 1837 he opposed the New School views of doctrine and polity. When division came, he supported it.

See A.A. Hodge. The Life of Charles Hodge (1880); and C.A. Salmond, Princetonia: Charles and A.A. Hodge (1888). BRUCE L. SHELLEY

HOFBAUER, CLEMENT MARY (1751-1820). Redemptorist* priest. Born John Dvorvák, youngest of twelve children of a Moravian grazier and butcher, his desire for the priesthood had to be postponed until 1780. He worked as a baker from his father's death in 1757, except for a period of living as a hermit and as a servant in the Premonstratensian* monastery of Buck (1771-75). The generosity of three Viennese ladies saw him through Vienna University, after which he went to Rome and joined the recently founded Redemptorists (C.SS.R.). He was ordained in 1785. Returning to Vienna, where he was unable to establish a house because of Josephinism,* he went to Warsaw (1787-1808) where he did much pastoral work and opened schools; he founded several houses in Poland, working mainly among the German-speaking population. He also introduced the order into Switzerland and S Germany, acting as vicar-general for the regions north of the Alps. Driven from Warsaw by Napoleon, he returned to Vienna, serving first in a Franciscan church, then as chaplain to the Ursulines and as pastor of St. Ursula's church from 1813. His influence ranged from the emperor Francis throughout the populace, especially with leading Romanticists, winning many converts and causing spiritual renewal. To him more than any other the extinction of Josephinism is due. He established the Redemptorists there in 1819, and at his death Pius VII said, "Religion in Austria has lost its chief support." He was canonized in 1909, named patron saint of Vienna in 1914.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Lives by J. Hofer (tr. J.B. Haas, 1926) and J. Carr, C.SS.R. (1939).

C.G. THORNE, JR.

HOFMANN, JOHANN CHRISTIAN KONRAD VON (1810-1877). German theologian. He is widely regarded as the most significant of the Erlangen School of theologians which represented a modified form of Lutheran orthodoxy. He taught at Erlangen from 1845. His writings include Weissagung und Erfüllung (1841-44), Der Schriftbeweis (1852-56), and Die heilige Schrift (1862-78). Hofmann laid great emphasis on biblical exegesis which he coupled with stress on Christian experience. The latter is expressed historically in salvation history, of which Scripture is the record prior and subsequent to the coming of Christ. Hofmann interpreted this within the framework of an orthodox theism which saw world history rooted in the Trinitarian character of God and His purposes for man. The ultimate goal of the historical process is the union of God and man in Christ. Hofmann's rejection of the penal satisfaction view of atonement caused considerable controversy. Satan, he held, is defeated because Jesus maintained His oneness with God even in His greatest extremity on the cross.

COLIN BROWN

HOLCOT, ROBERT (c.1290-1349). Biblical expositor. As a Dominican theologian he commented on a wide range of theological topics, though he asserted free will contrary to his contemporary Thomas Bradwardine.* There is no clear evidence that Holcot studied or taught at Cambridge. His commentary on the Sentences (Oriel MS 15) uses the term potentia absoluta of God's complete freedom to will all things. God's grace bears no necessary relation to His love, for God's will can dispense with anything. This philosophical Pelagianism is precisely what Bradwardine and Wycliffe attacked in fourteenth-century Oxford. By loving God less than another man loves Him, one can gain the greater reward. The sixteenth century knew Holcot for his questions on Lombard's Sentences, published in 1497, 1510, and 1518. The Commentary on Wisdom passed through several editions after 1480. The 1586 Basle edition amended his extreme views on the Immaculate Conception. Holcot died in the black plague of 1349. MARVIN W. ANDERSON

HOLINESS MOVEMENT, AMERICAN. A religious movement dating from the mid-nineteenth century that tried to preserve the original thrust of the Methodist teachings on entire sanctification and Christian perfection as taught by John Wesley in such writings as the Plain Account of Christian Perfection. This teaching expects that entire sanctification normally takes place instantaneously in an emotional experience similar to conversion. At this point one is cleansed from inbred sin and enabled to live without conscious or deliberate sin. In the American revivalistic context and under the influence of the camp meeting* there was a subtle mutation of these concepts in the direction of individualism, emotionalism, and emphasis on the crisis experience.

Early in the nineteenth century, groups began to emerge from Methodism in protest against the decline of discipline. In the 1840s abolitionist Orange Scott led the Wesleyan Methodists out because Methodism had grown comfortable with slavery. In 1860 B.T. Roberts and the Free Methodists were expelled from the Genesee Conference because of controversy over similar issues and the decline of the holiness emphasis. Both groups added statements on Christian perfection to their articles of religion and gradually identified themselves as holiness bodies.

At the same time there was a movement within Methodism to reemphasize holiness. In the 1830s two sisters, Sarah Lankford and Phoebe Palmer, organized a weekly prayer meeting known as the "Tuesday Meeting" which along with similar meetings became a major force in this movement. In the late 1860s was founded a "National Camp Meeting Association for the Promotion of Holiness," which evolved over the years into the National Holiness Association (NHA), renamed in 1971 the Christian Holiness Association (CHA), the present ecumenical body representing non-Pentecostal holiness bodies. By the end of the century this movement had spawned innumerable holiness camp meetings, periodicals, and state and local holiness associations. Increasing conflict with Methodist leaders and the decline of national holiness leadership resulted in a period of fragmentation into a myriad of small groups. Many of these clustered to form such holiness denominations as the Church of the Nazarene, the largest independent holiness body, and the Pilgrim Holiness Church, which in 1968 merged with the Wesleyan Methodists to form the Wesleyan Church.

Also founded at this time were a number of denominations taking the name "Church of God."* Many of these moved into Pentecostalism, but the group centered at Anderson, Indiana, remained closely identified with the holiness movement. The impact of the holiness movement extended far beyond the bounds of Methodism. Two Mennonite bodies, the Missionary Church and the Brethren in Christ,* adopted Wesleyan views and identified with the movement. Other denominations such as the Christian and Missionary Alliance,* reveal holiness influence, but have not completely identified with the movement. Salvation Army founder William Booth was converted in England under an American holiness evangelist. When the Army came to the USA in the 1880s it had a strong holiness orientation and later identified with the CHA.

The twentieth century has produced other holiness groups. The Evangelical Methodist Church withdrew from Methodism in the wake of the fundamentalist–modernist controversy, and the Evangelical Church of North America was formed after the merger of the Methodist Church and the Evangelical United Brethren in 1968. Other related groups include the Holiness Christian Church, the Churches of Christ in Christian Union, the Methodist Protestants, the Primitive Methodist Church, the Congregational Methodist Church.

Many of these denominations developed in the wake of the revival movements associated with C.G. Finney,* with whose Oberlin Theology* holiness theology has many affinities. Another parallel movement in the mid-nineteenth century was the British Keswick* movement, whose teachings on the victorious life are distinguished from holiness thought primarily by their context in Reformed theology.

Many interpreters fail to distinguish between the holiness movement and Pentecostalism. There are many similarities and historical connections. In the late nineteenth century, holiness writers began to speak of entire sanctification as a "baptism of the Holy Spirit" on the model of Pentecost. It was in this milieu and thought pattern that Pentecostalism was born in America. Some holiness bodies, such as the Pentecostal Holiness Church, moved in this direction, but most dropped the term "Pentecostal" and reaffirmed non-Pentecostal Wesleyan doctrine.

In the twentieth century the holiness movement has shed some of the trappings of revivalism* and is better viewed as conservative Methodism. This development has produced a conservative reaction leading to a number of very small groups such as the Allegheny Wesleyan Methodist Connection, the Bible Missionary Church (originally Nazarene), the Wesleyan Holiness Association (originally Bible Missionary), the United Holiness Church, and the Evangelical Wesleyan Church (both originally Free Methodist), loosely grouped together in the Inter-Denominational Holiness Convention.

At present the holiness movement would claim a constituency of at least two million, from fifty to a hundred schools (including three theological seminaries), two interdenominational missionary societies (Oriental Missionary Society and World Gospel Mission), innumerable local associations, camp meetings, etc., and denominational agencies.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: T. Smith, Called Unto Holiness (1962); D. Rose, A Theology of Christian Experience (1965); K. Geiger, The Word and the Doctrine (1965); D.W. Dayton, The American Holiness Movement: A Bibliographic Introduction (1971); H.V. Synan, The Holiness-Pentecostal Movement (1971). DONALD W. DAYTON

HOLL, KARL (1866-1926). Patrologist. Born in Tübingen, he was a pastor before returning to Tübingen to lecture. He became professor of church history there in 1901 and from 1906 to 1926 held a similar chair in Berlin. Having collaborated with Harnack* on an edition of Greek patrology (the Berlin Corpus), he also investigated the origins of Epiphany and the Easter feast and fast, and wrote Enthusiasmus und Bussgewalt beim griechischen Mönchtum. One of Germany's most influential church historians, for both Eastern and Western churches, his studies on Luther, including The Cultural Significance of the Reformation, created a renascence in the Evangelical Church. He studied Russian and brought attention to Tolstoy, but avoided the theological disputes of the turn of the century. C.G. THORNE, JR.

HOLLAND, see LOW COUNTRIES

HOLLAND, HENRY SCOTT (1847-1918). Anglican preacher and theologian. Educated at Eton and Balliol, he became in turn senior student of Christ Church (1870-84) and canon of St. Paul's (1884-1910) before returning to Oxford as regius professor of divinity. A witty and prominent member of the *Lux Mundi group (he contributed the article on Faith), he combined a ritualistic High Churchmanship with a vague liberal theology formulated under the influence of T.H. Green and F.D. Maurice. An advanced member of the Christian Social Union of which he was sometime vice-president, he popularized a view of Christ as "the solution of all human problems." His religious and political optimism was shattered by the experiences of World War I. IAN SELLERS

HOLTZMANN, HEINRICH JULIUS (1832-1910). German theologian and NT scholar. Born in Karlsruhe and educated at Berlin, he held a pastorate at Baden (1854) before beginning his academic career. He taught in Heidelberg (1858), then in Strasbourg (1874) until retirement in 1904. In his study of the synoptic gospels (1863) he developed the two-source theory, with its dual necessity of accepting a "teachings" source for Matthew and Luke, and the priority of Mark, which yielded the kind of portrait of Jesus desirable to the liberal-psychological scheme, and one in which the eschatological interpretation of the kingdom of God in Jesus' preaching could be avoided. As a consequence Holtzmann was involved in church-political squabbles of the German pastors. At Strasbourg his work was mainly directed toward the preparation of textbooks in NT introduction (1885) and theology (2 vols., 1896-97), and a Lexicon für Theologie und Kirchenwesen, with Richard Zoepffel (1882). By his contribution on the synoptics to the Hand-Kommentar zum Neuen Testament (1889) and his New Testament Theology, he laid the foundations for the NT research of the twentieth century.

CLYDE CURRY SMITH

HOLY ALLIANCE. A declaration in treaty form signed on 26 September 1815 in Paris, by the Orthodox Czar Alexander I of Russia, Catholic Emperor Francis I of Austria, and Protestant King Frederick William III of Prussia after the final allied victory over Napoleon. It proclaimed that international relations would henceforth be based on "the sublime truths which the Holy Religion teaches" and that the rulers of Europe would abide by the principle that they were brothers and whenever necessary would "lend each other aid and assistance." They would recognize no other sovereign than "God our Divine Saviour, Jesus Christ." It was once believed that the pietistic Baroness Von Krüdener had inspired Alexander to advance such a compact, but recent scholarship holds that either he had for some time considered breaking with the old system of relations based on power politics or he wished to establish an international concert to counterbalance English seapower. Only the British government, the Sultan, and the pope refused to accede to it. Although it had no practical binding power, for liberals and revolutionaries the term "Holy Alliance" took on a sinister connotation as a conspiracy of reactionary powers to maintain the status quo in E Europe.

See J.H. Pirenne, La Sainte Alliance (2 vols., 1946-49).

RICHARD V. PIERARD

HOLY CLUB. This name was derisively given to the group of earnest "Methodists" which in the early 1730s met in John Wesley's rooms at Lincoln College, Oxford, and included Charles Wesley, Benjamin Ingham, and George Whitefield. Its members, in addition to spiritual exercises, visited prisoners, relieved the poor, and maintained a school for neglected children. Membership was never more than twenty-five, and when John Wesley left Oxford in 1735 the group disintegrated. The Club owed much to Moravian example and to the earlier religious societies which flourished in the Anglican Church. The practices and discipline of the Holy Club became the model for the later bands, classes, and societies of the Methodist revival, and the inspiration for the movement's social concern.

IAN SELLERS

HOLY COMMUNION, see COMMUNION, HOLY

HOLY GHOST, see HOLY SPIRIT

HOLY MOUNTAIN, see ATHOS, MOUNT

HOLY OFFICE. Organized in 1542 by Paul III, the Holy Office or Sacra Congregatio Romanae et Universalis Inquisitionis seu Sancti Officii was established to serve as the last court of appeal in heresy cases brought before the Inquisition.* Sixtus V in 1587 increased the number of cardinals designated to serve on it from six to thirteen. While the pope may preside over the deliberations of this body, it customarily functions without him. In 1908 the Holy Office was reorganized as the court to which final decisions in faith and morals were referred, and its name was shortened to the Congregatio Sancti Officii. It was subjected to further reorganization as a result of Vatican Council II.*

DAVID C. STEINMETZ

HOLY ORDERS, see ORDINATION

HOLY ROMAN EMPIRE. Political entity in medieval Europe. The empire's founding may be dated to Otto I (962), although the precise term "holy" was first used in 1157. A long struggle between the emperors and popes beginning with the Investiture Controversy* in 1076 undermined the empire, while the growing power of kings elsewhere in Europe and a deteriorating situation in Italy destroyed it as a supranational institution. The Golden Bull (1356) which delineated the rights of the electors revealed clearly that it had become essentially a German institution. The failure of imperial reform under Maximilian I and the religious cleavage of the Reformation left the German princes autonomous and entrenched in their rights. Although Hapsburgs occupied the throne continuously from 1438 (except 1742-45), their dynastic interests took preference over the empire. After 1648 it was merely a loose federation, and responding to Napoleon's expansionist pressures, Francis II dissolved it on 6 August 1806.

See F. Heer, The Holy Roman Empire (1968).

RICHARD V. PIERARD

HOLY SEPULCHRE. The name of the church which today houses the traditional sites of both the crucifixion and the tomb of Christ. It is a dilapidated, heterogeneous, and unlovely building inside the Old City of Jerusalem. The site has been inside the city walls since A.D. 41-44, when Herod Agrippa had a third wall built; recent archaeological investigation has at last clarified the fact that the site lay outside the city wall before then (cf. Heb. 13:12). The Roman emperor Constantine gave orders in A.D. 326 to build the church, which in its earliest phase was a complex in three parts (on different levels), the Anastasis (Resurrection grotto), the Martyrium (the basilica), and the elevated site of Calvary. Under the basilica was also a chapel dedicated to St. Helena, Constantine's mother, whom legend soon credited with the discovery of "the true cross."

The original church was burnt down by the Persians in 614, but was soon restored. The caliph Hakim then destroyed or damaged much of the edifice in 1009. Restoration was effected in 1048; and then the Crusaders did major rebuilding work between 1099 and 1149. On his conquest of Jerusalem, Saladin did no more than destroy the bells (1187). Since then, the church has suffered occasionally from earthquakes, fire, and well-intentioned alterations. Several Christian confessions have rights in different parts of the church. The authenticity of the site can be argued on the grounds that in Constantine's reign there was already a strong and unrivaled tradition in support of it, and that during the preceding two centuries the site was inaccessible to pilgrims.

See A. Parrot, Golgotha and the Church of the Holy Sepulchre (ET 1957); see also bibliography for JERUSALEM. D.F. PAYNE

HOLY SPIRIT. In the OT, the expression "Holy Spirit" is rare, but there are references to "the spirit of the LORD," which is used of God in action, God doing something. God is, of course, to be discerned in quietness (1 Kings 19:11,12), but it is not this that is meant when "the spirit of the LORD" is used. Then it is rather the irresistible God who is in mind (e.g., 2 Kings 2:16; Ezek. 3:14). The Spirit is active in the Creation (Gen. 1:2; cf. Job 33:4). The Spirit gives life (Ezek. 37:-14).

The Spirit is at work in men in a variety of ways. He may give strength to Samson (Judg. 14:6) or skill to Bezaleel (Exod. 31:3). It was when the Spirit of the Lord "came upon" men like Othniel or Jephthah that they were able to do their work as judges of the people (Judg. 3:10; 11:29). The Spirit "came mightily upon" David (1 Sam. 16:13 RSV). Nehemiah (9:20) saw the knowledge that took the Israelites through the wilderness as coming from God's Spirit.

The Spirit gave Ezekiel his message (11:5; cf. 2:2; 3:24, etc.), and other prophets too, such as Balaam (Num. 24:2), Amasai (1 Chr. 12:18), Zechariah son of Jehoiada (2 Chr. 24:20). Isaiah and Micah report similar experiences (Isa. 61:1; Mic. 3:8). And the Spirit may be expected to help others than the prophets as they seek to serve the Lord (Psa. 51:11; 143:10; Ezek. 36:27).

In all this there is nothing which compels us to see the Spirit as a hypostasis in the NT manner. The full flowering of Christian teaching on the Spirit is future in the prophetic writings (Joel 2:28f.). There are hints that the Spirit may be understood as in some sense different from the Father (e.g., Isa. 48:16), but no more. But in the NT there is a very great advance.

In the early chapters of the gospels, it is true, the Spirit appears to be used in much the OT manner (e.g., Luke 1:41, 67). Throughout the lifetime of Jesus there is not much more. John explains this by saying, "Up to that time the Spirit had not been given, since Jesus had not yet been glorified" (John 7:39). The coming of the Spirit in all His fulness was something that would follow, not precede, the passion and resurrection. But after this had occurred, the Spirit came on the infant church in a striking manifestation of enlightenment and power (Acts 2). From that time on, the presence of the Spirit is the characteristic thing about the Christian Church. It is a Spirit-filled body.

Two things are especially noteworthy about NT teaching on the Spirit: His universality among Christians, and His bringing of power for ethical achievement. First-century religions often held that a divine spirit would from time to time come upon men. But it was thought he would come only upon a few outstanding people. To be possessed by the spirit was a mark of outstanding distinction. But among the Christians the possession of the Spirit was the distinguishing characteristic. "Those who are led by the Spirit of God are the sons of God," wrote Paul, and again, "If one does not have the Spirit of Christ, he does not belong to Christ" (Rom. 8:14, 9). This is made clear by such incidents as that in Acts 19 where, when Paul met some men who claimed to be Christian, his first question was, "Did you receive the Holy Spirit when you believed?" (v. 2). It was apparently unthinkable that anyone should be a Christian and not have the Spirit. This seems implied also throughout the epistles of the NT. The church is plainly regarded as a community indwelt by the Spirit of God. He is expected to be at work in believers constantly.

The second unusual thing about NT teaching on the Spirit is that "the fruit of the Spirit is love, joy, peace, patience, kindness, goodness, faithfulness, gentleness and self-control" (Gal. 5:22,23). In the religions of antiquity generally, the divine spirit made his presence known by causing those in whom he came to engage in unusual behavior of an ecstatic kind. It was in the "whirling dervish" type of activity that the spirit's presence was to be discerned. It was something new and important when his presence was revealed rather by the manifestation of ethical qualities. The NT, it is true, does know of ecstatic gifts, such as the gift of "speaking in tongues." But such activities are subordinated to love and the like, which represent the "most excellent way" (1 Cor. 12:31).

Apart from these two points it is most important to see the Spirit in the NT as personal, not a force or an influence. Personal words are used of Him (like parakletos, "advocate"), and the activities ascribed to the Spirit are those which are normally fulfilled by persons. He gives gifts as He wills (1 Cor. 12:11), He leads believers and bears witness in them (Rom. 8:14, 16). He has knowledge (1 Cor. 2:11) and mind (Rom. 8:27). He loves (Rom. 15:30), grieves (Eph. 4:30), intercedes (Rom. 8:26f.), and cries out (Gal. 4:6).

The first Christians lived exultantly in the joy of the Spirit. But in succeeding generations the enthusiasm tended to wane, and the doctrine of the Holy Spirit was accepted formally as taught in Scripture rather than seen as a basis for living. Not surprisingly, in time there came a reaction. Montanus, a native of Phrygia in Asia Minor, who lived in the second part of the second century, put great emphasis on the Holy Spirit. He thought that revelation did not cease with the end of the NT period, and held that he himself was the source of important new revelations. As Jesus had been the incarnation of the Second Person of the Trinity, Montanus saw himself as the incarnation of the Holy Spirit. He was supported by others, notably by two prophetesses, Priscilla and Maximilla. They thought the new Jerusalem would come down from heaven to a spot in Phrygia, and they prepared for this happy event with a strenuous asceticism. Their protest against the clericalism of the church of their day and against the lax morality of many professing Christians was important, and won them many adherents. But they were in serious error in their teaching of the new dispensation of the Spirit inaugurated by His "incarnation" in Montanus, and the church had no alternative but to condemn them.

The only other important heresy in the doctrine of the Spirit is that associated with Macedonius, bishop of Constantinople at the end of the Arian period. He accepted the full deity of the Son, but held that the Spirit was a created being, not unlike the angels. In a day when men were coming to see that the full Arian position was impossible, it seemed to many that it was a useful compromise to accept the deity of the Son (with the orthodox) but to deny that of the Spirit (with the Arians). But sound doctrine is not built up on political compromises of this sort, and Macedonianism was soon rejected.

The precise relationship of the Spirit to the Father and the Son is nowhere stated in Scripture, and it has caused discussion and even division in the church. The only passage which even appears to bear on the subject is that in which Jesus speaks of "the Spirit of truth, who proceeds from the Father" (John 15:26 RSV). This passage does not deal with the eternal interrelationships between the persons of the Trinity, but it has given us the terminology. It has become customary to speak of the "procession" of the Spirit or of the Spirit as "proceeding."

In the earliest statements it was customary simply to take up the passage in John's gospel and speak of the Spirit as proceeding from the Father. But the Nicene Creed came to be transmitted in the West in the form "proceeding from the Father and the Son." It seems that this arose in the first instance from a copyist's mistake. But it became common to recite the creed in the West in this form. Not unnaturally, the Easterners demand that the creed be recited in its original form and that the double procession (i.e., procession from the Son as well as the Father) be renounced. The West's refusal was the formal cause of the break between the Eastern and Western churches.

The West has resisted the demand that it surrender the doctrine of the double procession because, however the disputed words originally got into the creed, they point to something true. The NT may not speak of the Spirit as "proceeding from" the Son, but it does link the two closely. The important point is that the Spirit is the "Spirit of Christ" (Rom. 8:9; 1 Pet. 1:11; cf. Acts 16:7; Phil. 1:19). Jesus baptized with the Holy Spirit (Matt. 3:11; Mark 1:8; Luke 3:16; John 1:33), and sent the Spirit (John 20:22; Acts 2:33).

More important than the citing of any individual texts is the general thrust of NT teaching that the Spirit comes upon men as a result of what Christ has done. We know and receive the Spirit only because we have been saved by Christ's atoning death and brought into newness of life. It is in this new life that Christ brings that we know the Spirit. The doctrine of the double procession safeguards this as the single procession does not. See also PROCESSION OF THE SPIRIT.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: A. Kuyper, The Work of the Holy Spirit (1900); H.B. Swete, The Holy Spirit in the New Testament (1910); W.H.G. Thomas, The Holy Spirit of God (1913); H.W. Robinson, The Christian Experience of the Holy Spirit (1928); F.W. Dillistone, The Holy Spirit in the Life of Today (1946); C.K. Barrett, The Holy Spirit and the Gospel Tradition (1947); J.E. Fison, The Blessing of the Holy Spirit (1950); E.F. Kevan, The Saving Work of the Holy Spirit (1953); R. Pache, The Person and Work of the Holy Spirit (1956); N.Q. Hamilton, The Holy Spirit and Eschatology in Paul (1957); G.S. Hendry, The Holy Spirit in Christian Theology (1957); E.H. Palmer, The Holy Spirit (1958); G. Smeaton, The Doctrine of the Holy Spirit (1958); L. Morris, Spirit of the Living God (1960); J.R.W. Stott, The Baptism and Fullness of the Holy Spirit (1964); A.M. Stibbs and J.I. Packer, The Spirit Within You (1967); J.D.G. Dunn, Baptism in the Holy Spirit (1970).

LEON MORRIS

HOLY SYNOD. The Russian emperor Peter the Great (1682-1725) created the Holy Synod as part of his efforts to reorganize the Russian Church, thus replacing the old patriarchate of Moscow in 1721. The synod, a committee of the higher clergy, became the supreme authority in the Russian Orthodox Church second only to the emperor. As a result the clergy became a kind of auxiliary police force in the subordination of the church to the state, and helped to create an Erastian relationship between church and state which endured until the Communist revolution of 1918. The synod was charged with the responsibility of maintaining schools for the training of young men for the priesthood. C. GREGG SINGER

HOLY WATER. Ordinary water which has been blessed by a priest in order to be used for religious purposes—e.g., blessings, exorcisms, burials, and the Asperges of the Mass. In the West the actual blessing of the water is accompanied by exorcism and by the addition of exorcized salt. Holy water is usually found in the stoups, situated near the main door of churches; this practice goes back to Norman times, and the use of holy water in the church began in the fourth century, but gained momentum in the Middle Ages.

HOLY WEEK. The week beginning with Palm Sunday and ending with Holy Saturday, observed as a solemn fast, commemorating the Passion. Its origin lies in the two-day pre-paschal fast of the ante-Nicene Church, but with the historicization of festivals in the fourth century it became a week, and its liturgical observances were modeled on developments in Jerusalem. By the Middle Ages a complex of services had been adopted, including the Palm procession, the Pedilavium, the Veneration of the Cross, the burial of the Cross and Host in the Easter Sepulcher, and ceremonies with the new fire and Paschal Candle. The Anglo-Catholic movement revived some of these customs in Anglican worship. In 1957 the Roman Catholic Church completed a reform of Holy Week. JOHN A. SIMPSON

HOLY YEAR, see JUBILEE, YEAR OF

HOMBERG, SYNOD OF (1526). Called by Philip of Hesse to reorganize the church in his territory. At the synod a Frenchman, Francis Lambert,* formerly of the Franciscans, was mainly responsible for producing an ambitious scheme of church reform. This developed the logic of the priesthood of all believers, creating a democratic church in which the local congregation had the right of appointing pastors and excommunicating, and the general supervision was given to an annual synod, which appointed three visitors to examine local churches. The scheme was abandoned when Luther rejected the proposals on the grounds that the time had not yet come for such definitive legislation, but also because, since the Peasants' War, he had become more skeptical of the mass of the laity and more dependent on princes. C. PETER WILLIAMS

HOMILETICS. The discussion of the art and theology of preaching. The earliest Christian sermon was called a "homily," a term deriving from the Latin homilia, "a conversation." From the earliest times preaching played a basic part in the religious life of the OT. Moses, Joshua, and Elijah all appealed by the spoken word to the listening congregation. The great literary prophets were preachers as well as writers. The prophetic oracles may have been used as proclamation in the cultic life of the community during the Exile. In the Jewish synagogue service on the Sabbath there developed the custom of an address delivered on the portion of Scripture which had been read in the congregation (cf. Luke 4:16-21; Acts 15:21).

The NT opens with the preaching of John the Baptist which reechoed the prophetic message of the coming Messiah and the kingdom of God. Jesus Himself devoted a great part of His ministry to preaching, and His word had the unique personal power and authority of God Himself. He also sent out His disciples to preach in His name (Matt. 10:7), promising that their word would have the same power and authority as His own personal utterance (Luke 10:16), and would cause the spread of His kingdom till the end of the world (Matt. 24:14). After the resurrection, the apostles found that Jesus continued His ministry through their proclamation (i.e., His former ministry was only a beginning—Acts 1:1). God Himself, they believed, appealed to men and stretched out His hand to heal as they preached. They had no hesitation in claiming that what they preached was the Word of God (1 Thess. 2:13; Acts 4:31; 1 Pet. 1:23) which saved men (1 Cor. 1:21). Moreover, they believed that through their preaching the powers of salvation and of the new age were being implanted within human life and history to hasten the fulfillment of the hitherto hidden purpose of God to unite all things in Christ and fully to perfect the new creation (cf. Col. 1:22-29; Eph. 1:9, 10; 3:4-13). The accounts of the apostolic church indicate that preaching in the form of the exposition of Scripture took place not only as a missionary activity, but also in the context of the assembled congregation of believers, especially on the Lord's Day (Rom. 15:4; Acts 18:24-28; 20:7ff.). The continuance of this custom is reflected in Justin's account of worship in the second century.

The earliest Christian preaching took the form of a simple conversational, practical, and pastoral homily, based on the text which had been read, and often following the varied topics suggested by the text, in the order in which they arose within the text, with little concern to attain a satisfying rhetorical structure. The sermon began when and where the text began, and ended when the text ended. It was often delivered extempore, though arising out of careful preparation. It was regarded as the primary duty of the bishop to preach, and he often did so seated, while the congregation stood. The great preachers of the third and fourth centuries—Basil, the Gregories, Chrysostom, and Augustine—were conscious that they lived in a world in which the normal method of communication involved the use of traditional rhetoric; and while they recognized the deep difference between their task as Christian preachers and that of pagan rhetoricians whose aim was merely to impress an audience with a great speech, they felt that the church must accept the help which the study of rhetoric could bring to preaching. The first important discussion of homiletics in this light was made in Augustine's On Christian Doctrine, a work that has never ceased to be important.

In the early Middle Ages, arrangements and excerpts from the sermons of Augustine, Caesarius of Arles, and other Fathers were circulated to help preachers who could not produce their own sermons. In the revival of preaching with the Dominican and Franciscan friars, a great variety of homiletic helps, with sermon suggestions for every possible occasion, was published. The art of illustrating sermons with fantastical allegorical fables was greatly developed, giving rise to many collections of exempla for this purpose. Treatises on preaching (e.g., by Humbert of Romans) were issued. In the thirteenth century a "modern" new form of thematic preaching from a short text with careful introductions, transitions, conclusion, and, of course, three headings, appeared in university circles. It was called "modern" in contrast with the older form of homily. Calvin and Luther at the Reformation tended to return to the older form of preaching, but the medieval forms prevailed with succeeding generations. Influential works on homiletics were produced, e.g., by Hyperius and Keckermann. The most important Puritan work, recently republished, was William Perkins's Art of Prophesying. Later there appeared Simeon's

Horae Homileticae and Vinet's Homiletics, immensely popular in their day.

What is usually said on the subject of homiletics has been best discussed by following the topics traditionally used in works on rhetoric: invention (finding out what to say), disposition (arranging the material), style (clothing it in suitable language), memory (the task of fixing for the mind what is to be delivered), and delivery.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: In addition to books cited above, J. Bingham, The Antiquities of the Christian Church 2 vols., (1878); J.A. Broadus, Lectures on the History of Preaching (1893); R.G. Owst, Preaching in Mediaeval England (1926); C.H. Dodd, The Apostolic Preaching and Its Development (1936); R.F. Bennett, The Early Dominicans (1937); J.J. von Allmen, Preaching and Congregation (1962); J.W. Blench, Preaching in England (1964); St. Francis de Sales, On the Preacher and Preaching (1964); Y. Brilioth, A Brief History of Preaching (1965).

RONALD S. WALLACE

HOMILIES, BOOKS OF. Authorized sermons issued in two books by the Church of England in the reigns of Edward VI and Elizabeth I. They were to provide for Protestantism sermonic models for the new simplified style of topical preaching as well as a proper theological base. Thomas Cranmer broached the idea as early as 1539, it was authorized by Convocation in 1542, and within a year the twelve homilies of the first book were collected and edited by Cranmer, who also wrote at least five of them. They were not published, however, until 1547. The first six homilies present distinctive Protestant theology, namely the perspicuity and sufficiency of Scripture, the radical sinfulness of man, justification by faith alone (entitled "Of the Salvation of all Mankind"), evangelical faith, and sanctification. The homilies were revoked by Mary, but reinstituted by Elizabeth. In 1562-63 the second book was issued, though only published with the full twenty-one homilies in 1571. Bishop John Jewel wrote all but two of these; they are more practical and liturgical in content than the first book. The two books were united into one volume in 1632.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: G.E. Corrie (ed.), Certain Sermons Appointed by the Queen's Majesty ... (1850); J.T. Tomlinson, The Prayer Book Articles and Homilies (1887); M. Donovan and A.R. Vidler, "The Homilies," Theology (1941), pp. 284-95; H. Davies, Worship and Theology in England From Cranmer to Hooker (1970).

BRIAN G. ARMSTRONG

HOMILIES, CLEMENTINE, see CLEMENT OF ALEXANDRIA

HOMOEANS. In the controversy stirred by the insertion of homoousios into the creed of Nicea* (325), one group sought to counter the objectionable term by using homoios ("like"). They are usually called "Homoeans," though distinctions among them ranged from the unqualified use of the term (Valens of Mursa and Ursacius of Singidunum) through a qualified "like in all things" (Acacius of Caesarea) to a full "like in substance" (Basil of Ancyra). The compromise saw its chief, but short-lived, success under the patronage of the Arian-sympathizing emperor Valens (364-78) at the synodal sessions of Nice (359) and Constantinople (360), whose creeds incorporate the Homoean formula qualified by "according to the Scriptures."

CLYDE CURRY SMITH

HOMOOUSIONS, see HOMOOUSIOS

HOMOOUSIOS (Gr. = "of the same substance"). This technical term from late Greek philosophical tradition was first used in a Christian setting by Gnostics. Both Origen in Alexandria and Sabellius in Rome played some role in its adoption in Christianity. Tertullian was ultimately responsible for its reappropriation, though as late as the Synod of Antioch (268) homoousios was severely criticized. That Arius himself opposed the term is evident in his letter to Alexander, bishop of Alexandria, before the Council of Nicea* (325). Evidently it was the emperor Constantine as presiding officer there, presumably on the advice of Hosius* of Cordova, who introduced the concept into creedal discussions, with reference to the relationship between Father and Son.

CLYDE CURRY SMITH

HONORIUS I (d.638). Pope from 625. A native of Campania in Italy, he was interested in the Christianization of the Anglo-Saxons, administered the financial affairs of the papacy wisely, but is chiefly remembered for his involvement in the Monothelite* controversy. Sergius, patriarch of Constantinople, wrote to Honorius seeking support for a formula that would reconcile the Monophysites. While confessing two natures in Christ, this formula attributed to Him "one theandric operation," i.e., one mode of activity—that of the Divine Word. This had been strongly opposed by Sophronius of Jerusalem. In his reply, Honorius supported the forbidding of further discussion of either one or two operations, adding that such questions should be left to the grammarians. He went on to write, "Whence also we confess one will of the Lord Jesus Christ since plainly our nature was taken by the Godhead, and that nature sinless, as it was before the fall." In a second letter, of which only fragments remain, he again repudiated as inexpedient the formula "two operations," though he confessed two natures in Christ, "unmixed, undivided, unchanged," operating what is characteristic of each.

He died in the year that the Ecthesis,* the charter of Monothelitism, was published, making use of his formula of "one will." His successors condemned Monothelitism, and at the Council of Constantinople in 681 Honorius was formally anathematized with Sergius and Cyrus of Alexandria. This anathema has created difficulties for the supporters of papal infallibility, particularly in the Gallican controversies of the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, and before the Vatican Council definition of 1870.

See J. Chapman, The Condemnation of Pope Honorius (1907).

J.G.G. NORMAN

HONORIUS III (d.1227). Pope from 1216. Born Cencio Savelli at Rome and well educated, he succeeded Innocent III after long experience in ecclesiastical administration, and his pontificate carried on an inherited policy with some changes. At once he found himself amid plans set by the Fourth Lateran Council, as initiated by Innocent, while his chief concern was a crusade to recover the Kingdom of Jerusalem. This was to be led by Emperor Frederick II, but it was not, and seeming political stability was attempted to launch it: aid given to Henry III (England's nine-year-old monarch) and the attention of King Philip Augustus and his son, Louis VIII, redirected from England to Toulouse. A major concern was always the relationship with Frederick, who wanted for himself and his son Henry VII control of both the imperial and Sicilian crowns. This brought immense papal opposition, leading to a major struggle and finally a victory which ended his crusading interest.

The Fifth Crusade did proceed, but not happily. The crusade against the Albigenses* continued, and heresy was unrelentingly pursued; here were unmistakable shades of the Inquisition. Honorius formally approved and used the new mendicant orders, Dominicans and Franciscans. Among his many writings are Liber Censuum (1192); Compilatio quinta (1226); his decretals which have been considered the first official book of canon law; a life of Gregory VII; and a continuation of the Liber Pontificalis.

C.G. THORNE, JR.

HONORIUS OF AUTUN (c.1090-c.1156). Monk and writer. Describing himself as a priest and teacher ("Scholasticus"), he was a well-known writer—over 500 manuscripts of his works have survived. Although a monk with solitary inclinations, he showed a lifelong interest in the outside world. He wrote books on liberal education, he defended the right of ordained monks to preach and to exercise sacramental functions, and his popular Imago Mundi dealt with astrology, astronomy, geography, and history. Honorius was a Christian Platonist and a great admirer of John the Scot. He wrote widely on religious and theological matters. His Elucidarium, in its three books on God, man, and paradise, ranged from evil and free will to a variety of contemporary problems which he dealt with very sensibly. He wrote also on the Virgin Mary's intercessionary powers, the Liturgy, the Psalter, the Song of Songs, and papal supremacy. Various other writings condemned ecclesiastical abuses—simony, clerical marriage, misuse of ecclesiastical offices, and the ordination of illiterates. It appears now that his Latin name, Augustodensis, links him not with Autun in Burgundy, but with Regensburg in S Germany. L. FEEHAN

HONTHEIM, JOHANN NIKOLAUS VON (1701-1790). Suffragan bishop of Trier, and known pseudonymously as "Justinius Febronius," was the formulator of Febronianism.* After eighteen years' work, he published his doctrines in The State of the Church and the Legitimate Authority of the Roman Pontiff, a Book Composed for the Purpose of Uniting in Religion Dissident Christians (in Latin, 1763). It reflected Gallican and Protestant motifs, although remaining devoutly Catholic, and not secular. Clement XIII condemned it (1764), but intensive public debate continued throughout Europe. Hontheim later unconvincingly recanted (1778), while others, including Austrian chief minister Kaunitz, used his ideas to support a more secular Josephinism.* He studied law at Louvain, Leyden, and Rome, winning a doctorate in jurisprudence (1724); then became priest (1728), professor (1732), university pro-chancellor (1746), and suffragan bishop (1748), all at Trier. C.T. MC INTIRE

HOOK, WALTER FARQUHAR (1798-1875). Dean of Chichester. Born in London and educated at Winchester and Oxford, he served in parishes in Birmingham and Coventry, and was from 1837 to 1859 a remarkably successful vicar of Leeds, frustrating Dissenters, increasing the number of parish churches from fifteen to thirty-six, befriending the poor, and adapting Anglicanism to the challenge of the new urban areas. A High Churchman, Hook helped the Tractarian* party to consecrate St. Saviour's, Leeds (1845), but later quarreled with Pusey over the ritualism practiced there. He wrote extensively, producing an eight-volume Dictionary of Ecclesiastical Biography and twelve volumes of lives of archbishops of Canterbury. Hook's immense physical and spiritual energies, together with his belligerent High Church Toryism, have suggested a comparison with Dr. Samuel Johnson. IAN SELLERS

HOOKER, RICHARD (c.1554-1600). English theologian and apologist. Educated at Exeter Grammar School and Corpus Christi College, Oxford, where he was fellow from 1577 to 1584, he lectured in Hebrew and logic and was rector of Drayton Beauchamp (1584), master of the Temple in London (1585-91), and rector of Bishopbourne from 1595 until his death. Though an able preacher and sensitive pastor, he is primarily remembered as one of the greatest apologists for a Church of England which was not obliged slavishly to copy sister churches. His famous encounter with Walter Travers* at the Temple showed an independent Reformed position on matters like predestination, assurance, and judgment of Rome, in addition to a shrewd insight into the doctrinal and psychological weaknesses of militant Puritanism. Released from duties at the Temple, he produced the first four books of his Laws of Ecclesiastical Polity in 1593, followed by the fifth in 1597. The history of the remaining books is obscure, and they were not fully published until 1662. As well as being a classic of English prose, his work was a profound contribution to the English theological tradition. His skillful restatement of Thomism, combined with a careful discussion of the relation between reason and revelation, enabled him to meet Puritan criticisms of the Elizabethan Church at a far more creative level than apologists like Whitgift or Bancroft. He showed that a church could justifiably be ordered without either claiming divine institution for every detail or falling into Roman error by continuing medieval practices; his exposition of law showed an appreciation of historical continuity which was lacking in much Protestant ecclesiology. The defense he offered for the role of redeemed reason helped to inspire the flowering of Caroline theology and has since provided many members of the Church of England with a theological method which has combined the claims of revelation, reason, and history. Though this account of the relationship between church and state was unduly optimistic, it has continued to be influential. He is one of the most important English theologians of the sixteenth century.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: The best edition of his Works is the 7th revised edition of J. Keble (1888). For his life, C.J. Sisson, The Judicious Marriage of Mr. Hooker (1940). Recent studies are P. Munz, The Place of Hooker in the History of Thought (1952); G. Hillerdal, Reason and Revelation in Richard Hooker (1962); J.S. Marshall, Hooker and the Anglican Tradition (1963); W.S. Hill, Studies in Richard Hooker (1974). IAN BREWARD

HOOKER, THOMAS (1586-1647). Puritan clergyman and founder of Connecticut. Born in Leicestershire, he was educated at Cambridge, where he was converted to Puritanism. His popularity as lecturer at St. Mary's, Chelmsford, forced authorities to retire him, and in 1630 he fled from England to Holland. Persuaded to emigrate to Massachusetts, he became pastor at Newtown (Cambridge) in 1634. Restiveness led the congregation to move to Connecticut in 1636, against the wishes of the Massachusetts officials. In 1638 he was the primary figure in the creating of the Frame of Government for communities around Hartford. Virtual dictator of Connecticut thereafter, and perhaps the most powerful pulpit orator of his day, Hooker was an expositor who dealt eloquently with Puritan fundamentals of religious experience and moral duty. His writings were chiefly sermonic, but his Survey of the Summe of Church Discipline (1648) was a notable work on Congregational polity and social theory. DARREL BIGHAM

HOOPER, JOHN (d.1555). Protestant martyr and Anglican bishop. Graduate of Oxford and later a monk, he moved to London after the dissolution of the monasteries. After reading some reformational writings he was converted to Protestantism and then sought to spread his views at Oxford. As a result of his activities he had twice to flee from England. In 1546 he married a woman from Antwerp. For a brief period they settled in Zurich, where he enjoyed the friendship of H. Bullinger* and a correspondence with M. Bucer* and J. à Lasco.* Returning to England in 1549, he became chaplain to Protector Somerset.

Hooper gained fame as a supporter of the principles of the Swiss reformation. His preaching was very popular, being devoted to biblical exposition and exposure of imperfect reformation in his own land. Following the fall of Somerset he was Northumberland's chaplain. In 1550 he was nominated to the see of Gloucester, but his consecration was delayed until 1551 due to his opposition to vestments. During 1552 the sees of Gloucester and Worcester were amalgamated, and he was made bishop of both. With the accession of the Catholic Mary he was imprisoned, deprived, degraded, and publicly burned. His record as a bishop was praiseworthy. He preached several times each day, visited all the parishes of his dioceses, was generous to the poor, denounced ruthless landlords, and sought to persuade his clergy and people to read the Bible.

For his writings, see the two-volume collection by the Parker Society (1843 and 1852). There are short biographies by J.C. Ryle (1868) and by W.M.S. West (1955). See also L.B. Smith, Tudor Prelates and Politics (1953). PETER TOON

HOPKINS, GERARD MANLEY (1844-1889). English poet. Born at Stratford (Essex) and educated at Baliol College, Oxford, under Jowett and Pater, he was influenced in art by the Pre-Raphaelites and in religion by the later Tractarians.* In 1866 he seceded to Rome. He joined the Jesuits and held several teaching and pastoral posts, including Stonyhurst, St. Helens, and the chair of Greek at Dublin. On entering the order he destroyed the poetry he had written up to that date and only returned to the art at the request of his superior to write a poem on The Wreck of the Deutschland, celebrating the heroic death of four exiled nuns from Bismarck's Germany. The oddity of the poem's language resulted in its rejection by The Month, to which it was submitted.

This oddity of expression, now recognized as the source of Hopkins's strength—"All things counter, original, spare, strange," to use one of his own lines—is consistent with his emphasis on individuality—"What I do is me: for that I came." In this Hopkins revealed his allegiance to Duns Scotus, rather than to the official theologian of the Jesuits, Thomas Aquinas. Consistently with this emphasis, he developed his theories of inscape (or individually distinctive form in things) and instress (the force that determines the form). This gives to his vision of things, particularly natural phenomena, a sharp, unusual, and special vividness and to his account of his own experience a penetrating sensitiveness that in the so-called Terrible Sonnets and in "Spelt from Sibyl's Leaves" becomes almost unbearably painful—"selfwrung, selfstrung, sheathe- and shelterless, thoughts against thoughts in groans grind."

Hopkins's poems were not published in his lifetime and indeed did not appear until his friend and literary executor, Robert Bridges, issued them in 1918. It was then clear how he was indeed a poet born out of due time, and the subsequent publication of his letters has revealed the acuteness of his criticism and dissatisfaction with the poetic mode of his own contemporaries. Hopkins remains a difficult, but immensely rewarding poet, a man who agonized before God.

See Poems (ed. W.H. Gardner and N.H. MacKenzie, 1967); and N.H. MacKenzie, Hopkins (1968). ARTHUR POLLARD

HOPKINS, SAMUEL (1721-1803). Congregationalist theologian of the New England Theology* or "Hopkinsianism." Born in Waterbury, Connecticut, he received his A.B. from Yale in 1741, and two years later was ordained as pastor of Great Barrington, Massachusetts. In 1770 he became pastor of the Congregational church in Newport, Rhode Island. He was an early exponent of the abolitionist cause, seeing slavery as a moral evil. He is even better known for his modification of Calvinism. To him sin was essentially self-love but without legal imputation of Adam's sin to us. Man was responsible to seek a change of heart which would lead to "disinterested benevolence" in the life of the regenerate.

GEORGE MARSDEN

HOPKINSON, FRANCIS (1737-1791). American composer. Although a lawyer by profession and a musical amateur, Hopkinson was very active in the early musical life of Philadelphia. He was one of the first American-born composers, and took a great interest in church music as well as secular. He published A Collection of Psalm Tunes with a Few Anthems. He was a signer of the Declaration of Independence.

HORMISDAS (d.523). Pope from 514. Born at Frosinone in Latium, he succeeded Symmachus as bishop of Rome in 514. Eastern and Western churches had been divided since 484 over the Henoticon, but Hormisdas negotiated with the emperor Anastasius I in 515 to hold a council. His extravagant demands were rejected by the emperor. In 519 further negotiations induced the emperor Justin I and the patriarch John to sign a dogmatic statement ("Formula Hormisdae"), accepting the Chalcedonian Definition and the Tome of Leo. The names of Acacius, Zeno, and Anastasius were removed from the "diptychs," and the authority of the Roman see was emphasized (based on Matt. 16:18). Hormisdas conferred with the Arian Goths in ecclesiastical matters and maintained good relations with Theodoric, the Ostrogoth ruler of Italy.

J.G.G. NORMAN

HORNE, GEORGE (1730-1792). Bishop of Norwich. Born in Kent, he graduated from University College, Oxford (1749), became president of Magdalen College (1768), and later was dean of Canterbury (1781) before going to Norwich in 1790. A High Churchman, he nevertheless adopted some of the views of John Hutchinson and sympathized with Methodism's spiritual earnestness. He strongly disapproved of the expulsion of Methodist students from St. Edmund's Hall, Oxford, and refused to forbid John Wesley to preach in his diocese. He actively promoted the Naval and Military Bible Society (founded in 1780), and espoused the cause of Scottish bishops who petitioned Parliament (1789). He wrote a commentary on Psalms, interpreting them messianically.

J.G.G. NORMAN

HORNE, THOMAS HARTWELL (1780-1862). Librarian and Protestant biblical commentator. Born in London and educated at Christ's Hospital (where he was a contemporary of Samuel Taylor Coleridge), he became clerk to a barrister, undertaking varying literary work in his spare time. At first a Wesleyan, he was ordained in the Church of England (1819), later joining the staff of the British Museum (1824), where he worked on the compilation of the catalog for many years. Horne was the author of more than forty books, many of them on Christian apologetics and bibliography. In his earlier days he cataloged the Harleian MSS for the British Museum; later he edited Charles Simeon's Horae Homileticae, a twenty-one volume commentary on the Bible. He is remembered chiefly for his Critical Study of the Holy Scriptures (3 vols., 1818), which was widely used for half a century by students. R.E.D. CLARK

HORNER, RALPH (1853-1921). Founder of the Holiness Movement Church in Canada. Born in Shawville, Quebec, he was converted at a Methodist meeting in 1876 and began almost immediately to preach to his neighbors. Realizing he had the ability to elicit strong emotional responses from his hearers, he decided to enter the Methodist ministry. He attended Victoria College (1883-85), during which time he continued to organize holiness meetings. Refusing a regular circuit in 1886, he embarked on an independent evangelistic tent ministry. Because of mounting protests against the speaking in tongues which accompanied his preaching, the Montreal Annual Conference deposed him from its ministry in 1895. He organized his followers into a Holiness Movement Church, and in 1895 at a convention in Ottawa attended by evangelists from Ontario, the Western Provinces, and Quebec, he was elected bishop. He held this position until he withdrew from the Holiness Movement Church in 1916 over the true interpretation of sanctification and formed the Standard Church of America. After his death both churches declined rapidly.

ROBERT WILSON

HORSLEY, SAMUEL (1733-1806). Anglican bishop. Son of a clergyman, Horsley was educated at Cambridge and held various livings and domestic chaplaincies, was made a Fellow of the Royal Society in 1767 and later served as its secretary, was consecrated bishop of St. David's in 1788, of Rochester in 1793, and of St. Asaph in 1802. He was a man of scientific bent, and in the course of a twelve-year controversy with Joseph Priestley over the latter's philosophical and historical methods strongly defended the Trinitarian and christological beliefs of the early church. In religion a High Churchman and in politics a strong Tory, he upheld the establishment and opposed all innovations, particularly Sunday schools. He was a genuine, if ostentatious, friend of the poor, and his social teaching is a novel blend of Utilitarianism and traditional Christian philanthropy. Under the impact of the French Revolution he adopted an extravagant millenarianism and was mentally unbalanced when he died.

IAN SELLERS

HORT, FENTON JOHN ANTHONY (1828-1892). NT critic and biblical scholar. With B.F. Westcott* he edited an edition of the Greek NT (1881) which formed the basis for the English Revised Version and which set the pattern for nearly all future editions of the Greek text. The fifty-seven-page introduction by Hort sets out the basic elements of the science of textual criticism which remain, in all essentials, valid to the present. With his friends Westcott and J.B. Lightfoot,* he planned to write a complete commentary on the NT. Hort was to be responsible for the synoptic gospels, Acts, the general epistles, and the Apocalypse. Due to a tendency towards perfectionism he was able to publish very little, though it is generally regarded that he was the greatest of the three Cambridge scholars. His written legacy consists of a few fairly fragmentary works, most of them published posthumously, including Two Dissertations (on John 1:18 and on the Eastern Creeds, both 1876); The Way, The Truth, the Life (1893); Judaistic Christianity (1894); The Christian Ecclesia (1897); I Peter i.1-ii.17 (1898). W. WARD GASQUE

HOSANNA. The NT Greek transliteration of a Hebrew term meaning "save, we pray." The phrase in a slightly different form occurs in Psalm 118:25, which was used in the Jewish Passover rites of NT times. There is evidence that by then "hosanna" was a ritual exclamation (of praise as much as supplication), associated with Messianic hopes, which was uttered in the context of several Jewish festivals. The NT use of the word in the context of Christ's final entry into Jerusalem (e.g., Matt. 21:9) brought it into the early Christian eucharistic liturgy, and also into the Palm Sunday liturgy somewhat later.

HOSIUS (Ossius) (c.256-357). Bishop of Cordova. Born in Spain, he was probably already bishop when he suffered persecution under Maximianus Herculius, before the edicts of Diocletian in 303. He was present at the Synod of Elvira (c.300) and was later in attendance on Constantine. The Donatists* blamed their condemnation by the emperor in the Council of Milan (316) to his being advised by Hosius. As sole master of the Roman Empire by 323, Constantine sent Hosius as his commissioner to Alexandria to settle the dispute between Alexander and Arius. Apart from refuting the dogmas of Sabellius it is not clear what he achieved; probably on his advice the emperor called the Council of Nicea to settle the still unsolved Arian problem.

The role of Hosius in the council has been much discussed. He appears to have presided, but not as papal legate. His influence over the emperor can probably be seen in the latter's explanation of the Homoousion and letter to the churches concerning the council. After Nicea, Hosius appears to have returned to his diocese, but reemerged again in 345 at the Council of Sardica. Constans, at the instigation of certain bishops, persuaded Constantius to call the council chiefly to settle the question of the orthodoxy of Athanasius. Athanasius traveled to Sardica with Hosius, who was to preside. When the Eastern bishops arrived, they refused to attend because of Athanasius's presence, and withdrew to issue an encyclical letter condemning Hosius and Julius of Rome and others for holding communion with Athanasius.

In 355 Hosius was summoned to Milan by Constantius to condemn Athanasius and to hold communion with the Arians. He refused, and persisted despite imperial persuasion. His only extant letter, a reply to Constantius, belongs to this period. Finally at Sirmium he was forced to sign the second (the "Blasphemy") of the three creeds that seem to have emanated from here over this period (351, 357, 359). This was an Arian creed which Hosius probably repudiated before his death soon afterward in Spain. He has been described as dictatorial, harsh, and inflexible, and some of the blame for the failure of the Council of Sardica must rest on him. On the other hand, he was held by Athanasius and by Liberius of Rome in the highest honor. DAVID JOHN WILLIAMS

HOSIUS (Hos, Hosz), STANISLAUS (1504-1579). Polish Counter-Reformation controversialist and cardinal. Born at Cracow, he received humanistic training there and, sponsored by Tomicki, bishop of Cracow and vice-chancellor of Poland, studied law at Padua and Bologna, earning a Bologna doctorate in canon and civil law. On his return home he served as secretary to Tomicki, eventually becoming royal secretary. He was invested with several benefices, ordained priest (1543), and became bishop first of Culm (1549), then of Ermland (1551). His burning desire was the extirpation of the Protestant heresy. His consummate polemical skill against reformers such as Johann Brenz* and Jan à Lasco,* his educational programs, and his violent repressive measures made him perhaps the greatest of the Polish counter-reformers, winning him both the sobriquet "hammer of the heretics" and the favor of Rome. His Confessio fidei catholicae christianiae (1553, 1557) was one of the most successful polemic pieces of the Catholic Reformation. In 1558 Paul IV called him to Rome, where he became a leading voice in the Curia, playing an important role in the final sessions of the Council of Trent.* His two-volume works were published at Cologne in 1584.

See also L. Bernacki, La Doctrine de l'Église chez le Cardinal Hosius (1936); and F.J. Zdrodowski, The Concept of Heresy According to Cardinal Hosius (1947). BRIAN G. ARMSTRONG

HOSKYNS, SIR EDWYN CLEMENT (1884-1937). Anglican clergyman and theologian. He was educated at Jesus College, Cambridge; Wells Theological College; and the University of Berlin. From 1919 he was a fellow of Corpus Christi, Cambridge. A pioneer of the "biblical theology" movement in England, Hoskyns was the translator of Karl Barth's famous commentary on Romans into English (1933). His most important book was The Riddle of the New Testament (1931), with his pupil F.N. Davey, concerning the relation of Jesus of Nazareth to the primitive Christian Church. He argued that no interpretation of the person and teaching of Jesus which fails to explain this relationship can be true to history. In his discussion it was argued that no matter where one looks, or how far one goes back into the tradition (Mark, Q, M, L, etc.), one never finds a "simply human" Jesus, and that the best explanation of the historical data is that the so-called Christ of faith is a historical "given" rather than the creation of the church. His other works include a massive theological commentary on the fourth gospel (ed. F.N. Davey, 1940) and a number of important essays: "The Christ of the Synoptic Gospels" in Essays Catholic and Critical (1926) and "Jesus the Messiah" in Mysterium Christi (1930).

W. WARD GASQUE

HOSMER, FREDERICK LUCIAN (1840-1929). American Unitarian clergyman. Born in Framingham, Massachusetts, he graduated from Harvard in Arts and Divinity and subsequently was pastor of several Unitarian churches, including First Unitarian, Berkeley, California, from which he retired in 1904. Considered a liberal even in his denomination, Hosmer devoted his remaining years to hymn and verse writing. Among his publications is Unity Hymns and Chorals (1880).

HOSPITALLERS. Medieval men and women given to the care of the infirm, with both themselves and their patients usually observing religious vows. By 800 the Muslim world had medical hospitals, but W Europe did not in any proper sense until 1200. There were both hospices for the permanently poor, insane, and incurable, and hospitals for temporary medical treatment. One foundation could be both, and often hospitals developed from hospices. Monasteries also became hospitals, while St. Bartholomew's, London, was both. The Rules when observed were Austin, Benedictine, Franciscan, or that of the Knights Hospitallers of St. John of Jerusalem. Diocesan bishops had some control, and the popes bestowed many favors: chapels, cemeteries, indulgences. Laymen also shared in the work, and while the master was sometimes a layman more often he was a religious. The attendant brothers and sisters were mostly nurses, and in larger hospitals were assisted by clerks in minor orders and lay servants.

The eleventh and twelfth centuries saw a huge increase in both hospitals and nursing orders: Antonines, Order of the Holy Spirit, Order of St. William of the Desert, Bethlehemites, Order of St. Catherine, and Beguines and Beghards. The Knights of St. John of Jerusalem, after 1310 known as the Knights of Rhodes, and from 1530 as the Knights of Malta, were exemplary hospitallers. Founded not later than 1108 to care for the sick and provide for pilgrims and crusaders in Jerusalem, they subsequently established and managed hundreds of hospitals and hospices across Europe and the Levant, together with their military efforts. Having conquered Rhodes in 1309, they moved their center there, with the emphasis being more military and their wealth and power much increased after suppressing the Knights Templars in 1312. In 1530 their center became Malta until 1798, and they were reestablished in Rome in 1834.

Hospitallers also served the leper communities and had a great influence on medical progress. Leprosy appeared in Europe about 500 and reached its height in the thirteenth century, declining by 1350 and very rare by 1500. The Hospitallers of St. Lazarus who began to treat leprosy in twelfth-century Jerusalem are but one of many such examples. Most medieval hospitals were very small, fewer than thirty beds, and every country had its great infirmaries: S. Spirito, Rome; Holy Ghost, Lübeck; St. Leonard's, York. By 1200 also, medieval hospitallers were working under physicians trained at Salerno, Montpellier, and elsewhere, and much documentation testifies to the careful standard of their nursing. The orders flourished well into the modern period, when drastic changes occurred.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: R.M. Clay, The Mediaeval Hospitals of England (1909); D. Riesman, The Story of Medicine in the Middle Ages (1935); G. Bottarelli, Storia politica e militare del sovrano ordine di S. Giovanni di Gerusalemme detto di Malta (2 vols., 1940); E.E. Hume, Medical Work of the Knights Hospitallers of St. John of Jerusalem (1940).

C.G. THORNE, JR.

HOTMAN, FRANÇOIS (1524-1590). French jurist, scholar, and Reformer. Born in Paris of a family originally from Silesia, Hotman became one of the foremost legal experts and law professors of his day. His conversion to Reformation doctrines in 1547 led to a life of uncertainty and periodic exile. In his most influential book, Franco-Gallia (1573), Hotman argued for a limited constitutional monarchy in France. Actually written before the St. Bartholomew's Day massacre of 1572 and thus not merely a livre de circonstance prompted by that notorious event, it became a landmark in Western political thought because it signaled a clear transition from medieval to modern constitutionalist principles. Hotman died in poverty at Basle.

ROBERT D. LINDER

HOUGHTON, WILLIAM HENRY (1887-1947). Baptist minister and president of Moody Bible Institute. Born in South Boston, he was educated in New England schools. An early career on the stage was cut short for theological training after a deepening religious experience, and subsequently he joined R.A. Torrey* as songleader. Ordained to the Baptist ministry in 1915, he held several pastorates, including Baptist Tabernacle, Atlanta (1925-30), and Calvary Baptist Church, New York City (1930-34), in each of which membership doubled. He conducted a successful evangelistic campaign in Ireland in 1924. Ten years later he became president of Moody Bible Institute, Chicago, a post he held until his death. During his tenure he strengthened the faculty; doubled the circulation of Moody Monthly of which he was editor (1934-46); encouraged Irwin Moon to join the institute extension staff (1938) to begin what became Moody Institute of Science; and provided the stimulus for the founding of the American Scientific Affiliation (1941). He was well known for his gospel songs.

HOWARD A. WHALEY

HOW, WILLIAM WALSHAM (1823-1897). Bishop and hymnwriter. A solicitor's son, educated at Shrewsbury and Oxford, he held several parochial posts before his consecration in 1879 as bishop of Bedford, where he became known as "the poor man's bishop." In 1888 he became the first bishop of Wakefield. Although he published a commentary on The Four Gospels (1870) and numerous sermons, he is remembered chiefly for several of his fifty-four hymns. These were contributed to a collection of Psalms and Hymns, compiled with T.B. Morrell (1854), and to Church Hymns (1871) which he edited jointly with J. Ellerton.* B.L. Manning thought him possibly the greatest nineteenth-century hymnwriter. He wrote, e.g., "For all the saints," "O Jesu, Thou art standing," "O Word of God Incarnate," "It is a thing most wonderful," and "We give Thee but Thine own." JOHN S. ANDREWS

HOWARD, JOHN (1726-1790). Prison reformer. Born in Hackney, after a short period as apprentice to a grocer he came into a modest inheritance in 1742 and traveled in Europe. After one trip to Portugal his boat was captured by a privateer on the return journey, and he was imprisoned in France. This may have set his mind moving in the direction which was to be his life-work. In 1758 he settled in Bedfordshire, where he built model cottages, promoted educational experiments, and developed rural industry. Following the death of his second wife, he traveled again through Europe, and on his return in 1773 was made high sheriff of Bedfordshire. Thereafter he devoted his time and strength and a good part of his fortune to the reform of conditions in prisons in England and in Europe.

There were many abuses—for example, jailers in England received fees rather than a salary, and this led to extortion and corruption. Howard visited all the county jails, and he promoted parliamentary bills designed to reform conditions. He then toured jails throughout England and published his book, State of the Prisons (1777), which caused great concern. Further travels in Europe were followed by another act of Parliament in 1779. In 1782 he made a third general inspection of English prisons, and then a tour of Europe, giving special attention to the lazarettos, particularly in Italy and the Near East, which were designed for the control of infectious diseases. He himself was put in one when he was in quarantine in Venice. He publicized the terrible conditions in such institutions and agitated for reform. In 1789 he took his last journey, which led him to Prussia and Poland and on into Russia; there he caught camp fever from a woman in the course of his researches, and died. Howard was a very earnest evangelical Christian, a teetotaler and a vegetarian, whose life was devoted to the cause of prison reform.

See biographies by D.L. Howard (1958) and M. Southwood (1959). A. MORGAN DERHAM

HOWARD, PETER (1908-1965). Oxford Group* movement leader. Born at Maidenhead, son of a schoolmaster, he was educated at Mill Hill and Oxford, and worked for the Beaverbrook Press till his conversion to Moral Re-Armament ("Oxford Group") in 1941 provoked his resignation. Thereafter he farmed in Suffolk, undertaking worldwide journeys for the movement, and after Frank Buchman's* death in 1961 he became its foremost representative. A forthright personality with many admirers and some bitter critics, Howard wrote a large number of books and plays which were performed at the Westminster Theatre, London. Though frequently invoking the names of the three persons of the Trinity to support his crusade for the "moral absolutes" or "ideology" of the movement, no consistent Christian theology can be said to underlie his work. IAN SELLERS

HOWE, JOHN (1630-1705). English Nonconformist minister. Born at Loughborough, Leicester, he studied at Christ's College, Cambridge, and then Brasenose College, Oxford. In 1652 he became a fellow of Magdalen and was also ordained by Charles Herle and other ministers at Winwick, Lancashire. In 1654 he was given the "perpetual curacy" of Great Torrington, Devon, by the dean and canons of Christ Church, Oxford. At Torrington he labored to unite Presbyterians and Independents, but his work was halted when Oliver Cromwell called him to court in 1657 as a chaplain. Once again he tried to heal divisions among the various groups who frequented Whitehall. He also served Richard Cromwell. After the latter's resignation of the Protectorate, he returned to Torrington.

In 1662 Howe was ejected and for the next eight years he had his share of harassment under the Clarendon Code* while he preached from time to time in the homes of local gentry. Moving to Ireland in 1670 he became the chaplain to Lord Massareene in Antrim Castle. During his six years there he engaged in various schemes to educate Presbyterian clergy and also wrote The Living Temple of God (1675). In 1676 he returned to London as co-pastor of the Presbyterian congregation at Haberdashers' Hall. During 1685-87 he lived abroad, mostly at Utrecht. After the Toleration Act (1689) he labored to unite the Presbyterians and Independents, but the "Happy Union" he helped to forge was but a brief one. A six-volume edition of his works was published in 1862-63. PETER TOON

HOWE, JULIA WARD (1819-1910). Writer and reformer Born in New York City, she was reared an Episcopalian and was privately educated. Her marriage to Samuel G. Howe (1843), a humanitarian and teacher of the blind, placed her in the company of prominent Bostonian intellectuals, poets, and social reformers. She belonged to the Radical Club and assisted her husband in editing the abolitionist paper The Commonwealth (1851-53). Becoming a Unitarian, she occasionally preached from Unitarian pulpits. After her husband's death (1876) she gave herself unceasingly to public service, a leader in every humanitarian movement or cause. She advocated woman suffrage, prison reform, international peace, and children's welfare. She also wrote travel books, essays, drama, and verse. Her most famous piece of poetry is "The Battle Hymn of the Republic." ALBERT H. FREUNDT, JR.

HOWSON, JOHN SAUL (1816-85). NT scholar. Graduate of Trinity College, Cambridge, he served as teacher (1845-49) and then headmaster (1849-66) of Liverpool Collegiate Institute. From 1867 he was dean of Chester. Howson is remembered chiefly as co-author with W.J. Conybeare* of the influential work, The Life and Epistles of St. Paul (2 vols., 1852), which remains in print. Howson was chiefly responsible for the historical, geographical, and archaeological aspects of the work. He published also several other works on Paul and on NT subjects generally.

HROMADKA, JOSEF LUKI (1889-1969). Czech Reformed theologian. Born in Hodslavice, Moravia, he was educated at several universities and in 1912 became pastor of the Evangelical Church of Czech Brethren. From 1920 to 1939 he was professor of systematic theology at the Jan Hus Theological Faculty in Prague, and during the war he taught at Princeton Theological Seminary. On his return home in 1947, he became a controversial figure for urging reconciliation between Christians and Communists. He was a founder of the World Council of Churches and served on its central committee. He was also founder and chairman of the Christian Peace Conference, an organization which served as a vehicle for Christian-Marxist dialogue and communication between Christians in the East and West, and he received the Lenin Peace Prize in 1958. Because of his protest against the Soviet invasion of Czechoslovakia, he was forced to resign as chairman of the CPC in November 1969. He died six weeks later. RICHARD V. PIERARD

HROSVIT. Tenth-century nun and poetess who lived at Gandersheim in Saxony. She took as her model the literary style of Terence, but she was very familiar with all the leading Latin poets and with Holy Scripture. One of her main aims was to oppose Terence's descriptions of the frailty of women by portraying the courage and chastity of Christian virgins. After her death she was quickly forgotten, but Conrad Celtes, the humanist, discovered a Latin manuscript of her writings at Ratisbon which was printed in 1501. One of her poems, "Passio Sancti Pelagii," claims to be based on the report of an eyewitness account of the martyrdom. There is an English translation of her plays by H.J.W. Tillyard (1923) and of her other works by Sister Gonsalva Wiegand (1936).

PETER TOON

HUBER, SAMUEL (1547-1624). Protestant scholar. Born at Burgdorf, near Bern, he was active in religious controversy, usually defending Lutheran doctrines against the Calvinism of the Swiss Reformed Church. He caused special offense by his assertion of Christ's universal atonement ("Christum Jesum esse mortuum pro peccatis totuis generis humani"), and was banished from Switzerland in 1588. He joined the Lutheran church, signed the Formula of Concord,* and became first a pastor near Tübingen, then professor in Wittenberg University. His assertion that God has from eternity elected all men to salvation gave offense to other Lutherans, and he was opposed by Polycarp Lyser and Aegidius Hunnius (1593), whom he in turn charged with Calvinism. According to Albrecht Ritschl, Huber was "a very poor theologian," but noteworthy as representing the protest against the doctrine of twofold predestination. The title "Huberianism" was widely given to expositions of a universal atonement such as he advocated.

J.G.G. NORMAN

HUBERT WALTER (d.1205). Archbishop of Canterbury from 1193. He faithfully served three kings, was essentially a royal administrator, and was rewarded for his services by promotion in the church. He was successively dean of York, bishop of Salisbury from 1189, and then primate. He was also papal legate from 1195. He studied law at Bologna and had been a member of the famous Angevin lawyer Glanvill's household. He played a major role in collecting Richard I's ransom money, and was Richard's justiciar from 1193 until 1198. The newly ransomed Richard waged war in France from 1194 and never returned to England, so Walter as justiciar was in virtual charge of the kingdom. His achievements as justiciar were many. He systematized the organization and recording of judicial and legal matters and insisted on a more thorough enforcement of law and order. After Richard's death in 1199, Walter helped to rally support for King John. As the latter's chancellor from 1199 he gained equally high praise for his reorganization of chancery practice and the systematic recording of its transactions.

PETER TOON

HUBMAIER, BALTHASAR, see ANABAPTISTS

HUC, ABBÉ (Régis Evaniste) (1813-1860). Missionary to China. The period after 1840 and the Opium Wars was one of persecution for Roman Catholics, but Abbé Huc with his companion, Father Gabet, both French Lazarists, undertook a remarkable journey from Peking through Mongolia and Tibet to Lhasa and back to Canton in 1844-46. They were protected by wearing mandarin dress and the crimson sash that signified kinship to the emperor. Everywhere they found terror-stricken little groups of Christians, but nearly succeeded in establishing a mission in Lhasa itself. The famous account of his journeyings (Travels in Tartary and Tibet) by Abbé Huc stimulated fresh interest abroad in the Christian mission in China. LESLIE T. LYALL

HUGHES, HUGH PRICE (1847-1902). Wesleyan divine. Born at Carmarthen and educated there and at Swansea, he trained for the Wesleyan ministry at Richmond College and graduated from London University. He served in various circuits, founding new churches wherever he went, and in 1885 while superintendent of the Brixton (London) circuit he launched the Wesleyan Forward Movement, a campaign of evangelism and social service characterized by the erection of central halls and encouraged by the Methodist Times (founded 1885) which he edited. Other related causes were the Wesleyan Twentieth Century Fund which, as president of conference in 1898, Hughes instigated to raise a million pounds for church extension, Methodist reunion, and social reform—his bitter attacks on Parnell after the divorce crisis of 1890 led him to formulate the term "the Nonconformist Conscience." His self-styled "Christian Imperialism" caused him to champion British imperial expansion overseas and a campaign of social and ecclesiastical aggression against the Anglican Church at home. Despite his missionary enthusiasm, Hughes's theology was reductionist, and appears particularly so in his teaching on sin and on the Last Things. The central halls and big city missions of contemporary British Methodism remain his most permanent memorial. IAN SELLERS

HUGHES, JOHN JOSEPH (1797-1864). Roman Catholic archbishop of New York. Born in Annalogham, Ireland, he went to the USA in 1817, was educated in Mount St. Mary Catholic College in Maryland, and was ordained in 1826. He served two parishes in Philadelphia until 1837, when he became coadjutor bishop of New York. He founded St. John's College (now Fordham University) in 1841. He became bishop of New York in 1842 and archbishop in 1850. He organized the parochial school system of New York and freed it from public and lay control. He began the building of St. Patrick's Cathedral in 1858 and led in the establishment of the North American College in Rome. Early in the Civil War he was successful as an envoy of the United States government in winning sympathy for the Union cause in France, Ireland, and Italy. EARLE E. CAIRNS

HUGHES, STEPHEN (1622-1688). Welsh Puritan. He was son of a Carmarthen silk merchant, but little is known of his youth and education. He was appointed Puritan minister of the parish of Meidrum, Carmarthenshire, in 1654. He contributed largely to the work of publishing "good books" in Welsh. He began by issuing the first part of the work of Vicar Rhys Prichard in 1659. During the era of persecution his home was at Swansea, and the work of publishing was in abeyance. It recommenced in 1670. He secured the cooperation of such men as Thomas Gouge (1605?-1681), Bishop William Thomas (1613-1689), Charles Edwards (1628-1691), Richard Jones (1603-1673), and William Jones (d.1679). Between them they published a series of books culminating in a translation of Pilgrim's Progress in 1688. The significance of this work for Welsh Christianity was immense in that it ensured that Puritanism would make wide use of the Welsh language in literature and education. Hughes was also a preacher of great influence and was the founder of the strong Congregationalist tradition in Carmarthenshire. R. TUDUR JONES

HUGH OF CLUNY (1024-1109). Abbot of Cluny. Descended from Burgundian nobility. He rejected the knightly life for academic training under Bishop Hugh of Auxerre, his great-uncle, and entered the Cluny novitiate when fourteen. He took vows a year later, was ordained to the priesthood in 1044, appointed prior in 1048, and named successor to Abbot Odilo* in 1049. At the Council of Reims (1049) he eloquently advocated reforms before Leo IX. Thereafter enjoying the confidence of nine popes, several from Cluny ranks, he served them as personal adviser, diplomatic emissary, and executor of Vatican policy. His presence at numerous councils and synods contributed to significant decisions: condemnation of Berengar's heresy (Lateran, 1050), decree on papal elections (Lateran, 1059), implementation of reforms (Avignon and Vienne, 1060), defense of Cluniac privileges (Lateran, 1063), organization of the First Crusade (Clermont, 1095).

This capable disciplinarian governed Cluny for sixty prosperous years. Houses were added to the order in France, Italy, Spain, Germany, and England. Civil and ecclesiastical privileges were gained. The magnificent abbey church of Cluny was erected and in 1095 its altar personally dedicated by Urban II. Concubinage, simony, and investiture were attacked. Hugh feared secular domination of the church. Diplomatic in his sympathy with Gregory VII against Emperor Henry IV, he remained a wise irreproachable mediator in a factional age, winning the tributes and friendship of both civil and ecclesiastical leaders. Most of his voluminous correspondence has been lost, as has his Life of the Blessed Virgin.

JAMES DE JONG

HUGH OF LINCOLN (1135-1200). Bishop of Lincoln. Born in Burgundy and educated by Regular Canons at Villard-Benoit, he was professed there when fifteen years old, and subsequently became head of one of that House's dependencies at Maximum. Later he joined the Carthusian Order at Chartreuse where he remained for seventeen years. At Henry II* of England's request, he was sent to England as first prior of the Carthusian House at Witham, Somerset, founded by Henry II as part expiation for Becket's murder. Hugh built the house at Witham. He quickly impressed everyone by his personal holiness and integrity. He became a close friend of Henry, but could be fearlessly critical of his policies toward the English Church. Henry respected his attitude, and overriding Hugh's objections, he appointed him bishop of Lincoln in 1186.

Hugh applied himself tirelessly to the improvement of the see, which had been vacant for eighteen years. He introduced a program of clerical reform and started the rebuilding of Lincoln Cathedral, occasionally carrying hods of stones and mortar himself. As an important bishop he was involved also in political matters. In 1197 he was one of the feudatories who denied Richard I's right to insist that his barons should serve personally on the continent. In John's reign Hugh visited France on the king's behalf. He was a much-loved campaigner for justice. He insisted that Henry II compensate those evicted to make room for the House at Witham, and during the popular persecutions of the Jews in England he did all he could to protect them. He died in London and was buried at Lincoln. He was canonized in 1220.

L. FEEHAN

HUGH OF ST.-VICTOR (c.1096-1141). Exegete and theologian. Descended from the courts of Blankenburg in Saxony, he early joined the Austin Canons Regular at Hamersleven, and settled finally about 1115 in the new monastery of St.-Victor in Paris. Conflicting accounts of these years exist for lack of information; he himself said: "Since my childhood I have been an exile." From 1120 until death he was the leading master in the school of St.-Victor, where he was prior of the abbey for a time after 1133. A recognized scholar, he was concerned about the task of the trivium and quadrivium, distinctions between natural reason and divine faith and the objects of each, the nature of philosophy, scientific classification, the importance of the literal interpretation of Scripture, and rules for exegesis.

As a pure philosopher his contribution was limited. His forte was exegesis, and together with expounding Scripture he was a student of the science of interpretation—seen in his notes on the first books of the OT. He developed into a theologian (cf. his Summa Sententiarum and De sacramentis christianae fidei). He was given to studying the Fathers, and was called "the second Augustine."

In the belief that original sin is a corruption contracted at birth, his theological system begins with Adam and goes through Advent and the final consummation, defining faith as "a certainty about things absent, above opinion and below science." He was indebted to his contemporaries, Anselm of Canterbury, Anselm of Laon, and William of Champeaux. A mystic, Hugh wrote on mystical union and believed that as the soul ascends to God it acquires the gift of wisdom or contemplation which original sin canceled; he distinguished sharply between contemplation and Beatific Vision. His writings on all these subjects are many.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: J.P. Kleinz, The Theory of Knowledge of Hugh of St. Victor (1945); R. Baron, Science et Sagesse chez Hugues de Saint-Victor (1957); J. Taylor, The Origin and Early Life of Hugh of St. Victor (1957). C.G. THORNE, JR.

HUGUENOTS. A nickname for the French Calvinists (the origin is uncertain: perhaps a corruption of the German Eidgenossen, "confederates"). Under Francis I (d.1547), persecution of Protestants was sporadic; his sister Margaret, indeed, made Navarre a center for reform-minded humanists. By the 1540s Calvinism spread rapidly in France, bringing increased repression. Under Henry II's reign (1547-59), special courts were set up to try heretics, who were often burned at the stake. As martyrs multiplied, so also did Calvinism spread, aided by massive mission efforts from Geneva. Powerful noble clans adopted the new faith, notably the Bourbons, led by Antoine of Navarre. A national synod was held in 1559. With Henry's death, the political situation began to disintegrate rapidly. The princely family of the Guises, militant Catholics, opposed any toleration of the heretics. An extremist Huguenot attempt to kidnap the new king (the weak Francis II) failed; a Catholic-Calvinist colloquy at Passy (1560) achieved nothing; attempts at compromise by allowing limited toleration produced militant Catholic protest, climaxed by a Guise march on Paris (1562).

Civil war broke out. It was to last for a generation. The main parties were three: the Huguenots, the militant Catholics, and the politiques, who wanted above all the restoration of order. Religious differences were entangled with political ambitions. Both Huguenots and militant Catholics proved ready to intrigue for foreign support. The wars were marked by political assassinations and even by mass "executions" (the Massacre of St. Bartholomew's Day,* 1572), an attempt to wipe out the Huguenot leadership).

Huguenot political theorists developed justifications for revolt against tyrants (e.g., Vindiciae contra tyrannos, 1579). Given the conventional wisdom of the age—namely, that a state could not survive if its citizens were divided in ideology (religion)—the situation seemed insoluble. The wars were ended in ironic fashion: the assassination of Henry III (by a fanatic Catholic) made Henry of Navarre, the Huguenot leader, heir to the throne. To gain it, he turned Catholic ("Paris is well worth a Mass"). He quickly ended the civil war and in 1598 issued the Edict of Nantes,* granting the Huguenots full toleration, civil rights, and the right to their own fortified towns. To some extent, thus, the Huguenots remained a "state within a state."

During Henry IV's* reign (1598-1610) the Huguenots felt secure. After his assassination their position slowly worsened. Huguenot militant revolts (1615, 1625) merely led to the loss of the fortified towns. Though entrenched enough under Louis XIII (1610-43) to engage in internal controversy over the attempts by Amyraut (Amyraldus) of Saumur to soften the orthodox idea of predestination, the Huguenots' days were numbered. Louis XIV (reigned 1643-1715) was determined to make France the most powerful state in Europe, and this involved ruling a state committed to one religion. Repressive measures were instituted (e.g., the dragonnades, or quartering of soldiers on Huguenot families), persecution followed, and in 1685 the Edict of Nantes was revoked. Calvinism was now illegal. Hundreds of thousands of Huguenots left in a mass exodus from the lands of the "Sun King."

Those who remained, mostly the poor, suffered sentences to the galleys, hangings, and other punishments. The Calvinist peasants of the Cevennes rose in desperate revolt (1702); though the "Camisards"* were gradually hunted down, by Louis's death in 1715 a regular "underground" church had been organized, led by Antoine Court* and later by Paul Rabaut.* By the later 1700s, with the spread of Enlightenment ideas (Voltaire, etc.), persecution for religious reasons seemed increasingly antiquated, and by 1787 the Huguenot remnant gained limited civil rights.

The French Revolution brought full toleration and civil rights. The Napoleonic regime recognized Calvinism as an established religion, along with others, at the cost of some degree of state regulation. This was continued in the post-Revolutionary era. The Huguenots, though a small minority, produced many noted figures (e.g., the political leader Guizot). As the revolutionary storms subsided, new influences affected the Calvinists: higher criticism and "modernism" on the one hand, and the "Awakening" (Réveil)* on the other, the latter a conservative and Pietist return to traditional orthodoxy. By 1848 a conservative group led by Adolphe Monod* split off; another conservative schism followed in 1872, despite the efforts of the aging Guizot to reconcile evangelicals and modernists.

By 1905 anticlerical liberalism brought an end to all ties between state and religious groups. Among the Calvinists four separate bodies resulted. After World War I they cooperated increasingly, and by 1938 most Calvinists united in the Reformed Church of France.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: A.G. Grant, The Huguenots (1943); E. Leonard, Histoire du Protestantisme français (1961); B.G. Armstrong, Calvinism and the Amyraut Heresy (1969). DIRK JELLEMA

HUMANISM, RELIGIOUS. The Renaissance may be said to be the source of religious humanism, at least in modern times. In its early phases it expressed itself in the revival of "human" learning, the rebirth of classicism, as against the "sacred" learning of the Middle Ages. This in turn involved both the revival of classical languages (incidentally benefiting biblical studies) and the development of a historical perspective made necessary by the rejection of medievalism. In its later phases, religious humanism showed itself in the repudiation of the Augustinianism of the Reformers by Erasmus and, later, Arminius. Thus as a "movement," if it can be called such, it embraced parts of the Roman Catholic Church (in such individuals as Colet, More, and Erasmus) and Protestantism (Arminius, Socinus, Locke) as well as independent thinkers such as Spinoza. The Moderates* in the Church of Scotland and the "Broad Church" school of Anglicanism, as well as certain themes in German Pietism and in the philosophy of Kant, may be said to have carried many of the emphases of religious humanism into the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries.

These emphases were: (1) a confidence in human nature, coupled with a belief in the power of education. This expressed itself characteristically in a repudiation of the Augustinian (and biblical) teaching on the bondage of the will (see the Erasmus-Luther debate), and in an anthropocentric religiosity. This confidence in human nature was tempered by skepticism, particularly in theological matters; (2) a belief in toleration, due less to conviction about fundamental human rights than to theological indifferentism and skepticism, combined with the belief that what was right in Christianity was but republication of ancient wisdom or, later, a restatement of "natural religion." Though some individuals such as Colet and More were religiously earnest, for many religious humanists the church was treated in a thoroughly secular way, or thought of as having simply a "civic" function to fulfill. PAUL HELM

HUMBERT (d.1061). Cardinal bishop of Silva Candida. A Burgundian by birth, he became a monk at the monastery of Moyenmoutier, where he showed himself to be a good scholar and keen reformer. Leo IX called him to Rome in 1049 and a year later made him cardinal bishop. In this position he was a principal adviser to Leo IX, Victor II, and Stephen IX with regard to the reform of the church and relations with the East. He strongly denounced simony in Libri tres adversus Simoniacos. At the time of the Great Schism* he was a leading member of the mission which Leo IX sent to Byzantium to the patriarch, Michael Cerularius, in 1054. Humbert is to be classed with Peter Damian* as a leading reformer of the eleventh century. PETER TOON

HUME, DAVID (1711-1776). Scottish philosopher, historian, and man of letters. His philosophical program, first outlined in A Treatise of Human Nature (1739-40), involved the application of Newtonian scientific method to human nature. The ultimate data of investigation are "impressions," those sensations directly presented to the mind of which "ideas" are the copies. The philosopher must discover from what impression or impressions ideas are derived. This amounts, in essence, to an early application, in a psychological idiom, of the logical positivists' verification principle. Hume's analyses of memory, personal identity, and (most famously and successfully) causation are attempts to fulfill this program. In morals, Hume argued that moral judgments were the product of the passions, not of the reason.

In religion, Hume is chiefly noteworthy for his skeptical attacks on miracles and on the argument from design. Miracles are denied on a posteriori grounds; it is always more reasonable to reject someone's testimony about a miracle than to accept it. This view has implications for historiography. His attack on the argument from design involved showing the ambiguity of the evidence. Hume was a skeptic about metaphysical claims and theories, in religion and elsewhere, though not about the "natural beliefs" men have about, for instance, the external world. He set many of the problems currently discussed by analytic philosophers. His work in religion can be regarded as one of the most fundamental attacks on natural theology in modern times. PAUL HELM

HUMILIATI. An order of penitents, probably founded by Johannes Oldratus (d.1159), which was partly suppressed in the sixteenth century. Following the Benedictine Rule, they cared for the poor and mortified their bodies. The order had three types of members: those who lived ascetically in their own homes, those who were nuns, and those who were monks. During the late Middle Ages their discipline and devotion deteriorated, and when Charles Borromeo,* who had sought to reform the order, was assaulted in 1571 by one of the monks, the pope suppressed the monasteries but allowed the Humiliate Nuns to continue. The Humiliati are sometimes called the "Barettines of Penitence." PETER TOON

HUNG, HSIU-CH'ÜAN (1813-1864). Leader of the Taiping Rebellion. A Hakka by birth, he was a disillusioned scholar in Canton when handed a treatise on Christianity written by Liang A-fah,* a colleague of Robert Morrison in Malacca. Thereafter he gave Christian teaching serious attention. Not having received any Christian instruction, he began to teach a syncretistic faith combining Chinese beliefs with the doctrines of God and of Jesus, His Son, and adopted much Christian teaching and practice. Being also eccentric and with delusions of grandeur, he eventually assumed the imperial title in 1851 and led a peasant uprising against the Manchu rule. His declared intention was to set up "the Heavenly Kingdom of Great Peace" (Taiping). The rebellion at first met with dramatic success, but degenerated into arson and massacre and was finally suppressed by foreign troops led by Lt.-Col. C.G. ("Chinese") Gordon. Hung committed suicide. This pseudo-Christian movement which, wisely directed, might have given Christianity a strong start in China became the most desolating insurrection of the nineteenth century. LESLIE T. LYALL

HUNGARY. In the latter years of the ninth century the pagan Magyars made their first permanent settlements in Hungary. Using their new home as a base, they raided large portions of W Europe. In 955 Otto I, Holy Roman Emperor, won a great victory over them at Unstrut. This victory checked the advances of the Magyars, and their conversion to Christianity followed this major defeat. It took place in the closing years of the tenth century under Stephen (see STEPHEN OF HUNGARY) who preached to his subjects, urging them to accept Christianity. From Pope Sylvester II Stephen received the royal crown and title as king of Hungary. When Stephen died in 1038, a sharp reaction set in against Christianity. Later in the eleventh century, however, powerful monarchs gave new support to the Christian Church, and Christianity gained a stronghold in Hungary. The situation changed again when the fall of Constantinople to the Turks in 1453 opened the way for their conquest of Hungary. Christianity faced increasing difficulties and lost its privileged position.

In the latter half of the sixteenth century Protestantism made its way into the country. It had been adumbrated by the Hussite movement of the fifteenth century and the resultant translation of the Scriptures into the Hungarian language. Lutheranism made great headway in Hungary after 1525, and many Hungarian students went to Wittenberg for their training in theology. Calvinism later had an impact, particularly among the Magyars, while Lutheranism had the greater appeal for the German and Slavonic peoples of the kingdom. On the other hand, the upper classes, particularly the landed aristocracy, remained loyal to the Roman Catholic Church, and the activities of the Jesuits also helped to keep the Protestants as a minority in Hungary. Not until 1787, in fact, did the Hungarian Protestants gain a degree of freedom, when the Hapsburg Edict of that year either eased or removed entirely the earlier restrictions. Protestants were thereafter given the same civic rights as Roman Catholics.

During the nineteenth century, Protestants in Hungary felt the effects of the evangelical movements which were so influential in Britain, Switzerland, and the USA. With the restoration of the monarchy in 1920 after a short period of communistic control, the religious situation of the nineteenth century was restored, but in 1944 a Nazi regime was created which brought great hardship to both Protestants and Catholics. When Nazis gave way to Communists after World War II, the situation became even worse, and all branches of the Christian Church have suffered severely since 1949.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: E. Horn, Christianisme en Hongrie (1906); E. Revesz, S. Kovats, and L. Ravasz, Hungarian Protestantism, Its Past, Present and Future (1927); V. Gsovski (ed.), Church and State Behind the Iron Curtain (1955); R. Tobias, Communist-Christian Encounter in East Europe (1956). C. GREGG SINGER

HUNT, JOHN (1812-1848). English missionary to Fiji. Born into the family of a Lincolnshire farmer, he had little formal schooling. Converted in a Methodist meeting at seventeen, he educated himself and preached in various chapels. He entered a Wesleyan theological college in 1835, and after ordination in 1838 sailed for Fiji as a missionary where he stressed Bible translation and the training of indigenous pastors. As he was a strong enthusiast for the doctrine of entire sanctification, his preaching sparked a revival in 1845. The rigors of extensive traveling in visiting the scattered Fijian congregations led to his death. His translations of the Scriptures were published posthumously, the NT in 1853 and the whole Bible in 1864. RICHARD V. PIERARD

HUNT, WILLIAM HOLMAN (1827-1910). English painter. He led the "Pre-Raphaelite Brotherhood" grouping of young British artists (and literary figures) who in the mid-nineteenth century wanted to return to simple painting technique, direct study of outdoor events with detailed depiction of exactly what is there, avoiding the academistic rules of chiaroscuro lighting and the coloring virtuosity Raphael had made the trend. In search of serious subject matter, Hunt himself practiced what he preached by going to Egypt and Palestine to paint biblical scenes with authentic local settings and types of people. Although Charles Dickens attacked the Pre-Raphaelite program as arrogant presumption, Ruskin defended their work, insuring its influence in England.

Holman Hunt helped break the conventional, iconographic picturing of Christ, and paintings like his well-known The Light of the World (1854) appealed to the new middle-class patrons of the arts. But the artistic skill and sincerity of principles behind the bright colors, exactly detailed foregrounds, and choices of "elevated" topics suffer from a somewhat maudlin spirit and anecdotal bent which keeps the art tied to being period pieces, illustrational tracts for the times.

CALVIN SEERVELD

HUNTING. The Bible calls Nimrod (Gen. 9:9) a mighty hunter, and later in the patriarchal period it cites Esau (Gen. 25:27) as an ideal outdoorsman. Although the cultural period of hunting had disappeared before the Hebrews settled in the Promised Land, there were still numerous references to the activity. A wide variety of game animals, beast of prey, and game birds were available in Palestine. Although "quiet" hunting was sanctioned for the clergy by the church for centuries, there are many today who would condemn it altogether on moral and humanitarian grounds.

There is little direct guidance available in the biblical material concerning the modern-day ethics of hunting. It is made clear in Genesis 1:28 that man is to have dominion over the fish of the sea, the birds of the air, and animals. It is also clear that the killing of animals was not forbidden. Cruelty to animals, however, appears to be contrary to the nature of God's creation. It seems consistent to add here that when hunting threatens the existence of a species, this could be termed exploitation of God's creation and in direct disregard for the God-given laws of nature. Theologians agree that conservation laws directed toward the preservation of the species of game are binding in conscience, for they promote the common good. JOHN P. DEVER

HUPFELD, HERMANN CHRISTIAN KARL FRIEDRICH (1796-1866). German OT scholar. Born at Marburg, where he began his education, he continued at Halle under H.F.W. Gesenius,* staying on as instructor before going back to Marburg as professor of theology in 1825. In 1838 he returned to Halle and remained there until his death. In addition to more technical works, Hupfeld sought to define the methods of biblical interpretation* (1844). In contrast with rationalists of his day, he preserved more of the sense of revelation in the OT. His work on the sources of Genesis (1853) rediscovered K.D. Ilgen's theory (1798) and cautiously divided into two distinct documents the sources in which Elohim had been used. His four-volume work on the Psalms (1855-61) was the first modern commentary on that book. He had a significant influence on H. Gunkel.* CLYDE CURRY SMITH

HUS, JAN (1373-1415). Bohemian Reformer. He was born of poor parents at Husinec in S Bohemia, the name of which place he assumed. His mother greatly desired that her son become a priest, and Jan at about thirteen years old entered the elementary school in the nearby Prachatice. In 1390 he matriculated in the university of Prague and four years later received his A.B. degree, ranked sixth of twenty-two. Going on to obtain the master's degree in 1396, he began teaching in the faculty of arts.

In 1402, after receiving priestly ordination, he was appointed rector and preacher of the Bethlehem Chapel, the center of Czech preaching in the spirit of the previous Czech reform movement. He thus became its most outstanding popular exponent. Nevertheless he continued his teaching in the arts faculty and enrolled in the faculty of theology for the doctor's degree. When the theological works of John Wycliffe* were brought to Prague about 1401, Hus became acquainted with them; prior to that he knew only Wycliffe's philosophical realism, with which he agreed. In 1403 a German university master, Johann Hübner, selected forty-five theses from Wycliffe's writings and secured their condemnation as heretical by the university, where the Germans, largely Nominalists, had three votes against the one Czech vote. This caused a rupture between the German and Czech masters, for the latter generally defended Wycliffe. Hus, however, did not share Wycliffe's radical theological views, such as Remanence, although some members of his party did.

The new archbishop, the young nobleman Zbynek Zajíc of Hasmburk, knew but little theology. Fortunately for Hus and the reform party, he favored its ecclesiastical reforms. This benevolent attitude lasted five years, during which the reform party grew in strength. Finally in 1408 the opponents of reform, mostly the higher clergy, won the archbishop to their side. The final break came in 1409 over the deposition of Pope Gregory XII and the election of Alexander V at the Council of Pisa. King Wenceslas and the Czech university masters, including Hus, sided with Alexander, while Zbynek and the German masters remained faithful to Gregory. When the king forced the archbishop to acknowledge the new pope, Zbynek secured from Alexander prohibition of preaching in chapels, including the Bethlehem Chapel. Hus refused to obey and was excommunicated by Zbynek, and the case was then turned over to the Curia. Hus was cited to appear in Rome, but sent procurators instead. Thereupon he was excommunicated by Cardinal de Colonna for contumacy. The king, angered by the opposition of the German masters to his ecclesiastical policy, changed the constitution of the university by depriving the Germans of their three votes and granting them to the Czechs. The Germans left in a body, and Hus was elected rector of the now Czech university.

But even greater conflict arose in 1411, when Pope John XXIII issued his "crusading" bull against King Ladislas of Naples. Shortly after, he appointed a commission for the sale of indulgences. Hus vehemently denounced this "trafficking in sacred things" as heresy. The Prague populace rose in revolt and burned a simulated papal bull. During the uprising three young men were beheaded for opposing the sale of indulgences. The process against Hus at the Curia was renewed in 1412, and he was declared under major excommunication by Cardinal Peter degli Stephaneschi. Prague was placed under interdict because of Hus's presence; thereupon he left for exile.

Hus found refuge chiefly in S Bohemia, and during the next two years he engaged in literary conflict with his adversaries, particularly Stanislav of Znojmo and Stephen Pálec. He also preached far and wide. Among the most important Czech works he now wrote were the Expositions of the Faith, of the Decalogue, and of the Lord's Prayer, as well as Postil. In 1414 he accepted the invitation of the leading Czech noble, Henry Lefl of Lazany, the chamberlain of King Wenceslas, to his castle of Krakovec.

Because of the Great Schism,* aggravated at the Council of Pisa* by the division of the West among the three popes, it was decided to hold still another council for the final settlement of the controversy. Emperor Sigismund* was the leading promoter, though Pope John XXIII unwillingly cooperated. The council was to be held in Constance* on 1 November 1414. Sigismund invited Hus to attend and promised him safe conduct for the journey both ways, even if the charges against him were not lifted. After much hesitation, and upon the urging of even King Wenceslas, Hus consented to go. He left Krakovec on 11 October and arrived at Constance on 3 November. At first he was left unmolested; but within less than a month he was treacherously lured into the papal residence and then imprisoned in a dungeon in the Dominican monastery. A panel of judges was thereupon appointed, and he was subjected to what amounted to a continuation of the previous trial for heresy. The judges endeavored to convict him of adhering to Wycliffism; but when he successfully repudiated most of the charges, Pálec extracted forty-two articles from Hus's chief work, De ecclesia. When the Parisian chancellor, Jean Gerson, arrived at the council, he brought with him an additional twenty charges of heresy and error.

When Pope John, who presided over the council, found himself in danger of losing his bid for confirmation in the papal office, he fled from Constance on 21 March 1415. He was seized, however, and brought back a prisoner. He was finally condemned and deposed on the basis of fifty-four charges. The council meanwhile reorganized itself. Hus, who had been transferred to the castle of Gottlieben, was now being judged by a new commission, the head of which was Peter Cardinal d'Ailly.* He was finally permitted a public hearing before the council on 5, 7, and 8 June, but was not permitted to present and defend his own views, but only to answer charges falsely formulated against him by his enemies or testified to by false witnesses. Finally d'Ailly demanded that Hus abjure the articles charged against him. In vain Hus protested that to abjure what he did not hold would be to perjure himself. He was willing to abjure if instructed from Scripture in what way his teaching was wrong. This the council refused to do. Even so, it would have preferred to secure Hus's retraction. It gave him a final formula which likewise proved unacceptable, since he still would have to admit having taught heresy and error.

The last session was held on 6 July in the cathedral before the general congregation. The final thirty articles, none of which correctly stated his own teaching, were read. Since he still refused to recant on the ground that they ascribed to him views he did not hold, he was declared an obstinate heretic, a disciple of Wycliffe, deposed and degraded from the priesthood, and turned over to the secular arm for execution. He was burned at the stake the same day on the outskirts of the city.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: M. Spinka, John Hus and the Czech Reform (1941), John Hus at the Council of Constance (1965), and John Hus, a Biography (1968); P. de Vooght, L'hérésie de Jean Huss (1960). MATTHEW SPINKA

HUTCHINSON, ANNE (1591-1643). Early American colonist. Born Anne Marbury, she married William Hutchinson and emigrated to Massachusetts in 1634. Her particular way of expressing her Calvinistic doctrines (and her criticism of the monopoly of preaching, education, and administration by one social class) brought her into conflict with the leaders of the young colony. At first she was supported by John Cotton* and Henry Vane,* but a synod of Congregational churches denounced her supposedly antinomian views. After this the General Court of the Colony sentenced her to banishment after a travesty of a trial. In 1638 she moved with her family to Aquidneck (now Rhode Island). After her husband's death in 1642 she moved first to Long Island, then to what is now Pelham Bay, New York, where she was killed by Indians. PETER TOON

HUTTEN, ULRICH VON (1488-1523). German Reformer. Born at Steckelberg, he was in 1499 placed in a monastery with a view to a religious vocation, but fled in 1505 and wandered from university to university, studying the classics and humanist writings. In 1515 he made a bitter attack on Duke Ulrich of Württemberg who had murdered the head of his family, Hans von Hutten, and in 1517 he settled permanently in Germany in the service of the archbishop-elector of Mainz. Hitherto a humanist scholar, he was suddenly caught up in enthusiasm for the Reformation and the freeing of Germany from papal control. Bitter ironical attacks on the papacy led to an order of arrest from Rome in 1520 and his dismissal from the elector's service. He fled at first to the castle of Franz von Sickingen, but was forced later to remove to Schlettstadt, Basle, and Mühlhausen, all of which towns refused to receive him. In 1522, afflicted by disease and poverty, he approached Zwingli,* who secured him refuge on an island till his death.

Hutten is a puzzling figure whose precise influence on the course of the Reformation has been hotly debated by historians. Undeniably he sought the political emancipation of Germany rather than her spiritual renewal, advocating what is often called the "Knights' Reformation," i.e., an alliance of the German nobility and free cities against the princes, an impossible ideal rendered quite abortive as early as 1520. But he was not without spirituality and derived from Luther not only inspiration to address his German audience in its native tongue, but also those evangelical sentiments which characterize his later works.

See H. Holborn, Ulrich von Hutten (1929; rev. ET 1937) and T.W. Best, Humanist Ulrich von Hutten (1969). IAN SELLERS

HUTTERITES. Anabaptist* sect. They first emerge in Moravia in 1529; reorganized by Jacob Hutter in 1533, they were able despite their leader's martyrdom in 1536 to develop their distinctive ideas, in particular their pacifism and Christian communism, in the comparative peace and security of Moravia. Until 1599, in fact, they enjoyed their "golden period," expanding into Slovakia and building up about a hundred bruderhofs, or farm colonies, with a membership of about 25,000. The Counter-Reformation at last caught up with them in the person of the persecuting Cardinal Franz von Dietrichstein, and their discomfiture was completed by the Catholic victory at the battle of the White Mountain (1620).

Moravia being lost to them, they retreated to Slovakia and Transylvania where despite Turkish invasions and Jesuit harassment they held out for 150 years, producing a rich devotional literature which is still the basis of their worship and witness. Renewed and vicious persecution fell upon them during the reign of Maria Theresa (1740-80), but in 1767 the rump of the sect, now confined to Transylvania, crossed the mountains into Walachia and in 1770 removed again to the Ukraine. In Russia they flourished under such leaders as Johannes Waldner (1794-1824), but the introduction of military conscription in 1870 determined them to emigrate to the USA, where they settled mainly in South Dakota, Some again emigrated in 1917 when their pacifism proved unpopular, this time to Canada. They now number about 7,500 in the USA, still practice community of goods, learn German, cherish their ancient manuscripts, and maintain hostility to most forms of modern culture.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: R. Friedman, Hutterite Studies (1961); P.K. Conkin, Paths to Utopia (1964); J.A. Hostetler and G.E. Huntington, Hutterites in North America (1966); V. Peters, All Things Common (1966); J.W. Bennett, Hutterian Brethren (1967). IAN SELLERS

HYACINTH (1185-1257). "Apostle of the North." Nobly born Jacek Odrawaz (the former name was corrupted by a later writer), he studied at Cracow and probably Bologna. As a priest he entered the Order of Preachers at Rome in 1217/18. Having accompanied his uncle who was to be consecrated in Rome as bishop of Cracow, he is said to have witnessed St. Dominic's miracle of raising the dead. The earliest biography was written a century after Hyacinth's death by Stanislaus of Cracow. Later accounts are not reliable. Hyacinth had an important part in the extensive Dominican missionary efforts, having founded several houses of the order—e.g., at Cracow, Danzig, and Kiev—as well as making journeys of thousands of miles on foot to preach in Scandinavia, Lithuania, Bohemia, Greece, Russia, Tibet, and his native Poland. Miracles of crossing rivers dryshod, restoring the blind, and raising the dead have been attributed to him. Hyacinth was canonized in 1594. C.G. THORNE, JR.

HYMNS. A Christian hymn is a song, normally metrical and strophic, used in worship. Augustine's requirement that it be "with praise of God" would outlaw hymns of meditation, description, exhortation, or teaching. An ideal hymn has something definite to communicate, is scriptural, poetic yet simple and singable, theistic, preferably christocentric, orthodox, and truly ecumenical. Although a good tune is important, this should carry the words, and not vice versa. This article treats mostly hymns popular in Britain and America.

The NT shows that the apostlic church sang hymns. The Psalter was soon supplemented by the canticles (Magnificat, etc.) of Luke 1, 2, and the doxologies, e.g., Luke 2:14. The younger Pliny (c.A.D. 115) reported in a letter to Trajan that Christians sang "a song to Christ as a god." This might, however, have been a liturgical recitation. The earliest hymn whose full text has survived is one used at a lamplighting ceremony (c.A.D. 200 or earlier) and translated from the Greek by John Keble*: "Hail, gladdening Light." Another Greek hymn (fourth century or earlier) is known to us, via Latin, as the Gloria in excelsis. Most other Greek hymns in our collections were translated by J.M. Neale.* Latin hymnody can be traced back to the fourth century. The *Te Deum, possibly by Niceta, bishop of Remesiana (d.c. 414), used to be ascribed to Ambrose (d.397), the anti-Arian bishop of Milan, to whom the Western Church owes the recognition of hymns as an integral part of public worship and indirectly the invention of "Long Meter." From the fourth to the eleventh centuries there were many Latin hymns, mostly translated by Neale. The authorship is not known of the originals of "Jesu, the very thought of Thee" (Caswall) and "Come, Holy Ghost, our souls inspire" (J. Cosin). There are over 150 versions of Dies Irae (Thomas of Celana, thirteenth century), the greatest of the medievel Sequences (hymns sung before the Gospel at Mass).

During the two centuries after the Reformation there was, largely owing to Calvin,* no book of hymns for use in the Church of England. Their place was largely taken by the metrical Psalms, notably the Whole Booke of Psalmes Collected into English Metre (1562), by Thomas Sternhold* (d.1549) and John Hopkins (d.1570), and printed by John Daye. Only one hymn associated with this is now used, the "Old Hundredth": "All people that on earth do dwell" (ascribed to William Kethe, d.1594?). This "Old Version" of the Psalms held sway until 1696 when A New Version by Nahum Tate* and Nicolas Brady* was published. To this we owe "As pants the heart" and "Through all the changing scenes." The books co-existed until c.1870. The Scottish Psalter, still used by Scottish Presbyterians, dates from 1650.

In 1623 there appeared George Wither's Hymnes and Songs of the Church, the first attempt at a comprehensive English hymnbook; it had little success. Hymns have been taken or adapted from Herbert* ("Let all the world"), Milton* ("Let us with a gladsome mind"), Baxter* ("Ye holy angels bright"), Bunyan* ("Who would true valour see"), and Addison* ("When all Thy mercies"). Samuel Crossman (1623-84) gave us "My song is love unknown," and Thomas Ken,* "Awake my soul" and "Glory to Thee, my God, this night." Late in the seventeenth century hymns began to be freely written, and Dissenters began to use them in congregational worship. In 1671 hymns were sung at Broadmead Baptist Church, Bristol, and in 1673 Benjamin Keach published a collection of Communion hymns.

The Independent, Isaac Watts,* threw open the door by publishing in 1707 his Hymns and Spiritual Songs and in 1719 The Psalms of David. He made David speak "like a Christian" (cf. Ps. 72 with his paraphrase, "Jesus shall reign"). In over 600 hymns, many still in use (e.g., "O[ur] God, our help in ages past" and "When I survey the wondrous cross"), he expressed wonder, praise, and adoration at all aspects of Christian experience. His co-religionist, Philip Doddridge,* composed about 370 hymns, notably "Hark, the glad sound," "My God, and is Thy table spread?" and "O God of Bethel."

The Collection of Psalms and Hymns, compiled by John Wesley* (1737), was for use in the Church of England. John edited many subsequent collections, mostly consisting of some of the 6,000 or so compositions by his brother Charles Wesley* and his own thirty-three paraphrases from, e.g., Gerhardt,* Scheffler,* Tersteegen,* and Zinzendorf.* The definitive Collection of Hymns, for the Use of the People called Methodists (1780, with supplements 1831 and 1876) contain such hymns as Charles's "And can it be," "Hark! the herald angels sing," "Jesu, Lover of my soul," "Love divine," and "O for a thousand tongues." Whereas Watts and Doddridge freely paraphrased Scripture, Charles Wesley also paraphrased the Prayer Book and versified Christian doctrine and experience.

The Wesleys were not the only hymnwriters of the Evangelical Revival. John Byrom* is remembered for "Christians, awake," A.M. Toplady* for "Rock of ages." In 1779 John Newton* and William Cowper* produced the Olney Hymns, including "Glorious things of Thee are spoken" and "There is a fountain fill'd with blood."

Thomas Cotterill's Selection of Psalms and Hymns (8th ed., 1819), which led to the quasi-legalization of hymn-singing in the Church of England, contained many hymns by James Montgomery.* In 1820 Heber* failed to get his MS collection authorized for use in the Church of England. When published (1827), his Hymns [etc.], which introduced us to H.H. Milman* ("Ride on! ride on in majesty!"), led a movement toward a literary type of hymn. H.F. Lyte* is remembered for "Abide with me."

The Oxford Movement (1833 onward) revived an interest in Latin and Greek hymns, which Neale,* Caswall,* and John Chandler (1806-76) sought to satisfy. Many Tractarians wrote original hymns: notably, Keble, whose Christian Year appeared in 1827; J.H. Newman,* whose "Lead, kindly Light" and "Praise to the Holiest" are well known; F.W. Faber,* whose compositions tended toward sentimentality; and Mrs. C.F. Alexander,* who expounded the Creed to children in "All things bright and beautiful," "Once in royal David's city," and "There is a green hill."

The 600 or so hymns of the Presbyterian Horatius Bonar* included "Fill Thou my life," "Here, O my Lord," "I hear the words of love," and "I heard the voice of Jesus say." Thomas Kelly,* the Church of Ireland minister whose evangelical preaching cost him his living, wrote some 760 hymns, such as "Look, ye saints, the sight is glorious," "The Head that once was crowned with thorns," and "We sing the praise of Him who died." Brethren writers should be better known: E.F. Bevan*; J.G. Deck (1802-84), "O Lamb of God, still keep me"; Sir Edward Denny (1796-1889), "Light of the lonely pilgrim's heart"; and Alexander Stewart (1843-1923), "Lord Jesus Christ, we seek Thy face."

Among many other nineteenth-century British hymnwriters were Henry Alford,* "Come, ye thankful people"; Thomas Binney*; John Ernest Bode (1816-74), "O Jesus, I have promised"; Matthew Bridges (1800-94) and Godfrey Thring (1823-1903), "Crown Him with many crowns"; W.C. Dix (1837-98), "As with gladness"; James Edmeston (1791-1867), "Lead us, Heavenly Father"; Charlotte Elliott (1789-1871), "Just as I am"; Richard Mant (1776-1848), "Bright the vision"; George Matheson*; J.S.B. Monsell (1811-75), "Fight the good fight"; E.H. Plumptre (1821-91), "Thy hand, O God, has guided"; C.G. Rossetti*; W.C. Smith, "Immortal, invisible, God only wise"; S.J. Stone (1839-1900), "The Church's one foundation"; H.K. White (1783-1806), "Oft in danger"; William Whiting (1825-78), "Eternal Father, strong to save"; and C. Wordsworth.*

Some compilers of Anglican hymnals contributed hymns. E.H. Bickersteth,* whose Hymnal Companion to the Book of Common Prayer (1870) is still used by some Evangelicals, wrote "Peace, perfect peace" and "Till He come." The 1871 edition of Church Hymns was edited by John Ellerton* and W. W. How*; the 1903 edition is still used. An extreme product of the Oxford Movement was The Hymnal Noted (1852-4) by J.M. Neale.

A more moderate product was Hymns Ancient and Modern (1861). The comprehensive quality of the book eventually won it favor with most Anglicans. Although not an official collection, the total sales of all editions were by 1960 about 150 million.

In the 20th century excellent hymns have been written by G.W. Briggs (1874-1960), "God, my Father, loving me"; Cyril Alington (1872-1955), "Good Christian men, rejoice and sing"; Timothy Rees (1874-1939), "O crucified Redeemer"; Frank Houghton (1894-1972), "Thou who wast rich beyond all splendour"; and Timothy Dudley-Smith (1926- ), "Tell out, my soul, the greatness of the Lord."

More typical of the times has been the study of hymns (see bibliography) and compiling of hymnals (by, e.g., Bridges and Percy Dearmer* and most denominations). Recent interdenominational collections are The B.B.C. Hymn Book (1951); Christian Praise (1957); The Cambridge Hymnal (1968); Hymns for Church and School (1964) and Youth Praise (1966-69).

The earliest American Psalter was The Bay Psalm Book (1640). The earliest American hymns were Wesleyan or Calvinist, notably "Great God of wonders" (Samuel Davies*) and "I love Thy kingdom, Lord" (Timothy Dwight*). The Kentucky revival (1797-1805) inspired "negro spirituals" full of longing for release from slavery, e.g., "Swing low, sweet chariot."

Most American nineteenth-century hymnody reflected a highly literary, but liberal or Unitarian outlook: J.W. Chadwick (1840-1904), "Eternal Ruler"; Oliver Wendell Holmes (1809-94), "Lord of all being"; F.L. Hosmer,* "Thy kingdom come!"; Julia Ward Howe,* "Mine eyes have seen the glory"; Samuel Johnson (1822-82), "City of God," the friend of the hymnodist, Samuel Longfellow (1819-92); W.P. Merrill (1867-1954), "Rise up, O men of God"; E.H. Sears (1810-76), "It came upon the midnight clear"; and J.G. Whittier,* "Immortal love" and "Dear Lord and Father."

There were exceptions: G.W. Doane (1799-1859), "Thou art the Way"; George Duffield

(1818-88), "Stand up, stand up for Jesus"; Phillips Brooks,* "O little town of Bethlehem"; and, especially, Ray Palmer (1808-87), "Jesus, these eyes have never seen," "Jesu, Thou joy of loving hearts," and "My faith looks up to Thee."

From 1870 onward D.L. Moody* and Ira D. Sankey* inspired many new compositions. Although their Sacred Songs and Solos grew from a sixpenny pamphlet (1873) to a book of 1,200 pieces (1903), its restricted range (ideal for the original revival meetings) disqualifies it from general congregational use. Some of the better hymns have been taken into standard collections. Even the Anglo-Catholic English Hymnal contains five examples, including "There were ninety and nine" by E.C. Clephane (1830-69). The most extensive contributors to what Americans know as the Moody and Sankey Hymn Book or Gospel Songs are Fanny Crosby*; P.P. Bliss*; F.R. Havergal*; and D.W. Whittle (1840-1901).

Among more recent American hymnals are those for the Congregational (2nd ed., 1958), Methodist (1935), Episcopal (1940), Presbyterian, etc. (1955), Lutheran (2nd ed., 1958), and the Evangelical and Reformed (1941) churches.

Although German hymns had been translated at the Reformation (Miles Coverdale's Goostly Psalmes and Spirituale Songes, c.1536) and later by the Moravians and J. Wesley, the nineteenth century produced the most translators: J.W. Alexander (1804-59) (of Gerhardt); E.F. Bevan; J.L. Borthwick* (and Sarah Findlater); S.A. Brooke (1832-1916) (of Joseph Mohr*); Miss J.M. Campbell (1817-78) (of Claudius); Carlyle and F.H. Hedge (1805-90) (of Luther's Ein' feste Burg); F.E. Cox*; Richard Massie (1800-87) (of Luther* and K.J.P. Spitta*); William Mercer (1811-73) (Church Psalter and Hymn Book, 1854); and Catherine Winkworth.*

Other modern languages represented in hymnals are (translators only given): Danish ("Through the night of doubt and sorrow," Sabine Baring-Gould*); French ("Thine be the glory," R.B. Hoyle, 1875-1939); Indian (Marathi) ("One who is all unfit to count," Nicol Macnicol, 1870-1952); Irish ("I bind unto myself," C.F. Alexander); Italian (Caswall); Russian ("O Lord my God!" chorus: "How great Thou art!" Stuart K. Hine, 1899- ); and Welsh ("Guide me, O Thou great Jehovah," Peter Williams, 1722-96).

Missionary hymnals include Hymns of Universal Praise (Shanghai, 1948); London Missionary Society, Dihela tsa Tihelo ea Modimo (Bechuanaland, 16th ed., 1951); the E[ast] A[sia] C[hristian] C[onference] Hymnal (Tokyo, 1964); and the Treasury of Praise (Taiwan, 2nd ed., 1967), for Chinese-speaking Brethren assemblies in the Far East. Cantate Domino (World Student Christian Federation) contains (Geneva, 3rd ed., 1951) 120 multilingual hymns.

See also MUSIC, CHRISTIAN; CAROL; and entries under individual composers and hymnwriters.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: See bibliographies in A. Pollard, English Hymns (1960), and E.R. Routley, "Hymn," Encyclopaedia Brittanica (1973). Other works: H.W. Foote, Three Centuries of American Hymnody (1940 new ed., 1968); G. Sampson, "Century of Divine Songs," Proceedings of the British Academy, 29 (1946), pp. 37-64; A.E. Bailey, Gospel in Hymns (1950); W.J. Reynolds, Survey of Christian Hymnody (1963); C. Northcott, Hymns in Christian Worship (1964); E.R. Routley, Hymns Today and Tomorrow (1964); T.B. McDormand and F.S. Crossman, Judson Concordance to Hymns (1965); C.S. Phillips and L.H. Bunn, "Hymn," Chambers' Encyclopaedia (1966); C.J. Allen, Hymns and the Christian Faith (1966).

JOHN S. ANDREWS

HYPOSTATIC UNION. The doctrine of the substantial union of the divine and human natures in the one person (hypostasis) of Jesus Christ, formulated by Cyril of Alexandria* in opposition to Nestorius. He described the union as "natural" (kata physin) or "hypostatic" (kath' hypostasin). The doctrine was formally accepted at the Council of Chalcedon (451), though the phrase "hypostatic union" was not used, in the words "the property of each nature being preserved and coalescing in one 'prosopon' and 'hypostasis.' "

See INCARNATION.

HYPSISTARIANS (Hypsistians). An obscure sect of the fourth century, probably confined to Cappadocia. Nothing is known of them apart from what we know from Gregory of Nazianzus* and Gregory of Nyssa.* The sect appears to have held a syncretistic doctrine, containing elements derived from heathen, Christian, and Jewish sources. It was strictly monotheistic, rejecting both polytheism and the doctrine of the Trinity, and worshiping God who was symbolized by fire and light, and referred to as the Almighty and the Most High. The sect rejected sacrifice and every outward form of worship, holding that adoration was a purely spiritual act. But paradoxically, it adopted the observance of the Jewish Sabbath and the Levitical prohibition of certain foods. Members of the sect were few in number and of little influence even in Cappadocia. The father of Gregory of Nazianzus (also called Gregory) had been a member, but was converted through the influence of his wife Nonna.

DAVID JOHN WILLIAMS

I

I AM MOVEMENT. An American organization founded in 1934. Its views include an eclectic assortment of beliefs and practices drawn from Hinduism, Theosophy, Unity, Spiritualism, and the American fascist Silver Shirts, in addition to the special revelations supposedly given to Guy W. Ballard.* I AM teaches that human beings remain subject to continual transmigrations of the soul within history unless they are cleansed perfectly by heavenly light and ascend from this world in full harmony with the eternal I AM Power. I AM is also an intensely patriotic movement which views America as under the special guidance and protection of St. Germain. It is extremely conservative on social and economic issues and sponsors an auxiliary organization called "Minute Men of St. Germain" which crusades against Communism, spy activities, labor unions, and everything believed to threaten the American way of life. Since the federal trials of I AM leaders in 1940-41 on fraud charges, the movement has become secretive. Serious inquirers are enrolled in study groups and cautioned not to disclose information to outsiders. Fully committed members are expected to abstain from certain foods and drinks, tobacco, card playing, and all sexual activities even within marriage in order to purify themselves.

HARRY SKILTON

IBAS (d.457). Bishop of Edessa from 435, he is best known for the letter he sent in 433 to Bishop Mari(s) in Persia. This reveals that he took a mediating position between Nestorianism and the views of Cyril of Alexandria. He also helped to translate into Syriac the writings of Theodore of Mopsuestia, the Antiochene theologian. Because of supposed Nestorianism, he was deposed by the "Robber Synod" of Ephesus in 449. Two years later his orthodoxy was vindicated by the Council of Chalcedon. His epistle to Mari was condemned by Emperor Justinian and the Fifth Synod of Constantinople (553) (see THREE CHAPTERS CONTROVERSY). Only a Greek translation of the letter has survived; all his other writings are lost.

PETER TOON

IBN GABIROL, SOLOMON BEN JUDAH, see AVICEBRON

ICELAND. The first Christians in Iceland were Celtic monks who arrived about 800, after having been introduced to Christianity in Britain. Early missionary activity is attributed to Thorvaldr, an Icelandic viking, and the Saxon bishop Frederick, in the late tenth century. Although their efforts proved abortive, this preparatory work laid the groundwork for further missionary labor under the Norwegian king, Olaf Tryggvason, who introduced Christianity as the national religion in the year 1000.

In 1056 Isleifur Gizurarson became the first native bishop, and his ancestral estate at Skaholt thereafter became the episcopal residence. Isleifur's son, Gizur, as the succeeding bishop (1082-1118), established a second see at Holar. Due to the subservience of these sees to the civil powers, the state of the priesthood declined morally and intellectually. Because of political pressures and the attempts by Norwegian and other foreign bishops to centralize the organization of the church and its estates, the Icelandic Church experienced considerable conflict and suffering. Monastic activity declined; intellectual pursuits went into eclipse; the level of popular piety concerned neither people nor priest. Only the reviving breezes of the Lutheran Reformation were to bring new life to this disjointed religious situation.

Since Iceland had come under Danish control in the late fourteenth century, it fell to the Lutheran King Christian III to introduce the new doctrine to the Icelandic Church. Aided by the biblical scholar Oddur Gottskalksson, who translated the NT into the native language, Christian III declared to the nation through its legislature that the Lutheran system should be adopted. His most determined opposition came from Bishop Jon Aresson* of Holar, who, resorting to violence to save Skaholt for the pope, was himself imprisoned and beheaded.

A succession of able Lutheran bishops appeared after 1540, and the Reformation entered a constructive period. The sees of Holar and Skaholt were more happily united under the energetic bishop Gudbrandur Thorlaksson (1570-1627); the next two centuries saw the zenith of Lutheran preaching, hymnody, and devotional literature. The first complete translation of the Bible appeared in 1584.

In 1801, due to rationalistic inroads, and led by Magnus Stephensen, Holar and Skaholt were merged into one diocese located at Reykjavik; the Lutheran hymnal and service were altered to reflect the new thought. This liberalism has been perpetuated in the current century by the church's bishops and theological faculty.

See J. Helgason, "Die Kirche in Island," in Ekklesia (ed. F. Siegmund-Schultze, 1937), and J.C.F. Hood, Icelandic Church Saga (1946).

H. CROSBY ENGLIZIAN

ICON; IKON (Gk. eikōn "image"). Traditionally very popular in the public and private worship of members of Orthodox Churches (e.g., in Greece and Russia), icons are flat images of Christ, the Virgin Mary, or a saint. They usually take the form of wooden pictures painted in oils; some have ornate decoration and some are made of ivory or in mosaic. Their usage may be traced back to the fifth century; during and after the Iconoclastic Controversy* in the eighth and ninth centuries it was much intensified. To the icons is given full veneration—genuflexions, incense, etc. They are believed to be the channel through which the divine blessing or healing comes to the faithful; for those who use them this view is confirmed by the stories of miracles associated with them—e.g., that of the *Theotokos in the monastery of the Abramites at Constantinople. The Western Church has never widely used icons, but there is a famous one, that of Our Lady of Perpetual Succor at Rome. PETER TOON

ICONOCLASTIC CONTROVERSY (Gr. eikonoklastēs, "image-breaker"). The dispute involving church and state over the presence of paintings, mosaics, and statues in churches, in the period from 717 to 843. Though early councils (e.g., that of Elvira) had prohibited pictures in churches, their usage became widespread between 400 and 600. It was claimed that pictures of the martyrs would teach the illiterate to follow their good examples. The veneration of pictures, however, had its opponents such as Epiphanius.*

In 717 Leo III,* the Isaurian, acceded to the imperial throne and in 725 legislated against image-worship. His motivation is not clear, but it was possibly affected by his knowledge of Muslim opposition to images and by a desire to gain greater control over the church. His legislation was rejected in Rome by Gregory II* as heretical, and the latter's successor, Gregory III, called a council of ninety-five bishops in 731 to confirm this position. John of Damascus* also wrote against Iconoclasm. This action did not stop Leo and his successor Constantine V in their crusade against images. In 753 Constantine summoned a council to meet at Hieria, near Chalcedon; this resulted in a full condemnation of images by the 338 bishops present. Iconodules were accused of circumscribing the divinity of Christ and of confusing his two natures by the veneration of pictures of Him.

The Seventh Ecumenical Council of Nicea (787), however, guided by the empress Irene and the patriarch Tarasius* (both iconodules) reversed the decisions of Hieria. Icons were justified by reference to the tradition of the church through quotations from the Fathers. When Leo the Armenian became emperor in 813, though opposed by the patriarch Nicephorus,* he reverted to the policy of Leo III, and at an assembly of bishops in Sancta Sophia in 815 had the decrees of Hieria restored. His successors, Michael and Theophilus, continued the policy of Iconoclasm, but after the latter's death his widow, Theodora, restored the use of icons. She caused a "feast of orthodoxy" to be instituted on the first Sunday in Lent in 843, and arranged the return of the exiled iconodules. This marked the end of imperial support for Iconoclasm.

The writings and records of the councils of the Iconoclasts were destroyed, thus our knowledge of them is drawn from what their opponents said. The theological significance of the controversy was threefold: it caused a development of thinking about the use of icons and of sacramental theology; it emphasized the importance of tradition in the church; and (in the West) it strengthened the papacy. Iconoclasm has often reappeared in European history, with Carlstadt,* Luther's colleague, an example of a fervent Iconoclast.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: E.J. Martin, A History of the Iconoclastic Controversy (1930); E. Bevan, Holy Images (1940); P.J. Alexander, The Patriarch Nicephorus of Constantinople (1958); E. Gilson, The Arts and the Beautiful (1965). PETER TOON

ICONOGRAPHY, see ART, CHRISTIAN

IGNATIUS (d.98/117). Bishop of Antioch. He is known of almost exclusively through seven letters whose authenticity was established in the seventeenth century, largely by James Ussher,* and vindicated in the nineteenth, chiefly by J.B. Lightfoot.* While traveling under armed guard to be executed in Rome, preceded by other Syrian Christians, he was welcomed by Polycarp* and delegates from other churches at Smyrna, whence he wrote to the churches at Ephesus, Magnesia, Tralles, and Rome. Later from Troas he wrote to the Philadelphian and Smyrnaean congregations and to Polycarp. His death at Rome is asserted about 135 by Polycarp, who had earlier collected his letters for the Philippian church.

In six of his letters Ignatius attacks a heresy compounded of Docetic, Judaistic, and perhaps gnosticizing features, and advances the antidote of adhesion to the bishop, presbyters, and deacons. Probably still the only monarchical bishop in Syria, and the earliest witness to the threefold ministry, he magnifies the bishop's unifying authority as representing God (apostolic succession is unmentioned).

Ignatius displays prophetic qualities (he calls himself Theophoros, "God-bearer" or "God-borne," perhaps his baptismal name), and is a colorful and vigorous writer, influenced by Judeo-Christian and Gnostic conceptions. The flattering letter to the Romans (silent on monepiscopacy) pleads with them to do nothing to thwart his passion for martyrdom, by which, in language indebted to Maccabean and imitatio Christi ideals, he will "attain to God," become at last a disciple, and offer a ransom for the church.

Ignatius falls heir to apostolic tradition (explicitly Pauline rather than Johannine), but is led by personal and ecclesiastical circumstances into dramatic, even bizarre emphases. Against Docetism* he stresses Christ's true humanity and identifies it with the healing food of the Eucharist, a further focus of congregational unity.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: J.B. Lightfoot, Apostolic Fathers, Part II (3 vols., 2nd ed., 1889); C.C. Richardson, The Christianity of Ignatius of Antioch (1935); study by J. Moffatt in Harvard Theological Review 29 (1936), pp. 1-38; F.A. Schilling, The Mysticism of St. Ignatius of Antioch (1932); H.W. Bartsch, Gnostisches Gut und Gemeindetradition bei Ignatius von Antiochien (1940); V. Corwin, St. Ignatius and Christianity in Antioch (1960); M.P. Brown, The Authentic Writings of Ignatius (1963); T. Camelot in Sources chrétiennes 10 (4th ed., 1969). D.F. WRIGHT

IGNATIUS, FATHER, see LYNE, J.L.

IGNATIUS OF LOYOLA (Iñigo López de Loyola) (1491-1556). Spanish ecclesiastic reformer and mystic, founder and first general of the Society of Jesus.* He was born in the Basque province of Guipúzcoa in NW Spain. Little is known of his youth. His father died when he was about fourteen, whereupon he attached himself to the court of King Ferdinand, pursuing a military career. In 1521, defending Spain's claim to Navarre against France, while at the fortress of Pamplona, Loyola was struck by a cannon ball. One leg was badly mangled, ending his military career. While recuperating at the castle of Loyola he chanced to read Ludolph of Saxony's Life of Christ. Inspired to become a soldier for Christ, he vowed lifelong chastity and soon entered the monastery at Manresa. Here he spent nearly a year in ascetic practices, experienced several mystical visions, and composed the essence of that great manual of spiritual warfare and conquest, the Spiritual Exercises. After a pilgrimage to Jerusalem in 1523, he commenced his schooling, culminating it with the M.A. at Paris University (1535).

At Paris he gathered around him a band of associates who worked through the Exercises and became fired with Loyola's ideal. After graduation, Loyola and six dedicated colleagues (Nicolas de Bobadilla, Peter Faber, Diego Laynez, Simon Rodriguez, Alfonso Salmeron, and Francis Xavier), at St. Mary's Church in Montmartre, vowed together a life of poverty, chastity, and a career of service in the Holy Land or, failing that, of unreserved service to the pope. They met the following year in Venice, found their way to Jerusalem blocked by war, and finally won a favorable response from Paul III, leading to their approval as an Order of the church. This was officially confirmed by the bull Regimini militantis ecclesiae (1540).

In early 1548 Loyola was unanimously chosen "general" for the society. He provided the organization of the group by the famous Constitutions, which outlined a paramilitary structure with obedience, discipline, and efficiency the key ideas. Heavy stress was laid also on education and preparation, and Loyola founded in 1551 the Roman College as a model. Based on these ideals the Jesuits* took the lead in the Catholic reform movement. Loyola was beatified in 1609, canonized in 1622.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Autobiography (1900 and 1956); P. Dudon, St. Ignatius of Loyola (1950); J. Brodrick, St. Ignatius Loyola: The Pilgrim Years (1956); Letters to Women (1960); R. Gleason (ed.), Spiritual Exercises (1964).

BRIAN G. ARMSTRONG

IHMELS, LUDWIG HEINRICH (1858-1933). German Lutheran theologian and churchman. Born in East Frisia, he served in pastorates there after completing his education. Appointed professor of systematic theology at Erlangen in 1894, he was the last major representative of the Erlangen theology. His most important work, Die christliche Wahrheitsgewissenheit (1901), dealt with assurance of salvation. He moved to Leipzig University in 1902 and was named bishop of the church in Saxony in 1922. He took a leading part in promoting the Lutheran union movement and presided over the first Lutheran World Congress at Eisenach in 1923. In his speeches and writings he stressed the ecumenical character of Lutheranism. RICHARD V. PIERARD

IHS. This monogram is built by using the first three uncial (capital) letters of Jesus' name as it is written in Greek. It was overlooked that the second letter was a Greek eta, not a Latin H. (The monogram is also sometimes found as IH or IHV.) This explains why it has occasionally been incorrectly expanded to "Ihesus." There have been several other attempts to explain the etymology of this abbreviation. A popular theory regards each of the letters in the IHS monogram as the first letter of separate words instead of the first three letters in the Greek term for Jesus. Among others, the letters have been held to refer to Iesus Hominum Salvator ("Jesus, Savior of Men") or Iesum Habemus Socium ("We have Jesus as our companion"). WATSON E. MILLS

ILDEFONSUS (c.607-667). Archbishop of Toledo. From a distinguished family, he studied apparently under Isidore of Seville.* Against his father's wishes he entered the monastery at Agalia near Toledo, later becoming its abbot and founding a nunnery nearby. As abbot he served at the eighth and ninth Councils of Toledo (653, 655). From 657 he was archbishop of Toledo. Ildefonsus contributed much to Roman Catholic veneration of Mary through his De virginitate sanctae Mariae. His legendary encounters with the Virgin, recounted by his early biographers, became the subject of medieval art and poetry. Three other major works and two letters to Quiricus, bishop of Barcelona, survive. De viris illustribus demonstrates the seventh-century Spanish Church's debt to fourteen notables. Valuable insight into the medieval catechumenate and baptism is derived from Annotationes de cognitione baptismi. De progressu spiritualis deserti describes the believer's pilgrimage from baptism to heaven.

JAMES DE JONG

ILLUMINATI (Alumbrados). Members of a Spanish group of mystical tendencies. At the dawn of the sixteenth century Spain was touched by a religious movement which brought about renewal. The common folk, thirsty for a personal understanding of the Gospel, met in small groups to study the Bible. Bataillon contrasts this simplistic search for freedom with the intellectual aspirations of Cardinal Jiménes,* whose movement at Alcala had limited appeal. The Alumbrados, or "enlightened ones," were mystical in nature, drawing from Neoplatonism certain concepts also used by the Sadilies or Islamic mystics. A Franciscan first used the word "Illuminati" in 1494 in a letter to Cardinal Jiménes. Its doctrines seem to be known from the Inquisition,* which in 1623 condemned a wide range of Illuminist opinions. More recent scholars point to the positive leadership of Pedro Ruiz de Alcarez rather than repeat the general condemnation of an amorphous Spanish religious phenomenon of 129 years. Alcarez in his letter of 22 June 1524, written to the Inquisitors after four months' imprisonment, identifies the movement with the Franciscan Order. The key term was "love of God."

Alcarez may be called a member of the dexados movement, since Isabel de la Cruz initiated him into it about 1510. When Alcarez took Isabel's views on the freedom in God's love, thereby opposing merits by grace, a definite doctrinal content was added to the amorphous Franciscan illuminative way. The propositions condemned from his writings were made public on 25 September 1525. The perfection which Alcarez taught is the submission to God's will rather than an eradication of evil from the soul. Alcarez fought against the recogidos movement of Francisco De Osuna. This form of Spanish mysticism in the Franciscan movement sought by a method of prayer (recogimento) to recollect sufficient data through the senses to achieve illumination and union with God. The allegorical use of Scripture here in contrast to Alcarez assumes a natural divine light in which grace builds upon nature. This form of Illuminati thought influenced Loyola and St. Teresa. In Juan de Valdés* and Peter Martyr* such views were conveyed to Little Gidding and New England.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: A. Sánchez Barbudo, "Algunos aspectos de la vida religiosa en la Espana del siglo XVI: Los Alumbrados de Toledo" (unpublished Ph.D. dissertation, University of Wisconsin, 1953); J.E. Longhurst, "The Alumbrados of Toledo," Archiv für Reformationsgeschichte, XLV (1954), pp. 233-52; idem, Luther's Ghost in Spain (1969). MARVIN W. ANDERSON

IMAGES. The use of images to represent Yahweh was absolutely prohibited by the Mosiac Law (Exod. 20:4, 5; Deut. 5:8, 9; Lev. 26:1) and reinforced by the prophets (Amos 5:26; Hos. 13:2; Isa. 2:8; 40:18-26). Many objects such as the ark of the covenant, the oxen that supported the bronze sea, and the cherubim in the Holy of Holies were employed to assist worship, but they were never considered objects of worship. The bronze serpent (Num. 21:8, 9) was venerated with incense for a period, but this was abolished by Hezekiah. The illegitimate use of images is epitomized in the use of the golden calves in Israel by Jeroboam I. Although they were intended as symbols for the presence of God, they soon deteriorated into objects of worship. The syncretism of Baal worship and Yahwehism brought a flood of images into both the northern and southern kingdoms. Even with the reforms of Hezekiah and Josiah, this idolatry continued until the exilic period (587-537 B.C.). After this period, the prohibition was intensified.

During the Roman occupation, the observers of the law, at the risk of death, elicited promises from the procurators and governors not to bring the standard adorned with the emporer's image into the holy city or through Jewish territory. Soon after the establishment of the early church, the use of images arose and was later justified by such leaders as Augustine and Ambrose. Opposition did arise and precipitated the Iconoclastic Controversy* of the eighth and ninth centuries. The Second Nicean Council ruled that honor paid to an image passes on to its prototype and that he who worships an image worships the reality of him who is painted in it.

Icons became an integral part of worship in the Orthodox Churches, and veneration of images was later strengthened by Thomas Aquinas in the Western Church. The use of images was strongly opposed by some of the Reformers, especially Calvin, Zwingli, and the Puritans. Following this lead, most Protestant churches continue to oppose the use of images.

See also ICON.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Thomas Aquinas, Summa Theologica, III, i; W. Palmer, An Introduction to Early Christian Symbolism (1885); E. Bevan, Holy Images (1940); A.D. Lee and C.H. Pickar, New Catholic Encyclopedia, vol. 7, pp. 370-72 (1967). JOHN P. DEVER

IMMACULATE CONCEPTION. In 1854 Pius IX in the papal bull Ineffabilis Deus stated that "from the first moment of her conception, the Blessed Virgin Mary was, by the singular grace and privilege of Almighty God, and in view of the merits of Jesus Christ, Saviour of Mankind, kept free from all stain of Original Sin." This dogma is based on a particular view of conception. It is believed that a person is truly conceived when the soul is created and infused into the body. At the moment of her animation Mary was given sanctifying grace which excluded her from the stain of original sin. Mary was redeemed at conception by Christ in anticipation of His atoning death. At the same time the state of original sanctity, innocence, and justice was conferred upon her. Thus Mary was sinless from the moment of her conception, although this did not exempt her from sorrow, sickness, and death, consequent upon Adam's sin.

No direct or categorical proof of the dogma can be brought forward from Holy Scripture, though basis is sought in such texts as Genesis 3:15; Psalm 45:12ff.; Luke 1:28, 41, 48. This basis is strengthened by the designation of Mary as the "new Eve" by the Christian Fathers such as Justin Martyr and Irenaeus. Augustine exempted the Virgin Mary from actual but not original sin. Thomas Aquinas argued against Augustine because he believed that Mary's conception was a natural one and in every natural conception original sin is transmitted. The Council of Basle in 1439 affirmed that the belief was in accordance with the Catholic faith, with reason, and with Holy Scripture. The universities followed the lead of the Sorbonne which in 1449 required its candidates to make an oath to defend the dogma. The Franciscans, Carmelites, and especially the Jesuits were staunch defenders of it.

As early as the seventh century a Feast of the Conception of Mary originated in the monasteries of Palestine. In 1476 Sixtus IV approved the feast with its own mass and office, and adopted it for the Roman Church. In 1708 Clement XI imposed it on the whole Western Church. "Immaculate" was added to the title after its promulgation in 1854. Since 1854 Eastern Orthodox theologians have rejected the doctrine as detracting from the merits of Mary's actual sinlessness. Protestants have always rejected this dogma since it appears to have no direct scriptural basis. S. TOON

IMMANUEL. A biblical name (Isa. 7:14, 8:8; Matt. 1:23), meaning "God (is) with us" in Hebrew. (The KJV spelling "Emmanuel" in Matt. 1:23 is due to the Greek form of the name.) The name is unambiguously applied to Christ in Matthew, but its function in Isaiah 7f. has been much debated; Jews traditionally have related it to Hezekiah, the crown prince of Judah, and many modern Christian scholars have similarly argued that some contemporary of the prophet Isaiah was intended. The traditional Christian view that it was a title of the Messiah is still by no means untenable.

IMMERSION, see BAPTISM

IMPANATION (Lat. impanare, "to impane, to embody in bread"). A description of certain theories of the Eucharist propounded in the Middle Ages and at the Reformation which sought to safeguard the Real Presence of Christ in the elements without positing the change of the natural bread and wine. Originally, in the eleventh and twelfth century, the word described the "heretical" doctrines of such people as the followers of Berengar who taught that the relation between Christ and the bread and wine was similar to that of the divine and human natures of Jesus Christ. During the sixteenth century Roman Catholics accused Luther, and Carlstadt accused Osiander, of teaching impanation. The first use of it as a technical term seems to have been by Guitmund of Aversa (d. c.1090); Alger of Liége (d.1131) also used the term when writing against transubstantiation. PETER TOON

IMPRIMATUR. The term employed to signify that the Roman Catholic authorities have approved of a book's publication. This approval must be given to all works of clergy or laity dealing with the Bible, doctrine, church history, church law, and ethics. It indicates that the censor has found in them nothing that is in conflict with the church's teachings. It is thus more negative than positive. The approval is given through the bishop of the diocese. All works—whatever the subject—written by clergy are supposed to receive this imprimatur. This practice grew up as a result of decrees of the Council of Trent (1545-63) which established a list of forbidden and expurgated books.

See also INDEX. W.S. REID

INCARNATION (Lat. in carne, "in flesh"). Although this term does not occur in Scripture, it is scriptural in the sense that it expresses the meaning of Scripture by teaching that Jesus of Nazareth was the eternal Word who became flesh (John 1:14). Jesus is the Son of God who, being sent by the Father, comes into this world "in the likeness of sinful flesh" (Rom. 8:3 KJV). At the heart of the Christian faith is the confession of the "mystery of godliness: He appeared in a body" (1 Tim. 3:16).

Having declared in the doctrine of the Trinity (A.D. 325) that the Father and the Son are coeternal and consubstantial, the fathers of the church could not avoid the question: How could the eternal Son, who is equally God with the Father, so partake of our flesh as to become a man as we are men? Some (e.g., Apollinarius) suggested that the Son assumed a true body and soul, but in place of the human spirit had, or rather was, the divine Logos. Realizing that this impugned our Lord's full humanity, others (e.g., Nestorius) affirmed this humanity, but spoke of Jesus in a way that made Him virtually a distinct person from the divine Logos ("He who was formed in Mary's womb was not himself God, but God assumed him . . .").

Reacting against suggestion that the divine Son and Jesus were two persons, Cyril of Alexandria and his followers argued that, as a result of incarnation, the human and the divine were fused into one nature (Monophysitism*). After much controversy, following the lead of Pope Leo I, the church came to define the orthodox doctrine of the incarnation at the Council of Chalcedon in A.D. 451 by declaring that our Lord Jesus Christ is true God and true man (vere Deus, vere homo), consubstantial with the Father in all things as to His divinity, yet in His humanity like unto us in all things, sin excepted. This one and the same Jesus Christ is known in two natures "without confusion, without conversion, without severance and without division, the distinction of natures being in no wise abolished by their union, but the peculiarity of each nature being maintained, and both concurring in one person and subsistence." This union of the human and the divine natures in one person (known technically as the "hypostatic union," from the Greek hypostasis, "person") is the common confession of the church, Eastern Orthodox, Roman Catholic, and Protestant.

It is not that the Definition of Chalcedon* removes the mystery of the Incarnation—one might say that it rather heightens the mystery—but it has proven remarkably effective in marking out the proper boundaries of believing thought about the person of Jesus Christ the only Mediator between God and man.

As for the terms of Chalcedonian Christology, the following should be noted. The word "nature" (Gr. physis, Lat. natura), as used by the Fathers, does not refer to the physical order which is the object of investigation in the "natural" sciences. "Nature" rather designates "being" or "reality" in distinction to "appearance." To say that Jesus Christ has a "divine nature" is to say that all the qualities, properties, or attributes by which one describes the divine order of being pertain to Him. In short, He is God Himself, not like God, but just God. So also with the affirmation that Jesus Christ has a "human nature." He is not God appearing as a man; He is a man. He is not only a man or only God; He is the God who became a man. He did not cease to be God when He became a man, He did not exchange divinity for humanity; rather He assumed humanity so that, as a result of the incarnation, He is both human and divine, the God-man.

As for "person" (Gr. hypostasis, Lat. persona), this term was used by the Fathers to describe our Lord as a self-conscious, self-determined Subject, one who designates Himself by the word "I" over against a "thou." The word hypostasis literally means "that which stands under," i.e., what is there, in each individual case, at the deepest level. While we must ascribe to Jesus as the Christ all the qualities which belong to the human order of being (including bodily, physical, objective being—the Word "became flesh," John 1:14), we cannot say that at the most ultimate level of His being He is a human person. He is a divine person, with a human nature. The Son of God did not assume a man's person to His own nature, but a man's nature to His own person. He is, then, a divine person who has assumed our humanity. (Were he not a divine person, He would not be the object of Christian worship, for Christians worship God only, never the creature.)

As for the personal qualities of Christ's humanity, the position generally—though not universally—held by theologians subscribing to Chalcedonian Christology is one which speaks of the "impersonal humanity" of our Lord (anahypostasy, enhypostasy). Not that there is no manifestation in Jesus of personality at the human level; rather, the thought is that this humanity, of itself, has no existence independently of the divine Person. That which is human, in Him, exists in and through the Word which is God Himself. There is, to be sure, a sense in which God is present to all created reality, especially in a gracious way in His word and sacraments. But howsoever we may conceive of this divine presence of power (creation-providence) and of grace (word-sacrament), there can be no thought of identity between God and the creature. But of the man, Jesus Christ, something absolutely unique is affirmed; this man is declared to be identical with God Himself, because He, the Person, is the "Word made flesh and dwelling among us" (cf. John 1:14). Therefore we can never think of Him as man, without at the same time thinking of Him as God.

If the incarnate Son of God unites true deity and true humanity in a personal self, then there is a communion of attributes in the person of the Mediator whereby we may speak of Him in any way that is proper to speak of God or of man (see, e.g., Acts 20:28, where the best text speaks of God's having purchased the church with His own blood). Lutheran theologians, in distinction to the Reformed, have gone further, arguing not only for a communion, but also for a "communication" of attributes (Article VIII, Formula of Concord). To suppose, however, as the doctrine of the communicatio does, that the human nature of our Lord possessed of the attributes of the divine by virtue of the hypostatic union, is to draw a conclusion that has not commended itself widely outside Lutheran circles.

Likewise, the church as a whole has rejected the Lutheran doctrine of kenosis* (from the verb kenoō, "to empty," Phil. 2:7) though others besides Lutherans, especially in the Anglican Communion, have accepted some form of kenoticism.

In all of these views the fundamental assumption of Chalcedonian Christology is not challenged; the Incarnation is understood to mean that a preexisting divine person, the eternal Son of God, has revealed Himself in history as the man Jesus of Nazareth. A significant shift, however, begins with Schleiermacher,* who observed that it is unfortunate that the church should speak of the union of the human with the divine in Jesus the Christ as the act of the person himself, rather than making it constitutive of the person. The "Son of God" is the subject of the union of the human and divine in Jesus, according to Schleiermacher, not the divine person who exists before the union took place.

Ultimately, for Schleiermacher, Jesus is a man "who was uniquely endowed with God consciousness"; for Ritschl, "Jesus taught a lofty morality, but in the exercise of this vocation never transgressed the limits of a purely human estimate of himself"; for Harnack, "Jesus knew God in a way no one had ever known him before." In this tradition of German liberalism there is such a radical shift away from Chalcedon toward a view of Jesus as only a man, albeit an exceptional one, that it is hardly possible to speak of "incarnation" any longer. For this reason Tillich* has put the word "incarnation" in quotation marks and declared that its traditional meaning that "God has become a man" is "not a paradoxical statement but a nonsensical one." For contemporary theologians who concur in this judgment, Jesus was a first-century Palestinian Jew, no different from other men, save that his ethical integrity and religious genius have made us all his debtors.

In contrast with this "theology of the horizontal," the Christian doctrine of incarnation affirms that in the Jesus-event God, like a "perpendicular from above," visited our planet and became a part of our history. To understand this difference, in the light of the crucial question, "Whom say ye that I am?" is to perceive how important lucid theological thought can be for Christian faith, as that thought is preserved in the historic symbols of the church.

See also CHRISTOLOGY; JESUS CHRIST.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: A. Ritschl, Justification and Reconciliation (1902); F.E.D. Schleiermacher, The Christian Faith (1928); H.E. Brunner, The Mediator (1947); D.M. Baillie, God Was in Christ (1948); P. Tillich, Systematic Theology, vol. II (1951); K. Barth, Church Dogmatics, part I, vol. 2 (1956); K. Heim, Jesus the World's Perfector (1961); K. Rahner, Theological Investigations, vol. 1, chap. 5, "Current Problems in Christology" (1961). PAUL KING JEWETT

INCENSE. Usually regarded as a symbol of prayer ascending to God, incense has been, and is, widely used in many religious ceremonies, both Christian and pagan. The word describes both the substance used for burning and the aroma. In the Jewish temple it accompanied all sacrifices (except the sin-offering of the poor and the meat-offering of the leper). On the Day of Atonement it was solemnly burned by the high priest in the Holy of Holies. For the ingredients of incense and its use see Exodus 30:34-38; Leviticus 16:12ff.; and the Talmud (cf. Keritot 6a). Unless there is a reference in Revelation 8:3-5, there is no sure evidence of its use in Christian worship until the sixth century. This use may have risen in imitation of the custom of carrying incense in a thuribulum (thurible) before Roman magistrates. By the ninth century its use was widespread in both West and East. Today it is only used in solemn sung services in the West, but in the East it is used rather more frequently. Within the Church of England its use is technically illegal, but it is nevertheless used by Anglo-Catholic clergy in the service of Holy Communion.

PETER TOON

INCUBATION (Lat. incubare, "to brood"). The practice of sleeping in a temple or sacred place for oracular purposes was common in many ancient cultures, e.g., in the worship of Ascelpius, the patron of medicine. After the fall of paganism in the Roman Empire the custom was introduced into Christianity, and so the term came to refer to the practice of sleeping in or near churches or holy places in order to receive healing or visions. Certain centers, with which a saint was connected, were believed to have special possibilities for healing—e.g., St. Michael in the church of Anaplous, near Istanbul.

INDEPENDENTS; INDEPENDENCY. In Britain in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries Independency was a synonym for Congregationalism.* The word came into general usage in the revolutionary decade of the 1640s and was used at first in both a political and an ecclesiastical sense. In the former sense it came to represent those who believed in the provision of some form of religion toleration inside or alongside the state church; thus some members of the Long Parliament and many army officers were termed Independents. In the second sense it described those who believed in or practiced a Congregational form of church government; such people could be separatists* or ministers within the parish system who both gathered a church and preached in the parish "church."

Famous examples of conservative Independents are the Five Dissenting Brethren of the Westminster Assembly: Thomas Goodwin,* Philip Nye,* Sidrach Simpson, William Bridge,* and Jeremy Burroughes.* They taught a doctrine of the church which was halfway between separatism (Brownism) and Presbyterianism* (see further An Apologeticall Narration, ed. R.S. Paul, 1963). An example of a separatist Independent is Vavasor Powell,* the Welsh evangelist. After the Restoration in 1660 those who practiced the Congregational way and paedobaptism were, in the main, those who were deemed Independents. The term was not much used in the nineteenth century and has never been popular in the USA. However, the growth of the Fellowship of Independent Evangelical Churches* in Britain since 1945 has again brought the term in general use.

PETER TOON

INDEX OF FORBIDDEN BOOKS. A list of books which are prohibited reading for members of the Roman Catholic Church. This practice is in keeping with a tradition which regards certain works as dangerous to the faith and morals of Catholics. Under Pope Gelasius I (492-96) a decree was issued which divided books into three categories: authentic scriptural ones, recommended works, and heretical works. Many specific works were denounced until the formal codification of forbidden books took place under Paul IV (1555-59). One of the tasks of the Congregation of the Inquisition was to compile a catalog of forbidden books, and this was published with papal approval in 1559, the first such list to bear the official title of "Index."

Due to dissatisfaction with this Index the leaders of the Council of Trent (1545-63) began a revision, but were unable to complete it and appointed a commission for this purpose. As a result the Tridentine Index or Index of Pope Pius IV (1559-65) was issued in 1564. In addition to the list of forbidden books, it contained ten guidelines for regulating censorship. Revisions of the Index include those of Sixtus V (1590), Clement VIII (1596), Alexander VII (1664), Benedict XIV (1751), and Leo XIII (1897 and 1900). The last revision of the Leonine Index took place in 1948. In 1966 at Vatican Council II,* it was declared that no further editions of the Index would be issued, and its chief value today is historical. Catholics are still, however, bound to abide by certain guidelines prohibiting the reading of books which constitute a possible spiritual danger.

See IMPRIMATUR.

See also R.A. Burke, What Is the Index? (1952); and H.C. Gardiner, Catholic Viewpoint on Censorship (1958; rev. ed., 1961).

ROBERT G. CLOUSE

INDIA. The tradition that the Apostle Thomas came to India grows no weaker in the Indian Church. There are two separate considerations. The first is the tradition held particularly by the Syrian Christians of Kerala: that Thomas came to Cranganore in A.D. 52, founded churches in seven places in Kerala, later proceeded to the east coast and indeed beyond India, and finally was martyred at Mylapore in 72. Mylapore is within the modern city of Madras, and the reputed burial place is within the present Roman Catholic cathedral at Mylapore. There is, however, no written evidence for this South India tradition earlier than a Portuguese account about 1600.

The second consideration—whether Thomas was ever in India at all, leaving aside the South India details—is different. There are early references to Thomas's being in India. But the difficulty lies in demonstrating beyond a doubt that "India" in these references corresponds with India as we know it. One example is the Syriac Doctrine of the Apostles (c.250), which states that "India and all its countries, and those bordering on it, even to the farthest sea, received the Apostles' hand of priesthood from Judas Thomas, who was Guide and Ruler in the Church which he built there, and ministered there." Where the reference is to "India," it perhaps refers to somewhere around S Arabia, as when Eusebius writes of Pantaenus in India (about 180), and incidentally associates Bartholomew and not Thomas with the Church there.

Regarding the *Acts of Thomas with its allusions to the apostle, even if it indicated that Thomas was in NW India, this would in no way substantiate the South India theory, but it has a grain of credibility which contributes to modern hesitancy before dismissing the traditions. There is no inherent impossibility in the theory that Thomas came to India. The sea route, using the monsoon, was known then. Both proof and disproof are lacking.

The existence of Syriac liturgy in the Keralan churches (giving them the name "Syrian," for they are not racially distinct from the rest of the population) is sufficient proof of a link between these churches and the Near East. But in trying to trace the antiquity of the link, the same difficulty, of defining the word "India" in documents, arises. For example, there is mention of a bishop of Basra, Dudi, leaving his see and evangelizing in "India" (c.295-300), and there is the signature of John the Persian to the Creed of Nicea (325) on behalf of churches "in the whole of Persia and in the great India." Keralan tradition is of an immigration of Syrian Christians in 345, to strengthen an already existing if ailing church, and such an exodus would be likely from the Sassanid Empire at that period of persecution of Christians. Another tradition speaks of an immigration in 823; but long before that Cosmas the "Indian Sailor" (c.552) writes of Christians "in the land called Male [Malabar] where the pepper grows" and of a bishop appointed from Persia at a place called "Kalliana," which was probably equivalent to "Kalyan" (beside modern Bombay).

This link, whenever it began, determined certain things of importance about the Keralan Church. There was a distinct foreignness about having worship in Syriac and depending on a supply of foreign bishops; there was an indirect link with the patriarch of Antioch, via the Church of the Sassanid Empire, but that link would be severed when the Eastern Church stressed its autonomy; and when the Eastern Church adopted a Nestorian confession, the Indian Church would be Nestorian also, from the seventh century until the Portuguese period. Further, when the mother church suffered losses, and in parts vanished altogether, during the Muslim era, its dependent church in India became weak and neglected. It was, in extent, a church in Kerala with an outpost on the east coast at Mylapore, the Thomas shrine. Whatever had existed further north in India would hardly survive Muslim invasions.

Marco Polo was in India in 1288 and 1292 and was shown a tomb said to be that of St. Thomas. From about this time, friars were calling at India on their way to China, and one of these, John of Monte Corvino,* made converts and recommended missions. In 1321 four Franciscans who landed at Thana, near modern Bombay, were martyred; but their companion, a French Dominican called Jourdain de Severac, who was evidently assigned to work in India, remained in the area and baptized many people. The friendly Nestorian Christians whom Jourdain met were a neglected, ignorant people; and, of course, they were sadly heretical. In 1330 Jourdain was sent back to India as bishop of Quilon (in Kerala), and he carried a letter from the pope urging the Syrian Christians to submit to Rome. This was the first outright papal claim to authority, and although we know little of Jourdain's subsequent ministry, a Latin Rite church was established in Kerala.

The Portuguese discovery of the Cape route to India (1498) and settlement at Goa (1510) changed everything. These were men with a religious mission, for the pope had granted the kings of Portugal perpetual right of church patronage in the east, the Padroado. By 1534 a bishop was at Goa, head of a powerful church, but not a church whose life could in many aspects have pleased Francis Xavier,* founder of Jesuit missions in the East, when he arrived in 1542. Xavier's character contrasted with the general picture of that Portuguese period, earning him the respect of almost all (despite his recommending the Inquisition* in India). At Cape Comorin he instructed and established the neglected converts who had been won from the pearl-fisher community, and he laid foundations for Jesuit work in India.

To a degree, Roman Catholic success corresponded with Jesuit fortunes. They were agents in establishing authority among the Syrians of Kerala, becoming somewhat less than popular in the process (see MALABAR CHRISTIANS and DIAMPER, SYNOD OF). They responded to an invitation from Akbar, the Mogul emperor, and conducted a mission at his court which actually proved fruitless but might have had great consequences. In the south an Italian Jesuit, Robert de Nobili,* led the way in trying to overcome the foreign appearance of Christianity by means of "accommodation" to Hinduism. He dressed and lived like a Brahmin sannyasi, dissociated himself from the existing church at Madurai, and when he made converts permitted them to remain separate from the other Christians and to keep their outward signs of Hinduism such as the sacred thread. They thus preserved caste, which to Nobili was simply social custom. A bitter church controversy arose over these methods, and Nobili was withdrawn from Madurai in 1645. Eventually the method of "accommodation" was condemned. The Jesuits themselves were suppressed as an order. Their lot was to be succeeded by others; but, again, it might be said that the Roman recovery from a period of decline coincides with the restoration of the Jesuits in the nineteenth century.

If a difficulty exists about defining India, one might sometimes have pause in determining what was Christianity. From a Protestant viewpoint, it was the arrival of Protestant missions which gave to India the Bible; and it was the belief of many of these early missionaries that they were introducing biblical Christianity, in contrast with what stood for Christianity in the existing churches. The first Protestant missionaries were the German Lutherans, B. Ziegenbalg* and H. Pluetschau,* sent personally by Frederick IV of Denmark to his trading territory at Tranquebar in South India. They arrived in 1706, royal missionaries about to enjoy a far from royal welcome at the hands of the Danish authorities, not even wanted by the chaplains who cared for the European community; but it was nevertheless a great day in the story of Christianity in India and, to single out what is basic to the Protestant period, by 1714 Ziegenbalg had translated and printed the Tamil NT, the first in an Indian language.

Tranquebar was a tiny territory, but the mission had reverberations to the end of the earth. A new missionary conscience was stirred, as news was spread in the annual letters distributed by the Pietists at Halle, Germany. Although Germans led the way, impetus was to shift to Britain—as political power in India was to be won by the British—in that eighteenth century. Even before there were British missionaries, Anglicans were so inspired by news of Tranquebar that they gave financial support to "English" missions at other places in South India, staffed by German Lutherans. The East India Company countenanced these missions and even lauded a man of the caliber of C.F. Schwartz,* but it became alarmed at mounting pressure in Britain that it should itself make provision for mission work. Talk of missions was a threat to good trading conditions, and the Company for two decades pursued a policy of strictly forbidding the entry of missionaries.

Thus when William Carey* and Dr. John Thomas of the Baptist Missionary Society came to Calcutta in 1793, they were undesirable, illegal immigrants. They found employment as managers of indigo plantations, and Carey prepared himself in Bengali and Sanskrit for his real mission. The next Baptist families, in 1799, had to bypass the Company and make for Danish territory at Serampore, sixteen miles from Calcutta, so that Denmark had again a special place in this history; Serampore proved to be the birthplace of "the modern missionary movement." The Serampore trio of Carey, Joshua Marshman,* and William Ward attempted great things for God, and their college (1819) and their translations of the Bible (Bengali, Oriya, Assamase, Sanskrit, Hindi, and Marathi, by the time of Carey's death in 1834) indicate the foundations they laid for later work. Even in the period before 1813 when missionaries were forbidden, the Serampore men were not really alone, for there were evangelical chaplains to the Company who shared the missionary vision. Most famous of these was Henry Martyn,* who translated the Urdu NT and whose holy "burning out for God" inspired subsequent generations and is a symbol of the cost of mission to India.

As doors opened to missionaries, an Anglican Church organization was established in India, paid from Indian revenues; early bishops at Calcutta included such men as Reginald Heber* and Daniel Wilson.* Church of England missionary societies had important roles, inheriting work previously under the Danish-Halle German missionaries, helping the Syrian Church in Kerala, and sharing in the rise of a strong church at Tinnevelly.

In 1833 restrictions on non-British missions were lifted and the whole process of covering the map of India was accelerated. In the coming century churches were to rise which would approximately equal the number of Roman Catholics in India. Sometimes the converts were won singly and slowly, and sometimes in the rush of mass movements, as in Bihar and the Telugu country. It was an enterprise of foreign mission, but some of the converts were themselves leaders for the young churches. They included Pandita Ramabai,* Narayan Vaman Tilak,* and Sadhu Sundar Singh.*

Christian missions led the way in education. Alexander Duff* used higher education as a means of evangelism, but the belief that Western education would necessarily erode Hinduism and win over higher castes (Duff himself had some notable converts) was belied. Christianity undoubtedly influenced the nineteenth-century reform movements within Hinduism, and education did change belief. There was, however, a new factor of revived nationalism, with a revulsion toward the West, and if some of the great Indians of the twentieth century were to be professedly unreligious (like Jawaharlal Nehru and his daughter, Mrs. Indira Gandhi), there was also a noticeable revival of orthodox Hinduism. Some of the reform movements within Hinduism had been close to Christianity, but others, such as the Arya Somaj (1875), were militantly anti-Christian.

India was large enough to absorb Protestant missions without much friction. The rules of "Comity" regulated boundaries. More positively there was active cooperation in such union institutions as Madras Christian College (1887); and the 1910 World Missionary Conference in Edinburgh,* which gave birth to the ecumenical movement, led directly in India to the formation of the National Missionary Council (1914), which evolved into the National Christian Council. Missions integrated with national churches, and the NCC restricted full membership to churches.

Church union was another process. The strength of feeling among Indians was detected in a manifesto issued by a meeting of ministers at Tranquebar in 1919, deploring denominational disunity as something foreign and a brake on evangelism. V.S. Azariah* was a leader on that occasion. An important point conceded at Tranquebar was that acceptance of the "historic episcopate" was necessary if Anglicans were to be in union, and when the Church of South India (1947) and the Church of North India (1970) were formed, it was on this basis.

The Roman Catholic Church was not affected by this. Fully recovered from its period of decline, it weathered a sore controversy in the nineteenth century as it began to shed the vestiges of the Portuguese Padroado, established an Indian hierarchy (1886), formed a satisfactory separate organization for the Keralan Syrians in its fold, and displayed its progress by creating an Indian cardinal (1952) and holding the 38th International Eucharistic Congress at Bombay (1964).

Generally this period of readjustment in churches was not marked by expansion. Of course there were always external checks on that. Hinduism's tolerance seemed embodied in Gandhi, who had favorite Christian hymns but remained firmly a Hindu; by contrast, evangelism seemed a variant of Western imperialism, and that was in full retreat. Independence for India in 1947 did not inhibit evangelism, for the constitution guaranteed freedom to propagate one's religion, and some princely states now within the Indian Union were actually opened to missionaries for the first time. But it is also true that two states, Orissa and Madhya Pradesh, passed acts in the late 1960s which were designed to make conversions more difficult; and the missionary force declined sharply as government virtually stopped inflow. The greatest deterrent to evangelism, however, was not from outside the church, but within. Evangelism was sometimes out of favor in the church leadership and replaced by a social gospel. Some theologies minimized the uniqueness of Christ, and (as elsewhere in the world) spiritual decline meant decline in evangelism.

Fewer than 3 per cent of India's population of 547 million is even nominally Christian, but pessimistic signs are matched by the vitality of such an indigenous movement as the assemblies led by Bakht Singh, a converted Sikh, and by the quality of leadership appearing in the larger and older denominations.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: E. Chatterton, A History of the Church of England in India (1924); A. Mingana, The Early Spread of Christianity in India (1926); J.W. Pickett, Christian Mass Movements in India (1933); D. Ferroli, The Jesuits in Malabar (1939); E.G.K. Hewat, Christ and Western India (1950); C. Dawson, The Mongol Mission (1955); L.W. Brown, The Indian Christians of St. Thomas (1956); C.B. Firth, An Introduction to Indian Church History (1961); J.S.M. Hooper (rev. W.J. Culshaw), Bible Translation in India, Pakistan and Ceylon (1963); M.E. Gibbs, From Jerusalem to New Delhi (1964); K. Baago, A History of the National Christian Council of India, 1914-1964 (1965); J.E. Orr, The Light of the Nations (1965) and Evangelical Awakenings in India (1970); C.P. Mathew and M.M. Thomas, The Indian Churches of Saint Thomas (1967); W.G. Young, Handbook of Source Materials for Students of Church History (1969). See also The Christian Handbook of India (25th and last large-scale ed., 1959) and The United Church of North India Survey, 1968 (report). ROBERT J. MC MAHON

INDIA, EVANGELICAL FELLOWSHIP OF. An association of individuals and groups (such as churches and missions) formed in 1951, affiliated later to the World Evangelical Fellowship,* and aiming at revival in the Indian Church, evangelism, and "effective witness to, and safeguard of, the evangelical faith in the Church." The EFI has become known as the main meeting ground of evangelicals ("ecumenically linked" and otherwise), holds an annual conference in January, and has furthered its aims by activities like a national congress on evangelism, national prayer assembly, and city "penetration plans," and by permanent departments for Christian literature, relief aid, and Christian education (this last producing Sunday school lessons in the various languages). At first, EFI was mainly a missionary movement, owing much to the inspiration of the National Association of Evangelicals* in the USA, but leadership is now entirely Indian. In 1970 individual membership was about 1,400; group membership represents a significant segment of the church.

ROBERT J. MC MAHON

INDIANS, AMERICAN, see AMERICAN INDIANS

INDONESIA. There are slight traces of Christianity in Indonesia from the seventh century, but little is known. The first Franciscan mission reached the Spice Islands with the Portuguese in 1522 and saw mass conversions in Halmahera (1534) and other places. Francis Xavier* spent a short period on Indonesian soil. An anti-Portuguese reaction, however, severely reduced the number of Indonesian converts: the first martyrdoms on Halmahera also occurred in 1534. When the Dutch ousted the Portuguese in 1605, some 30,000 Indonesian Christians became Protestants, following the faith of their new masters. The Dutch East India Company church, however, catered chiefly for its Dutch employees, and local evangelization was scant and superficial. Most converts "turned" in social groups, their Christian knowledge was small and their zeal less —Sanghir Christians, it was reported, thought Christ had died on Christmas Day! The Bible was nevertheless translated into Malay, the trade language; a manuscript of the Lord's Prayer dates to 1627. The NT was published in 1688, and the whole Bible translated by Leydekker in 1733. Some 55,000 baptized Indonesian Christians (although only about a thousand were communicants) were counted in 1727. By the end of the company regime in 1799 there were hardly any more.

The evangelical (Pietistic) movement in Europe transformed the picture. The first efforts to evangelize Java were made, separately, by Coolen (1770-1863) and Emde (1774-1859), a planter and a watchmaker respectively, in the east of the island. Raffles, the British governor (1811-15), was the first to instigate missionary work, and thereafter Dutch and German missionaries gave themselves to the Indies. The Dutch government kept strict control over them and the churches they planted, and prohibited work in politically sensitive areas such as Atjeh and Bali. Churches were planted all over the country: in nineteen ethnic areas the whole people turned to Christianity, and at least as many "gathered" churches were planted elsewhere. L.I. Nommensen* evangelized the animistic Bataks of Sumatra; Kam (1772-1833) earned by his labors in the nominally Christian eastern islands the title of "Apostle of the Moluccas"; Bruckner (1783-1847) pioneered in Central Java. These are only a few among many. Portions of Scripture were produced in a score of local languages. Most of the schools and hospitals of the colonial era were provided by missions, education in particular being fruitful as a method of evangelization.

Nowhere else in the world was so large a church established in the midst of Islam. Its weakness was that it was totally under missionary control and financed from Europe. Shocked by the obvious weakness of the state church, Schuurman opened the Depok Seminary in 1878 to train indigenous evangelists. Depok was closed in 1926, but its work was continued by the Djakarta Theological Seminary, founded in 1934. In Dutch days, however, missionaries were supreme—only a Dutch pastor could baptize, for instance. The credit for altering the situation belongs largely to H. Kraemer,* who after many study-tours (1926-35) recommended that the churches should be freed from foreign control and that missionaries "turn from chiefs into teachers of independence." In the following decade many churches (differentiated largely by ethnic, linguistic, and geographical factors rather than by theology) received independence: the Batak Church in 1930, the East Java Church in 1931, the National Protestant Church in 1935. Even after independence, however, most of the church finances originated from Europe. Similar progress was being made in other areas when the Japanese occupation in 1942 abruptly brought the period of tutelage to an end. With their missionaries in concentration camps, Indonesian Christians were compelled to take responsibility for their own church life.

Since independence, Indonesian Christians have lost the state protection they formerly enjoyed, but have shared the full religious liberty granted by the constitution. A great effort began to equip the whole church with Indonesian literature, with theological colleges, with a trained ministry, and an Indonesian pattern of life and worship.

The two distinctive features during this period have perhaps been the ecumenical movement and the mass turnings to Christianity. The Indonesian Council of Churches (DGI) was formed in 1951 and is supported by thirty-seven member bodies. It has always hoped to unite all the Christian bodies of the country, but this remains an ideal. In the twentieth century there has been a great deal of Anglo-Saxon missionary effort in Indonesia, and the churches which have resulted from this effort (including the majority of the Pentecostal groups) do not support the national council, largely because of their suspicions of the ecumenical movement as a whole.

Mass turnings have always been a feature of the Indonesian church scene. Recently, especially after the abortive Communist coup d'état in 1965, there has been a flood of "new converts" seeking to enter the Christian Church, particularly in North Sumatra, Central and East Java, and other places. There are good sociological explanations for this phenomenon, but in some areas, particularly the island of Timor, numerous miraculous events have been reported. Sadly, many of the existing churches were not prepared for an influx of converts seeking instruction. In some places little teaching was or could be given, and by 1970 the mass movements in many places had slowed down.

Apart from the mainstream of Indonesian Protestantism, Roman Catholicism has made steady progress since it was permitted by the Dutch government to enter Indonesia in the nineteenth century. Flores and N Timor in the Lesser Sunda Islands have become Catholic strongholds. With a membership of about two million, the Roman Catholic Church was granted an independent hierarchy in 1962 and has in recent years experienced the same rapid growth as the Protestant community.

The Chinese in Indonesia, too, have not gone unevangelized. The most notable events in their history were the visits of John Sung the evangelist, just before the Japanese war. He began a revival movement of which the effects can still be felt. There is a large Indonesian-Chinese community with its own churches, and several Chinese-language churches, mostly independent of each other.

Both Protestant and Catholic communities have their own political party, and individual Christians have held high office in the government. In a society subject to disintegrating pressures the Indonesian Church, still predominantly rural, is one of the factors making for national unity; although numbering only one-tenth of the total population, it is truly part of the life of the nation.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: In addition to general books on missions and an extensive literature in Dutch and German, volumes in English include the following: H. Kraemer, From Mission Field to Independent Church (1958); N. de Waard, Pioneer in Sumatra (1960); S. Houliston, Borneo Breakthrough (1963); D. Bentley-Taylor, The Weathercock's Reward (1967); F.L. Cooley, Indonesia: Church and Society (1968); R. Peterson, Storm over Borneo (1968); P. van Akkeren, Sri and Christ (1970); K. Koch, The Revival in Indonesia (1970); P.B. Pedeusen, Batak Blood and Protestant Soul (1970); [Christian name unknown], Christian Opportunity in Indonesia (1970); E.C. Smith, God's Miracles in Indonesian Church Growth (1970); J. Warneck, The Living Christ and Dying Heathenism (n.d.).

MARTIN B. DAINTON

INDRE MISSION. The popular name of the Kirkelig Forening for Indre Mission i Danmark (the Danish Church Home Mission Society), an evangelical movement within the Danish national church. It was formed in 1861 by some Pietistic clergymen and laymen from "the awakened circles." Toward the end of the nineteenth and the beginning of the twentieth centuries, the Mission spread as a dynamic revival movement all over Denmark; many clergymen joined it, numerous laymen were employed as colporteurs or lay-preachers, and gradually meeting-houses were built all over the country. Originally the Indre Mission was characterized by the preaching of a straightforward and simple message of doom and salvation, always stressing the necessity of conversion and sanctification, and drawing a sharp line between believers and unbelievers. In spite of their critical attitude to the national church, the Indre Mission people stayed within it, considering it their divinely given mission to function as its salt. Today the Mission has become a recognized and established party within the church, but at the same time it has lost much of its original zeal and spiritual power, and to some extent even drifted away from its original biblical and evangelical position. Nevertheless, it still exerts a stronger influence than any other movement upon Danish church life. N.O. RASMUSSEN

INDULGENCE, DECLARATIONS OF, see DECLARATIONS OF INDULGENCE

INDULGENCES. In the Roman Catholic Church this is the remission of all or part of the debt of temporal punishment owed to God due to sin after the guilt has been forgiven. This grant is based on the principle of vicarious satisfaction, which means that since the sinner is unable to do sufficient penance to expiate all his sins, he is able to draw on the spiritual treasury formed by the surplus merits of Christ, the Virgin Mary, and the saints. The authority for granting indulgences rests with the pope, although he may designate others (e.g., cardinals, bishops) to have this power, with the exception of indulgences for the dead.

Most indulgences granted by the pope are applicable to the souls in purgatory, Apostolic indulgences are those attached to religious articles (such as crucifixes, statues, medals, and rosaries), or to the performance of certain works on special feast days, or the recitation of certain holy names at the hour of death. Other indulgences may be gained by fulfilling the prescribed conditions and completing a designated act (usually the recitation of certain prayers) in the manner specified by the granting authority. To gain an indulgence it is necessary to be a member of the Catholic Church, in a state of grace, and to have the intention of gaining the indulgences. Other conditions, such as confession and Communion, may be required in some instances. A plenary indulgence remits the entire payment of punishment due up to the point when it is gained, while a partial indulgence remits only part of the punishment.

Although instances of forms of indulgences, such as commutations of penance and absolution grants, can be found in the early church, it was not until the eleventh century that indulgence grants appeared which relaxed penitential acts on the condition that contributions be made to a church or monastery. The practice of granting indulgences became more widespread with the advent of the Crusades, beginning with the First Crusade in 1095 when Urban II promised the remission of all penance to those who set out to liberate the Holy Land. Later this was extended to a plenary indulgence and came to include those who contributed to the support of the Crusades. The abuse of the granting of indulgences in return for financial support was considerable during the Middle Ages, and it eventually touched off the Protestant Reformation when Martin Luther attacked the doctrine itself in his "Ninety-five Theses."

BIBLIOGRAPHY: E.J. Ross (tr.), Indulgences as a Social Factor in the Middle Ages (1922); W. Herbst, Indulgences (1955); P.F. Palmer (ed.), Sacraments and Forgiveness, vol. 2 of Sources of Christian Theology (2 vols., 1955-60).

ROBERT G. CLOUSE

INFALLIBILITY. The Roman Catholic doctrine that ecumenical councils of bishops and the pope speaking ex cathedra are immune from error when teaching concerning faith and morals. The need for infallibility in the church has been argued in recent times from two standpoints. First, since the Holy Spirit indwells the church, it is to be expected that He will ensure that the shepherds of the flock will understand and teach aright the divine message of salvation. Second, since eternal punishment is threatened to those who disobey the Gospel (Mark 16:16), it is to be expected that God will provide a correct understanding of the Gospel in the world.

The infallibility of the pope was first defined by Vatican I* on the basis of such passages as Matthew 16:18; Luke 22:31; John 21:15—understood in the light of their interpretation in the West from early times. Cardinal Cullen composed the definition, making much use of Reginald Pole's De Summo Pontifice (1569). Infallibility is understood as a charisma, given by the Holy Spirit for the preserving and expounding of divine truth. The teaching of previous councils (Constantinople IV, Lyons, and Florence) is referred to as pointing to this conclusion. Vatican II* reaffirmed the doctrine of papal infallibility, but set it in a larger context. The charisma belongs to the pope insofar as he is the head of the college of bishops; when he speaks ex cathedra he has this authority in a special way (singulariter). The extent of the infallibility of bishops in council, and the pope pronouncing ex cathedra, is declared to be "as wide as the divine deposit of faith, which is to be kept as a sacred trust and faithfully expounded." Roman Catholic theologians also speak of the infallibility of the body of the faithful insofar as it maintains its faith and practice.

Protestants have always opposed this doctrine, arguing that only God and His Word are infallible.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: G. Salmon, The Infallibility of the Church (1888); T.G. Jalland, The Church and the Papacy (1944); B.C. Butler, The Church and Infallibility (1954); O. Rousseau, L'Infallibilité de l'Église (1962); O. Karrer, Peter and the Church (1963).

PETER TOON

INFANT BAPTISM, see BAPTISM

INFRALAPSARIANISM, see SUBLAPSARIANISM

INFUSION, see BAPTISM

INGE, WILLIAM RALPH (1860-1954). Dean of St. Paul's, London. Born in Yorkshire and educated at Eton and Cambridge, he taught at Eton and elsewhere (1884-88), lectured in Hertford College, Oxford (1889-1904), was vicar of All Saints', Knightsbridge (1904-7), and for four years thereafter was Lady Margaret professor of divinity at Cambridge. He went to St. Paul's in 1911 and held the post until 1934, despite differences with a theologically conservative and mainly Anglo-Catholic chapter. Of great ability and wide-ranging interests, Inge wrote on many subjects, including mysticism and especially Plotinus. He held that Platonic philosophy and Christianity belong together. For many years he contributed a column to a London daily, expressing himself frankly and not always cheerfully. Theologically he is regarded as a liberal, but he strongly opposed the Catholic modernists Tyrrell and Loisy, holding strongly to the importance of the historical in Christianity. P.W. PETTY

INGERSOLL, ROBERT GREEN (1833-1899). American politician and agnostic. Born in New York and educated in Illinois, he was admitted to the bar in 1854 and served in the Civil War from 1861 to 1863. His unsuccessful attempt in 1860 to become the Democratic candidate for Congress led him to change party tickets; as a Republican he was appointed attorney general (1867-69) for the state of Illinois. He moved his residence to Washington, D.C., in 1879 and to New York in 1885. Ingersoll received as much as $5,000 for some of his famous antireligious speeches. His main attacks were directed against the authority of the Bible and its alleged inaccuracies. He gave titles to his famous speeches: "The Gods," "Ghosts," "Skulls," and "Some Mistakes of Moses." Few have rivaled his eloquence. Some historians feel that his agnostic beliefs kept him from becoming the Republican nominee for the presidency. DONALD M. LAKE

INGLIS, CHARLES (1734-1816). First Anglican bishop of Nova Scotia. Born and educated in Ireland, he was ordained in 1758 in London before being sent as a Church of England missionary to Dover, Delaware. In 1765 he went to New York to become assistant to the rector of Trinity Church. The American Revolution disrupted his life, for his church was burnt, his congregation scattered, and his property confiscated. In 1783 he sailed with a group of Loyalists to Nova Scotia. Four years later he was consecrated the first bishop of Nova Scotia. A devoted churchman and an incessant traveler, he did much to organize the Anglican cause in his diocese. Because of failing health he retired to his farm near Annapolis in 1796, but remained active, being named to the Council of Nova Scotia in 1809.

ROBERT WILSON

INNER LIGHT, see FRIENDS, SOCIETY OF

INNERE MISSION. Proclaimed by J.H. Wichern* at a Kirchentag in 1848, this mission within Christendom aimed to show the love of Christ meeting practical human needs as the realization of the Kingdom of God. The central committee and local associations of the Innere Mission flourished despite considerable opposition in the church. They coordinated many already existing evangelistic and welfare activities in the church, and encouraged many fresh enterprises. Wichern saw all these as parts of the one mission of the church, and he looked for an Evangelical Volkskirche, a people's church, though he was conservative in church and politics, working with the Prussian government and hostile to socialism. Later some leaders of the Mission adopted a more radical socialist approach to winning the alienated working classes, but with little success. Meanwhile the many activities of the Mission continued up to the present as part of the German Evangelical Church's attempt to minister to human wholeness in the Spirit of Jesus.

HADDON WILLMER

INNOCENT I (d.417). Pope from 401. In him great talent, upright character, vigorous determination, and a high view of the papacy met at a time which, because of the rapid collapse of the Roman power, was ripe for the extension of papal influence. His thirty-six surviving letters reveal his relationships with other churches and are important because of the doctrinal positions of the church to which they point. He argued that the Western bishops had an obligation to follow the Roman Church because they belonged to churches formed through the agency of Peter. When he granted the African bishops' request to condemn Pelagius, he took the opportunity of asserting that nothing should be completed, even in the most distant provinces, "until it comes to the knowledge of this see." He was more restrained in his dealings with the East. He ensured that Illyricum remained under his jurisdiction even though it was partly in the East. When dealing with an appeal from John Chrysostom* for support, however, he first called for a council in the East, and only when this failed did he break off communion with Chrysostom's enemies. His secular influence also increased, especially after Alaric sacked Rome (410). C. PETER WILLIAMS

INNOCENT III (1160-1216). Pope from 1198. One of the greatest popes of the Middle Ages, Giovanni Lotario de' Conti was unanimously elected at the age of thirty-seven, following the death of Celestine III. A member of one of the noble families of Rome, he studied theology at Paris and canon law at Bologna and was made a cardinal deacon by Clement III (1190). Although not an outstanding cardinal, he did actively participate in Curial matters and wrote a book, On the Contempt of the World, an exhortation to asceticism and contemplation which became popular throughout Europe. He was able to marshal traditional ideas of the papacy and thus make it the pivot of W and E Europe. He had a keen intellect and knew exactly what had to be done for the Roman Church to dominate all human relationships. In addition to mastering the tasks of the Curia, he was also an able statesman and his dealings with European monarchs are evidence of his desire to be viewed as the supreme arbiter in all cases and the preserver of unity throughout Christendom.

Innocent began his reign by reorganizing the administration of Rome. He obtained the right to nominate the senator who ruled Rome and to receive an oath of fidelity from him. Following the collapse of German rule in Italy after the death of Emperor Henry VI, he was able to restore and expand the Papal States, thus strengthening the position of the papacy and preventing the unification of Italy. Under Innocent, the Fourth Crusade (1202-4) was launched, resulting in the formation of the Latin Empire of Constantinople. It failed, however, to unite the Eastern and Western churches. Also the great Fourth Lateran Council (1215) was summoned by Innocent. Some of the more important of its seventy decrees included the official approval of the term "transubstantiation," the suppression of heresy, the role of the church in secular justice, the necessity of paying the tithe, and several other actions which shaped church policy for centuries. The council also fixed 1217 as the year for a crusade against Islam.

Innocent was heavily involved in European politics. In the controversy over whether the Hohenstaufen, Philip of Swabia, or the Guelf, Otto of Brunswick, should become Holy Roman Emperor, he decided in favor of the purportedly pro-papacy Otto. But when Emperor Otto IV invaded Sicily, the pope excommunicated him and supported the election of his ward, Frederick II. In England, Innocent put the land under interdict and excommunicated King John for his refusal to allow the papal appointee to the archbishopric of Canterbury, Stephen Langton,* to enter the country. John submitted in 1213. Innocent also intervened in the matrimonial affairs of such monarchs as Peter II of Aragon, Alphonso IX of Léon, and Philip II of France.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: S.R. Packard, Europe and the Church under Innocent III (1927); L. Elliott-Binns, Innocent III (1931); C.E. Smith, Innocent III, Church Defender (1931); J. Clayton, Pope Innocent III and His Times (1941).

ROBERT G. CLOUSE

INNOCENT IV (c.1200-1254). Pope from 1243. Born of a family that produced another pope (Adrian V) and several cardinals, he was trained in canon and Roman law at Bologna where he also taught briefly. Confidant of Gregory IX and made cardinal (1227), he succeeded Celestine IV after an eighteen-month vacancy owing to the pressure of Emperor Frederick II. Innocent excommunicated him as had Gregory, and at the Council of Lyons* (1245) charged him with perjury and heresy. The intrigue between empire and papacy was alleviated with his death, but papal interference continued with his successors until an agreement was reached in 1254. Innocent's Commentaria on canon law speaks defensively to the many extreme worldly entanglements he initiated and inherited. C.G. THORNE, JR.

INNOCENT X (1574-1655). Pope from 1644. Born Giovanni Battista Pamfili, he rose rapidly as a papal advocate, auditor, and nuncio, became a cardinal in 1629, and was elected pope as the nominee of the Spanish party. He began his pontificate by trying to recover money purloined by the Barberini, the relatives of the late pope who had the support of Mazarin, while not neglecting to advance his own family. He waged a cruel war against Parma, promised considerable help for Venice against the Turks but sent little, encouraged Spain to revolt against Naples, and was at first hostile to the independence of Portugal. He protested strongly against the Peace of Westphalia* (1648) and issued a bull against it as a violation of the laws of the church. In 1653 he condemned five Propositions from Jansen's Augustinus. In his later years Innocent fell under the dominance of the arrogant Donna Olimpia Maidalchini, his brother's wife, who mulcted the papal treasury and contributed to the spread of corruption. IAN SELLERS

INNOCENT XI (1611-1689). Pope from 1676. Born Benedetto Odescalchi at Como, he was educated there at the Jesuit College, then gained the doctorate in civil and canon law from the University of Naples (1639). He was appointed apostolic protonotary by Urban VIII and became a powerful influence in the Curia because of his model Christian life. He was made cardinal in 1645 and cardinal legate to Ferrara in 1648. In 1650 he took holy orders and was consecrated bishop of Novara, distinguishing himself here as at Ferrara by charitable works. He returned to Rome in 1656, and he served in the Curia till his election as pope.

His pontificate is one of continuous reform, continuous struggle against vested interests, and concerted effort against the forces of Islam. Perhaps his most famous work was his defense of the traditional rights and freedoms of the church against the Gallicanism* of Louis XIV of France. He opposed Louis's use of the régale (right to use the revenues of a bishopric when vacant), of the franchise (right of ambassadors to the papal court to grant asylum to anyone in their compounds), of the Gallican Articles of 1682, and also Louis's effort to secure the archbishopric of Cologne for a pro-French candidate. Innocent eventually excommunicated Louis and firmly followed policies he felt were best for the church. He also decreed against laxity in moral theology, seeming to favor the Jansenists over the Jesuits, and he decreed against Quietism.* He was beatified in 1956.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: E. Michaud, Louis XIV et Innocent XI (4 vols., 1882-89); Epistolae, ad principles (2 vols., 1891-95); J. Orcibal, Louis XIV contre Innocent XI (1949).

BRIAN G. ARMSTRONG

INNOCENT XII (1615-1700). Pope from 1691. Born Antonio Pignatelli outside of Naples, he was educated at the Jesuit Roman College whence he entered the Roman Curia in 1635. He received several advancements under succeeding popes, especially under Innocent XI who created him cardinal in 1681, bishop of Faenza in 1682, and archbishop of Naples in 1687. He was elected pope as a compromise candidate in the Hapsburg-Bourbon struggle, and he patterned his pontificate after Innocent XI except that he sided with the Bourbons rather than the Austrian Hapsburgs. He proved to be a reformer of iron will as well as being successful in healing divisions within the church. He issued a bull against nepotism, abolished sinecures, established the Curia Innocenziana (lately known as the Camera dei Deputati) for the forceful and fair administration of justice, and instituted many charitable and educational works. He resolved the long-standing Gallican problem, condemned Quietism without alienating the great Fénelon,* quieted the Jansenist storm, and helped contribute to the War of the Spanish Succession by convincing Charles II of Spain to name Philip of Anjou as his successor.

BRIAN G. ARMSTRONG

INQUISITION, THE. A special tribunal established by the medieval church for the purpose of combating heresy. In the Middle Ages the growing threat of heretical groups, particularly the Cathari,* led to the acceptance by the church of the use of the secular authority, of physical penalties, and of an inquisitorial method as means for their suppression. Alexander III* at the Council of Tours (1163) urged secular princes to prosecute heretics, to imprison them, and to confiscate their property. He also directed the bishops to search out heretics, encouraging them to replace the older method of trial by accusation, which depended upon the initiative of an accuser, with the more vigorous and effective method of inquest in which the judge took the initiative.

It was Gregory IX,* however, who in a series of actions from 1231 to 1235 imposed on such activities a formal organization and set of procedures whereby the apprehension and trial of heretics was reserved to the church and the major responsibility for such work was given to papal inquisitors. He is therefore often credited with having established the Inquisition. In 1478 the Spanish Inquisition was authorized by Sixtus IV.* It followed procedures similar to those described below but was characterized by its subservience to the state, with its appointments officially made by the secular authority.

Dominicans and Franciscans were most often chosen as papal inquisitors. Assisted by numerous aides, the inquisitor would begin his work in a town by calling the clergy and people to a solemn assembly at which those who knew themselves to be guilty of heretical views were urged to confess within a period of grace frequently ranging between two and six weeks. Those who did so were normally given light penalties. At the expiration of this period the inquisitor began a systematic search for suspects who would be summoned before the tribunal for interrogation. The suspect, who was not allowed legal defense but could have a counselor, was encouraged to confess his errors, and toward this end Innocent IV in 1252 allowed the use of torture.

When confessions were not forthcoming, the testimony of two witnesses, if it could not be refuted, was considered sufficient for conviction. The practice of withholding from the accused the names of the witnesses was not modified until the time of Boniface VIII (1294-1303). Some safeguards were provided, however, for the accused, such as the opportunity to discredit as witnesses one's enemies, the punishment of false witnesses, and the various restrictions placed on the use of torture. Nevertheless, frequently the accused found himself in the position in which he was assumed to be guilty; his safest mode of escape was to confess, since by persistently asserting his innocence he ran the risk of being judged an obdurate heretic, for which the punishment was death. If he were so judged, he would be abandoned to the secular authority for burning, for the church did not participate officially in the shedding of blood. Milder punishments included imprisonment, confiscation of property, wearing a yellow cross, prayer, fasting, almsgiving, flagellation, and pilgrimage.

In the early modern period the Roman Inquisition, established by Paul III in 1542, was used to combat witchcraft and the Protestant Reformation. Some Protestants also were to be found employing inquisitorial procedures against those suspected of sorcery and incorrect doctrine. The increasing secularization of Western society, however, was accompanied by the decline of such activities by religious institutions. To modern minds the Inquisition rightly seems abhorrent, but to be fair one must recall the Zeitgeist in which it operated and remind oneself of the activities of modern institutions which also, but sometimes more subtly, suppress those who hold unorthodox views.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: H.C. Lea, A History of the Inquisition of the Middle Ages (3 vols., 1888); A.S. Tuberville, Medieval Heresy and the Inquisition (1920); H. Kamen, The Spanish Inquisition (1966).

T.L. UNDERWOOD

INSCRIPTIONS, CHRISTIAN. Understanding of the NT and early church has been revolutionized by the many written documents recovered from the past. The term "inscription" may be used in several senses: to describe any written document, including those written upon stone, clay, papyrus, or other material; to include all inscribed artifacts, except the parchment and papyri; or, more commonly, to refer to the larger monuments only. The excessively large number of artifacts makes study very complicated—e.g., more than 11,000 Christian inscriptions earlier than the seventh century have been found in Rome alone. Archaeologists usually limit the texts of significant value to the first seven centuries of the Christian era.

An inscription is said to be "Christian" if it bears evidence of the Christian faith. Many inscriptions were no doubt the work of the Christian community, yet bear no specific reference to the faith. Some Christian inscriptions are composed with correctness and some even with elegance, both in form and content; others, however, are written in barbarous style. Christian inscriptions often give few, if any, personal details: epitaphs, for example, usually give only name, age, and date of death. On the other hand, the total number of Christian inscriptions gives valid evidence about the nature and essence of a community of believers, and helps in an analysis of the expansion of the Christian faith. Occasionally an inscription has been found which records the building of a specific church or perhaps the death of an early Christian martyr. More rarely, archaeologists have unearthed inscriptions which relate to doctrine, but these are generally of little value when compared with the many more or less fully preserved literary sources.

Second-century inscriptions are fairly common, especially in the famous Roman catacombs. By the middle fourth century inscriptions were common in Rome, North Africa, and Asia Minor, although some of these are from heretical groups such as the Montanists or the Donatists. Most of these inscriptions are in either Latin or Greek, and most are original, although the texts of others survive only in copies. Dating the inscriptions is complicated, since many of the dates which the original inscriptions bear refer to consular years. Often the archaeologist must infer the date of the inscription from either the site where it was found, or from some kind of internal evidence such as content or style of writing.

See A. Parrot, Le Musée du Louvre et la Bible (1957), pp. 142-44; D.J. Wiseman, Illustrations from Biblical Archaeology (1958).

WATSON E. MILLS

INSPIRATION. By the term "inspiration" Christian theology designates a particular activity of the Spirit of God whereby specially chosen prophets and apostles spoke and wrote the veritable Word of the Living God. God's spiration, or breath, is associated in biblical theology with the primal divine gift of human life, with the regeneration of sinners, and with the production of sacred scripture. In view of God's agency in inspiration, historic Christianity distinguished the Bible from all other literature as a unique canon of written revelation.

Inspiration as a spiritual phenomenon is not common to all believers, but is divinely reserved for specially authorized and authoritative bearers of God's message. This does not, however, imply that the message transmitted by chosen prophets and apostles is a product of mechanical divine dictation. Inspiration neither suppresses the personalities of the writers, nor puts an end to their human fallibility. Although prophets and apostles remained fallible men who shared the culture of their times, God nonetheless revealed to them information beyond their natural resources, and what they taught as doctrine has its basis in the Holy Spirit as ultimate author of their message.

Nor is inspiration understandable biblically in terms of mantic ecstaticism. The obscure and sporadic pronouncements of mantic seers contrast with prophetic-apostolic declaration which is emphatically moral and centers in the historic redemptive purpose of God. Nor is scriptural inspiration to be confused with internal psychic excitement. The biblical view declares, not simply the writers, but their very writings to be inspired. The Apostle Paul in 2 Timothy 3:16 uses the term theopneustia, which not only emphasizes that God is the original author, but also affirms Scripture itself to be God-breathed.

Inspiration is nonetheless consistent with, and does not violate, the human personality of the prophets and apostles through whom God communicates the truth about Himself and His purposes. The modernist notion that men could not have told the truth about divine things unless they transcended their humanity—that is, ceased to be human—is self-refuting. Neo-Protestant theologians have long endeavored, within the Bible itself, to distinguish inspired from supposedly uninspired strata. But such efforts turn serious biblical study into a shambles. Without the reliability of Bible history, scriptural theology cannot be credited, since the two are intertwined. And the Bible view of creation and miracle (centrally Christ's incarnation and resurrection) has clear implications for nature as well as history. Scripture implies that the sacred writings are plenarily inspired. No theologian has adduced objective criteria for discriminating that which he presumes to be errant in Scripture from that which he contends to be trustworthy. If one assumes that the biblical writers are to be trusted only where their assertions can be presently validated, he distrusts the writers, finding them credible on grounds other than their supposed divine inspiration.

Karl Barth acknowledged the futility of the modernist attempt to divide Scripture into trustworthy Word of God and fallible word of man. He affirmed that none of Scripture is objectively Word of God, yet held that any of it can become Word of God through a personal divine confrontation. But this alternative forfeits the inspiredness of Scripture on which Scripture itself insists, and it obscures both the authority and truth of the Bible in its propositional form.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: B.B. Warfield, The Inspiration and Authority of the Bible (1948); R. Preus, The Inspiration of Scripture (1955); C.F.H. Henry (ed.), Revelation and the Bible (1958); K. Runia, Karl Barth's Doctrine of Holy Scripture (1962).

CARL F.H. HENRY

INSTANTIUS (late fourth century). Spanish bishop. A follower of Priscillian,* he may have been deposed by a synod at Saragossa in 380. When Idacius, bishop of Emerita, obtained a rescript from Gratian that he could use against them, Instantius and Salvianus (another bishop and follower of Priscillian) accompanied Priscillian, whom they had made bishop of Avila, to Italy to seek the aid of Damasus and Ambrose. Unsuccessful in this, they nevertheless gained the aid of Macedonius, the magister officiorum, who used his influence to obtain their protection. Gratian's assassination, however, brought another change of fortune. Priscillian and Instantius were summoned before a synod at Bordeaux in 385. Instantius was deposed. When they appeared before Maximus at Treves, Priscillian was put to death on a charge of witchcraft, and Instantius banished. He may be the author of eleven treatises attributed by G. Schepps to Priscillian and published from a Würzburg MS in 1886.

DAVID JOHN WILLIAMS

INSTITUTES, THE, see CALVIN; CALVINISM

INSTITUTIONAL CHURCH. Gymnasiums, libraries, handcraft centers, and medical services were all part of the work of an institutional church. A former president of Dartmouth, William J. Tucker, probably developed this description of a church that served the life of the whole man in the inner city each day of the week. Thomas Beecher, in the latter half of the nineteenth century, built the first full-fledged institutional church, in Elmira, New York, with facilities for social services as well as worship. In 1882 William S. Rainsford, with the financial help of his vestryman, J.P. Morgan, developed the Episcopal Church of St. George's on the East Side of New York City into an institutional church. Temple University in Philadelphia grew out of the night school for workers in Russell Conwell's Baptist Temple. Over 150 of these churches united under the leadership of Josiah Strong and William E. Dodge to form the Open and Institutional Church League, which helped to develop the Federal Council of Churches. Many churches as a result give attention to human need in all aspects of life.

EARLE E. CAIRNS

INTERDENOMINATIONAL FOREIGN MISSION ASSOCIATION. Composed of interdenominational faith missionary societies, this was founded in 1917 by seven societies to provide spiritual fellowship and cooperation. The organization has a conservative creedal statement, provides member societies with relevant information through IFMA News, helps churches to set up missionary programs, and promotes cooperation among evangelical missionaries who rely mainly on prayer and faith in money-raising. This organization in 1969 embraced forty-four societies sending out nearly 6,000 missionaries with an income of nearly $33 million.

INTERDICT. In ancient Roman law this was a negative command by the praetor forbidding certain actions. In the Roman Catholic Church it is a command which prohibits or denies to the faithful participation in certain sacred acts, even though they remain in communion with the church. An interdict may be directed toward two purposes: its general use is a censure to bring about a desired cessation of an act or condition, but it may also be used as a vindicative penalty to bring about atonement for an offense.

There are several types of interdict. A personal interdict affects the person against whom it is directed wherever he goes, while a local interdict is concerned only with a certain locality and does not affect any who leave the area. In a particular personal interdict, the recipient or recipients of the ban are explicitly named; but in a general personal interdict, all those in a certain group are affected. A particular local interdict is directed against one sacred place, and a general local interdict affects a larger area, such as a diocese, province, state, or nation. A bishop may impose an interdict on a particular parish or the people of a parish, but only the Apostolic See may impose interdicts affecting larger areas or groups. The sacred acts which are prohibited by an interdict include the celebration of the Mass, Benediction of the Blessed Sacrament, and burial rites. Exceptions to the prohibitions of the interdict are granted to the dying and on some of the greater feasts (e.g., Christmas and Easter).

Although the interdict was used in the early church in the sixth century, it was not part of ecclesiastical law until the eleventh, and was not completely institutionalized until later. It was a frequent weapon of the medieval papacy in dealing with obstinate monarchs, as in the case of Innocent III's* interdict on England when King John (1199-1216) refused to allow the papal appointee (Stephen Langton) to the archbishopric of Canterbury entry into the country. Theoretically the interdict is still applicable, but is no longer held to be an active instrument of the Roman Catholic Church.

ROBERT G. CLOUSE

INTERIM OF AUGSBURG, see AUGSBURG, INTERIM OF

INTERNATIONAL BIBLE READING ASSOCIATION. A movement to encourage personal Bible study. It was founded in 1882 by the National Sunday School Union under the inspiration of Charles Waters, a bank manager and a member of C.H. Spurgeon's congregation at the Metropolitan Tabernacle, who became the first secretary. It first issued a scheme of Bible readings related to the International Sunday School Lessons. In three years the membership rose to 100,000 and by 1900 reached nearly 750,000. Weekly comments were introduced in 1886, followed in 1887 by a monthly leaflet, "Hints on the Daily Readings." A badge was adopted in 1895.

The movement spread to Australia (1882), New Zealand and Canada (1883), the USA (1885), and many other countries. The first foreign language used was French (1884), followed soon by German and Swedish (1886). Members supported a Sunday school missionary to India, Dr. J.L. Phillips (1890), thus beginning the IBRA Missionary fund. Fuller daily Bible notes began in 1909, written by Dr. Alexander Smellie for 14 years, continued by his widow editing his material after his death until 1944. Other authors have since maintained these notes, and further Bible reading aids have developed for children, young people, and more advanced students. Expansion overseas has continued, both in association with missionary societies and independently, e.g., Nigeria (1971/2).

J.G.G. NORMAN

INTERNATIONAL BIBLE STUDENTS ASSOCIATION, see JEHOVAH'S WITNESSES

INTERNATIONAL CONGREGATIONAL COUNCIL. This was formed in London in 1891 for the purpose of obtaining greater cooperation among the Congregational churches over the world. The Congregational response to the emerging ecumenical movement of the latter part of the nineteenth century, it was designed not only to bring greater unity among Congregationalists, but also to bring Congregationalism into greater cooperation with other Protestant churches in the task of evangelism. It proved, however, to be a suitable vehicle for the promotion of the Social Gospel* and was increasingly used for this purpose by liberal theologians.

INTERNATIONAL COUNCIL OF CHRISTIAN CHURCHES. An interdenominational council of churches of strong fundamentalist beliefs characterized by militant opposition to the World Council of Churches, to Communism, and to defections from orthodox Christianity. The principal founder of the movement was Carl McIntire, an American Presbyterian minister who led also in the founding of the Bible Presbyterian Church, Faith Theological Seminary, Shelton College, and the American Council of Christian Churches.* The ICCC was founded at Amsterdam in 1948 and includes constituent bodies (national church groups), consultative bodies (local churches), and associated bodies (such as missionary societies and Bible leagues). In 1972 there were 155 "Bible believing Protestant denominations" in ICCC membership, most of them small. Throughout its history there have been some defections, usually stemming from disagreements with McIntire.

The missionary arm of the council is known as The Associated Missions (TAM). The ICCC operates also International Christian Relief, and its youth movement called International Christian Youth offers a separatist alternative to ecumenical programs. The ICCC holds regional and national council meetings yearly, and in 1973 held its eighth world congress in Cape May, New Jersey. The international headquarters is in Amsterdam; national offices are maintained in Africa, the Middle East, Latin America, the Far East, Canada, the USA, and Europe. The main organ of the movement is McIntire's Christian Beacon, a weekly publication from his headquarters in the Bible Presbyterian Church of Collingswood, New Jersey, of which he is pastor. McIntire is also widely known for his controversial "Twentieth Century Reformation Hour" radio broadcast.

ROBERT C. NEWMAN

INTERNATIONAL MISSIONARY COUNCIL. Founded at Lake Mohonk, New York, in 1921, the IMC was designed to be a council of councils. It was an outgrowth of the great World Missionary Conference at Edinburgh* in 1910, responding to the increasing desire for more cooperation among Protestant Christian missions. Its membership was restricted to regional cooperative agencies, such as the national missionary councils in Europe and America and the national Christian councils in what were considered the mission lands. The total membership ultimately included thirty-eight agencies. Mission boards or societies were not members, except as they were represented in these regional agencies.

The IMC was not an administrative, but a consultative and advisory body. Its chief function was to stimulate cooperation, arrange for joint conferences, make careful surveys or studies of the missionary enterprise, and recommend procedures. Its major conferences were those of Jerusalem (1928), Madras (1938), Whitby (1947), Willingen (1952), Ghana (1957), and New Delhi (1961). Its official organ became The International Review of Missions, which had started publication in 1912. It also published a number of missionary studies of permanent value. During World War II and until 1955, it assisted the "orphaned" missions whom the war had cut off from support from their homelands. At the Ghana assembly it created a theological education fund to assist theological schools overseas.

After the formation of the World Council of Churches* at Amsterdam in 1948, the IMC came under increasing pressure to become the missionary arm of that body. At the cost of losing a few of its members, in 1961 it took the final step at New Delhi of integration with the WCC as its Commission/Division of World Mission and Evangelism.

HAROLD R. COOK

INTER-VARSITY FELLOWSHIP. This movement was founded in 1927 to further the cooperation between evangelical Christian unions in the universities and colleges of Great Britain. Four Christian unions in the teaching hospitals had united in 1873 to form the Medical Prayer Union. The Cambridge Inter-Collegiate Christian Union began in 1877 and later became affiliated to the Student Christian Movement.* In 1910 the link was broken because of the broadening outlook of the SCM. In 1919 the first annual inter-varsity conference was organized to promote evangelical and missionary activity in the colleges; the growth of this work led to the formation of the IVF.

Typical of the aims of membership of a Christian union are "to present the claims of the Lord Jesus Christ to the members of the university; to unite those who desire to serve him; and to promote the work of Home and Foreign Missions." Groups are found also in polytechnics, colleges of education, and technical colleges. Missionary conferences are organized, and much is done among overseas students. On completing their studies, students are encouraged to join graduate fellowship groups which are located in many areas. Special interests are catered for by organizations such as the Christian Medical Fellowship and the Theological Students' Fellowship. A wide range of Christian literature is produced. The IVF is affiliated to the International Fellowship of Evangelical Students.

J.W. CHARLEY

INVESTITURE CONTROVERSY. This developed into a fifty-year struggle after Gregory VII* (pope from 1073) charged the Salian emperor Henry IV* of Germany with making ecclesiastical appointments through lay investiture, a practice condemned by Nicholas II in 1059. Henry claimed that an imperial divine right for a century had been withdrawn; he sought Gregory's dethronement. Excommunication followed; the imperial ecclesiastics feared for their own security and hesitated to support their king. Henry found himself isolated and sought reinstatement to the extent of humiliating himself before the pope at Canossa (1077). After the intervention of Matilda of Tuscany and the abbot Hugh of Cluny, Gregory heard Henry's plea and absolution ensued. But conniving and fighting followed as a result of earlier resentments: the two protagonists set up an antipope and an anti-king, but with no effect.

After Gregory died in 1085, Urban II turned instead to the crusade without German support: both sides wanted to save face. Paschal II renewed the struggle fruitlessly; the new leaders in Rome agreed with Gregory's aims, but not his means. The principle used to terminate the German investiture controversy (1103-7) was embodied in the Concordat of Worms (1122) and reasserted by the Second Lateran Council (1123), between Callistus II and Henry V: the emperor abandoned lay investiture with ring and staff, but could still demand homage of bishops and abbots in his domains before their ecclesiastical investiture. The German king did have the right of veto over ecclesiastical appointments. This struggle kept German churchmen from cultural advances while they attended to political affairs, and Germany fell behind in its intellectual leadership of W Europe. C.G. THORNE, JR.

IONA. A small Scottish island off the SW coast of Mull from which Columba,* who arrived there in 563, evangelized W Scotland and N England. His monastery became a famous ecclesiastical center, but was repeatedly ravaged by Norsemen. A Benedictine house was established on Iona in the early thirteenth century, but the buildings were pulled down at the Reformation in 1561. In 1900 the duke of Argyll gave the monastic ruins into the care of the Church of Scotland. The abbey church of St. Mary, dating from the twelfth century, has been restored and is now used in connection with the work and worship of the Iona Community.* Forty-six Scottish kings are said to have been buried on the island. Many ancient remains have been discovered, including a number of Celtic crosses. Iona forms part of a Church of Scotland parish which embraces also a section of Mull. J.D. DOUGLAS

IONA COMMUNITY. Founded by Scottish minister-baronet George MacLeod in 1938 on the island of Iona,* this imaginative experiment brought together ministers and laymen sharing the fellowship of work and worship. On the wall (where an extensive rebuilding project was planned) and in the abbey they would seek to carry out what they regarded as the task of the church: "to find a new community for men in the world today." Three obligations are involved in full membership of the Iona Community: ministers and craftsmen are expected to spend some time on the island, particularly during the initial stages of their membership; members accept a threefold rule concerned with prayer, Bible reading, and tithing; and they are expected to attend the monthly meetings on the mainland in winter and the annual regathering on Iona in June. There are thousands of associate members throughout the world. In 1951 the Iona Community was brought under Church of Scotland auspices; a special church committee reports annually to the general assembly on the Community's affairs.
J.D. DOUGLAS

IRELAND. Pre-Christian Ireland was a Celtic land of tribal institutions, Druidic influences, and pagan worship, especially of the oak, the ash, and the yew tree. The island had escaped the ravages and the benefits of Roman invasion. There were in Ireland Christians from an early age, such as Kieran of Cape Clear Island. Palladius* was sent in 431 to minister to the Irish who were believers in Christ; but the establishing and development of the Christian Church was largely the work of Patrick,* and the church he founded developed in isolation from the Western Church (see IRELAND, CHURCH OF). Its monasteries were the main centers, and its abbots exercised a wide influence in learning and art. Saints like Finnian of Clonard (d. c.589) and Comgall* of Bangor at home, and Columba* and Columbanus* abroad, made famous the name of the Irish Church.

This period of brilliance ended disastrously with the Danish invasions that ravaged the island for more than three centuries before their defeat by Brian Boru at Clontarf in 1014. But the land still disunited was poor soil for Christian progress, and the days were dark during Anglo-Norman invasions that began in 1170. Though the conquest by the Anglo-Normans was never complete, the pope's recognition of the sovereignty of Henry II in 1172 was the death knell of the independent Celtic Church,* and the dividing of the church into a majority section that accepted oversight from Rome and a minority section which was largely the church of the ruling classes and continued as the Church of Ireland.*

The policies of reformation for the Church of England adopted and enforced by Henry VIII were applied to Ireland with equal tactlessness and with the same disastrous results. In 1537 the king was declared to be head of the church in Ireland, and the submission to Roman authority was forbidden. The gap between native Irish and Anglo-Norman widened. Reformation was identified with English law, and the people were drawn to Roman supervision as never before. Indeed, Romanism and patriotism became almost synonymous from that time.

A new element was introduced in the early seventeenth century when English and Scottish settlers were planted in Ulster to replace the native Irish who had been hostile to the English rule, and to develop the land by their industry. For some years their religious life was directed by godly Anglican bishops like Ussher of Armagh, Echlin of Down, and Knox of Raphoe. But the Scots in particular looked to their homeland for ministers, and eminent preachers like Brice, Cunningham, Blair, and Livingstone served them well. The coming of a Scots army to Carrickfergus in 1642 to quell a bitter rebellion led to the organizing of a presbytery by the army chaplains, and from this there has grown the strong, virile Presbyterian Church in Ireland. This church submitted to a period of stern testing after the Restoration in 1660. It had been largely committed to the Scottish Covenants of 1638 and 1643. Following the Revolution Settlement of 1690, a small remnant adhered to the Scottish Covenants and still exists as the Reformed Presbyterian Church* of Ireland.

The Secession from the established church in Scotland had its effect in Ireland. For about a century the original Presbyterians, the synod of Ulster, and the Secession Synod worked side by side in Ireland, but a felicitous union in 1840 formed the general assembly of the Presbyterian Church in Ireland. The influence of Arianism affected Presbyterianism in Ireland. The synod of Ulster in 1721 by a large majority affirmed its belief in the essential deity of Christ, and called for a voluntary subscribing of the Westminster Confession of Faith.* The minority who were unwilling to subscribe subsequently became the synod of the Non-Subscribing Presbyterian Church.

Two other vital factors affected Christianity in Ireland. The first was the vigorous impact of the ministry of John Wesley.* He preached in many parts of Ireland, and while his influence was greatest where English settlers were most numerous, the cause he fostered has been permanently established throughout Ireland, Methodism today makes a big contribution to the spiritual, educational, and cultural life in both Northern Ireland and Eire. The second and very important factor was the revival of religion in 1859. There had been earlier evidences of the special working of the Holy Spirit, particularly among the Presbyterian settlers in County Antrim in 1625, but the 1859 revival was wider in its scope and deeper in its effects. Most of the branches of the Protestant Church received benefit from the movement.

The onward progress of Christianity in Ireland has been closely identified with its political life. The outstanding politicians in every age have been closely connected with some branch of the church. As a general rule, Roman Catholics have been nationalist and republican in their outlook, while the Protestant population has sought to maintain the link with Great Britain. This strong division in political sympathies has produced much bitterness and tension, but it has also led to a deeper involvement in political life by the churches.

Ireland has made a significant contribution to missionary work throughout the world. From the days of Columba in the sixth century until the present time, thousands of missionaries of every type of ecclesiastical attachment have taken the Gospel to many countries.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: J.S. Reid, History of the Presbyterian Church in Ireland (3 vols., 1833); J. Godkin, The Religious History of Ireland (1873); W.D. Killen, Ecclesiastical History of Ireland (1875); T. Olden, The Church of Ireland (1892); W.A. Phillips (ed.), A History of the Church of Ireland (3 vols., 1933-34); R.P. McDermott and D.A. Webb, Irish Protestantism Today and Tomorrow (1945); T.J. Johnston, J.L. Robinson, and R.W. Jackson, A History of the Church of Ireland (1953).

ADAM LOUGHRIDGE

IRELAND, CHURCH OF. This owes its origin to Patrick,* who was loyal to the church order of his times and particularly to the customs of the church in Gaul where he had been trained and ordained. The latter included a preference for the monastic system, which at first was concerned with the education of men and boys of high social rank and later developed a zeal for evangelism. In the century after Patrick's death, Brigid introduced a convent system at Kildare with a special concern for the poor.

The Church of Ireland retained her independence from the see of Rome, though surrendering her practice in favor of the Roman observance of Easter in 704. Roman influence was seen in the Irish Prayer Book at the end of the seventh century. Extreme sufferings were endured during the Viking invasions from 795 to 1014. Monasteries and churches were plundered and ruined, the people and their pastors were led captive or put to death, and standards of culture and of religion inevitably suffered. The defeat of the invaders brought quieter times, and in the twelfth century the constitution of the church was reformed.

The period from 1200 to 1500 saw the transfer of authority to English government, the building of some fine cathedrals, and the development of a distinctive spiritual character. The breach with Rome in the sixteenth century heralded a return to a measure of independence, and while the Reformation was inadequate in origin, the Irish Articles* were strongly Calvinistic, her bishops were commendable for their soundness and piety, and the founding of the university in Dublin in 1591 was a mark of progress.

The Church of Ireland bridged the gap between the people of the land and the ruling classes. She survived the tragedy of the 1641 rebellion, the pressures of Cromwell—and there was no gap in the succession of her bishops. The progress of the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries was steady, but the census of 1861 showed that the church had claim on only one-eighth of the total population. The Church of Ireland (disestablished in 1869-70) has made an outstanding contribution to culture and government and is well geared today for work especially in education and in the industrial areas of the country.

See IRELAND for bibliography.

ADAM LOUGHRIDGE

IRENAEUS (fl. c.175-c.195). Bishop of Lyons. Probably a native of Smyrna, where as a boy he listened to Polycarp,* he perhaps studied and taught at Rome before moving to Lyons. As presbyter in 177/8 he mediated in his church's behalf with Bishop Eleutherus of Rome over the Montanists.* On his return he succeeded Bishop Pothinus (who had died in the persecution of 177/8), probably without episcopal consecration. He represented an important link between East and West, corresponded widely, and protested against Pope Victor's excommunication of the Asian Quartodecimans.*

His diocese included also Vienne and possibly congregations further afield (he was Gaul's sole monarchical bishop) and involved him in speaking Gallic (Celtic). He encountered Gnostic activity and devoted five books to the Detection and Overthrow of Falsely-named Knowledge (Gnosis), usually called Against Heresies (Adversus Haereses), which are invaluable in recording Gnostic teachings, especially of the Valentinians. He drew on Gnostic works and earlier refutations, mostly lost, and was himself heavily used by later antiheretical writers. Irenaeus's Greek survives only in extensive extracts, but can be reasonably reconstituted from a close Latin translation produced before 421 (perhaps as early as about 200), an Armenian version of Books 4-5, and several Syriac fragments. His Demonstration of the Apostolic Preaching, rediscovered in an Armenian translation in 1904, is both catechesis and apologia, expounding Christian theology and christological proofs from OT prophecy.

Irenaeus almost belongs to the Apostolic Fathers. Through Polycarp he claimed contact with the apostolic generation and the traditions of the Elders, and in his time the Spirit still dispensed charismata and the bishop was still a presbyter. Yet his apostolic tradition, embodied in the Rule of Faith and transmitted by successions of teachers in churches of apostolic foundation, was a developed ecclesiastical tradition. The NT writings are paralleled with the OT as Scripture, and the four-gospel canon stoutly defended. Against Gnostic scriptures, traditions, and successions he erects the apostolic pillars of catholic orthodoxy. The unity of Father, Son, and Spirit in both creation and redemption (including the millennial resurrection of the flesh) is strongly emphasized, and in his key concept of "recapitulation" he develops Paul's Adam-Christ parallel (extending it to Eve-Mary) and views the Incarnation as the climactic summation of God's dealings with mankind in creation, education, and salvation, and the unification of the whole human race.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: J. Quasten, Patrology 1 (1950), pp. 287-313. Against Heresies: best complete edition to date, W.W. Harvey (2 vols., 1857). Extensive new ed. in progress in Sources Chrétiennes series (1952ff.). Demonstration: ETs by J.A. Robinson (1920) and J.P. Smith (1952).

Selected studies: F.M.R. Hitchcock, Irenaeus of Lugdunum, A Study of His Teaching (1914); J. Lawson, The Biblical Theology of St. Irenaeus (1948); G. Wingren, Man and the Incarnation: A Study in the Biblical Theology of Irenaeus (1959); A. Benoit, S. Irénée: Introduction à l'Étude de sa Théologie (1960); H. von Campenhausen, Fathers of the Greek Church (1963), Chap. 2; R.A. Norris, God and World in Early Christian Thought (1965), Chap. 3; J. Daniélou, Gospel Message and Hellenistic Culture (1973), pp. 144-53, 166-83, 221-34, 357-64, 398-408. D.F. WRIGHT

IRISH ARTICLES (1615). The Church of Ireland* had drawn up twelve short articles of religion in 1566. A convocation of the Irish Church held between 1613 and 1615, and moved by a spirit of independence, decided to prepare a set of articles that would reflect their particular beliefs. The new articles, 104 in number, were largely the work of James Ussher.* Though in general agreement with the Lambeth Articles of 1595, they reflected Ussher's Calvinism and the spirit of Puritanism which then prevailed in Trinity College, Dublin. They had also a Presbyterian flavor, for they made no reference to the prelatic orders of bishop, priest, and deacon. Their strong emphasis on predestination and reprobation was to many a stumbling block. Though approved by the convocation and ratified by the lord deputy in 1615, they were replaced twenty years later by the English Thirty-Nine Articles,* largely due to the efforts of Wentworth and John Bramhall, bishop of Derry. Though never used since then, they were never repealed. ADAM LOUGHRIDGE

IRONSIDE, HENRY ALLEN ("Harry") (1876-1951). Bible teacher and author. Born in Toronto, he moved to California in 1886. Although never ordained, he began preaching when fourteen years old. For a time a Salvation Army officer, he later joined the Plymouth Brethren (1896). For over fifty years he traveled widely as a home missionary, evangelist, and Bible teacher. After 1924 he held meetings under the auspices of Moody Bible Institute, was visiting professor at Dallas Theological Seminary (1925-43), pastor of Moody Memorial Church, Chicago (1930-48), and author of over sixty books and pamphlets, mostly biblical and popular, including Things Seen and Heard in Bible Lands (1936), In the Heavenlies (1937), Lamp of Prophecy (1939), The Way of Peace (1940), and The Great Parenthesis (1943). He died on a preaching tour in New Zealand.

ALBERT H. FREUNDT, JR.

IRVING, EDWARD (1792-1834). Scottish minister. Born at Annan, he graduated in arts from Edinburgh, where he also studied divinity, taught school at Haddington and Kirkcaldy (1810-19), then became assistant to Thomas Chalmers* at St. John's, Glasgow. In 1822 he went to the Caledonian Chapel, London, which proved so inadequate for the hundreds who wanted to hear him that a new church was built in Regent Square in 1827. Many famous people were among his listeners, entranced by one who so eloquently attacked the spirit of the age and the callous indifference of the rich to the poor man at his gate and in his factories.

Irving's friends included Carlyle, Coleridge, and Henry Drummond. Gradually, however, the novelty wore off, and Irving found it difficult to settle to the ordinary pastoral round. Unbalanced emphases crept into his preaching, and many were alienated by his treatment of prophecy, eschatology, his high view of the sacraments, and his encouragement of speaking in tongues during public worship. A sad process of deterioration set in, and latterly he inveighed against political reform, Catholic emancipation, and the University of London ("the synagogue of Satan"). Predictably there was a split in his congregation. Six hundred followers went with him into the wilderness and a succession of temporary meeting-houses. Many of these erstwhile Presbyterians were to join the Catholic Apostolic Church,* the founding of which is often wrongly attributed to Irving.

His writings include For the Oracles of God (1823) (The Times published daily extracts), The Doctrine of the Incarnation Opened (1828), and The Orthodox and Catholic Doctrine of Our Lord's Human Nature (1830). The latter particularly led to his arraignment before the London presbytery, charged with holding the sinfulness of Christ's humanity. Though he claimed his words had been misunderstood, he was excommunicated, and in 1833 deposed from the Church of Scotland ministry by the presbytery of Annan. He became an itinerant preacher, was given (and humbly accepted) the modest position of deacon in the emerging Catholic Apostolic Church, died in Glasgow, and was buried in the cathedral there.

See A.L. Drummond, Edward Irving and His Circle (1937), and H.C. Whitley, Blinded Eagle (1955). J.D. DOUGLAS

ISAAC, HEINRICH (c.1450-1517). Musical composer. He was one of the most voluminous and versatile of the Netherlandish composers who helped to create the Renaissance style during the later fifteenth century. He was active in Germany and Austria as well as in Italy, where he died. He created a gigantic cycle of polyphonic compositions for the Proper of the Mass for the whole church year; commissioned for the diocese of Constance, it is known as the Choralis constantinus. This monumental work was published in the middle of the sixteenth century, showing the continuing esteem in which his work was held. Among his Masses is the attractive Missa carminum, based entirely on secular songs adapted to the traditional sacred text. One of these tunes, his own "Innsbruck," was later adopted as a Lutheran chorale and is among those included by Bach in his St. Matthew Passion.

J.B. MAC MILLAN

ISAAC THE GREAT (c.350-440). Armenian patriarch (catholicos). Son of Nerses, the sixth catholicos of the Armenian Church,* Isaac received a good education at Constantinople. He married, but after the death of his young wife he became a monk. In 390 he became the tenth catholicos and negotiated the severance of the Armenian Church from submission to the see of Caesarea in Cappadocia. He also encouraged the creation of an Armenian literature, including the translation of the Bible and theological works; he himself helped with the latter. Some hymns are attributed to him. His name is highly venerated in the Armenian Church, and two days in the church calendar are set aside for remembrance of him.

PETER TOON

ISAAC OF NINEVEH (d. c.700). Nestorian* bishop of Nineveh; sometimes called "Isaac Syrus." Originally a monk in Kurdistan, he was made bishop by the patriarch George, but after only about five months in the episcopate he retired to a monastery at Rabban Shapur. During his later life he was suspected of departing from Nestorian tenets. Although he wrote in Syriac, many of his extensive writings (mostly on asceticism and related topics) were translated into Greek, Arabic, and Ethiopic. The Greek translation was undertaken by two monks, Patricius and Abraham, of the monastery of Mar Saba, near Jerusalem. Part of this was eventually published at Leipzig in 1870 by Nicephorus Theotokios. Most of the Syriac text remains unpublished, but there are Latin versions in J.P. Migne, Patrologia Graeca, LXXXVI (1) pp. 811-86. PETER TOON

ISABELLA OF CASTILE (1451-1504). Daughter of John II of Castile, she married Ferdinand of Aragon in 1469. On the death of her half-brother Henry IV in 1474, she ascended the Castilian throne, and in 1479 Ferdinand became king of Aragon (see FERDINAND V). The result was a union, not of countries, but of crowns—whose bearers came to be known as the "Catholic Sovereigns." Isabella was successful in increasing royal power at the expense of the independence of the nobles, the towns, and the church. She developed a regular army and played a personal role in its successful campaign to recapture Granada (1492). She was the friend of exploration and learning, and the enemy of heretics and infidels, supporting the endeavors of Columbus and the universities while instigating the work of the Spanish Inquisition (1478) and developing the policy for the expulsion of Jews (1492) and Muslims (1502). Isabella's five children included Joanna "the Mad," who gave birth to the future emperor Charles V, and Catherine who married Henry VIII.

T.L. UNDERWOOD

ISHO'DAD OF MERV (ninth century). Nestorian* bishop of Hedatta on the Tigris. Facts concerning his life have been gathered largely from Arab sources. At one point he was considered as a candidate for a patriarchal see. His fame rests on his commentaries, which were written in Syriac and which demonstrate unusually rich acquaintance with earlier exegetical writings. Because of his attempt to reconcile in his own work the allegorical method of exposition current among Monophysites with the more scientific approach espoused by Theodore of Mopsuestia and the Nestorians, he ranks as a key figure for understanding biblical exposition in Eastern Christianity.

ISHU'-YAB III (before 600-658). Patriarch of the East from 650. Son of a Persian Christian, he was a monk at Bait Abe in N Mesopotamia, then became bishop of Nineveh before 627, and metropolitan of Arbil about 637. He fled from his diocese during the Byzantine invasion of 627, was sent as a member of a peace embassy to Constantinople in 630, and on his way back stole some relics from a church in Antioch. He vigorously opposed the teachings of Sadhona of Ariwan. After appointment as patriarch he set up a monastic school, and encouraged high standards of singing. By this time the Arabs were masters of Mesopotamia. His long-winded, rhetorical letters are important first-hand evidence for the history of the time. He succeeded, probably with Muslim help, in bringing Shim'un, metropolitan of Fars, into obedience, but not before the latter had lost the Christians of Oman to the Muslims. Ishu'-Yab probably created four new metropolitan provinces—Samarqand, China, India, and Qatar. He had a high, mechanical view of apostolic succession; his views on schism were similar to those of Cyprian of Carthage.* WILLIAM G. YOUNG

ISIDORE OF PELUSIUM (c.360-c.440). Ascetic and theologian. Born probably at Alexandria where he received a systematic theological education, he was for forty years abbot of a monastery near Pelusium on the eastern estuary of the Nile. He took part in fifth-century controversies, supporting the memory of Chrysostom, whose exegesis he followed, and warning Cyril of Alexandria to be moderate in his dealings with Nestorius. He also seems to have opposed Eutyches.* Isidore left some 2,000 letters which contain much of doctrinal, exegetical, and moral interest. He followed Athanasius in Christology and appears to have anticipated the terminology of the Council of Chalcedon. He held that the Holy Spirit was consubstantial with the Father and the Son. He defined the church as "the assembly of saints knit together by correct faith and excellent manner of life," adding that it should abound in spiritual gifts. J.G.G. NORMAN

ISIDORE OF SEVILLE (c.560-636). Archbishop of Seville and encyclopedist. His parents fled to Seville from Cartagena when the city was destroyed by Arian Goths. He was born in Seville and educated in a monastery primarily by his elder brother, Leander, who became archbishop of Seville. From his earliest years he showed great aptitude in learning, and his studies covered virtually all areas of contemporary knowledge. About 600 he became archbishop and as such founded schools, laid plans for the conversion of the Jews, and also presided over church councils —e.g., at Seville (619) and Toledo (633).

Without any doubt his chief importance lies in his writings. His Sententiarum libri tres was the first manual of Christian doctrine in the Latin Church: the first book dealt with dogma, the second and third with ethics. The Etymologiarum sive originum libri viginti was an encyclopedia in twenty books distilling all the knowledge of his time in all fields; by means of it he virtually became "the schoolmaster of the Middle Ages." Topics covered included grammar, rhetoric, mathematics, music, jurisprudence, history, theology, heresies, geography, geology, clothing, agriculture, and anthropology. Many of his earlier writings were used in this massive work. On the Bible he wrote a general introduction, Prooemiorum liber unus; biographical sketches of biblical characters, De vita et morte sanctorum utriusque Testamenti; and an allegorical interpretation of the OT, Quaestium in Vetus Testamentum libri duo. His Historia de Regibus Gothorum, Vandalorum et Suevorum is the principal source for the history of the Visigoths.

He died at Seville and became the national hero of the Spanish Church. He was canonized in 1598 and formally accepted as a "Doctor of the Church" in 1722.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: His works are in J.P. Migne, PL LXXXI-LXXXIV. For a modern edition of his Etymologiae see the two-volume edition by W.M. Lindsay (1911). For his life and work see E. Bréhaut, An Encyclopaedist of the Dark Ages (1912), and P. Séjourne, Le Dernier Père de l'Église, Saint Isidore de Séville (1929); J. Fontaine, Isidore de Séville et la Culture Classique (2 vols., 1959).
PETER TOON

ISLAM (Arabic = "obedience": one who is "obedient" is a Muslim). The youngest of the world's great religions, founded in Arabia by Muhammad (c.570-632). It contains material drawn from both Judaism and Christianity, but regards Muhammad as the final revealer of the unity and the will of God (Allah). The basic confession of Islam ("There is no god but Allah, and Muhammad is his prophet") is simple, but the implication is total obedience, as the name Islam indicates.

Muhammad was active in two Arabian cities: Medina and Mecca, the latter of which is the holy city of Islam. It was there he received the revelation of the *Qur'an (Koran), and it is to Mecca that every Muslim is expected to make a pilgrimage at least once in his life. Within a century of Muhammad's death the influence of Islam had been extended from Spain in the west to India in the east, and this process of expansion continued for several centuries. Today expansion by conquest has ceased, but Muslim missionary activity is intensive in Africa south of the Sahara, and increasingly in the West. Centers of Muslim influence are still in North Africa and the E Mediterranean, Asia Minor, Iran, Pakistan, Malaysia, and Indonesia.

The doctrinal history of Islam is complex. The main historical division is between Sunnite (from sunna, "accepted practice") and Shi'ite (from shi'a, "party") groups, which disagreed over the leadership question. Sufism is the main Islamic form of mysticism. But theological distinctions are slight: accepted by all are such points of doctrine as monotheism, the prophetic office of Muhammad, and the infallibility of the Qur'an. Worship is closely regulated. Five times a day the faithful should pray—if possible in a mosque, but if not, on a prayer-mat—and always in the direction of Mecca. On Fridays special services are held, and during the month of Ramadan fasting takes place between sunrise and sunset. Islam forbids the making of images, and the ornamentation of the mosque is restricted to patterns and elaborately carved texts from the Qur'an.

Since Islam is post-Christian, maintains its own finality as a divine revelation, and holds Jesus to have been a forerunner of Muhammad, relations between Christianity and Islam have always been strained, and Islam has always been passionately resistant to the Christian message. So far there has been practically no accommodation on either side: proclamation has been met with counter-proclamation, and in Muslim countries (theocracies) the Christian Church has as a rule a minority position and little direct influence.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Encyclopaedia of Islam (1913-38; new ed. in progress); T. Andrae, Die Person Muhammeds in Lehre und Glauben seiner Gemeinde (1917); W.M. Watt, Muhammad at Mecca (1952), and Muhammad at Medina (1955); J.W. Sweetman, Islam and Christian Theology (1945-55); K. Cragg, The Call of the Minaret (1956) and Sandals at the Mosque (1959); W.C. Smith, Islam in Modern History (1957).
E.J. SHARPE

ISSY, ARTICLES OF (1695). These thirty-four articles issued at Issy near Paris were the result of an ecclesiastical investigation of the works of Madame Guyon* in 1694-95. She chose three bishops to sit in judgment on her doctrine, and their verdict (the Articles) condemned for Quietism*: e.g., indifference to one's own salvation or past sins, desire to suppress explicit acts of faith, secret mystical doctrine, or any claim that extraordinary states of prayer are the only way to perfection. The Articles were a compromise; she signed them herself, retracting her Quietism, as did Archbishop Fénelon* of Cambrai. Consequently Bishop Bossuet* of Meaux, who had been one of her judges, was determined to remove any traces of her influence, while Fénelon wanted her principles to stand. Sympathetically he published forty-five articles (1697) on true and false mysticism which Bossuet attacked and the Holy See condemned. C.G. THORNE, JR.

ITALY, see PAPAL STATES, RISORGIMENTO

IVO OF CHARTRES (1040-1116) Bishop of Chartres. A great canonist, he had studied first at Paris and then at Bec under Lanfranc.* In 1090, having become a celebrated teacher, he was appointed to the see of Chartres which was already famous for its school. As bishop he showed courage in opposing Philip I's proposals to desert his wife and remarry. As a result he was imprisoned in 1092. He was a moderate in his involvement in the Investiture Controversy,* suggesting that a king could not grant the spiritual office but might bestow the temporalities. In this solution he prefigured the Concordat of Worms (1122). Of his works, Panormia (seventeen books) and the Decretum (eight books) are of greatest significance. In these he brought together ecclesiastical rules from a wide background in an orderly collection, suggested ways of discovering underlying unity in the face of apparent incompatibility between authorities, and also provided good patristic documentation. In so doing he paved the way for the synthesis of the canons which Gratian was to complete, provided theological texts for many later theologians, and by his technique inspired Abelard's* Sic et Non. Under his guidance Chartres flourished, as a school both of theology and of canon law. Ivo's surviving 288 letters provide a good insight into the political and religious life of the period. C. PETER WILLIAMS

J

JABLONSKI, DANIEL ERNST (1660-1741). Theologian, hebraist, and bishop of the Unitas Fratrum. Born at Nassenhuben, near Danzig, he studied at Frankfurt-an-der-Oder and Oxford. On the death of his father Petrus Figulus Jablonski (1670), he was chosen to succeed his maternal grandfather Comenius* as leader of the Unitas Fratrum, and he was consecrated bishop in 1699. He was appointed preacher at Magdeburg (1683), head of the United Brethren College at Lissa (1686-91), court preacher at Königsberg (1691) and Berlin (1693). When the revived Moravian Brethren sought an episcopal link with the older Brethren Church, Jablonski, assisted by Christian Sitkovius, bishop of the Polish Brethren, consecrated David Nitschmann as bishop, in Berlin (1735). He worked for the union of Lutherans and Calvinists and later sought to reform the church of Prussia by introducing the episcopate and liturgy of the Church of England. He was one of the founders of the Berlin Academy of Science, and its president in 1733. J.G.G. NORMAN

JACKSON, FREDERICK JOHN FOAKES (1855-1941). Anglican theologian. Educated at Trinity College, Cambridge, he was chaplain and lecturer (1882-95) and then dean (1895-1916) at Jesus College. In 1916 he became Briggs graduate professor at Union Theological Seminary of New York, a position held until 1934. He wrote numerous books, primarily in the area of church history, including History of the Christian Church (1891), Christian Difficulties in the Second and Twentieth Centuries (Hulsean Lectures, 1903), English Society, 1750-1850 (1916), Studies in the Life of the Early Church (1924), Eusebius (1933), and many others. He edited The Parting of the Roads (1911), a collection of essays of some of his former pupils at Jesus, and The Beginnings of Christianity: Part I: The Acts of the Apostles (5 vols., 1919-33) with Kirsopp Lake. W. WARD GASQUE

JACKSON, SAMUEL MACAULEY (1851-1912). American Presbyterian church historian, educator, and philanthropist. Educated at College of the City of New York, Princeton and Union seminaries, and the universities of Leipzig and Berlin, he engaged in pastoral work from 1876 to 1880 and thereafter devoted much time and money to philanthropic causes. From 1895 to 1912 he taught church history at New York University for which he refused any salary. He published widely in that field, and from 1908 edited the New Schaff-Herzog Encyclopaedia of Religious Knowledge. He produced several volumes on Zwingli, including Hulderich Zwingli, the Reformer of German Switzerland (1901). ROBERT C. NEWMAN

JACKSON, SHELDON (1834-1909). Presbyterian missionary to the West and Alaska. Born in New York State, he earned his degrees at Union College and Princeton Seminary, afterward serving Presbyterian churches in Minnesota (1859-69). He was then put in charge of his church's western missions (1870-82) and there pioneered the use of prefabricated church buildings. After two years in New York he supervised Alaskan Presbyterian missions from 1884 until 1907. He set up a public school system in Alaska for the government, and in 1892 introduced reindeer into mainland Alaska to help the natives. When elected moderator of his denomination in 1897 he was described as a man who was "by inside measurement a giant." EARLE E. CAIRNS

JACOB BARADAEUS (d.578). The Monophysite bishop from whom Jacobites* take their name. Born at Tella, east of Edessa, he was educated at the monastery of Phasilta near Nisibis. Then, after a visit to Constantinople to plead the cause of Monophysitism* with the sympathetic Theodora, he stayed in the city as a monk. About 542 he was consecrated bishop of Edessa. The nickname "Baradai" was given him because, in order to avoid arrest by the imperial forces he traveled around "clad in rags" (baradai). For nearly forty years he moved from place to place in the area from the Nile to the Euphrates, but especially in Syria. He preached, established monasteries, ordained clergy, consecrated bishops, and even created patriarchs. He died in the monastery of Cassianus. A Syriac Life of Jacob has been preserved and was edited by J.P.N. Land in Anecdota Syriaca, vol. II (1875). PETER TOON

JACOBINS. A name originally applied to French Dominicans whose first house in Paris was under the patronage of St. James and was located on Rue St. Jacques. As an intellectual center of the order it attracted many students, who undoubtedly promoted the term's popularization. When the radical Society of Friends of the Constitution began using these Dominican facilities early during the French Revolution, her members soon found the old term applied to them.

JACOBITES. The Monophysites* of Syria who rejected the doctrine of the two natures in Christ and who have been traditionally named after Jacob Baradaeus.* After the Council of Chalcedon (451) the Syrian patriarch withdrew his church from communion with other Eastern churches because he did not accept the christological doctrine set forth by the council. Often persecuted, this Monophysite church experienced strengthening through the labors of Jacob Baradaeus and his supporters. Also, Empress Theodora treated it sympathetically during the mid-sixth century. It was at the Second Council of Nicea (787) that it was described as "Jacobite" in the anathemas against the Monophysite doctrine.

Though suffering numerical losses through the Muslim conquests and through internal schisms and losses to the Roman Catholic Church in the seventeenth century, the Jacobite Church still exists, but with a small membership. Its patriarch, while taking his title from Antioch, lives elsewhere. The bread for the Eucharist is made of leavened dough mixed with salt and oil; in the liturgy to the trisagion is added the words "who was crucified on your account"; and the sign of the cross is made with one finger (perhaps to emphasize the doctrine of the one nature of Christ). Among the theologians of the Jacobites are reckoned Isaac of Antioch, Jacob of Edessa,* and Jacob of Sarug.*

See D. Attwater, The Dissident Eastern Churches (1937). PETER TOON

JACOB OF EDESSA (c.640-708). Jacobite* scholar. Born near Antioch, he was elected bishop of Edessa in 684, but soon yielded his position to spend most of his time in monasteries. His presence often led to open hostility, especially at the monastery in Tell 'Addā. He was one of the most important writers of the Monophysite Church in W Syria; Greek theology influenced the area through him. His works included Syriac homilies in verse and prose, liturgies, commentaries on the OT and NT, and a chronicle that took up where Eusebius left off. Guided by Greek and Syriac versions, he revised the Peshitta OT. Among the Greek writers he translated into Syriac was Severus of Antioch. He wrote the earliest known Syriac Grammar, and introduced the use of Greek letters for Syriac vowels. JOHN GROH

JACOB OF NISIBIS (fourth century). Jacob (or James), a solitary ascetic, was made bishop of Nisibis by popular acclaim. A confessor in the persecution of Maximus, he later took a leading part at the Council of Nicea and was classed favorably by Athanasius with Hosius of Cordova and Alexander of Alexandria. Apparently he subscribed to the decrees of the Dedication Council of Antioch (341). He baptized and befriended Ephraem the Syrian,* with whom tradition sometimes confused him. Theodoret and Gennadius record legends of his austerity and wonder-working. Nicknamed "the Moses of Mesopotamia," he organized a week of public prayer which was answered by the death of Arius, and he so defended Nisibis against the Persian Sapor II in 338, 346, and 350 that after he died, his bones were treated as guarantees of civic protection. Christians removed them when Nisibis fell in 363. The Chronicle of Edessa dates his death in 338, but the legendary defense of Nisibis in 350 rules this out. Modern scholars reject the claim that eighteen tracts discovered in Venice and published by Antonelli in 1756 are part of twenty-six Syriac treatises on faith and practice attributed to Jacob by Gennadius. The Roman, Syrian, Greek, Mennonite, and Coptic churches commemorate him. G.T.D. ANGEL

JACOB OF SARUG (451-521). Bishop of Batnae and Syriac theological writer. Born at Kurtnam on the Euphrates and educated at Edessa (now Urfa), the center of Syriac theology and Bible translation, he became a presbyter. During Persian dominance of his country he achieved fame for his care of his people. In 519 he became bishop of Batnae, the main town of Sarug in Osrhoene, but died two years later. He wrote many letters, sermons, funeral orations, hymns, and edifying biographies. He also translated the six Centuria of Evagrius Ponticus. Perhaps his principal work was a long series of metrical homilies (3,300 lines, for example, on the Passion of Christ). Several other works, such as liturgies, were ascribed to him. Some scholars regard him as a Monophysite, but he was considered orthodox by his contemporaries. Many of his writings remain unpublished. PETER TOON

JACOPONE DA TODI (c.1230-1306). Franciscan monk and poet. Born into nobility, he studied law at Bologna and became a wealthy lawyer in his hometown. After the tragic death of his wife, he experienced spiritual conversion and repentance, donated his wealth to the poor, and became a lay brother. He supported the "Spirituals," with the cardinals Peter and Jacob Colonna and Angelo Clareno, in their opposition to papal opulence and political machinations. Boniface VIII excommunicated and imprisoned him in 1298. He was released in 1303. Jacopone is the mystic who gave to Italian poetry its sharpest notes of religious experience. His two great works are the hymns Laude ("hymns of praise") and Stabat mater dolorosa ("the sorrowing mother stood"). He has long been called "blessed" in Todi, but the Congregation of Sacred Rites refuses to consider his beatification, probably due to his sarcastic treatment of Boniface VIII in Laude. ROYAL L. PECK

JAMES. Apostle, son of Zebedee, sometimes known as "James the Great." This James was the brother of the Apostle John. He was called from his occupation as a fisherman to become one of the twelve apostles (Mark 1:19,20). It is possible that their mother, Salome, was a sister of Mary and that James was therefore a cousin of Jesus (cf. Matt. 27:56; Mark 15:40; John 19:25). As he is normally mentioned first, he was probably older than his brother. In the lists of the apostles their names are associated with Peter and Andrew. Mark records that Jesus gave the brothers the nickname "Boanerges" ("Sons of Thunder," Mark 3:17). Luke records their asking Jesus whether they should call down fire on a Samaritan village (Luke 9:51-56). Mark states that they themselves, and Matthew that their mother, asked that they be given places at the right and left hand of Jesus in His glory. The two brothers are associated with Peter in a sort of inner circle of Jesus' disciples at the home of Jairus (Mark 5:37, etc.), on the Mount of Transfiguration (Mark 9:2, etc), and in the Garden of Gethsemane (Mark 14:33, etc.). James is the only one of the apostles (apart from Judas) whose death is recorded in the NT. He was martyred by Herod Agrippa in A.D. 44 (Acts 12:1,2). There was apparently no attempt to replace him.

R.E. NIXON

JAMES. Apostle, son of Alphaeus. The name comes from the Greek Jacobos which renders the Hebrew Jacob, and it was a common one. He heads the third group of four disciples in each list of the twelve. His name is not found elsewhere in connection with any incident during or after the ministry of Christ. As Levi is said to be the "son of Alphaeus" (Mark 2:14), it has been suggested that James and Levi were brothers, but there is nothing else to link them together. It is not clear whether James, son of Alphaeus, is the same as "the younger James," or the "the smaller James" (AV "James the less") of Mark 15:40. Some have tried, implausibly, to identify him with James the brother of Jesus, thus giving the latter a place among the twelve. R.E. NIXON

JAMES II (of England) and VII (of Scotland) (1633-1701). King of Great Britain, 1685-88. Coming to the throne because his brother Charles II was officially childless, James was a Roman Catholic who had been abroad for many years. He might have been passed over in favor of his daughters Mary and Anne, especially as Mary's husband, William of Orange, had strong claims in his own right. Respect for monarchy was strong, however, and James would have retained his position had he not pushed Catholic policies and ensured a Catholic succession. Though Parliament initially gave tangible sign of its goodwill and support, James overreacted to uprisings in his kingdom, alienated Parliament and influential Anglicans, and appointed his coreligionists to high office. As a political expedient he eventually courted the Nonconformists, but he failed to win them or to allay Anglican fears. In Scotland he intensified the persecution of the Covenanters.* The birth of a son in June 1688 precipitated the issue. William of Orange was ready, and the country ready to receive him. James fled and heard Mass in France as his people celebrated a Protestant Christmas.

See F.C. Turner, James II (1948), and J.P. Kenyon, The Stuarts (1958). P.W. PETTY

JAMES VI (of Scotland) and I (of England) (1566-1625). King of Scots from 1567, his descent from Henry VII made him the nearest heir when Queen Elizabeth of England died in 1603. Although he assumed the title James I of Great Britain, the kingdoms were not united until 1707.

Son of Mary, Queen of Scots* and Lord Darnley, he was proclaimed king by the nobles who forced his mother's abdication and placed him under the tutorship of George Buchanan.* Four regents followed in quick succession, and even after James' coming of age in 1578 rival groups made bids for power by seizing his person. With this background James was determined to become a "universal king"—king of the whole nation and beyond the power of factions. This view conflicted with the "Two Kingdoms" theory of Andrew Melville* and the Presbyterians which meant that the secular kingdom of the state should not interfere with the spiritual kingdom of the church. Despite Buchanan's constitutional teaching, James was unwilling to have any area excluded from his jursidiction and aimed at the "One Kingdom" which he would rule under God alone. As he was a notable exponent, therefore, of the Divine Right of Kings,* his political ideas found expression in his Trew Law of Free Monarchies (1598) and Basilikon Doron (1599).

Astute use of opportunities and nicely calculated gifts of the church temporalities which had been annexed to the Crown in 1587 enabled him to break the power of the Scottish nobility and to impose various forms of episcopacy over the Presbyterian structure of the Scottish Church. Thus, when he went to England he boasted that he was able to rule Scotland by his pen which others had not done by the sword.

James seemed much less able to assess the political and ecclesiastical situation in England. His policy of peace with Spain and his extravagant expenditure on his favorites led to quarrels with Parliament. His attempts to improve the lot of Roman Catholics were unpopular and ineffectual enough to provoke the Catholic Gunpowder Plot* (1605). At the Hampton Court Conference* (1604) James astonished the English divines with his theological learning, but failed to understand the Puritans' viewpoint. Confusing them with Presbyterians, he sternly ordered them to conform in ceremonial matters. A positive result of the conference was the planning of the Authorized (King James) Version of the Bible, which was published in 1611.

In Ireland James was responsible for the settlement of Protestant English and Scots in Ulster and indirectly for its modern divisions.

See D.H. Willson, James VI and I (1956), and D. Mathew, James I (1967). HENRY R. SEFTON

JAMES, BOOK OF ("Protevangelium"). An apocryphal infancy gospel of the late second century professing to have been written by James the Lord's brother. The original Greek text has survived, and also various oriental versions are in existence, the oldest being the Syriac, though there is no Latin version. It describes the miraculous birth and infancy of the Virgin Mary, whose parents are here for the first time given the names of Joachim and Anne. It then goes on to deal with her relationship to Joseph and the birth of Jesus (using the early chapters of Matthew and Luke as a basis). Here Joseph is presented as an old man who already had sons. The story of the death of Zechariah seems not to belong to the original. The "Protevangelium," as it has been called since the sixteenth century, may have been known by Clement of Alexandria. It was certainly known by Origen, for he refers to it when asserting that the brothers of Jesus were sons of Joseph by a former wife. R.E. NIXON

JAMES, EPISTLE OF, see EPISTLES, GENERAL

JAMES, LITURGY OF. A very ancient liturgy which is extant in Greek and Syriac. Early tradition ascribes it to James, Jesus' brother, mentioned in Matthew 27:56 and Galatians 1:19, etc. Tradition also makes him the first bishop of Jerusalem. Modern scholarship generally views the terminus a quo of its origin as A.D. 450, since this liturgy was used by both the Syrian Jacobites* and the main stream of orthodoxy after the Council of Chalcedon. The liturgy has some similarity to the one associated with Cyril, a fourth-century bishop of Jerusalem, and seems to contain a reference to the discovery of the "true cross" at Jerusalem in the fourth century.

JAMES, WILLIAM (1842-1910). American psychologist and philosopher. After a career first as an artist, then as a medical student, James developed an interest in experimental psychology (1867), and taught physiology, psychology, and philosophy at Harvard. Although plagued with ill-health after 1865, he was very active in lecturing both in America and Europe, and in writing what were to become classics of American philosophy. Among his most important books are The Varieties of Religious Experience (1902), Pragmatism (1907), and A Pluralistic Universe (1909). James wrote for a wide, popular audience. It is partly for this reason that his work seems often unguarded and difficult to summarize. James was a pragmatist in the sense that for him truth is that which we must take account of if we are not to perish. The mind is not simply a passive recipient of sense-data, as in classical empiricism, but is characteristically active. He was anti-reductionist in temper in that he stressed the richness, the "pluralism" of experience, including religious experience, against what he took to be the rigidities of scientific or religious orthodoxy. Religious experience is a well-nigh universal phenomenon; it endures; there must therefore be "truth" in religion. James's brilliance as a descriptive psychologist is apparent in his accounts of religious experience. His brother was Henry James the novelist.

PAUL HELM

JANE FRANCES DE CHANTAL (1572-1641). Founder of the Congregation of the Visitation of Our Lady. Born Jeanne Françoise Frémiot at Dijon, she was the daughter of the president of the parlement of Burgundy. She married Baron de Chantal (1592), who was killed in a hunting accident nine years later, leaving her with four young children. She heard Francis de Sales* preach, and she placed herself under his direction in 1604. After her eldest daughter married, and as her fourteen-year-old son was provided for, she took her two remaining daughters to Annecy, and there founded the Visitation Order (1610). At her death there were eighty-six houses, and by 1767 when she was canonized there were 164.

J.G.G. NORMAN

JÄNICKE, JOHANNES (1748-1827). Founder of the first German missionary training school. A Bohemian-born weaver, he was influenced by the Moravians and eventually became pastor of the Bethlehem Bohemian-Lutheran congregation in Berlin. Encouraged by the pious Saxon official, Von Schirnding, Jänicke opened a school in 1800 to train young men for missionary service. It being a faith venture, he gave the instruction himself and received assistance from English missionary societies, individual German Christians, and even the Prussian king. Its eighty graduates, among them Karl Rhenius* and Karl Gutzlaff,* served under various societies in Africa and Asia. Because his son-in-law and successor refused to merge the school with the Berlin Mission Society (founded 1824), it rapidly declined after his death and was dissolved in 1849. In 1805 Jänicke had formed a Bible Society and in 1811 a tract society which were forerunners of the later Prussian Bible (1814) and Tract (1816) societies.

RICHARD V. PIERARD

JANSEN, CORNELIUS OTTO (1585-1638). Roman Catholic bishop of Ypres (1636). He studied at Louvain and Paris, where he met Jean Duvergier de Hauranne, later abbot of Saint-Cyran. At Bayonne and Champre (1612-17) in the company of Saint-Cyran, Jansen immersed himself in the writings of Augustine. Against the Jesuits and the theologians of the Counter-Reformation,* Jansen and Saint-Cyran wished to reshape Catholicism with the teaching of Augustine and defeat Protestantism with its own weapons. Jansen became the director of a college at Louvain (1617), a public opponent of the Jesuits (Madrid, 1626-27), and eventually bishop of Ypres. His masterpiece was the Augustinus of the Doctrine of St. Augustine on the Health, the Sickness and the Cure of Human Nature: against the Pelagians and those of Marseilles (1640). This treatise was condemned as heretical by the Sorbonne in 1649 and by Innocent X in 1653.

See JANSENISM. DAVID C. STEINMETZ

JANSENISM. A radically Augustinian movement in the Roman Catholic Church in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, whose teaching was summed up in five propositions condemned by Pope Innocent X in 1653: (1) that it is impossible to fulfill the commands of God without special grace; (2) that grace is irresistible; (3) that only freedom from compulsion is needed for merit, not freedom from necessity; (4) that it is semi-Pelagian to teach that grace can be resisted or complied with by free will; and (5) that it is semi-Pelagian to teach that Christ died for all men.

While such ideas had been found in the writings of strongly Augustinian theologians throughout the history of the church, the Jansenists (who took their name from C.O. Jansen*) drew practical conclusions from these ideas which undercut the sacramental and hierarchical claims of the church of the Counter-Reformation.* The sacraments of the church were only efficacious when God had already transformed the inner disposition of the recipient by His grace. Because the grace of God was strictly limited to the elect, the church need not preoccupy itself with the conversion of men still outside the visible institution, but should rather purify itself by severe discipline and rigorous asceticism. The sacraments were restricted in their use to those who by their moral discipline had qualified themselves to receive them. Everything in the church which did not have divine sanction should be mercilessly excised.

The Jansenists were antipapal in their sentiments, admitting the right of the pope to condemn the five propositions taken from the Augustinus, while rejecting the condemnation itself. Jansenist views of free will, predestination, stringent moral asceticism, the sacraments, the hierarchy, and the mission of the church brought them into inevitable conflict with the Jesuits.

The first Jansenists, including the convent of Port-Royal, were generally known as Cyranists after the abbot of Saint-Cyran (Duvergier), the friend and colleague of C.O. Jansen. The Jansenists had already assumed a definable shape by 1638. After the death of Jansen and Saint-Cyran, Antoine Arnauld* became the acknowledged leader of the movement (1643), whose most illustrious member was Blaise Pascal.

While Arnauld and his generation died in communion with Rome, Jansenist ideas were repeatedly condemned, most vigorously in the decree Unigenitus issued by Clement XI in 1713 against the teaching of Pasquier Quesnel.* The headquarters of the Jansenists at Port-Royal was destroyed, and the movement was subject to persecution in France. In Holland, however, Jansenism was tolerated, and in 1723 the Jansenists created the schismatic bishop of Utrecht. Jansenism also flourished in Tuscany, giving articulation to its views in the Synod of Pistoia (1786). Thousands of volumes were produced in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries by and about Jansenism, many of which were written in the vernacular and sold to the public at large.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: J. Carreyre, "Jansenisme," in Dictionnaire de Theéologie Catholique, vol. VIII (1924); N.J. Abercrombie, The Origins of Jansenism (1936); M. Escholier, Port-Royal (1968).

DAVID C. STEINMETZ

JAPAN, CHRISTIANITY IN. Although some claim evidence of Nestorian influence on early Japanese Buddhism, Christianity's introduction to Japan is generally held to have been the arrival of the Spanish Jesuit, Francis Xavier,* with two Japanese converts on 15 August 1549. Under the patronage of the ruling warlord, Nobunaga, and his successor, Hideyoshi, the Roman Catholic faith spread rapidly. In 1587, however, Hideyoshi issued an edict banning all missionaries. Fierce persecution set in, with thousands dying for their faith, including twenty-six Christians who were publicly crucified. By 1640 only 150,000 secret Christians remained. For the next 250 years the Tokugawa line cut off Japan from the outside world until 1853, when the isolation was forcibly broken. Christianity was still forbidden to the Japanese, but the trade treaties drawn up with the West opened the door for missionaries.

The first Protestant missionaries, the Rev. John Liggins and Bishop Channing-Williams of the Episcopal Church, arrived in May 1859. Later that year two other American denominations sent missionaries: Dr. James Hepburn* (Presbyterian) and Drs. Guido Verbeck and S.R. Brown (Reformed Church). In 1860 the Baptists sent their first. Despite the edicts outlawing Christianity, the first convert was baptized in 1864, and the first church was organized at Yokohama in 1872. Catholicism's renaissance began with Father Girard's arrival in September 1859. The first church was established in 1862, and in 1865 thousands of secret Christians, descendants of the seventeenth-century Catholic believers, revealed themselves. Intense persecution followed, but was eased in 1873 when the edicts banning Christianity were removed. Ivan Kasatkin, later Bishop Nicolai,* founded the Eastern Orthodox Church and saw it grow to 30,000 members.

The main characteristic of the Protestant movement in the 1870s was the emergence of Christian bands: at Yokohama under the Rev. John Ballagh, at Kumamoto under Captain L.L. Janes, at Sapporo under Dr. W.S. Clark,* at Nagasaki under Dr. G. Verbeck,* and at Hirosaki, etc. From these bands came many leaders in the period of rapid growth from 1880 to 1889, notable Yuzuru Neeshima,* Kanzo Uchimura,* Masahisa Uemura, and Yoichi Honda. Mergers between denominational missions and their churches resulted in the Japan Episcopal, Presbyterian, Congregational, and Methodist denominations, and numerous interdenominational bodies were founded such as the Japan YMCA (1880), Scripture Union (1884), Christian Endeavour (1886), and the Bible Society (1890).

Although religious freedom was granted with the promulgation of the national constitution in 1889, the 1890s were marked by a reaction against Christianity, two contributory factors being the Imperial Rescript on Education and the realization that modernization did not require Christianization. With the rise of capitalism in the mid-1890s came modern social and labor problems. Newly arrived Salvation Army officers found in Gunpei Yamamura a leader for the work of freeing the indentured prostitutes and helping the poor in the slums. The catastrophic influence of liberal theology which had made its first appearance in 1885 was being increasingly felt in the church. A touch of revival came at the turn of the century and with it development of cooperative evangelism and inspirational conferences arranged by Barclay Buxton and Paget Wilkes* who in 1904 formed the Japan Evangelistic Band.

From 1900 to 1920, as Japan's industrial revolution was intensified, Christians became more involved in social work, the contribution of Toyohiko Kagawa* being the most outstanding. Through the preaching of Charles Cowman, Ernest Kilbourne, and Juji Nakada who had organized the Oriental Missionary Society in 1898, the Japanese Holiness Church came to birth in 1917. In Hokkaido the work of the Rev. John Batchelor, the "apostle to the Ainu," was at its height, and on the main island the Central Japan Pioneer Mission was begun in 1925. The rise of militarism in the 1930s led to increasing curtailment of religious freedom until 1941 when thirty-two major Protestant groups were forcibly amalgamated into the United Church of Christ in Japan (called the "Kyodan"). In the war years many Christians suffered greatly for their faith, but many compromised.

In the postwar period, with the dissolution of State-Shintoism and emperor-worship, Christians began to reorganize, spurred on by a new wave of missionaries in a climate of unprecedented religious freedom. The Anglicans, Presbyterians, Lutherans, and some others soon seceded from the Kyodan, which set up a partnership with eight denominations for channeling financial aid and missionary personnel to churches and schools, the main ones being Meiji Gakuin, Aoyama Gakuin, Doshisha, St. Paul's (Anglican), Kanto Gakuin (Baptist), and the International Christian University. Other Kyodan-related ministries are the KyobunKwan (publishing), Avaco (audio-visual), and the Japan Union Theological Seminary.

The majority of the postwar Protestant Missionary force comprises the denominational missions of the Southern Baptist, American Baptist, Reformed, Nazarene, Christian and Missionary Alliance, Lutheran, Pentecostal churches, and numerous interdenominational faith missions, The Evangelical Alliance Mission (outgrowth of the Scandinavian Alliance Mission started by F. Franson* in 1891 and associated with the Domei denomination), the Far Eastern Gospel Crusade, and the Overseas Missionary Fellowship being the three largest. All engage in evangelistic work and founding churches, most of which have either a denominational link or membership in the Federation of Independent Churches. The prewar Holiness churches reorganized, the largest group forming the Immanuel Church under Dr. David Tsutada.

Cooperative ministries include Pacific Broadcasting Association under Dr. Akira Hatori, Japan Inter-Varsity Christian Fellowship, Japan Sunday School Union, and Word of Life Press. The main evangelical seminaries are the Japan Bible Seminary, Japan Christian Theological Seminary, Kobe Theological Seminary, Tokyo Christian College (liberal arts), and more than a score of Bible institutes.

The Roman Catholic Church has grown conspicuously, aided by many foreign personnel. Churches, hospitals, schools, and universities (e.g., Sophia, Seishin, Nanzan) are their main emphases, and about 50 per cent of Japan's total baptized church membership is in the Catholic Church. These, with Greek Orthodox, nonchurch Christians, conservative, liberal, and neoorthodox, and exogenous and indigenous sects (e.g., Tejimakyo, Spirit of Jesus Church) make up the Christian streams. Evangelicals nationwide have formed the Japan Evangelical Association, while ecumenically minded Protestants and Catholics have the Japan Ecumenical Association.

The Christian Church, with less than one-half of 1 per cent of the population, looks insignificant set against the vast majority whose customs and beliefs are deeply rooted in a Shintoism and Buddhism allied with materialism, and the resurgent religions such as the Soka Gakkai, but its influence is widely felt. With capable Japanese leaders at the helm, with a spirit of partnership between missionaries and the national church, with urban area evangelism expanding, and with an increasing number of Japanese missionaries going out, the Christian cause should continue to advance steadily.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: O. Cary, A History of Christianity in Japan (2 vols., 1907); C.R. Boxer, The Christian Century in Japan, 1549-1650 (1951); J. Natori, Historical Stories of Christianity in Japan (1957); T. Yanagita, A Short History of Christianity in Japan (1957); C.W. Inglehart, A Century of Protestant Christianity in Japan (1959); D. Pape, Captives of the Mighty (1959); J.M.L. Young, The Two Empires in Japan (1961); J.J. Spae, Christian Corridors to Japan (1965) and Christianity Encounters Japan (1968); M. Griffiths, Take Off Your Shoes (1971).

DAVID MICHELL

JASPER, JOHN (1812-1901). American Negro Baptist preacher. Born into slavery on a plantation in Fluvanna County, Virginia, he was raised by a pious mother. He was employed as a slave in the Richmond tobacco factory of a prominent Baptist layman where he experienced a dramatic conversion in 1837. At his master's urging he began preaching, and after learning to read he immersed himself in the Bible. His fame as a lay preacher and pulpit orator spread rapidly throughout Virginia, and after emancipation he took over a regular congregation, eventually becoming pastor of the Sixth Mount Zion Church in Richmond. Thousands thronged to hear him, and one sermon in particular—"De Sun Do Move" (a defense of the literal movement of the sun around the earth), which he repeated over 250 times—gave him a national reputation. Not a sensationalist, he was known for his simple biblical faith, remarkable eloquence, and ability to relate tenderly to his parishioners.

RICHARD V. PIERARD

JASPERS, KARL (1883-1969). German existentialist* philosopher. He read medicine at Heidelberg, where he became a lecturer in psychology before promotion to the chair of philosophy there in 1921. Jaspers was relieved of his duties by the Nazis in 1937, but reinstituted in 1945. His position under the Nazis was made all the more acute by the fact that his wife was Jewish. From 1948 he taught at Basle. Already in his medical studies he was influenced by philosophy, and he used Husserl's phenomenology and Dilthey's descriptive analytical psychology.

As a philosopher Jaspers developed an independent approach, though he paid considerable respect to the classical philosophers of the past. He early rejected the view that philosophy is a branch of science. He was equally opposed to the idea of the omnicompetence of science. Though science has its proper place, it does not disclose the meaning of life. Philosophy is a type of thinking which is not compelling and does not have the universal validity of the natural sciences, but which nevertheless leads the thinker to himself. It arises out of his inner activity and awakens sources within him which give ultimate meaning. For Jaspers, Existenz-philosophy is "the way of thought by which man seeks to become himself."

It does not cognize objects, but elucidates the being of the thinker.

Jaspers held that there is no law of nature or history which determines the way of things as a whole. The future depends upon the decisions and deeds of men, in the last analysis of the individual among the billions of men. He stood apart from institutional religion and regarded the concrete forms of religion as symbols or ciphers. He spoke of "the Encompassing" (das Umgreifende) to denote the Being that surrounds us and the Being that we are. It is neither subject nor object, but contains both. The transcendent denotes both the source and the goal of our existence, out of whose depths alone we become authentically human. Although often difficult, Jaspers regarded philosophy not as a specialist study, but as a way of thinking for all who seek illumination of "the Ground within us and beyond us, where we can find meaning and guidance." It is virtually an alternative to religion.

Among the English translations of Jaspers' writings are Nietzsche and Christianity (1961), Truth and Symbol (1959), Philosophical Faith and Revelation (1967), and (with R. Bultmann*) Myth and Christianity (1958).

BIBLIOGRAPHY: P. Koestenbaum in The Encyclopedia of Philosophy, IV, pp. 254-58; P.A. Schilpp (ed.), The Philosophy of Karl Jaspers (1957): containing an autobiography, twenty-four studies, a reply by Jaspers, and a bibliography; C.F. Wallraff, Karl Jaspers: An Introduction to his Philosophy (1970). See also bibliography under EXISTENTIALISM. COLIN BROWN

JEFFERSON, THOMAS (1743-1826). Third president of the USA and political philosopher. Born at Shadwell, Virginia, he was educated at the College of William and Mary (1760-62) and admitted to the bar in 1767. He was a member of the House of Burgesses (1769-76), the Continental Congress (1775-76, 1783-84), and the Virginia House of Delegates (1776-79), governor (1779-81), minister to France (1785-89), secretary of state (1790-93), vice president of the USA (1797-1801), and president (1801-9). His administration saw the Louisiana Purchase, the Lewis and Clark Expedition, and war with Algerian pirates. He retired to his home at Monticello in 1809. He was a founder of the Democratic-Republican party and advocated democratic simplicity, agrarianism, state rights, and separation of church and state. He considered the Declaration of Independence (1776), the Virginia Bill for Establishing Religious Freedom (1786), and the founding of the University of Virginia (1819) to be his greatest achievements. A Deist, he deleted the miraculous from his edition of the gospels, The Life and Morals of Jesus of Nazareth.

ALBERT H. FREUNDT, JR.

JEHOVAH. The traditional English spelling, introduced by Tyndale, of the Hebrew name for the God of Israel; it is generally agreed today that the correct spelling should be "Yahweh." The earliest MSS of the books of the Hebrew Bible contained no vowels, so the sacred name appeared simply as YHWH ("the Tetragrammaton"); for knowledge of the pronunciation we are indebted to the Greek writers Clement of Alexandria and Theodoret. Even before the Christian era, the Jews refused to pronounce the name at all and substituted the word "my Lord" (in Hebrew 'adonay); in later (Massoretic) MSS the vowels of this word were therefore attached to the consonants of Yahweh, as a guide to synagogue readers to substitute 'adonay. The erroneous reading of this hybrid form as "Jehovah" dates from the medieval period. The KJV and its successors usually prefer to translate the Tetragrammaton as "the LORD" (in capitals). The original meaning of the name is uncertain; suggestions include "He who is," "He who is present," and "He who causes to be."

D.F. PAYNE

JEHOVAH'S WITNESSES. This movement originated with C.T. Russell* as the Watch Tower Bible and Tract Society and the International Bible Students Association—not to be confused with the International Bible Readers Association. The title of Jehovah's Witnesses was assumed in 1931 under Russell's successor, J.F. Rutherford.* On the death of the latter in 1942 the leadership passed to Nathan H. Knorr (b.1905).

Theologically Jehovah's Witnesses resemble Arians in their view that the Son was the first and highest created being. He is identified with Michael the Archangel. When he became man, he became only man, and although at his resurrection he was exalted above the angels as a spirit being, his body remained dead, although it was removed from sight by Jehovah. Christ's appearances were "in materialized bodies." The holy spirit is the active force of God. As a perfect man Jesus died to ransom all the descendants of Adam from the physical death which Adam's sin had inflicted on them. "As a childless man his unborn human offspring counterbalanced all the race that Adam has reproduced." Since Jehovah's Witnesses do not believe in a soul that can live apart from the body (see CONDITIONAL IMMORTALITY), the primary purpose of Christ's ransom is to give the right either not to die physically or to be restored by resurrection. Salvation is through faith in the ransom, through baptism by Jehovah's Witnesses, and through proclamation of their message, together with a moral life. There is virtually no interest in the devotional life. The Lord's Supper is celebrated once a year only at the Passover, and only those who have the inner witness that they are members of the 144,000 elite may partake.

The sect has been continually expecting Armageddon and the setting up of the Kingdom. This kingdom will be governed by Jesus Christ through the 144,000 in heaven, and on earth through an indefinite number of "men of goodwill," "other sheep," or "Jonadabs." This extra class was discovered when it was obvious that Jehovah's Witnesses numbered more than the expected 144,000. The rest of mankind will be raised at intervals, except presumably those who fought against God at Armageddon, and will be judged for life or destruction according to their behavior during the Millennium. In Life Everlasting in Freedom of the Sons of God it is thought likely that 1975 will see the start of the millennial kingdom.

The movement is probably the most authority-ridden religious body in the world. Members are told by the central government what they must find in the Bible, and may not deviate. Thus blood transfusion must be rejected as though it were banned by Scripture. Dogmas may be changed. In 1929 "the clear light broke forth" in the Watchtower that the higher powers of Romans 13 were not earthly rulers, but Jehovah and Christ Jesus, and Rutherford's books took this up. Recent books (e.g., Life Everlasting) have returned to the orthodox interpretation. It used to be stated that the 144,000 were raised in 1918 (e.g., Let God be True, p. 192), but now they will be raised in the Millennium (e.g., Things in which it is Impossible for God to Lie, p. 350f.).

The sect has over one million active members who have the title of "publishers" (of the good news of the kingdom), and a number of full-time "pioneers." A further million-plus are interested followers. Some 30 per cent are found in America, 8 per cent in West Germany, and 5 per cent in Britain. Many Witnesses have stood firm under shocking persecution, especially under Communist regimes. Since the theology turns on the assertion that Jesus Christ is not Jehovah, it is worth noting that John 12:39-41 says that He was the one whom Isaiah saw in the Temple, and Isaiah 6:5 says this was Jehovah. In Revelation 1:17 Christ describes himself as "the First and the Last," which is the unique title of Jehovah in Isaiah 44:6. Note also similar equations in 1 Peter 2:8 (Isa. 8:13,14) and Revelation 2:23 (Jer. 17:9, 10).

BIBLIOGRAPHY: W.R. Martin and N.H. Klann, Jehovah of the Watchtower (1953); M. Cole, Jehovah's Witnesses (1956); J.K. Van Baalen, The Chaos of Cults (1956); W.J. Schnell, Thirty Years a Watchtower Slave (1957) and Into the Light of Christianity: Basic Doctrines of Jehovah's Witnesses (1959); G.D. McKinney, The Theology of Jehovah's Witnesses (1962); A. Hoekema, The Four Major Cults (1963); T. Dencher, Why I Left Jehovah's Witnesses (1966).

J. STAFFORD WRIGHT

JEROME (Eusebius Hieronymus) (c.345-c.419). Biblical scholar and translator, he was born of Christian parents in Stridon in NE Italy. Around the age of twelve he went to Rome and studied Greek, Latin, rhetoric, and philosophy under Aelius Donatus. While in Rome he met Rufinus of Aquileia. He allegedly spent his Sundays in the catacombs translating the inscriptions. At the age of nineteen he was baptized. He journeyed to Gaul, became acquainted with monasticism at Treves, and on his return joined a small group of ascetics including Rufinus. About 373 he left the group and went to the East and spent some time living as an ascetic in the desert near Chalcis.

During this time he began to master the Hebrew language, perfected his Greek, and had his famous dream in which he was accused of being a Ciceronian rather than a Christian. He left his ascetic existence and went to Antioch, where he heard the lectures of Apollinaris of Laodicea on Scripture and was ordained without pastoral responsibility by Bishop Paulinus, recognized by Rome as an orthodox bishop. Jerome then went to Constantinople and studied with Gregory Nazianzus* and perhaps Gregory of Nyssa. While there he translated some of the works of Eusebius, Origen, and others. In 382 he journeyed to Rome with Bishop Paulinus and became involved in the dispute surrounding the Melitian Schism.* He became the friend and secretary of Pope Damasus. While in Rome he praised the ascetic life of monasticism and decried the lax moral life of the Christians in the city. He was most successful in winning the female sex to his views of ascetic living, but due to rumors about his relationship with them and the accusation that his harsh asceticism caused the death of one of them, he left Rome after the death of Pope Damasus and in 386 made his home in Bethlehem for the rest of his life. There he oversaw a men's monastery and continued to serve as the spiritual adviser to some of the women who followed him from Rome to establish a convent.

He engaged in theological controversy with Vigilantius, Origen, Pelagius, Jovinian, his good friend Rufinus, and even Augustine of Hippo. In these controversies he used irony, personal attacks, sarcasm, and bitter invective. Yet his service to the church was invaluable and should not be obscured because of the flaws in his complex personality. His scholarship and grasp of languages was unsurpassed in the early church. He engaged in a voluminous correspondence, compiled a bibliography of ecclesiastical writers, wrote De Viris Illustribus, wrote commentaries on virtually all the books of the Bible, and perhaps most important of all, upon the urging of Pope Damasus used his great linguistic skills and erudition to translate the Bible into the common tongue of that day.

In the process of producing the Vulgate, Jerome apparently used Origen's Hexapla and consulted local rabbis in order to perfect the OT section. He questioned the inclusion of the Apocrypha section although he did use it for edification. His translation is important in that he set the example of working from the original languages. The Vulgate has left a tremendous imprint upon the development of the church, and thus Jerome's scholarship extends its influence into our own day.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Works in J.P. Migne (ed.), Patrologia Latina (1844-64), vols. XXII-XXX; L. Huizinga, Hieronymus (1946); P. Antin, Essai sur Saint Jérôme (1951); F.X. Murphy (ed.), A Monument to Saint Jerome (1952); E. Arns, La technique du livre d'après saint Jérôme (1953); J.G. Nolan, Jerome and Jovinian (1956); C.C. Mierow, Saint Jerome: The Sage of Bethlehem (1959); J.N.D. Kelly, St. Jerome (1975).

ROBERT SCHNUCKER

JEROME EMILIANI (Girolamo Miani) (1481-1537). Founder of the Somaschi, a Counter-Reformation* order of clerks regular, specializing in the care of orphans. Born in Venice of noble parentage, he fought in the Venetian army against the League of Cambrai (1508). He was ordained

(1518), returning to Venice to devote himself to relieving suffering following the invasion of N Italy. He opened a hospital at Verona (1518) and the house in Somasca near Bergamo, from which his order was named. He founded at Bergamo Italy's first home for prostitutes. He died at Somasca from typhus contracted while tending sufferers. He was made patron of orphans and abandoned children in 1928. The Somaschi, founded in 1528, began a community life under Augustinian Rule in 1532, were approved by Paul III in 1540, and raised to the rank of order by Pius V in 1568. J.G.G. NORMAN

JEROME OF PRAGUE (c.1371-1416). Bohemian Reformer. A layman, he was a brilliant orator and debater, and a close friend and disciple of John Hus.* Intellectually he was a Realist, following closely upon the Wycliffism which he ardently propounded in Bohemia and especially at Prague, but he always remained orthodox on transubstantiation. After graduating from Prague University in 1398, he greatly contributed to the spreading of Wycliffe's works in Bohemia. Later he received the M.A. degree from Paris where he also lectured, but adverse reaction to his Realism and Wycliffism led to flight successively from Paris and Heidelberg.

In 1407 he helped to lead the nationalist-Wycliffite campaign which granted the Czechs equality of powers in the hitherto German-dominated Prague University. The archbishop of Prague apparently excommunicated him in 1409. In 1410 his preaching at the court of Sigismund of Hungary led to his dismissal. He appeared in Vienna, where the Inquisition arrested him, but despite an oath to the contrary he fled. From 1410 he became much more radical and activist in his opposition to the church. In Prague he was a leader of popular demonstrations against his friend Hus's excommunication, against indulgences, and against religious relics. In 1413 the local episcopate expelled him from Cracow and he went to support the Ruthenian schismatics in White Russia. In 1414 he went to the Council of Constance, honoring a promise to help his friend Hus. He quickly left to avoid arrest, but was brought back and jailed. In June 1415, after Hus's condemnation, Emperor Sigismund demanded that Jerome be dealt with, and he was burnt as a heretic at Constance in 1416.

See "Jerome of Prague," University of Birmingham Historical Journal, vol. I (1947).

L. FEEHAN

JERUSALEM. An important Palestinian city, sacred because of its association with David and Jesus to Jews and Christians respectively; it is also sacred to Islam because of its traditional associations with Abraham and Muhammad. The city and the name Jerusalem (? "Foundation of Salim") go back at least to 1800 B.C. Its pre-Israelite kings included Melchizedek (cf. Gen. 14). Conquered by David about 1000 B.C., it became the capital and also the central shrine of the united monarchy of Israel, and subsequently of the kingdom of Judah. During the monarchy the city grew, especially to the north, where the Temple was erected by Solomon.

Both city and Temple suffered destruction by the Babylonians in 587/6 B.C., but were partially rebuilt by the end of the century, and Jerusalem was refortified by Nehemiah (445-433 B.C.). The city expanded greatly in the Maccabean period; and Herod the Great (37-4 B.C.) carried out a major building program. His grandson Agrippa I further added to the northern fortifications (A.D. 41-44), but in A.D. 70 the city and Temple suffered a major destruction by the Roman armies under Titus. Yet further damage was done in the Second Jewish Revolt (A.D. 132-35), after which Hadrian rebuilt Jerusalem as a pagan city named Aelia Capitolina. It became a Christian city in Constantine's reign, with the construction of important churches.

The Persian invasion of A.D. 614 caused some destruction. In 638 the Muslims under the caliph Omar captured Jerusalem, and both the El-Aqsa mosque and the Dome of the Rock ("Mosque of Omar") were erected in the seventh century. The Muslims proved tolerant until the caliph Hakim in 1009 ordered the destruction of many Christian buildings. The First Crusade soon afterward resulted in the creation of the Latin Kingdom of Jerusalem (1099-1187); the Crusaders were again great builders. Saladin drove them out, but did no harm to the Christian shrines. The Muslim rulers in the following centuries were responsible for much of the Muslim architecture still to be seen; the Turkish sultan Suleiman the Magnificent built the existing city walls about 1535.

Gen. E.H.H. Allenby captured Jerusalem in 1917, and a British administration followed until 1948, with Jerusalem as the capital of Palestine. Then the city was divided, the W suburbs held by Israel, the Old City and the E sector in Jordanian hands. The Israelis captured the whole city in 1967. Even in its divided days, the Israelis made it their capital.

Archaeological exploration has been limited and difficult because of the dense population of the city. It is clear, however, that the city's earliest expansion was northward, then westward in the postexilic era. Nehemiah's rebuilding retracted the E walls somewhat, while Hadrian's city retracted the S wall to a marked degree. Modern expansion has been chiefly to the west and north of old Jerusalem.

Solomon's temple, symbolizing the presence of God, gave the city a powerful religious appeal as "the holy city"; the names "Jerusalem" and "Zion" early came to symbolize the people of God. As a theological symbol Jerusalem exercised a profound influence on Christian writing (as early as Galatians 4 and Revelation 21) and hymnology (e.g., "Jerusalem the golden").

BIBLIOGRAPHY: J. Simons, Jerusalem in the Old Testament (1952); S. Perowne, Jerusalem and Bethlehem (1965); J. Boudet (ed.), Jerusalem: A History (ET 1967); K.M. Kenyon, Jerusalem: Excavating 3000 Years of History (1967); N.W. Porteous, "Jerusalem-Zion: The Growth of a Symbol," in Living the Mystery (1967), chap. 7; J. Jeremias, Jerusalem in the Time of Jesus (ET 1969); C. Gulston, Jerusalem: The Tragedy and the

Triumph (1978). See also Bible atlases for plans and maps. D.F. PAYNE

JERUSALEM, KNIGHTS OF, see HOSPITALLERS

JERUSALEM, PATRIARCHATE OF. From the account in the Acts of the Apostles, enlarged in Eusebius, it is evident that the first organized Christian ecclesiastical structure was brought into being in Jerusalem, with James, the Lord's brother, as presiding officer. That leadership remained in Judeo-Christian and dynastic hands until the devastation of the city under Hadrian, whence the episcopal list becomes Gentile in name, and the relevance of the city is eclipsed by the primary churches in the major cities of the Greco-Roman world. The honor of birthplace of Christianity was however retained, and intensified when Constantine's mother, Helena, made the city a place of pilgrimage which restored prestige to its diminished jurisdiction.

By canon law the Council of Nicea (325) accorded place of honor to its episcopal structure next after Alexandria, Rome, and Antioch—under the last of whose territorial jurisdiction it might actually be assumed to have come. While the Council of Chalcedon (451) raised the see to patriarchal rank, the Islamic conquest reduced the significance of that rank. The Crusaders disrupted the residential continuity of the office, so that its holders intermittently until 1845 often were to be found in Constantinople instead; they also created in 1099 a Latin patriarchate frequently resident at Acre which lasted until 1291 (nominally 1374), but was reconstituted in 1847. The non-Roman Armenians also have a patriarch of this title, while the Melchites include Jerusalem in the titulary of their patriarch of Antioch.

CLYDE CURRY SMITH

JERUSALEM, SYNOD OF (1672). A generation after the violent death of Cyril Lucar,* who had brought Calvinism into the Eastern Church, the occasion of the consecration of the restored Church of the Holy Nativity in Bethlehem provided an opportunity to exterminate the lingering effects of that influence. Dositheus,* patriarch of Jerusalem (since 1669), with his retired predecessor Nectarius,* convened a synod in Jerusalem in March 1672, in which six other metropolitans among sixty-eight Eastern bishops and ecclesiastics from as far as Russia participated. Their signed decisions serve Eastern Orthodoxy as an equivalent to the Roman Catholic Council of Trent.*

The acts of the synod are in two parts. The "Six Chapters" attack the so-called Confession of Cyril Lucar, declaring it to be forgery, so as to refute the Calvinist impact in a context which shows the patriarchate to have been free from error even while the writings of a patriarch are anathematized. The "Eighteen Articles," to which are appended four questions catechetical style, serve as a renewed declaration of faith; these were drafted chiefly by Dositheus as his "Confession" and have come to be called "the shield of orthodoxy." Article I states the Trinitarian formula with single procession of the Spirit. Article II and the first three questions deal with the relation of Scripture to an authoritative Tradition, the questions making it clear that Scripture, defined as including the Apocrypha (3), being full of difficulties (2), ought not be read indiscriminately by all (1), and hence can receive proper interpretation only within that church free from error. Others equally emphasized traditional "Catholic" doctrine over against the "new" doctrines of the Reformation.

CLYDE CURRY SMITH

JERUSALEM CONFERENCE (1928). World missionary conference gathered on Mount of Olives at Easter 1928. It was the first conference held since the formation of the International Missionary Council,* which was itself the outgrowth of the World Missionary Conference at Edinburgh,* 1910. Its purpose was to reexamine the Christian mission in the light of the spread of secularism. The first globally representative assembly of non-Roman Christians, nearly one-quarter of the 231 members represented in full equality the churches of Asia, Africa, and Latin America. The agenda included urbanization and industrialization in Asia and Africa, rural problems, race relations, war, medical work, religious education, relations between younger and older churches. Fears were expressed, especially by European representatives, that this agenda signified the triumph of the Social Gospel and might lead to syncretistic compromise. Some interpretative reports were given to keep the balance, but some evangelical societies withdrew from their respective national conferences, e.g., the China Inland Mission. The "Message" was drafted by William Temple and incorporated part of the statement prepared by the Lausanne Conference,* 1927. After acknowledging elements of truth in other religions, it affirmed that "Christ is our motive and Christ our end. We must give nothing less, and we can give nothing more."

See Reports of the Jerusalem Meeting of the International Missionary Council (8 vols., 1928).

J.G.G. NORMAN

JERUSALEM CONFERENCE ON BIBLICAL PROPHECY (1971). Most Protestants traveling to Bible lands are evangelical believers whose faith embraces a belief, not only in Jesus of Nazareth as the Messiah of OT promise, but also in His return to judge the world and fully establish the kingdom of God. The Jerusalem Conference attracted some 1,500 such evangelicals from thirty-two nations from 15-18 June 1971, to hear speakers expound eschatological themes. The program concentrated mainly on widely shared evangelical views and reflected differences only secondarily. The resurrection of Jesus Christ was affirmed to be the hinge of human history, and decision for or against Christ the final determinant of man's destiny. The conference focused interest on eschatology in a scriptural context at a time when end-time concerns gained wide secular emphasis due to possibilities of nuclear annihilation, global ecological pollution, and world famine due to human overpopulation. That God, not man, determines the outcome of history, and that men and nations are destined for final moral judgment, was a central conference emphasis. The purpose of God in creation, reasserted in the redemption of fallen man, was affirmed to be the ultimate conformity of regenerate mankind to the image of Jesus Christ.

The Jerusalem Conference was significant for the fact that its prophetic interest was not correlated either with social withdrawal or neglect of evangelism. The lively expectation of Christ's return was said to require more earnest missionary engagement in fulfillment of the entrusted Great Commission, and also a more vigorous quest for social justice and widespread repentance and moral renewal since the Risen Lord will judge men and nations for their misdeeds. Most participants saw in the return of modern Jewry to Palestine a fulfillment of OT prophecies. Conference leaders emphasized, however, that Israel as a nation is answerable to the requirements of divine justice no less than her Arab neighbor-nations.

CARL F.H. HENRY

JESUITS (Society of Jesus). The name given in 1540 to a brotherhood founded six years earlier by Ignatius Loyola.* He had been joined by six others: Francis Xavier,* Pierre Le Favre (Faber), James Laynez,* Alphonsus Salmeron, Nicholas Bobadilla, and Simon Rodriguez, and they vowed to go to Palestine or anywhere the pope would send them. They soon gained a reputation in Italy as preachers, leaders of retreats, and hospital chaplains. In 1539 they formed a "Company of Jesus" in Rome, dedicated to instructing children and illiterates in the law of God. In 1540 the Society of Jesus was established by a bull entitled Regimini militantis ecclesiae. During the period 1540-55 it grew rapidly, requiring an autocratic structure, which was provided by Loyola's military training and the exercises he had worked out in The Spiritual Exercises. These were not novel, for there were parallels in the Rules of Francis and Benedict. Nevertheless, they provided the atmosphere of religious obedience so essential to such a disciplined constitution, culminating in the special promise of obedience to the pope, demanded in full commitment to the Society. Loyola refused to turn it into a contemplative order, convinced that its task was to minister to society; thus he removed the obligation of the religious to say the offices in choir. It was this readiness of Loyola to adjust the old ideals of the monks to the new demands of the age that prepared the way for their success.

They established orphanages, houses for reclaiming prostitutes, schools, centers of poor relief, and even a system of banking for the destitute peasants. Their missionary work expanded; one of their most famous missionaries was Francis Xavier. By the time of Loyola's death in 1556, the Society was one thousand strong and its direction of ministry had changed in that its influence was felt more acutely among the aristocracy than among the poor. This change was accomplished mainly through Loyola's wisdom in adopting modern methods of education. The first Jesuit secondary school was established at Messina in 1548. Colleges were founded in university settings, and the Society became a teaching order and the leading movement in Catholic higher education, providing the most effective teaching methods in contemporary Europe.

The Jesuits were the pope's strong supporters at the Council of Trent* and also found themselves spearheading the intellectual attack on the Reformation* and becoming the foremost Catholic apologists. They arrived in England in 1578 and were much feared. The eighteenth century saw them expelled from Portugal (1759), France (1764), and Spain (1767). Pressure from various states forced Clement XIV in 1773 to issue the bull Dominus ac Redemptor, suppressing the Society. Not until 1814 were they restored by Pius VII's Sollicitudo omnium ecclesiarum. The Society is today still a powerful force in the world of education, responsible for the Gregorian University in Rome, and nine others in their eastern missions, in addition to their many schools and academies throughout the world.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: T. Hughes, The History of the Society of Jesus in North America (4 vols., 1907-17); T.J. Campbell, The Jesuits, 1534-1921 (1921); J. Brodrick, The Origin of the Jesuits (1940); M.P. Harney, The Jesuits in History (1941; rep. 1962); L. Polgar, Bibliography of the History of the Society of Jesus (1967); B. Basset, The English Jesuits (1968).

GORDON A. CATHERALL

JESUS CHRIST (c. 5 B.C.-c. A.D. 30). The Founder of Christianity bore "Jesus" (the Greek form of Joshua or Jeshua) as His personal name; "Christ"* (Gk. christos, "anointed") is the title given Him by His followers, who acknowledged Him to be the expected Messiah of Israel. Since the theological aspects of His person and work are treated under other entries, this article confines itself to the historical Jesus. By this is meant not simply Jesus as He is accessible to the scientific methods of the historian who views history as a closed continuum of cause and effect, from which any divine initiative is excluded, but Jesus as He actually was —a Jesus who is adequate to account for the Christian faith and life which have found their basis in Him.

Early days. According to the only two evangelists who give us any record of His birth and infancy, Jesus was born in Bethlehem, about six miles south of Jerusalem, toward the end of Herod the Great's reign (37-4 B.C.), but spent his boyhood and youth in Nazareth, a town in Galilee, where he was brought up, with four brothers and some sisters, in the household of Joseph, the carpenter or builder (who probably died before Jesus emerged into public view), and his wife Mary (who lived on to become, with the rest of the family, a member of the primitive church of Jerusalem). It was generally understood that the family was descended from King David, but Jesus, although He did not repudiate the designation "son of David" when it was given to Him, laid no weight on such descent.

His life up to the age of thirty is unchronicled apart from Luke's record of a visit which He paid to Jerusalem with Joseph and Mary when He was twelve years old. His early years, however, cannot have been uneventful. His home overlooked the mighty highway between Syria and Egypt, and news of the world outside Galilee would reach Nazareth quickly, losing nothing in the telling. At the age of about ten He would hear of the revolt led by Judas the Galilean against Quirinius's census in Judea, and of the severity with which it was crushed (A.D. 6). Sepphoris, four miles to the north, was involved in an earlier revolt during Jesus' infancy and was destroyed by the Romans, but it was subsequently rebuilt by Herod Antipas, who ruled from there as tetrarch of Galilee and Perea until he moved (c. A.D. 22) to his new capital, Tiberias; reports of happenings at his court would readily be carried to Nazareth. Scenes of Israel's ancient history, such as Mt. Tabor, where Deborah and Barak mustered their forces for victory over the Canaanites, or Mt. Gilboa, where Saul fell in battle against the Philistines, were familiar to Jesus from early days; even more pressingly familiar were the realities of Israel's present plight, dominated as she was by the Romans, either indirectly through their clients the Herod family, in the north, or directly farther south in Judea.

Beginnings of Jesus' ministry. Jesus' first public appearance was His receiving baptism in the Jordan near Jericho at the hands of John the Baptist (c. A.D. 27-28). This experience was the inauguration of His ministry. The descent of the dove in the baptismal narrative marked Him out as the one anointed with the Spirit of God to be the Servant-Messiah (cf. Isa. 11:2; 42:1; 61:1); the simultaneous voice from heaven addressed Him in terms which indicated He was Israel's king, acclaimed as Son of God in the oracle of Psalm 2:7, but a king who was to fulfil His royalty as the Servant of Isaiah 42:1 devoting His life to the will of God and the blessing of men. The conviction of His destiny thus impressed on Jesus' mind was confirmed by His temptation experience immediately following.

An early ministry in south and central Palestine, concurrent with the later period of John's activity, is attested for Jesus by the fourth evangelist (John 3:22ff.). But the main phase of His public ministry began in Galilee after John's imprisonment by Herod Antipas (Mark 1:14). In this ministry, the proclamation of the kingdom of God was accompanied by works of mercy and power, in which—especially in the cure of people who were demon-possessed—the advancing forces of that kingdom were manifested. All this aroused great popular enthusiasm throughout Galilee. When Jesus' refusal to be bound by religious convention, together with His insistence on interpreting and applying the law of God in the light of its original intention and not according to the tradition of the elders, meant that the synagogues were no longer available for His preaching, He found larger congregations on the hillside and by the lake shore.

From among His disciples He selected twelve men whom He commissioned to share His ministry, and sent them out two by two throughout the Jewish districts of Galilee to proclaim the kingdom of God. Their activity increased the popular enthusiasm and stimulated the unfriendly suspicion of Herod Antipas who, having recently executed John, felt that he had now a potentially more serious situation on his hands (Mark 6:7-16). On the return of the Twelve, Jesus took them out of Antipas's territory, but was pursued across the lake of Galilee by an excited crowd, prepared for militant action, who hoped that Jesus would put Himself at their head. They had to be dissuaded by "hard sayings" in which Jesus made it plain He had no intention of being the kind of leader they had in mind.

From then on, Jesus' Galilean following largely fell away, although a minority, more appreciative of the inwardness of His mission, remained loyal to Him. The Twelve, in particular, adhered to Him, and Jesus devoted a good part of the next few months to preparing them for the crisis which they would have to face when they went up with Him to Jerusalem for His fateful confrontation with the national and imperial authorities there.

Early preaching. His early Galilean preaching is summed up by Mark (1:15) in the announcement: "The appointed time has fully come, and the kingdom of God has drawn near; repent, and believe in the good news" (own trans.). In its setting this announcement could only mean that the time had come, in accordance with Daniel's apocalyptic visions, for Gentile dominion over Israel to give way to the everlasting and indestructible regime which God had promised to establish, in which dominion and judgment would be exercised by the "saints of the Most High." But that in itself differed little from the program of the Zealots.* The distinctiveness of Jesus' message appears in the content with which He filled this framework.

In this content the principal place is occupied by Jesus' teaching about the God to whom the kingdom belonged. Although He had so much to say about the kingdom of God, He did not speak of God as King (except indirectly, as in some of His parables), but as Father (not that there was any incompatibility between the concept of King and that of Father). When He spoke of God (or to God) as Father, He apparently used the form Abba, not a formal liturgical term but the designation which children gave to their father in the affectionate intimacy of the family circle. By His use of this designation Jesus expressed His awareness of loving nearness to God and implicit trust in Him, and—while He spoke on occasion of "the Father" and "the Son" on a plane of their own (e.g., Matt. 11:27; Luke 10:22)—He taught His disciples to use the same designation and think of God in the same way as He did. In His ethical teaching He insisted that the children of God should display the same qualities of grace and generosity as their Father did: if He did not withhold sunshine and rain from sinners, they must show compassion and a forgiving spirit to uncongenial and malicious persons, and be merciful as their Father was merciful (Luke 6:36). Nor should this attitude be a matter only of outward deed and word; it should, like all other ethical attitudes, be rooted in the inward thought and desire.

Those who listened to such teaching, with its emphasis on the supremacy of love, must have marked its fundamental divergence from that of the Zealots and their sympathizers, who inculcated an attitude of mortal hostility toward the Romans and those who collaborated with them. With His advocacy of nonretaliation and nonresistance Jesus coupled an active ministry which did not satisfy the messianic expectations of those who expected the restoration of David's kingdom or the execution of judgment upon the ungodly. When challenged on this point, Jesus emphasized He was indeed fulfilling the prophetic hope; as He said in the message which He bade the two disciples of John the Baptist deliver to their incarcerated master: "the blind receive their sight and the lame walk, lepers are cleansed and the deaf hear, and the dead are raised up, and the poor have good news preached to them" (Matt. 11:5 RSV; Luke 7:22). These were things which the greatest prophets of Israel had associated with the advent of the new age (cf. Isa. 35:5f.); in particular, the emphasis on the preaching of the good news of liberation to the poor marked Jesus out as the Spirit-anointed speaker of Isaiah 61:1f., who is commissioned to engage in precisely such a ministry. No wonder that in His programmatic sermon in the Nazareth synagogue, recorded in Luke 4:16ff., He began his exposition of Isaiah 61:1f. with the words: "Today this scripture is fulfilled in your hearing."

The kingdom of God and the Son of Man. The teaching of Jesus envisages two phases in the coming of the kingdom. The earlier, preparatory phase in which it was subject to limitations was present in His ministry—"If it is by the finger of God that I cast out demons, then the kingdom of God has come upon you" (Luke 11:20 RSV; cf. Matt. 12:28)—and should be manifested in the lives of His followers. But one day soon it would come "with power" (Mark 9:1), the limitations having been removed; and for this day Jesus taught His disciples to pray "Thy kingdom come" (Matt. 6:10 RSV; Luke 11:2). The frontier between the two phases is marked by the passion of the Son of Man.

The close association of the Son of Man with the kingdom of God in Jesus' teaching reflects Daniel 7:13f., where eternal and universal dominion is bestowed by God on "one like a son of man," whose counterpart in the angelic interpretation of the vision takes the form of "the saints of the Most High" (Dan. 7:18, 22, 27). The expression "the Son of Man" (with an exception in Acts 7:56 which proves the rule) is peculiar to Jesus in the NT and denotes His own relation (and also, in part, that of His followers) to the kingdom of God. Two main phases in the career of the Son of Man are distinguished in Jesus' teaching: He will indeed (as Daniel saw) receive dominion and appear in glory; "but first he must suffer many things and be rejected by this generation" (Luke 17:25 RSV; cf. Mark 8:31, etc.). The suffering of the Son of Man, as much as his investiture, is something that is "written" (Mark 9:12); and if it be asked where it is "written," a more promising answer is offered by the fourth Servant Song of Isaiah 52:13—53:12 than by the visions of Daniel.

If Jesus at His baptism was hailed from heaven in terms of Isaiah 42:1, then the other oracle which, like that, begins with the introduction "Behold my servant" would naturally have presented itself to Him as something which He was called upon to fulfil. His last words to the high priest at His trial confirm that His passion would be the prelude to vindication and manifestation in power: "From now on the Son of man shall be seated at the right hand of the power of God" (Luke 22:69 RSV; cf. Mark 14:62). Or, as His words are reported by John in another context: "When you have lifted up the Son of man, then you will know that I am he" (John 8:28). At times He spoke of His impending passion as the cup which He had to drink or the baptism which He had to undergo, and made it plain to His disciples that only by sharing His cup and baptism could they hope to share His glory—a glory which was not the external reward for sharing His ministry as the Servant-Messiah, but consisted in their sharing that ministry.

Jesus and the Ruling Powers. Jesus' teaching was revolutionary enough in its inner essence, but not directly revolutionary in the political sense which would attract the immediate hostility of the civil and military power. In Galilee there was little occasion for Him to refer to the Roman occupation of Judea. When news was brought to Him of a massacre of Galilean pilgrims in the temple area by the soldiery of Pilate, a prefect of Judea, Jesus made the report the basis of a general warning but expressed no judgment on the perpetrators. He is credited with one unflattering personal reference to the ruler of Galilee—"that fox" (Luke 13:32)—and may have indirectly criticized Herodias's remarriage (Mark 10:12). Antipas's hostility was perhaps aroused against Him because of indiscretions of the Twelve during their Galilean mission, but Jesus refused to countenance any seditious talk or action on their part, just as, in the sequel, He sharply discouraged the leaderless multitude which hailed Him as a second Moses and tried to compel Him to be their king (John 6:14f.; cf. Mark 6:34ff.). The proclamation of the kingdom of God and the inculcation of the Golden Rule as the way of life had incalculable implications for the Roman Empire and the Herodian dynasty alike, but Jesus deplored the Zealots' suicidal policy of armed revolt, which could lead only to disaster.

So, when He went to Jerusalem at the end of His ministry, His lament over the city and prediction of its overthrow were due to its refusal of the way of peace which He offered. The spirit of revolt was in the air; a recent abortive insurrection (Mark 15:7) had aroused widespread sympathy for its doomed leaders. When the Zealots' test-question, if God's chosen people should pay tribute to a pagan emperor, was put to Him, He answered that Caesar's coinage was best given back to Caesar, and that the important issue was to discharge one's duty to God. While His answer was bound to disappoint those who followed the Zealot line, it could be misrepresented (as in the event it was) to suggest a disavowal of allegiance to Caesar.

Death of Jesus. It was the enmity, in the first instance, of the temple authorities, not of the Roman administration, that He incurred in Jerusalem. His "cleansing" of the outer court of the Temple was not a violent demonstration such as would have led quickly to the intervention of Roman auxiliaries from the Antonia fortress; it was a "prophetic action" in the OT tradition, whose message was not lost on the leaders of the sacerdotal establishment: the restoration of the area to be "a house of prayer for all people" (Isa. 56:7) in terms of the prophetic ideal would prejudice their privileges. His action was as unacceptable to them as Jeremiah's temple speech had been to their predecessors six centuries before (Jer. 7:1ff., 26:1ff.). In addition, such attacks on an unpopular hierarchy, unless they were checked, could lead to a popular movement which would attract Roman reprisals. It was therefore decided to arrest Jesus unobtrusively, if possible. With the aid of Judas Iscariot, the Jewish authorities found an earlier opportunity of doing this than they had expected.

Jesus was arrested on Passover Eve. According to John (18:3,12), members of the Antonia garrison took part in the arrest; this suggests that the chief priests had already made preliminary arrangements with the Roman authorities. Jesus was brought first before a Jewish court of inquiry. After an unsuccessful attempt to convict Him of a threat to the Temple (the one department in which the Romans still allowed the Sanhedrin to exercise capital jurisdiction), His unexpected acceptance of the designation "Messiah" (albeit in His own preferred understanding of the term) gave His inquisitors the occasion they sought to hand Him over to Pilate as a leader of sedition, who claimed to be "the king of the Jews." This was the charge recorded in the "title" affixed above His head on the cross, to which Pilate, after some temporizing, condemned Him.

The abiding significance and saving efficacy of the death of Jesus belong to theological rather than historical study (see ATONEMENT). But the study of the historical Jesus includes what can be known about the way in which He viewed His death. When He spoke of giving His life "a ransom for many" as the crown of His service (Mark 10:45), He used language which was not unfamiliar in Israel. The martyrs of Maccabean times, for example, offered up their lives as an atonement for their people and land. In offering up His life as a ransom "for many," Jesus had in His mind the Servant of Yahweh who in His suffering bears the sin of "many" and procures their justification (Isa. 53:11f.). To the same effect His words at the institution of the cup interpret it as His "covenant [blood], which is poured out for many" (Mark 14:24), to which Matthew supplies the epexegesis, "for the forgiveness of sins" (Matt. 26:28). This is no peculiarly Markan theologumenon, of Pauline or comparable origin; it underlies the Johannine presentation of Jesus as "the Lamb of God, who takes away the sin of the world" (John 1:29) and His portrayal in the Apocalypse as the one who by His blood has ransomed men for God "from every tribe and language and people and nation" (Rev. 5:9). These and similar words convey the testimony of the early Christians that Jesus' own understanding of His death validated itself in their experience of its purifying and redemptive power.

With His resurrection on the third day after His crucifixion, the Jesus of history becomes the exalted Lord—in pre-Pauline Christianity as well as in Pauline; among Aramaic-speaking as well as among Greek-speaking believers (see CHRISTOLOGY). But the value of His exaltation to be Lord of all depends wholly on the continuity and identity of the exalted Lord with the Jesus of history, in whom already the Word had become flesh.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: A. Schweitzer, The Quest of the Historical Jesus (ET 1910); J. Klausner, Jesus of Nazareth (ET 1929); T.W. Manson, The Teaching of Jesus (2nd ed., 1935) and The Servant-Messiah (1953); V. Taylor, The Life and Ministry of Jesus (1954); J.M. Robinson, A New Quest of the Historical Jesus (1959); G. Bornkamm, Jesus of Nazareth (ET 1960); E. Stauffer, Jesus and His Story (ET 1960); N. Perrin, The Kingdom of God in the Teaching of Jesus (1963) and Rediscovering the Teaching of Jesus (1967); H. Zahrnt, The Historical Jesus (ET 1963); H. Anderson, Jesus and Christian Origins (1964); M. Kähler, The So-Called Historical Jesus and the Historic Biblical Christ (ET 1964); G.E. Ladd, Jesus and the Kingdom (1964); J. Peter, Finding the Historical Jesus (1965); O. Betz, What do we know about Jesus? (ET 1968); X. Léon-Dufour, The Gospels and the Jesus of History (ET 1968); D. Flusser, Jesus (ET 1969); C.H. Dodd, The Founder of Christianity (1971); H.J. Schultz (ed.), Jesus in His Time (ET 1971); E. Schweizer, Jesus (ET 1971).

F.F. BRUCE

JEWEL, JOHN (1522-1571). Bishop of Salisbury. Educated at Merton and Corpus Christi Colleges, Oxford, he became a fellow of Corpus in 1542. In 1547 the continental Reformer Peter Martyr* came to Oxford and greatly influenced Jewel, who became one of the leading thinkers in the Reforming party. On Mary's accession, Jewel agreed to sign anti-Protestant articles, but was still obliged to flee in danger of his life, and reached Frankfurt in 1555. There he was regarded suspiciously by John Knox* because of the articles he had signed, and he publicly expressed sorrow for his cowardice. With Richard Cox he defended the 1552 Prayer Book against Knox and the more advanced Reformers. Later he joined Peter Martyr in Strasbourg and accompanied him to Zurich. After his return to England in 1559 he corresponded with Martyr on the religious state of the country. In 1560 Elizabeth made him bishop of Salisbury, which he administered conscientiously and vigorously. He carried out several visitations, and on account of the lack of capable preachers, engaged himself in preaching and literary work.

In 1562 he published his Apologia pro ecclesia Anglicana, the first systematic defense of the Church of England against the Church of Rome. Written in Latin for circulation abroad, it was translated into English by Lady Bacon in 1564. It described the beliefs and practices of the Church of England, defending their deviation from the Roman ones, and sought to demonstrate both that a reformation had been needed and that local churches had the right to legislate for reform in provincial synods. The treatise was distinguished by weighty learning (especially of the early Church Fathers), logical reasoning, and absence of emotional appeal. It was given official approval in James I's reign by Archbishop Bancroft.

Lengthy and bitter controversy followed with the Roman Catholic Thomas Harding. A convinced Anglican, Jewel took his stand on the Elizabethan Settlement* and also opposed the Puritans with their desire for further reforms such as the abolition of the surplice. At Salisbury, Jewel built the cathedral library and educated and supported a number of poor boys, among them Richard Hooker,* whose Ecclesiastical Polity shows the strong influence of Jewel.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Collected Works (ed. J. Ayre, 1845-50, and R.W. Jelf, 1848); N.M. Southgate, John Jewel and the Problem of Doctrinal Authority (1962); J.E. Booty, John Jewel as apologist of the Church of England (1963). JOYCE HORN

JEWS, MISSIONS TO THE. Except under Hadrian, the Jews in the Roman Empire down to the reign of Constantine retained their position as a tolerated cult and were therefore more favorably placed than the Christians. Much the same was true in the East under the Parthian and Sassanid dynasties. Hence the Church tended to be on the defensive against the Synagogue, except for efforts by Hebrew Christians, of which we know little. The only surviving evidence from this period of a genuine attempt to reach the Jews is Justin Martyr's Dialogue with Trypho. Once Christianity had triumphed in the Roman Empire the only methods of dealing with Jews known to most in authority were discrimination, persecution, and sometimes forced baptism. During the Reformation and Counter-Reformation some little interest was shown by the Church in the conversion of the Jews, but not until the Moravians (1738) and Pietists did it become important. The work of Ezra Edzard (1629-1708), J.H. Callenberg (1694-1760) and A.H. Franke (1663-1723) led to the founding of the Institutum Judaicum at Halle in 1728.

A new era began when J.S.C.F. Frey (1771-1851), a Hebrew Christian from Germany, came to London. His work led to the founding of the London Society for Promoting Christianity among the Jews (later Church Missions to Jews, now The Church's Ministry among the Jews) in 1809 as an interdenominational society. Christian opinion was not yet prepared for such an experiment, and it soon had to be reformed as a purely Anglican one. In 1842 Free Church supporters of Jewish missions founded the British Society for Promoting Christianity among the Jews (British Jews' Society, now International Jews' Society).

The first acceptance of responsibility by a church as such was in 1840 by the Church of Scotland, and its example was followed by the Presbyterian Church of Ireland the following year. Beginning with Norway in 1844, the new concern spread to Scandinavia and Finland and gradually to all the main Protestant churches of Europe, though in varying degree. Especially important was the founding in 1886 of the Institutum Judaicum Delitzschianum in Leipzig by F. J. Delitzsch.* This provided the necessary intellectual tools for the missionary and apologist. The Swedes set up a similar institute in Jerusalem in 1951. In the Roman Church the most important development was the founding of the Sisters of Zion by Father Marie Ratisbonne, a Jew converted in 1842 by a vision.

A second generation of missionary societies came into existence in the second half of the century, largely as an answer to the westward surge of E European Jews. England gave the lead, most of the societies being nondenominational. The most important were the Mildmay Mission to the Jews (1876), the Barbican Mission to the Jews (1889, Anglican in leadership), and the Hebrew Christian Testimony to Israel (1893). In America most missionary work was purely local in its nature, but in 1894 Leopold Cohn founded the American Board of Missions to the Jews, interdenominational and fundamentalist in nature, which has grown to be the largest Jewish mission in the world, both in resources and missionaries. The only other mission of this kind that needs to be named is The Friends of Israel (1938). Many of the larger denominations support some form of missionary activity, normally depending on local response; the Southern Baptists are the only one active outside America.

The International Missionary Council* had from the first envisaged including Jewish missions in its scope, but it was not able to set up its Committee on the Christian Approach to the Jew (IMCCAJ) until after its Jerusalem meeting (1928), and it was scarcely functioning before the Nazi holocaust changed the whole position of Jewry. Its chief contribution was its insistence on the "Parish approach," i.e., in most countries the emergence of the Jew into the mainstream of life placed responsibility for Christian witness on the local church.

The effect of the holocaust on both Jews and Christians and of the coming into being of Israel led to an increasing stress on dialogue, which Vatican Council II declared to be the policy of the Roman Church. With the entry of IMC into the framework of the World Council of Churches, IMCCAJ became the Committee on the Church and the Jewish People (CCJP), and its main purpose has become the furthering of dialogue. In turn this has meant that active missionary work among Jews is being increasingly confined to conservative evangelical circles, which have all along been its mainstay. The list of converts is in every way an imposing one, but above all missions have succeeded in making Jesus a reality to His people.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: R. Allen, Arnold Frank of Hamburg (n.d.); J. Wilkinson, Israel My Glory (1894, 1921); W.T. Gidney, The History of the London Society for Promoting Christianity amongst the Jews from 1809 to 1908 (1908); D. McDougall, In Search of Israel: A Chronicle of the Jewish Mission of the Church of Scotland (1941); G.H. Stevens, "Go, Tell My Brethren": A Short Popular History of Church Missions to Jews (1809-1959) (1959). H.L. ELLISON and after some years in Rome served as secular priest and administrator in the Spanish Church. In 1484 he unexpectedly entered the strict Observantine Franciscan Order. For nearly ten years he lived an austere penitential life, gaining fame as a man of great spirituality. His secluded life changed when in 1492 Isabella made him her confessor. She consulted him often for political as well as spiritual advice. In 1495 he became archbishop of Toledo, head of the Spanish Church, and chancellor of Castile. Remaining an ascetic, he used his power and wealth to effect rigorous reform of the church and to convert or extinguish the Moors and Jews of the kingdom. After Isabella's death (1504) he became increasingly active politically. He financed and led para-Crusade military expeditions in North Africa and supported the monarchy against uprisings within Castile. For his services he was created cardinal in 1507.

JIMÉNES (Ximenez) DE CISNEROS, FRANCISCO (c.1436-1517). Spanish cardinal and inquisitor. Born Gonzales Jiménes at Torrelaguna in Castile, he took law degrees at Salamanca (1456)

Jiménes was a great patron of all types of philanthropic work, especially education. He founded and funded the University of Alcalá (1500) and the College of San Ildefonso. Alcalá he made a center of humanism, and financed the Complutensian Polyglot* Bible. He died at Roa, having effectively renewed the church and strengthened the monarchy of Spain.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Primary works are in Spanish, but among secondary sources are R. Merton, Cardinal Ximenes and the Making of Spain (1934); W. Starkie, Grand Inquisitor (1940); J.C. Niceto, Juan de Valdes and the Italian Reformation (1970).

BRIAN G. ARMSTRONG

JOACHIM OF FIORE (c.1135-1202). Mystic philosopher of history. He lived in Calabria, Italy, where he became a Cistercian monk. After being abbot of Curazzo, he retired to a more remote region and founded the order of San Giovanni in Fiore (1192). He recorded two mystical experiences which gave him the gift of spiritual intelligence enabling him to understand the inner meaning of history. At times he prophesied on contemporary events and the advent of Antichrist. He also meditated deeply on the two great menaces to Christianity, the infidel and the heretic.

With papal encouragement, Joachim explained his beliefs in three major works: the Exposition of the Apocalypse, the Concordance of the Old and New Testaments, and Psalterium of Ten Strings. His explanation involves interwoven patterns of twos and threes. The two testaments represent two eras of history culminating in the first and second advents. These periods are marked by other agreements such as twelve tribes and twelve churches and seven seals and seven openings. History is also trinitarian, with the first age being that of the Father when mankind lived under the law as recorded in the OT. The second age, that of the Son, is the period of grace and covers the NT dispensation which Joachim believed would last for forty-two generations of thirty years each. The third age was to be that of the Spirit during which the liberty of spiritual intelligence would prevail. This new age was to begin about A.D. 1260 and would be characterized by the rise of new religious orders that would convert the world.

Joachim's teaching was not meant to undermine ecclesiastical authority, but it inspired groups such as the Spiritual Franciscans and the Fraticelli, who carried his ideas to revolutionary conclusions to claim to be Joachim's spiritual men ready to usher in the third age.

See H. Bett, Joachim of Fiore (1931).

ROBERT G. CLOUSE

JOAN, POPE. The story of an alleged female pope was widely believed from the thirteenth to the seventeenth centuries. So much so, that when David Blondel argued in 1647 that it was a legend he was criticized by fellow Protestants. The story has it that a scholarly woman, disguised as a man, succeeded to the chair of Peter about 1100 (later versions state 855). After about two years in office she gave birth to a child as she was taking part in a procession to the Lateran, and then died. It seems that a thirteenth-century Dominican chronicler, Jean de Mailly, first gave respectability to the legend and that it gained wide currency in the Middle Ages, partly due to the influence of Martinus Polonus (d.1278) and the use of the story in fifteenth-century controversies over the extent of papal power. Some scholars interpret the story as a modification of a Roman folk-story, the original possibly relating to a priest of Mithra and a child.

PETER TOON

JOAN OF ARC (1412-1431). "The Maid of Orléans," national heroine of France. An illiterate though devout peasant girl from Domrémy, Champagne (called Jeanne la Pucelle), she began at the age of thirteen to experience inward promptings, voices accompanied by light, which urged her to save France from the aggressors. As these voices increased, she could even distinguish those of SS. Michael, Catherine, Margaret, and others. By this time the dauphin, Charles, was at war with the joint forces of England and Burgundy. Although she was unsuccessful at persuading the French commander at Vaucouleurs in 1428 of the reality of her visions, she was sent to Charles who became convinced when she recognized him in disguise. On close examination by theologians at Poitiers, she was given armor and attendants, then joined the army at Blois, later to rout the English besieging Orléans.

After another victory in the Loire she persuaded Charles to be crowned at Reims (1429). Going in 1430 to relieve Compiègne, she was there taken prisoner by the Burgundians and sold to the English without intervention from Charles VII. Appearing before the court of the bishop of Beauvais, she was charged with witchcraft and heresy; fearlessly enduring the long trial, she refused to betray her inward leading. Found guilty, with the verdict confirmed by the University of Paris, her visions were declared "false and diabolical." Facing death, she recanted slightly, only to stand firm once again. She was burnt as a heretic in the marketplace of Rouen. Charles VII twice sought a changed verdict, but not until Callistus III (1456) was the case declared fraudulent and her innocence acknowledged. Her death proved her influence; her banner carried the symbol of the Trinity and the words "Jesus, Maria." Canonized in 1920, she is the second patron of France.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: P. Champion (ed.), Procés de condamnation de Jeanne d'Arc (2 vols., 1920-21); W.F. Barrett, The Trial of Jeanne d'Arc (1931); L. Fabre, Joan of Arc (tr. G. Hopkins, 1954); R. Pernoud, Joan of Arc (1965). C.G. THORNE, JR.

JOGUES, ISAAC (1607-1646). Jesuit missionary and martyr. Born in Orléans, France, and educated at the local Jesuit college, he entered the Society of Jesus in 1624 and in 1636 was ordained and began missionary work among the Huron Indians in Canada. He made numerous journeys into the interior of North America. Returning once from Quebec, the canoes were attacked by the Iroquois and Jogues was taken prisoner. He was flogged, bitten, stripped, mutilated, and insulted by the Indians. He was rescued by the Dutch and sent to France, only to return to Quebec in 1644. He immediately sought permission to go as a missionary to the Iroquois, but his request was denied because of unsettled conditions. In 1646, while acting as part of a peace mission, he was again taken prisoner by the Iroquois and died of a hatchet blow. Jogues's martyrdom emphasized his great piety already apparent in his writings, and his self-sacrifice provided inspiration and impetus to Canadian missions. ROBERT WILSON

JOHANSSON, GUSTAF (1844-1930). Archbishop of Finland. Successively professor of dogmatics and ethics at the University of Helsinki (1877-85), bishop of Kuopio (1885-96), and bishop of Savonlinna (Nyslott) (1896-99), he became primate thereafter. His literary production was large and included a volume on dogmatics and publications on justification and on the Church of Finland. Although a conservative theologian, he struggled for many ecclesiastical reforms, the abolition of obligatory participation in Communion, and the advancement of diakonia. Chairman of the committee for a new translation of the Bible, he worked also toward a new church hymnal and catechism. He participated in politics as a clerical representative and boldly maintained the special position of Finland within the Russian Empire, even in the presence of the czar and his officials. In spite of this his policy of loyalty has been much criticized.

Johansson opposed the ecumenical movement, and especially the 1925 Stockholm Conference,* chaired by Archbishop Nathan Söderblom of Sweden. According to Johansson, the ecumenical trend was a grave danger to the church because it opened the door to syncretism and cooperation with liberal theologians. He felt also that ecumenicity could not be united with Christian eschatology. He was a disciple of J.T. Beck* of Tübingen, whose biblicism he tried to follow. Johansson retains a central position in the modern church history of his country, and his influence is still felt in the present generation of Finnish theologians. STIG-OLOF FERNSTROM

JOHN I (d.526). Pope from 523. He was Tuscan. His pontificate was marked by much friction with Theodoric the Ostrogothic ruler at Rome who adopted a very severe policy against the orthodox Catholics in Italy as his answer to an equally stringent policy by Justin against the Arians of the Eastern Empire. John went to Constantinople to secure a reversal of this policy, and he was partially successful. But on his return to Italy he was imprisoned by Theodoric and died in Ravenna.

JOHN VIII (d.882). Pope from 872. He devoted much of his pontificate to defending Italy against the Saracens. The various regnal and imperial coronation ceremonies which he conducted were designed to persuade the recipients to accept responsibility for Italy's defense. He had supported the emperor Louis the Stammerer who had overrun the duchy of Benevento in 873, but Louis died in 875. John then turned to his friend Charles the Bald and crowned him emperor on Christmas Day 875, but Charles's subsequent visits to Italy were fleeting and unsuccessful. John's great difficulty was an inability to detach the princes of Palermo, Naples, and Capua and the maritime power of Amalfi from their alliances with the Saracens. The hope of obtaining the Eastern emperor Basil I's support against the Saracens led John, at Basil's request, to recognize the previously deposed Photius* as patriarch of Constantinople, and to conclude peace between Rome and Byzantium at the Photian Council (879-80). In his final years John was forced to pay annual tribute to the Saracens. He was assassinated by conspirators at the Lateran Palace.

L. FEEHAN

JOHN XII (c.936-964). Pope from 955. He was the son of Alberic II of Spoleto, ruler of Rome, before whose death in 954 the nobles had to swear to elect his only son, Octavian, who was only eighteen. Called John, he was much given to vicious living, according to the historian Liutprand, bishop of Cremona. In 959 John tried to recover former papal lands from King Berengarius II and had to appeal for help from Otto I, who obligingly sent his army to Italy in 961. In return, Otto was crowned emperor in 962, and the archbishopric of Magdeburg and the bishopric of Merseburg were erected. Otto then issued the Privilegium Ottonianum, promising to make the pope temporal ruler of most of Italy, but with the provision that he recognize imperial suzerainty over the Papal States. Future popes were to take an oath of fealty to the emperor before consecration. Bitter strife between pope and emperor ensued; with increasing support Otto called a synod at Rome to accuse John of immorality. Deposition followed (963), and a Roman lay official was elected and consecrated Leo VIII. With Otto's departure from Rome in 964, however, John returned and took revenge. Leo was deposed and all his actions canceled. Liutprand records that John's death was sudden and scandalously mysterious.

C.G. THORNE, JR.

JOHN XXII (1244?-1334). Pope from 1316. Born Jacques d'Eudes, he studied law at Paris and elsewhere in France, and was successively bishop of Frejus (1300), bishop of Avignon (1310), and cardinal bishop of Porto (1312). At one time he had been chancellor of the Angevin kingdom of Naples, and his Angevin connection contributed to his election as pope. The first "Avignon" pope who really resided at Avignon,* he was an outstanding administrator. He was mainly responsible for that perfecting of the machinery of papal government which was one of the positive contributions of the Avignon papacy. He failed in his repeated attempts to break the Ghibelline (imperialist or antipapal) power in Italy and to reestablish a papal state there.

In pursuit of these aims he tried to assert the papacy's ultimate theocratic authority during imperial vacancies and over disputed imperial elections. This policy led to a long drawn-out quarrel with Emperor Lewis of Bavaria, whom he excommunicated in 1324 in the unsuccessful hope of fomenting civil war in Germany. Lewis counterattacked strongly. He organized a Ghibelline League which made great inroads into Italy. He encouraged Marsilius of Padua and John of Jandun, whose book Defensor Pacis was a fundamental challenge to John XXII's views on papal theocracy. Lewis also supported those Franciscan Spirituals who had protested against John's vesting in the Order of Friars Minor all property which had been given to it (1322-24). John had added, in justification of his decision, that although Christ and His apostles had lived in poverty, they had exercised the right of ownership both in common and individually (Cum inter nonnullos, 1323). The Spirituals claimed that this was heresy, but those who refused to accept the ruling were persecuted. Their leaders were excommunicated and a few Spirituals were burnt. When Lewis captured Rome, he had an antipope, Nicholas V, crowned and had John XXII condemned for heresy (1328). Lewis was, however, soon driven permanently from Italy, and his antipope submitted. L. FEEHAN

JOHN XXIII (c.1370-1419). Antipope. Born in Naples, Baldassare Cossa studied law at Bologna after an early military career. In 1402 he served as cardinal deacon under Boniface IX, then became cardinal and legate in Bologna (1403-8). In 1408 he collaborated in convening the Council of Pisa* to terminate the schism between Roman and Avignon popes by withdrawing support from Gregory XII, the Roman pope. He presided at the council in 1409. Both popes were deposed, and Alexander V was elected, but his sudden death led to Cossa's election to the papacy at Bologna in 1410.

With John XXIII in his company, Louis of Anjou recaptured Rome and defeated Ladislaus of Durazzo, an ally of Gregory XII. A new council in Rome condemned the works of Hus and Wycliffe in 1412, after Hus revolted against the emissaries John sent to Prague to sell indulgences and defame his political enemy, the king of Naples. In 1413 Ladislaus drove John from Rome to Florence. Out of constraint he complied with Emperor Sigismund's proposal for a new council at Constance.* The council, which opened in 1414, summarily deposed John in 1415, and the schism was ended with the election of Martin V. John's attempted escape failed when Sigismund placed him in custody. After submitting to the new pope in 1418, John was pardoned and soon named cardinal bishop of Tusculum (Frascati). The papal insignia graces his tomb in the baptistery at Florence, but after John XXIII ascended the throne in 1958 Cossa was no longer officially numbered among the popes. JOHN GROH

JOHN XXIII (1881-1963). Pope from 1958. Elected following a conclave of three days with eleven ballots, Angelo Giuseppe Roncalli had previously served as a secretary to the bishop of Bergamo in N Italy, directed the Congregation for the Propagation of the Faith in Italy, and then been apostolic delegate until in 1953 he became a cardinal and patriarch of Venice. It was thought at first that he would be only a "transitional" pope.

Of medium height, sturdy and stout, he looked very different from his predecessor, Pius XII. His whole approach was also different from other modern popes. He chose the name "John," a title not used for five and a half centuries; at the Christmastide following his election he made lengthy visits to two hospitals, caused sick and crippled children to visit him, and also visited the Regina Coeli prison. Soon he gained the love of Christians everywhere; beneath the vestments of the pope they felt there still existed the soul and heart of a country priest. An all-important day in his pontificate was 25 January 1959. To a stunned extraordinary congregation of seventeen cardinals who were in Rome he announced he would do three things: (1) call a synod of the church in the city and diocese of Rome; (2) summon an ecumenical council to promote Christian unity; (3) promote the reform of canon law. There had not been a Roman synod since medieval times, and the last council had met in 1869-70. If there was opposition to his ecumenical ideals within the Vatican, leaders in other churches were most gratified. Athenagoras, Orthodox patriarch of Constantinople, was delighted; and Archbishop Fisher of Canterbury even called upon the pope, an event that caused a great stir in England.

Pope John made two famous speeches in 1962, one on the relationship between the church and the world, and another at the opening of the council. The latter urged the church to respond to the twentieth century and make the depositum fidei relate to the world and its needs. As the council progressed in its first session, he took a lively interest in it and prodded often in order to facilitate progress. Both during and after the first session John XXIII was a sick man, but he continued his work unabated. His visits to hospitals and parishes in Rome continued. Statesmen—e.g., Harold Macmillan of Britain—and church leaders—e.g., the prior of the Protestant community of Taizé—were given audiences.

On 29 March 1963 he set up the Commission of Cardinals to revise the Code of Canon Law. During this same period he showed great concern for a happy relationship of the church with Communist governments. He saw the release of the archbishop of Lvov in the Ukraine from prison, and he received at the Vatican the son-in-law of Nikita Kruschchev. Furthermore, bishops from Poland, Hungary, and other countries behind the Iron Curtain were allowed to attend the council. His encyclicals included: Ad Petri Cathedram, which related to the council; Princeps Pastorum, which dealt with missions; Mater et Magistra, which looked at social questions; and Pacem in terris, which dealt with peace on earth. Part V of the latter was concerned with the relationship of the church to Communist governments.

The last week of his life was followed intensely by the press of the free world, for his warm, irradiating humanity had endeared him to many who did not share his religious views.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: L. Algisi, Giovanni XXIII (1959); F.X. Murphy, Pope John XXIII Comes to the Vatican (1959); E. Balduci, Papa Giovanni (1964); E.E.Y. Hales, Pope John and His Revolution (1965); G. Lercaro and G. De Rosa, John XXIII, Simpleton or Saint (1967); M. Trevor, Pope John (1967). See also John XXIII, Journal of a Soul (ET 1965), and bibliography under VATICAN II.

PETER TOON

JOHN, ACTS OF. A legendary document belonging to the early third century, purporting to give information about the life and work and death of John the Apostle. The original in Greek consisted of 2,500 lines. Large sections of this survive, although the beginning is lost. We also have a Latin version of some otherwise unknown incidents involving John, and several fragmentary MSS. The work probably originated from Ephesus, which is the setting for many of the events and traditionally the place where John died. The work is remarkable as much for the words attributed to John as for the works. It contains also a docetic account of the death of Jesus. The Acta Ioannis came eventually to be regarded as the work of the Valentinian Leucius, a supposed disciple of the apostle. In the fifth century an orthodox revision of the Acts of John was ascribed to one Prochorus.

STEPHEN S. SMALLEY

JOHN, EPISTLES OF, see EPISTLES, GENERAL

JOHN, GOSPEL OF. The history of the interpretation of the gospel of John shows that until the middle of the twentieth century the major concern of critics has usually been with the identity of the fourth evangelist. During the nineteenth century, for example, radicals like A.F. Loisy* regarded this gospel as an unhistorical, theological reconstruction of the first three gospels, having no connection with John the Apostle; whereas conservative scholars like B.F. Westcott* maintained that the fourth gospel was mainly if not entirely an apostolic work. At the turn of the twentieth century, and under the influence of the religio-historical method of biblical exegesis, the gospel of John was viewed as representative of a late stage in the process of hellenizing Christianity (O. Pfleiderer; cf. R. Bultmann, who claims that John used ideas current in Gnostic circles to give expression to Christian truth). Later, scholars such as A. Schlatter* and C.F. Burney,* taking serious account of the Semitic background to the language and ethos of the gospel, began to assert its Jewishness.

Tradition. Johannine criticism since 1950 has tended to find the key to the problem of the fourth gospel (namely, the apparently large differences between John's gospel and the synoptic gospels) in the issue of tradition rather than authorship. The "old look," represented by the work already mentioned, assumed that the fourth evangelist's tradition was derived directly from the synoptic gospels and was either John's own work of history (in which case the supposed conflict between the two versions presented a difficulty) or a later, theological reshaping of the so-called historical tradition of the synoptists by someone other than the apostle. But the more recent "new look" on the gospel of John recognizes that a sharp division of this kind between history and theology in the gospels is invalid; and also that there probably lies behind the fourth gospel a reliable and primitive Christian tradition, parallel to that behind the synoptic gospels and independent of it.

The likelihood that the synoptic and Johannine traditions are related in this way (at the substructural level, rather than by direct literary dependence) has been confirmed in three directions. First, it is suggested by a straight literary comparison between John and the other gospels (P. Gardner-Smith). Secondly, the evidence of the Dead Sea Scrolls makes it likely that a religious setting which could have influenced the writing of John's gospel existed before the Christian tradition began. In this milieu, Jewish and Greek (even pre-Gnostic) ideas and terms were combined in a way that was previously known outside the fourth gospel only from late, Hellenistic literature. Thirdly, archaeological excavation in and around Jerusalem has established the probability that John's gospel drew on a genuinely historical tradition which was originally transmitted in a S Palestinian setting.

Composition. The "new look" on John's tradition, which is accepted by many but not all contemporary writers on the fourth gospel, clearly affects the question of the composition of this gospel, and the extent to which the John the Apostle (traditionally regarded since Irenaeus as both "the disciple whom Jesus loved" and the Fourth Evangelist) is associated with it. The beloved disciple plays the role in the fourth gospel that John the Apostle does in the synoptic gospels, and also appears as a witness to the tradition being recorded (cf. John 19:35; 21:24). It is possible therefore that John was responsible for the tradition behind the fourth gospel, which explains why the church eventually accepted the gospel as his; but that he did not write the gospel in its final form, which explains why there was hesitation at first to accept it as coming from an apostolic hand. In this case three basic stages may have been involved in the composition of the gospel. At the first stage, the tradition about Jesus, mostly in oral form, would have taken shape in Palestine in association with John the Apostle himself. Secondly, this tradition may have been recorded by a disciple-friend of John in later life, at Ephesus (traditionally the place where the apostle ended his days, and where his gospel was published). This writer may be called the fourth evangelist. Finally, after John's death the fourth evangelist, in the context of a Johannine school perhaps, may have edited the gospel material so far written down, adding the epilogue (John 21) and prologue (1:1-18) in that order, and drawing out the implications of its distinctive theology already present in seminal form at the second stage (R.V.G. Tasker, R.E. Brown; cf. R. Bultmann, R.T. Fortna). Despite the early background to the fourth gospel just suggested, it was probably still the fourth to be written (c. A.D. 85); cf. its developed theology, and especially its high Christology.

Purpose. Like all the evangelists, John wrote his gospel to proclaim Jesus as Lord and Christ. He expresses his intention directly in John 20:31. The background and character of the gospel suggest that he is in the first place addressing a group of Hellenistic Jews, probably in the diaspora. This accounts for the shaping of a basically Palestinian tradition in a Greek direction, and suggests that the Hellenism of the fourth gospel belongs to the environment in which it was published rather than to its original tradition; although the Hellenistic elements in John (concepts such as Logos, light, and knowledge) also have their own Hebraic background which a Jew could appreciate. But the fact that the writer explains Jewish terms (such as "Messiah," John 1:41) and customs (such as the Passover, 6:4), which cannot have been unfamiliar to the most hellenized Jew, indicates that ultimately the scope of John's audience was probably without limit. He is anxious that any reader of the gospel should "see" who Jesus is, and receive the life He came to give (20:29-31).

For this purpose the writer selects seven "signs," beginning with the Incarnation (1:14), which reveal the true nature of Jesus as the Savior of the world (4:42), and point toward the fulfillment of the salvation in His glorification (13:31). Thus John 1—12 deals with the revelation of the Word to the world, and 13—21 with the glorification of the Word for the world. A theological development of this kind makes better sense of the structure of the fourth gospel than sacramental (O. Cullmann) or liturgical-lectionary (A. Guilding) theories.

The gospel in the early church. The fourth gospel seems to have been used by Gnostics, especially the Alexandrians, before it was used by the orthodox; and it was the Valentinians (e.g., Ptolemaeus and Heracleon, the first commentator on the gospel) who first ascribed it to "John," presumably wishing to secure apostolic authority for their teaching. Evidently the heretics found that the doctrinal diversity in the gospel favored their dualist and docetic theology. The gospel probably influenced as well the Valentinian Gospel of Truth and the apocryphal Gospel of Peter (c.150). The Apologists, beginning with Justin Martyr (mid-second century), are the first orthodox writers to show any likely knowledge of the gospel, although there are possible traces in Ignatius (c.115), and Tatian used the gospel in his Diatessaron (c.150); but it is not until Theophilus of Antioch (late second century) that any certainty about its authenticity is reached. Theophilus quotes the opening phrases of the prologue to the fourth gospel as the words of John, implying but not stating that this John was the apostle.

Thereafter the gospel is attributed directly to John the Apostle, the beloved disciple, who died at Ephesus where the work was published (cf. the Muratorian Canon, Irenaeus, Polycrates, and Clement of Alexandria, who gives us the famous description of John as the "spiritual gospel"; also the anti-Marcionite prologue to the gospel of John, although its date is uncertain). Papias, described by Irenaeus as a disciple of John, and Polycarp his companion, are strangely silent about the gospel; so also is the third century apocryphal document, the Acts of John, * where allusion to the gospel would have been natural. From the beginning of the third century the apostolic authorship of the fourth gospel was denied by the church, probably because of its use by Gnostics (cf. the Alogi in the late second century, who went so far as to ascribe the gospel and Revelation of John to the Gnostic heretic Cerinthus); and it was not until much later that the fourth gospel was accepted back into the NT canon as genuinely apostolic. The history of the gospel of John in the early church accords with its origin as suggested above.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Ancient commentaries: Cyril of Alexandria (ed. P.E. Pusey, 1872); Chrysostom (ed. J.P. Migne, PG LIX); Heracleon (fragmentary; see Texts and Studies I [1891], pp. 50-103); Origen (ed. A.E. Brooke, 1896); Theodore of Mopsuestia (Syriac in Corpus Scriptorum Christianorum Orientalium: Scriptores Syri, IV.3, 1940); Augustine (Corpus Christianorum, Series Latina XXXVI, 1954); also J. Calvin (1553).

Modern commentaries: B.F. Westcott (1882); B. Weiss (4th ed., 1902); A. Loisy (2nd ed., 1921); J.H. Bernard (1928); E.C. Hoskyns (2nd ed., 1947); C.K. Barrett (1955); R.H. Lightfoot (1956); R. Bultmann (4th ed., 1959); R.V.G. Tasker (1960); R. Schnackenburg (1965); R.E. Brown (1966-70); J. Marsh (1968); J.N. Sanders (1968); L. Morris (1971); B. Lindars (1972).

Special studies: W. Sanday, The Criticism of the Fourth Gospel (1905); C.F. Burney, The Aramaic Origin of the Fourth Gospel (1922); P. Gardner-Smith, St. John and the Synoptic Gospels (1938); R.H. Strachan, The Fourth Gospel: Its Significance and Environment (3rd ed., 1941); J.N. Sanders, The Fourth Gospel in the Early Church (1943); O. Cullmann, Early Christian Worship (ET 1953); C.H. Dodd, The Interpretation of the Fourth Gospel (1953); W.F. Howard, The Fourth Gospel in Recent Criticism and Interpretation (4th ed., 1955); A.E. Guilding, The Fourth Gospel and Jewish Worship (1960); M.F. Wiles, The Spiritual Gospel (1960); C.H. Dodd, Historical Tradition in the Fourth Gospel (1963); A.M. Hunter, According to John (1968); J.L. Martyn, History and Theology in the Fourth Gospel (1968); L. Morris, Studies in the Fourth Gospel (1969); R.T. Fortna, The Gospel of Signs (1970); T.E. Pollard, Johannine Christology and the Early Church (1970); B. Lindars, Behind the Fourth Gospel (1971); C.K. Barrett, The Gospel of John and Judaism (1975).

STEPHEN S. SMALLEY

JOHN, GRIFFITHS (1831-1912). Co-founder with Robert Wilson of the first Protestant mission in Inland China. Born in Wales, he was appointed to China by the London Missionary Society in 1855. The first mission was established in Hankow six years later. John traveled widely from Hankow through Hupeh and Hunan and up the Yangtze River into Szechwan, though no work could be started there until 1888, when a Chinese evangelist took up residence in Chungking. Land was purchased in Wuchang in 1863 despite the opposition of officials. John also prepared a translation of the NT in Mandarin, and started on the OT for the Bible Societies. He undertook too a translation into easy Wen-li. In 1901 the LMS under John's leadership established several stations in the long-resistant province of Hunan. John was undoubtedly one of the five most prominent missionaries in China in the nineteenth century. LESLIE T. LYALL

JOHN BAPTIST DE LA SALLE, see LA SALLE

JOHN CHRYSOSTOM, see CHRYSOSTOM

JOHN CLIMACUS (579-649). Ascetic and mystic; also known as "Sinaites" and "Scholasticus" (though not to be confused with Patriarch John III). A monk of Sinai, he became an anchorite and later abbot of the monastery. His life was written by Daniel, a monk of Raithu on the Red Sea. His name was derived from his book Ladder of Paradise (Klimax tou Paradeisou). There are thirty "steps of the ladder," corresponding with the age of Christ at His baptism. Each step is a chapter describing a particular monastic virtue or vice, showing the way it may be acquired or eliminated. Step 30 is entitled "Faith, Hope and Charity," where the monk receives the crown of glory from Christ. J.G.G. NORMAN

JOHN FREDERICK, ELECTOR (1503-1554). German Lutheran prince, called "the Magnanimous." Born at Torgau, he was the son of Elector John the Constant. Well educated under the Lutheran Spalatin,* he strongly supported Luther and was instrumental in the publication of early editions of his works. His reign as elector was crucial in the consolidation of Lutheranism, and particularly in the establishment of a Lutheran state church. A bulwark of the Smalcald League, he was defeated by Charles V's forces at Mühlberg in 1547, taken prisoner, and lost Wittenberg and his electoral title. Released in 1552, he established his government at Weimar and founded the University of Jena to replace Wittenberg, but he died at Weimar before his programs developed. BRIAN G. ARMSTRONG

JOHN GUALBERT (c.990-1073). Founder of the Vallumbrosan Order. Originally he was a member of the Benedictine monastery at San Minato, near Florence. After four years there he joined the monastery at Camaldoli, and some time later moved to Vallumbrosa, a city probably near Florence, where he formed his own monastic settlement. The Rule of the Vallumbrosan Order was a modified Benedictine, in some ways more austere, and it particularly excluded manual labor. The order eventually included the institution of lay brothers. Traditional date for the founding of the order is about 1300. John Gualbert has been canonized by the Roman Catholic Church.

JOHN OF ANTIOCH (d.441). Patriarch of Antioch. Former student of Theodore of Mopsuestia, he is known chiefly through the writings of Cyril* of Alexandria and the records of the Council of Ephesus* of 431. John arrived late at the latter; Cyril had already illegally proceeded without him. John's arrival reversed the sides and the decisions, except for the condemnation of Nestorius (see NESTORIANISM), and added a procedural condemnation of Cyril. A compromise was effected in 433: Cyril kept his Theotokos, but in the context of an Antiochene union of one person in two natures. Measured in terms of the condemnation of Nestorius, victory lay with Cyril; but that a moderating reconciliation should have been required and accomplished suggests the importance of John. The whole situation was complicated by the fact that in the midst of theological debate there were also nontheological factors: imperial concern, patriarchal rivalry, and human personality. CLYDE CURRY SMITH

JOHN OF AVILA (1500-1569). Spanish missionary and scholar. Born near Toledo, he studied law at Salamanca only to abandon it (1515) for philosophy and theology at Alcalá under Domingo de Soto. He dispensed the family fortune to the poor after his ordination in 1525 and hoped to go to America as a missionary. Persuaded to work in Spain instead, he was a missionary in Andalusia for nine years. A great preacher and counselor, he pleaded strongly for reform and denunciation of vice in high places, which brought him before the Inquisition, where he was declared innocent (1533). From Seville he went to Cordova and then to Granada in 1537 where he helped found the university. His greatest work was in reforming Spanish clerical life, with a large circle of disciples around him who taught in colleges he founded. The University of Baeza became a model for seminaries and schools of the Jesuits, who revered him and whose work he widely encouraged. John of God, Francis Borgia, Teresa of Avila, and Louis of Granada (his biographer) benefited from his friendship and counsel. His sermons and letters of spiritual direction are literary classics, but Audi Filia (c.1530) on Christian perfection is his best work. C.G. THORNE, JR.

JOHN OF BEVERLEY (d.721). Bishop of York. He was educated at the school of Canterbury and later studied at Hilda's double abbey at Whitby. He was one of the five pupils of hers there who later became bishops. John was appointed to the see of Hexham in 686. One of those whom he ordained while he was at Hexham was Bede.* In 705 he was translated to York. During his episcopate there he founded an abbey at Inderawood (the modern Beverley), to which he retired on resigning his see in 718. He had a considerable reputation for personal holiness and seems to have possessed gifts of spiritual healing. An extensive cultus grew up around him in medieval England. R.E. NIXON

JOHN OF CAPISTRANO, see CAPISTRANO

JOHN OF DAMASCUS (c.675-c.749). Greek theologian and last of the great Eastern fathers. After serving as chief representative of the Christians in the court of the caliph of Damascus, he left (or was compelled to leave) and entered the monastery of St. Sabas near Jerusalem where he was ordained priest. In the Iconoclastic Controversy* he defended in three treatises the use of icons. His fame, however, is particularly associated with his Fount of Wisdom (or Sources of Knowledge) which achieved lasting fame in both East and West. It is divided into three parts, covering philosophy, heresies, and the orthodox faith. The last part presents the teaching of the Greek fathers on important doctrines and has always been used as a textbook in the Orthodox Churches.

He was, however, unknown in the West, apart from references in florilegia or Catenae of patristic quotations, until the twelfth century when his Exposition of the Catholic Faith was translated into Latin as De Fide Orthodoxa. A century later the other two parts of the Fount of Wisdom were likewise translated. Peter Lombard appealed to the authority of John of Damascus twenty-seven times in his Sentences (1150). In the thirteenth century the De Fide was divided into four books on the model of the Sentences. Also, the discovery of two versions of a concordance to the De Fide, dating from the mid-thirteenth century, would seem to go far in supporting the view that the De Fide was important in the creation of Western medieval theology. In 1890 Pope Leo XIII declared John to be a "Doctor of the Church." John also wrote a treatise on the ascetic life, a commentary on the Pauline epistles, and various poems (hymns). Some of his sermons also are extant.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Works in J.P. Migne (ed.), PG XCIV-XCVI; J. Nasrallah, Saint Jean de Damas (1950); B. Studer, Die theologische Arbeitsweise des J. von Damaskos (1956); B. Kotter, Die Überlieferung der pege Gnoseos des Johannes Damaskenos (1959) and Die Schriften des J. von Damaskos (1969). PETER TOON

JOHN OF GOD (1495-1550). Founder of Brothers Hospitallers.* Born John Ciudad in Portugal, he was a soldier until forty, when he returned to Spain as a shepherd lamenting his sinful life. Hoping for martyrdom in Africa, he returned to Granada (1538) to sell books and religious pictures. Ministered to by John of Avila, he began his ministry to the sick poor and founded a hospital there. Many were attracted to the work, which had archiepiscopal approval, and Bishop Tuy named him "John of God," prescribing a habit for him and his companions. The order, Brothers Hospitallers, received papal approval in 1572, and its Rule was devised after his death. Canonized in 1690, he was declared patron of hospitals and the sick (1886) and of nurses (1930).
C.G. THORNE, JR.

JOHN OF LEYDEN (Jan Beukelszoon) (1509-1536). Militant Anabaptist.* When Anabaptism was spreading rapidly in the northern Low Countries in the late 1520s, Jan Beukelszoon was rebaptized by Jan Mattheys of Haarlem, a fiery chiliast preacher. Militant "apostles" gathered in Westphalia, where Münster seemed ready to be the Anabaptist "city of refuge." Many of the lower classes there had turned Anabaptist, taken control, banned unbelievers, and incurred a siege by the outraged bishop of Münster. Mattheys, followed by Beukelszoon and others, went there, and after Mattheys was killed in battle, the tailor of Leyden was crowned king of the "New Zion." He instituted community of goods and polygamy, and executed his opponents. Protestant nobles joined Catholic forces against the city, and after its fall the defenders were slaughtered (1536), with their leader numbered among the dead. The memory of Münster helped shape the stereotype of the Anabaptists as disturbers of the peace and as erratic revolutionaries. DIRK JELLEMA

JOHN OF MATHA (Jean de Matha) (1160?-1213). One of the founders of the Order of Trinitarians. A native of Provence, France, he became a priest and consecrated himself to the redemption of Christian captives in the hands of the Turks. To further this purpose, with Felix of Valois (d.1212) he founded the Trinitarian Order at Cerfroid in the diocese of Meaux (1198). He was canonized in 1679.

JOHN OF MONTE CORVINO (d. c.1330). Founder of the first Franciscan mission in China. Born at Monte Corvino (Salerno), he was commissioned by Pope Nicholas IV in 1291, with letters for eastern kings, and journeyed through Persia, spent a year in India where he made about one hundred converts, and finally reached Khanbalik (Peking) in 1294. Khan Timor Olcheitu (Chentsung) was receptive to John and his traveling companion, a merchant, Peter Lucalonga. John was most successful in establishing a mission at Tenduk, northwest of Khanbalik, where the ruling prince, George, already a Nestorian Christian, converted to Western orthodoxy. Lucalonga became a successful merchant in China and donated land for the establishment of three churches. John was named archbishop in 1307 by Pope Clement V. Besides making 6,000 converts, he translated the NT and Psalms and established a native boys' choir that was highly popular with the people and the khan. DONALD M. LAKE

JOHN OF PARIS (c.1250-1306). Preacher and early conciliarist. Also known as John Quidort, he was born and educated in Paris. Joining the Jacobins,* he established a reputation for brilliance as an apologist for Thomism and respondent to William de la Mare's Correctorium fratris Thomae. A popular preacher and lecturer on Peter Lombard's Sentences, he was stripped of these offices near the end of his life for his writings on the Eucharist and the papacy. De potestate regia et papali (1302) anticipated conciliarist positions by advocating Christ as head of the church, collegiate authority, and deposition of the pope under certain circumstances. His interpretation of Christ's presence at the sacrament approximated consubstantiation and influenced Lutheran thought. He died in Bordeaux while appealing his suspension to the pope. JAMES DE JONG

JOHN OF PARMA (1209-1289). Franciscan leader. He taught logic at Parma, became a Franciscan in 1233, and later went to Paris for further study. He taught theology and was a master in logic and an eloquent preacher. As minister-general of his order from 1247 he sought to restore its asceticism and original standards. To this end he traveled throughout Europe, trying also to unite the Eastern and Western churches. His austerity and adherence to the doctrines of Joachim of Fiore,* together with a suspect treatise, brought his resignation, at Alexander IV's insistence, in 1257. He suggested Bonaventura* as his successor. The rest of John's life was spent in penance and contemplation as a solitary at the hermitage of Greccio. In 1289 he set out for Greece again to further reunion, but died en route at Camerino. The Franciscan Salimbene (1221-88) described John in his Chronicle as handsome, charming, learned, musical, strong, and energetic.
C.G. THORNE, JR.

JOHN OF RAGUSA (c.1380-c.1443). Dominican theologian. Born John Stoikovic, he became a considerable scholastic figure. In 1422, as a representative of Paris University, he successfully urged Martin V to hold a council, and was present at its sessions in Pavia and Siena. He became procurator general of the Dominicans in 1426, residing in Rome, and was influential with Martin V, helping to persuade him to call the Council of Basle* (1431). He attended its opening stages as papal theologian, preaching the opening sermon, and debating with the Hussites. In 1435 the council sent him to Constantinople as part of an embassy to attempt to achieve the union of Eastern and Western churches. He spent some years there persuading the emperor John Palaeologus to send representatives to the council, studying Greek, and when in 1437 there were envoys of the pope and council in Constantinople at the same time, preventing open hostility between them. He supported Felix V and became a cardinal, though some argue that he was faithful to Eugenius IV. Of his extant writings, his accounts of the councils of Siena and the early stages of Basle, together with his condemnation of Hussite teaching, are the most important. C. PETER WILLIAMS

JOHN OF ST. THOMAS (1589-1644). Dominican scholar. Portuguese and named from his devotion to Thomas Aquinas, he read arts and theology at Coimbra, continuing at Louvain, where he studied under a Dominican and entered the order. In 1620 he began lecturing in theology, at Piacenza and Madrid, then held the chair at Alcalá, simultaneously being a qualificator of the Supreme Council of the Spanish Inquisition. Confessor and adviser to Philip IV, he refused on insufficient evidence to condemn Louvain professors brought before him. Cursus theologicus was his chief work (1637-67), a commentary on Aquinas's Summa Theologica, the first four volumes of which were published during his lifetime. Cursus philosophicus (1631) also followed Thomist forms, and the Compendium (1640) on doctrine was published in seven Spanish editions and several languages. C.G. THORNE, JR.

JOHN OF SALISBURY (c.1115-1180). Medieval philosopher and classical scholar. Born of a poor family at Salisbury, Wiltshire, he studied under Abelard* at Paris and at Chartres. He became a papal clerk and was employed on various missions. In 1153 he returned to England to become chief minister and secretary to Theobald and Thomas Becket,* archbishops of Canterbury. He supported Becket against Henry II and was present at the archbishop's death in 1170. He became bishop of Chartres in 1176. His principal writings are the Policraticus (1159), a political treatise, and the Metalogicon (1159), which defends the study of logic and metaphysics and argues fittingly, as the best Latinist of his age and a notable man of letters, that this should be related to literary education. The latter work demonstrates his acquaintance with Aristotle's logical writings. He also wrote Historia Pontificalis and a number of Letters. HOWARD SAINSBURY

JOHN OF THE CROSS (1542-1591). Spanish mystic. Born Juan de Yepez y Alvarez in Old Castile, of a poor family of noble origin, he entered the Carmelite monastery at Medina del Campo in 1563. After studying theology at Salamanca, he was ordained (1567). Dissuaded by Teresa of Avila* from becoming a Carthusian, he introduced her reforms among the friars, joining the first of their reformed houses (Discalced*) at Duruelo. He then became master of the Carmelite College at Alcalá de Henares (1570-72) and confessor of the Convent of the Incarnation at Avila (1572-77).

Imprisoned in 1577 in the Carmelite monastery at Toledo for his reforms (his general favored a more relaxed rule: Calced*), he wrote the beginning of The Spiritual Canticle, but the entire work derives from this experience. With his escape after nine months to the monastery of Calvario came the separation between Calced and Discalced. He and Teresa were joint founders of the Discalced Carmelites. He was rector of the college at Baeza (1579-81) and prior at Segovia from 1588. In 1581 he went to Granada and became acquainted with the Arabian mystics. Writing out of personal experience and as a student of Scripture and Thomism, he wrote three poems, with commentaries: The Dark Night of the Soul (on which The Ascent of Mount Carmel is a second commentary), The Spiritual Canticle, and The Living Flame of Love. In this order is spiritual progression, classically conceived, with his own mystical experience bursting out in the third poem. Distrusted by his superiors, he was removed from the friary at La Penuela to Ubeda, where he died from inhumane treatment. He was canonized in 1726 and made a "Doctor of the Church" in 1926.

See B. Frost, Saint John of the Cross (1937), and E.A. Peers, Handbook of the Life and Times of Saint Teresa and Saint John of the Cross (1954).

C.G. THORNE, JR.

JOHN OF WESEL (c.1400-1481). Roman Catholic reformer. John Ruchrath or Rucherat was born in Oberwesel am Rhein, studied at Erfurt (where he later served as rector of the university), and after a brief period as professor in Basle (1461), he became a cathedral preacher in Worms (1463). He fought for the reform of theology, even when it led him to defend disturbing and unpopular positions. He rejected the Filioque clause of the Nicene Creed as unbiblical, and virtually denied the Augustinian doctrine of original sin on the same grounds. Canon law was binding only inasmuch as it accorded with Scripture. Fasting, clerical celibacy, distinctions between bishops and priest were all human institutions and held no authority over the conscience of the faithful. Indulgences were a pious fraud, because only God could remit the penalties for sin. Indicted for suspected Hussite doctrines, he was deposed in 1477 and brought before the Inquisition in 1479. He recanted, but his books were burnt and he was sentenced to confinement for the rest of his life in the Augustinian cloister at Mainz. He died soon after, a broken and dispirited man.
DAVID C. STEINMETZ

JOHN SCHOLASTICUS (d.577). Born at Sirimis, near Antioch, the son of a cleric, he was a lawyer at Antioch, where he made a famous collection ("Synagoge") of canons, which he later re-edited and enriched from the Novellae of Justinian, so that the work became one of the primary sources for subsequent Eastern canon law. He was appointed patriarch of Constantinople by Justinian in 565, succeeding Eutychius who had been exiled for opposing Aphthardocetism, which Justinian had espoused. John became a close friend of Emperor Justin II and took an active part in trying to win over the Monophysites, but later carried out Justin's policy of suppression. He is said to have written a "Catechetical Oration" on the Trinity. He may be identical with John Malalas, the Byzantine chronicler, whose Chronography woven around the fortunes of Antioch, is a source of religious and secular history, written in the common Greek of the age. J.G.G. NORMAN

JOHNSON, RICHARD (1753-1827). Anglican clergyman. Educated at Cambridge, he was appointed first chaplain to the convict colony at Botany Bay, New South Wales, Australia, in 1786. Both the Eclectic Society and members of the Clapham Sect* helped to secure his appointment. He conducted the first service in Australia on 3 February 1788. As the only chaplain his task was made more difficult by opposition from the military junta in the colony. He built a church at his own expense. His emphasis on personal salvation brought charges of "methodism." Yet independent observers recognized his unsparing help towards the sick among the convicts, the aborigines, and the orphans. Like most government officials he acted as farmer and magistrate, but his main concern was for his clerical duties. He left the colony in 1800 officially on leave, but in 1810 he took a London parish. NOEL S. POLLARD

JOHNSON, SAMUEL (1709-1784). Moralist, essayist, and lexicographer. Born at Lichfield and educated at Pembroke College, Oxford, Johnson unsuccessfully attempted schoolmastering before he went to London with the actor Garrick. He had a harsh struggle, in the course of which he wrote for The Gentleman's Magazine. His satiric poems London and The Vanity of Human Wishes appeared in 1739 and 1749, and in 1747 he began work on his great Dictionary which appeared in 1755. He also ran two periodicals, The Rambler (1750-52) and The Idler (1758-60), while in 1759 he published the moral tale, Rasselas. The last twenty years of his life are the Age of Johnson, the great conversationalist, as recorded by Boswell, but they also include his edition of Shakespeare (1765) and his Lives of the Poets (1779-81). Johnson, Tory and Anglican, held deeply sincere religious views, though these are expressed more often in moral than in spiritual terms. Nowhere is this better shown than in the last lines of The Vanity of Human Wishes, where a fine reticence controls profound beliefs. In this regard Johnson ranks among the most reverent of English writers.
ARTHUR POLLARD

JOHN THE APOSTLE. Traditionally the author of the NT documents that bear the name of John: the fourth gospel, the epistles of John, and Revelation. He was the son of Zebedee, and the (probably younger) brother of James (Matt. 4:21). His mother was possibly the Salome who was present at the crucifixion of Jesus (Matt. 27:56; cf. Mark 15:40). The two fishermen brothers James and John were called Boanerges ("Sons of Thunder") by Jesus (Mark 3:17), presumably because of their headstrong character. With Peter they formed an "inner group" of the Twelve, and were the only disciples present with Jesus on three important "revelatory" occasions during His ministry: the raising of Jairus's daughter (Mark 5:37), the Transfiguration (Mark 9:2), and the agony in Gethsemane (Mark 14:33). Luke also tells that Peter and John were the two disciples sent to prepare the final Passover meal for Jesus (22:8; cf. Mark 14:13). The Apostle John is not mentioned by name in the fourth gospel, although "the sons of Zebedee" appear in 21:2; but he may have been present at the call of the first disciples (John 1:35-41) and is usually but not always identified with the beloved disciple. In that case, we have further evidence about him (see John 13:23; 19:26; 20:2-10, 21:7; 21:20-23). The beloved disciple in the gospel of John* has the special function of witnessing to the reliability of the Johannine tradition (John 19:35; 21:24).

The Apostle John is mentioned in three passages of Acts, each time with Peter (1:13f.; 3:1—4:31; 8:14-25). He seems to have played an important part in the life of the early church (Gal. 2:9), despite his subordination to Peter, and was presumably present at the Jerusalem council (Acts 15). He does not appear in the later part of Acts, and we do not know when he left Jerusalem (cf. Acts 12:17).

Later tradition connects John the apostle with Ephesus, where he is reported to have died a natural death in old age. The testimony of Irenaeus affirms also that John lived at Ephesus until the time of Trajan (A.D. 98-117). Although this tradition has been challenged, its chronology is plausible. Eusebius follows Irenaeus, but says that John was exiled to Patmos during the reign of Domitian (81-96) and afterward returned to Ephesus. Thus John the apostle could be the author of the Revelation. Eusebius, however, assigns this to John the Elder,* whom he mentions in association with the confused witness of Papias to the origins of John's tradition.

Various stories support the link between John and Asia Minor, but other accounts are less straightforward. Tertullian claims John was exiled from Rome, after he had been "plunged, unhurt, into boiling oil." The Muratorian Canon says John was with the other apostles when he wrote his gospel, perhaps suggesting a Palestinian rather than Asian provenance. This evidence, however, is probably unhistorical, like the tradition that John was martyred early in life, possibly at the same time as James his brother (Acts 12:2; cf. Mark 10:39). The case for John's association with Ephesus in old age appears strong, although this does not by itself establish his responsibility for the final edition of the Johannine corpus. Its diversities of style and thought rather suggest origin in a school, behind which (no doubt) stood the Apostle John himself.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: See under JOHN, GOSPEL OF. Also, A. Harnack, Die Geschichte der altchristlichen Litteratur bis Eusebius (1893); P. Parker, "John and John Mark," JBL LXXIX (1960), pp. 97-110; J.N. Sanders, "St. John on Patmos," NTS IX (1962-63), pp. 75-85. STEPHEN S. SMALLEY

JOHN THE BAPTIST. Son of the priest Zechariah and Mary's kinswoman Elizabeth, John was born in circumstances suggesting divine intervention (Luke 1:5-79). He grew up in the desert (Luke 1:80). His association with the Qumran* community in his early days is possible, and in this case he may have been responsible for the Qumranic influences in the fourth gospel; but this suggestion should not be exaggerated. After his call, John was too independent a figure to be committed to another movement, whatever his background.

John's ministry began in the region of the Jordan; although if W.F. Albright is right to identify "Aenon near Salim" (John 3:23) with the Samaritan territory near Nablus, it had significantly wider scope. John appeared as an ascetic preacher (cf. Luke 1:15), clothed like the OT prophets with camel's hair, and eating locusts and wild honey (Mark 1:6). He preached "a baptism of repentance for the forgiveness of sins" (Mark 1:4 RSV), which included a reference to the dawning kingdom of God (Matt. 3:2). The eschatological content of his message, with its stress on judgment, is given by Matthew and Luke (Matthew 3:7-12). The baptism which John administered had its background in Jewish lustration and initiation rites; but in John's hands it acquired a new dimension, both because it was no longer self-administered, and because it was accompanied by the demand for repentance in the light of Israel's need for renewal, and in the face of the coming messianic age (Mark 1:5; contrast Josephus, Antiquities 18.5.2).

John's relation to Jesus in the NT is of special and obvious importance. He was similar to Jesus in many ways (cf. the parallelism of Luke 1 and 2); yet after him the line was drawn across history (Matt. 11). For he was above all the forerunner of the Messiah he recognized and confessed (Mark 1:2f., 7f.), even if he possibly had doubts on this score eventually (Matt. 11). The Johannine estimate of his own identity is probably correct. He regarded himself as neither the Christ nor Elijah, the expected forerunner of the new age; but simply as "the voice of one crying in the wilderness" (John 1:23 KJV). Probably, however, he modeled himself on Elijah. John is thus an important bridge-figure between Judaism and Christianity; his popular preaching marked a new beginning in Israel's history. His ministry was, as a result, regarded in the early church as the beginning of the Gospel period (Acts 10:36f.; cf. 1:22). John was put to death by Herod Antipas in the fortress of Machaerus, after the hostility of both Herod and Herodias, his wife, had been aroused (Mark 6:14-29; differing in some respects from the account in Josephus, Antiquities 18.5.2). The disciples of John the Baptist evidently remained together after his death (cf. Mark 6:29); but the Clementine Recognitions 1.60 is the only source to suggest that their existence constituted a threat to the Christian Church.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: C.H. Kraeling, John the Baptist (1951); P. Winter, "The Proto-Source of Luke 1," Novum Testamentum I (1956), pp. 184-99; J.A.T. Robinson, "The Baptism of John and the Qumran Community," HTR L (1957), pp. 175-91; P. Benoit, "Qumran et le Nouveau Testament," NTS VII (1960-61), pp. 279-88; C.H.H. Scobie, John the Baptist (1964); W. Wink, John the Baptist in the Gospel Tradition (1968); F.F. Bruce, New Testament History (1969/70), pp. 145-54; E. Bammel, "The Baptist in Early Christian Tradition," NTS XVIII (1971-2), pp. 95-128.

STEPHEN S. SMALLEY

JOHN THE CONSTANT (1468-1532). Saxon prince and brother of Frederick the Wise. Born at Meissen, John became an early supporter of the Lutheran cause. He urged his brother to protect Luther from the ban of the Empire, and welcomed Luther when he preached at his own court in Weimar in 1522. John attempted in his practice of statecraft to follow the principles outlined by Luther in Von Weltlicher Obrigkeit. He was reluctant to suppress Müntzer and Carlstadt at first and tolerated their radical reform. When on the death of his brother he became sole ruler (1525), he confessed himself a Protestant and entered into a treaty with Philip of Hesse (1526). He established visitations, reorganized the University of Wittenberg, and stopped the appropriation of church property by the Saxon nobility. He defended the Protestant interests at the Diet of Speyer and accepted the Schwabach Articles.* At the Diet of Augsburg he signed the Augsburg Confession as leader of the Protestant party. Opposing the election of Ferdinand as Roman king, he agreed to the formation of a Protestant league of defense against the emperor, leading to the peace of Nuremberg (1532).

DAVID C. STEINMETZ

JOHN THE ELDER. Probably a mythical figure, invented by Eusebius of Caesarea to account for the authorship of the Apocalypse. Those who could not accept the book as the work of John the Apostle, particularly because of its millenarianism, and yet hesitated to regard it as pseudonymous, looked around for another John who could have been its author. Dionysius of Alexandria (d. c.264) appealed to the existence of two tombs at Ephesus, both purporting to be the burial place of "John," as evidence that such a second John existed. Eusebius followed Dionysius, mistakenly discovered the other John in the tradition of Papias, called him "John the Presbyter," and ascribed the Revelation to him. But Papias was no doubt referring to John the Apostle in two different contexts, among the disciples (also called apostles and elders who had died, and those who were still alive). Although the "Presbyter" has been claimed as the author of all or part of the Johannine corpus, there is no need to postulate his existence in order to account for its particular character.

STEPHEN S. SMALLEY

JOHN THE SCOT, see ERIGENA

JOINVILLE, JEAN (c.1225-1319). French nobleman and chronicler. Becoming Seneschal of Champagne after his father's death in 1233, he was subsequently active in French court life, and established contacts which enlisted his participation in the Sixth Crusade (1248-54). He joined the assaults on Egypt and Palestine and became a friend of Louis IX during their imprisonment. While at Acre, he composed a credo which reflects medieval piety. Returning to his estates, he followed Louis's career with interest, though he declined the royal invitation to participate in the Crusade of 1270. At the suggestion of Queen Jeanne, wife of Philip the Fair, he composed a discursive but graphic and engaging biography of Louis. It chronicles the Sixth Crusade and captures the spirit of the age. JAMES DE JONG

JONAS, JUSTUS (1493-1555). Protestant Reformer and scholar. Born at Nordhausen, he studied at Wittenberg and Erfurt, became provost of All Saints' and professor at Wittenberg, and sided with Luther in his movement. He attended the Marburg Colloquy* (1529) and the Diet of Augsburg (1530) and participated in the Concord of Wittenberg* (1536). As pastor in Halle he contributed to the progress of the reform movement there. He opposed the Augsburg Interim* (1548). He is known for translating the Apology of the Augsburg Confession from Latin into German. His Latin translation of the Brandenburg-Nuremberg Catechism was translated into English under the direction of Archbishop Cranmer. It was also translated into Icelandic. His contributions to the Lutheran Reformation include hymnwriting, church visitation, organizational ability, the drafting of church orders, and preaching.

CARL S. MEYER

JONES, BOB (1883-1968). American evangelist. Born in Alabama, son of a Confederate Army veteran, he held his first evangelistic meeting at the age of fourteen, and a year later was licensed to preach by the Methodist Church. He attended Southern University in Greensboro, Alabama. In 1924 he decided to start his own college to promote unflinching fundamentalism.* At the time of his death, Bob Jones University, located in Greenville, South Carolina, had an enrollment of 4,000 and a modern campus valued at $50 million. Jones's evangelistic preaching took him to every state of the union and into thirty foreign countries. During the height of his career he preached an estimated 12,000 folksy sermons to more than fifteen million people. The school which bears his name came to be identified with fundamentalist theology and Southern conservative politics, including segregation of the races.

BRUCE L. SHELLEY

JONES, E(LI) STANLEY (1884-1973). Missionary to India. Born in Maryland, he was ordained as a Methodist minister and appointed first to the Lal Bagh English-speaking church in Lucknow. Soon, however, he was released to a wider ministry among English-speaking Indians. Possessing a deep understanding of Indian culture and religion, he sought to interpret the Christian faith to the educated, not as a Western import, but as the fulfillment of their own spiritual longings. A popular preacher, he was also a spokesman for peace, racial brotherhood, and social justice. His encouragement of Indian independence led to his being barred from the country for a period by the British authorities. In 1930 he founded a Christian ashram for study and meditation in Sal Tal, which many continue to attend. During his extensive world travels he was responsible for the foundation of similar centers in America and several European countries. He also established the Nur Manzil psychiatric center in Lucknow. He was the author of twenty-nine books, the best known being Christ of the Indian Road and Abundant Living. JAMES TAYLOR

JONES, GRIFFITH (1683-1761). Welsh preacher. Born a Nonconformist in Carmarthenshire, he was ordained in the established church in 1709, served two curacies, and was rector of Llandilo Abercowyn from 1711 and of Llanddowror from 1716. A traveling preacher and keen to improve religious and social conditions in Wales, he established in 1730 his first charity school, where children and adults were taught by day and night to read the Bible in Welsh; education grew despite ecclesiastical opposition. Teachers traveled a circuit and schools multiplied: before his death over 3,000 schools were opened and 150,000 taught. Jones had strong Calvinist leanings and wrote many theological books in Welsh and English. Daniel Rowland* of Llangeitho, founder of Welsh Methodism, was supposedly converted under his ministry. C.G. THORNE, JR.

JONES, JOHN CYNDDYLAN (1840-1930). Welsh expositor and theologian. Born at Capel Dewi, Cardiganshire, he was educated as a candidate for the Welsh Calvinistic ministry at Bala and Trevecca colleges. After serving as minister at the English Calvinistic Methodist church at Pontypool (1867-69), he became a Congregational minister in London, and in 1875 returned to the Methodist fold as minister of Frederick Street, Cardiff. His eagerness to introduce an element of Anglican ceremonial into the services ended in his resignation in 1888. He then joined the staff of the British and Foreign Bible Society in South Wales.

He was an assiduous writer. His books, Studies in Matthew, Luke, John, Acts and The Epistles of Peter, became popular, not least among American readers. He published similar expositions in Welsh on the gospel of John and the epistle to the Philippians. He was a vigorous opponent of liberal trends in biblical scholarship; some of his views on this topic can be seen in his Primeval Revelation. His systematic theology in four volumes, Cysondeb y Ffydd, expounds a moderate Calvinism much influenced by such American theologians as W.G.T. Shedd.* At his best he was a very good writer, and there was a rare power and unction in his preaching. He was passionately concerned to maintain the evangelical position in theology and biblical exegesis, but lacked the scholarly equipment to do full justice to his intentions.

R. TUDUR JONES

JONES, RUFUS MATTHEW (1863-1948). Quaker scholar and professor. Born in South China, he was educated at Haverford College, Harvard, and in continental universities. Having taught in Friends schools and been principal of Oak Grove Seminary (1889-1893), he returned to Haverford to lecture in philosophy. A birthright Quaker, at twenty-four he had a mystical experience which reshaped his life entirely. By mysticism he meant a kind of Pauline experience and understanding of Christianity. Philosophy and theology were his life, together with a conspicuous concern for others. To Kant's philosophy of ethics he became increasingly indebted. Considered a prophet of Quakerism and hailed as a saint, he was as prominent in Britain as in America, and lectured more widely still. He helped to found the American Friends Service Committee (1917) and served as its chairman for over twenty years. He wrote over fifty books and hundreds of articles, most of which concerned mystical experience and action.

C.G. THORNE, JR.

JONES, SAMUEL PORTER (1847-1906). Evangelist and Prohibitionist. Born in Alabama, he grew up and graduated from high school in Cartersville, Georgia. Chronic nervous indigestion kept him from college, and alcoholism soon ended a law career he began in 1868. After promising his dying father to reform, he was converted under his Methodist grandfather's preaching and became a circuit rider for the North Georgia Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, in 1872. Eminently successful in winning converts in Georgia before 1880 and in raising funds as agent for the Methodist Orphanage Home, Decatur, Georgia, "Sam" was thereafter invited to conduct revival meetings in major southern cities and became after 1885 an evangelist of national prominence. His meetings, characterized by controversial, vernacular oratory, often produced organized efforts to enforce local blue laws and helped stimulate the national Prohibition movement. The Sam P. Jones Lectureship at Emory University perpetuates his memory.

D.E. PITZER

JONES, THOMAS ("of Denbigh") (1756-1820). Welsh Calvinistic Methodist* theologian. He was born at Penucha, Flintshire, of a fairly well-to-do family. His only education was at schools in Caerwys and Holywell, but it gave him excellent grounding in the classics. He began to preach among the Calvinistic Methodists in 1783 and ministered to their societies at Mold, Ruthin, and finally Denbigh (1806-20). He was closely associated with Thomas Charles after whose death in 1814 Jones was the most learned and distinguished leader of the Calvinistic Methodists.

Jones was a man of wide culture. His massive volume Hanes Diwygwyr, Merthyron, a Chyffeswyr Eglwys Loegr (1813) is at the same time a plea for toleration in matters of religion and a sustained defense of the thesis that Evangelicalism is a continuation of the Augustinian understanding of Christianity which is the true catholicism. Jones's autobiography is a moving document describing his spiritual pilgrimage. In the theological controversies that dominated Welsh intellectual life at the beginning of the nineteenth century he took a firm but moderate Calvinist position. He was firmly opposed to Arminianism on the one hand, and although he was critical of hyper-Calvinism he was not able to embrace fully the "Modern Calvinism" of his friend, Edward Williams of Rotherham. He was also well versed in the Welsh literary tradition. His prose style is forceful and elegant, and as a poet and hymnwriter he combined the classical heritage of the strict meters with the newer use of free meters in the tradition of Williams Pantycelyn. The Welsh Calvinistic Methodists had no wiser or more scholarly and godly leader at the beginning of the last century than Thomas Jones.

R. TUDUR JONES

JORDANES (Jornandes) (fl. c.550). Latin historian. A native Alan, he served as notarius to an Alan king, later becoming an orthodox bishop in Italy. His Getica, written about 551, an epitome of Cassiodorus's lost Gothic Histories, relates the earliest migrations of the Goths to their defeat by Belisarius in 541, then carries events beyond Cassiodorus in hopes of reconciling Gothic and Roman royal families. Uncritical and profuse with errors, it is nevertheless much cited as principal extant source for our knowledge of the Goths, especially their settlement on the Black Sea under Hermanric (mid-fourth century) and of Attila's second invasion of Gaul. He also authored a short compendium of universal history from Creation to 552, de regnorum ac temporum successione, also known as the Romana. DANIEL C. SCAVONE

JOSEPH. Husband of the Virgin Mary. He is scarcely mentioned in the NT outside the birth and infancy narratives in the gospels of Matthew and Luke. There are indirect references to him in John 1:45; 6:42. It is likely that he had died before the ministry of Jesus began. Matthew and Luke both show him as a man of Davidic descent (Matt. 1:19f.; Luke 2:4) who was betrothed to Mary at the time of the conception of Jesus, but had no intercourse with her until after His birth (Matt. 1:18; Luke 1:27, 35). It is natural to assume that the brothers of Jesus referred to in the gospels were subsequent children of Joseph and Mary. While the account of the Annunciation* in Luke's gospel is told from Mary's point of view, that in Matthew is told from Joseph's. Through the appearance of angels in dreams he was able to take Mary as his wife rather than divorcing her (Matt. 1:18-25), and to escape from Herod to Egypt (Matt. 2:13-15) and return again to Israel (Matt. 2:19-23). The veneration of Joseph goes back to early times in the Eastern Church, but seems to have started in the West only in the late Middle Ages. R.E. NIXON

JOSEPH CALASANCTIUS (1556-1648). Founder of the Piarists.* Born near Petralta de la Sal, he studied law and theology at Lérida, Valencia, and Alcalá; was ordained in 1583; and went to Rome in 1592, where he was patronized by the Colonna family and became active in charitable works. Convinced of the need to provide religious and secular education for the children of the poor, he opened in 1597 the first free public school in Europe (in Rome) and established in 1602 the Piarist Order for those teaching, giving full privileges of a religious order. Dissension arose: Galileo's associations were suspected, and fears were expressed that the educated poor might unbalance society. By 1643 crises led to Joseph's own trial, and in 1646 destruction came when Innocent X reduced the order to a federation of independent religious houses, not to be fully restored until Clement IX (1669). Joseph was canonized in 1767; Pius XII declared him "the heavenly patron of all Christian schools."

C.G. THORNE, JR.

JOSEPHINISM. The Austrian Hapsburg policy of secular state control of the church implemented in the eighteenth century under Empress Maria Theresa and culminating with intensity under Joseph II (1780-90). Its motivation was secular and rationalist, aimed at "rationalizing" the organization of the whole of society through an "enlightened" program of statist centralism. Instructions (1767, 1768) by the chief minister, Kaunitz, initiated the program.

Then under Joseph II came a rush of projects, including the following. The law of toleration (1781) ended the Catholic monopoly, allowing Protestants and Jews a certain freedom to worship—a step permitted, Joseph argued, because any church could be made obedient to the state. Traditional censorship, including the Index, was abolished, but a new rationalist censorship was practiced against, inter alia, "superstitious" works, all ecclesiastical publications, and most public discussion of religion. Monasteries were either dissolved or their members reduced in number (beginning 1781) on grounds that many were useless, or wasteful; their properties were confiscated, and the revenues used to fund a state reorganization of parishes, and state-controlled schools, shops, or factories. All links between the papacy and the Hapsburg Church were abolished or controlled, since the pope was viewed principally as a foreign political power. Bishops were obliged to swear loyalty to the state and forbidden corporately to oppose Joseph's decrees, while priests were made de facto state officials. The system thus erected continued without major alterations until 1850.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: M.C. Goodwin, The Papal Conflict With Josephinism (1938); F. Maass, Der Josephinismus (5 vols., 1951f.), "Josephinism" in New Catholic Encyclopedia VII, pp. 1118-19, and "Josephinism" in Sacramentum Mundi III, pp. 209-10, and "Josephinismus" in Lex Theol Kirche V (1960), pp. 1137-39; S.K. Padover, The Revolutionary Emperor: Joseph II of Austria (rev. ed., 1967); C.A. Macartney, The Hapsburg Empire, 1790-1918 (1968). C.T. MC INTIRE

JOSEPH OF ARIMATHEA. Although coming only from a small village in Judea, Joseph was a respected member of the Sanhedrin (Mark 15:43). The fact that he had a private tomb and was able to provide the linen for it is evidence of his wealth (Matt. 27:57-60). He is described by Luke as "a good and upright man, who had not consented to their decision and action [i.e., the Sanhedrin's plot against Jesus] . . . and he was waiting for the kingdom of God" (23:50f.), and by John as "a disciple of Jesus, but secretly, because he feared the Jews" (John 19:38). The crucifixion seems to have emboldened him, and he used his position to go to Pilate and obtain from him permission to take down the body of Jesus from the cross (Mark 15:-43-46, etc.). This may have been partly the act of a Jew not wishing to see the land defiled by a corpse (Deut. 21:23), but is more closely bound up with his devotion to Jesus. A number of legends were associated with him, especially that of a visit to England with the Holy Grail and the building of a church at Glastonbury. R.E. NIXON

JOSEPH OF COPERTINO (1603-1663). Franciscan ascetic. The son of a poor carpenter in a small town of SE Italy, Joseph in his youth suffered much ill health aggravated by his asceticism. He entered the Franciscan Order, became a priest in 1628, and thereafter lived a life of extreme austerity, punctuated by many loathsome self-tortures. In his devotions he frequently swooned in ecstasy and rose in the air. His superiors, doubtless moved by notoriety or envy, were determined to end this "miracle." He was made to attend chapel alone, and even charged before the Inquistion; but in paying homage to Urban VIII by kissing the papal feet, Joseph astonished Urban by forthwith levitating. There are numerous eyewitness accounts of this achievement, including that of the duke of Brunswick (d.1679), patron of the German philosopher Leibnitz. The duke, though a Lutheran, was so impressed by the "miracle" (which he saw twice) that he forthwith became a Roman Catholic. Levitation seems now to be unknown or extremely rare: the last reasonably well authenticated cases were connected with the medium D.D. Home (1833-86).

R.E.D. CLARK

JOSEPHUS FLAVIUS (A.D. 37-post 100). The Roman name of Joseph ben-Matthias, a Jew of aristocratic family and Pharisaic adherence, author in Greek. Religious ascetic for a time in youth, he was later a priest, and in A.D. 64 member of a mission to Nero. After the outbreak of the Jewish revolt in A.D. 66 he became commander in Galilee, eventually capitulating to Vespasian at Jotapata. Prophesying his captor's imperial destiny, he became his protégé and attempted to urge surrender upon his compatriots. He accompanied Titus to Rome where he lived in literary activity, having taken Roman citizenship and the Flavian name.

Devious and self-centered, he wrote from a mixture of motives: sycophancy, self-defense, and patriotism. Between A.D. 75 and 79 appeared his Jewish War, addressed first in Aramaic to races prone to trouble Rome on her borders (still extant in Greek). In six books it draws upon personal reminiscence, that of Herod Agrippa II also, and official records, for the events of A.D. 66-70, for which period it is a valuable historical source. The Archaeology (or Antiquities) of the Jews, in twenty books, appeared in A.D. 93-94: an apologia for his people, it follows the Septuagint order, and later draws upon Nicolas of Damascus, Herod's secretary, for recent events. In book XVIII is found the renowned passage ("Testimonium Flavianum") about Jesus, which modern scholarship confirms as basically authentic, though some alteration of Josephus's style and/or interpolation by Christians is generally admitted. Other passages deal with John the Baptist and James the Just. The Life was an appendix to the Antiquities; Contra Apionem is written against a contemporary anti-Semite.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Edition: Loeb Classical Library in nine volumes with translation and notes (1926-65), by H. St. J. Thackeray et al.; H. St. J. Thackeray, Josephus the Man and the Historian (1929); L.H. Feldman, Studies on Philo and Josephus (1937-62) (1963); H. Schreckenberg, Bibliographie zu Flavius Josephus (1968).

J.N. BIRDSALL

JOSQUIN DESPREZ, see DESPREZ

JOURNALISM, CHRISTIAN. In current usage of the term, Christian journalism relates most commonly to Christian periodicals. Only rarely is it connected with other media. It is not so closely tied to news in the narrow sense as is secular journalism. In the pre-Reformation church, "journalism" was for the most part confined to official announcements and newsletters. The Roman government used acta diurna, bulletins posted daily in public places. Beginning with Constantine, these may have taken on something of the character of Christian journals. The newsletters were sent out regularly by Roman scribes to businessmen and politicians in distant cities to keep them abreast of doings in Rome. Such newsletter service continued from European capitals into the 1700s, after printed papers became common.

With the development of printing at the time of the Reformation came the rise of Christian journalism in the form of pamphlets. It is doubtful whether the Reformation would have had nearly the impact without them. Luther himself wrote that "there has never been a great revelation of the Word of God unless He has first prepared the way by the rise and prosperity of languages and letters, as though they were John the Baptists." His own tracts were the forerunners of modern periodicals, and they were highly successful. Four thousand copies of his address "To the Christian Nobility" were sold in five days. Roman Catholics also began to use printed materials, but they have been dogged to the present day by theological doctrines which fail to recognize the freedom of the press.

There was little effort to develop Christian journalism in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries. The Puritans argued extensively in books and pamphlets, and recorded extensive history there, but despite many attempts to produce regular news journals in 1640-60, they never became seriously interested in periodicals. State churches saw no good reason to enlighten the masses.

Christian periodicals did not become established until the nineteenth century. In North America they took the form of highly partisan newspapers which bred much strife among Christians, but which nonetheless often enjoyed as much respect and readership as their secular counterparts. Religious newspapers were sold on the streets along with the others. During the latter part of the nineteenth century and the early part of the twentieth, most Christian daily newspapers died out, to be replaced by weekly papers and magazines. Eventually many of these changed into or gave way to monthlies, and independent periodicals were replaced by denominational or organizational house organs. These have been the mainstay of Christian journalism for most of the twentieth century, and their proliferation has been little short of phenomenal, although virtually all require subsidies on top of circulation and advertising income.

Modern Christian publications tend to equate progress with improvement in physical appearance rather than rhetoric, and investment of resources has reflected this emphasis. The popularity of offset printing with its much cheaper picture reproduction has encouraged the trend. Articles, reviews, and editorials generally espouse strongly held theological positions, but little great literature has been produced. Emergence of the Jesus Movement, which immediately started dozens of new papers on inexpensive newsprint, may have been the start of a reversal away from the slick, multicolored, profusely illustrated pattern toward more concentration on quality editorial content, although the first issues carried rather standardized devotional and evangelistic material.

The scope of Christian journalism is seen in the size of the several "trade associations" in the field. In North America, these are the Catholic Press Association (435 member publications in 1971 with an aggregate circulation of 24,346,826), Associated Church Press (195 and 21,958,111), and Evangelical Press Association (195 and 11,400,000). There is some overlapping membership among these. Canadian editors, for example, have their own group in addition to belonging to one or more of the others. There are hundreds of other religious publications, mostly small, which belong to none of these.

All these periodicals rely upon mail promotion and delivery. Very few have been available on public newsstands. Many churches subscribe for their members. The prospect of sharp increases in postal rates during the 1970s spelled possible reconsideration of this distribution method. Most Christian publications have been selling large amounts of advertising space. In 1971 the top fifteen consumer-type Protestant periodicals received an estimated total of more than $3 million in advertising revenue. The advertisers generally are publishers of books and educational materials, organizations appealing for donations, insurance companies, schools, and travel agencies.

The liberal Christian Century was undoubtedly the most influential religious journal until Christianity Today was founded in 1956 to challenge its stature. As of 1972, both were being indexed in the standard reference work, Reader's Guide to Periodical Literature, along with America, a Jesuit weekly, the liberal lay Catholic weekly Commonweal, and the monthly Catholic World. Christian Herald has also long been a leader. Decision, published by the Billy Graham Evangelistic Association, captured top circulation honors in going from an initial press run of 286,000 in 1960 to more than 4,500,000 in twelve years. The Christian Science Monitor is highly reputed as a daily newspaper for secular coverage; it devotes one page a day to Christian Science dogma. The African Methodist Episcopal Church prints the largest continuously published Negro paper in America, the Christian Recorder. The sprightly United Church Observer is the most prominent in Canada.

Most religious weeklies that survived the two world wars subsequently established sound footing and maintained wide respect. Most notable among these have been the Southern Baptist state papers, one of which, the Baptist Standard of Texas, has had a larger circulation than most national and international religious publications. Among weeklies that do remarkably well despite very small staffs are The Mennonite and Presbyterian Journal. Among the few churchmen who still recognize the incomparable value of a weekly is Carl McIntire, who edits and publishes the polemical but very timely Christian Beacon.

In many African countries, mission-spawned publications are among the most widely read and are sold on newsstands because they serve secular news as well as religious purposes. There are some daily Christian newspapers published in Scandinavia and the Netherlands. L'Osservatore Romana, voice of the Vatican, is the world's best-known religious daily. In Indonesia Christians have their own daily newspaper, Sinar Harapan ("Ray of Hope"), begun in 1961. It distributes 65,000 copies daily, is twelve pages in length, and in size is the largest newspaper in the country.

The most-respected training ground for Christian journalists has been Syracuse (New York) University, which has a department of religious journalism in its school of communications and which offers bachelors, masters, and doctoral degrees in communications. Wheaton (Illinois) College and Oklahoma Baptist University offer graduate programs in Christian communications which embrace journalism.

Evangelicals have seized opportunities in radio and television to a much greater extent than liberals. Thousands of Christian programs took to the air, and hundreds of Christian stations have been commercially successful. Few broadcasts and telecasts, however, have been concerned enough with timely affairs and current developments to warrant the designation of journalism. Most have simply followed the pattern of church services. The coming generation will probably have more sophisticated media such as cassettes, electronic video recordings, and facsimile at its creative disposal.

A definitive work on Christian journalism has been long overdue. Indeed, an authentic philosophy of Christian journalism relating reportage to evangelism, service, education, worship, and fellowship has been desperately needed. Under the influence of empiricism, secular journalism long championed a theory of verifiability wherein biblical truth must be labeled "opinion" and subordinated to the "facts" of observable data. In recent years, a new art form of journalism that is basically existential has risen to compete with the objectivity school. To do justice to its scriptural origin an evangelical view must be developed which transcends both these theories of meaning.

DAVID KUCHARSKY

In the British Isles, the nineteenth century could aptly be called "a continuing communication revolution" in the field of print and journalism. Technical developments with faster transportation made possible the distribution of periodicals on a national scale. Modern Christian journalism in Britain can, however, be dated from the Wesleyan Revival of the eighteenth century. Before the foundation of the Religious Tract Society in 1799, John Wesley* and his friends were using tracts on a wide scale. The first Christian magazines, it should be noted, were either collections of sermons aimed at the elect, or tracts—stories or homilies—designed to reach the unconverted. The Religious Tract Society really shaped the magazine revolution of the nineteenth century. Originally founded as a means of developing new styles of print evangelism, the RTS became a worldwide enterprise, producing literature for distribution in many languages and countries.

As the century proceeded and reform movements developed, Christians were faced with the implications of wider literacy. The Society for the Propagation of Christian Knowledge, like the RTS, became a foremost publisher of "wholesome Christian literature." Magazines such as The Sunday at Home and The Leisure Hour offered superb combinations of articles on travel, popular science, the arts, literature, etc., combined with very readable articles on Scripture. Later The Quiver and Cassell's Family Magazine mingled popular appeal with spiritual content; The Sunday Strand had evangelist George Clarke as editor.

Denominational newspapers also flourished in the later nineteenth and early twentieth centuries, particularly as so many evangelists were deeply involved in journalism. The firebrand Hugh Price Hughes, with his campaigning Methodist Times, was obviously encouraged in literature evangelism by D.L. Moody.* Former missionary Michael Paget Baxter was another great crusader in print with his Christian Herald (still the best-selling Protestant weekly in Britain) and The Signal. World War I saw for the first time free church evangelists working as chaplains on an equal footing with Anglicans and Roman Catholics. Reports sent home from the front, published in Christian papers at home, helped prepare the way for interchurch evangelism and ultimately the ecumenical movement as well as the cause of Christian journalism.

Between the wars, some of the finest campaign journalism was seen in papers like The Methodist Recorder and Joyful News. The 1930s tended to be years of retrenchment, however, and radio, movies, and television (the latter in its infancy) held out alternative attractions to reading. World War II closed down many publications, and the bombing of London destroyed the premises of many publishing houses. Crusade (monthly) magazine, launched in the 1950s by the Evangelical Alliance, was probably the most noteworthy feature of the decade, but twelve issues a year does not give scope for much "hard" news. Where such is found it is generally in denominational publications such as Church Times, Church of England Newspaper, and Baptist Times. Of the interdenominational weeklies, The Christian tried to blaze new trails in offering a wide range of news coupled with a professionalism of presentation, but it fell a financial casualty in 1969. The British Weekly, launched by W. Robertson Nicoll in 1886, still maintains a precarious existence, having changed hands several times in the past two decades. The Life of Faith (founded in 1874) maintains its traditionally strong links with the Keswick Convention.* The Roman Catholic weeklies—the Catholic Herald, The Universe, and The Tablet—while their ecclesiastical attachment is never in any doubt, offer an imposing treatment of international affairs as they overlap the religious scene. DAVID LAZELL

JOVIANUS, FLAVIUS CLAUDIUS (c.332-364). Roman emperor. A Christian from Pannonia and senior member of the imperial bodyguard, Jovian was a compromise choice as emperor in 363. His brief reign was hailed as guaranteeing the church a place in the state from which no subsequent emperor again sought its removal, though it appears that his official policy was one of broad toleration for all religious parties. To get the army safely out of Mesopotamia and to gain his own security, he agreed to a treaty with Shapur II with unfavorable provisions including the loss, not only of Transtigridian territory, but the frontier cities of Nisibis and Singara also. He did not have the chance to establish himself, for he died suddenly and mysteriously at Ancyra before he reached Constantinople. CLYDE CURRY SMITH

JOVINIAN (d. c.405). Writer and monk. His treatise entitled Commentarioli has not survived, and its thought can at most be minimally reconstructed from Jerome's refutation, Adversus Jovinianum, in two books written in 392 at the request of Pammachius.* By that date Jovinian, presbyter and formerly strict monk, and his followers had already been synodically condemned twice: in Rome under Siricius (390) and in Milan under Ambrose (391). Jerome's first book deals entirely with Jovinian's notion that, provided persons did not differ in other respects, marriage is of equal esteem to virginity—which struck at the heart of monasticism. In the second book three further notions are covered: those receiving baptism in full faith cannot again be led into sin; fasting has no greater merit than eating with thankfulness; and there is no inequality based on status in life in heavenly reward. It appears also that Jovinian was associated with Helvidius as one rejecting the perpetual virginity of Mary and affirming that Jesus had full brothers by Joseph.
CLYDE CURRY SMITH

JOWETT, BENJAMIN (1817-1893). English classicist and theologian. Born at Camberwell, London, he was educated at Oxford where he was elected fellow while still an undergraduate (1838). After a succession of college offices and the regius chair of Greek (1855), he became master of Balliol (1870). He was ordained in 1842 and was vice-chancellor of Oxford, 1882-86. He wrote commentaries on the epistles of Paul (1855), and through an essay on scriptural interpretation contributed to Essays and Reviews (1860), he fell under suspicion of unorthodoxy and ceased to write on theological subjects. He worked to secure the abolition of theological tests for university degrees and offices. His classical learning was almost unsurpassed in his day, and he was known as "the Great Tutor." J.G.G. NORMAN

JOWETT, JOHN HENRY (1864-1923). English Congregationalist preacher. Born near Halifax, Yorkshire, he studied at Airedale College, Bradford, at Edinburgh University, and Mansfield College, Oxford. He was pastor at St. James' Congregational Church, Newcastle-upon-Tyne (1889), and succeeded R.W. Dale at Carr's Lane Chapel, Birmingham (1895). He became chairman of the Congregational Union (1906-7) and president of the National Free Church Council (1910-11). His reputation as a preacher grew, and he became pastor of Fifth Avenue Presbyterian Church, New York City (1911), returning to Westminster Chapel, London (1918-22), in succession to Campbell Morgan. He delivered the Yale Lectures on Preaching in 1912, wrote many devotional books, and was made Companion of Honour in 1922. J.G.G. NORMAN

JUBILEE, YEAR OF (Holy Year). A Roman Catholic institution, based only indirectly on the Levitical Year of Jubilee (Lev. 25), but rather an extension of the pilgrimage movement and the system of indulgences,* first observed in 1300 under Boniface VIII, apparently by spontaneous popular demand. Boniface in the bull Antiquorum fida relatio offered plenary indulgences to all pilgrims to Rome who met the conditions within the year. Intended to be celebrated each century, the next jubilee was proclaimed for 1350 by the Avignonese Pope Clement VI at the request of the Romans. Urban VI in 1389 reduced the interval to thirty-three years, and in 1470 Paul II further diminished it to twenty-five—the present interval. In 1500 Alexander VI extended the indulgence to all churches in the year following the jubilee, until Easter Saturday, though subsequent practice has varied. A jubilee indulgence was proclaimed throughout Christendom by Paul VI for 1 January to 29 May 1966, later extended to 8 December, to mark the completion of Vatican II. MARY E. ROGERS

JUD, LEO (1482-1542). Reformer in Switzerland. Born at Gemar, Alsace, after studies at Basle and Freiburg-im-Breisgau (1499-1512) he became pastor at St. Hippolyte, Alsace (1512-19), and then at Einsiedeln, Switzerland (1519-22), where he succeeded Zwingli.* One of the earliest followers of Zwingli, he was a staunch supporter of the Zwinglian Reformation. In 1523 he became pastor of St. Peter's, Zurich; on 1 September he preached against images and set off a wave of iconoclasm. He played a part in the suppression of convents. He helped Zwingli in his conflict with the Anabaptists, although at one time he had been "quite taken by some of Schwenkfeld's ideas on tolerance and some of the democratic principles of the Anabaptists" (G.H. Williams). He introduced a baptismal liturgy in 1523, which was in German, though it retained several Catholic features. He translated into German works of Augustine, Thomas à Kempis, and Erasmus; made a Latin translation of the Hebrew OT; and was author of the Swiss-German version of the Prophets (1525) which was incorporated in the complete Zurich Bible of 1529, preceding Luther's version by five years. His Protestant catechism (1538) was long in use. J.G.G. NORMAN

JUDAISM. The religion of the Jews in contrast with that of the OT, from which it was derived. The two focal points in its development were the two destructions of the Jerusalem temple in 586 B.C. and A.D. 70, which ended the centrality of sacrifice found in the OT. It was encouraged above all by the widespread dispersion of Jewry both East and West, which made the Law the center around which Jewish life and religion had perforce to revolve outside Palestine. During the intertestamental period, in which Judaism was developing, various directions became obvious—e.g., Pharisees, Sadducees, Essenes, Zealots, Hellenists—but the situation created by the destruction of the Jewish state in A.D. 70 and confirmed by the crushing of the Bar-Kochba revolt in 135 left the Pharisaic interpretation of Judaism without rivals. It reached its full development by 500, its authoritative documents being the Talmud, composed of the Mishnah and Gemara, and the Midrashim (official interpretations of the OT books).

An outstanding feature of Judaism has been its ability to adapt itself to pressure and persecution from Christianity and Islam, to minority social status, and to changing cultural circumstances without altering its essential nature. These adaptations have periodically been codified, the most important being Maimonides's Mishneh Torah (1180) and Karo's Shulcan Aruch (1565). Once Judaism had been able to eliminate the Jewish Christian, there was only one movement, until modern times, which it was not able to assimilate, viz., the Karaites, who emerged in the eighth century and reached their climax in the twelfth; today they claim only some two thousand adherents. In the nineteenth century, under the influence of modern thought, a reform, or liberal, movement began and has steadily increased. Other Jews have turned to materialism, Marxism, or a religionless nationalism.

Though Judaism had its great philosophical thinkers, it is essentially a historical religion based on God's election of Israel, shown above all in the Exodus, giving of the Law, and conquest of Canaan. Though Judaism recognizes the existence of the righteous among the nations, who will have "a share in the world to come," a full knowledge of God's will and the possibility of carrying it out are confined to Jewry. It is the possession of the Law that gives real meaning to God's election, and any Gentile who is prepared to accept "the yoke of the Law" is welcomed into the community of Israel. Since under Muslim and medieval Christian rule successful missionary attempts by Jews involved the death penalty for converter and converted alike, the zeal for converts shown in an earlier period vanished and is only rarely met with today.

The Jewish doctrine of God is not merely monotheistic, but strongly and deliberately anti-Trinitarian. God's unity is declared to be unique, "like no other unity." In its more philosophical forms Judaism declares that no human attribute may be postulated of God; where they are used in the Bible, it is merely an accommodation to human weakness. The transcendence of God is stressed in a way that makes any concept of incarnation impossible. Various concepts to bridge the gulf between God and His creation are found, but none are authoritative or universally received.

The main stress in normative Judaism is laid on the Torah. Though under Septuagint and Christian influence this is very generally rendered "Law," it is realized that "Instruction" is a more accurate rendering. The Torah is perfect, written in letters of fire in heaven antedating the creation of the world. Israel was chosen for the sake of the Torah and apart from it has no reason for existing. The Torah consists of two parts, the written and the oral. The written Torah contains 613 precepts, 365 being negative and 248 positive; the oral Torah is the extension of these precepts to cover all life and all its contingencies. Except for adaptations to more recent conditions, the oral Torah has found its definitive expression in the Talmud, to which modern developments must conform. Much scorn has been poured on the methods used by the rabbis, but once we grant the basic concept of Torah, it is difficult to see what other results could have been reached. The Talmudic system is more humane than that of the Samaritans or Karaites and is in many ways comparable with the casuistic methods of the Schoolmen and Jesuits.

Legalistic such a system must be, but this is mitigated by stress on kawwanah and lishmah, i.e., that in the carrying out of the commandment the heart must be directed (kawwanah) to God and that it should be done for its own sake (lishmah), out of the love to God, and not purely for reward. If it is asked how this can be reconciled with a statement like Acts 15:10, it must be remembered that it was said by Peter, who came from a mixed population of Galilee. The real keeping of the Law virtually demands a thoroughly Jewish environment.

The outstanding weakness of the system from the Christian standpoint is that the Torah is conceived of as something given to man for his interpretation and application. On the basis of passages like Leviticus 18:5 it is stressed that the Torah was given that men might live by it; hence commandments that weighed too heavily on the community have been mitigated or circumvented. In addition, a genuine threat to life releases the Jew from all commandments except those prohibiting idolatry, murder, and adultery—Christian baptism is regarded as idolatry. This outlook, the tendency to place all commandments on the same level, and the vanishing of sacrifice have in the course of time diminished the sense of sin. Traditional Judaism recognizes that there are two impulses in man, one good, one bad, by virtue of his creation, not fall; the concept is played down today. The evil impulse can be checked by study of Torah.

The messianic hope never took on a fixed and official form. It is universally accepted that God will yet set up His perfect rule on earth, and it was generally agreed that this would be achieved through the Messiah.* Mainly due to repeated disappointments, he has become for many the personification of the hope of the kingdom of God. With this was linked the expectation of the resurrection of the body. Under Greek influence the concept of the immortality of the soul was gradually accepted. The virtual incompatibility of the two ideas has led to a blurring of the hope of a future life and bodily resurrection. For the Liberal, future life is purely spiritual.

There is judgment to come for all, yet only the exceptionally wicked Jew need fear punishment; for most it will mean rewards. Various views have been held about Gehinnom, or hell. For some it is a limited period of punishment, which purifies or annihilates; others consider it eternal.

Theology, beyond the unique oneness of God, the divine origin and primacy of the Torah, the coming kingdom of God, and the election of Israel, plays little part in Judaism. Controversies, until recently, have been about doing. A Jew who does the right things is presumed to believe the right things unless he expressly denies them. Hence it is usual to speak of an "observant" rather than of an "orthodox" Jew. "Orthopraxy" would be a better term than "orthodoxy."

Judaism by its nature has always stressed the community rather than the individual, this world rather than the next. The ghetto system, by shutting the community in on itself, made charity and justice paramount virtues necessary for survival, and the Torah scholar, using his knowledge for the good of the community, was its outstanding member. In Judaism there are no sacraments, and the rabbi occupies his position solely by virtue of his knowledge of the Torah.

Mysticism has played a major role in the synagogue. At first it was confined to small circles "whose intellectual and religious background fortified them against the dangers of straying into the paths of heresy." Its influence widened over the centuries until in the late eighteenth century it became a popular mass-movement in E Europe known as Hasidism. Stress on the transcendence of God and the claims of the Torah prevented mysticism from degenerating into pantheism and antinomianism. All estimates of Judaism in practice must allow for the influence of the mystic element.

With few exceptions Jewry missed the impact of the Renaissance. It was the growth of humanism and the politically liberating effects of the French Revolution that exposed Jewry, especially in W Europe, to the impact of modern thought. Religiously the result has been the rise of the Liberal Synagogue (Reform Synagogue in America), which in turn has deeply influenced the thought, if not the practice, of much traditional Judaism. In it the center of gravity has moved from the Law to prophetic ethics, and but for its historical coloring, it is hardly distinguishable from Unitarianism. The advent of the State of Israel, especially since the war of 1967, has normally added a strong nationalistic coloring.

In Israel itself, Judaism is under the control of the stricter traditionalists. The tendency is for the more obvious demands of the Law to be treated as national customs without religious significance.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: S. Singer (ed.), The Authorised Daily Prayer Book of the United Hebrew Congregations of the British Empire (1891): with commentary by J.H. Hertz (2 vols., 1941); Jewish Encyclopaedia (12 vols., 1901-6); C.G. Montefiore, Liberal Judaism (1903); L. Baeck, Das Wesen des Judentums (1905—ET The Essence of Judaism, 1936); W.O.E. Oesterley and G.H. Box, The Religion and Worship of the Synagogue (1907) and A Short Survey of the Literature of Rabbinical and Mediaeval Judaism (1920); M. Friedländer, The Jewish Religon (1909, 1921); S. Schechter, Aspects of Rabbinic Theology (1909); H.L. Strack and P. Billerbeck, Kommentar zum Neuen Testament aus Talmud und Midrasch (4 vols., 1922-28); G.F. Moore, Judaism in the First Centuries of the Christian Era (3 vols., 1927, 1930); E.R. Bevan and C. Singer (eds.), The Legacy of Israel (1927); H.L. Strack, Introduction to the Talmud and Midrash (ET 1931); A. Cohen, Everyman's Talmud (1932); H. Danby (tr.), The Mishnah (1933); I. Epstein (ed.), The Talmud (ET, 35 vols., 1935-52); C. Roth, A Short History of the Jewish People (1935); C.G. Montefiore and H. Loewe, A Rabbinic Anthology (1938); G.C. Scholem, Major Trends in Jewish Mysticism (1946); J.H. Hertz, The Pentateuch and Haftorahs (1947); S.S. Cohon, Judaism, A Way of Life (1948); J. Jocz, The Jewish People and Jesus Christ (1949); M. Waxman, Judaism, Religion and Ethics (1953); I. Epstein, The Faith of Judaism (1954) and Judaism (1959); L. Roth, Judaism, A Portrait (1960); J. Parkes, The Foundations of Judaism and Christianity (1960); R.A. Stewart, Rabbinic Theology (1961); L. Jacobs, Principles of the Jewish Faith (1964), R.J. Zwi Werblowsky and D.G. Wigoder, The Encyclopedia of the Jewish Religion (1966).

H.L. ELLISON

JUDAIZERS. A party of Christians in the early church who thought it was necessary that Gentile converts to Christianity should be circumcised and observe the Jewish law—in fact that they should become Jews in order to become Christians. The epistle to the Galatians was written by Paul to demonstrate that such an attitude contradicted the gospel of the grace of God. Acts 15 records the taking up of the issue at the Council of Jerusalem and the decision that such requirements should not be made of the Gentiles, but that they should be asked to observe as requirements for table fellowship certain food and marriage regulations.

JUDAS ISCARIOT. One of the twelve apostles; the betrayer of Jesus. The meaning of the name "Iscariot" is uncertain. It is most likely to signify "man of Kerioth" (a place in S Palestine), which would make him probably the only Judean among the Twelve as well as being the bearer of the name of Judah. Others have suggested links with Sychar, Issachar, or Jericho, or a derivation from sicarios, "assassin." He held a position of importance as treasurer of the group (John 12:6; 13:29) and was close to Jesus at the Last Supper (John 13:21-26). He went to the chief priests to offer to betray Jesus (Mark 14:10f., etc.) and took the opportunity to do so in the Garden of Gethsemane (Mark 14:43-50, etc.). Accounts of his remorse and suicide are found in Matthew 27:3-10 and Acts 1:15-20. The motives which lay behind Judas's action have long fascinated students of the NT. John makes explicit his avarice (12:4-6), but it is likely that he was in one way or another disillusioned with how Jesus was working out His messianic vocation—and acted to put down someone he considered dangerous, or to force His hand to bring matters to a head. R.E. NIXON

JUDAS OF JAMES. He may have been the son or the brother of James (whose identity is unknown). He is probably to be identified with Thaddaeus.*

JUDE, EPISTLE OF, see EPISTLES, GENERAL

JUDGMENT. An important doctrine of Scripture as Christ Himself stated: "For judgment I have come into this world" (John 9:39). This NT idea grew from the OT teaching of the Day of the Lord. That New Era was thought to be the final crisis of history when God would judge men and reward them for their works. Both testaments in describing God picture Him as a holy and righteous being who must judge sin. Many leaders of the early church focused on the idea of a general judgment at the end of history. Irenaeus, Hippolytus, and Lactantius show the profound effect of this teaching as they argue for the resurrection of the body, the completion of the ministry of Christ, and the significance of the present work of God in history, all on the basis of the doctrine of God's judgment. After the Reformation and the development of Protestantism there was a great diversity of opinion on the precise number as well as the time of the judgment. Some continue to speak of a general judgment whereas others distinguish as many as seven actions in this work.

Evangelicals who believe in a number of judgments usually mention those at the cross, at the Bema seat of Christ (2 Cor. 5:10), of the living nations at the end time (Matt. 25), of the angels (Jude 6 and 2 Peter 2:4), and of the wicked dead at the Great White Throne (Rev. 20:5,7). Advocates of these elaborate schemes of judgment are usually premillennialists and dispensationalists who hold to a more complicated and detailed plan for the second coming of Christ. They agree with other evangelicals, however, that the final judgment is the climax of a process which was inaugurated by the coming of Christ, who claimed that a rejection of Him caused a person to be "condemned already because he has not believed in the name of God's one and only Son" (John 3:18). When the consummation comes, those who have not followed Christ will be eternally condemned to hell (Matt. 25:31, 46; 2 Thess. 1:7-10; Rev. 20:14,15).

The judgment of God is to be universal, and even though Christians will not be judged for their salvation, they still will be examined as to their works (Rom. 14:10). The achievements of some will be superficial ("wood, hay, or straw"), while others will have done worthwhile acts for Christ ("gold, silver, costly stones," 1 Cor. 3:12-15). In this judgment Christ's words of praise or blame will be the reward or punishment (Matt. 25:21-23; Luke 19:17).

BIBLIOGRAPHY: J. Baillie, And the Life Everlasting (1934); O. Cullmann, Christ and Time (1951); L. Morris, The Wages of Sin (1955; rep. 1957) and The Biblical Doctrine of Judgment (1960); L. Boettner, Immortality (1956); A.T. Hansen, The Wrath of the Lamb (1957).

ROBERT G. CLOUSE

JUDSON, ADONIRAM (1788-1850). Missionary, lexicographer, and Bible translator. Born at Malden, Massachusetts, son of a Congregational minister, he was graduated as valedictorian from Brown University (1807). After teaching for a year at Plymouth, he studied divinity in Andover Theological Seminary. He was a leader in the founding of the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions.* In 1812 he was ordained, and he and his wife embarked for Burma as Congregational missionaries. During that voyage they reexamined their views on baptism and both were baptized in Calcutta (1812). That cut off their support, but this was taken over by the Baptist Triennial Convention, organized in 1814.

Reaching Rangoon, Judson learned Burmese to preach and translate the Bible, and worked on an English-Burmese dictionary. The war with England (1824) brought him seventeen months' imprisonment, but the peace saw him work as an interpreter. He continued missionary work at Ava, but by 1826 he had lost his wife and two children. He then went to Maulmain. His second wife died in 1845, and he remarried again. In 1849 the Burmese-English half of his dictionary was published. He died at sea.

C.G. THORNE, JR.

JULIAN CALENDAR, see CALENDAR

JULIAN OF ECLANUM (380-c.455). Pelagian theologian. Son of Memorius, bishop of Eclanum, he was ordained on the death of his wife and succeeded his father as bishop. He was very learned in Latin. Greek, logic, and theology. He became a supporter of Pelagius* and in 418 attacked the Epistola Tractoria in which Pope Zosimus had condemned Pelagius and Celestius. He was deposed and expelled from Italy. He traveled in the East and was received by Theodore of Mopsuestia and Nestorius. Returning to Sicily, he taught there until his death. Julian was Pelagianism's "most systematic exponent;" he defined freedom of the will as "the possibility of committing sin or abstaining from it." He reduced grace to simple, protective divine assistance and denied the solidarity of the human race in Adam's sin. He defended marriage against asceticism, and the innocence of the sexual impulse. Augustine* answered him in three works. J.G.G. NORMAN

JULIAN OF NORWICH (c.1342-after 1413). English mystic. About her very little is known, except that she was an anchoress who lived in a cell built to the wall of the Norman Church of St. Julian in Norwich. Her only testament is Revelations of Divine Love. A series of sixteen revelations, or shewings, which took place on 8 May 1373, gave rise to this work, and that record is then extended with the fruit of her meditation thereon for the next twenty years. Her life was total solitude but for occasional counseling, and her thinking was without other influences except for possible knowledge of The Cloud of Unknowing and the writings of Walter Hilton. The Revelations contain no formal theological system nor any elaboration because of the ineffable nature of mystical experience, though great theological questions are wrestled with more simply. God's love is defined often in terms of pain: the sufferings of Christ and what believers must be willing to suffer for Him, which must be understood before joy can be had. Julian makes a distinction between accidental element—sickness, and shewings, which are only props to help the soul advance to God—and essential ones—prayer and contemplation, which establish the true union between God and man.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: R.H. Thouless, The Lady Julian (1924); P. Molinari, Julian of Norwich: The Teaching of a Fourteenth Century English Mystic (1958); G. Warrack (ed.), Revelations of Divine Love (1958). C.G. THORNE, JR.

JULIAN THE APOSTATE (Flavius Claudius Julianus) (c. 331-363). Roman emperor who endeavored to restore pagan religion. Born in Constantinople, he was the son of Julius Constantius, brother of Constantine I. His mother, Baslina, died soon after his birth. In 337 all his family apart from a half-brother, Gallus, were murdered by soldiers to ensure undisputed succession of Constantine's sons. Educated under Mardonius and Eusebius, bishop of Nicomedia, in 341 he was sent with Gallus to Macellum, a remote castle in Cappadocia. Returning to Constantinople (347), he studied grammar and rhetoric until exiled again to Nicomedia, where, listening to Libanius the philosopher, he was awakened to the glories of classical Greece. Hitherto a Christian by conviction, now he was won over to the old gods; hence his nickname "the Apostate."

When Gallus was executed (354), he escaped, thanks to the intercession of Empress Eusebia, and he was allowed to continue his studies in Athens. Trouble in Gaul forced Constantius to make him Caesar (355). He married Julian to his sister Helena and sent him to govern Gaul, where he achieved some notable military victories. Proclaimed Augustus by his troops (360) when Constantius died unexpectedly, he was everywhere acknowledged sole ruler (361).

Immediately Julian set about restoring the old religions. He issued an edict of universal toleration, swept away the court sycophants, became Pontifex Maximus in more than name, and ordered the restoration of the old cultus, reopening the temples and reviving the sacrifices. He even attempted to rebuild the Temple of the Jews at Jerusalem. At first tolerant of Christians—indeed, exiled Nicenes like Athanasius were permitted to return—later he began a persecuting policy. His efforts were doomed to failure, as he himself discovered at Antioch. The old religions were moribund, and his philosophic version of them never existed. The revival ended with his death on campaign in Persia. J.G.G. NORMAN

JÜLICHER, ADOLF (1867-1938). German NT scholar. Professor of theology at Marburg from 1889 to 1923, he wrote a very influential work on The Parables of Jesus (2 vols., 1888-89), in which he argued that Jesus' parables were originally intended to illustrate one truth only (i.e., as true similes and not as allegories) and that all allegorical features are therefore secondary. His Introduction to the New Testament (1894; ET 1904) offers a good summary of critical opinion in German Protestant circles at the turn of the century and was a standard work for many years. His other writings include a study of gospel criticism (1906), Paulus und Jesus (1907), and a posthumously published edition of parts of the Old Latin Versions of the NT (1938-54).

W. WARD GASQUE

JULIUS I (d. 352). Pope from 337. Elected to the Roman see in the year that Constantine died, he had the task of presiding over the Western Church in the difficult years of the Nicene theological crisis, which cannot be separated from the equally trying conflicts by which the church was ensnared in the imperial division among the sons of Constantine. That the West had from the outset found the homoousion position more acceptable than the East helps to define Julius' stance. He provided refuge for Athanasius* during the latter's second deposition (339-46), presiding over the synod in Rome (341) which went on record supporting that Nicene position represented, not only by Athanasius, but also by the more extreme Marcellus of Ancyra who had also been deposed from his see. Letters to Julius from both these men survive, as does Julius' letter of support for them, which arose out of the synod and was sent to the Eastern bishops. When the Arians responded by their own synod at Antioch (341), Julius prevailed upon the Western emperor Constans to summon a general council at Sardica (343). But the session split between West and East over the seating of Athanasius, and the two halves met separately—the Eastern within Constantius's jurisdiction—and produced opposing decisions. Within Rome, Julius was responsible for building two new churches. CLYDE CURRY SMITH

JULIUS II (1443-1513). Pope from 1503. Born Giuliano Della Rovere at Albisola, near Savona, Giuliano was influenced by his uncle, Francesco, to enter the Franciscan Order where he studied with them in Perugia and was ordained. When his uncle became Pope Sixtus IV, Giuliano became a cardinal in 1471 and served as a legate to the French king Louis XI in 1480-82. He exerted some control over the papacy when Sixtus ruled, but in 1484 when his uncle died, Giuliano secured the election of Innocent VIII and determined papal policy until Innocent's death in 1492. When Rodrigo Borgia (Alexander VI) was elected pope, Giuliano was forced to flee from Rome due to the animosity between the two powerful churchmen. Although a brief reconciliation was effected for political reasons, it was not until 1503, the year of Alexander's death, that Giuliano was able to return to Rome without fear. After the one-month pontificate of Pius III, Giuliano was able to secure his own election through means of bribery and extensive promises.

He had promised not to make war to recapture the losses which the papacy had suffered under the Borgias, but nevertheless demanded that Cesare Borgia return the dukedom of Romagna in the Papal States. Julius incurred the enmity of the Venetians with his thrust to strengthen the landholdings of the Papal States, and entered into alliances with the great European powers, including the Holy Roman Empire and France, to gain the desired territories from Venice. When this was accomplished, he strove to drive the French out of Italy and formed new alliances, keeping European statecraft in a constant turmoil. The emperor and Louis XII of France encouraged the calling of an antipapal council at Pisa, and Julius retaliated by calling the Fifth Lateran Council in 1511. Julius also entered into the Holy League with Spain, Venice, and later England, against France and finally succeeded in expelling French forces from Italy.

Julius brought about administrative reforms in the Curia and was an avid patron of the arts (notably Michelangelo), but his reputation is that of the warrior-pope. ROBERT G. CLOUSE

JULIUS III (1487-1555). Pope from 1550. Born Giovanni Maria Ciocchi del Monte in Rome, of a Tuscan family of lawyers, he completed humanist studies under Raffaelo Lippo Brandolino, then took to jurisprudence in Perugia and Bologna. Following theological training he became chamberlain to Julius II. Succeeding his uncle as archbishop of Siponto (1511), he held administrative posts under Clement VII and Paul III. He was taken hostage by imperial forces after the sack of Rome (1527). As one of three papal legates he opened the Council of Trent* as first president. The first assembly ended in 1549, and in the following year he was elected pope. He ordered the resumption of the council (1551), but it had to be suspended because of the opposition of Henry II of France. On the accession of Mary Tudor (1553), Julius sent Reginald Pole as legate to England. Julius fostered reform in the church, encouraged the Jesuits, and was a generous patron of Renaissance humanism. J.G.G. NORMAN

JULIUS AFRICANUS, SEXTUS (d. after 240). Christian scholar. Brought up in Palestine, Julius traveled widely and inquisitively, both during and after his military service. He listened to Heraclas in Alexandria, met Origen, and hunted with Bardesanes in Edessa. After settling in Emmaus he went as its representative to the emperor Elagabalus in Rome to ask that it be rebuilt. He was successful enough to be given charge of the task. He later impressed the emperor Severus (222-35) so much that he was commissioned to organize his public library in Rome. In his five-volume Chronographia he attempted to synchronize sacred and profane history and predicted that the world would last 6,000 years and that Christ had been born in the year 5,500. His twenty-four-volume Cesti was an encyclopedic work on subjects ranging from natural science to military tactics, but revealing a belief in superstition and magic. Only fragments of either work have survived. Two letters also are extant: one to Origen arguing that the Septuagint story of Susanna cannot be regarded as canonical because the evidence is against its having a Hebrew original, and one to an unknown Aristides on the differences in the genealogies of Christ in Matthew and Luke. C. PETER WILLIAMS

JUNG CODEX, see NAG HAMMADI

JURIEU, PIERRE (1637-1713). Prominent theologian and apologist of the French Reformed Church. Descended from notable families, he studied philosophy at Saumur and theology at Sedan (1656-58) before traveling to England and the Netherlands. He succeeded his father as minister at Mer (1671) and remained there until he was appointed professor of Hebrew at the Sedan academy (1674-79). During his years at Sedan, Jurieu vigorously defended the Reformed faith against the attacks of clerics like Bossuet.* When the academy was dissolved by Louis XIV, Jurieu went to the Netherlands, where on the recommendation of Pierre Bayle* he became minister of the Walloon Church at Rotterdam (1681). There he fostered French Calvinism through his writings and by caring for exiled French Reformed pastors. He came to believe that the Calvinists would soon be restored to France, because of his interpretation of the prophecies of the Apocalypse (as seen in his work: L'Accomplissement des prophéties ou la délivrance de l'église, 2 vols., 1686; ET 1687).

Jurieu gradually adopted a view that distinguished between temporal and spiritual power. He demanded full liberty of conscience for the citizen. These ideas, developed in Histoire du calvinisme et du papisme (2 vols., 1683) were accepted by many Protestants in 1685 when the Edict of Nantes* was revoked by Louis XIV. Jurieu then continued during the years 1686-89 to fashion an ideology of revolution. He stated that the "right of princes to use the sword does not extend to matters of conscience." Since Louis's use of the sword to coerce men's consciences had put himself outside the pale of law, revolt was thus lawful. Violence was to be repaid with violence.

A prolific writer, Jurieu's style is marked by impressive erudition and polemical bitterness. In addition to his books against Louis and Bossuet, he wrote against the Jansenists (Pierre Nicole and Antoine Arnauld) as well as against the indifference of Bayle. His other important works include Histoire critique des dogmes et des cultes (1704-5; ET 2 vols., 1705), Unité de l'église et points fondamentaux (1688), and Traité de l'amour divin (1700).

BIBLIOGRAPHY: C. Van Oordt, Pierre Jurieu (1879); H.M. Baird, Huguenots and the Revocation of the Edict of Nantes (2 vols., 1895); G.H. Dodge, The Political Theory of the Huguenots With Special Reference to Pierre Jurieu (1947); P. Hazard, The European Mind, the Critical Years (1680-1715) (tr. J.L. May, 1953).

ROBERT G. CLOUSE

JUSTIFICATION (Lat. justificatio, Gr. dikaiosis ). Any consideration of this term in the end resolves itself into an argument over etymology: the verb justificare undoubtedly has the "forensic" connotation of pronouncing a guilty person acquitted. Dikaioun, on the other hand, while clearly having this meaning in the majority of cases, is understood by some to imply making or becoming actually righteous.

The doctrine of Justification is clearly adumbrated in the gospels, but is brought to full realization by Paul, particularly in the Roman and Galatian epistles. Here it is presented as the result and completion of the redemptive work of Christ when man in faith responds to Him, and God in His mercy treats him as though he were righteous.

The clarity of Paul's teaching was obscured in the patristic period: Augustine at first sight seems to reaffirm the Pauline position, but really conflates the immediacy of the act of justification with the later process of sanctification. This became the accepted medieval view, reaffirmed by Thomas Aquinas for whom justifying grace was a supernatural quality infused like hope or love into the human soul, with faith its preliminary rather than its channel. Justification is thus no longer the acquirement of a status, but the production of a state, dependent especially on loyal observance of the sacraments. When the Renaissance threw men back onto the original Greek text of the NT and highlighted once more the significance of individual personality, the way was opened for Martin Luther's most vital contribution to Reformation theology: his rediscovery after agonizing search of the Pauline emphasis that in justification Christ's righteousness becomes our righteousness, or is imputed to us, by faith through grace.

This central belief of the Reformers, reiterated by Melanchthon and later by Calvin, Wesley, and Spurgeon, the Council of Trent anathematized in favor of the medieval view. Justification in post-Tridentine Catholicism became again an imparted gift, not a pronouncement of acquittal; a gradually realized psychological condition, not a once-for-event in the believer's experience. The way was opened, as before, to salvation by merit.

In later Protestant theology the theme of justification was variously handled. The basic Protestant emphasis was never entirely obscured, but Calvinists, particularly under the influence of Federal theology, dwelt on the highly contentious doctrine of eternal justification, others depressed faith at the expense of grace or vice versa, still more treated justification as progressively realized through different stages, others subsumed it under the general idea of reconciliation, while Ritschl's teaching that the community of believers is the object of justification raised the issues of the interdependence of justification, church, baptism, and the Holy Spirit. More recently Hans Küng has argued impressively that the differences between the Catholic and Protestant views are largely imaginary and capable of reconciliation, a theory more deserving of study by evangelicals than recent and impatient radical dismissals of justification as an "archaic term" (Macquarrie), its significance having been "vastly exaggerated" in previous debate.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: W. Cunningham, Historical Theology (1863); C. Hodge, Systematic Theology, vol. 3 (1873); A. Harnack, History of Dogma (ET 1894-99); A. Ritschl, Critical History of the Christian Doctrines of Justification and Reconciliation (ET 1900); J. Denney, The Christian Doctrine of Reconciliation (1917); K. Barth, Church Dogmatics, I, 2 (ET 1956); F. Gogarten, The Reality of Faith (ET 1959); G. Ebeling, Word and Faith (ET 1963) and The Nature of Faith (ET 1966); H. Küng, Justification: The Doctrine of Karl Barth and a Catholic Reflection (1964); J. Jeremias, The Central Message of the New Testament (ET 1965).

IAN SELLERS

JUSTINIAN I (483-565). Greatest of the Byzantine Roman emperors. Illyrian by birth and adopted by his uncle, Justin I, whom he succeeded in 527 as emperor, he changed his name to Flavius Justinianus. In 523 he married Theodora, who until her death in 547 had a similar influence over him as that of Livia over Augustus. A new legal code, the Corpus Juris Civilis, was made during his reign by the jurist, Trebonianus (see JUSTINI-

AN CODE). Justinian built on a grand scale, the church of Hagia Sophia being his greatest monument. During 533-4 his armies reconquered North Africa, defeating the Vandals, and a year later he drove the Goths from Italy. A champion of Nicene orthodoxy, he closed philosophical schools in Athens, forced pagans to accept Christian baptism, and persecuted the sectarian Montanists. He failed, however, in his anti-Nestorian zeal, to win the Monophysites over to his viewpoint, and this failure led to the condemnation of Origenism* and the Three Chapters Controversy.* PETER TOON

JUSTINIAN CODE. Consolidation of Roman law promulgated by Emperor Justinian* in 529 (Codex Constitutionum). Justinian found the laws of the empire in great disarray and appointed a commission of ten legal experts, including the great jurist Trebonianus, to enlarge and rearrange the existing laws, eliminating contradicting and useless constitutions. Encouraged by the success of this endeavor, Justinian turned to the simplification of more difficult works—the writings of the jurists. After issuing the "Fifty Decisions" which settled certain important legal questions on which there had been disagreement among the older jurists, Justinian appointed a new commission under Trebonianus whose task it was to condense the writings of the jurists. This Digest was promulgated in 533, shortly after Trebonianus completed and published a revised edition of the Institutes of Gaius, which was to be used as a manual for law students. Justinian then appointed another commission headed by Trebonianus to revise the Codex and incorporate the new constitutions of the "Fifty Decisions" into it. This revised edition of twelve books was promulgated in 534 (Codex repetitae praelectionis) and is what has survived to the present. From 534 to the end of this reign Justinian continued to enact new ordinances (Novellae constitutiones post codicem). The Codex, Digest, Institutes, and Novels constituted the Corpus Juris Civilis which became the basic collection of Roman law. The Code was influential in the development of canon law in the West and today is valuable for its historical and legal interest. ROBERT G. CLOUSE

JUSTIN MARTYR (c.100-165). Christian apologist. Born of pagan parents at Flavius Neapolis, formerly Shechem, in Samaria, he appears from his youth to have been intent on finding intellectual peace and satisfaction. He studied the leading philosophies of his day: Stoicism, Aristotelianism, Pythagoreanism, and Platonism. At last through a conversation with an old man he discovered that Christianity was the "one sure worthy Philosophy." From his conversion (c.132) he sought to proclaim his newfound faith, and he taught in many of the leading cities of the ancient world. He seems to have spent considerable time in Rome, where Tatian was one of his pupils. Justin was one of a number of Christian apologists who set themselves to defend the Christian faith against misrepresentation and ridicule. Justin, especially, attempted to show that Christianity was the embodiment of the noblest concepts of Greek philosophy and was the Truth par excellence.

In his First Apology (c.152) addressed to Emperor Antoninus Pius and to his son Verissimus and the philosopher Lucius, he argued that the teaching of Christ and the prophets is alone true and older than all other writings. He asserts that the divine Logos had been in the world from the beginning, and that those who lived according to "reason," whatever their race, were Christians. Justin emphasizes, however, that the whole Logos resided in Jesus Christ. Christianity was not therefore a new revelation, but supremely the full revelation of truth because Christ was Himself the incarnation of the whole divine Logos. The purpose of His coming was to save men from the power of demons and to teach the truth. More than any other second-century apologist, Justin states frequently that Christ saves mankind by His death on the cross and by His resurrection. Although he speaks of Father, Son, and Spirit, it is clear that his emphasis upon the transcendence of God led him to subordinate the Son and Spirit. In the later chapters of the First Apology he gives an account of the sacraments of baptism and the Eucharist which are of great value to students of the early liturgy.

The Second Apology (c.153) is much shorter than the first and was called into existence by Justin's indignation at the unjust persecution of Christians. The Dialogue with Trypho comes from a different background: it narrates Justin's conversation with a learned Jew, Trypho, and certain of his friends. This writing shows Justin's desire to win Jews for Christ as well as the Gentiles. The book closes with an eloquent appeal to Trypho to accept the truth and "enter upon the greatest of all the contests for your own salvation, and to endeavour to prefer to your own teaching the Christ of Almighty God."

The main significance of Justin, indeed, is that he is the first Christian thinker after Paul to grasp the universalistic implications of Christianity. With his own distinctive understanding of the Logos concept, he sums up in one bold stroke the whole history of mankind as finding its consummation in Christ.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Works in J.P. Migne (ed.), PG VI (1857); E. Goodenough, The Theology of Justin Martyr (1923); H. Chadwick, "Justin Martyr's defence of Christianity," BJRL XLVII (1965), pp. 275-97, and Early Christian Thought and the Classical Tradition (1966); W.A. Shotwell, Biblical Exegesis in Justin Martyr (1965); L.W. Barnard, Justin Martyr: His Life and Thought (1967).
G.L. CAREY

JUVENAL (d.458). Bishop of Jerusalem. Some ten years after his appointment he came to prominence at the Council of Ephesus* (431) where he supported the anti-Nestorian side. At the Robber Synod of Ephesus* (449) his voice was raised for Dioscorus,* but the political opportunism so characteristic of Juvenal's career led to his voting for the former's condemnation at the Council of Chalcedon* (451), which body confirmed the diocese of Jerusalem's jurisdiction over all Palestine. Some monkish followers of Dioscorus so threatened Juvenal's position that imperial help was needed for him to regain control of the see in 453.

JUVENCUS, GAIUS VETTIUS AQUILINUS (fl. c. 330). Latin Christian poet. The fame of Juvencus, Spanish priest of a noble family, rests on his epic of Christ's life in about 3,200 hexameters, the earliest important Christian counterpart to pagan epic. Drawn from Matthew primarily, it is called Historiae evangelicae libri IV. He was well read in the pagan classics, especially Virgil, whose influence is seen in Juvencus's genre, meter, vocabulary, and mythological allusions. However, the nature of Juvencus's work, closely paraphrasing the gospels, especially Christ's words, precluded any flights of poetic imagination. Still, the versification is generally pleasing and Juvencus was highly respected in medieval times.

DANIEL C. SCAVONE

JUXON, WILLIAM (1582-1663). Archbishop of Canterbury. Born at Chichester and educated at Oxford where he studied law, Juxon in 1609 became vicar of St. Giles, Oxford, and in 1621 succeeded William Laud* as president of St. John's College. He was vice-chancellor in 1626-27 and aided the Laudian reform of the university statutes. Laud was his friend and patron, and in 1633 Juxon succeeded him as bishop of London. In 1636 he became Lord High Treasurer of England, and after Laud's imprisonment he was Charles I's constant adviser, ministering to him up to his execution in 1649. Though a thoroughgoing Laudian, he was trusted by men of other persuasions as a man of integrity and tolerance. During the Commonwealth he was left in seclusion. At the Restoration he was made archbishop of Canterbury, but because of infirmity exercised little influence over the church. JOHN A. SIMPSON

K

KABBALAH (Cabala). The broad stream of Jewish mysticism, and more especially those schools which flourished in parts of Europe and in Palestine between the twelfth and seventeenth centuries. The Hebrew word qabbalah denotes "tradition," and by it the mystics meant both Jewish oral tradition in general and also their own esoteric lore. The roots of such mysticism lay in intertestamental developments, evidenced in the Qumran scrolls and the apocalyptic literature; in the rabbinical period, moreover, there was a considerable amount of speculative and mystical thought, influenced by Gnosticism and Neoplatonism. The Sepher Yetsirah (seventh or eighth century) already testified to a speculative interest in the nature of God and of the universe, and posited ten mediating emanations from God (called sephiroth). In due course a distinction was made between theoretical and practical kabbalah, the latter approximating to white magic. The movement, though tending to heterodoxy, was nevertheless deeply attached to the Hebrew Bible, which it interpreted both literally and cryptically (by ciphers, numerology, etc.); its authoritative work, the thirteenth-century Zohar (by Moses de Léon of Granada), purports to be a commentary on the Pentateuch. The movement became popular in the late Middle Ages, due partly to the historical stresses to which European Jewry was subjected. Hasidism is the linear descendant of the kabbalah.

The chief figures of the movement included Eleazar of Worms in Germany (thirteenth century) and Isaac Luria and Hayim Vital in Safed in upper Galilee (sixteenth century). Nahmanides and Joseph Caro were much influenced by the kabbalah, and so were some Christian thinkers, e.g., J. Reuchlin and Paracelsus.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: J.L. Blau, The Christian interpretation of the Cabala in the Renaissance (1944); C.D. Ginsburg, The Essenes ... the Kabbalah (1863-64; rep. 1955); A.J. Heschel, "The mystical element in Judaism," in L. Finkelstein (ed.), The Jews: Their History, Culture, and Religion (3rd ed., 1960), ii, pp. 932-53; G.G. Scholem, Major Trends in Jewish Mysticism (ET, 3rd ed., 1961) and On the Kabbalah and Its Symbolism (ET 1965).

D.F. PAYNE

KAEHLER, MARTIN (1835-1912). German Protestant theologian. He was born near Königsberg, Prussia, and except for three years at Bonn (1864-67) his entire academic career from 1860 to his death was spent at the University of Halle. He was strongly influenced in his theological development by Rothe, Tholuck, Müller, Beck, and von Hofmann. Though his lectures on Protestant theology, the Geschichte der protestantischen Dogmatik im 19. Jahrhundert, were published posthumously (1962), Kaehler was best known for his penetrating study, Der sogenannte historische Jesus und der geschichtliche biblische Christus (1892). In this book he opposed the tendency of biblical scholars to drive a wedge between the historical Jesus and the proclamation of the apostles. The real Jesus is not the portrait of Jesus of Nazareth which historians are able to reconstruct, but the Christ of faith who is experienced again and again by the Christian community ("the real Christ is the preached Christ").

DAVID C. STEINMETZ

KAFTAN, JULIUS WILHELM MARTIN (1848-1926). German Protestant theologian. Educated at Erlangen, Berlin, and Kiel, he later taught at the universities of Basle (1873-83) and Berlin (from 1883). Strongly influenced by Ritschl, Kaftan stressed personal religious experience and the historical revelation in Christ. The Atonement was interpreted in mystical and ethical categories, rejecting any idea of satisfaction or need for God's reconciliation with man (rather than the reverse).

KAFTAN, THEODOR (1847-1932). German Lutheran churchman. Elder brother of Julius Kaftan,* he was born in Loit, Schleswig, and educated at Erlangen, Berlin, and Kiel. He occupied various ecclesiastical posts in Schleswig, including general superintendent for the province (1886-1917). A strongly confessional Lutheran, he clashed with spokesmen for both the orthodox and neo-Protestant positions. He supported Lutheran ecumenism on the national and international levels and was a leading figure in the General Evangelical Lutheran Conference. He opposed Prussian attempts to Germanize North Schleswig, and sought to protect the Danish character in church life there. He disliked the church's growing dependence upon the state, and advocated the formation of an episcopalian territorial church. He was the author of numerous works in the field of practical theology.

RICHARD V. PIERARD

KAGAWA, TOYOHIKO (1888-1960). Japanese Christian leader. Born at Kobe, he was an illegitimate child of a wealthy cabinet minister and a geisha; yet his father took a liking to him and formally adopted him, but both his parents died before he was five. His childhood in the ancestral home was filled with bitter loneliness and tragedy, but when he was at school in Shikoku the first ray of hope and love entered his life through the friendship of a Japanese Christian teacher and two missionaries. His conversion at fifteen brought disinheritance from his family, but an overpowering experience of the love of Christ moved him to dedicate his life to serve the destitute in the slums. In his second year at the Presbyterian College in Tokyo he was stricken with tuberculosis, and all but succumbed. The appalling conditions of prostitution, poverty, and exploitation impelled him to his God-given mission, and despite poor health he entered Kobe Theological Seminary, soon to exchange his living quarters for the city's slums, where 10,000 people lived in cell-like houses six feet square.

For fifteen years from 1919 he toiled in the slums, striving to improve labor conditions and the laborers themselves. In 1921 he became the leader of the nascent labor movement, and he formed also the first peasant union. Fired by a passion for social righteousness, Kagawa preached, wrote, and worked unceasingly for the cause of Christian socialism; in 1925 trade unions were given legal right to organize, and in 1926 legislation was finally passed for abolishing the slums. Kagawa made his mark as a mystic, ascetic, and pacifist, but it was as a soldier of movements that his influence was greatest. He once stated as his aim "the salvation of 100,000 poor, the emancipation of 9,430,000 labourers, and the liberation of twenty million tenant-farmers." Prominent as a church leader and patriot, he continued as Japan's apostle of love to the end. Among his many books are Before the Dawn (ET 1925), Christ and Japan (1934), and Love, the Law of Life (1930).

See W. Axling, Kagawa (1932), and J.M. Trout, Kagawa, Japanese Prophet (1959).

DAVID MICHELL

KAISERSWERTH. Rhineland town where Theodor Fliedner,* pastor of the small Protestant community, founded an institution in 1836 to train deaconesses for nursing, educational, and social work. At Kaiserswerth itself, hospitals, homes for the old and needy, and schools formed a considerable estate. Fliedner's work was helped by Frederick William IV of Prussia and was linked with the Innere Mission.* Florence Nightingale trained there. Deaconesses from Kaiserswerth work throughout Germany and in several other parts of the world, and Kaiserswerth is the mother house of an association of about 28,000 sisters in seventy-two houses (1958).

KANT, IMMANUEL (1724-1804). German philosopher. Born in Königsberg, Prussia, into a Pietist* family, he lived there all his life. He was professor of logic and metaphysics in the university from 1770. His contact with the ideas of David Hume* "awoke him from his dogmatic slumbers" and turned him into the "critical" philosopher of the Critique of Pure Reason and later works. Thenceforth his aim was to show how reason functions in the acquisition of knowledge, and how the a priori knowledge which (according to Kant) the mind has, in logic, mathematics, and physics, can be justified; to preserve the notion of human freedom; and to give an account of the true nature of morality. The only actions that are moral are those which are in accordance with the Categorical Imperative and which are performed from a sense of duty alone. Nonmoral reasoning is by contrast hypothetical, not categorical in character.

His inquiry into the limits of knowledge demonstrates that metaphysical knowledge (including knowledge of God) is impossible; for all our knowledge arises from sense experience, although it does not end there, for the general structure of knowledge is given by the combinatory power of the human mind: neither reason nor sense experience can provide knowledge by itself. The classical rational proofs of the existence of God have to be abandoned. This denial of the knowledge of God makes room for faith. God, though unknowable, is still required (postulated) by practical reason, since the moral law demands that we should promote the highest good (happiness commensurate with virtue) which only God can bring about. The way is thus open for "rational faith," that is, the viewing of all one's duties as divine commands.

Kant's view that any knowledge of God is impossible has been extremely influential in Protestantism. Theology has become anthropology. On it has been based the romanticism of Schleiermacher* and the ethical religion of Ritschl.* Less obviously but just as surely, Karl Barth's* "wholly other" God has connections with Kant's unknowable God. With the view that God is unknowable has gone a recasting of classic dogmatic theology, from the notion of revelation onward.

OONAGH MC DONALD

KARLSTADT, see CARLSTADT

KASATKIN, IVAN, see NICOLAI

KATTENBUSCH, FERDINAND (1851-1935). German church historian and theologian. He was born in Kettwig and studied under A. Ritschl. He became professor of systematic theology at Geissen (1878), Göttingen (1904), and Halle (1906). His principal work was a history of the Apostle's Creed, Das apostolische Symbol (two vols., 1894, 1900), based on the researches of C.P. Caspari. He dated the Old Roman Creed about 100. He also contributed to the history of the Reformation confessions, the theology of Luther, and systematic theology. He "has the merit of being the first to have applied the idea of the Son of Man = people of the saints to the Christian concept of the Church" (Cullmann). J.G.G. NORMAN

KEBLE, JOHN (1792-1866). Hymnwriter and Tractarian. Educated at Oxford, where he won a double first and became a fellow of Oriel (1811-23), he assisted his vicar-father before accepting the country living of Hursley, Hampshire, where he remained until his death. In 1827 he published anonymously The Christian Year. According to A. Fox, its influence (over 100 editions were published by 1867) has been overrated and has in any case waned. Parts of it and Keble's other collections are still sung, e.g., "Blest are the pure in heart," "New every morning," "Sun of my soul," "There is a book," and "When God of old." In 1833 Keble preached his Oxford Assize sermon in which he denounced contemporary Erastianism as "national apostasy." Newman regarded the sermon as the start of the Oxford Movement.* Keble also contributed to Tracts for the Times (1833-41). After Newman's secession to Rome, Keble and Pusey led the movement. Keble's standard edition of the Works of Hooker appeared in 1836. Keble is remembered less for his many books than for his hymns and as a devoted parish priest. In 1870 Keble College, Oxford, was founded in his memory. JOHN S. ANDREWS

KEIL, JOHANN KARL FRIEDRICH (1807-1888). Lutheran scholar and exegete. Born in Lauterbach, Saxony, he studied theology at the universities of Dorpat and Berlin, and was professor of Old and New Testament exegesis and oriental languages at Dorpat (1833-58). Influenced by Hengstenberg toward conservative orthodoxy, Keil helped to shape Lutheran ministerial thought in the Baltic provinces for twenty-five years. From 1859 until his death he lived in Leipzig and Rodlitz, engaging in literary work and in serving the Lutheran Church. A vigorous advocate of conservative theology, he rejected the rationalistic, critical views of Scripture. His chief work is his biblical commentary on the OT begun in 1861 in collaboration with Franz Delitzsch. Later expositions appeared on the gospels, Peter, Hebrews, and Jude. H. CROSBY ENGLIZIAN

KEIM, KARL THEODOR (1825-78). German Protestant theologian and church historian. After studying under F.C. Baur* at Tübingen, he was professor at Zurich (1860-73) and then at Giessen (from 1873). He concentrated on the history of primitive Christianity and the Protestant Reformation. His liberal-critical life of Christ, Die Geschichte Jesu von Nazara (3 vols., 1867-72; ET in 6 vols., 1873-82), is his best-known work; here he attempted to disengage the "facts" of the life of Jesus from the miraculous elements of the gospels. He rejected the historicity of the fourth gospel altogether, though (following Baur) he argued for the primitive nature and primacy of Matthew. Luke and Mark were understood to have adapted material from Matthew and other sources in the direction of a mediating Paulinism and world-embracing universalism respectively.

W. WARD GASQUE

KEITH-FALCONER, ION GRANT (1856-1887). Missionary and Arabic scholar. Born in Edinburgh, son of the eighth Earl of Kintore (who was also an evangelist), he was educated at Harrow, Cambridge, and Leipzig. Very tall, of attractive personality, he was a Hebrew and Arabic scholar, and also one of the earliest bicycle champions (on "penny-farthings" and heavy boneshakers). He helped found the Cambridge Inter-Collegiate Christian Union in 1877 and engaged in evangelism among the poor. In 1885, partly through the influence of the Cambridge Seven, he went as a missionary to Arabs, though appointed Lord Almoner's professor in Arabic at Cambridge (nonresident). He and his young wife founded the Sheikh Othman hospital (Free Church of Scotland, afterward Church of Scotland) near Aden, but he died of fever within a few months. His social, academic, and athletic standing, together with his early death, made him a great Christian influence on his contemporaries.

JOHN C. POLLOCK

KELLS, BOOK OF, see BOOK OF KELLS

KELLY, THOMAS (1769-1854). Irish hymnwriter. Son of an Irish judge, he was born in Dublin and educated at Trinity College there. He was originally intended for the law, but was converted in 1792 and took holy orders. He remained in the Church of Ireland only a short time, and for most of his life conducted a vigorous evangelical ministry in unconsecrated buildings in Dublin, Wexford, and elsewhere. As a hymnwriter his name is often linked with those of Watts and Newton. He is credited with 765 hymns in all, of which the best known are "Look, ye saints! the sight is glorious," "The Head that once was crowned with thorns," and "We sing the praise of Him who died." Kelly excels in hymns of praise, handles difficult meters dexterously, and often succeeds in compressing the whole evangelical economy within the compass of a few verses.

IAN SELLERS

KELLY, WILLIAM (1821-1906). Plymouth brother and biblical critic. Only son of an Ulster squire, he was educated at Downpatrick and Trinity College, Dublin. He was in 1841 converted to the principles of the Brethren, and began to write extensively on behalf of the Darbyite section of that body. He edited two periodicals, The Prospect from 1848 to 1850, and the Bible Treasury from 1856 till his death; wrote a long series of devotional works and commentaries; and edited the collected works of J.N. Darby* (34 vols., 1867-83). In 1879 the excommunication of Dr. Edward Cronin led to the "Kelly schism" in the Exclusive Brethren, Kelly heading the more moderate and understanding faction till his death. The original Kelly assemblies are now much reduced, being entirely separate from the Exclusives and inclining more to the independent Brethren. Spurgeon said of Kelly that he was "born for the universe" but "narrowed his mind by Darbyism." IAN SELLERS

KELVIN, LORD, see THOMSON, WILLIAM

KEMPE, MARGERY (c.1373-d. after 1433). English mystic. Born at Bishop's Lynn in Norfolk and daughter of its many-times mayor, John Burnham, she married a local official, John Kempe, and they had fourteen children. She is best remembered for her Book of Margery Kempe, a detailed but far from complete account of her life over forty years. She suffered mental disorder, vowed chastity in 1413, and made pilgrimages to Palestine and Europe. Although her autobiography has been criticized as devoid of spiritual understanding, she counted among her advisers and supporters theologians and religious of repute, including Julian of Norwich.* Recipient of visions and revelations, she lived in a period remarkable for lady saints, and in an area which was the scene of preaching and other activities by several distinguished friars of the time. C.G. THORNE, JR.

KEMPIS, THOMAS À, see THOMAS À KEMPIS

KEN, THOMAS (1637-1711). Bishop of Bath and Wells. He became a fellow of New College, Oxford, in 1657 and taught at Winchester College from 1672. Here he probably wrote his two famous hymns, "Awake, my soul, and with the sun" and "Glory to Thee, my God, this night." Although a king's chaplain, he refused to allow his house to be used by the king's mistress, Nell Gwynne, on a royal visit to Winchester. Charles II greatly respected him, made him bishop of Bath and Wells in 1684, and received absolution from him on his deathbed. Ken refused to read James II's Declaration of Indulgence, but also declined to take the oath of allegiance to William and Mary in 1689 and was deprived of his see. Despite an offer of reinstatement in 1703, he lived an ascetic life in retirement. He wrote in the Laudian tradition a manual of devotion for boys, and The Practic of Divine Love (1685). JOYCE HORN

KENOSIS. This Greek term is formed from a reflexive verb meaning "he emptied himself" (Phil. 2:7). As a christological statement it has been appealed to as a scriptural warrant for a highly distinctive understanding of the Incarnation. In fact, P. Henry calls this theory "the fourth great attempt at a theological explanation of Christ's being." The essence of the original kenotic view which goes back to Thomasius of Erlangen is stated by J.M. Creed: "The Divine Logos by His Incarnation divested Himself of His divine attributes of omniscience and omnipotence, so that in His incarnate life the Divine Person is revealed and solely revealed through a human consciousness." F. Loofs demonstrates that nothing approaching an acceptance of this kenotic idea is to be found in the Church Fathers before the modern period. As a christological theory it is an innovation inspired by liberal theology.

Kenoticism falls into two categories corresponding to the two main presuppositions which underlie the theory. The notion of a surrender of divine attributes took its rise in Lutheran theology which, starting from the premise of communicatio idiomatum, so divinized the human nature of Christ as to produce a type of Monophysitism. But this raised problems for the nineteenth-century Lutherans who, led by Thomasius, proceeded to invert the communicatio idiomatum formula and assert the communication of Christ's human attributes to His deity. In this way they sought to safeguard the reality of His humanity—but at the expense of abolishing a continuance of His deity into His incarnate existence.

A more attractive and reasonable version of the principle that the incarnation of the divine Logos required a self-limitation was offered by the British theologians, H.R. Mackintosh and P.T. Forsyth, both of whom operated with categories of consciousness rather than metaphysics. For them, consciousness became the essence of personality; and they argued that it is a monstrous thought that the human Jesus could have sustained a divine consciousness. Instead, the eclipse of that divine awareness was the price He paid to become man, and it is that surrender which constituted the kenosis. But it remains doubtful if this modified kenoticism is any improvement, and both forms of the theory have to face the irreducible facts that God is unchangeable and the Atonement must be a work of God.

See R.P. Martin, Carmen Christi: Philippians ii. 5-11 in Recent Interpretation and in the setting of early Christian worship (1967), pp. 165-96.

RALPH P. MARTIN

KENRICK, FRANCIS PATRICK (1796-1863). Roman Catholic archbishop and educator. Born in Dublin and educated in local schools, he graduated from the College of Propaganda in Rome and was ordained there in 1821. He taught at the college and seminary at Bardstown, Kentucky (1821-30), then in 1831 was consecrated bishop and became coadjutor in the Philadelphia diocese. He succeeded to the see in 1842. In 1851 he was named archbishop of Baltimore, which post he held until his death. Kenrick was a fine scholar, brilliant teacher, and able administrator. He published several erudite books on biblical, theological, and apologetic topics.

KENSIT, JOHN (1853-1902). Protestant preacher and controversialist. Born in London of working-class parents, he was successively draper's assistant, stationer, and subpostmaster. From his youth an ardent Protestant, he was deeply incensed by the romanizing trends within the Anglican Church, and founded successively a Protestant book depot in 1885, the Churchman's Magazine, and the Protestant Truth Society (1890). The strong antiritualist agitation of 1898-1900 led him to establish the Wycliffe Preachers to bear staunch witness to Protestant principles. He fought against the consecration of liberal and ritualistic bishops, and was charged by his enemies, especially Bishop Creighton of London, with fanaticism. While conducting a Protestant crusade in Liverpool and Birkenhead in 1902, he was assaulted by a Catholic mob and died in hospital a few days later. He is generally regarded as the founder of what is known in Britain as "Political Protestantism." IAN SELLERS

KENTIGERN (Mungo) (d.603). One of the early Christian leaders and missionaries in Scotland. He came of Strathclyde Briton stock. Brought up in Culross and trained by Servanus, he moved to the Glasgow area where he became the leader or bishop of the local church. With the rise of an anti-Christian party in the kingdom of Strathclyde, however, he was forced to retire to Wales, where he is reported to have founded the monastery of Llanelwy. Later he returned to Glasgow to continue his work and, from church dedications in the north of Scotland, would seem to have carried on evangelization there also. About 590 he and Columba* met, probably in the Tay Valley, where they agreed to delimit the areas of their work. St. Mungo's Cathedral, Glasgow, is named after him. W.S. REID

KENYON, SIR FREDERIC GEORGE (1863-1952). Greek manuscript scholar. Educated at Winchester and New College, Oxford, he was appointed to the staff of the British Museum in 1889. From 1898 until 1909 he was assistant keeper of manuscripts, and from 1909 until 1930 director and principal librarian. His scholarly interests covered a good range, and he published a number of books concerned with Robert and Elizabeth Barrett Browning. His main work was done with Greek papyri and particularly with NT manuscripts. His publications included Our Bible and the Ancient Manuscripts (1895; rev. 1939); A Handbook to the Textual Criticism of the New Testament (1901; rev. 1912); Recent Developments in the Textual Criticism of the Greek Bible (1933); The Text of the Greek Bible (1937); The Bible and Archaeology (1940); and The Bible and Modern Scholarship (1948). He used his considerable knowledge of MSS in the ancient world to demonstrate the substantial reliability of the NT text and its closeness to the events which it records. R.E. NIXON

KEPLER, JOHN (1571-1630). One of the founders of modern astronomy. Born near Stuttgart, he became a theological student, teacher of astronomy and mathematics, assistant to Tycho Brahe, imperial mathematical aide to Rudolph II, and astrologer to Wallenstein. His principal scientific discoveries were the three laws of motion which bear his name, the principle of continuity in geometry, and the Keplerian telescope. He worked also on the theory of optics and on the calculus and coined a number of scientific terms such as "satellite" and "camera obscura." He was led to his discovery of the three laws of planetary motion by his belief in Neoplatonic mysticism. Although he accepted the Bible and the Christian religion, his understanding of nature was pantheistic. He thought the universe was an expression of the being of God Himself, and that the sun was the image of the Father.

ROBERT G. CLOUSE

KERR, ALEXANDER (1885-1970). First principal of Fort Hare, South Africa. Born near Kilmarnock, Scotland, he took charge in 1915 of Fort Hare, the first institution of higher learning for Africans in Bantu-speaking Africa; it resulted from cooperation between the churches, the state, and the African people. Initially it pioneered African secondary education, but was soon preparing students from South, Central, and East Africa for degrees of the University of South Africa. There were 720 graduates between 1923 and Kerr's retirement in 1948. He served on various official commissions, including those which recommended the establishment of Makerere College, Uganda, and the University of Rhodesia. Although a layman, he was moderator of the general assembly of the Presbyterian Church of South Africa in 1942. He opposed the transfer of Fort Hare to government control in 1960.

D.G.L. CRAGG

KESWICK CONVENTION. This annual summer gathering of evangelicals at Keswick in the English Lake District originated in the Moody–Sankey revival of 1875 through the efforts of the then vicar of Keswick, Canon Harford-Battersby. The keynotes of Keswick are prayer—especially invocation of the Holy Spirit to indwell the gatherings —reverent Bible study, addresses, and a marked enthusiasm for foreign missions. The movement aims to promote "practical holiness," and its motto is "All One in Christ Jesus." A quantity of literature appears annually, most notably the yearly report Keswick Week, the journal The Life of Faith (from 1879), and the volumes of the Keswick Library (from 1894). Local "Keswicks" or conventions are held in various cities. Supporters come mainly from Christians of the Reformed tradition, especially evangelical Anglicans. Unlike Wesleyan–Arminian concepts of holiness, Keswick maintains that the Christian's tendency to sin is not extinguished but merely counteracted by victorious living in the Spirit. IAN SELLERS

KETTLEWELL, JOHN (1653-1695). Writer and Nonjuror.* Born in Yorkshire, he was educated at Oxford, and ordained in 1678. His first book, The Measures of Christian Obedience (1681), brought him the chaplaincy to the countess of Bedford and the vicarage of Coleshill (1682). He established several charities, preached as a Nonjuror against the rebellions of 1689, and was deprived of his living in 1690. He removed to London and there wrote many devotional books and some controversial tracts. He founded also a fund for deprived clergy, which was declared illegal after his death.

KEYS, POWER OF THE (Lat. Clavium potestas). A term symbolic of the authority of Christ and of church leaders. In the Book of Revelation (1:18; 3:7,8), "key(s)" is used as a symbol of the Lord's authority over His church, or that of one of His messengers to whom is given power over those in the "Abyss" (20:1). In Matthew's gospel (16:19) it is the symbol of that authority given to Peter as the leader of the apostolic band. The Roman Church has traditionally understood this authority as belonging to Peter alone, and thus to the bishop of Rome as the head of the Church Universal. Protestants understand this authority either as having been given to Peter as representative of the whole band of apostles (cf. Matt. 28:18), or as having been fulfilled by Peter as an individual when he "opened the door of faith to the Gentiles" (Acts 14:27) by preaching to and baptizing the household of Cornelius, as he had done earlier for the Jews on the day of Pentecost (Acts 2).

W. WARD GASQUE

KGAMA III (c.1828-1923). African Christian chief. Baptized in 1862 by H.C. Schulenbourg of the Hermansburg Mission, he soon proved himself an uncompromising Christian. Confirmed in 1875 as chief of the Ngwato, he tried to apply Christian standards of government despite strong opposition. He opposed many tribal customs, banned the liquor trade, dispensed evenhanded justice, and refused to alienate tribal lands to white men. Although jealous of his position and somewhat intolerant, he treated his opponents (particularly his father and brother) with astounding patience and magnanimity. He consistently supported the London Mission Society which replaced the Hermansburg Mission, but sometimes had strained relations with individual missionaries. He accepted a British Protectorate in 1885 and visited England in 1895 in a successful attempt to avoid control by the Chartered Company. His grandson, Seretse Khama, became first president of Botswana. D.G.L. CRAGG

KHOMYAKOV, ALEKSEI STEPANOVICH (1804-1860). Russian philosopher and theologian. A member of the landed gentry, he was graduated from the University of Moscow in 1822. He was an officer in a cavalry regiment before traveling to France, Italy, Switzerland, and Austria. From 1828 to 1829 he served in a hussar regiment during the Russo-Turkish War. In 1830 he retired to his estates of Bogucharov and Lipitzy where he tried to improve the conditions of his serfs and eventually advocated the abolition of serfdom. He spent his winters in Moscow where he was active in the intellectual life of the salons. In 1847 he traveled to Germany and Bohemia. His writings cover a wide range of subjects from tragedy and poetry to philosophy and theology.

Khomyakov's philosophy emphasized the concreteness and wholeness of reality. A leader in the Slavophile movement, he believed that the Slavs were destined to take over the leadership of the world from the decadent Western civilization which was characterized by reason, logical necessity, and materialism, in contrast with the spiritual and moral freedom of Russian thought. Although a layman, he was well read in theology and believed the Orthodox Church as a mystical body was the guiding light of true Christianity. He criticized both Roman Catholicism and Protestantism for destroying the unity of Christianity. At the heart of his theology is his doctrine of Sobornost, or commonality, which portrays the church as the divinely inspired fellowship of truth and love. Truth, then, comes not from the decisions of a hierarchy or a council, but from the whole Christian community; not from reason, but from the illumination in the depth of man's soul by faith. Khomyakov was a religious populist who saw the Russian peasant commune as that which preserved Christianity in its pure form and would lead the nations into a new Christian era.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: V.Z. Zavitnevich, Aleksei Stepanovich Khomiakov (2 vols., 1902-13); A. Gratieux, A.S. Khomiakov et le mouvement slavophile (2 vols., 1939); N. Zernov, Three Russian Prophets (1944); S. Bolshakoff, The Doctrine of the Unity of the Church in the Works of Khomyakov and Moehler (1946).

BARBARA L. FAULKNER

KIDD, BERESFORD JAMES (1864-1948). Church historian. Son of a Church of England clergyman, he was educated at Oxford, was ordained (1887), served as assistant curate in Oxford (1887-1900), and lecturer in theology at Pembroke College (1902-11). He was vicar of St. Paul's, Oxford (1904-20), and in 1920 became warden of Keble College, where he remained until retirement (1939). Kidd's publications were concerned with the history of Christianity, beginning with the Thirty-Nine Articles (1899) and the English (1901) and Continental (1902) Reformation, pursuing in detail the church to 461 (1922), adding the Eastern Churches from 451 (1927), and the Counter-Reformation (1933). His work in the history of Christianity was based on careful study of its documents, illustrative collections of which he also published. Throughout his career he pursued the matter of Anglican catholicity, and later wrote on Roman primacy (1936) and Validity (1937). CLYDE CURRY SMITH

KIERKEGAARD, SØREN AABY (1813-1855). Danish philosopher. Born in Copenhagen, son of a wealthy Lutheran who retired early to devote his life to piety, Søren's melancholy disposition, inherited from his father, may have influenced his highly individual and introspective writing. Attempts have been made to explain his thought in psychological terms. He took ten years to take his degree; his engagement was broken off and he never married; he prepared for ordination in the Danish Lutheran Church, but was never ordained.

His writings have been divided into two main groups, though the division is only a rough one. Those written between 1841 and 1845 are largely philosophical and aesthetic. Some were pseudonymously attributed to John Climacus and contain numerous pseudonymous characters who express indirectly the writer's viewpoint. The works of this period include his thesis on The Concept of Irony with Constant Reference to Socrates (1841), Either-Or (1843), Fear and Trembling (1843), The Concept of Dread (1844), Stages on Life's Way (1844), Philosophical Fragments (1844), Concluding Unscientific Postcript to the Philosophical Fragments (1846), and numerous Edifying Discourses. The works of Kierkegaard's later period are sometimes described as his Christian writings, though they might with equal accuracy be described as works attacking formal Christianity. In fact, in both periods he wrote from a Christian standpoint. Among his later writings are Works of Love (1847), Christian Discourses (1848), and Training in Christianity (1850). He kept a Journal to the end of his life. A study of its contents and his various other papers is an invaluable supplement to his other writings.

In Holy Week 1848, Kierkegaard underwent a second conversion experience, after which he largely abandoned his pseudonymous writing in favor of direct communication and Christian witness. When Bishop Mynster died in 1854, his successor, H.L. Martensen, delivered an oration celebrating his predecessor's witness to the truth. Although Mynster had been a lifelong friend of the family, Kierkagaard could not forbear writing a withering series of attacks on the man who had come to symbolize for him the formal, conformist, indifferent Christianity into which Protestantism had now fallen. Kierkegaard died while the controversy was at its height.

His thought was shaped by his reaction to Hegel and German idealism in general; his debt to Greek thought, especially to Socratic irony; his sense of the otherness of God; and an overpowering awareness of the personal demands of NT Christianity as contrasted with the lukewarm, official Christianity of the day.

At the heart of Kierkegaard's thought lies the distinction between time and eternity, finite and infinite, immanent and transcendent. Man and his world belong to the former; God to the latter. There is no continuity between the two, for God is wholly other. The gulf can be bridged only from God's side. This is done in the Incarnation. But even here the divinity of Christ is hidden. Christ comes to men incognito. It cannot be otherwise, for to be known directly is the mark of an idol. Christ can be known only by faith. It is by faith that man becomes a true contemporary of Christ, transcending the limits of time and space. The Christian life is one of personal commitment in faith.

Consequently Kierkegaard's pronouncements on history appear disparaging; for merely historical knowledge without faith does not lead to Christ. Conversely, a minimal historical knowledge is enough to afford an occasion for faith. But unlike some of his twentieth-century followers, Kierkegaard did not favor radical, biblical criticism. His writings take Scripture at its face value and show no interest in the criticism of his day. The key to his attitude was the conviction that the finite cannot contain or express the infinite. The temporal is merely the occasion for encountering the eternal.

Through translation into German, English, and other languages, Kierkegaard is more influential today than in his lifetime. He is widely regarded as a forerunner of existentialism.* But although he was deeply concerned with human existence, his thought has more in common with the dialectical theology of the early Barth than with later radical existentialism. It worked within a theistic framework that was concerned above all with the transcendence of God. He preserved this transcendence by making it a hidden one. Consequently Kierkegaard has been criticized for irrationalism. Others have dispensed with his theistic framework and made his approach the basis of a nontheistic existentialism.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: There is no collected edition of Kierkegaard's writings in English, but all the most important works have been translated. A comprehensive list, with descriptive analysis, is given by G.E. and G.B. Arbaugh, Kierkegaard's Authorship (1968). A. Dru has edited his Journals (1938). This is supplemented by R.G. Smith (ed.), The Last Years: Journals 1853-1855 (1965). His Journals and Papers are being edited by H.V. and E.H. Hong (1967- ).

Studies: W. Lowrie, Kierkegaard (2 vols., 1938) and A Short Life of Kierkegaard (1942); H. Diem, Kierkegaard's Dialectic of Existence (1959); L. Dupré, Kierkegaard as Theologian (1963); E.J. Carnell, The Burden of Søren Kierkegaard (1965); P. Sponheim, Kierkegaard on Christ and Christian Coherence (1968). COLIN BROWN

KIKUYU CONTROVERSY. A dispute within the Anglican Church about the nature of the church and its ministry, which arose from the proceedings of a conference of missionary bodies working in Kenya, held on the Church of Scotland mission station at Kikuyu near Nairobi in 1913. The conference discussed a scheme of federation under which all Christian missionary work in Kenya would be brought together. Opposition to the scheme came from missionaries holding Baptist views who wished to rebaptize those baptized in infancy, and from the Anglican delegates who wished to insist on episcopal confirmation. Both parties, however, withdrew their opposition, and the scheme was approved for transmission to the overseas parent bodies of the missions involved. The conference closed with a communion service according to the Anglican Rite conducted by the bishop of Mombasa (William Peel), in which all members took Communion except the Friends.

When the Anglo-Catholic bishop of Zanzibar, Frank Weston, heard of the proceedings he wrote a letter of protest to the archbishop of Canterbury, Randall Davidson. He objected to what he regarded as the inadequate view of the church and its ministry reflected in the scheme of federation, especially the lack of emphasis on the historic episcopate, and the admission of nonepiscopally confirmed Christians to a Communion service conducted by an Anglican bishop. A month later he sent the archbishop a formal indictment of the bishops of Mombasa and Uganda (J.J. Willis, who chaired the conference) and asked him to arraign them on charges of "propagating heresy and committing schism." The archbishop refused to do this, and referred the matter to the Central Consultative Body of the Lambeth Conference.

Meanwhile the controversy spread throughout the English-speaking world and was even the subject of a Punch cartoon. After some delay due to the outbreak of war, the archbishop delivered his findings at Easter 1915. He was obviously sympathetic to the two bishops, but advised caution in the matter of intercommunion in future, and felt that he could not advise Anglican acceptance of the scheme of federation in the form proposed.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: H.M. Smith, Frank, Bishop of Zanzibar (1926); G.K.A. Bell, Randall Davidson (1935); vol. 1, chap. 42; J.W. Arthur and J.J. Willis in the symposium Towards a United Church (1947); R. Macpherson, The Presbyterian Church in Kenya (1970). JOHN WILKINSON

KILHAM, ALEXANDER (1762-1798). Founder of the Methodist New Connexion.* He was born in Epworth, Wesley's birthplace, son of a Methodist weaver. Converted while young, he entered the service of Robert Carr Brackenbury, the Methodist gentleman–preacher, and assisted him in pioneer preaching in the Channel Islands. He became an itinerant preacher in 1785 and was soon involved in controversies (arising first from the expectation and then the event of Wesley's death) about the relation of Methodism to the Church of England. His pamphlets, under his own name or pseudonyms, defended administration of the sacrament to Methodists by preachers who were not in Anglican orders, called for lay representation in circuit and connexional government, and opposed a project for Methodist bishops. An attack on conference abuses brought his expulsion in 1796, and the Methodist New Connexion was formed, embodying his principles. He died, still only 36, worn out by extreme toil. One of Kilham's stations was Aberdeen, and Scottish Presbyterian practice may have affected him. Certainly he represents the tradition always present in Methodism which stood closer to English Dissent than to Anglicanism. His widow Hannah (1774-1832) joined the Society of Friends and became a pioneer of African linguistics and education. A.F. WALLS

KILIAN (c.640-c.689). "The Apostle of Franconia." A native of Ireland, he was probably already a bishop when he left with eleven companions to evangelize the Franks. Having reached Würzburg, he reputedly traveled to Rome for papal approval of his mission. He converted many in Franconia and Thuringia, including Duke Gozbert, whom he persuaded to separate from Geilana, his brother's widow. In revenge she had him murdered with two of his fellow-missionaries, Coloman and Totman. Their relics were solemnly transferred by Burchard, first bishop of Würzburg, to the new cathedral in 752, and are now enshrined in the Neumünster, traditionally the site of the martyrdom. J.G.G. NORMAN

KILWARDBY, ROBERT (c.1210-1279). Archbishop of Canterbury from 1273. One of the foremost theologians of his time, he studied at Oxford and Paris and taught in both universities. In 1240 he became a Dominican and in 1261 prior provincial for England. Vigorous and respected as a theologian, his tenure of the former post was marked by controversy with the Franciscans as to whether interior poverty was not more spiritual than material poverty, and by increasing confrontation with the Aristotelian influences in his own order. In 1273 he became archbishop of Canterbury and was energetic in visitations. In 1277, after an Oxford visitation, he condemned several Thomist doctrines, but Thomist support was powerful at the papal court, and Kilwardby was summoned to Rome and "promoted" to the cardinalate. He resigned as archbishop and died shortly afterward. C. PETER WILLIAMS

KING, EDWARD (c.1735-1807). Archaeologist and writer on science and religion. Born in Norwich and educated at Cambridge and Lincoln's Inn, King (who had private means) practiced law, occasionally writing and studying for most of his life. His interests were many, but the study of sacred Scripture as related to secular knowledge predominated. His writings are characterized by Christian devotion, a pellucid style, and heavy documentation, but also, not infrequently, by lack of a balanced judgment. His extreme originality shocked his contemporaries, arousing strong opposition, but many of his ideas, suitably modernized, would be more acceptable today. In a brilliant book (1796) he argued on biblical and observational grounds for the reality of meteorites at a time when this view was commonly ridiculed. His discussions and speculations on the use of "heaven" and "heavens" in the NT, the meaning of Genesis 1–3, and the possibility of a multipopulated universe, etc., are of abiding interest.

R.E.D. CLARK

KING, JONAS (1792-1869). American Congregational author and missionary to Greece. Born in Hawley, Massachusetts, and educated at Williams College (1816) and Andover Seminary (1819), he was ordained in 1819, studied Arabic for a year, then went to Palestine under the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions (1822-25). Returning home, he remained in Greece for a time, marrying Anetta Mengous in 1829. Assigned to Greece in 1830, he began a career of distinguished missionary and consular service. Besides founding a Greek Protestant church, King also started a school and wrote Christian literature in several languages. His Farewell Letter (1825) with his reasons for not becoming a Roman Catholic was translated into several languages. He died in Athens.

ROBERT C. NEWMAN

KING, MARTIN LUTHER, JR. (1929-1968). American civil rights leader. Born in Atlanta, Georgia, and educated at Morehouse College, Crozer Theological Seminary, and Boston University (Ph.D., 1955), he became pastor of Drexler Avenue Baptist Church, Montgomery, Alabama (1954), and co-pastor with his father of Ebenezer Baptist Church, Atlanta (1959). He rose to national prominence as leader of the movement to secure equal rights for Negroes through nonviolent, mass demonstrations, beginning with the Montgomery bus boycott (1956). He organized the Southern Christian Leadership Conference,* was the leading figure in the March on Washington (1963) that led to the 1964-65 Civil Rights Acts, and was active in voter registration drives. He received the Nobel Peace Prize (1964). King urged settlement of the Vietnam conflict and admission of Communist China to the U.N. Strongly criticized by segregationists and militant blacks, he was assassinated in Memphis, Tennessee, by a white man. He wrote Stride Toward Freedom (1958), Strength to Love (1963), Why We Can't Wait (1964), and Where Do We Go from Here: Chaos or Community? (1967).

ALBERT H. FREUNDT, JR.

KINGDOM OF GOD. This phrase (and the phrase "the kingdom of heaven" which is used often in Matthew's gospel with the same meaning) does not occur in the OT or in Jewish literature, but its source is to be found there. The idea of God reigning is prominent especially in the Psalms. The messianic promises were concerned with a king who should reign. The apocalyptic writers stressed God's reign as something which would break into the present world order and establish a new one, while the rabbis saw the kingdom as being connected with obedience to the Law. In the NT, the kingdom of God plays a very important part, particularly in the synoptic gospels, of which it is the central theme. The Greek word basileia, like its English translation, suggests too strongly a "realm" rather than a "reign," but it is the latter concept which, drawing its significance from the dynamic Hebrew work malkuth, is the more prominent in the NT.

A proper understanding of "the kingdom of God" in the teaching of Jesus has been bedeviled by the tendency of scholars to read into the gospels their own views of what Christianity is about. The liberal Protestants of the nineteenth century reduced the conception to a set of humanistic values ("the kingdom of self-respect," etc.). Albert Schweitzer, in reaction to this, found a revolutionary content in Jesus' message and the expectation of an imminent consummation of the kingdom. More recent scholars have tried to do more justice to the various sides of the teaching. Many of the parables of Jesus deal with the crisis caused by the coming of the kingdom, and if this in many cases is meant to have its primary reference to the response of the Jewish people to the ministry of Jesus, it may have a legitimate extension to the situation of the Christian Church as it waits for the final consummation.

There has been divergence of opinion as to whether the "drawing near" of the kingdom proclaimed by Jesus (Mark 1:14f.) means that it had actually arrived when He began his ministry. There are passages which seem unquestionably to imply that the presence of Jesus meant the presence of the kingdom (Mark 14:25; Matt. 25:34; Luke 22:29f.). A number of other passages may refer to the Parousia or to some event such as the Resurrection or Pentecost which could be described as a coming of the kingdom (e.g., Mark 9:1). Whether present or future, the reign of God demands a response of commitment from men who are called frequently to enter the kingdom. This is also found in John's gospel (3:3-5). The term is comparatively rare in the rest of the NT. Since the time of Augustine there has been a tendency to institutionalize the concept of the kingdom by identifying it with the church.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: A. Schweitzer, The Quest of the Historical Jesus (1910); T.W. Manson, The Teaching of Jesus (1931); C.H. Dodd, The Parables of the Kingdom (1935); R. Otto, The Kingdom of God and the Son of Man (1943); R.H. Fuller, The Mission and Achievement of Jesus (1954); N. Perrin, The Kingdom of God in the Teaching of Jesus (1963); G.E. Ladd, Jesus and the Kingdom (1966). R.E. NIXON

KING JAMES VERSION, see BIBLE, ENGLISH VERSIONS

KING'S CONFESSION, see SCOTS CONFESSION

KING'S EVIL, THE. Scrofula, a tubercular disorder afflicting the skin with draining sores and ugly scars. French and English tradition regarded the disease curable by the monarch's touch, hence the term "the king's evil." Presenting those afflicted to the king may date from the reign of Edward the Confessor (d.1066). The practice certainly existed in the court of Louis IX (d.1270) in France. His curative power was supposedly passed to the Valois monarchs of France and to English royalty through Edward III (d.1377). The latter embellished the practice by presenting the sufferer with a touchpiece or coin serving as a talisman. At times the touching was accompanied by ablutions and litanies. The last to practice the rite were the English Stuarts. JAMES DE JONG

KINGSLEY, CHARLES (1819-1875). English novelist and Christian Socialist. Born at Holne, Devonshire, and educated at King's College, London, and Magdalene College, Cambridge, he was ordained in 1842, and from 1844 was vicar of Eversley, Hants. Though ill-qualified, he was professor of modern history at Cambridge (1860-69) and he subsequently held canonries at Chester and Westminster. From 1869 he was prominent in the Educational League. He was precocious, athletic, romantic, and interested in the sciences, particularly botany. He was influenced by Thomas Carlyle and F.D. Maurice, and as "Parson Lot" was the pamphleteer of the Christian Socialist* movement. His concerns were educational and sanitary reform, and the extension of the co-operative principle. He was a critic of Tractarianism;* "Muscular Christianity" is associated with him; and his insinuation in 1863 that Newman had little respect for truth led Newman to write his Apologia. Kingsley's novels generally had some bearing on social issues. Westward Ho, Hereward the Wake, and The Water Babies are still read. JOHN A. SIMPSON

KIRK; KIRK SESSION. In Scotland the word "kirk" is still used interchangeably with "church." Originally the allusion was with particular reference to the national Church of Scotland (hence, "Auld Kirk"), but it has come to be employed generally to denote the denomination or the place of worship of any of the mainline Scottish churches other than Roman Catholics and Episcopalians. The kirk session is the lowest court in any Presbyterian Church, concerned with the oversight of a single congregation. In the case of the Church of Scotland, the kirk session's interest technically extends to the whole parochial area.

KIRK, KENNETH ESCOTT (1886-1954). Bishop of Oxford. Educated at Oxford, he saw chaplaincy service in World War I before returning to Oxford (1922-37) where finally he held the chair of moral and pastoral theology. Consecrated bishop in 1937, he continued his writing, particularly on moral theology, and is probably best known for The Vision of God (1931) and The Apostolic Ministry (1946).

KISS OF PEACE. A salutation as a token of Christian brotherhood named in 1 Peter 5:14 and often referred to in the NT as the "holy kiss" (Rom. 16:16; 1 Cor. 16:20; 1 Thess. 5:26) and later, among patristic writers, as the "kiss of peace." It was so mentioned first by Justin Martyr in the second century; he described it as a mutual greeting of the faithful. No limitation of its use is stated or implied; the Christians were simply bidden "to greet one another." A sign of love and union, the kiss of peace was a part of the Eucharistic liturgy and was maintained in the Western Church until after the thirteenth century. Once actually a kiss, the symbol has been modified so that the persons exchanging it face each other, and each places his hands upon the other's shoulders and each bows his head. WATSON E. MILLS

KITTEL, GERHARD (1888-1948). German biblical scholar. Born in Breslau, youngest son of Rudolph Kittel,* he taught at Kiel and Leipzig before assuming the chair of NT at Griefswald in 1921. Five years later he took up a similar post at Tübingen and held it nominally until his death. Originally interested in rabbinical studies, Kittel in 1931 launched a major composite project—Theologisches Wörterbuch zum Neuen Testament—wherein he insisted that a lexicon of the NT must trace the history of each word with reference to its secular usage in classical and koine Greek as well as its religious connotations derived from the Septuagint and the Hebrew background. By World War II four massive volumes (A-N) had been completed. While Kittel held back from full Nazi demands to suppress Christianity, Das antike Weltjudentum (1943), written with Eugen Fischer, shows his propagandistic usefulness. CLYDE CURRY SMITH

KITTEL, RUDOLPH (1853-1929). German OT scholar. Born of a Swabian family, he studied at Tübingen where in 1881 his prize criticism of J. Wellhausen* impressed C.F.A. Dillmann of Berlin, whose OT handbook he was later to edit, and whose commentary on Isaiah he revised. In 1888 he became professor of OT at Breslau, transferring in 1898 to the chair of biblical theology at Leipzig, whence he retired in 1924. He prepared a critical edition of the Hebrew text, Biblia Hebraica (3rd ed., with Paul Kahle, 1929-37), and prepared commentaries on Kings (1900), Chronicles (1902), Psalms (1913), Judges (1922), and Samuel (1922). He wrote Geschichte der Hebräer (2 vols., 1888-92)—which later became Geschichte des Volkes Israel, Die hellenistische Mysterienreligion und das Alte Testament (1924)—and Die Völker des vorderen Orients (1931). He did not live long enough to see the Ras Shamra Tablets* which his work anticipated. CLYDE CURRY SMITH

KITTO, JOHN (1804-1854). English biblical scholar. Born in Plymouth, Kitto at the age of twelve sustained an accident while assisting his father, a drunken stonemason, which left him permanently deaf. Dragging out a miserable existence first as a workhouse inmate and then a shoemaker's apprentice, he showed a great interest in books and, having been converted in 1824, was rescued by A.N. Groves,* who sent him to Islington Missionary College to train as a printer for the Church Missionary Society. This body found his services both in London and Malta (1827-29) unsatisfactory, and in 1829 he traveled to Muslim lands as one of Groves's party of Brethren missionaries. In Baghdad he set up a missionary school which was destroyed in 1832 when he returned to England. He now broke with the Brethren and began to write for the wider evangelical world. His Pictorial Bible (1836f.), History of Palestine (1843f.), Cyclopedia of Biblical Literature (1845f.), Journal of Sacred Literature (1848f.), and the Daily Bible Illustrations (1850f.) were once well-known works of devotion and popular scholarship. Latterly academically honored, he struggled against severe physical and pecuniary hardships till his death. IAN SELLERS

KLOPSTOCK, FRIEDRICH GOTTLIEB (1724-1803). German poet. Born at Quedlinburg, eldest son of a lawyer, he attended the classical school of Schulpforta, near Naumburg (1739), and studied theology at Jena (1745) and Leipzig (1746). While still at school he drafted the plan of a religious epic, Der Messias, inspired by Milton's Paradise Lost. He was a private tutor in Langensalza (1748). Frederick V of Denmark, on the advice of his prime minister, Count von Bernstorff, invited him to his court to complete Der Messias (1751). He married Margareta (Meta) Moller of Hamburg (1754), who died four years later. Apart from a year at Karlsruhe from 1770, he lived in Hamburg, completing Der Messias (1773) and marrying the niece of his first wife. He wrote religious odes, hymns, and lyrical and epic poems, and made important contributions to philology and the history of German poetry. J.G.G. NORMAN

KNEELING. A posture used in Christian worship, generally for prayer, which in the early church signified penitence. It was actually forbidden on Sundays and during the Easter festival. Standing was the normal posture for prayer adopted from Jewish practice (but cf. Acts 20:36). It remains customary in the East, apart from penitential devotions. In the West kneeling has become more normal, apart from some Protestant churches where sitting is usual. At the Reformation in England there was some dispute over the direction to kneel when receiving the Communion. An explanation (known as the Black Rubric) that this signified no adoration of the elements, but simply humility and gratitude, was inserted in the 1552 Prayer Book and restored in revised form in 1662. JOHN TILLER

KNIBB, WILLIAM (1803-1845). Perhaps the best known of the early Baptist missionaries in Jamaica, he arrived in the island in 1824 to manage the Kingston school. In 1830 he went as minister to Falmouth, near Montego Bay, where he remained until his death. His ministry in Falmouth spans momentous years: the slave revolt of 1831-32, the persecution of evangelicals which followed it, emancipation, the shift from plantation to freehold residence—all crowd into the fifteen years of Knibb's ministry. His principal contribution in these events was as propagandist. A vigorous and flamboyant orator, he could always be counted on to flay the devil. In 1832 and again in 1841, when the Baptists badly needed an advocate in England, they sent Knibb. He was a tireless champion of the blacks, in slavery, in apprenticeship, and in freedom, when he risked his personal credit to settle the slaves on their own land. He was also a prime mover in the decision to declare the Jamaica churches independent of the Baptist Missionary Society, in the formation of Calabar College for training ministers, and in organizing the first West Indian mission to Africa.

See H.J. Hinton, Memoir of William Knibb, Missionary in Jamaica (1847) and G.A. Catherall, William Knibb: Freedom Fighter (1972).

GEOFFREY JOHNSTON

KNIGHTS HOSPITALLERS, see HOSPITALLERS

KNIGHTS OF COLUMBUS. A fraternal benefit society of Roman Catholic men, founded by Michael J. McGivney of New Haven, Connecticut, and chartered by the state of Connecticut in 1882. The organization is represented in every state of the USA and in Canada, Mexico, Puerto Rico, the Philippines, and the Canal Zone. With more than 1.5 million members, affiliated through 5,000 subordinate councils and sixty-one state councils with its supreme council, it seeks to further charity, brotherhood, and patriotism. It has promoted war relief, disaster relief, parochial education, veterans' benefits, parish assistance, and historical studies, and it has lobbied for aid to parochial schools. It is also notable for its provision of insurance to protect the wife and children of each of its members. DARREL BIGHAM

KNIGHTS OF MALTA/RHODES, see HOSPITALLERS

KNIGHTS TEMPLAR, see TEMPLARS

KNOX, EDMUND ARBUTHNOTT (1847-1937). Bishop of Manchester. Educated at Oxford, where he became fellow and tutor (1869-84), he subsequently engaged in parish work before consecration as suffragan bishop of Coventry in 1894, whence he was translated to Manchester in 1903. He retired in 1921. Knox was a prominent evangelical; his opposition contributed much to the rejection of the revised Prayer Book (1927-28), and he strove vigorously against liberal and High Church tendencies. His writings include Sacrifice or Sacrament (1914), On What Authority? (1922), and The Tractarian Movement, 1833-1845 (1933).

KNOX, JOHN (c.1514-1572). Scottish Reformer. Born at Haddington and educated at St. Andrews, probably under the conciliarist and scholastic John Major, Knox was ordained by the bishop of Dunblane (1536) and later served as a notary (by 1540) and a private tutor (by 1543). Thomas Gilyem (Gwilliam) converted him to Protestantism. He was subsequently influenced by the more zealous principles of John Rough and George Wishart,* a disciple of Lutheran and Swiss theology. Knox was indebted to Wishart for his sense of prophetic vocation, his tendency toward theological eclecticism, and his adherence to Bucer's doctrine of the Lord's Supper. Following Wishart's martyrdom (1546), Knox contemplated going to Germany, but renewed action against heretics caused him to go to St. Andrews Castle, where he was called as preacher. When the castle fell, he was taken to France and made a galley slave. While thus detained, he wrote a précis of Henry Balnaves's compendium of Protestant thought, which drew heavily on Luther's commentary on Galatians. In it Knox embraced Luther's doctrine of justification.

After being freed early in 1549, Knox went to England and was appointed preacher at Berwick. His sermons attacked the Mass as idolatrous, and he was summoned to answer for his views before the Council of the North at Newcastle (1550). Through the influence of Northumberland, Knox preached before the royal court in 1552. At Windsor he criticized the provision in the forthcoming Second Book of Common Prayer calling for kneeling during Communion; his efforts were largely responsible for the inclusion of the Black Rubric. Sensing trouble, he refused the bishopric of Rochester, but not because he opposed episcopacy. As one of the preachers of the 1553 Lenten sermons, he warned of the dangers of secret Catholics in political offices. Following Mary's accession, he fled to the Continent. He met with Calvin* in Geneva, Bullinger* in Zurich, and other Swiss leaders, posing questions on rebellion against idolatrous monarchs and female sovereigns.

At Calvin's urging Knox became pastor of the English congregation at Frankfurt in 1554. A dispute over the Book of Common Prayer led to his ouster and return to Geneva in 1555. The same year he went back to Scotland and openly preached Protestant doctrine. He was summoned to appear in Edinburgh in May 1556 on a charge of heresy, but the regent's intervention resulted in a quashing of the summons. He left Scotland that year to become pastor of the English congregation in Geneva. There he wrote The First Blast of the Trumpet against the Monstrous Regiment of Women (1558), arguing that female sovereignty contravened natural and divine law. The Blast was aimed primarily at Mary Tudor, but shortly after its appearance Elizabeth was crowned, making Knox's name odious in Elizabeth's court. Even Calvin was displeased, prompting Knox to write a treatise against an "Anabaptist" in defense of the Calvinist doctrine of predestination. The treatise is untypical of Knox's style and basic theological concerns. In the summer of 1558 Knox wrote three more tracts setting forth his theory of lawful rebellion against idolatrous princes, including rebellion by commoners.

The Protestant lords in Scotland sought Knox's return, and he arrived in May 1559. In addition to preaching he negotiated with the English for troops and money. With John Willock and others, he played a major role in drafting the Scots Confession,* which Parliament approved in August 1560. With Willock, John Douglas, and three others, he also drafted the Book of Discipline. After Mary Stuart's return in 1561, Knox denounced her masses and court life at Holyroodhouse. During her reign Knox had three interviews with Mary in which he defended his opposition to idolatry. In 1561-62 he engaged in a controversy on ordination with Ninian Winzet, a Catholic priest and educator. Knox claimed that he, like Amos and John the Baptist, had extraordinary calling, but lacked the miraculous power to demonstrate it. Knox also disputed with Quintin Kennedy, abbot of Crossraguel, on the Mass. In 1567 he visited England, afterward refusing to sanction separation from the Church of England. Following Darnley's murder, he returned to Scotland the month (June) Mary was captured. He demanded her execution. After her abdication he preached at the coronation of her son James (see JAMES VI AND I).

Knox was a man of conviction and courage, whose declamations against idolatry overshadowed the warmer side of his nature. His most notable work was the History of the Reformation of Religion within the Realm of Scotland, the first complete edition of which was published in 1644. He gave to the Kirk of Scotland an eclectic theology and polity, helped draw up its Book of Common Order, and planted the seeds for the later development of Covenant thought in Scotland. His broad view of ecumenical fellowship with Protestant churches in England and on the Continent tempered the spirit of Scottish nationalism during his lifetime.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Knox's Works (ed. David Laing, 6 vols., 1846-64); his History (ed. W.C. Dickinson, 2 vols., 1949): major biographies by P.H. Brown (1895), E. Percy (1937), J. Ridley (1968), and W.S. Reid, Trumpeter of God (1974); on Knox's thought, see J.S. McEwen, The Faith of John Knox (1961). RICHARD L. GREAVES

KNOX, RONALD ARBUTHNOTT (1888-1957). Roman Catholic scholar. Born at Kibworth, son of the (Anglican) bishop of Manchester, E.A. Knox,* he was educated at Eton and Balliol, and became a strong Anglo-Catholic and a bitter critic and satirist of modernists within the church. He joined the Church of Rome in 1917, was ordained priest in 1919, taught at St. Edmund's College, Ware, and was Catholic chaplain at Oxford from 1926 to 1939. Thereafter he devoted himself to his translation of the Bible into English (1944) and to a study of religious enthusiasm, which appeared in 1950. Knox dealt learnedly and half-admiringly with Protestant religious leaders, especially Anabaptists, Quakers, and Methodists, while disapproving of their beliefs. His collected sermons are valued highly by English Catholics. IAN SELLERS

KNOX, WILFRED LAWRENCE (1886-1950). Anglican churchman and NT scholar. He was the son of a famous evangelical bishop, E.A. Knox,* and the brother of an even more famous Roman Catholic cleric and writer (Ronald A.*). Wilfred was the scholar of the family and was elected to membership in the British Academy. Educated at Trinity College, Oxford, he was ordained priest in 1915; he moved to Cambridge in 1920, where he remained, except for two years in London, until his death. His early writings were primarily apologetic in nature and aimed at a defense of "liberal" Anglo-Catholicism. His major scholarly works include St Paul and the Church of Jerusalem (1925), St Paul and the Church of the Gentiles (1939), Some Early Hellenistic Elements in Primitive Christianity (1944), and many articles in the Journal of Theological Studies. W. WARD GASQUE

KOCH, JOHANN, see COCCEIUS

KOHLER, C. and H., see BRÜGGLERS

KORAN, see QUR'AN

KOREA. Christianity was planted in Korea by Koreans, not by foreigners. Prior missionary contacts were only peripheral—the first Catholic, de Cespedes, in 1593 as chaplain to invading Japanese troops, and the first Protestant, Karl Gutzlaff,* in 1832 exploring the coast. Not until Lee Sung-hun in 1784 returned, baptized, from a visit to the ex-Jesuit mission in Peking did Catholicism begin to spread among Koreans. In the next one hundred years, despite great persecutions (1801, 1839, 1846, and 1866), the Catholic Church, though still a hidden movement, grew to some 17,500 members. The first foreign missionary was Chinese, Father James Chou in 1794, followed in 1835 by Father Pierre Maubant of the Paris Missionary Society.

Protestantism similarly was introduced by Koreans. A year before the arrival in 1884 of the first resident Protestant missionary, a Korean convert of Scots missionaries in Manchuria, Suh Sang-yun, brought Korean Scripture portions into forbidden Korea and secretly gathered together the country's first group of worshiping Protestants. The missionaries followed—first a Presbyterian physician, Dr. Horace Allen, and in 1885 two clergymen, H.G. Underwood* (Presbyterian) and H.G. Appenzeller (Methodist). The pioneer in opening N Korea was S.A. Moffett. It was in the north that church growth was greatest, particularly after 1895, later reinforced and vitalized by the great revival of 1906-7. By 1910 Protestants had outstripped Catholics 167,000 to 73,000. Methodists and Presbyterians cooperated in a comity agreement, but growth was greatest in Presbyterian areas which followed the "Nevius Plan," a strategy stressing Bible classes for all Christians, lay witness, self-support, and self-government. The Korean Presbyterian Church was organized as an independent body in 1907; the Korean Methodist Church in 1930. Other major denominations are the Anglicans (1890), Seventh-Day Adventists (1903), the Holiness Church of the Oriental Missionary Society (1907), and the Salvation Army (1907). Southern Baptists revived an earlier, independent work after World War II.

Japanese annexation in 1910 brought harassment to the church, culminating in open persecution when Christians in the 1930s refused government demands to participate in Shinto ceremonies. But at the same time Christian identification with the Korean independence movement won nationwide respect, and a spreading network of Christian hospitals and colleges (Ewha, Soongsil, Yonsei, and later Keimyung, Taejon, and Seoul Women's) broadened the Christian witness. The end of World War II ushered in a second period of church growth which not even the disastrous church schisms of the 1950s, the division of the country, or the Communist invasion could block. Despite the loss of all North Korea to organized Christianity, the number of Protestant adherents has almost doubled in every decade since 1940, and since 1960 Catholic growth has been even more rapid. The largest groups are Presbyterians (1,438,000), Catholics (839,000), Methodists (300,000), and Holiness (217,000).

Officially Christianity, with just under four million adherents including marginal sects, is smaller than Buddhism (5.5 million) and Confucianism (4.42 million), but more realistic surveys suggest that the claims of the older, weakening religions are exaggerated and that Christianity, with 13 per cent of the population, is now the largest organized religion in Korea.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: A.D. Clark, History of the Korean Church (1961); S.H. Moffett, The Christians of Korea (1962); J.C. Kim and J.J. Chung, Catholic Korea, Yesterday and Now (1964); R. Shearer, Wildfire: Church Growth in Korea (1966); L.G. Paik, The History of Protestant Missions in Korea 1832-1910 (2nd ed., 1971).

SAMUEL HUGH MOFFETT

KORIDETHI CODEX. A manuscript of the gospels which once belonged to the Church of St. Kerykos and St. Jolitta at Koridethi in the Caucasus Mountains near the Caspian Sea. It is written in a rough uncial hand by a scribe who knew little or no Greek. Edited in modern times by G. Beermann and C.R. Gregory, who dated it in the ninth century, it contains a Byzantine-type text in Matthew, Luke, and John, but one akin to the type of text used by Origen and Eusebius at Caesarea in Mark. The MS is identified by the Greek letter theta or the number 038 in critical texts of the NT. It is now located in the museum at Tiflis, the capital of the Soviet Socialist Republic of Georgia.

W. WARD GASQUE

KRAEMER, HENDRIK (1888-1965). Educator, ecumenist, and writer on missions. After specializing in oriental languages and cultures in his native Netherlands, the Bible Society of that land sent him to serve the Dutch Reformed Church in Indonesia from 1922 to 1937, as a linguistics and Bible translation consultant. His most famous book, The Christian Message in a Non-Christian World, written as a study guide for the third World Missionary Conference at Tambaram* in 1938, emphasized the uniqueness of the biblical message in missions. From 1937 he was professor of religion in the University of Leyden, until in 1948 he became the first director of the Ecumenical Institute of the World Council of Churches at Bossey, near Geneva. He was interned by the Nazis from 1942 to 1943. From 1955 to 1957 he was visiting professor at Union Seminary, New York, and thereafter lived in Holland until his death.

EARLE E. CAIRNS

KRAPF, JOHANN LUDWIG (1810-1881). Pioneer missionary to Kenya. Born at Derendigen, near Tübingen where he received his education, he spent a short time in the Lutheran parish ministry before offering to the Anglican Church Missionary Society in 1838. After a frustrating six years in Abyssinia from which he was finally expelled, he transferred to Mombasa in 1844. Here he laid his wife and newly born child in "a lonely missionary grave." He took a house in Mombasa and studied Swahili, into which he translated the NT, and produced a standard dictionary and grammar. In 1846 he was joined by a fellow German Lutheran, Johannes Rebmann,* and they moved to Rabai, about ten miles inland from Mombasa, to work among the Wanyika. From here he and Rebmann went on several important journeys of exploration inland. In 1850 he was in Europe on furlough and returned to Kenya in 1851, but in 1853 had to return to Europe due to ill-health. He maintained his interest in East Africa* and continued important linguistic work. He was twice back in East Africa, once conducting a pioneer party of British Methodists to their new station of Ribe to the north of Mombasa in 1861, and again as interpreter to the Napier expedition to Abyssinia in 1867. He died at Kornthal near Stuttgart.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: W. Claus, Dr Ludwig Krapf, weil Missionar in Ostafrika (1882); J.L. Krapf, Travels, Researches and Missionary Labours in Eastern Africa, (1860); E. Stock, History of the Church Missionary Society, (1899).

JOHN WILKINSON

KRAUTH, CHARLES PORTERFIELD (1823-1883). Lutheran theologian and editor. Born in Martinsburg, Virginia, he studied at Gettysburg College and Seminary, was ordained into the Lutheran ministry in 1842, and served congregations in Maryland, Virginia, and Pennsylvania as a member of the Evangelical Lutheran General Synod. In 1861 he became editor of the Lutheran and Missionary; in 1864 he was elected professor at Mt. Airy Lutheran Seminary in Philadelphia and, after 1868, served also as professor of philosophy at the University of Pennsylvania. He was the leading spirit in the establishment of the General Council (1867), a federation of Lutheran synods opposed to "American Lutheranism," which sought to compromise Lutheranism with Puritanism. He authored "Fundamental Articles of Faith and Church Polity," adopted in the meeting preliminary to the founding of the General Council in Reading, Pennsylvania, in 1866. His "Theses on Altar and Pulpit Fellowship" reiterated the stand he advocated in the Akron and Galesburg Rules, "Lutheran altars for Lutherans only; Lutheran pulpits for Lutherans only." He was editor of The Lutheran and The Lutheran Church Review. His most important work is The Conservative Reformation and Its Theology (1871).

See A. Spaeth, Dr. Charles Porterfield Krauth (2 vols., 1909).

CARL S. MEYER

KRÜDENER, BARBARA JULIANA VON (1764-1824). Russian-born Pietist. Unfaithful to her husband, a Russian minister of state, she formed an attachment with a young French officer which was described in her idealized autobiographical novel, Valérie. A few months later (1804) during a sojourn at Riga she experienced a sudden conversion, after which she held Pietistic conventicles throughout Württemberg. As a confidante of Czar Alexander I she was regarded by some as the prime mover of the Holy Alliance with Prussia and Austria. Alexander, however, contended that he had conceived the treaty while at Vienna in 1815. Further conventicles sprang up in 1816-18 in N Switzerland and S Germany. She died during a visit to the Crimea. WAYNE DETZLER

KRUMMACHER, FRIEDRICH WILHELM (1796-1868). German Reformed pastor. Son of Friedrich Adolf Krummacher, he was born in Mörs, near Düsseldorf, and studied at the universities of Halle and Jena. He became pastor at Frankfurt in 1819, Ruhrort (1823), Gemarke in the Wuppertal (1825), Elberfeld (1834), and the Trinity Church in Berlin (1847). In 1853 he was appointed court chaplain at Potsdam. A powerful preacher, he strenuously opposed rationalism and was an influential leader of the Evangelical Alliance in Germany. His most important and enduring work is the classic, Elias der Thisbiter (1826; ET Elijah the Tishbite, 1836), and his other works include Der Prophet Elisa (1837; ET Elisha, 1838), and David, der König von Israel (1867; ET David, The King of Israel, 1867).

KEITH J. HARDMAN

KUENEN, ABRAHAM (1828-1891). Netherlands Protestant theologian. Born at Haarlem, he was professor of NT, ethics, and OT interpretation at Leyden from 1855. Although Julius Wellhausen is generally acclaimed as chief exponent of the so-called "literary-historical school," the earliest scientific exposition of its essential themes must be ascribed to Kuenen and K.H. Graf. Kuenen's first book, showing G.H.A. Ewald's* influence, was Historisch-Kritisch Onderzoek (1861-65; ET The Hexateuch, 1886). With Graf he came to hold that "P" (the Priestly code) was the latest element in the Pentateuch. His later views were promulgated in De Godsdient van Israel (1869-70; ET The Religion of Israel, 1873-75) and De profeten en de profetee onder Israel (1875). J.G.G. NORMAN

KULTURKAMPF (German "struggle for civilization"). Church-state conflict in Prussia and elsewhere in the 1870s. It was so called first by Richard Virchow, an atheistic scientist, in 1873. It was mainly inspired by Otto von Bismarck, who feared that Catholic influence would endanger German unity. Its antecedents included the mixed-marriage dispute in Cologne in the 1830s, Protestant resistance to Catholic demands for increased liberties, hostility by German liberalism, and the 1870 decree of papal infallibility. It began with the abolition of the Catholic bureau in the Prussian Ministry of Education and Public Worship (1871). Bismarck appointed Adalbert Falk as Minister of Public Worship (1872). He expelled the Jesuits, brought education under state control, and passed the famous May Laws.* When Pius IX protested, Bismarck severed diplomatic relations with the Vatican. In 1875 the Roman Catholic Church was deprived of all financial assistance from the state, and religious orders were compelled to leave the country. Catholic resistance remained firm, and several bishops and priests were imprisoned.

A change of policy came later when Emperor William I favored a more moderate approach; the rise of the Socialists as a new political enemy, coupled with the election of a more conciliatory pope (Leo XIII), convinced Bismarck that a concordat with the Vatican was a better solution. Falk was dismissed (1879), diplomatic relations were restored with the Vatican (1882), and the May Laws modified (1886-87). In other German states, in Austria, and in Switzerland, similar but less extreme legislation prevailed for a time, but religious peace was eventually restored.

See J.B. Kissling, Geschichte des Kulturkampfes im Deutschen Reich (3 vols., 1911-16); and H.W.L. Freudenthal, "Kulturkampf" in New Catholic Encyclopedia (1967), vol. 8.

J.G.G. NORMAN

KÜNG, HANS (1928- ). Roman Catholic theologian. Born in Switzerland, he studied at the German College in Rome, the Gregorian University, the Institut Catholique, the Sorbonne, and later in universities in Berlin, London, Amsterdam, and Madrid. Ordained in 1955, he served for several years as a parish priest. In 1960 he was appointed professor of fundamental theology in the Roman Catholic faculty of the University of Tübingen. He attended Vatican Council II* and gained fame as a progressive but not radical thinker. His name became known in English-speaking lands after the publication of his Council and Reunion (1961). Other titles that have been well received in English include The Church, Justification, Infallible? and On Being a Christian. His name is now associated with moderate, progressive, ecumenical Roman Catholic theology.

PETER TOON

KUYPER, ABRAHAM (1837-1920). Dutch Calvinist theologian and political leader, a major figure in recent Dutch history. Born in Maassluis, his father a minister in the Reformed Church, Kuyper was brought up in a perhaps naïve version of orthodoxy. As a student at Leyden, he rebelled against it and turned to the prevalent "modern" theology. A brilliant student, he went on in theology, studying under the "modernist" Scholten and others. This proved not to satisfy him emotionally. As a young preacher at Beesd, he was attracted by the deep-seated Calvinistic pietism of the villagers; this along with other influences led him to embrace orthodox Calvinism. At thirty a rising preacher, he moved to Utrecht, and soon to Amsterdam. Attracted by the "anti-revolutionary" political views of the Calvinist theorist Groen Van Prinsterer, whom he finally met in 1869, Kuyper's thoughts turned to politics. The aging Groen's protégé, as an "Anti-Revolutionary Party" made its first appearance, he ran for parliament.

Groen's death (1867) left Kuyper as the Anti-Revolutionary leader. With ferocious activity he moved toward making the orthodox Calvinists a political force. A daily newspaper was started, Kuyper elected to parliament (1874), party chapters organized, and a specific political program drafted. Codified in Kuyper's Ons Program (1878), it called for state aid to religious schools, extension of the suffrage, recognition of the rights of labor, reforms in colonial policy, and a revitalization of national life. Its theoretical basis was the idea of the autonomy of the various social spheres, each of which had its own God-given rights. The school issue gave Kuyper the opportunity to organize a massive petition campaign (1878), which provided a mass base for the party, and paved the way for the "Monstrous Coalition" with the Catholics, who also wished state aid for their schools.

By 1880 Kuyper started an orthodox Calvinist "Free University" (free from church and state control), and taught in its seminary. By 1886 he led an exodus of over 100,000 orthodox from the Reformed Church (the Doleantie: joining with an earlier separatist group, they formed the Gereformeerde Kerk, the second largest Protestant group in the Netherlands). By 1888, after the extension of suffrage to many of the middle class, the Coalition won brief control of the government, to the dismay of the Liberals, who saw Kuyper as a potential Cromwell. By 1892, as left-wing liberal proposals for major suffrage extension split all major parties, the conservative wing of the Anti-Revolutionary left (to form the Christian Historical Party). Kuyper, calling for "Christian democracy," drove on, a whirlwind of activity. Further suffrage extension brought a notable Coalition victory in 1900, and Kuyper was made prime minister (1901). This was in many ways the high point of his career. As prime minister he encountered difficulties (notably the railroad strike of 1902) and was ousted after the heated campaign of 1905. He was now sixty-eight. He lived on for a decade and a half, the "grand old man" of the Anti-Revolutionary Party and still a political force to reckon with. He lived to see the granting of full financial equality to religious schools, and the extension of suffrage to all (1917). Though the Coalition broke up (1925), Kuyper's Anti-Revolutionaries have remained a major party. Kuyper's achievement was to give the long-submerged "common people," the lower-middle-class orthodox Calvinistic group, a religious and political voice. He contributed to the development of the Netherlands' present "plural society" (ideological groupings each having their own political parties, trade unions, etc.). As a theologian he revived a systematic, orthodox Calvinism, marked by an emphasis on "common grace."

See P. Kasteel, Abraham Kuyper (1938), and F. Vandenberg, Abraham Kuyper (1960).

DIRK JELLEMA

L

LABADISTS. Followers of Jean de la Badie (1610-74), born near Bordeaux, the son of the governor of Guienne. He possessed a strong bent to mysticism, becoming a Roman Catholic priest, then about 1650 embracing Protestantism. He held pastorates in Geneva (1659-66), then in Holland (until 1670). There under his leadership his congregation at Middelburg became a religious community dedicated to simple living, holding children and property in common. Enthusiastic disciples flocked to him, among them Pierre Dulignon (d.1679), Pierre Yvon (d.1707), Theodor Untereyk (d.1693), and more important than any, Anna Maria von Schürman (d.1678), whose book Eucleria set forth the above principles and others such as the continuance of prophecy and the continuous Sabbath. The Dutch authorities found them too independent of the religious community in Holland, and in 1670 they moved to Westphalia, then to Bremen in 1672, and later to Altona, where they were dispersed on the death of the leaders. By 1730 the movement was dead, although settlements had been made in Maryland and New York. KEITH J. HARDMAN

LABARUM. The first Christian military standard, designed by Constantine from his celestial vision and dream on the eve of his victory at the Milvian Bridge (313). From 324 it was the official standard of the Roman Empire. Fashioned after legionary standards, it substituted for the old pagan symbols the form of a cross, surmounted by a jeweled wreath containing the monogram of Christ, intersecting chi (X) and rho (P), on which hung a purple banner inscribed hoc signo victor eris or a Greek or Latin variant. As a new focal point for Roman unity the monogram appeared on coins, shields, and later public buildings and churches.

LACHMANN, KARL KONRAD FRIEDRICH WILHELM (1793-1851). German philologist, founder of modern textual criticism. Born at Brunswick, he studied at Leipzig and Göttingen, and joined the Prussian army in 1815. He was professor of philology at Berlin from 1825 until his death. His life was spent in the study of philology, especially of Old and Middle High German, and he was one of the finest classical scholars of his day. He applied to the text of the NT the same critical principles as he applied to the texts of classical authors, and he was the first scholar to produce an edition of the Greek NT in which the Textus Receptus was abandoned in favor of older MSS. He aimed at presenting the text current in the latter part of the fourth century, and he gave the impulse to later scholars such as Tischendorf, Westcott, and Hort. He published his smaller edition of the NT in 1831, and his larger in two volumes in 1842-50.

J.G.G. NORMAN

LACORDAIRE, JEAN-BAPTISTE HENRI (1802-1861). Celebrated French Roman Catholic orator, he was at first a Deist of the Rousseau type. After a legal education at Dijon, he practiced law in Paris until Lammenais's* Essai sur l'indifférence convinced him of the credibility of Christianity. Following theological study, he was ordained in 1827, but immediately became a revolutionary. An attempt to open a progressive school in Paris after the Revolution of 1830 failed, and the pope condemned and terminated his periodical L'Avenir. Chastened, Lacordaire proclaimed ultramontanism at Notre Dame in a series of fiery sermons which electrified Paris. He succeeded in reviving the Dominican Order, forbidden since the Revolution, but experienced continuous conflicts with Rome over periodicals he launched to air republican principles.

ROBERT P. EVANS

LACTANTIUS (c.240-c.320). Latin rhetorician, Christian apologist, and historian. Taught by Arnobius in North Africa, his accomplishments attracted the emperor Diocletian to appoint him as teacher of Latin oratory in Nicomedia. Having become a Christian, he felt it necessary to resign when persecution started in 303 and consequently knew real poverty. In this period he turned to writing Christian apologetics for the educated pagan and for Christians disturbed by the challenges of the accepted intellectual wisdom. Feeling that technical Christian terminology had obscured the effectiveness of previous apologists, he shunned its use whenever possible. His masterly Ciceronian style has earned him the title "the Christian Cicero." His Divine Institutes argues that pagan religion and philosophy are absurdly inadequate. Truth lies in God's revelation, and the ethical change which the teaching of Christ brings points conclusively to its accuracy. Lactantius draws on a wide range of pagan sources at some cost to theological orthodoxy. He later became tutor of Constantine's eldest son, Crispus. He wrote The Death of the Persecutors —an account of the recent persecutions arguing passionately, though with good historical documentation, that persecuting emperors suffer and that virtuous and just emperors prosper. This has become a major primary source for the persecutions of the period. C. PETER WILLIAMS

LAGARDE, P.A. DE, see DE LAGARDE

LAGRANGE, MARIE JOSEPH (1855-1938). French Roman Catholic scholar. Born in Bourg-en-Bresse, he studied at the minor seminary, Autun; at Paris where he took his doctorate in law; at Salamanca; and at Vienna. He was ordained at Zamora (1883), lectured in history and philosophy at Salamanca and Toulouse, and founded in Jerusalem the École Pratique d'Études Bibliques (1890), and the Revue Biblique (1892). Engaged in biblical criticism, he supported Leo XIII's efforts in that direction, was appointed to the biblical commission (1902), and came as close to higher criticism as Catholic orthodoxy would permit. Among his innumerable works are studies on the OT, NT commentaries, Études sur les religions sémitiques (1903), Synopsis evangelica graece (1926), Le Judaïsme avant Jesus Christ (1931), and the popular Gospel of Jesus Christ.

C.G. THORNE, JR.

LAINEZ, DIEGO, see LAYNEZ

LAITY (Gr. laos, "people"). In the Roman Catholic and Orthodox churches and in High Anglicanism a sharp distinction is drawn between clergy and laity who owe them allegiance and depend on them for guidance and help. Evangelicals find this division unknown in the primitive church and, as they regard the ultimate authoritative ministry as that of the risen Lord and all Christian people as dependent on and sharing in the same, they would include the church's ministry within the laos, assigning to it, with varying degrees of emphasis, a functional and representative role. During the last twenty years, theologians within the mainstream churches have been much concerned to elevate the position of the laity and have paid some heed to the evangelicals' contention.

IAN SELLERS

LAKE, KIRSOPP (1872-1946). British biblical scholar. Lake was educated at Lincoln College, Oxford. Following two brief curacies in England, he held professorships at the universities of Leyden (1904-14) and Harvard (1914-37, various subjects). He was controversial in both his academic and theological views. His book Historical Evidence for the Resurrection of Christ (1907) was an attempt to cast doubt on the story of the empty tomb. Probably his best book was The Earlier Epistles of St. Paul (1913), in which he emphasized the influence of Hellenistic religion on early Christianity. Also of great value was the epochal, multivolumed work which he edited with F.J. Foakes Jackson, The Beginnings of Christianity: Part I. The Acts of the Apostles (1920-33), which is still a standard reference tool for all students of the NT. It should be noted that Lake's views regarding the historical value of Acts were much more skeptical than the majority of the other contributors. He also published extensively in the area of Greek paleography and textual criticism.

W. WARD GASQUE

LALEMANT, JEROME (1593-1673). Jesuit missionary to Canada. He entered the Jesuit novitiate in 1610, and after probation held several positions at Jesuit colleges in France. In 1638 he went to Canada as a missionary to the Hurons, and in the same year was named superior of the Huron mission. He began building Sainte-Marie-des-Hurons in 1639, with much of the work being done by the donnés. These were laymen who dedicated their lives for religious service without taking religious orders, and it was Lalemant who created the donnés. In 1644 he became superior of the Jesuits in New France, and in 1658 was made rector of the Jesuit college at La Flèche, France. He returned with Laval* to Quebec in 1659 and was again until 1665 superior of the Jesuits. Lalemant was known for his spirituality and was held in esteem by both French and Indian Canadians.

ROBERT WILSON

LAMBERT (c.635-c.700). Bishop, monk, and missionary. Some uncertainty surrounds the exact dates of his life, but sometime around 670 he became bishop of Maestricht. Although bishop until his death, he was for political reasons exiled from the monastery of Stavelot which served as the headquarters for his see. During the exile he traveled as a missionary. He is sometimes known under the name "Landebertus the Martyr," since some sources claim that he met a violent and bloody death. The exact causes are unknown; one conjecture involves the rebuke of Pepin of Heristal, mayor of the palace, for adultery. After his death the see was transferred to Liège.

LAMBERT, FRANCIS (1486-1530). Reformer of Hesse. Born at Avignon of noble parents, he entered the Franciscan Order and became a noted preacher. Influenced by Luther's writings from 1520 and by Zwingli from 1522, he left the order and traveled under an alias to Wittenberg to study the Reformation in its original setting. Here he received a state pension and translated Protestant works into French and Italian. After a short and troubled stay in Metz and Strasbourg he was called to Hesse by the Landgrave Philip* in 1526. Though distrusted by the Lutherans as a Frenchman and a supporter of Zwingli's sacramentalism, he took a leading part in the promotion of the Reformation in Hesse, and from 1527 was professor of exegesis at the new University of Marburg. He wrote a number of commentaries on the Prophets, the Writings, and the Apocalypse, and some controversial pamphlets, notably an attack on Erasmus.

IAN SELLERS

LAMBERT OF HERSFELD (c.1025-c.1085). Benedictine abbot. He took Benedictine orders at the abbey of Hersfeld in 1058. Sympathy with the Cluny reforms and opposition to Emperor Henry IV precipitated his move to the abbey of Hasungen, where he became abbot in 1081. His reputation rests on a number of historical writings, more notable for their polished Latin style than for their accuracy. Annales, the most significant, chronicles world history from Creation to 1077. Only Lambert's extensive treatment of the period 1069-77 is original work. Until the mid-nineteenth century, when von Ranke tempered this judgment, Lambert was widely regarded as a highly credible medieval historian.

LAMBETH ARTICLES. Nine theological propositions drawn up in 1595 at Lambeth Palace, London, by Archbishop Whitgift and his advisers. Their purpose was to clarify the doctrine of predestination which was mildly stated in Article Seventeen of the Thirty-Nine Articles.* At Cambridge there had been a controversy over predestination, due to the advocacy of a "weak" doctrine of divine election (similar to that of the later Arminians) by Peter Baro and William Barrett. William Whitaker and others defended the doctrine of double predestination based wholly on God's good pleasure. A series of articles were drawn up and these, modified slightly by Whitgift, became the Lambeth Articles. Queen Elizabeth did not like them, so they were not officially authorized; they were, however, incorporated into the 1615 Irish Articles.* PETER TOON

LAMBETH CONFERENCES. The origin of these gatherings was fortuitous. A synod of the Anglican Church in Canada conceived the idea of a general council to deal with the Colenso* Affair and the effects of Essays and Reviews. This scheme posed great problems, but the archbishop of Canterbury, C.T. Longley, proposed an informal gathering of bishops which would meet at his personal invitation to discuss Anglican problems, though having no legislative powers. In 1867 the first conference of seventy-six bishops met, and its success ensured the calling of future conferences, which have occurred every ten years, with the majority of Anglican bishops attending. The 1888 conference was important for its endorsement of the Lambeth Quadrilateral*; the 1920 conference for the "Appeal to all Christian People"—a plea for reunion addressed to the heads of all Christian communities; and the 1958 conference for its progressive statements on race relations and family planning. The 1968 conference discussed the Christian ministry, as well as current world and reunion issues. The plan of each conference is the same: a theological issue; domestic issues; church unity; and current social issues. Though the conference lasts a month, large themes are frequently treated superficially.
JOHN A. SIMPSON

LAMBETH QUADRILATERAL, see CHICAGO-LAMBETH ARTICLES

LAMB OF GOD. A description of Jesus by John the Baptist found only in John 1:29, 36. The Greek word amnos refers to Jesus also in Acts 8:32 and 1 Peter 1:19, and the word arnion is found frequently in Revelation. As John 1:36 seems to allude to the lamb of the Passover, it may be that this is also in mind in the Baptist's words. But as reference is made to removing the sin of the world this is probably not an adequate explanation. The lamb of the sin offering was meant to signify the forgiveness of sin, and this concept may have some bearing on the saying. It is possible also that some contribution to the understanding of it may come from Isaiah 53 and the Suffering Servant who is led like a lamb to the slaughter. Likewise the lamb God was to provide for Abraham (Gen. 22:8) may give some comparison. John's gospel is so rich in imagery that there could be allusions to several of these concepts.
R.E. NIXON

LAMBRUSCHINI, RAFFAELLO (1788-1873). Italian educational, social, and religious reformer. Born in Genova, ordained a Roman Catholic priest and in charge of the Orvieto diocese, he opposed Napoleonic policies and was imprisoned and sent to Corsica. Freed in 1814, he withdrew to Figline near Florence where he possessed an estate, and devoted himself to improve social conditions by means of schools, educational publications such as La Guida per l'educatore (first review on education), political journals, and other treatises. He also took an active part in government affairs before and after the annexation of Tuscany to the Kingdom of Italy. A man of high ideals and fine intellect, in close touch with all the leading men of Tuscan and Swiss evangelism, he championed the cause of liberty in all its aspects: economic, political, moral, and religious. He opposed the temporal power of the pope and advocated a reform of the Roman Church from within, based on a deepening of the spiritual life of the individual and a return to the simplicity of the Gospel. DAISY RONCO

LAMENNAIS, FÉLICITÉ ROBERT DE (1782-1854). French Roman Catholic writer who personally epitomized the spiritual conflict between Catholic faith and the new democratic ideal. From budding rationalism in his youth, he converted (1804) to devout Catholic faith, became a priest (1816), and early supported Joseph de Maistre* and Louis de Bonald. He came to believe that the church, as the supreme guardian of the truth, ought to be independent of any state control or alliance. His concern promoted some dimensions of Ultramontanism,* but worked against even a favorable alliance between throne and altar. By 1830 he founded a newspaper L'Avenir to promote liberty for the church from the state. Even though he did not then accept the secularist basis for liberalism, his ideas were condemned by Gregory XVI (1832, 1834). Paroles d'un croyant (1834) summarized his commitments. Gradually he left the church to advocate the new liberal democratic ideal and to extol the common man, not the church, as the hope for societal regeneration. He joined the republican government (1848-52) which was formed out of the Revolution of 1848. Liberal Catholicism counted him among its founders. C.T. MC INTIRE

LANFRANC (c. 1005-1089). Archbishop of Canterbury from 1070. Born in Pavia, he studied and practiced law before becoming a pupil of Berengar of Tours (1035). An excellent student of logic, he opened a school at Avranches (1039), but gave up his work and entered the Benedictine abbey of Bec in 1042. There he started another school that became famous throughout Europe, numbering among its alumni Anselm of Canterbury and Ivo of Chartres. Lanfranc also became an adviser to the future William I (the Conqueror) of England while the king was duke of Normandy. Against his inclinations and only because of papal orders, Lanfranc was consecrated archbishop of Canterbury. With the support of William he reformed the church by enforcing clerical celibacy, purifying the cathedral chapters, and introducing Norman personnel committed to the Hildebrandine reform program into England. Although he enjoyed the full confidence of William I, the reform movement alienated him from William II (Rufus). Lanfranc's work as a theologian includes glosses on the epistles of Paul and participation in controversies over the nature of Holy Communion. He developed the teaching of transubstantiation in opposition to Berengar of Tours at the Council of Rome and Vercelli (1050), at Tours (1059), and in his Liber de Corpore et Sanguine Domini (1059-1066).

See A.J. MacDonald, Lanfranc: A Study of His Life, Work and Writing (2nd ed., 1944).

ROBERT G. CLOUSE

LANGE, JOHANN PETER (1802-84). German Protestant theologian and biblical scholar. Born near Elberfeld, Prussia, he attended the University of Bonn (1822-25), where he was brought under the influence of K.I. Nitzsch, one of the chief advocates of the Vermittlungstheologie. While serving as a parish minister in Duisburg (1832-41), he published a sharp attack on D.F. Strauss* under the title, Über den geschichtlichen Charakter der kanonischen Evangelien (1836). When Strauss was prevented in 1841 from assuming the chair at the University of Zurich to which he had been elected, Lange was called to occupy the chair in his place. At Zurich Lange elaborated further his own alternative to Strauss's Leben Jesu in his multivolume Leben Jesu nach den Evangelien (1844-47). In 1854 he was appointed to the chair of dogmatic theology at the University of Bonn previously held by I.A. Dorner.

DAVID C. STEINMETZ

LANGTON, STEPHEN (d.1228). Archbishop of Canterbury from 1207. Born in England but educated at Paris, where he won a reputation as an OT commentator, he was created a cardinal by Innocent III in 1206, and in 1207 consecrated archbishop of Canterbury. King John refused to accept him, and until 1213 England was under papal interdict. In that year John yielded to Innocent, and Langton arrived in England. He strongly sympathized with the baronial opposition, and though he seems to have been the first to suggest a Charter, he tried to hold a mediating position. On the Charter itself, his name heads the list of counselors. Late in 1215 he was suspended by papal commissioners for not excommunicating the barons (the pope supported John). Langton went to Rome to plead before Innocent, but though the sentence was revoked, he was not allowed to return to England until 1218. He supported the regency against baronial attacks and papal claims, and in 1225 obtained from Henry III the final edition of Magna Carta. From Honorius III he secured the right for the archbishop of Canterbury to be the pope's legatus natus, and at the Synod of Oseney (1222) he issued the decrees of the Fourth Lateran Council and special constitutions for the English Church.

See F.M. Powicke, Stephen Langton (1928).

JOHN A. SIMPSON

LAODICEA. A city in SW Phrygia (Asia Minor), near the juncture of the Lycus with the main Maeander valley. Built on a spur (c.850 feet above sea level), it commanded the great coast road that passed from Ephesus 100 miles away on the coast, to the interior of Asia Minor. The city's origin is unknown, but it was refounded by Antiochus II (261-246 B.C.) and named after his wife Laodice. When the Pergamene kingdom was willed to the Roman state in 133 B.C., Laodicea became part of the province of Asia. A textile and banking center, it also had a celebrated medical school. Commentators of John's condemnation of Laodicea (Rev. 3:14-19) have related these features to the geographical background of the city, including allusion to hot spring water brought six miles by aqueduct and cooled to lukewarm temperatures en route. The Christian church there may have been founded by Epaphras (Col. 4:12, 13).

JAMES M. HOUSTON

LAODICEA, CANONS OF. In the second canon of the Quinisextum Council held at Constantinople (692), reflecting an Eastern stance over against Rome, the sources for canon law were specified in a list of synods. Standing between that of Antioch (341) and Constantinople (381) is the otherwise unidentifiable synod at Laodicea in Phrygia from which come sixty canons, about one-third of all those datable before 381, and sufficiently repetitious to suggest a compilation of even older collections. The twelfth-century Gratian* speaks of thirty-two bishops present, and a Theodosius as their chief author. These canons of Laodicea are concerned with relationships of Christians to non-Christians, Jews, and heretics; with conditions and requirements for the clergy; and with worship practices in general, but including in addition preparation for baptism, fasting before Easter, and penance. Regarding bishops, the canons declare against the widespread practice of rural appointments, and against the mob making the choice. There are references also to female presbyters, and the necessity to prohibit clergy from being "magicians, enchanters, mathematicians, or astrologers." The concluding canon, which may be an appendage, provides one of several lists of Scripture known from the fourth century; it omits most notably Revelation, and the Apocrypha of the OT.

See English translation in A Select Library of the Nicene and Post-Nicene Fathers of the Christian Church (ed. P. Schaff and H. Wace, rep. 1956).

CLYDE CURRY SMITH

LAODICEANS, EPISTLE TO THE, see APOCRYPHAL NEW TESTAMENT

LAPIDE, CORNELIUS À, see CORNELIUS À LAPIDE

LAPSI. Latin word for the "lapsed" who abandoned the faith in persecution. Some early Christians escaped by bribery, others by flight, but apostates were few until Decius's persecution (250-51), when especially in Africa many offered sacrifice or incense (sacrificati, thurificati), procured false certificates of conformity, or volunteered professions of compliance, apostasy, or paganism (libellatici)*. Their reconciliation was complicated by letters of recommendation (libelli pacis) issued by prestigious confessors. Cyprian* wrote numerous letters and a treatise on The Lapsed, and steered the Council of Carthage* (251) into decreeing that penance be proportioned to the gravity of the offense, a policy followed also at Rome, where it occasioned Novatian's rigorist protest. The African traditores were among the lapsed dealt with in councils following the Great Persecution. Lapsed clergy were normally readmitted only as laity or merely titular clergy. D.F. WRIGHT

LARDNER, NATHANIEL (1684-1768). Nonconformist* scholar. Educated at Deal, Hoxton Academy, Utrecht, and Leyden, Lardner was both an Independent minister and a domestic chaplain between 1709 and 1729, and assistant preacher at a Presbyterian chapel from 1729 to 1751. He was a nonsubscriber in the Salter's Hall controversy of 1719. His theological opinions developed from Baxterian Calvinism through Arminianism to a modified Arianism. Between 1727 and 1757 he published his remarkable Credibility of the Gospel History in which with disarming candor and immense learning he strove to defend the facts of the NT against Deist critics; in effect by detaching the OT from the New and developing novel ideas concerning the Logos* he was unconsciously adopting the rational methods of the Socinians and was responsible for Joseph Priestley's conversion to that system. Lardner's works were translated into several languages and were three times reprinted. IAN SELLERS

LA SALLE, JEAN BAPTISTE DE (1651-1719). French educational reformer. Born in Reims of a noble family, he became a priest in 1678. His parish work brought to his attention the lack of education among the poor, and he helped to set up charity schools for them. He set about improving the standards, status, and morale of his teachers, forming them into a religious order—Brothers of the Christian Schools (1684). He established what was in effect the first training college for secular teachers in conditions of great hardship and poverty, centering first on Vaugirard, near Paris, and then on St. You, near Rouen. He met much opposition from the vested interests of the Writing Masters and the Little Schools. Reformatories and boarding schools were also founded. At his death, the schools were to be found in twenty-two French towns and they are now spread widely through the world.

As a practical necessity he pioneered the simultaneous method (class teaching) in his primary schools in contrast to the individual methods common in primary schools of the time. He also substituted French for Latin learning to read. In the classroom, great stress was laid on silence, and signs were used instead of words wherever possible. "The Brothers should be careful to punish their pupils but rarely," says his Rule. He was canonized in 1900. His educational works include Les Règles de la bienséance et de la civilité chrétiennes (1703); La Conduite des écoles chrétiennes (1720); and various school manuals. He produced also a number of spiritual works.

HOWARD SAINSBURY

LAS CASAS, BARTOLOMÉ DE (1474-1566). Spanish missionary to the West Indies, sometimes called "the Apostle of the Indies." Born in Seville, son of a merchant who had gone with Columbus on his second voyage, he received a law degree from the University of Salamanca. In 1502 he went with Governor Ovando to Hispaniola as a legal adviser, and was ordained priest there in 1510. He became concerned about the harsh treatment of the natives under the colonial system, and spent the years 1515-22 traveling between Spain and America, obtaining the power from Charles V to set up various projects and enforcing them. In 1521 the Indians revolted against the church-controlled Indian settlement he had established, and blaming his fellow Spaniards for its failure, he entered the Dominican Order in 1523.

Emerging from a long retreat, Las Casas again campaigned for humane treatment of the Indians, working for their conversion also. He gained acceptance from them, but alienated many of his colonial countrymen by his fanaticism. He played a key role in Indian-Spanish relations in the New World, and while in Spain succeeded in getting the New Laws of 1542-43 promulgated. Although these laws would have improved the lot of the Indians, they were not completely successful, due to opposition from the colonists. As bishop of Chiapa in Mexico from 1544-47, Las Casas could not even enforce the New Laws in his own diocese. He spent his last years in Spain working tirelessly for improved conditions for the Indians. He entered into controversy with the historian Sepulveda (1550) over the question of wars of conquest in the New World. His major works include De unico vocationis modo; Apologética historia; and Historia de las Indias; along with his best-known work, Brevísima relacion de la destrucción de las Indias, which denounced the evils of colonialism. Although Las Casas has been accused of promoting Negro slavery in America, this practice had already long existed and was not considered morally wrong in his time.

See L. Hanke, The Spanish Struggle for Justice in the Conquest of America (1949); and J. Friede and B. Keen (eds.), Bartholomew de Las Casas in History (1972). ROBERT G. CLOUSE

LASKI (à Lasco), JAN (1499-1560). Nephew of Jan Laski, archbishop of Gniezno and primate of Poland, the younger Jan benefited from his uncle's aid especially in ecclesiastical preferments and his treatment by distinguished people abroad. In 1521 he was ordained priest and appointed dean of Gniezno. With his elder brother Jerome he went on many diplomatic missions for his uncle and for Poland and thereby met (and even bought the library of) Erasmus in Basle. Soon after this he had made contacts with both Zwingli and Oecolampadius. Exactly when his conversion to Protestantism occurred is not known, but it was probably completed by 1538 when, being offered a Polish bishopric, he abruptly departed for Frankfurt-am-Main. Thence he moved to Louvain, where he married. Next he was in Emden in Frisia where in 1543 he became superintendent of the churches in the territory of Countess Anna of Oldenburg.

A gifted organizer, Laski used the type of discipline favored by Oecolampadius. As the major link in this order he established the Coetus, which was composed of all the clergy and which met each Monday in Emden from Easter to Michaelmas. The Interim of 1548 necessitated his departure, and in 1550 he arrived in England. He was granted the use of the church of the Austin Friars for the German, Dutch, Belgian, and French Protestants and as superintendent of the "churches of strangers" was given a free hand in preaching, teaching, worship, and discipline—a unique concession. He published an influential book on church discipline and also a confession of faith and a catechism. His only real friend among the bishops was John Hooper. Following the death of his protector, Edward VI, he had to leave England. He ended his days as superintendent of the Reformed churches of S Poland.

See O. Bartel, Jan Laski (1955), and B. Hall, John à Lasco (1971). PETER TOON

LASSUS, ORLANDUS (c.1532-1594). Musical composer. Probably born at Mons as Roland de Lattre, he was also known by his Italianized name, Orlando di Lasso. As a boy he was thrice kidnaped for his beautiful voice. Active in Italy and France, he spent most of his later life in Munich. No composer of the sixteenth century was more widely sought after, and his music was printed by almost every European publisher of the day. Over 1,200 of his works are known, the greater part sacred, but he also wrote French chansons, Italian madrigals, and German lieder. This latter category contains some beautiful pieces based on Lutheran chorales and Genevan Psalms, showing the appeal these had to many Catholics as well as Protestants. He composed over fifty Masses, but it is his motets that show his true greatness. Notable are his settings of the penitential Psalms. The Magnum opus musicum is a collection of 516 motets published by his sons after his death. J.B. MAC MILLAN

LAST JUDGMENT, see JUDGMENT; ESCHATOLOGY

LAST SUPPER. There are slight differences in the four accounts of the Last Supper in the NT (Matt. 26:26-29); Mark 14:22-25; Luke 22:14-20; 1 Cor. 11:23-26). Luke and Paul introduce the words "do this in remembrance of me." Matthew and Mark have "this is my blood of the covenant" instead of "this cup is the new covenant in my blood." The synoptic accounts each preserve a pledge by Jesus to abstain from drinking the fruit of the vine till the kingdom has come. Paul, instead, gives the rubric: "whenever you eat . . . and drink . . . you proclaim the Lord's death until he comes." In certain texts of Luke, two cups are mentioned, one before and one after the bread, and scholars differ about what could be the original text. The varied nature of the accounts enriches our understanding of the incident. The large area of consensus no doubt arises from our Lord's careful impression of Himself, His words and actions on His immediate followers at this time.

The synoptic accounts indicate that the supper was a Passover meal eaten on the Passover night, but according to John, Jesus was slain on the cross when the Passover lambs were slain in the Temple. There may therefore have been two different current calendars for calculating the feast date, each followed by a rival group. Some suggest that Jesus deliberately ate a Passover meal earlier than on the official date. Others suggest that the meal was a farewell festive meal of a type common among friends, or a Jewish Kiddush—a simple meal of preparation either for a Sabbath or a festival.

See also COMMUNION, HOLY.

RONALD S. WALLACE

LAST THINGS, see ESCHATOLOGY

LATERAN COUNCILS. Ecumenical church councils held in the Church of St. John Lateran, one of the major Roman basilicas. There were five such councils, the first of which was summoned by Callistus II in 1123 to signal the end of the Investiture Controversy,* at which time the Concordat of Worms was confirmed. The council promulgated a number of canons, chiefly restatements of previous decrees dealing with ecclesiastical ordinations and offices, in keeping with the Gregorian Reform, and with crusading indulgences and the Peace and Truce of God.

At the Second Lateran Council, summoned by Innocent II following the death in 1138 of his rival Anacletus II who had challenged his rule from the double election of 1130, Innocent announced the deposition of all supporters of Anacletus, the excommunication of Roger II of Sicily, and the condemnation of the adherents of Pierre de Bruys and Arnold of Brescia. The canons followed the reforming lines of the First Lateran Council, prohibiting payment for such priestly services as extreme unction and burial, the study of civil law or medicine by religious, marriage of the clergy, usury, tournaments, use of the crossbow, and incendiarism, among others. They provided that monks and canons were to be consulted in episcopal elections, and confirmed the Peace and Truce of God.

The Third Lateran Council, like the Second, marked the end of a schism. It met in 1179 at the behest of Alexander III, following the discomfiture of his rivals, whose support from Frederick Barbarossa had ended with the agreement at Venice in 1177. Alexander III* was the first great canonist pope of the period of the revived study of law, and issued at the council a series of important decretals, the first of which stipulated a two-thirds majority of the cardinals for a papal election, and another required majority decisions in ecclesiastical communities. Other reforming decrees set up cathedral schools with free instruction, and attacked simony, pluralism, and clerical vices. There were sanctions against usurers, Cathari, Jews, and Saracens, and against those aiding the latter or pirates. The Truce and Peace of God were reconfirmed.

The Fourth Lateran Council, summoned in 1215 by Innocent III,* marks the pinnacle of the achievements of the most powerful of medieval popes. It confirmed the election of Frederick II; denounced Magna Carta as an affront to the pope and his vassal, King John of England; enunciated the dogma of transubstantiation; made yearly confession and Communion mandatory; confirmed the new Franciscan Order; and required distinctive dress for Jews and Saracens. Condemnations were directed against the Cathari and the Waldensians, though they were not named, and against the teachings of Joachim of Fiore* and Amalric* of Bena. Reforming canons stipulated, among others, that no new orders were to be founded, and that general chapters were to be held in existing orders. The abuses surrounding indulgences were to be curbed. Clerks were enjoined against participating in judicial ordeals. Provisions were made for the forthcoming (Fifth) crusade. The council rejected a proposal that regular payments be collected from the entire church to support the papal administration.

Julius II* responded to the antipapal Council of Pisa (1511-12) by summoning the Fifth Lateran Council in 1512. No canons were issued, only pontifical constitutions. The chief concern of Julius was to achieve the condemnation of conciliar theory in general, and of the decrees of the councils of Constance* and Basle* and the recent Council of Pisa,* plus the Pragmatic Sanction of Bourges,* in particular. Both Maximilian and Louis XII were persuaded to disavow their previous support of the Council of Pisa. There were futile gestures toward reform of abuses surrounding commendations, pluralism, and clerical immunities, and a recognition of the need for church reform generally. A new crusade was projected, to be supported by a three-year tax on all benefices. The failure of the Fifth Lateran Council to deal decisively with the issues confronting it led directly to Luther's reform.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: G.D. Mansi, Sacrorum Conciliorum nova et amplissima collectio (31 vols., 1759-98); K.J. von Hefele, Histoire des conciles d'après les documents originaux (ed. H. Leclercq, 1907ff.); G. Tangl, Die Tielnehmer an den allgemeinen Konzilien des Mittelalters (1922); P. Hughes, The Church in Crisis (1961); R. Foreville, Histoire des conciles oecuméniques, vol. VI (1966); H.J. Margull (ed.), The Councils of the Church: history and analysis (1966).

MARY E. ROGERS

LATERAN TREATY. Concluded between the Vatican and the Italian Kingdom in 1929, this restored the relations ruptured at the seizure of Rome in 1870. It acknowledged the Holy See's independence and sovereign jurisdiction over the Vatican City, and proprietary rights over several churches and buildings elsewhere. Italy affirmed that Catholicism was the sole religion of the state, while the papacy formally recognized the Italian Kingdom and Rome as its capital. Italy agreed to compensate the Apostolic See for the loss of the Papal States. The attached concordat guaranteed to the Church the free exercise of its spiritual powers, but bishops were to take an oath of loyalty to the state. Mussolini thereby enhanced his reputation by neutralizing the papacy.

RICHARD V. PIERARD

LATIMER, HUGH (1485-1555). English Reformer and martyr. Born in Leicestershire and educated at Cambridge, he was at first a staunch defender of the unreformed faith, but was convinced by Bilney* of his error and thereafter was foremost as a reformer. Appointed bishop of Worcester in 1535, he was twice imprisoned for his beliefs during the reaction of Henry VIII's later years; and ultimately with Cranmer* and Ridley* he was to become one of the most celebrated victims of the Marian persecution, being burnt at Oxford in October 1555. The earliest controversies of the English Reformation were concerned with a strange mixture of papal pretension, clerical corruption, and doctrinal error. Much, for instance, was made of pilgrimages, purgatory, and the view of the Virgin Mary. It is to Latimer's credit that as early as 1533, in a letter to Morice about the accusations leveled against him by Powell, he recognized the central and necessary doctrine of justification, quoting Romans 5:1, adding, "If I see the blood of Christ with the eye of my soul, that is true faith that his blood was shed for me." After that he could say, with Luther, right to the end of his life: "Here I stand; I can do no other."

This being the case, it was essential that men should read and understand for themselves. Hence therefore the emphasis he placed on the need for acquaintance with the English Bible. Hence also his part in the composition of the First Book of Homilies, the twelfth of which—"A Faithful Exhortation to the Reading of Holy Scripture"—is possibly from his pen.

It is, however, as a preacher that Latimer still lives—and that says much for the force and vividness of his style. During the encouraging years of Edward VI's reign Latimer preached his series at St. Paul's Cross "On the Plough" (1547) and before the court in Lent 1548-50. In the first three sermons of the first series he concentrated on the doctrine to be taught; in the last, which has come down to us in detail, he sought to define "what men should be the teachers and preachers of it." Latimer was unsparing of clerical and especially episcopal shortcomings ("Since lording and loitering hath come up, preaching hath come down . . . For they that be lords will ill go to plough . . . They hawk, they hunt, they card, they dice; they pastime in their prelacies with gallant gentlemen, with their dancing minions and with their fresh companions"). And he could go further than this with his racy references to "pampering of their paunches . . . munching in their mangers, and moiling in their gay manors and mansions."

Latimer saw the preacher's office as to teach truth and "to reprehend, to convince, to confute gainsayers, and spurners against the truth," but he always asserted that the way a man lives will be the clue to what he believes. He therefore emphasized conduct, and never more vigorously than in the seven discourses in Lent 1549 with his exposures of public misdemeanors—bribery, exploitation, and the suborning of justice among them. Latimer was not only forthright; he was also gifted with a fine colloquial turn of phrase, a fund of arresting anecdotes and a capacity for vivid narrative. He was a popular preacher in the best sense of the phrase.

See Sermons (ed. H.C. Beeching, 1906); and H.S. Darby, Hugh Latimer (1953).

ARTHUR POLLARD

LATIN, ECCLESIASTICAL. Latin succeeded Greek as the official language of the Western Church during the third century. Ecclesiastical Latin originated in the popular speech and was popularized and formalized by the Vulgate of Jerome. It served as the lingua franca until late in the Middle Ages. By the time of the Renaissance, some humanists tried to purify the ecclesiastical Latin by returning it to its classical structure and phonetics. Comparatively, ecclesiastical Latin stands to classical Latin as Koine Greek relates to classical Greek. The phonetics and pronunciation of ecclesiastical Latin is known as the Italian pronunciation, and for liturgical purposes none but this pronunciation is permissible.

DONALD M.LAKE

LATIN AMERICA. This is the commonly accepted term for the twenty-one republics located to the south of the United States together with assorted territories and islands of the Caribbean Sea. The original inhabitants of Latin America were American Indians, many of whom later mixed with colonizers from Spain and Portugal to form the large ethnic group called mestizos. The population of Latin America is approximately 300 million with a high annual growth rate of 2.8 percent. Major languages spoken are Spanish, Portuguese, Quechua, and French. The Latin American nations gained their independence from the Iberian conquerors in the early nineteenth century. Economic progress has been slow, with agriculture predominating and a wide gap between rich and poor in many areas. The two major rival political options are so-called developmentalism and Marxist-type socialism.

The Roman Catholic religion entered Latin America with the Iberian conquest in the sixteenth century. Spain at that time had just won back her territory from the Moors after almost 800 years of struggling, and the idea of imposing religion upon a people through military conquest was still strong in Hispanic mentality. In the New World, Catholic missionaries found three major civilizations, the Aztecs of Mexico, the Mayas of Central America, and the Incas of South America, each with a form of animistic religion. The success of the Franciscans, Dominicans, Augustinians, Jesuits, and other missionaries in bringing the Indian peoples to true Christianity was spotty. In many cases the religious institutions of Spain were merely imposed alongside the political institutions, and a nominal Christianity resulted which in many cases could be described as "Christo-paganism," or "folk Catholicism." Outstanding among early missionaries were Bartolomé de Las Casas* and José de Acosta. Separation of church and state was unknown. The wars of independence in the early 1800s caused severe difficulties for the church until the Vatican was finally able to come to terms with the new independent governments.

Abortive attempts to plant Protestantism in Latin America were made by the French Huguenots in 1555 and the Dutch Reformed in 1624, both in Brazil and both effectively crushed by the Catholic Portuguese. The German Moravians settled permanently in British Guiana in 1735 and carried on successful evangelistic work among the Arawak Indians in Dutch Guiana. Argentina, Uruguay, Brazil, and Chile received European immigrants in the nineteenth century, among whom were colonies of Lutherans, Scotch Presbyterians, Anglicans, and Italian Waldensians. Their religious influence was typically confined to their own ethnic communities. Most courageous of the pioneers of Protestantism in this period were the colporteurs of the British and Foreign Bible Society and the American Bible Society, such as James (Diego) Thompson (1788-1854), his convert, Francisco Penzotti (1851-1925), and many more.

A milestone for Protestant missions was the founding of the Patagonian Missionary Society (later South American Missionary Society) by an Anglican sea captain, Allen Gardiner, in 1844. This was the first missionary of the aggressively evangelistic type. Under SAMS, Barbrooke Grubb (1865-1930) successfully planted churches among the Aracua Indians in S Chile. Presbyterian churches were planted by missionaries David Trumbull (1819-89) in Chile in 1868 and H.B. Pratt in Colombia in 1865. William Taylor (1821-1902), stressing self-supporting missions, was an outstanding pioneer of Methodist work particularly in Chile, Peru, and Central America. In 1882 J.H.L. Ewen of Great Britain, traveling through Argentina in a horse-drawn "Bible coach," planted Plymouth Brethren assemblies there. Interdenominational work began when the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions sent workers to Mexico between 1860 and 1880, and when C.I. Scofield founded the Central American Mission in 1890, pioneering the work in almost every one of the Central American republics. Lack of religious liberty and harsh persecution from Roman Catholics severely hindered Protestant missions during this period. By the year 1900, only approximately 50,000 Protestants could be located in Latin America.

The turning point in the Protestant advance in Latin America came with the convening of the Conference on Christian work in Latin America in Panama in 1916. The World Missionary Conference which met at Edinburgh in 1910 did not regard Latin America as a mission field, but this was corrected at Panama. Following the Panama Conference, the Committee on Cooperation in Latin America was organized under the leadership of Robert E. Speer (1867-1947) and Samuel Guy Inman. The CCLA convened subsequent conferences in Montevideo in 1925 and Havana in 1929. Latin Americans then assumed the initiative and convened the First Latin American Evangelical Congress in Buenos Aires in 1949, the second in Lima in 1961, and the third in Buenos Aires in 1969. In 1965 the CCLA phased out and became the Latin America Department of the Division of Overseas Ministries of the National Council of Churches, USA.

The end of World War II brought a great wave of conservative missionaries to Latin America, both from interdenominational missions and from the newer denominations. Easing of Catholic persecution of Protestants during the 1960s, combined with aggressive evangelism, has expanded the Protestant movement from the 50,000 of 1900 to over twenty million today, with some projections anticipating one hundred million by A.D. 2000. The Second Vatican Council (1962-65) convened by Pope John XXIII produced a radical change in the Latin American Roman Catholic Church. An ecumenical spirit now prevails, Bible reading is encouraged, a social conscience has been awakened, the Mass is said in the language of the people, and new emphasis is being placed upon the laity. Modern innovations, however, have produced divisions, three of which have become quite sharply defined. A large number of Catholic leaders remain conservative, attempting to preserve the traditions of the past. Among the progressives, some have chosen to emphasize the social implications of Christianity, casting their lot with a form of radical Marxism, while other progressives have taken a more spiritual line, stressing a return to the Bible and biblical Christianity.

Ecumenical overtures on the part of the Catholic Church and the World Council of Churches have not found wide acceptance among Latin American Protestants, and Latin America remains for ecumenists the most difficult continent. Evangelicals (as Latin American Protestants call themselves) at the grass roots level are still largely converts from nominal Catholicism, and they tend to identify the Roman Church with spiritual emptiness and even idolatry. A decision taken by the United Bible Societies at their first Regional Conference of the Americas in Oaxtepec, Mexico, in 1968, to produce a "common Bible" approved by both Protestants and Catholics met with such widespread opposition that the plan was later dropped. The WCC has encouraged the development of the Committee for Latin American Evangelical Unity (UNELAM) as its chief Latin American arm.

Social conditions in Latin America have strongly influenced the development of Christian theology. Over four centuries of a semifeudal socioeconomic system, in which the church played an important supportive role, have, particularly within the past twenty years, been repudiated by a growing body of Latin Americans. The unjust distribution of wealth and the submission of the economy of many republics to foreign economic interests seem to many to be the central issue of life in Latin America. A group of theologians, both Catholic and Protestant, has rallied to the cause and is in the process of developing a "theology of liberation," stressing the horizontal man-to-man or man-to-society dimensions of Christianity. Vatican II, papal encyclicals such as Paul VI's Populorum Progressio, the establishment of research centers in Chile (Centro Belarmino) and Mexico (Center of Intercultural Formation), the martyrdom of Marxist priest Camilo Torres, and the impact of outspoken advocates of liberation such as Archbishop Helder Camara of Brazil and theologian Gustavo Gutierrez of Peru are all symbolic of the direction taken by a significant number of Catholic thinkers.

The Second Assembly of the Latin American Roman Catholic Episcopate (CELAM), held in Medellín, Colombia, in 1968 perhaps marked the beginning of Roman Catholic theology of liberation. On the Protestant side, a vocal organization called Church and Society in Latin America (ISAL) was established in 1962 after a consultation in Huampaní, Peru, in 1961. It has become the rallying point for Protestant theologians of liberation, and its journal, Cristianismo y Sociedad, their principal mouthpiece. The two streams converged in 1972 in the first Latin American Congress of Christians for Socialism, held in Santiago, Chile. The close similarity between Catholic and Protestant approaches to the theology of liberation became apparent in Santiago.

Another significant group of Protestant theologians has been critical of the theology of liberation, at least in its more radical expressions. Disturbed by the questionable hermeneutics of the radical theologians and their failure to maintain the biblical emphasis on vertical reconciliation (man-God) and on the centrality of conversion and the pious life, these theologians met in Cochabamba, Bolivia, in 1970 to form the Latin American Theological Fraternity. This has given visibility to thinkers who are as aware of the social problem of Latin America as the ISAL group, but who have set to work to develop what they feel is a more biblical and balanced approach to the theology of liberation. The Fraternity is more representative of grassroots Latin America Protestantism than the ISAL theologians, although ISAL may be shedding some of its former élitism.

Until recently, theological education in Latin America has followed traditional North American and European patterns. Missionaries from the historic denominations tended to establish theological seminaries on the post-secondary school level, whereas missionaries from the interdenominational groups and newer denominations usually set up Bible institutes on lower academic levels. Outstanding among the seminaries taking more liberal positions are the Instituto Superior Evangélico de Estudios Teológicos (formerly Union Seminary) of Buenos Aires and the Evangelical Seminary of Río Piedras, Puerto Rico. Equally high-level training with a more evangelical and evangelistic emphasis is given at the Latin American Biblical Seminary and evangelistic emphasis is given at the Latin American Biblical Seminary of San José, Costa Rica. The total number of institutions for training the Protestant ministry is estimated at 360.

Roman Catholic theological training has likewise followed traditional lines through a program of major and minor seminaries, although the present trend is to reduce the number of minor seminaries as such. The dual problems of reduction in the number of vocations on the part of Latin Americans themselves and the subsequent disproportionate number of foreign priests and nuns ministering in Latin America continue to plague the church. Between 1955 and 1969 the population of Latin America increased from 202,000,000 to 270,000,000 while the number of students in major seminaries increased only from 6,385 to 7,013.

An innovative type of ministerial training called theological education by extension originated in the Presbyterian Seminary of Guatemala in 1962. Faced with the inability of traditional approaches to theological education to keep up with the extremely rapid multiplication of Protestant congregations in Latin America, it was decided to restructure seminaries in order better to meet the needs of church leaders. Through the use of programmed instructional materials, seminary training is taken out to the students (typically mature people) rather than requiring residence, and it is adjusted to several different academic levels. After a consultation in Armenia, Colombia, in 1967, the method began to spread and by 1972 over 10,000 were taking theological training by extension in Latin America. Institutions in Africa and Asia were also adapting the Latin American system to their own conditions.

Evangelism in Latin America was given new impetus in 1960 when Kenneth Strachan of the Latin America Mission initiated the nationwide program of Evangelism-in-Depth* in Nicaragua. This year-long program of intensive evangelism has since been repeated in over half of Latin American republics. It became the prototype of what is now called "saturation evangelism," which is being applied in principle in a number of countries in Asia and Africa as well as in the United States. Evangelists under the Billy Graham Association and Overseas Crusades (SEPAL) have also enjoyed wide international and interdenominational ministries. The First Latin American Congress on Evangelization was held in Bogotá, Colombia, in 1969, drawing together 1,000 delegates from the entire continent.

The various branches of the Pentecostal church have been outstanding in their ability to bring large numbers of Latin Americans to a commitment to Christ. Approximately two-thirds of Latin American Protestants are Pentecostals. Particularly large Pentecostal movements have sprung up in Chile and Brazil, characterized by their indigenous qualities. Church buildings seating 16,000 and 25,000 respectively have recently been constructed. Studies showed that this growth is aided by a culturally relevant liturgy, concentration on the receptive working classes, the apprenticeship system of leadership training, the mother-daughter church planting scheme, and the encouragement of lay ministry.

A charismatic movement, not directly related to denominational Pentecostalism, has been growing in such countries as Brazil, Argentina, and Costa Rica among the more traditional churches over the past decades, and is currently gaining momentum. It has penetrated Catholic as well as Protestant churches, bringing fresh winds of renewal. Although the movement is unstructured, it has adopted a name, el movimiento de renovación, and some eighty of its advocates from Argentina, Brazil, Paraguay, Ecuador, Colombia, and Costa Rica held a consultation in Buenos Aires in 1972. The close fellowship of Catholics and Protestants in this kind of meeting is extraordinary in the Latin American historical context.

Although the Protestant educational and medical ministries which were important earlier in the century are being phased out as governments become better able to care for these needs, other specialized ministries continue to be significant. Radio station HCJB in Quito, Ecuador, pioneered missionary radio in 1931 and missionary telecasting in 1961. Now almost without exception, every Latin American republic enjoys an evangelical radio broadcasting station. These stations, as well as other related ministries, are coordinated by Difusiones Interamericanas (DIA) of San José, Costa Rica. Several substantial Protestant publishing houses such as Editorial Caribe, Editorial Vida, Editorial Moody, Casa Bautista de Publicaciones, Editorial Aurora, Editorial Libertador, and many others keep a steady supply of Christian literature flowing in Spanish and Portuguese. Major Protestant periodicals include Pensamiento Cristiano and Certeza, both from Argentina, and La Estrella de la Mañana from Venezuela. Both Campus Crusade for Christ and the International Fellowship of Evangelical Students have active staff workers throughout Latin America for ministry on the university campuses. Wycliffe Bible Translators are working in some 200 Latin American tribes, reducing their languages to writing, and translating the NT.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: J. Mackay, The Other Spanish Christ (1932); W.S. Rycroft, Religion and Faith in Latin America (1958); S.U. Barbiere, The Land of Eldorado (1961); W. Scopes (ed.), The Christian Ministry in Latin America and the Caribbean (1962); W.M. Nelson, A History of Protestantism in Costa Rica (1963); R. Wood, Missionary Crisis and Challenge in Latin America (1964); J. Bishop, Latin America and Revolution (1965); F. Houtart and E. Pin, The Church and the Latin American Revolution (1965); W.R. Read, New Patterns of Church Growth in Brazil (1965); J.L. Mecham, Church and State in Latin America (1966); J.B.A. Kessler, A Study of the Older Protestant Missions and Churches in Peru and Chile (1967); S. Shapiro (ed.), Integration of Man and Society in Latin America (1967); E. Willems, Followers of the New Faith (1967); C. Bennett, Tinder in Tabasco (1968); W.R. Read, V. Monterosso, and H. Johnson, Latin American Church Growth (1969); R.D. Winter (ed.), Theological Education by Extension (1969); M. Bradshaw, Church Growth Through Evangelism in Depth (1969); C.L. d'Epinay, Haven of the Masses (1969); J. Lara-Braud (ed.), Social Justice and the Latin Churches (1969); C.P. Wagner, Latin American Theology (1970) and The Protestant Movement in Bolivia (1970); T.E. Quigley (ed.), Freedom and Unfreedom in the Americas (1971); I. Illich, Deschooling Society (1971); A.W. Enns, Man, Milieu and Mission in Argentina (1971); R.R. Covell and C.P. Wagner, An Extension Seminary Primer (1971); L. Colonnese (ed.), Conscientization for Liberation (1971); Q. Nordyke, Animistic Aymaras and Church Growth (1972).

C. PETER WAGNER

LATITUDINARIANISM. A term applied both to those seventeenth-century Anglican divines who appealed to reason as a "source" of religious authority besides Scripture and church practice (e.g., Chillingworth,* Stillingfleet*), and to later Broad Churchmen such as the contributors to Essays and Reviews (1860), and men such as Whateley, S.T. Coleridge, and Kingsley.* The term signifies more a theological temper and method than a set of doctrines. Latitudinarians have often been distinguishable more by what they oppose—e.g., Puritanism, Deism, Tractarianism—than by any peculiar tenets of their own.

LATOURETTE, KENNETH SCOTT (1884-1968). Church historian. Born and raised in a devout Baptist family in Oregon, he studied at Yale (1904-9), traveled for the Student Volunteer Movement,* then taught in China until invalided home in 1912. After recovering he began his life's work of teaching and writing church history, especially the history of missions, and Far Eastern history. He returned to Yale in 1921, continuing to live on campus in his bachelor quarters after his retirement from full-time teaching in 1953. He served as president of the American Baptist Convention, the American Historial Association, and the Association for Asian Studies. He served on numerous editorial boards and was actively associated both with the ecumenical movement and with various evangelical organizations. He perennially hosted informal student discussion groups. His works include The Development of China (1917); The Development of Japan (1918); History of Christian Missions in China (1929); The Chinese: Their History and Culture (1934); History of the Expansion of Christianity (7 vols., 1937-45); A History of Christianity (1953); Christianity in a Revolutionary Age (5 vols., 1958-62); and Beyond the Ranges: An Autobiography (1967). He was honored with a festschrift edited by W.C. Harr, Frontiers of the Christian World Mission (1962).

DONALD TINDER

LATROCINIUM, see EPHESUS, ROBBER SYNOD OF

LATTER-DAY SAINTS, see MORMONS

LAUBACH, FRANK CHARLES (1884-1970). American Congregational missionary and linguist. Born in Benton, Pennsylvania, he was educated at Princeton, Columbia, and Union Seminary, and following ordination in 1914 he did literacy work in the Philippines. In 1929 he began his famous educational project of teaching reading by phonetic symbols and pictures, eventually developing literacy primers for some 300 languages and dialects in over 100 countries in Asia, Africa, and Latin America. Laubach came in contact with several world leaders, including Gandhi, who became an advocate of his literacy work in India. The Laubach Method, now world famous, is essentially "each one teach one" in which each new literate teaches another the language. Out of Laubach's efforts grew the Committee on World Literacy and Christian Literature of the Foreign Missions Conference of North America. As an author he wrote widely, often moving beyond linguistics. Among his main works are India Shall Be Literate (1940); Teaching the World to Read (1947); Prayer, the Mightiest Force in the World (1946); and Making Everybody's World Safe (1947).

ROBERT C. NEWMAN

LAUD, WILLIAM (1573-1645). Archbishop of Canterbury from 1633. Educated at St. John's College, Oxford, he reacted, under the influence of the president, John Buckeridge, against the dominant Calvinism and became convinced of the importance of the episcopal organization of the Anglican Church, and of the observance of external order. Himself elected president in 1611, he tried to reintroduce pre-Reformation liturgical practices. In 1616 he became dean of Gloucester, where he moved the Communion table from the nave to the east end of the choir. Made bishop of St. Davids in 1621, he engaged in a conference with "Fisher the Jesuit" during which he admitted that the Church of Rome was a true church "because it received the Scriptures as a rule of faith . . . and both the sacraments." His views commended themselves to Charles I, who translated him to Bath and Wells in 1626, to London in 1628, and to Canterbury in 1633.

He encouraged the reintroduction into churches of stained-glass windows, crosses, even crucifixes, and railed altars, and of practices such as bowing whenever the name of Jesus was mentioned, and making the sign of the cross in baptism. During his provincial visitation of 1634-36 he tried to secure uniformity without regard for conscientiously held objections, and used the Star Chamber to enforce this. Charles I's Declaration of Sports allowed on Sundays, published in 1637, was probably instigated by Laud in opposition to Puritan views of the Sabbath. He supported the king's new Prayer Book for Scotland, which led to the eruption in St. Giles' in 1637. In 1640 he secured the passing by Convocation of canons maintaining the divine right of kings,* but was obliged to suspend the oath binding men never to alter the government of the church. Imprisoned by Parliament in 1641, he was executed for treason in January 1645.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Collected works (ed. W. Scott and J. Bliss, 1847-60); E.C.E. Bourne, The Anglicanism of William Laud (1947); H.R. Trevor-Roper, Archbishop Laud, 1573-1645 (1962).

JOYCE HORN

LAUDS. Although this is the first service of the day hours in the Daily Office, in practice it is said together with the night office (Matins). Derived from the ancient morning prayer of the church, the service always includes Psalms 148-150, the laudes, or praises sung to God at daybreak. The canticle is the Benedictus, or Song of Zechariah (Luke 1:68-79). The Eastern Lauds is the Orthros.

LAURENCE (Lawrence, Laurentius) (d.258). Martyr. Possibly born at Huesca, Aragon, he was one of seven deacons at Rome during the pontificate of Sixtus II. He suffered martyrdom in Valerian's persecution. According to traditions preserved by Ambrose, Prudentius, and others, when required by the Roman praetor to deliver up the church's treasure, Laurence assembled the poor who were his special charge, saying, "These are the treasures of the Church," for which action he was roasted to death on a gridiron. This story has been widely rejected by modern scholars who hold that he was beheaded like Sixtus and other contemporary martyrs. He was buried on the Via Tiburtina, at Campus Veranus, and during Constantine's reign a basilica was built over his tomb, later enlarged to the present San Lorenzo fuori le Mura. His name occurs in the canon of the Roman Mass and the litanies. J.G.G. NORMAN

LAUSANNE CONFERENCE (1927). First conference of the "Faith and Order" movement, held at Lausanne, largely through the initiative of Bishop C.H. Brent and Robert H. Gardiner. Over 400 delegates from about ninety churches participated, notable absentees being the Roman Catholic and Russian Orthodox churches and several Baptist groups. Roman Catholic nonparticipation was explained by Pius XI in the encyclical Mortalium Animos (6 January 1928), in which he forbade Roman Catholic involvment in the ecumenical movement which he called "panchristian." The conference was concerned with the doctrinal questions which divided the churches. Subjects discussed were: the call to unity, the message of the church to the world, the essence of the church, episcopacy and apostolic succession, and the sacraments.

The Greek archbishop Germanos declared that union was impossible without the acceptance of the seven Ecumenical Councils, and some delegates came away more conscious of differences than when they went. Even so, the conference did much to stimulate interest in reunion and encourage theological cooperation. The concluding statement, called "The Lausanne Message," was an admirable exposition of the essential Gospel, defined as "the joyful message of redemption, both here and hereafter, the gift of God to sinful man in Christ." It won the delegates' unanimous assent, and part was incorporated in the message of the Jerusalem Conference, 1928.

See H.N. Bate (ed.), Faith and Order: Proceedings of the World Conference, Lausanne (1937). J.G.G. NORMAN

LAUSANNE CONGRESS ON WORLD EVANGELIZATION (1974). Convened by an international group of 142 evangelical leaders under the honorary chairmanship of Dr. Billy Graham, this congress aimed: to proclaim the biblical basis of true evangelism; to relate biblical truth to contemporary issues; to share and strengthen unity and love in Christ; to identify those yet unreached with the Gospel; to learn from each other the patterns of evangelism the Holy Spirit is using today; to awaken Christian consciences to the implications of expressing Christ's love in attitude and action; to develop cooperative strategies toward partnership in the work; to pray together that the congress might notably further world evangelization; and to be God's people, available for His purposes in the world.

There were nearly 3,000 official participants from 150 countries. All had previously received, and most had responded in writing to, the major papers; at Lausanne the main work was done in seminars and study groups. Regional and national groups met to consider local implications of the insights gained. The congress produced the widely acclaimed Lausanne Covenant and set up a continuation committee "to further the total biblical mission of the Church," with special reference to the 2.7 billion of the world's people yet unreached.

Lausanne was the culmination of the 1966 World Congress on Evangelism* and a series of national and regional congresses.

See Let the Earth Hear His Voice (ed. J.D. Douglas, 1975). GOTTFRIED OSEI-MENSAH

LAVAL, FRANÇOIS XAVIER (1623-1708). First bishop of Quebec. Born in Montigny, France, he was educated by the Jesuits at La Flèche and Paris. Ordained in 1647, he prepared himself for missionary service, and in 1658, just before leaving for New France, was appointed apostolic vicar by the pope. Laval played a significant role in the affairs of New France, for upon his arrival in 1659 he became a member of the Quebec Council and, in 1663, of its replacement the Sovereign Council which governed the colony. As spiritual leader of the colony he sought to maintain high moral standards which, in his refusal to allow the sale of liquor to the Indians, earned him the enmity of the fur traders. Because of his strong will he was often at odds with the governor and other leaders of the colony. He was also responsible for organizing the parochial system of New France and was a key supporter of missions to the Indians. Named the first bishop of Quebec in 1674, he held the post until 1688 when he retired to the Quebec Seminary which he had founded, and which became Laval University in 1852. ROBERT WILSON

LAW, WILLIAM (1686-1761). English devotional writer. Born at King's Cliffe, Northants, he was educated at Emmanuel College, Cambridge, of which he was elected a fellow in 1711, the year of his ordination. He declined to take the oath of allegiance to George I in 1714, was deprived of his fellowship, and became a Nonjuror* for the rest of his life. In 1727 he first became associated with the Gibbon family at Putney, on his appointment as tutor to Edward Gibbon, father of the historian. Here he remained as a valued friend and family adviser until Gibbon's death in 1740 when, with the break up of the household, he returned to King's Cliffe for the rest of his life. He became recognized as a notable controversialist with his Three Letters to the Bishop of Bangor (1717), which refuted Bishop Hoadly's attempt to "dissolve the Church as a society." He ridiculed the bishop's theory that sincerity alone should be the test of religious profession, though it might testify to moral integrity, and instead he built up a constructive apologetic for orthodox Christianity. His Case of Reason (1732) was an answer to Tindal's Christianity as old as Creation, and in part anticipates Bishop Butler's argument in his Analogy.

But Law's most influential work was his Serious Call to a Devout and Holy Life (1728), which influenced the lives of many early Evangelicals, including Whitefield, the Wesleys, Henry Venn, Thomas Scott, and Henry Martyn, and others such as Samuel Johnson and Gibbon. In this book Law strongly commends the Christian faith for its moral and ethical teaching, especially for its advocacy of self-denial, humility, and self-control. All life must be lived for the glory of God. But the book has no strong doctrine of the Atonement, and lacks any joy in the good news of the gospel message. A master of logical argument, Law also wrote The Spirit of Prayer (1749, 1752), and The Spirit of Love (1752, 1754). In association with two ladies, Mrs. Hutcheson and Miss Hester Gibbon, his closing years were spent in founding schools and almshouses and in other practical works of piety. G.C.B. DAVIES

LAWRENCE, BROTHER, see BROTHER LAWRENCE

LAWS, ROBERT (1851-1934). Scottish medical missionary. Born in Aberdeen, he qualified in arts, theology, and medicine by part-time study, and joined the Livingstonia Mission (1875) as medical officer and second-in-command. As leader after 1877, he founded stations at Bandawe (1881) and Livingstonia (1894) and helped to develop extensive work west of Lake Nyasa. He regarded evangelism, education, industrial training, and medical work as complementary aspects of the Christian mission and gave practical expression to this belief at Livingstonia, which he superintended from 1894 to 1927. His work here provided trained leaders for the autonomous African Church which he hoped to create. Laws was elected moderator of the United Free Church of Scotland General Assembly in 1908, and was an unofficial member of the Nyasaland Legislative Assembly from 1912 to 1916. D.G.L. CRAGG

LAXISM. Not a theoretical system of moral theology as such, but an interpretation of Probabilism* which its critics thought to be excessively lenient. Laxism maintained that if the less safe opinion (favoring liberty) were slightly probable, it could be followed with a safe conscience. It came to the fore in the seventeenth century through Juan Sanchez (d.1620), Bauny (d.1649), Leander (d.1663), Diana (d.1663), Tamburini (d.1675), Caramuel (d.1682), and Moya (d.1684), and was bitterly attacked from a Jansenist viewpoint by Blaise Pascal in 1657 in his Lettres provinciales. Laxism was condemned in 1665 and 1666 by Alexander VII and by Innocent XI in 1679.

HOWARD SAINSBURY

LAY BROTHER. A member of a religious order employed primarily in manual labor who, unlike a priest, is not obliged to recite the Divine Office daily. He has, however, to attend daily Mass and say a short, regular office (varying from order to order). The custom of unordained monks originated in the eleventh century to fill the gap created in monasteries by the fact that priests were excused many manual chores. A lay brother has a special habit and serves a novitiate. There are also lay sisters.

LAYNEZ, JAMES (Iago or Diego Lainez) (1512-1565). Spanish Jesuit theologian and leader in the Catholic Reformation. Born at Almazán in Castile, he graduated in philosophy at Alcalá in 1532, then after studying theology for a year moved to the University of Paris, joining Ignatius of Loyola.* He was one of the six who took vows at Montmartre in 1534, thus forming the nascent Society of Jesus. The group moved to Italy, where Laynez spent his remaining life as a powerful counter-Protestant preacher and philosophy–theology teacher. He was a leader of the Jesuits, becoming provincial in Italy (1552), vicar general when Ignatius died (1556), and second general (1558). The leading papal theologian at the Council of Trent, he decisively shaped the uncompromising canons on justification, the sacraments, purgatory, and papal absolutism. He died in Rome.

BRIAN G. ARMSTRONG

LAY READER. A nonordained Anglican licensed to read the lessons, conduct Morning and Evening Prayer (except the Absolution), preach at non-Eucharistic services, and, with special episcopal permission, read the Epistle and administer the chalice at Holy Communion. The office is a modern attempt to revive the ancient office of reader, which dates from 1866 and received its earliest wide development in the USA—where the number of clergy was inadequate to the needs of expansion, and where the services of the Episcopal Church were conducted in many areas and for long periods solely by lay readers. In England, Convocation issued regulations on a lay reader's work in 1905, and these regulations have been revised subsequently on a number of occasions. A bishop admits a reader to his office, granting him either a parochial or a diocesan license. Each diocese has a readers' board, which stipulates a minimum training, and coordinates their work.

JOHN A. SIMPSON

LAZARISTS (Vincentians). Popular name of the Congregation of the Priests of the Mission which originated in the successful mission to the ordinary people on the Gondi family estates conducted by Vincent de Paul* and five others in 1625. Approved by papal bull (1632), the society was constituted a congregation with Vincent as superior. They received the priory of St. Lazarus, Paris (formerly a lazar-house), hence the popular name. The society was confirmed by Alexander VII (1655), and rules framed on the Jesuit model were published in Paris in 1668. Their special concerns were the evangelization of the poorer classes, the training of clergy, and foreign missions. Suppressed during the French Revolution, they were restored by Napoleon.

J.G.G. NORMAN

LAZARUS. The name of a beggar in a parable told by Jesus (Luke 16:19-31) and also of the brother of Mary and Martha of Bethany, who was raised from the dead by Jesus (John 11). It has been suggested that the former was a real person, since it was not Jesus' usual practice to name the characters in His parables, but this is questionable. Nothing is known of the latter outside of what is contained in John 11 and 12.

The hypothesis has been suggested by O. Cullmann and F. V. Filson that Lazarus is the author of the fourth gospel, or at least the one on whose testimony the narrative depends, because of the words of John 11:3, 36 (cf. 13:23; 19:26; 20:2; 21:7,20), but this view has not found widespread acceptance. Various valueless traditions and legends connect him with Cyprus, Constantinople, and Marseilles. W. WARD GASQUE

LEANDER (c.550-c.600). Bishop of Seville. Born in Cartagena, Leander came from a family which eventually included four saints—himself, his sister Florentina, and his brothers Fulgentius and Isidore. The latter succeeded him as bishop. Leander assumed the episcopal see about 577, and as Spain's leading churchman led the country's Visigothic rulers from Arianism to Catholicism. By converting Prince Hermenegild, Leander initially incurred the wrath of King Leovigild and was forced to flee to Constantinople. Here he befriended Gregory the Great, several of whose letters to Leander are extant. Returning to Seville, he presided at the Synod of Toledo in 589. De triumpho ecclesiae ob conversionem Gothorum, his closing address to that assembly, along with a rule for nuns, constitute his two preserved writings. JAMES DE JONG

LE CARON, JOSEPH, see CARON, JOSEPH

LECLERC, JEAN (1657-1736). French Protestant theologian. Born in Geneva, he studied philosophy and theology, was ordained in Geneva, and then went to Saumur where he published his Liberi de Sancto Amore Epistolae Theologicae in which he dealt with the doctrine of the Trinity, original sin, and the problem of the two natures in the person of Christ. After meeting John Locke and Philip Lumbach in Amsterdam, he became a Remonstrant* in theology. After a brief return to Geneva he settled in Amsterdam where he became a professor of Hebrew in the Remonstrant Seminary. Between 1684 and 1712 he held the chair of church history at that school. He was a prolific writer and exercised good influence in Arminian circles, particularly through the reviews he edited. C. GREGG SINGER

LECTIONARY. A book containing portions (pericopes) of Scripture appointed to be read at public worship on particular days of the year, or one listing such lessons. The practice of reading extracts from the Scriptures is found in the synagogue and in the early church. Systems of lessons began to appear from the third century, and appropriate readings for differing churches' ecclesiastical calendars followed. Western Protestant churches followed the emphasis of the Roman Church upon Advent, but Lutheran and Anglican lectionaries now differ widely from present Roman Catholic usage. The Anglican lectionary of 1871 governs the lessons read at Morning and Evening Prayer. There is an alternative revised Table (1922). Further revisions following in 1944, 1946, and 1956 illustrate a general determination to make the lectionary more meaningful for the present day. HOWARD SAINSBURY

LECTOR, see MINOR ORDERS

LECTURER. A term used of a clergyman of the Church of England who preached a sermon on a specified day in a given parish church or cathedral. The lectureship was much used by Puritans in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries as a means of propagating Protestant theology and gaining direct access to many people whose parish clergy were not committed preachers. The lecturer was not usually the incumbent of the parish, and his support came from other than normal ecclesiastical funds—e.g., directly from parishioners, a corporation, or a nobleman.

LEE, ANN (c.1736-1784). Founder of the Shakers.* Originally "Shaking Quakers," her movement took form near Manchester, England, in 1758-72. After unfortunate experiences in marriage, childbirth, and the loss of four infants, Ann withdrew from her husband in 1766 and announced her "complete conversion." Assuming leadership of the local Shakers shortly thereafter, she enunciated her cardinal doctrines: confession was the door to the regenerate life, celibacy its rule and cross. Failure to progress and increasing persecution led "Mother Ann, the Word," as she was now regarded, and seven followers to emigrate to Watervliet, New York, in 1774. In America the movement grew rapidly under Ann's energetic leadership. She was largely responsible for the formulation of the characteristic beliefs of the Shakers: celibacy, communism, pacifism, millennialism, élitism, and spiritual manifestations through barking, dancing, and shaking.

ROBERT D. LINDER

LEE, JESSE (1758-1816). "The Apostle of Methodism in New England." Born in Virginia, he early became a Methodist preacher, but was a pacifist during the Revolutionary War when Methodists were regarded as unpatriotic, due to the statements of John Wesley. He was appointed to the first circuit in New England from 1789 to 1798, achieving much success over a wide area. After serving as assistant to Bishop Asbury* (1797-1800), he was appointed as presiding elder of the South District of Virginia in 1801. He served three terms as chaplain in the House of Representatives, and one in the Senate of the United States. During all his other activities he attempted to chronicle the progress of Methodism in America, and published his Short History of

Methodism in America, the first such account, in 1810. KEITH J. HARDMAN

LEFÈVRE D'ÉTAPLES, JACQUES, see FABER, JACOBUS

LEGATE, BARTHOLOMEW (1575?-1612). Last heretic burnt in London. Born in Essex, he became a cloth merchant, and when business took him to Zealand he became a preacher among the Seekers.* Expecting a new revelation, he held that meanwhile there was no true church or true baptism, nor any "visible Christian." He rejected the Mennonite tenet of the celestial origin of Christ's body as an "execrable heresy." By 1604, though believing in propitiatory sacrifice, he had concluded that Christ was only a man, but born free from sin. In 1611 with his brother Thomas, Bartholomew was imprisoned, charged with heresy. King James I took a personal interest and tried to convince him of error, but found Legate incorrigible. In February 1612 Legate appeared before a formidable consistory of episcopal, clerical, and legal assessors. Thirteen articles of heresy were cited. Found guilty and handed over to the secular arm for execution, he refused to recant and was publicly burnt. Legate was reportedly of good appearance, articulate, and of excellent character. J.D. DOUGLAS

LEGATE, PAPAL, see NUNCIO AND LEGATE

LEGGE, JAMES (1815-1897). Missionary and Chinese scholar. Born in Scotland, he graduated in arts at Aberdeen (1835) and early revealed scholarly gifts. In 1839 he went to Malacca under the London Missionary Society to become principal of the Anglo-Chinese College, and three years later he founded a theological college in Hong Kong where he also revised part of the NT. He returned to England in 1873 and two years later became the first professor of Chinese at Oxford University, where he enhanced his reputation by monumental translations of classical Chinese literature.

LEIBNITZ, GOTTFRIED WILHELM (1646-1716). German philosopher. Born at Leipzig, he studied jurisprudence, mathematics, and philosophy at Leipzig and Jena universities, entered the service of the elector of Mainz in 1666, and in 1676 at the invitation of the duke of Brunswick became the ducal librarian and historiographer at Hanover. There he spent the rest of his life, working on his massive history of the House of Brunswick. As a philosopher Leibnitz was dissatisfied with Descartes's dualism and the mechanistic views of man and society propounded by Newton and Locke. In his Monadology (1714) and other works he asserted the dynamic and spiritual nature of the world which he saw in terms of motion, but whether, as he believed, his idea of God is essential as the first link in his great schematic chain of causation must be a moot point. His outlook is buoyant and hopeful, and leads on to the optimism of the Enlightenment.

As a Protestant theologian Leibnitz's optimism in conspicuous, and his Théodicée (1710), written in reply to Bayle's* Dictionary, demonstrates the harmony of faith and reason. But his intellectualist view of Christianity as the summation of all religions, and even more his idea of evil as merely the unfortunate consequence of the necessary limitation of all things created mark a serious departure from Lutheran orthodoxy. Repelled by his knowledge of the excesses of the Thirty Years' War, Leibnitz arranged during the years 1686-91 a number of fruitless negotiations between Protestant and Roman Catholic theologians, and strove to promote union between the Protestant churches, helping to establish the Collegium Irenicum in Berlin in 1703. A profound if sometimes abstruse metaphysician, he is rightly regarded as the real founder of the German philosophic tradition.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: R.W. Meyer, Leibnitz and the Seventeenth century Revolution (1952); N. Rescher, The Philosophy of Leibnitz (1966); K. Muller and W. Totok, Studia Leibnitiana (1969f.). IAN SELLERS

LEIGHTON, ROBERT (1611-1684). Archbishop of Glasgow. Graduate of Edinburgh University, he was ordained in 1641 when he became minister of Newbattle, which post he relinquished on appointment in 1653 as principal of Edinburgh University. On the reimposition of the episcopal system he was "reordained" and consecrated bishop of Dunblane in 1661. A man of ascetic habits, he gave his entire income, apart from his own frugal expenses, to the poor, but his passive acquiescence in the government's persecution of the Covenanters* has tarnished his reputation—though he described persecution as "scaling heaven with ladders fetched out of hell." His ruling passion was to achieve the unity of the Church in Scotland, to further which aim he reluctantly became archbishop of Glasgow in 1670. Disappointed in his quest, he retired to Sussex and engaged in works of charity. Among his devotional writings is a notable commentary on 1 Peter. J.D. DOUGLAS

LEIPZIG, DISPUTATION OF (1519). A debate arranged by Johann Eck,* pro-chancellor of Ingoldstadt and Luther's former friend but later chief adversary, in an attempt to discredit Luther's and Carlstadt's recently discovered Augustinian theology and force them into dangerous antipapal admissions. The choice of Leipzig was Eck's, as here Wittenbergers were known to be unpopular. The first and third phases of the debate between Eck and Carlstadt were arid affairs, with the Reformer, anxious to plead for the open Bible and the witness of the Fathers, forced by his opponent to retreat into tortuous Scholasticism. The second phase, however, when Luther debated with Eck, came to life as the former was led to affirm that church councils may not only err, but have in fact erred; that the "power of the keys" had been given to the church (i.e., the congregation of the faithful) rather than to the pope; and that belief in the preeminence of the Roman Church was not necessary to salvation. Luther left the disputation depressed by the levity and insincerity of the proceedings and the hostility of the Leipzigers, while Eck boasted that he had triumphed over the heretic. The debate had in fact cleared the air, furnished Luther's enemies with a case against him, and prepared the way for his condemnation by the Diet of Worms* the following year. IAN SELLERS

LE JEUNE, CLAUDE (c.1530-1600). French composer. Much of his life was spent close to court circles or in the service of noblemen friendly to the Huguenot* cause. At some time before 1564 he seems to have become a Protestant. He had connections with the family of William of Orange and the Duc de Bouillon, and finally became court composer to Henry of Navarre. Le Jeune was not a church composer, although he did write one Mass and a few motets. Like Goudimel,* he was strongly attracted to the texts and melodies of the Genevan Psalter. Since Calvin forbade the use of part-singing in the Reformed service, Le Jeune's settings must have been conceived for social purposes, even though he described some of them as "en forme de motets." He was one of the most talented and versatile French composers of his time. There are over 300 settings by him of Genevan psalms, as well as settings of moralistic Huguenot poems. His simpler, four-part settings are superior to those of Goudimel and were reprinted well into the seventeenth century, also with Dutch and German text. He wrote, in addition, much important secular music.
J.B. MAC MILLAN

LENT (Old English Lencten, German Lenz, "spring," Lat. Quadragesima). The period of forty days' fasting before Easter. One or two days of fasting in preparation for Easter is attested by Irenaeus in the third century, but the earliest reference to a period of forty days (Greek) as the name for Lent occurs in the fifth canon of the Council of Nicea (325). "Forty" no doubt was suggested by the forty days' fast of Jesus, while the fast itself may have been originally part of the preparation of candidates for baptism on Easter night. The length of the fast differed. In Rome in the fifth century, for example, it was three weeks, and in the Eastern churches seven. Not until the seventh century was a period of forty days determined in the West.

Originally the fast was rigorous. One meal a day was allowed, and all flesh and "white meats" forbidden. Gradually the fast was relaxed in the West from the eighth/ninth centuries. By the sixteenth century the evening office of Vespers was advanced to before midday so that the rule of not eating before Vespers could be maintained. A light meal (collation) was also allowed.

In the Roman Catholic Church the Lenten Masses reflect the baptismal associations of the fast by their references to water, raising from the dead, and light. Penitence is another ancient aspect of Lent, deriving from the practice of publicly excluding penitents from Communion at the beginning of Lent and their public reconciliation on Maundy Thursday. The Passion theme dominated the fast. Eastern Church liturgies reflect the same themes. Roman Catholics now usually keep only Ash Wednesday and Good Friday as fast days, but Lent remains a time of penitence.

The Book of Common Prayer prescribes the observance of Lent with fasting. The Tractarians revived the observance in the nineteenth century after a period of comparative disuse, and it is now widespread in the Anglican Church with the emphasis on penitential practice and private devotion at the discretion of the individual. Lent forms part of the Lutheran church year and is observed in some measure in other Protestant churches.
HOWARD SAINSBURY

LEO I (the Great), (St. Leo) (c.400-461). Pope from 440. Born in Tuscany, he was a deacon under Pope Celestine I (422-32) and was active before his election as bishop of Rome, succeeding Sixtus III. One of the greatest administrators of the early church, Leo is known for combining Roman Law with ecclesiastical procedure and for strengthening the primacy of the Roman see in church structure.

As pope, Leo was dedicated to the duty of preaching, and he wrote many sermons for the liturgical cycle. He vigorously enforced uniformity in church government and doctrine, both locally (i.e., in the ten surrounding bishoprics) and universally. When the co-emperor Marcian convened the Council of Chalcedon in 451, Leo sent representatives and his Tome to Flavian (patriarch of Constantinople), part of which concerned a doctrine of Christ that was adopted by the council. He maintained peaceful relations with Marcian's successor, Emperor Leo the Thracian, in spite of some friction over the support of Chalcedon. Leo's belief in the use of moderation in the wielding of power is illustrated by his dealings with the African Church and his violent reaction to the discovery that one of his vicars (Anastasius of Thessalonica) had acted hastily in dealing with his assistants. He defended the faith against such heretical groups as the Manichaeans, Monophysites, and Pelagians. He was also instrumental in preventing the destruction of Rome in 452, when he persuaded Attila to withdraw, and in 455, when he persuaded the Vandals to refrain from murdering the populace.

Leo did not write any treatises, but his preserved sermons indicate his beliefs in matters of doctrine. The essence of his teaching lies in his awe for the mystery of Christ and the church. He believed that he acted in the place of Peter, and that Christ actively participated in the governing of the church.

See W.J. Halliwell, The Style of Pope St. Leo the Great (1939), and T.G. Jalland, The Life and Times of St. Leo the Great (1941).
ROBERT G. CLOUSE

LEO III (c.680-741). Byzantine emperor from 717, known as "the North Syrian" or "Isaurian." After revolting against Theodosius III, he marched to Constantinople and was elected emperor. In a series of battles he repelled and defeated the Arabs. Also he introduced important administrative reforms—e.g., in the Ecloga Legum, based in part on the Justinian Code* and on canon and customary law. His ecclesiastical policy caused the outbreak of the long Iconoclastic Controversy.* In 726 he issued an edict against the use of images in worship, but when he tried to remove an honored icon of Christ in Constantinople he was strenuously opposed by the local people, the monks, the patriarch Germanus, and John of Damascus. A revolt broke out in Hellas. Undeterred, he banned in 730 the use of icons and ordered their destruction. Germanus refused to cooperate and was deposed; Pope Gregory III held two synods at Rome in 731, condemning Leo's supporters. In part a punishment to Rome, Leo transferred to the patriarchate of Constantinople lands (e.g., S Italy and Greece) previously under the papacy and also appropriated some papal patrimonies. His policy was continued by his son, Constantine V. PETER TOON

LEO III (d.816). Pope from 795. He was a native Roman, and his first significant act on election was to send to Charlemagne* the standard of Rome and the keys of Peter's sepulcher and of the city. In 799, having been accused by enemies of serious misbehavior, he barely escaped with his life. He appealed to Charlemagne, who came to Rome in 800 and before whom Leo purged himself on oath of the accusations. Two days later, on Christmas Day, he crowned Charlemagne emperor, perhaps in order to suggest that this was the prerogative of the pope alone. This put a strain on the improving relations with the East. Leo tried to correct this in 809 when, confirming the correctness of the Filioque clause introduced into the Nicene Creed,* he urged that the creed should not be chanted in the public liturgy. Leo was canonized in 1673. J.D. DOUGLAS

LEO VI (866-912). Byzantine emperor from 886; known also as "the Wise" and "the Philosopher." Eldest son of Basil I, he was educated under Photius,* became co-emperor in 870, and after ascending the throne renounced his former teacher to gain support with intransigents in the church. Facing threats from Arabs and Bulgarians, he staved them off with diplomacy rather than a military campaign. He reformed the state's legal and administrative functions, and in 888 completed the Basilica, a corpus of Roman law still valid in the empire, by enlarging the number of Greek books from forty to sixty. Leo married four times to secure an heir and was severely censured by churchmen for this action, although his son was legitimatized in time to inherit the throne. Leo constructed a church and a monastery in Constantinople to honor the biblical person Lazarus. His writings included laws and decrees regarding secular and religious affairs; a treatise on military strategy that incorporated much of Aelian's text on military affairs and urged feigned retreats without apology; homilies; religious verse; orations; secular poetry; and a funeral oration on his father's accomplishments.

JOHN GROH

LEO IX (1002-1054). Pope from 1048. Born in Alsace, he did military service in Lombardy during the reign of his relation, Emperor Conrad II, to whom he owed his appointment in 1027 as bishop of Toul. Having been influenced by the work of Cluny and Lorraine, he reformed various monasteries, which reforming zeal was apparent to the church at large after his election as pope. He traveled the Continent fostering a new ideal of the papacy. The councils at Bari, Mainz, Pavia, and Reims issued decrees against simony, clerical marriage, and other abuses. He forcefully opposed the Norman devastation of S Italy which antagonized both the German court and the Eastern Church. Defeated by the Normans in 1053, he was ready to embark on a triple alliance of papacy, empire, and Byzantium, but he died that year. Hildebrand, later Gregory VII, began his career in Rome under Leo's pontificate.

C.G. THORNE, JR.

LEO X (1475-1521). Pope from 1513. The second son of Lorenzo the Magnificent, Giovanni de'Medici received the tonsure before the age of eight and became a cardinal deacon at age thirteen. His tutors in his father's court included such men as Marsilio Ficino, Angelo Poliziano, and Giovanni Pico della Mirandola. He studied theology and canon law at Pisa and became a member of the college of cardinals in 1492. During the intervening period until his election to the papacy, Giovanni took part in the election of Alexander VI (1492), went into exile from Florence during Savonarola's* reign (1494), became head of the Medici family (1503), participated in the successive elections of Pius III and Julius II, and was able to regain power in Florence through a bloodless revolution by the Florentines (1512).

On 15 March 1513, he received holy orders, on the seventeenth he was consecrated bishop, and he was crowned pope on the nineteenth. He was chosen because of his peace-loving qualities as opposed to the warriorlike tendencies of Julius II. Leo personified the Renaissance—he loved art, music, and the theater, and was the patron of many humanists. His piety was probably sincere, but his lavish spending impoverished the papacy. He managed the culminating work of the Fifth Lateran Council (1512-17) and negotiated a settlement with Francis I of France which clarified the duties of king and pope (1515). In his constant search for sources of revenue Leo renewed an indulgence to support the building of St. Peter's, an act which led the Protestant Reformation.

See W. Roscoe, Life and Pontificate of Leo X (2 vols., 1853). ROBERT G. CLOUSE

LEO XIII (1810-1903). Pope from 1878. Vincenzo Gioacchino Pecci was a native of Carpineto, he was educated by the Jesuits of Viterbo, and studied at Rome. He was ordained priest in 1837, and made apostolic delegate of Benevento. In 1841 he became delegate of Perugia, where he gained a reputation as a social reformer. He was appointed nuncio to Brussels (1843) and consecrated archbishop of Damiato, and during his three years' residence he mediated in an educational controversy between the Jesuits and the Catholic University of Louvain. He became bishop of Perugia (1846) and in 1853 was created cardinal priest of St. Crisogono. His long episcopate found him building and restoring churches, and encouraging learning and social reform. Though not altogether persona grata to Pius IX, he yet protested against the loss of the pope's temporal power in 1870.

Elected to the papacy, he ought to have come to terms with the civilization of the day. By conciliatory methods he overcame the anticlericalism in Germany which followed the decree of papal infallibility in 1870. In Belgium he saw the Catholic party return to power (1884), while in 1892 he established an apostolic delegation in Washington. He renewed contacts with Russia and Japan and improved relations with Britain. In France, however, he tried with little success to dissociate the Catholic clergy from the royalist party, and during his last years relations between church and state there deteriorated into a period of triumphant anticlericalism. In Italy, too, he failed to recover the lost temporal powers of the papacy, and the pope remained "the Prisoner of the Vatican."

Leo did much by way of improving social attitudes, and attempted to stem the drift of the working classes into irreligion. His encyclical Rerum Novarum (1891) emphasized that labor should receive its just reward, and approved of social legislation and trade unionism. He encouraged the study of the Bible, and in 1883 he opened the Vatican archives to historical research. He made some approaches to other churches, notably to the Church of England in his apostolic letter Ad Anglos (1895), even though a commission he appointed rejected Anglican orders as invalid (1896). He also promoted the spiritual life of his own church.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: M. Spahn, Leo XIII (1912); H. Somerville, Studies in the Catholic Social Movement (1933); E. Soderini, The Pontificate of Leo XIII (ET 1934-35). J.G.G. NORMAN

LEONARDO DA VINCI (1452-1519). Florentine artist, scientist, and inventor. Born the natural son of a notary, he studied under Verrochio and in 1482 left Florence for Milan, where he served the duke until 1499. He wandered for several years, but finally settled in France under the patronage of the king where he remained until his death. Although a universal man, Leonardo placed painting above the other arts, for he felt it was the best method by which to present the work of nature to the senses. Thus it extends to the surfaces, colors, and forms of natural objects which science studies in their intrinsic forms. The beauty that painting seeks is the proportion of the things themselves. Proportion is found not only in numbers, but in sounds, weights, time, space, and any natural force. These principles he applied in such works as the Virgin of the Rocks, the Last Supper, and the Mona Lisa.

But Leonardo was also quite interested in science, which he felt should be based on experience and mathematical calculation. He had contempt for those who spent their time studying Aristotle and his commentators. In these attitudes he demonstrates his dependence upon Marsilio Ficino and the Renaissance Platonists of Florence. Da Vinci left a sizable collection of notebooks which have been scattered in various libraries of Europe. They consist of notes and sketches on various topics: mechanics, anatomy, physics, physiology, and philosophy. They also contain suggestions for machines of all types, such as airplanes, tanks, automatic guns, gears, and parachutes. In addition there are methodological notations on the procedures of scientific inquiry and the processes of nature.

See K. Clark, Leonardo da Vinci (1939), and I.B. Hart, The World of Leonardo da Vinci (1961). ROBERT G. CLOUSE

LEONTIUS OF BYZANTIUM (sixth century). Anti-Monophysite theologian. In his early years he lived among Nestorians. Probably a Palestinian monk, he is known from the Vita Sabae of Cyril of Scythopolis. He entered a monastery in Palestine called "New Laura" about 520 and accompanied Sabas to Constantinople in 530, where he defended Chalcedon against the Monophysites (531-36). Back in Palestine in 537, he defended Origenism against orthodox attacks, then returned to Constantinople about 540. He with Boethius in the West and John Philoponus in the East helped make Aristotelian philosophy available for use in theology. His works show him to be well versed in Aristotelian logic and the psychology of the Platonists. He forcefully opposed Monophysitism* and Severus* of Antioch in his works, which included Three Books against the Nestorians and Eutychians; A Resolution of the Arguments Advanced by Severus; Thirty Chapters against Severus; and perhaps Against the Fraud of the Apollinarians. His Christology appeared to be closer to Theodore of Mopsuestia's* than to Cyril of Alexandria's. He argued that Christ's two natures were permanently distinct, but the existence of the humanity was concretely manifested in the one hypostasis of the divine Word. He used the term enupostatos (later developed by Maximus the Confessor and John Damascene) to argue that if a nature had its subsistence in another hypostasis it need not thereby become an accident. His favorite term was used earlier; the idea came from the Neoplatonists. In sum, in his Christology Leontius seemed to be trying to reformulate the Christology of Evagrius Ponticus* into Chalcedonian terms. JOHN GROH

LEPORIUS (fl. 425-430). Latin theologian of Gaul. Probably born in Trier, he was a monk in Marseilles. Cassian spoke of him as a Pelagian, and his christological teaching shows points of contact with Theodore of Mopsuestia* and early Nestorianism.* He issued a letter in which he taught the essential similarity between Christ's moral experience and our own. When rebuked by several bishops of S Gaul, he and his followers fled to Africa, where he met Augustine and publicly recanted his error at Carthage in a Libellus Emendationis which was subscribed by Aurelian of Carthage and Augustine.

LEPSIUS, JOHANNES (1858-1926). Founder of the German Orient Mission. Son of a noted Egyptologist, his acquaintance with the East began as a child. A Lutheran pastor, he was deeply moved by the Armenian massacres of 1894-95, and his 1896 tract indicting Turkish policies received European-wide notice. In 1895 he established a German relief organization for Armenia which soon consisted of orphanages, medical clinics, and a carpet factory in Urfa, Turkey, to provide employment. In 1900 Lepsius transformed this into the German Orient Mission and endeavored to evangelize Muslims, but with little success. Most of its properties were lost in World War I, but it did carry on a relief work among the Armenian diaspora and a small Muslim mission which the Berlin Mission took over in 1937.

RICHARD V. PIERARD

LE QUIEN, MICHEL (1661-1733). French Dominican scholar. Librarian of Saint-Honoré, Paris, he wrote Défense du texte hébreu et de la version Vulgate (1690) and Panoplia contra schisma Graecorum (1718), taking issue with Patriarch Nectarius of Jerusalem on papal primacy. His posthumous Oriens Christianus (3 vols., 1740) treats Eastern Church history. He was responsible also for the still standard though incomplete edition of John Damascene's Opera omnia (2 vols., 1712). Unfinished too was an edition of Opera omnia Leontii Byzantini. He wrote two major works concerning the validity of Anglican orders.

LESSING, GOTTHOLD EPHRAIM (1729-1781). German writer and dramatist. Son of a Saxon pastor, he became librarian to the duke of Brunswick (1774-78), during which period he published a series of Fragments of an Unknown Writer. He claimed to have discovered them in the ducal library at Wolfenbüttel (hence their popular name of Wolfenbüttel Fragments). In reality they were extracts from a massive unpublished manuscript by H.S. Reimarus. The work was a defense and restatement of skeptical Deism. The last of the Fragments was entitled The Goal of Jesus and His Disciples, and claimed to expose the gospel accounts of Jesus as a piece of fraud on account of their alleged unfulfilled eschatological predictions. Jesus had promised the imminent coming of the kingdom of God, and it had not come. On His death the disciples had cunningly postponed it indefinitely, claiming that Jesus had risen from the dead and had gone to heaven. In the meantime, people have failed to notice that Christianity is built on unfulfilled fraudulent claims.

The ensuing controversy raged fiercely. Among those who replied were J.M. Goeze, J.C. Döderlein, J.D. Schumann, and J.S. Semler. Lessing did not commit himself, feigning ignorance of the author's identity and replying to critics in a series of pamphlets ostensibly trying to put the debate into perspective, while adding fuel to the fire. He adopted an enlightened attitude to religion, maintaining ambiguously that religion is not true because the apostles taught it; they taught it because it is true. Historical evidence is insufficient basis for religious belief, for the accidental truths of history can never become proof for the necessary truths of reason. The truth and value of a religion are to be apprehended in experience. Those who live right will show that they have true religion. This was the message of the dramatic poem Nathan the Wise (1779) and the essay on The Education of the Human Race (1780). Lessing also wrote an essay in gospel criticism, New Hypothesis on the Evangelists considered as merely human historical Writers (1788), which posited a single Hebrew or Aramaic source behind the gospels, portraying Jesus as a purely human messiah.

See H. Chadwick, Lessing's Theological Writings (1956), and G. Pons, Gotthold Ephraïm Lessing et le Christianisme (1964). COLIN BROWN

LEVELLERS. A democratic party in England during the Puritan Revolution and Commonwealth period. The name was given by enemies of the movement to suggest that it was aimed at "levelling men's estates." The party developed in 1645-46 among radical supporters of Parliament in and around London. The war had been waged in the name of Parliament and the people, and the Levellers demanded that sovereignty be transferred to the House of Commons elected by universal suffrage, that there be a redistribution of seats and annual (or biennial) parliaments. They also advocated equality before the law and freedom of religion. Since their reforms were not inaugurated by Parliament, the Levellers turned to agitation within the New Model Army. A debate held at Putney (October 1647) between Gen. Henry Ireton, the representative of the prevailing view that only property owners should have the franchise, and the Levellers ended in deadlock. Discipline was restored by the generals with force, and by 1650 the leading Levellers such as John Lilburne were imprisoned and the movement crushed. ROBERT G. CLOUSE

LEWIS, C(LIVE) S(TAPLES) (1898-1963). Novelist, poet, and apologist. Anglican layman who taught at both Oxford and Cambridge, Belfast-born Lewis attracted wide readership during and after World War II because he had, as C.E.M. Joad wrote, "the rare gift of making righteousness readable." He burst on the scene in 1941 with the clever satire Screwtape Letters—instructions from a senior devil to a junior devil on how to snatch a new Christian from the snares of heaven. Soon after, Lewis delivered a series of twenty-nine widely popular broadcast talks on basic Christian doctrine. They were, like Lewis's later writings, traditionally orthodox; he avoided denominational distinctives and called it "mere Christianity." The stamp of his style was wit, urbanity, clarity, an effortless elegance, and disciplined logic.

In scholarly circles Lewis was a respected literary critic before Screwtape surfaced. His Allegory of Love (1936), a study of the courtly love tradition in literature, was considered a landmark in medieval scholarship. A Preface to 'Paradise Lost' (1941) was at the center of controversy over Milton's theology and Romantic interpretations of Satan.

Books flowed from his pen at the rate of one or more a year, and in astonishing variety: novels, children's books, theology, philosophical apologetics, poetry, literary criticism. Many of his books seemed especially designed to remove obstacles facing the Christian in an agnostic age of scientific materialism. The Abolition of Man (1943), on the rational and social necessity of a normative ethic, and Miracles (1947), a philosophical defense of the possibility of miracles, were closely reasoned philosophical treatises. The Problem of Pain (1940) dealt with the ancient difficulty of justifying the ways of a good God to suffering man. Reflections on the Psalms (1958) and Letters to Malcolm: Chiefly on Prayer (1963) discussed problems in the Psalms, prayer, and the private devotional life. His three most popular novels, Out of the Silent Planet (1938), Perelandra (1943), and That Hideous Strength (1945), wove Christianity into a hauntingly beautiful fictionalized cosmic myth. The seven Chronicles of Narnia became modern children's classics.

C.S. Lewis disliked cant, positivism, and "chronological snobbery," the notion that newest is best. His lively apprehension of man's evil was balanced by his vision of joy—he called it Sehnsucht—man's longing for his eternal home. His was a world of clarity shaped by a commitment to the use of sound reasoning, furnished by emphasis on the changeless and detachment from passing fashions. He believed reason was the organ for truth, and imagination the vehicle for understanding. A certain dash of Platonic philosophy and philological expertise lay behind his concept of image and myth. He believed myth contained universal truth, and that Christianity was the archetypal myth. For Lewis, the Christian myth had an objective correlative.

Lewis was raised Anglican but became an atheist as a teenage schoolboy. His education at Oxford was interrupted by military service in World War I. After recovery from a shell wound he returned to Oxford to read philosophy and English literature. His first published work, a slim volume of lyric poetry, Spirits in Bondage, appeared in 1919, and a narrative poem, Dymer, followed in 1926: both were published under the pseudonym Clive Hamilton. After nearly thirty years as fellow of Magdalen College, he left Oxford in 1954 for the newly created chair of medieval and Renaissance English at Cambridge. Lewis moved slowly from atheism through Yeatsian romanticism to absolute idealism and finally theism, returning to worship in the Church of England in 1929. His conversion journey is traced in The Pilgrim's Regress (1933), an allegory, and Surprised by Joy (1955), his spiritual autobiography. Most of his life was spent in quiet bachelorhood, but in 1956 he married Joy Davidman Gresham, an American Jewish Christian convert, when she was critically ill with cancer. After her death in 1960 he wrote the poignant A Grief Observed, initially published under the pseudonym "N.W. Clerk"; until his own death three years later he served as guardian of her two sons.

Other writings include The Great Divorce (1946); Mere Christianity (1952); Till We Have Faces (1956); Christian Reflections (1967); and works on literature and criticism.

See biography by R.L. Green and W. Hooper (1974) and A. Arnott, The Secret Country of C.S. Lewis (1975). JOAN OSTLING

LIANG A-FAH (1789-1855). First ordained Chinese Protestant evangelist. When Robert Morrison could not gain access to China, he established a base in 1814 among the 4,000-strong Chinese community in Malacca, where his colleague, William Milne,* set up a printing press. Among Milne's converts and assistants was Liang A-fah, who became a Bible Society colporteur and wrote a long treatise on Christianity entitled Good Words Exhorting the Age, which he eventually distributed among the civil service examinees in Canton. One set of these books fell into the hands of Hung Hsiu-ch'uan* and sparked the Taiping Rebellion.

LIBELLATICI. The name given to those who during the Decian persecution (249-51) purchased certificates from the civil authorities which stated they had sacrificed to idols when in fact they had not. The practice was condemned by church leaders, but those guilty of the circumvention were treated more liberally than those who had actually sacrificed. A council at Carthage in 251 decided that penitent libellatici might be restored, but that sacrificati must submit to lifelong penance.

See LAPSI.

LIBERAL CATHOLIC CHURCH. A body that may be dated from 1918 when it appeared in London as a synthesis of theosophical and Old Catholic* doctrines and practices. Four members of the English Theosophical Society were ordained (1913-14) priests in the miniscule British Old Catholic Church. A lapse in the Old Catholic bishopric led to the recognition (1916) of J.I. Wedgwood as bishop, who in turn ordained C.W. Leadbeater (the leading London Theosophist since 1895) as bishop of the Old Catholic Church for Australasia. Wedgwood and Leadbeater compiled a new liturgy and renamed the body the Liberal Catholic Church (1918) to distinguish it from Old Catholicism. An American branch, begun in 1917, established its headquarters at Los Angeles, California, and built a procathedral (1924). The church does not hold to a firm doctrine, believing that there are "many paths to truth." Instead it stresses liturgy—whereby the "living Christ" is experienced—theosophy,* and reincarnation. It maintains a hierarchy of regional bishops, selected by a general episcopal synod, with a presiding bishop. Membership numbered 10,000 (1964), including 2,500 in the United States. Headquarters are in London.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: E.E. Beauregard, "Liberal Catholic Church" in New Catholic Encyclopedia XIII, pp. 699-700; R.K. McMaster, "Theosophy" in New Catholic Encyclopedia XIV, pp. 74-75; F.W. Pigott, The parting of the ways (1927); C.W. Leadbeater, The science of the sacraments (1920; rep. 1957). C.T. MC INTIRE

LIBERIAN CATALOGUE. A list of Roman bishops from Peter down to Liberius (352-66), one part in a collection of documents made by a compiler known as the Chronographer of A.D. 354.* the name given by T. Mommsen in his studies. Probably the earliest version of the Liber pontifi- *calis, it contains two sections: (a) dating the pontificates from Peter to 231 (Pontianus 230-35) based on authentic but faulty traditions as with a list in the Chronicle of Hippolytus; (b) the period 231-352 which seems to evidence official documentation. The twenty-five years given Peter's reign is substantiated in their chronicle by Eusebius and Jerome. Probably prepared in 336 under Pope Mark before its publication later, the Liberian Catalogue was first edited by the Jesuit, A. Bucherius, at Antwerp (1636), and is sometimes called the Bucerian Catalogue.

C.G. THORNE, JR.

LIBERIUS (d.366). Pope from 352. Shortly after his accession he was faced with the Eastern demand to condemn Athanasius. Not present at the Council of Milan (355) which succumbed to anti-Athanasian pressure, he was summoned before Constantius, but refused to condemn Athanasius and asked that the Nicene Creed be confirmed. He was exiled to Berea, and after two years he signed, under pressure, an agreement to the exile of Athanasius and to a heretical formula. The evidence for this is contained in four letters from exile, the authenticity of which is challenged, but cannot be doubted. There is, however, doubt as to which formula he signed and hence how heretical it was. He returned to Rome, and in 366 received into communion representatives of the Eastern Church, fleeing from the pro-Arian emperor Valens. He died that same year. Other items of his correspondence have been preserved, including three letters to Eusebius, bishop of Vercelli.

C. PETER WILLIAMS

LIBER PONTIFICALIS. The "Book of Popes" contains biographies of popes from the Apostle Peter's day to the mid-fifteenth century. The entries give such basic information as each man's birthplace, date of pontificate, and contributions to Catholicism. They tend to increase considerably in size with later pontiffs and are of uneven reliability, often reflecting the biases of the era in which composed. The first edition, based on a fourth-century list of Roman bishops, Catalogus Liberianus, appeared in the sixth or perhaps seventh century. Thereafter Liber pontificalis was periodically updated. It is least adequate on tenth- and eleventh-century popes. Yet it remains a basic source of information and is indispensable as a reflection of medieval attitudes towards the papacy. JAMES DE JONG

LIBERTINES. Sometimes this refers to a Jewish synagogue group mentioned in Acts 6:9 KJV, but it is more commonly associated with two groups of opposition to Calvin in Geneva. The first—not known as Libertines in their century—were Genevan patriots and influential families (the Perrins, Favres, Vandels, Bertheliers, etc.) who led the republic to independence and the Reformation. They resented the dominant influence of Calvin and "foreigners" in Genevan affairs. A bitter struggle with Calvin ended in their complete disgrace in 1555. The second group, called Libertines by Calvin, were spiritualists, professing a pantheistic, antinomian creed, denying evil, and rejecting all formal Christianity. They came to Geneva from France, but Calvin traces their beginnings to one Coppin of the Netherlands. They were suppressed in Geneva in 1555.

BRIAN G. ARMSTRONG

LICENTIATE. A term common in Scottish Presbyterianism to signify one who, having completed his theological studies, has received authority to preach the Word, but has not yet been by ordination given authority to administer the sacraments. Sometimes the word "probationer" is used to describe one having this status; in previous times in Scotland the word "preacher of the gospel" or "expectant" was used.

LIDDELL, ERIC (1902-1945). Athlete and missionary to China. While a student at Edinburgh University, he became the most popular and most widely known athlete Scotland had produced. Rugby football internationalist, Olympic champion, and world record-breaker, he established a national reputation also as an evangelist before returning to his birthplace at Tientsin to join the staff of the Anglo-Chinese Christian College there in 1925. Interned by the Japanese at Weihsien in China in 1942, he was highly regarded by people of all ages and races because of his Christ-like life and unremitting, self-denying service in the internment camp, where he died of a brain tumor just before he would have been released. "Scotland," said a leading national newspaper, "has lost a son who did her proud every hour of his life." D.P. THOMSON

LIDDON, HENRY PARRY (1829-1890). Anglican preacher. Born in London and educated at Oxford, he became a member of the Tractarian* group after the secessions to Rome. He exercised great influence both as a professor and administrator in Oxford, but his real fame rests on his preaching from the pulpit of St. Paul's as one of its canons over the last two decades of his life. Steeped though he was in the ethos of Oxford, Liddon nonetheless succeeded in the requirements of a popular preacher. This is not to say he was shallow or flashy. He marshaled his vast learning, strong logic, lucidity, and sense of order, and his sustained grasp of ideas within strictly controlled and methodically developed structures and expressed them in prose that was brilliantly expressive and finely modulated. He had, in particular, a fine ear for the effects of inversion and a falling close, and a ready memory for apt and succinctly narrated illustrations. In his Oxford sermons, sometimes taking as long as eighty minutes to deliver, he provided exhaustive treatments of theological topics in a closely argued and deeply scholarly manner. ARTHUR POLLARD

LIETZMANN, HANS (1875-1942). German church historian. Having studied at the universities of Jena and Bonn, he became professor first at Jena (1905-24) and then at Berlin (1924-42) as the successor of A. Harnack.* He served as the editor of the Zeitschrift für Neutestamentliche Wissenschaft from 1920 until his death and also, with others, Handbuch zum Neuen Testament (1906ff.), to which he contributed commentaries on Romans, 1 and 2 Corinthians, and Galatians. Lietzmann authored numerous important monographs, including an early study of Apollinarius of Laodicea (1904), another on Peter and Paul in Rome (1915; rev. ed. 1927), and an epochal work on the Mass and the Lord's Supper (1926). His four-volumed History of the Early Church (1932-44; ET 1937-51) remains a standard work. His academic interests bridged all the disciplines related to early Christian history—NT exegesis, classical archaeology and philology, papyrology, Hellenistic religion, canon law, and the like.

W. WARD GASQUE

LIFE AND WORK, see OXFORD CONFERENCE; STOCKHOLM CONFERENCE; WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES

LIGHTFOOT, JOHN (1602-1675). English biblical scholar. Born at Stoke-on-Trent, he graduated from Cambridge, spent two years teaching at Repton, and after ordination was engaged in pastoral work in Shropshire and Staffordshire (1630-42). He supported Parliament in the Civil War. In 1643 he became rector of St. Bartholomew's, London, and was a member of the Westminster Assembly* in which he was on the Erastian side against the extreme Presbyterians. He was later rector of Great Munden and master of Catherine Hall, Cambridge (1650), and was vice-chancellor of Cambridge University (1654). He took part in the Savoy Conference* (1661), this time supporting the Presbyterians. His works include Erubhin; or Miscellanies, Christian and Judaical (1629), a book on Genesis (1642), and Horae Hebraicae et Talmudicae (6 vols., 1658-78), showing the bearing of Jewish studies on NT interpretation. He also assisted Brian Walton with the Polyglot Bible (1657).

J.G.G. NORMAN

LIGHTFOOT, J(OSEPH) B(ARBER) (1828-1889). Bishop of Durham. A sickly child, he was at first educated by tutors at his Liverpool home, but in 1844 moved to King Edward's School, Birmingham, where he was much influenced by the headmaster, Dr. J.P. Lee, and formed a friendship with E.W. Benson, later archbishop of Canterbury. In 1847 he went to Cambridge, studied under B.F. Westcott,* became a fellow of Trinity and, after ordination, a tutor at the college, lecturing on the classics and the Greek NT. In 1861 he became Hulsean professor of divinity, and in 1875 Lady Margaret professor. In 1879 he was appointed bishop of Durham and devoted himself with great energy to his episcopal duties. He arranged for the division of the diocese into two and saw to the building of many new churches in the expanding industrial areas. He made benefactions to the University of Durham, and he used to have living with him at Auckland Castle six or eight young graduates who were training for the ministry.

Lightfoot was one of the most learned men of his time. Fluent in seven languages, he read very widely, had an accurate memory, wrote lucidly and powerfully, and was at his best when dealing with and assessing facts rather than ideas. This made him a good foil to both Westcott and F.J.A. Hort,* with both of whom he intended to write a commentary on the complete NT. Lightfoot was to do the Pauline epistles, and he completed three definitive commentaries: Galatians (1865), Philippians (1868), and Colossians and Philemon (1875). His work on the Apostolic Fathers (1869 and 1885) was epoch making. In nine articles in the Contemporary Review he completely demolished the arguments advanced in J.A. Cassels's anonymous Supernatural Religion and magnificently defended the historicity of the Christian faith. His historical gifts are displayed in a collection of sermons in the diocese of Durham entitled Leaders of the Northern Church (1890).

See G.R. Eden and F.C. Macdonald (eds.), Lightfoot of Durham (1931).

R.E. NIXON

LIGHTFOOT, ROBERT HENRY (1883-1953). English biblical scholar. Born in Wellingborough, Northamptonshire, son and maternal grandson of Church of England clergy, he was an Eton scholar and exhibitioner of Worcester College, Oxford, from which he received first class theological honors (1907) and the senior Greek and Septuagint prizes (1908). Subsequent to ordination he was curate of Haslemere (1909-12), and then in succession at Wells Theological College bursar (1912), vice principal (1913), and principal (1916). He served as examining chaplain to the archbishop of Canterbury (1913-53). He was named fellow and chaplain of Lincoln College, Oxford (1919), and then fellow of New College (1921) which he held through retirement.

He delivered the Bampton lectures (1934) in which he presented his basic understanding of the problem of History and Interpretation in the Gospels (1935), championing the form-critical method which had been developed among German scholars of the interwar period, and which he introduced into England, though mellowed by his own dependence upon F.C. Burkitt.* In 1935 he was named Ireland professor of exegesis of Holy Scripture at Oxford, receiving emeritus status 1949. In 1938 he published his study of Locality and Doctrine in the Gospels. He was editor of the Journal of Theological Studies from 1941 until his death. Among his mature studies were volumes on the gospels of Mark (1950) and John (published posthumously in 1956).

CLYDE CURRY SMITH

LIGUORI, ALPHONSUS (1696-1787). Roman Catholic moral theologian. Born of noble Neapolitan parents near Naples, he became a successful barrister, but retired from the profession following a crucial oversight in a case, and became a priest in 1726. His simple oratory stood in direct contrast with the pompous rhetoric of the day, and he became a mission preacher around Naples. In 1731 he founded the Congregation of the Redemptoristines for women, and in 1732 the Congregation of the Most Holy Redeemer (Redemptorists*) for men, communities particularly dedicated to mission work among the poor in rural areas.

His moral theology reacted against the gloomy rigorism prevalent under the influence of Jansenism,* which he attacked fiercely. His articles were later summarized in his Moral Theology. He eschewed equally the rigorism of Tutiorism and the possible laxity of Probabilism, maintaining a middle-of-the-road teaching to be identified as "Equiprobabilism." This view has gained the approbation of the Roman Church, although at the time it was bitterly attacked. Alphonsus can be considered the father of moral theology.

In 1762 he became bishop of St. Agatha of the Goths, a small diocese near Naples, but ill health caused him to submit in 1770 a resignation which Clement XIV would not accept. In 1775, however, Pius VI allowed him to retire. He remained major superior of his congregation and was involved in persistent controversy within his order and outside it. He was beatified in 1816 and canonized in 1839. In 1959 he was proposed as heavenly patron of confessors and moralists. He produced popular devotional and mystical writings, often on the themes of the Sacred Heart of Jesus and Mary as semi-divine mediatrix, and wrote many hymns. He also wrote apologetic and theological works.

See Lives by A. M. Tannoia (ET 4 vols., 1848-49) and A. Berthe (ET 2 vols., 1906).

HOWARD SAINSBURY

LIMBO. From a Teutonic word denoting the hem or border of a garment, limbo (or Limbus infantum) is the place between heaven and hell to which unbaptized babes are assigned at death. In the time of Augustine and for many centuries after, limbo was held to be a place of torture, but the torture was later replaced by natural bliss. The Jansenists in 1786 revived the torture theory, but Pius VI (1794) permitted Catholics to think that such children feel a pain of loss but not of the senses in the life to come. More liberal views (e.g., that unbaptized children may after all be saved) were first heard about 1900, but are still regarded as heterodox by most Catholics. In 1958 the Holy Office reiterated the urgent necessity for child baptism since the church still teaches the "absolute necessity of Baptism for eternal salvation." Fear that children might suffer in limbo led Catholic gynecologists to invent syringes so that baptism might be administered (under condition) before birth.

R.E.D. CLARK

LINCOLN, ABRAHAM (1809-1865). Sixteenth president of the United States. Raised on frontier farms, he was a self-educated lawyer who served in the Illinois legislature and the House of Representatives before becoming president in 1861. A Republican, he attracted support through his simplicity of manner, his defense of established authority, his fusion of farmers and industrialists, his equation of slavery's expansion with threats to Northern prosperity, and his recognition of the inferior condition of black Americans. His election prompted the lower South to secede, and his intransigence on secession, in turn, led the upper South to rebel and sparked civil war. Political and military concerns forced him into decisions many thought dictatorial, and guided him to interpret the war, which was initially to preserve the Union, as a crusade to free the slaves and finally as a national tragedy, a shedding of blood from which would come a new nation. Assassinated by a Southern sympathizer within days after his forces gained the victory, he epitomized the nation's ideals of self-reliance, opportunism, and churchless religion.

DARREL BIGHAM

LINCOLN, WILLIAM (1825-1888). English preacher. Born in East London in 1825, and converted at seventeen partly through reading Doddridge's Rise and Progress of Religion, he studied with missionary service in mind, but abandoned the plan owing to poor health. After further study at King's College, London, he was ordained in 1849. Following a curacy in Southwark he was appointed in 1859 to be minister of Beresford Chapel in Walworth, where his preaching was very popular. Even at this stage he was doubtful about his position in the Established Church, and he announced his intention to abandon it in 1862, shortly after which he published his Javelin of Phinehas, a lengthy condemnation of the union of church and state. Many of his congregation chose to stay with him, and as he had acquired the lease of the chapel he continued to minister there and encouraged congregational participation to such an extent that it was eventually regarded as a Brethren assembly. After his death a number of Brethren continued the ministry there.

TIMOTHY C.F. STUNT

LINDLEY, DANIEL (1801-1880). American missionary to South Africa. Born in W Pennsylvania and ordained a Presbyterian minister in 1832, he reached South Africa as an American Board missionary in 1835. A mission to the Matabele was abandoned after a Boer attack in 1837, and he joined colleagues among the Zulu in Natal. In 1840-46 he served as minister to the Boers (or Voortrekkers), believing that this would ultimately benefit the Zulu Mission. His devotion won their lasting regard. In 1847 he returned to mission work in the Inanda Location, NW of Durban, where he remained until retirement in 1873. The Inanda Girls' Seminary was opened in 1869. Lindley's attitude to tribal custom mellowed with the years, and he welcomed the ordination of native pastors in 1869, in which respect he proved more liberal than younger colleagues.

D.G.L. CRAGG

LINDSAY, THOMAS MARTIN (1843-1914). Scottish church historian. Born in Lanarkshire, he was educated at the universities of Glasgow and Edinburgh, and was ordained in the Free Church of Scotland* in 1869. Three years later he was appointed to the chair of church history at his church's Glasgow college, where he was later (1902) to become principal. Lindsay was a defender of W.R. Smith in the heresy trial (1877-81) that led to the latter's deposition. Among Lindsay's better-known works are Luther and the German Reformation (1900), and A History of the Reformation in Europe (2 vols., 1906-7). He made substantial contributions also to such projects as the Encyclopaedia Britannica and the Cambridge Modern History.

J.D. DOUGLAS

LINGARD, JOHN (1771-1851). English Roman Catholic historian. Member of an old Roman Catholic family, Lingard was trained at Douai, ordained priest in 1795, taught at Crook Hall seminary and later at Ushaw, and became parish priest of Hornby near Lancaster in 1811. A man of genial and kindly temperament, he produced between 1819 and 1830 an eight-volume History of England with the intention of disarming Protestant critics by his candor and scholarship. Many were, and still are, bemused by this approach, but his essential premise was long ago exposed by T.B. Macaulay: no Protestant opinion on any subject can possibly be correct. In 1836 he produced a new version of the four gospels which relied on the Greek rather than the Vulgate text. This novel approach, combined with the tenor of his historical writing and the well-known Gallicanism* of his youth aroused the wrath of the hierarchy and the Ultramontane party. IAN SELLERS

LINUS (first century). Beginning with Irenaeus and further documented by Eusebius, Linus is identified as the first appointed bishop of Rome "after the martyrdom of Paul and Peter" and taken to be the same as that one named in 2 Timothy 4:21 as companion in Rome with Paul. His term of office was put at twelve years terminating in the second of the emperor Titus—thus approximately 68-80. The language of this documentation would indicate him to be successor to "Paul and Peter."

LIPPI, FRA FILIPPO (c.1406-1469). Italian painter. He painted his commissioned pieces in the incomparable Florence contemporary with Fra Angelico, Masaccio, Donatello, and Ghiberti. His set pieces, molding together both Flemish detail and the current Italian, classic sense of bodies, were distinguished by a more pronounced linear movement—turning robes of the Madonna, birds in flight. The painting conventions he used (e.g., the Virgin Mary seated on a throne) seem somewhat at odds with items of everyday normalcy accompanying them, as if the self-conscious artist is no longer content working as a hireling within prescribed genres. One of Filippo Lippi's Renaissance students was Botticelli.* CALVIN SEERVELD

LIPSIUS, RICHARD ADELBERT (1830-1892). German Protestant theologian. Graduate of the University of Leipzig, after various appointments he became professor of systematic theology at Jena, where he wrote extensively on dogmatics and the history of early Christianity. His writing showed the influence, first, of Hegel, later of Kant and Schleiermacher. His mature thought was close to Ritschl.* He attempted to harmonize scientific principles and methods with those of religion. In this he was opposed by the Lutheran Church for an alleged theological liberalism. He found the basis of the harmonization he attempted in the unity of the personal ego, arguing that though one may come to an objective knowledge of the world through science, a real understanding of the world and, thus, of value required subjective experience. Through such experience, God is revealed as the ultimate unity. Lipsius was co-founder of the Evangelical Alliance and the Evangelical Protestant Missionary Union. MILLARD SCHERICH

LISZT, FRANZ (1811-1886). Hungarian composer and pianist. One of the most influential figures of the Romantic era in music, he is famed not only as a superlative pianist and composer, but as one of the great innovators of the nineteenth century. His interest and involvement in religious music is not so generally recognized. He wrote three large-scale settings of the Mass, two oratorios, and an assortment of other sacred works.

LITANY (Gr. = "supplication"). A form of alternating prayer in which the biddings or petitions are spoken (or sung) by the minister, and the people make the same response at short intervals, e.g., in: Kyrie eleison: "Lord, have mercy" "We beseech Thee, hear us." It may derive from the prayers and psalms of the synagogue, and it has analogies in pagan worship. The earliest known Christian litanies are found in fourth-century Antioch and from there spread through the Eastern Church. They play a prominent part in the worship of Eastern Christians today. In the Roman Catholic Church, litanies indicate special services such as Rogationtide processions. Here the invocation of Christ and the Holy Trinity is followed by that of numerous saints. The Litany of the Book of Common Prayer omits the invocations of saints. Appointed to be sung or said after Morning Prayer on Sundays, Wednesdays, and Fridays, it is used also at ordinations. HOWARD SAINSBURY

LITTLE LABYRINTH, THE. A lost third-century treatise directed against the Adoptianists—e.g., Theodotus, Artemon—assigned with some probability to Hippolytus of Rome. It was referred to by Theodoret, who ascribed it to Origen. Eusebius quoted two passages from it. There are grounds for thinking that a fragment may be preserved under the name Contra Noetum, in which Hippolytus expounds his rich and somewhat mystical doctrine of the Incarnation. It should be distinguished from The Labyrinth mentioned by Photius.

LITURGICAL MOVEMENT. There have been many liturgical movements in the history of the church, and the modern one had its immediate precursor in the revival of Roman Catholic Benedictine worship associated with Guéranger at Solesmes in nineteenth-century France. This stimulated scientific liturgical research and a concern for the correct performance of the liturgy. In the present century, this rather reactionary and limited movement in the Roman Catholic Church has been transformed into a powerful and remarkably ecumenical force through a revolution in theology. The rediscovery of the corporate nature of the church has resulted in a widespread attempt to restore to the laity a full and active participation in worship, in place of a solo performance by Catholic priest or Protestant minister. In the Roman Catholic Church this may be traced from the congress at Malines (1909), through the encyclical Mediator Dei (1947), to the constitution on the sacred liturgy of Vatican II* (1963) and the radical changes in the services which have followed. In England the modern movement did not appear until the 1930s, but since the war it has had a profound effect on the design of church buildings, and the adoption of a parish Communion as the main Sunday service, house meetings, and various attempts to integrate church services with daily life.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: E.B. Koenker, The Liturgical Renaissance in the Roman Catholic Church (1954); J.H. Srawley, The Liturgical Movement: its Origin and Growth (1954); A.R. Shands, The Liturgical Movement in the Local Church (1959; rev. 1965); M. Thurian, "The present aims of the Liturgical Movement" in Studia Liturgica, iii (1964), pp. 107-114. JOHN TILLER

LITURGY. From the Greek word leitourgia, which originally meant a public duty of any kind. In Jewish usage the word was specially applied to temple services (e.g., 2 Chr. 8:14, Septuagint). In the NT it is used for Christian service of God, though no distinction is made between worship and other kinds of service (Phil. 2:17). In English the word denotes a service of public, or corporate worship, and hence also a prescribed form used on such occasions, which may be a baptismal, eucharistic liturgy, etc. In churches with a liturgical tradition, however, the word on its own is normally understood to refer to the Eucharist. Services of daily prayer, and those (e.g., burial) which are less than full assemblies of the church, are referred to as "offices." JOHN TILLER

LIUDGER, see LUDGER

LIUTPRAND (c.920-c.972). Bishop and church historian. Of noble Lombard stock and educated at the court of Pavia, he was ordained deacon in that city. In 949 King Berengar II appointed him envoy to Constantinople. Subsequent disaffection with the king led him to the court of Emperor Otto I, who made him bishop of Cremona in 961. On Otto's behalf, Liutprand paid diplomatic visits to Rome and Constantinople, the latter to contract the marriage of the future Emperor Otto II with a Byzantine princess. Liutprand's reputation as a historian rests on three highly rhetorical though biased works. Antapodosis treats Italy, Rome, and Byzantium between 887 and 949. Historia Ottonis describes Otto I's vicissitudes with the papacy from 960-64. Relatio de legatione Constantinopolitana recounts Liutprand's second visit to Constantinople. JAMES DE JONG

LIVINGSTONE, DAVID (1813-1873). Scottish missionary and explorer. Born in Blantyre, he left school at ten years of age, worked incredibly long hours in the mill, but kept a book beside him while he worked. He attended evening classes and often studied until midnight. When he was about seventeen he experienced Christian conversion and dedicated his life to spreading the Gospel in other lands. He saved in order to study medicine and theology at Anderson's College, Glasgow, and heard God's call to go to Africa through Robert Moffat* who had labored there for twenty-three years under the London Missionary Society, and whose daughter Mary he was later to marry.

Arriving in 1841, he soon moved north from Kuruman into unexplored and unevangelized territory, thus beginning the travels which were to take him some 30,000 miles over the African continent.

His first great discovery was Lake Ngami (1849). Four years later he began "the greatest journey of exploration ever made by one man"—north from Cape Town to the Zambesi River, west to the Atlantic Ocean, then right across the continent to the Indian Ocean. In the course of it he discovered the falls on the Zambesi which he named after Queen Victoria. He went home in 1856 to find himself famous. In 1857 he published Missionary Travels and Researches in South Africa. He returned in 1858 as a consul to explore the Zambesi River and find whether it was navigable; the expedition was recalled in 1863. After a second trip home he planned to do something to expose and possibly end the Arab slave trade, and also to discover the sources of the Nile.

During his subsequent journeyings he dropped out of sight, and rumors reached home that he was dead. The New York Herald sent out H.M. Stanley to find him, and they met at Ujiji in November 1871. Stanley tried to persuade the doctor to return home, but he refused, convinced that God still had work for him to do. He died about the beginning of May 1873, and was subsequently buried in Westminster Abbey. Many came to do homage to one who was missionary, writer, poet, linguist, scientist, doctor, and geographer. Africa owes more to him than to any other. It has been said that he not only discovered Africa, but the African too. Largely due to his reports, it was not long before slavery was made illegal throughout the civilized world.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: H.M. Stanley, How I Found Livingstone (1872); W.G. Blaikie, Personal Life of Livingstone (1880 and numerous later editions); R. Coupland. Livingstone's Last Journey (1945); J.I. Macnair, Livingstone's Travels (1954); G. Seaver, David Livingstone: His Life and Letters (1957). J.W. MEIKLEJOHN

LLWYD, MORGAN (1619-59). Welsh Puritan author. Born at Cynfal in Merioneth, he was educated at Wrexham where he experienced conversion under the ministry of Walter Cradock (1610?-59), whom he then followed south to join the Puritan group centered on Brampton Bryan, Shropshire. Llwyd settled in Wrexham in 1647 after participating on the parliamentary side in the Civil Wars. He was an approver under the Propagation Act (1650) and joined the protest movement led by Vavasor Powell against Oliver Cromwell's Protectorate; but unlike Powell, he soon made his peace with the Protector and continued to minister at Wrexham until his death at forty years of age. There is a memorial to him at Rhos-ddu cemetery, where he was buried.

In his theology Llwyd veered toward the Quaker position, although for a time he adopted the views of the Fifth Monarchy Men*. He was much impressed by the thought of Jacob Boehme* and translated some pieces by him into Welsh. He expounded his views in a number of books and poems, but his little volume, Llyfr y Tri Aderyn ("The Three Birds") of 1653 is considered one of the prose classics of the Welsh. It expresses in memorable language Llwyd's concern for the spiritual life and his burning desire to see his countrymen embrace the Gospel. He left behind him a considerable amount of poetry. Two volumes of his works were published by the University of Wales in 1899 and 1908 while another substantial volume still remains in manuscript.

See G.F. Nuttall, The Welsh Saints, 1640-1660 (1957). R. TUDUR JONES

LOBSTEIN, PAUL (1850-1928). Protestant theologian. Born at Epinal in France, he was educated in the universities of Strasbourg, Tübingen, and Göttingen. From 1876 he taught at Göttingen as a professor of theology. Essentially a systematic theologian with a Ritschlian emphasis, he wrote mostly in French, but a few books were in German—e.g., his books on Calvin's ethics and Peter Ramus's theology, both published at Strasbourg (1877-78). His later studies were in historical theology and dogmatics: aspects of Calvin's thought, studies of the doctrines of God, the person and work of Christ, baptism, etc. Two of his major books, The Virgin Birth of Christ (1890) and An Introduction to Christian Dogmatics (1902), appeared in English translations. He is probably best known as an associate editor of the works of Calvin in the huge Corpus Reformatorum.

PETER TOON

LOCKE, JOHN (1632-1704). English philosopher. He was the first major British empiricist, conceiving his role as a philosopher as an "underlabourer" to the "natural philosophy" of the Royal Society. In An Essay Concerning Human Understanding (1690), Locke rejected the innate ideas of the Cambridge Platonists* and Descartes* and claimed that the mind is a tabula rasa; all knowledge is the product of ideas, which are in turn derived either from sense-experience or self-awareness. Knowledge of the external world is the product of the ideas of the qualities of things. Some of these qualities ("primary qualities" such as "solidity, extension, figure, motion or rest, and number") are in the world; others ("secondary qualities" such as sounds and colors), are in the perceiver. Primary qualities inhere in in-principle unknowable substances. Qualities must have substances, but it is impossible to say what these substances are. This doctrine of substance, together with the unclarity of Locke's central notion "idea," is damaging. In his writings, "idea" stands both for a quality of mind and for a quality of the external world. If the former, then (as Berkeley* showed) Locke is committed to a version of idealism or, at best, to the existence of a world forever veiled in the unknown. If the latter, Locke is committed to a naïve realism.

In religion Locke is known chiefly as the opponent of "enthusiasm" (in the Essay) and as the proponent of an undogmatic rationalism (in The Reasonableness of Christianity, 1695). These views paved the way for the Deism of the following century. Locke denied the deistic implications of his remarks on religion in the Essay, while in controversy with Edward Stillingfleet,* bishop of Worcester, but at the cost of some loss of consistency. It is undeniable that Deists such as Toland* appealed to Locke's "new way of ideas."

In his Second Treatise of Government (1690), Locke argued that a civil society, with true rights and liberties for its members, is produced out of a "state of nature" by means of a "contract" between participating individuals. He is noteworthy as an advocate of toleration, though this did not extend to Roman Catholics. PAUL HELM

LOEHE, JOHANNES KONRAD WILHELM (1808-1872). Born in Fuerth, Loehe attended the Gymnasium in Nuremburg and the universities of Erlangen and Berlin. He was ordained a Lutheran pastor on 25 July 1831. He served as vicar in Fuerth and in Kirchenlamitz before going to St. Giles in Nuremburg as second pastor and from there briefly to Altdorf, Gertholdsdorf, and Merkendorf before becoming pastor in Neuendettelsau in 1837 where he served the remainder of his life. He married Helene Andreae the same year; she died six years later. Loehe sponsored foreign missions. He was responsible for sending missionaries (Sendlinge) to North America. Some of them were instrumental in founding The Lutheran Church—Missouri Synod. After the break with the Missouri Synod (1853), some of Loehe's followers organized the Evangelical Lutheran Synod of Iowa. Loehe also supported mission work in New Guinea. He was a strong supporter of the Innere Mission* movement and founded a deaconess home in Neuendettelsau which was still in 1972 (a hundred years after his death) an important center. Loehe emphasized private confession and made significant contributions to liturgics. His Three Books About the Church was valuable for the discussions in Germany about the nature of the church. He published an Agenda, a book of church forms and order of services for Lutheran congregations. The periodical he issued, Kirchliche Mittheilungen aus und ueber Nord-Amerika, tells about the work of his missionaries in North America. Loehe was known as one of the foremost preachers of his time. He published books of sermons, devotional writings, treatise on liturgical practices, and the like.

CARL S. MEYER

LOGIA (Gr. "sayings"). The term generally used to denote the supposed collection of the sayings of Christ which circulated independently of the gospels in the early church. Some scholars have interpreted Papias's statement that "Matthew compiled the 'logia' in the Hebrew language" to mean that Matthew was responsible for the source "Q." The word "logia" is used also to describe the numerous sayings of Jesus discovered at Nag Hammadi* and Oxyrhynchus.*

LOGOS. The term is used in the NT and in Christian doctrine for Jesus Christ. It derives mainly from the prologue of the gospel of John. Logos meant both "word" and the thought or reason expressed in a word. Heraclitus (c. 500 B.C.) conceived it pantheistically as the universal reason penetrating everything, and the Stoics took it over and popularized it as the rational principle inhabiting and governing the universe. Under the influence of Plato's teaching on the eternal forms the idea of the Logos as an immanent power underwent development. It was thought of by Philo as an intermediary agent between God and the world. At the same time, other Jewish thinkers, working from the dynamic conception of the Word in Hebrew thought (Isa. 55:11; Ps. 33:6) and using Greek ideas, aimed at a very similar doctrine of the divine Wisdom (Prov. 8:22-31). Later Jews, writing in Greek, combined the two conceptions, using by preference the term "Logos" (Wisdom of Sol. 9:1f.), which is now personified (18:15). Philo took the significant step of making the Logos the intermediary between the transcendent God and the created order.

In the NT Paul calls Christ "the wisdom of God" (1 Cor. 1:24), "the firstborn over all creation," in whom "all things were created" (Col. 1:15ff.). John takes the further step of identifying Christ with the Logos of contemporary Greek and Jewish thought (1:1, 14). The identification is telling; but the fact that the term logos is not again used in the fourth gospel in the same sense raises questions as to its importance for the evangelist's doctrine of Christ. These questions are confirmed if the prologue of the gospel was not originally an integral part of the gospel and, moreover, if the evangelist used a hymn which may not have come originally from Christian sources. The extent to which the author of the fourth gospel was indebted to Greek and biblical thought is debated and raises questions which go far beyond his use of logos. In no doubt is the Christian stamp which John gives the term. Augustine, commenting on the statement that the Word was made flesh, declared, "This I never read of the Logos in the Neoplatonists" (Confessions 6:9).

See C.H. Dodd, The Interpretation of the Fourth Gospel (1958), pp. 263-85.

R.J. MC KELVEY

LOISY, ALFRED FIRMIN (1857-1940). Founder of Roman Catholic modernism in France. Born in Ambrières, he studied at Châlons-sur-Marne seminary (1874-79) and the Institut Catholique, Paris, under Louis Duchesne, remaining there as professor of Hebrew and exegesis (1884-93) until dismissed for his views on biblical inerrancy. Much shaken in his faith by 1886, he rejected all traditional dogmas and turned to pantheism. Excommunication came in 1908 when he publicly renounced his faith, as he had done his priestly functions in 1906. He was professor of the history of religions in the College de France (1909-30) and in the École des Hautes Études (1924-27). He never recanted his position, and died without reconciliation to the church.

His Choses Passées (1913) and Mémoires pour servir à l'Histoire religieuse de notre temps, 1860-1931 (1930-31) provide much autobiographical comment: the tortures of his thought, difficulties of conscience, and relationships with colleagues. The lack of intellectual honesty in the church disturbed him profoundly. In 1902 he published L'Évangile et l'Église in answer to Harnack's Wesen des Christentums (1900), holding that Christianity had developed in a way Christ had not prepared for. This was immediately condemned, as was Les Évangiles synoptiques (1908) and Le Quatrième Évangile (1903) which respectively defied authorized interpretation and John as author. Simples Réflexions was based on the decree Lamentabili and encyclical Pascendi (1907) as an attack on the authorities in Rome, while Naissance du christianisme (1933) sums up his final NT views. A student of biblical criticism with some extraordinary insights, he shifted too often in his views to have any permanently solid conclusions.

See A.R. Vidler, The Modernist Movement in the Roman Catholic Church (1934), and M.D. Petre, Alfred Loisy: His Religious Significance (1944).

C.G. THORNE, JR.

LOLLARDS. A term applied to the English followers of John Wycliffe.* Although the derivation of the word is not clear it seems to have meant "a mumbler" or "mutterer." The original group of Lollards was composed of Oxford scholars led by Nicholas of Hereford,* the translator of the first Lollard Bible. These students spread their ideas to Leicester, where laymen were won to the cause. From this center William Swinderby led preaching missions to nearby towns. Although the academic followers of Wycliffe's teachings were forced to recant, the movement continued among other classes under the leadership of John Purvey,* Wycliffe's secretary. By 1395 the Lollards had become an organized sect with specially ordained ministers, spokesmen in Parliament, and considerable strength among the middle and artisan classes.

Lollard beliefs are summarized in a document, the Twelve Conclusions, drawn up for presentation to the Parliament of 1395. This manifesto expressed disapproval of the hierarchy in the church, transubstantiation, clerical celibacy, the church's temporal power, prayers for the dead, pilgrimages, images, war, and art in the church. Though not mentioned in the Twelve Conclusions, the Lollards also felt that the main purpose of priests was to preach and that the Bible should be available in the vernacular for all believers. Due to persecution and the loss of the leadership of scholars such as Wycliffe, the movement came to include many strange extremists.

In 1401 Parliament passed a statute, De heretico comburendo ("On the Burning of a Heretic"), aimed specifically at Lollards. This law stated that a heretic convicted by the spiritual court who did not recant, or relapsed, should be turned over to the civil power and burned. Despite this legislation and the measures taken against them by Archbishop Thomas Arundel,* the Lollards remained strong and in 1410 found a leader in Sir John Oldcastle.* He succeeded in identifying Wycliffe's reform of the church with middle-class dissatisfaction with the wealth and conduct of the clergy. Arrested in 1413 for maintaining Lollard preachers and opinions, he was examined and condemned. However, he escaped imprisonment and organized a great Lollard march on London (1414). Henry V and his soldiers dispersed the group, but Oldcastle escaped once again. Later he was caught and hanged. The abortive uprising shattered the power of Lollardy and henceforth it existed as an underground movement. In 1431 another Lollard plot aimed at the overthrow of the government and the disendowment of the church was brought to light.

The continued popularity of the movement may be attested by the appearance of the Repressor of Overmuch Blaming of the Clergy (1455) by Reginald Pecock,* a strong attack on Lollard beliefs. There was a Lollard revival in the early sixteenth century in London, East Anglia, and the Chiltern hills. By 1530 this movement began to merge with Protestantism and amplified the undercurrents of dissent and anticlericalism that were present during the reign of Henry VIII. Lollardy facilitated the spread of Lutheranism, helped to make the king's anticlerical legislation popular with the people, and may have created the base for popular nonconformity.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: W.H. Summers, Our Lollard Ancestors (1904); J. Gairdner, Lollardy and the Reformation (1908); M. Deanesly, The Lollard Bible (1920); A.G. Dickens, Lollards and Protestants in the Diocese of York, 1509-1558 (1959).

ROBERT G. CLOUSE

LOMBARD, see PETER LOMBARD

LONGFELLOW, HENRY WADSWORTH (1807-1882). American poet. Born in Portland, Maine, and educated at Bowdoin College, he became the most popular American poet of his day. After study and travel abroad, he was appointed Smith professor of literature at Harvard University in 1836. His most popular longer works are Evangeline (1847), which aroused national interest for its narrative power; The Song of Hiawatha (1855), based on Indian legends and sometimes regarded as the American epic; and The Courtship of Miles Standish (1858), which popularized the legend of Plymouth Colony. Longfellow also wrote energetic ballads, beautifully reflective lyrics, and many sonnets, some of them among the best written by an American. The tragic death of his second wife Fanny in a fire in 1861 encouraged him to undertake as a source of solace one of his greatest works, a translation of the Divine Comedy. Longfellow's poetry reflects the optimistic sentiment and humanitarianism of the day. He was the first American poet to receive wide recognition abroad. There is a bust of him in Westminster Abbey's Poet's Corner.

PAUL M. BECHTEL

LOOFS, FRIEDRICH ARMIN (1858-1928). Lutheran theologian. Born at Hildersheim and educated at Tübingen under Harnack, at Göttingen under Ritschl, and at Leipzig, he became a devoted Ritschlian and was appointed professor of church history at Leipzig in 1886 and at Halle in 1888 where he remained until his death. He played a leading role in Lutheran affairs and became a member of the Saxon Consistory in 1910. He wrote several important monographs on the Fathers and the patristic period, of which Paulus von Samosata (1924) is probably the best known, and a notable work Guidelines to the Study of Dogma in 1890. A book severely critical of the materialistic philosophy of Haeckel was published in English in 1903; in 1913 there came a christological study, What is the truth about Jesus Christ? and in 1914 a series of lectures given in London entitled Nestorius and his place in the history of Christian Doctrine.

IAN SELLERS

LOPEZ, GREGORY (A-lou) (1615-1691). First Chinese bishop. Baptized by the Franciscan missionary Antonio de Santa Maria, A-lou studied in Manila, was admitted to the Dominican Order, and in 1656 became the first Chinese to be ordained. Accounts differ about subsequent events, but it seems clear that A-lou, who had assumed the name Gregory Lopez, shrank from ecclesiastical preferment and the offer of a titular bishopric. In 1690, however, a year before his death, he became bishop of Nanking. Thereafter no Chinese bishop was appointed until the twentieth century. Lopez had been involved in the renewed Chinese Rites Controversy,* and favored Matteo Ricci's* sympathetic attitude toward Confucian ritual.

LESLIE T. LYALL

LORD HIGH COMMISSIONER. The representative of the sovereign at the general assembly of the Church of Scotland. After the assembly has been constituted and has appointed its moderator, the Lord High Commissioner presents his commission in evidence that he is to be regarded as the royal representative. He is invited to address the assembly, which he customarily assures of the monarch's intention to maintain Presbyterian church government in Scotland. The Lord High Commissioner is not a member of assembly in his official capacity, but may be a member in his private capacity if he holds also a valid commission from a presbytery.

LORD OF MISRULE, see ABBOT OF UNREASON/MISRULE

LORD'S DAY, see SUNDAY

LORD'S PRAYER. The prayer which Jesus taught His disciples, recorded in different forms in Matthew 6:9-13 and Luke 11:1-4. The two versions are introduced differently. Matthew has, "This is how you should pray: ..." Luke has, "When you pray, say: ..." It may be that the prayer was given to His disciples in slightly different forms on two occasions. If, on the other hand, it is the same utterance of Jesus which has reached us in these two forms, most scholars would hold that Luke's version is nearer the original and that Matthew's is an expansion, perhaps in the form which it had already acquired in the worship of the church for which he wrote. The doxology, "For yours is the kingdom and the power and the glory forever," is found only in later MSS of Matthew, and may have been added by a scribe because he was used to saying the prayer with that ending.

The prayer contains much which can be paralleled from pre-Christian Jewish sources, but its originality lies in its compact arrangement and its emphasis on the Fatherhood and the reign of God. The address in Luke is simply "Father"; this would be Abba in Aramaic and is a characteristic way in which Jesus addressed God and taught His disciples to do so (cf. Rom. 8:15; Gal. 4:6). Matthew has the more explanatory "Our Father in heaven." The first three petitions deal with God's will and glory. Both gospels have "hallowed be your name." The name implies the character and nature of God which must be honored. The next petition is "your kingdom come," which may be primarily an eschatological prayer for God's final reign to be brought in, but which has present significance as well, as is shown in "your will be done, on earth as it is in heaven" (in Matthew only). The prayer then turns to human need. The petition for daily bread (Matthew "today," Luke "each day") may not be purely material in view of the picture of the messianic banquet and the symbolism of the Lord's Supper. The unusual word epiousion probably means "for tomorrow," which may have eschatological overtones. Next comes the request for the forgiveness of "debts" (Matthew) or "sins" (Luke) in the same measure as the petitioner forgives others. Finally there is a petition not to be led into "temptation," this being continued in Matthew with "but deliver us from evil" (or "the evil one"). The thought seems to be of the eschatological trial when faith might give way.

A vast amount of theology and devotion is packed into these few short phrases, and the Lord's Prayer (Lat. Paternoster from its first two words) has been used in instruction and worship in almost all sections of the Christian Church from the earliest times.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: F.H. Chase, The Lord's Prayer in the Early Church (1891); J. Jeremias, The Lord's Prayer (ET 1964); E. Lohmeyer, The Lord's Prayer (ET 1965); H. Thielicke, The Prayer that Spans the World (ET 1965). R.E. NIXON

LORD'S SUPPER, see COMMUNION, HOLY

LOSEE, WILLIAM (b. c.1764). A Methodist Episcopal Church itinerant preacher from the Lake Champlain area of New York, he organized the first Methodist circuit in Upper Canada. While visiting relatives in the Bay of Quinté area of Upper Canada he preached a number of sermons, and after a few months the people in the district urged him to ask the New York Conference for a permanent minister. Losee himself was sent, and he set up a circuit by 1791. In 1792 the first Methodist church in Upper Canada was built at Adolphustown, and in that year another preacher from New York joined Losee and the circuit was divided, with Kingston marking the boundary. Losee was only the first of a number of itinerant preachers who came to Canada as a result of the second great American frontier revival.

ROBERT WILSON

LOUIS I ("the Pious," also "the Weakhearted") (778-840). Frankish emperor from 814. King of Aquitaine in 781 and co-emperor in 813, Louis was the youngest and the sole surviving son of Charles the Great. In 817 he divided his empire among his three sons, Lothair, Pepin, and Louis. His later attempt to include a fourth son born in his second marriage (819) was thwarted by the other sons. Louis was greatly interested in missions and monastic reform. He wanted mission work to proceed apart from territorial conquest, and as a result he stimulated the creation of a large Scandinavian mission. Anskar* was his chief missionary. For leadership in monastic reform he turned to Benedict of Aniane.* In 815 Louis built a model abbey (Inden) for him near Aachen. In 816, 817, and 818 he gathered all the abbots of the empire to Aachen for meetings with Benedict. The council in 817 endorsed a set of interpretations of monastic rule, but this uniformity and reform were soon shattered by Scandinavian raiders. Louis's reform scheme was too advanced for his age; Benedict's early death left the abbeys without a visible leader. JOHN GROH

LOUIS IX (St. Louis) (1214-1270). King of France. Grandson of Philip II (Augustus) of the house of Capet he inherited the throne as a child (1226) and was long dominated by his mother, Blanche of Castille. His lifestyle was characterized by a devotion to justice that led the French to consider him the ideal Christian king. He dressed modestly, avoiding luxury and ostentation, was deeply pious and ascetic, and delighted in building churches and hospitals. Louis's axiom was when in doubt to favor others above himself, and the poor over the rich. An astute politician and administrator, he systematically extended royal control over the barons, the cities, and the church. He put down several noble rebellions, forbade the construction of private castles, appointed royal manors for the cities and inquisitors to keep watch over the baillis.

Louis's commitment to fairness even led him to negotiate a treaty with England unfavorable to himself because he felt that the lands had been unjustly gained by his predecessors. Although he attempted to establish peace in Europe, Louis was no pacifist, for he wished to free the resources of Christendom to make war on the infidel. In 1264 he launched the Seventh Crusade against Damietta in Egypt. The campaign was unsuccessful and Louis was captured, but later freed by the payment of a ransom. Later (1270) he led the Eighth Crusade directed against Tunis in North Africa, when he died of fever. The prestige of the medieval French monarchy reached its zenith under Louis, who was canonized in 1297.

ROBERT G. CLOUSE

LOUIS XIV (1638-1715). King of France. When he began his personal reign (1661), France was the strongest nation in Europe. Within the land, the nobility was subdued and forced to attend the king at his new palace of Versailles (the court moved there in 1682, although the buildings were not completed until 1710). The French administrative structure, the most highly developed in Europe, was centralized in the king. During the seventeenth century, French culture reached its highest point and was consciously and slavishly imitated by other lands. Louis's religious policy emphasized the autonomy of the French Church (Gallicanism*) and he persecuted the Jansenists with papal approval. He also issued the revocation of the Edict of Nantes* (1685) which rejected religious toleration in France and forced the Huguenots to convert to Roman Catholicism or else emigrate. Louis's foreign policy was based upon the desire to extend France to what was considered her natural boundaries. This led to the building of a large war machine and to four major wars. His reign can be divided into two parts at the year 1685. Until that time he was very successful, but in his last twenty-five years when the nations of Europe united against him, the resulting wars drained the strength of France.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: M. Ashley, Louis XIV and the Greatness of France (1946); W.H. Lewis, The Splendid Century (1953); W.F. Church (ed.), The Greatness of Louis XIV: Myth or Reality (1959); J.B. Wolf, Louis XIV (1968).

ROBERT G. CLOUSE

LOUIS (Luis) OF GRANADA (1504-1588). Spanish Dominican mystic, preacher, and writer. Born at Granada into the impoverished de Sarría family, he received schooling thanks to the aid of the marquis of Mondéjar and the Dominican priory of the Holy Cross, which he entered in 1524. He distinguished himself in studies and in 1529 was sent to the College of St. Gregory in Valladolid. Here he took the name "Louis of Granada" and was introduced to Christian humanism and perhaps mysticism. Louis was drawn to preaching and refused the offer of a professorship at Valladolid. About 1536 he was sent to restore the dilapidated monastery at Escala Coeli near Cordova. About 1548 he became prior at Badajoz, bringing him into contact with Portugal. A renowned preacher, in 1553 he became confessor for Queen Catherine of Portugal, in 1556 was elected provincial of his order for Portugal and spent the last three decades of his life there. His lasting contributions are his ascetical treatises On Prayer and Meditation (1544) and Sinners' Guide (1567), through which he decisively influenced, among others, Francis of Sales and Vincent de Paul.

BRIAN G. ARMSTRONG

LOURDES. A famous town on the Gave de Pau River in SW France. It gained fame in 1858 when a fourteen-year-old resident, Bernadette Subirous,* reported eighteen visions of the Virgin Mary between 11 February and 16 July. After the first vision, crowds began to accompany her to the grotto of Massabielle on the riverside, but only Bernadette saw the visions. In one of the visions she was instructed to dig for a spring, which gushed forth as she dug, and it now flows at the rate of 32,000 gallons a day. The spring water is used for sacramental baths by pilgrims. In other visions the Virgin told her that she, the Virgin, was the Immaculate Conception* and instructed Bernadette to have a chapel built and to encourage pilgrims to attend. Bernadette has since been beatified (1925) and canonized (1933) by the Roman Catholic Church.

After a period of opposition, the pilgrimage to Lourdes and the public cult of Our Lady of Lourdes were given official sanction. A Gothic church was constructed immediately, and the magnificent Rosary Basilica was added between 1883 and 1901. In 1891 Leo XIII approved an Office and a Mass of Lourdes for a local province, and Pius X extended it to the universal church in 1907. The pilgrimages reached a peak of six million in the centenary year of 1958, and they still continue at a yearly average of two million. Thousands of cures have been reported at Lourdes; after very careful check by the International Medical Commission in Paris, fifty-eight had been officially designated miracles by 1959.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: R.P. Cros, Historie de Notre Dame de Lourdes d'après les documents et les témoins (3 vols., 1925-27); D.C. Sharkey, After Bernadette (1945); R. Laurentin, Lourdes: Histoire authentique des apparitions de Lourdes (6 vols., 1961-66).

JOHN P. DEVER

LOVE, CHRISTOPHER (1618-1651). Presbyterian divine. Born in Wales and influenced in a Puritan direction by William Erbury, the Independent, he became a "poor scholar" at New Inn Hall, Oxford, graduating in 1639. Disapproving of Laudianism and prelacy, he would not accept episcopal ordination and so sought it from a Scottish presbytery, but without success. On his return he was imprisoned at Newcastle-on-Tyne for his extreme criticisms of the Book of Common Prayer. After his release he became a chaplain in the regiment of Colonel Venn within the army of Parliament in the Civil War. Eventually in 1645 he was ordained by a London presbytery in Aldermanbury Church. A zealous Presbyterian, he had little patience with the Independents and was accused in 1651 of plotting against the Commonwealth—the plot being commonly known as "Love's Plot." One charge against him was that he had corresponded with the young Charles Stuart and his mother, Henrietta Maria. He was condemned to death and executed on Tower Hill. In his lifetime he published several books, but his executors published many more after his death.

PETER TOON

LOVEJOY, ELIJAH PARISH (1802-1837). Presbyterian editor and abolitionist. Born at Albion, Maine, he graduated from Waterville College, taught school in Maine and Missouri, and was converted in 1832 through Presbyterian abolitionist preacher David Nelson. Lovejoy edited the Presbyterian weekly St. Louis Observer after attending Princeton Seminary and licensing by the Philadelphia Presbytery in 1833. Gradually adopting abolitionist views and staunchly defending freedom of speech, press, and petition, he became the focus of controversy in pro-slavery St. Louis where, in 1836, his establishment was assaulted because he denounced the lynching of a black man. Moving his press to free soil in Alton, Illinois, and protesting the 1836 Presbyterian general assembly's failure to endorse abolition petitions, Lovejoy made the Observer a principal abolitionist periodical with circulation reaching 1,700. Anti-abolitionists, however, unable to drive him from Alton, destroyed his first two presses and shot him to death to destroy a third he was protecting. D.E. PITZER

LOW COUNTRIES. The modern Netherlands and Belgium, the Low Countries, are roughly divided by the Rhine estuary. In Roman times the S Lowlands were a frontier province along the Rhine boundary. Christianity spread there during the third century, and Tongeren and Cambrai were centers of bishoprics (the Armenian St. Servatius, from the E regions of the far-flung empire, was bishop at Tongeren in mid-century). During the fourth century, imperial rule in the West crumbled, and there were only scattered survivals of Christianity in the S Lowlands, now under barbarian rule. The conversion of Clovis,* chief of the Franks, in 496 opened the way to the expansion of the faith; the Merovingian kings encouraged missions, and during the fifth and sixth centuries the S Lowlands were gradually converted (Vaast, Falco, Herebert, Lambert were among the better-known missionaries), the effort culminating in St. Amandus, the "Apostle to the Belgians," around 650. The region north of the Rhine, then known as Frisia, was a strong pagan kingdom, suspicious of Frankish expansion. Mission effort there came from the Anglo-Saxon Church. The isolated effort of Wilfred of York (678) was soon followed by the mission of Willibrord* (690), the "Apostle to the Frisians," who from 695 was bishop of Utrecht. His successor Boniface,* working with the expanding Frankish power, was martyred by the N Frisians (still independent) at Dokkum (754). Mission efforts by Willehad,* Lebuinus, Ludger,* and others, and the conquest of most of the independent Frisians by Charlemagne, completed the Christianization of the Lowlands by around 800.

The temporary stability furnished by Charlemagne's tribal "empire" was soon followed by the invasions of the pagan Northmen (Vikings), and much of the N Lowlands came under Viking control (Rorik, mid-800s). The Viking storm passed, and the Northmen too were converted. Feudalism emerged from the wreckage of the Carolingian state. The N Lowlands were part of the German feudal "empire" while the south was part of the kingdom of Frankland, or France. The cathedral school at Liège in the ninth century gained fame as the center of learning. In the north the bishop of Utrecht became an important political figure. By around 1050 feudalism had evolved into a system furnishing a relative degree of political stability, and the religious history of the Lowlands merged with the general religious history of feudal Europe. The S Lowlands became a center of commerce and industry; the counts of Flanders played important roles in the Crusades*; the Lowlands produced philosophers (Henry of Ghent,* Siger of Brabant*) and church reformers (Norbert* of Xanten) and in general took part in the religious life of the twelfth and thirteenth centuries.

By the 1300s medieval institutions were in disarray. The church suffered through the papal "Babylonian Captivity"* at Avignon, followed by the Great Schism.* Attempts at reform were many. The Lowlands produced a strong mystical movement (particularly Jan Van Ruysbroeck*), and the "new piety" associated with Gerard Groot* and the Brethren of the Common Life.* This movement, during the 1400s, stressed not only piety (Thomas à Kempis,* The Imitation of Christ) but also education; the young Erasmus* was among those trained at its schools. Meanwhile, theologians such as Wessel of Gansfort* and Cornelis Hoen worked out positions which in some ways anticipated Luther. Politically the Lowlands were to some extent united, under the dukes of Burgundy (Philip the Good, Charles the Bold); but towns and nobles alike strove to retain their feudal "liberties." The Burgundian heritage passed to the Hapsburgs, so that Charles V* (as well as being Luther's sovereign) ruled the Lowlands in the early 1500s.

The Lutheran "heresy" found fertile soil in the Low Countries. By the 1520s not only Lutheranism but Anabaptism found adherents. Dutch Anabaptist militants (John of Leyden*) took part in the Anabaptist "New Zion" at Münster: more significantly, Menno Simons* reorganized the peaceful wing of the movement. The "heretics" were sporadically persecuted under Charles V,* with the Anabaptists in particular suffering. In the next generation Calvinism spread rapidly and overshadowed other versions of Protestantism in both north and south. In 1555 the Spanish-born Philip II,* fervently Catholic, striving to centralize the administration of his domains, became the ruler of the Low Countries. The persecution of the Calvinists and other "heretics" was escalated; the Spanish attempts to ride roughshod over the cherished "feudal liberties" of towns and nobles aroused opposition; and by 1568 the Low Countries were in revolt under William of Orange. During the next forty years the fortunes of war changed many times. By the Twelve Year Truce of 1609, the north had gained its independence and become Protestant; the south remained Catholic and under Spanish rule. Renewal of the war (1621-48) did not change the situation.

During the seventeenth century the Netherlands (the N provinces) became a major European power. The Calvinists secured at the Synod of Dort* (1618-19) a victory for scholastic orthodoxy against the followers of Arminius*: The Remonstrants, who wished a Reformed church with a good deal of tolerance in matters of dogma, were expelled from the church. The great universities (e.g., Leyden, Utrecht) became internationally known centers of Calvinist learning, drawing students not only from the English Puritans,* but from all over Europe. But orthodoxy became increasingly defensive, and the church was soon factionalized by controversies over minor doctrinal matters (Voetius* against Cocceius*). In the "Spanish Netherlands," the S provinces, the Counter-Reformation made great strides, and the south became a center for Catholic orthodoxy. It, also, had its internal problems: Jansenism* spread to France, where Port-Royal became its headquarters and Pascal* its most famous defender. It eventually resulted in schism (1713: the Old Catholic Church* of Utrecht). For Catholicism, the N provinces were mission territory; the normal hierarchical organization was replaced by direct control from Rome, through vicar-generals or other special officials. In the north many remained Catholic, but the Reformed church was for all practical purposes the established church.

The "Enlightenment Era" of the 1700s found religion generally on the defensive against new currents of thought, secular in emphasis, stressing reason rather than divine revelation. In the Netherlands the Reformed church settled into what seemed to many to be a petrified orthodoxy, a bulwark of privilege, increasingly infiltrated as the century wore on by Deism.* The common people turned to an experiential Pietism,* while the educated classes lost interest in theology. In the S Lowlands, now under Austrian rule, the Catholic Church likewise took a defensive posture. No longer a center of intellectual development, it could no longer attract the ablest talents. Internally the main controversy of the era arose over the antipapal emphases of "Febronius" (J.N. von Hontheim*).

This era of religious torpidity was not to last. In 1789 the French Revolution broke out, soon to become a "European civil war." Revolutionary troops occupied the Lowlands in the 1790s, set up revolutionary regimes, and took away the privileges of Catholic priest (in the south) and Reformed minister (in the north). Napoleon, the "organizer of the Revolution," viewed religion as a useful ally and was willing (in return for support of revolutionary regimes) to grant recognition to existing religious bodies. After Napoleon's defeat at Waterloo in the S Lowlands (1815), the anti-Revolutionary allies planned to set up a strong state on the northern borders of France. The Lowlands were briefly again united, as a kingdom, under the Dutch leader William I.

Following Napoleon's general approach to religious matters, the king encountered problems. The Belgian Catholic hierarchy opposed his constitution as too liberal; the Belgian "Liberals" (who wanted a share in government for parliament) opposed it as being too conservative. Both groups, temporarily in uneasy alliance, opposed rule by the Dutch. Belgium became independent in 1830-31. The temporary allies soon fell out. The Belgian constitution of 1832 was, for the Catholic hierarchy, far too liberal, and Catholics consequently found it difficult to engage in politics. Agitation on the "school question"—state subsidies for religious schools—grew after mid-century, and (after Leo XIII, in 1879, approved participation in politics in a religiously neutral state) a Catholic political party emerged in the 1880s. It soon became the dominant party, held a majority until World War I, and pushed through legislation giving state aid to religious schools. The introduction of universal suffrage weakened its hold, but it remains a major party. Catholic trade unions and numerous other organizations were formed, making Belgium (like the Netherlands) in some ways a "split society," with religion playing an important role in social and economic life.

In the Netherlands the Reformed church was the major recognized religious body. Partly due to this state recognition, it was tolerant of dogmatic differences. A conservative-pietist wing emerged with the "Awakening" (Réveil) of the 1820s (Da Costa,* Groen Van Prinsterer et al.); in 1834 a small group of orthodox split off (the Afscheiding, or "Separation"). The main emphasis of the Reformed church as stressed by the "Groningen School"* at mid-century, was on way of life rather than on dogma. Thus the growing tensions between evangelical and modernist could be held in check. In 1886 A. Kuyper* led a second separation (the Doleantie: the two separatist groups soon united in the Gereformeerde Kerk, the second largest Protestant group in the Netherlands). Catholicism, meanwhile, had allied uneasily with the Liberals in politics. Both opposed the Reformed "establishment." In 1853 the Liberal leader Thorbecke arranged for the restoration of the traditional hierarchy in the Netherlands. But growing agitation on the "school question," among orthodox Calvinists as well as among Catholics, raised problems for the Liberals. Kuyper's charismatic leadership produced a "Monstrous Coalition" between Geneva and Rome in politics, and the coalition of Catholic and orthodox Calvinists parties gained political control from the Liberals and gained state support for religious schools. Catholic and orthodox Calvinist trade unions and other organizations were formed also, thus producing the "splintered society," or "plural society," of the present-day Netherlands.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: J.J. Altmeyer, Les Précurseurs de la réforme aux Pays-Bas (2 vols., 1886); P.H. Ditchfield, The Church in the Netherlands (1893); H. Pirenne, Histoire de Belgique (7 vols., 1902-32); T.M. Lindsay, A History of the Reformation, vol. II (1907); J.H. Mackay, Religious Thought in Holland during the Nineteenth Century (1911); E.C. Vanderlaan, Protestant Modernism in Holland (1924); E. de Moreau, Histoire de l'Église en Belgique (2 vols., 1940-48); A. Keller, Christian Europe Today (1942).

DIRK JELLEMA

LOYALISTS, see UNITED EMPIRE LOYALISTS

LOYOLA, see IGNATIUS LOYOLA

LUBBERTUS, SIBRANDUS (c.1556-1625). Calvinist theologian, best known as a Contra-Remonstrant* leader in the controversy leading up to the Synod of Dort.* Born at Langweer in East Friesland, Lubbertus studied at Wittenberg, Marburg, and Geneva, where he became an enthusiastic disciple of Beza. After stays in Basle and Heidelberg, he returned (now in his late twenties) to his home territory. He preached in Emden (1583), and at twenty-nine became a professor at the new university at Franeker. As a mature scholar he became increasingly alarmed by the teachings of Arminius* and engaged in active controversy against Vorstius,* Grotius,* and other leaders of the Arminian or "Remonstrant" (after the Remonstrance* of 1610) party. He was an ardent defender of orthodox (or scholastic) Calvinism, an able controversialist, a voluminous pamphleteer. The Remonstrant controversy became entangled with politics, increased in intensity, and led to the Synod of Dort; there Lubbertus, in his sixties, was a leading delegate, and took part in the deliberations which led to the condemnation of the Remonstrants and the triumph of the dogmatic Calvinism he had so long affirmed. He died soon after. DIRK JELLEMA

LUCAR, CYRIL (1572-1638). Patriarch of Constantinople and theologian. He knew much of Western ways, for he studied in Venice and Padua, could read and write Italian with ease, and served the Orthodox Church in Poland as rector of the Vilna Academy. This service in Poland transformed his outlook, for in controversies with the Roman Catholics he found allies in the Protestants. Appointed patriarch of Alexandria in 1602, he became patriarch of Constantinople in 1612. Although deposed several times by the Muslims, he continued as patriarch until his murder at the hands of the troops of Sultan Murad.

Lucar tried to bring the Orthodox Church closer to a Calvinist theological position. He entered into cordial relations with the archbishop of Canterbury and other important Protestant leaders. As a sign of this friendship he gave the Codex Alexandrinus to Thomas Roe, the English ambassador to Constantinople, who presented it to Charles I (it is now in the British Museum). He sent some of his ablest young priests to study at Oxford, Helmstedt, and Geneva. He also allowed his Confession of Faith to be printed in Geneva. This thoroughly Calvinist document taught that the church was subject to Scripture and could err; predestination to eternal life irrespective of good works; justification by faith; two sacraments; and a Reformed doctrine of the Eucharist. This statement caused a reaction in Europe. The confession's effect upon the Orthodox Church was limited, however, since it was repudiated shortly after Cyril's death. Finally, in 1672 the great Orthodox Synod of Jerusalem formally condemned the "error" of Protestantism.

See G.A. Hadjiantoniou, Protestant Patriarch (1961). ROBERT G. CLOUSE

LUCIANIC TEXT. A revision of the text of the Greek Bible by Lucian of Antioch (c.240-312), which became the standard text of the Eastern Church. It lies behind the so-called Syrian (Westcott and Hort) or Byzantine (=Koinē) text of the NT and is thus the ultimate authority for the Textus Receptus, which lies behind the AV (KJV) and other early Protestant translations. This text is characterized by smoothness of language, which is achieved by the removal of barbarisms, obscurities, and awkward grammatical constructions, and by the conflation of variant readings.

LUCIAN OF ANTIOCH (c.240-312). Teacher and martyr. Born at Samosata of distinguished parents, he completed his education at Antioch. Though for a time under the censure of the church because of his theological views, he became the head of the theological school at Antioch and there made his impression. As an exegete he encouraged a literalistic interpretation of Scripture, and so opposed the allegorical methods of Origen. He accepted the preexistence of Christ, but insisted that this had not been from all eternity. Many of his students, who included Arius and Eusebius of Nicomedia, came to occupy the most important sees in the East, and as fellow-disciples of Lucian were sympathetic to Arius. Lucian is often called the father of Arianism.* He produced a very distinguished revision of the Septuagint. The Second Creed of Antioch (341) is reputed to have been written by him and, though this is probably not so, he may have had some connection with it. He was martyred at Nicomedia. C. PETER WILLIAMS

LUCIAN OF SAMOSATA (c.125-c.190). Pagan satirist. Originally a lawyer in Antioch, he turned to that literary creativity in which he was unrivaled by any but Aristophanes. He became well known as a traveling lecturer through Greece, to Rome and beyond, and is a significant witness to human affairs in that urban society of the Greco-Roman world wherein Christianity found its place and began its growth. His satires penetrate into mystery cults, expose religious frauds, and reveal the skepticism of traditional modes of life and thought. Twice he pointed to Christianity, and while his view was that of an outsider, it cannot be said that he was the blasphemer which a later Christian age made him out to be. Christians, with Epicureans, are identified as opponents of the fraudulent prophet Alexander. In order to account for their victimization at the hands of the unscrupulous Peregrinus, he summarizes their behavior in a fashion not far from the Acts portrait of their communal life. CLYDE CURRY SMITH

LUCIFER (d.370/1). Bishop of Cagliari and strong opponent of Arianism.* He was one of the envoys of Pope Liberius to Emperor Constantius in 354, requesting a council to confirm adherence to the Nicene position and to settle the question of Athanasius. The council met at Milan (355) and there, with a few others, Lucifer fiercely resisted the emperor's wishes and refused to sign the condemnation of Athanasius. He was sent into exile, but had to be moved several times in an unsuccessful attempt to silence him. During this period he wrote five aggressive pamphlets to Constantius, revealing a dualistic concept of church and state and arguing that the emperor should be subordinate to the church. On his release, by Julius, he impetuously bypassed the deliberations of the Council of Alexandria (362) and traveled to Antioch to try to deal with the schism. There he consecrated Paulinus as bishop and thus effectively undermined the conciliatory plans of the council and its emissary to Antioch, Eusebius of Vercilli. Incensed by their compromise, he separated himself from them, and a small band of Luciferians sprang up. Lucifer returned to Sardinia and may have died excommunicate. His writings are also important because of the evidence they give as to the pre-Jerome biblical text. C. PETER WILLIAMS

LUDGER (Liudger) (c.744-809). Missionary to the Saxons. Born near Utrecht, he studied under Gregory (of Utrecht) before visiting England and studying under Alcuin at York.* In 775 he was sent to continue the missionary work of Lebuin at Deventer. Afterward he lived at Dockum and evangelized the Frieslanders. His work was not without opposition. Charlemagne sent him to preach to the Saxons of Westphalia, and about 803 he became bishop of Münster (Mimigernaford). Before this he had established a monastery in the same area. He died on a preaching tour and was buried in the Benedictine monastery at Werden.

LUDLOW, JOHN MALCOLM FORBES (1821-1911). Christian Socialist. Educated in France, where he was influenced by socialists and social Catholics, he came to London in 1838 to study law and was called to the bar in 1843. At Lincoln's Inn he came into contact with F.D. Maurice,* and from Paris during the 1848 Revolution he wrote his famous letter to Maurice, insisting that "the new Socialism must be Christianized." The Chartist fiasco of 1848 united him with Maurice and Charles Kingsley* into the Christian Socialist movement, but it was Ludlow who was the real leader and who supplied the social ideas—cooperative associations being one of his main contributions. With Maurice he edited the short-lived journal Politics for the People, and in 1850 edited alone a new journal Christian Socialist, which contained the first attempt to state coherently the Christian view of a socialist society. He had wide contacts with trades union and workers' leaders; he had a large part in the Industrial and Provident Societies Act (1852); and he conceived the scheme for the Working Men's College, which he and Maurice opened in 1854, and in which he taught for many years. Ludlow profoundly believed that religious as well as intellectual education must accompany political and industrial emancipation, and this led him to concentrate on educational work in later life, though in no way abandoning the official organs of Christian Socialism.*

See C.E. Raven, Christian Socialism (1920), and N.C. Masterman, John Malcolm Ludlow (1963). JOHN A. SIMPSON

LUDOLF OF SAXONY (c.1300-1378). Carthusian spiritual writer, author of the most widely read life of Christ written during the Middle Ages. Little is known of his life. He entered the Carthusian Order in 1340 and became prior at Coblenz in 1343. He retired to the charter house at Mainz in 1348 and died at Strasbourg thirty years later. He is best known for his book, The Life of our Lord Jesus Christ. It was first printed in 1474 and since that time has been translated into numerous languages and has had over sixty editions. The book was the most extensive life of Christ written until that time. It dealt with the events and teachings recorded in the gospels and included commentaries by church fathers and medieval writers as well as prayers and moral instructions. The work later influenced Ignatius Loyola, who utilized it in writing his Spiritual Exercises. Ludolf also wrote a commentary on the Psalms which was first printed in 1491.

RUDOLPH HEINZE

LUGO, see DE LUGO, JUAN

LUIS OF GRANADA, see LOUIS OF GRANADA

LUKE, GOSPEL OF, see SYNOPTIC GOSPELS

LUKE THE EVANGELIST. Luke, a physician and companion of Paul on his missionary journeys (Col. 4:14; Philem. 24; 2 Tim. 4:11), is generally though not universally agreed to have been the author of the third gospel and the Acts of the Apostles. It is widely thought that he joined the Pauline party where the "we" passages begin in Acts (16:10), and he remained as Paul's only companion at the end of the apostle's life (2 Tim. 4:11). Attempts have been made to identify him with either Lucius of Cyrene (Acts 13:1) or Lucius a kinsman of Paul at Corinth (Rom. 16:21). These were Jews, and Luke has usually been held to be a Gentile in view of the universalistic outlook of his gospel and his being distinguished from the circumcision party in Colossians 4:10-14. But the Jewish nature of the early chapters of the gospel has been stressed, as has been the emphasis Luke puts on Jerusalem.

Some have also challenged the view that "the circumcision party" in Colossians 4 refers to Jewish Christians as a whole, and have suggested that it means those Jewish Christians who were strict in the observance of the Law, but did not (like the Judaizers) try to force their practice upon others. If these views are correct, Luke may have been a Hellenistic Jew. He was not an eyewitness of the ministry (Luke 1:2), and is therefore unlikely to have been a member of the Seventy (Luke 10:1) or the companion of Cleopas on the road to Emmaus (Luke 24:18). The anti-Marcionite prologue to his gospel says he died unmarried in Boeotia, aged eighty-four. He is the patron saint of doctors. R.E. NIXON

LULL, RAYMOND (c. 1232-1316). Franciscan missionary, mystic, and scholar. From Palma (on Majorca in the Balearic Islands), he was educated as a knight and then converted from a life of dissipation (1263). Resolving to dedicate himself to winning Muslims to Christ, Lull learned Arabic. He also had a vision which revealed to him a method of approaching Muslims with the Christian message. Then he persuaded James II of Majorca to found a monastery at Miramir where Franciscans could study Arabic and the art in his method in order to prepare for missionary work among the Moslems. Lull taught at Miramir, Montpellier, and Paris. He took missionary journeys to Tunis and Algeria and tried unsuccessfully to enlist the rulers of Europe in his projects. The traditional account of his martyrdom in North Africa does not seem to be true; he probably died on Marjorca.

Lull was the first Christian theologian of the Middle Ages to use a language other than Latin for his major works. He wrote in Catalan and Arabic, in addition to Latin, and produced 290 books of which 240 survive. His writings center about his art, a method to demonstrate the unity of all truth. He attempted to work out a system by which all possible knowledge could be reduced to, or derived from, certain first principles. The art, he believed, would lead to a unification of the Greek and Latin churches and to the reunification of all mankind through Christianity. In addition to refuting Islamic teaching, Lull also struggled against the "Averroists" such as Siger of Brabant.*

BIBLIOGRAPHY: S.M. Zwemer, Raymond Lull, First Missionary to the Moslems (1902); E.A. Peers, Ramon Lull (1929); F.A. Yates, The Art of Memory (1966).

ROBERT G. CLOUSE

LULLY, JEAN-BAPTISTE (1632-1687). Italian composer. Of humble origin, he rose to a position of extraordinary influence at the court of Louis XIV. He was the virtual creator of French opera, successfully adapting recitative, which had been developed in Italy, to the French language. He also wrote lengthy motets for the royal chapel, in which he employed soloists, large choral forces, and orchestra. His followers, LaLande and Charpentier, wrote more extensively in the sacred categories, using his developments; the latter distinguished himself particularly in oratorio. Charles II of England sent Pelham Humfrey to study with Lully and apply his style to music for the English court. Thus the church music of the Restoration period was strongly influenced by French models, an influence which extended to the church music of Henry Purcell.*

J.B. MAC MILLAN

LUND CONFERENCE (1952). Conference of the "Faith and Order" commission of the World Council of Churches,* held at Lund, Sweden. There were 225 delegates from 114 churches; Roman Catholic observers were present. Documents issued following the 1937 Edinburgh Faith and Order conference formed the basis for study. Doctrinal differences of the churches were listed under the following heads: definition and limits of the church; church continuity and unity; the goal of the reunion movement; the number and nature of the sacraments and their relation to church membership; Scripture and tradition; priesthood and sacrifice. After stating the diverse views on these topics, the conference concluded that "comparative ecclesiology" (i.e., comparing and contrasting different convictions about the church) had been pursued to the limits and offered no prospect of reconciliation. "We need, therefore, to penetrate behind our divisions to a deeper and richer understanding of the mystery of the God-given union of Christ with His Church." The conference selected four major points for study for at least ten years: union of Christ and the church; tradition and traditions; ways of worship; institutionalism (the church as a sociological entity with its laws and customs).

See O.S. Tomkins (ed.), The Third World Conference on Faith and Order, Lund, 1952 (1953).

J.G.G. NORMAN

LUTHARDT, CRISTOPH ERNST (1823-1902). Lutheran scholar. Born at Maroldsweisack, he was educated at Erlangen and Berlin and became professor of systematic theology at Marburg in 1854 and at Leipzig in 1856. His Apologetic Lectures on Christianity (1864f.), Compendium of Dogma (1865), and Compendium of Religious Ethics (1896) reveal him as a conservative Lutheran scholar, and in translation brought him acknowledgment in the English-speaking world, where his Johannine studies were also popular. In 1864 he attacked the skeptical portraits of Jesus by Strauss and Renan, but during the next few years, when German unification was being accomplished, he as a loyal Saxon and president of the Leipzig Mission Society led the opposition to the Prussianization of the religious institutions of his kingdom. He helped found the General Evangelical-Lutheran Conference in 1868 and edited its Kirchenzeitung. He also edited the Zeitschrift für Kirchliche Wissenschaft (1879-89) and the Theologische Literaturblatt (1890-1902).

IAN SELLERS

LUTHER, MARTIN (1483-1546). Born in Eisleben, Luther attended the Ratsschule (city school) in Mansfeld, came under the influence of the Brethren of the Common Life* while in Magdeburg, and continued his preparatory training in the Georgenschule in Eisenach, where he was a member of the Cotta and Schalbe circle, before enrolling at the University of Leipzig (1501). At Leipzig Jodocus Trutvetter, a Nominalist (via moderna), seems to have influenced him most. Luther received his B.A. in 1502 and the M.A. in 1505. In July of that year Luther entered the chapter house of the Hermits of St. Augustine in Erfurt as a novice, due to a vow made in "a moment of terror," when thrown to the ground by a bolt of lightning during a thunderstorm. However, he was troubled about his salvation before this, and other incidents probably led to the decision to become a monk. In the monastery he pursued some theological studies and was ordained priest in 1507.

In 1508 Luther was transferred to the University of Wittenberg, where he earned the Baccalaureus Biblicus degree in 1509 and the doctor of theology degree in 1512. During these years he lectured on moral theology, the Sentences of Peter Lombard, and the Bible. Between November 1510 and March 1511 he was on a journey to Rome as a companion of a fellow friar on business for his order. With the doctor's degree Luther received the permanent appointment to the chair of lectura in Biblia at Wittenberg.

During these years before he became a doctor of theology, Luther was wrestling with the problem of his personal salvation. While in the monastery and as friar in Wittenberg he assiduously performed the required tasks and offices, frequently went to confession, and fulfilled the imposed penances. The problem of the dating of his "Tower Experience," when he came to a full realization of the meaning of justification by grace alone, has occupied numerous scholars and has not been fully solved. Some have placed it in 1514; others have put it as late as 1518. The continued study of Scripture, the influence of Augustine, the writings of John Tauler* and other mystics, the Psalterium Quintuplex of Jacques Lefèvre d'Étaples,* and the advice of his superior Johann Staupitz* were determinative probably in that order in clarifying his thoughts and convictions, and no one date or moment can be predicated. In 1518 his theology of the Cross was thoroughly Pauline, and Luther was the champion of sola fide (faith alone), sola gratia (grace alone), sola Scriptura (the Bible alone).

In his writings between 1516 and 1518 Luther evidences his Augustinianism. In Two Kinds of Righteousness (1518), Luther clearly speaks of Christ and His work from His birth to His death and resurrection as constituting the righteousness of believers; the promise is the assurance of faith for them. These thoughts are present in his lectures on the Psalms and on Hebrews (1518). By this time Luther had issued his famous protest against the scandals of the indulgence traffic, the Ninety-Five Theses* of 31 October 1517. The most noteworthy of these is number 62: "The true treasure of the church is the most holy Gospel of the glory and grace of God." His Explanations of the Ninety-Five Theses (1518) states, "The merits of Christ perform an alien work." The alien righteousness is the righteousness which he defines in his sermon on the Two Kinds of Righteousness as "the righteousness of another, instilled from without, the righteousness of Christ by which He justifies through faith."

The controversy brought about polemics from Rome, tracts and treatises, blunt and subtle attempts to silence him, a debate with Johann Eck* at Leipzig (1519), and an interview with Tommaso de Vio (Cardinal Cajetan*) in Augsburg (1519). In 1519 Charles V was elected emperor of the Holy Roman Empire and soon became aware of the magnitude of the religious problem in Germany, because of Luther's writings and the anticlericalism of the German people.

The year 1520 marked the appearance of some of Luther's most important reformatory writings. The Treatise on Good Works (May 1520) used the Decalogue as a basis for showing how faith is implemented in the life of the believer. In his Sermon on the Mass (April 1520) he taught that every Christian is a priest. On the Papacy at Rome (June 1520) branded the pope as "the real Anti-Christ of whom all the Scripture speaks." In The Address to the German Nobility (August 1520), Luther disallowed the authority of the pope over temporal rulers, denied that the pope was the final interpreter of Scripture, decried the corruption of the Curia, affirmed again the universal priesthood of the believers, and spelled out a program of the church reforms. Concerning the Babylonian Captivity of the Church (October 1520) reduced the number of sacraments from seven to two and aroused the ire of Henry VIII* of England. The Freedom of a Christian defended two propositions: "A Christian is a perfectly free lord of all, subject to none. A Christian is a perfectly dutiful servant of all, subject to all."

In April of the next year (1521) Luther stood before the emperor and the estates of the empire in the Diet of Worms,* declining to recant unless overcome by Scripture. Taken to Wartburg Castle by order of Frederick the Wise,* elector of Saxony, Luther had the opportunity to continue his writings and especially to translate the NT from Greek into German (the "September Testament" of 1522). The translation of the entire Bible was not completed until 1534, perhaps the greatest single achievement of the great Reformer.

Although condemned by the Edict of Worms and declared an outlaw, Luther returned to Wittenburg in March 1522 to cope with the Wittenburg Movement, braking its radical direction, assuring the essentially conservative character of his reformation. This conservative character is evident in Luther's revised Order of Mass and Communion (1523), the Order of Baptism (1523), and the German Mass and Order of Service (1526), collects and chants, orders for occasional services, a Litany, a German Te Deum and a Magnificat, and hymns for congregational singing. Among these Ein' feste Burg must be singled out. The conservative nature of the Lutheran Reformation was affirmed, too, by Luther's not depending on the knights, the humanists, or the peasants.

Luther's break with Erasmus* resulted from Erasmus's Diatribe on Free Will (1524). In his answer, The Bondage of the Will (1525), Luther affirmed that man cannot will to turn to God or play any part in the process leading to his own salvation. He granted that man has freedom regarding "things below him."

Luther's position in the Peasants' Revolts* (1524-25) upheld authority, denied the right to rebel, called for social justice, and urged consideration for the economic welfare of the lower classes. His language was intemperate in urging the princes to put down revolt, and alienated some of the lower class.

Between 1525 and 1529 Luther carried on a controversy with Ulrich Zwingli* of Zurich and others regarding the Lord's Supper. He took the words of institution, "This is my body" and "This is my blood," in a literal sense and opposed all attempts to interpret them figuratively. The Sacrament of the Body and Blood of Christ—Against the Fanatics (1526) and That These Words of Christ, "This is My Body," etc. Still Stand Firm Against the Fanatics (1527) define his position, often erroneously labeled consubstantiation. Philip of Hesse* attempted to bring about a reconciliation by calling the Colloquy of Marburg* (1529). Fourteen articles of the Christian faith were agreed on by the participants (Luther, Melanchthon,* Zwingli, Oecolampadius,* Bucer,* and others), but no agreement was reached on the fifteenth, regarding the Lord's Supper. However, in 1536 Bucer and Luther agreed on the Wittenberg Concord.*

Luther showed his concern for education by writing his appeal To the Councilmen of All Cities in Germany, that they Establish and Maintain Christian Schools (1524) and his Sermon on the Duty of Sending Children to School (1530). His preface to Melanchthon's Instructions for the Visitors of Parish Pastors in Electoral Saxony (1528) is evidence, not only of his churchmanship, but also of his genuine desire to foster schools. Both his "Large Catechism" (1529) and his "Small Catechism" (1529) came in response to the findings of the visitation. They are his efforts to raise the level of the understanding of Christian doctrine. His Small Catechism has been dubbed the "Layman's Bible." Moreover, Luther contributed to the revision of the theological curriculum of the University of Wittenberg; he was continually occupied in training pastors and preachers for the Lutheran churches; and he expended many efforts on behalf of non-German students who came to Wittenberg.

The history of Luther's life is not simply the history of the professor of Wittenberg. He was the leader of the movement of the professor that spread through much of Germany and the Scandinavian countries. Although he could not attend any of the diets of the Holy Roman Empire, because of the Edict of Worms, he was frequently consulted at his quarters in Castle Coburg during the Diet of Augsburg (1530). He prepared the Smalcald Articles* (1537) for the Smalcald League* in preparation for the council which was summoned, but did not meet, at Mantua. In 1535 his Lectures on Galatians were published; they are regarded by some scholars as his most profound theological treatise. In that year he began his Lectures on Genesis, which he completed ten years later, shortly before his death.

In 1525 Luther married Katharina von Bora, an ex-nun. His family life was a happy one. His home was a gathering place of friends and students, and the voluminous Table Talk was recorded by at least ten students between 1531 and 1544. Luther died in the town in which he was born (Eisleben) while on a mission to reconcile the princes of Anhaldt. His greatness can be gauged from the fact that during the four-hundred-plus years since his death, more books have been written about him than about any other figure in history, except Jesus of Nazareth.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: J. Besizing, Lutherbibliographie: Verzeichnis der gedruckten Schriften Martin Luthers bis zu dessen Tod (1966).

D. Martin Luthers Werke: Kritische Gesamt-Ausgabe (1883- ), known as the Weimar Ausgabe (WA) is still being published, and includes his letters, German Bible, and Table Talk. The most comprehensive English edition (55 vols., 1957- ) is still in production.

W. Pauck (ed.), Lectures on Romans (1961); T.G. Tappert (ed.), Luther: Letters of Spiritual Counsel (1955); J. Atkinson (ed.), Luther: Early Theological Works (1962); G. Rupp and P. Watson (eds.), Luther and Erasmus: Free Will and Salvation (1969); B.L. Woolf (ed.), Reformation Writings of Martin Luther (2 vols., 1952, 1956); P. Smith and C.M. Jacobs (eds.), Luther's Correspondence (2 vols., 1913, 1918).

Among biographies of Luther in English the following may be singled out: R. Bainton, Here I Stand (1950); E.G. Schwiebert, Luther and His Times (1950); U. Saarnivaara, Luther Discovers the Gospel (1951); H. Lilje, Luther Now (ET 1952); G. Rupp, The Righteousness of God (1953); R.H. Fife, The Revolt of Martin Luther (1957); H. Bornkamm, Luther's World of Thought (ET 1958); F. Lau, Luther (ET 1963); J.J. Pelikan, Obedient Rebels (1964); J.M. Todd, Martin Luther (1964); A.G. Dickens, Martin Luther and the Reformation (1967). CARL S. MEYER

LUTHERAN CHURCH BODIES IN THE USA. There were three major Lutheran churches in the USA as of 1974 and nine minor bodies.

(1) The Lutheran Church in America was organized in 1962, a merger of the Augustana Synod (founded in 1860), the American Evangelical Lutheran Church or the "Danish Evangelical Lutheran Church" (founded in 1878), the Suomi Synod or the Finnish Evangelical Lutheran Church (founded in 1890), and the United Lutheran Church in America (organized in 1918).

The United Lutheran Church was the largest and most influential of the church bodies that merged in 1962. Its roots go back to colonial America and the Pennsylvania Ministerium, formed in 1748 by H.M. Muhlenberg.* Lutherans settled early in New York, Delaware, New Jersey, Maryland, Virginia, the Carolinas, and Georgia (the Salzburgers). By 1820 some of these were organized into state synods; they federated in the General Synod in 1820. In 1867 the General Council was organized, made up in part of synods previously belonging to the General Synod. The General Synod South was composed of synods that had been formed in the South and had separated from the General Synod because of the slavery issue. These three groups (the General Synod, the General Synod South, and the General Council) united in 1918 to form the United Lutheran Church in America.

The Augustana Evangelical Lutheran Church in America was organized in 1860 among Scandinavian immigrants in America's Midwest. In 1870 the Norwegian constituents withdrew to form their own synod. The Augustana Synod expanded rapidly between 1871 and 1910. The period of Americanization followed between 1910 and 1930. The Augustana Synod was a charter member of the Lutheran World Federation and also of the American Lutheran Conference formed in 1930. The other two synods that formed the Lutheran Church in America were relatively small church bodies. In 1962 the United Lutheran Church numbered about 2,495,000 members; the Augustana Synod, 618,000; the Suomi Synod, 35,500; and the AELC, or Danish Synod, 24,000.

The Lutheran Church in America has a highly centralized administration. It has thirty-one constituent synods. In 1971 the LCA numbered about 3,229,000. Foreign missions, theological education, social ministry, and publications are the responsibility of the LCA as a whole, and not of its synods. Its theology has been within the framework of Lutheranism's tenets, but it has generally been regarded as more receptive to advanced theological thinking than the other two large church bodies within American Lutheranism.

(2) The American Lutheran Church is also the result of a merger of previously formed synods. Organized in 1960 it merged (the) American Lutheran Church, the Evangelical Lutheran Church, the Lutheran Free Church, and the United Evangelical Lutheran Church. The Lutheran Free Church was a small group of Norwegian Lutherans, the followers of Georg Sverdrup* and Sven Oftedal, organized in 1890. The United Evangelical Lutheran Church was a Danish group, organized in 1896. American Lutheran Church (as distinguished from The American Lutheran Church) was organized in 1930, the merger of the Buffalo synod (1818), the Iowa Synod (1854), and the Ohio Synod (1818). These were made up of German immigrants and Germans who had moved westward into the Ohio region in the "great crossing" of the early nineteenth century.

The Buffalo Synod, under the leadership of J.A.A. Grabau, held a "high church" view of the ministry. It early came into conflict with the Missouri Synod, a conflict which resulted in the breakaway of some of its members as a result of the Missouri-Buffalo Colloquy (1866). The Iowa Synod was organized under the leadership of Georg Grossmann and Johannes Deindoerfer as a result of the differences between the Missouri Synod leaders and Wilhelm Loehe.* It emphasized "open questions" in doctrinal formulations. Michael Reu was its outstanding leader in the twentieth century.

The Ohio Synod was organized partly because of the geographical barriers with the Lutherans in Pennsylvania under the leadership of Paul Henkel. In 1868 it reached an accord with the Missouri Synod and became a member of the Evangelical Lutheran Synodical Conference when organized in 1872. It severed its connections with that group in 1881 as a result of the Predestinarian Controversy. Its attempts to draw closer to the Iowa Synod culminated in 1930 with the formation of (The) American Lutheran Church.

The Evangelical Lutheran Church reaches back into the history of Norwegian immigrations and the formation of various Norwegian church associations in the nineteenth century. The Norwegian Synod (1853) was the largest of these. The 1890 merger of four Norwegian bodies resulted in the United Norwegian Lutheran Church in America. In 1917 the Norwegian Synod, the United Church, and the Hauge's Synod joined to form the Norwegian Lutheran Church in America, which changed its name to Evangelical Lutheran Church in 1946. Among the various Norwegian church bodies over the years the Norwegian Synod alone joined the Synodical Conference, of which it was a member from 1872 to 1883. In 1930 (the) American Lutheran Church and the Evangelical Lutheran Church joined with the Augustana Synod to form the American Lutheran Conference, which was dissolved in 1954. In 1971 the ALC numbered about 2,540,000 members.

(3) The Lutheran Church—Missouri Synod, organized in 1847, has assimilated other Lutheran synods, but has not merged with any large Lutheran bodies. Its founding fathers were made up of emmissaries sent over by Wilhelm Loehe as missionaries to the German Lutherans in America and followers of Martin Stephan who settled in Perry County and St. Louis, Missouri. C.F.W. Walther* was its first president and acknowledged theological leader until his death in 1887. The Evangelical Lutheran Synodical Conference (1872) united like-minded, confessional Lutheran synods into a loose federation, which existed until 1970. The Missouri Synod has been rigidly confessional in its theology, subscribing to the Lutheran Confessions because (not in so far as) they were in conformity with the Scriptures. In its church polity it has been congregational, the synod having only advisory jurisdiction over the congregations. Between 1910 and 1930 the process of Americanization produced a language transition from German to English and altered attitudes within the synod.

The Missouri Synod has supported a strong system of parish or parochial schools. It has maintained a system of preparatory schools for training future professional workers within the synod, two theological seminaries, and two teacher training institutions. Especially since 1894 it has been active in foreign missions and since World War II has been increasingly concerned about social questions. The "International Lutheran Hour," a radio ministry, has been under the sponsorship of the Lutheran Layman's League, an organization within the Missouri Synod. The Missouri Synod numbered about 2,877,000 members in 1971.

(4) Independent Lutheran church bodies in America in 1972 are the Wisconsin Evangelical Lutheran Synod (1853); the Evangelical Lutheran Synod of Canada; the Evangelical Lutheran Synod (1918); the Church of the Lutheran Confession; the Apostolic Lutheran Church (1961); the Church of the Lutheran Brethren; the Eielson Synod; the Association of Free Lutheran Congregations; the Fellowship of Authentic Lutherans (1971). The total number of Lutherans in the USA in 1971 was 8,872,000 members.

(5) The Lutheran Council in the USA was organized in 1967 as a federation of The Lutheran Church—Missouri Synod, The American Lutheran Church, the Lutheran Church in America, and the small Synod of Lutheran Churches which merged with the Missouri Synod in 1970. LCUSA continues the work of the National Lutheran Council, organized in 1918. The Lutheran Council has a theological commission to which all three members must belong for the purpose of carrying on theological discussions. Membership in its other commissions, e.g., publicity, armed services, student welfare, is voluntary. Public relations and welfare have been major concerns. However, the Lutheran Council has fostered dialogues with the Roman Catholic, the Presbyterian, and the Episcopalian churches. It operates independently of, but in coordination with, the Lutheran World Federation.

See J. Bodensieck (ed.), The Encyclopedia of the Lutheran Church (3 vols., 1965) as the best reference work for American Lutheranism.

CARL S. MEYER

LUTHERANISM. The system of religious beliefs ascribed to the followers of Martin Luther* is generally called "Lutheranism." The term may also be used in reference to the activities of the churches calling themselves "Lutheran." Both of these aspects are discussed in this article.

Lutheranism's doctrinal position is embodied in the Book of Concord* (1580), consisting of the three ecumenical creeds, the Augsburg Confession* and its Apology, Luther's Small and Large Catechisms, the Smalcald Articles,* and the Formula of Concord.* Justification by grace alone through faith in Jesus Christ is the primary doctrine accented by Lutheranism. Because of original sin man is in need of reconciliation with God. Reconciliation and the forgiveness of sins are the essence of justification; the righteousness of Christ is imputed to the believer who accepts it by the action of the Holy Spirit. It is not man's merit or works, but solely the grace of God that makes him justified before God. Sola gratia and sola fide are the phrases used to summarize this doctrine, most carefully explained in Article IV of the Apology of the Augsburg Confession. Good works are the fruit of faith. A good tree bears good fruit, Luther said, so a believer does good works. These good works, too, are the fruit of the Spirit. The believer, simul justus et peccator ("justified but still a sinner"), strives against evil and labors to do good. His spiritual life, according to Lutheran doctrine, is endangered and sustained by the means of grace. These are baptism, the Word, and the Lord's Supper.

The Word of God in Lutheranism is often equated with the canonical writings of the Old and New Testaments. These have been given by divine inspiration and therefore are authentic, reliable, and able to accomplish their divine purposes. Their purpose is, first of all, "to make wise unto salvation through faith which is in Christ Jesus." They are also meant, according to Lutheranism, to instruct men in questions of morality, to comfort him in tribulation, to refute those who repudiate the Christian religion, and to teach divine doctrine. By the Word the Holy Spirit calls men, enlightens and instructs them, sanctifies them, and gathers them into His church. The Scriptures are the sole source, rule, and norm of faith, sola Scriptura.

The sacraments—baptism and the Lord's Supper— are more than cultic rites. Baptism is regarded as the water of regeneration, a means by which the new birth is effected, especially in infants. The Lord's Supper is not a mere memorial meal, but was instituted by Christ for the forgiveness of sins, the strengthening of faith, and as an expression of union with Him and with fellow believers. In the bread and wine of the Holy Supper the body and blood of Christ Himself are present, Lutherans teach. They believe in the Real Presence (not to be termed "consubstantiation").

Lutheran theology is strongly christocentric. The message of Christ's redemptive act is the central message of the Scripture; being reborn in Christ and rising to newness of life are the essence of baptism; Communion with Christ and partaking of His body and blood are the essential of the sacrament of the altar. Solus Christus is the heart of Lutheran theology.

Lutheranism emphasizes the differences between Law and Gospel. The Law condemns; the Gospel saves. The Law terrorizes; the Gospel comforts. The Law reveals God's wrath; the Gospel reveals God's grace. Regarding predestination, Lutheranism teaches that God has elected certain men for salvation in Christ Jesus before the beginning of the world. This doctrine is given for the believer's comfort, to assure him of his salvation. Lutheranism does not teach an election to reprobation.

Christ Jesus, in Lutheran theology, is true God and true man. With the Father and Holy Spirit He is a member of the Holy Trinity, of the one Godhead. He became incarnate, born of the Virgin Mary, in order to fulfill the law, suffer, die, and rise again for the atonement of mankind. In him the two natures, the human and the divine, are united in one Person. This union is true and real, a personal one, and a perpetually enduring one. Lutheranism adheres to the formula of the Council of Chalcedon*: "We confess one and the same Jesus Christ, the Son and Lord only-begotten, in two natures, without mixture, change, division, or separation."

To Him is given the Headship of the church. The church is made up of all those, but only those, who trust in Christ Jesus as their Savior, Redeemer, and Mediator. They have entered into a saving fellowship with Christ. The church is holy, because its members are sanctified by the Holy Spirit. It is one, because it has one Lord and is united to Him; it is apostolic, because it is founded on the proclamation of the apostles, the gospel of Christ; it is catholic, or universal, because it is not restricted to one people, nation, or time. Lutheranism, too, speaks of the church invisible and the church visible. The church invisible is not discernible in a structure; the church visible is made up a structure. The marks of the true church, according to Lutheranism, are the pure preaching of the Word of God and the correct administration of the sacraments according to Christ's institution.

Lutherans do not insist on a uniform church polity. Some of the Lutheran churches are episcopal in character; some are congregational; others tend toward a presbyterial form of organization. Some are supported by the state; others are free churches or voluntary ecclesiastical societies. In its worship services Lutheranism tends to be ritualistic. Luther's "conservative reformation" retained much of the liturgy of the Western Catholic Church. There are Lutheran churches in the twentieth century, however, that have plain orders of service. The rites and ceremonies are regarded as adiaphora ("things indifferent") so long as the Gospel is not vitiated or nullified by them. The holy ministry has been instituted by Christ. Ordination is a good ecclesiastical custom, stemming from the ancient church, but not absolutely necessary. Believers in Christ are a royal priesthood.

The largest concentration of Lutherans is found in Germany and Scandinavia. In the USA, Lutheran membership was 8,872,000 in 1971. Lutheranism is found in Africa, South and Central America, Canada, Japan, India, Korea, the USSR, and possibly even in China. The largest of the territorial churches in Germany is the Evangelical Lutheran Church of Hanover, with approximately 4,000,000 members. The Evangelical Lutheran Church of Saxony numbers 3,600,000 members. In Württemberg, Schleswig-Holstein, and Bavaria there are 2,500,000 Lutherans each; in Mecklenburg and Thuringia, a million Lutherans each. The Scandinavian countries are almost entirely Lutheran. The Evangelical Lutheran Church in Denmark numbers 4,300,000 members; that in Finland, 4,375,000 members. The Church of Norway is somewhat smaller, numbering about 3,500,000 members. The Church of Sweden is the largest of the Lutheran Scandinavian churches with 7,000,000 members.

The Lutheran World Federation is the ecumenical voice of Lutheranism. It was organized at Lund, Sweden, in 1947, having been preceded by four Lutheran World Conventions (Eisenach, 1923; Copenhagen, 1929; Paris, 1935; Lund, 1947). Assemblies of the Lutheran World Federation have been held in Hanover (1952), Minneapolis (1957), Helsinki (1963), and Evian, France (1970). The constitution of the LWF gives its doctrinal basis in Article II: "The Lutheran World Federation acknowledges the Holy Scriptures of the Old and New Testaments as the only source and the infallible norm of all church doctrine and practice, and sees in the three Ecumenical Creeds and in the Confessions of the Lutheran Church, especially in the Unaltered Augsburg Confession and Luther's Small Catechism, a pure exposition of the Word of God."

The functions of the Federation are to further a united witness to the gospel of Jesus Christ; to cultivate unity among the Lutherans of the world; to foster Lutheran participation in ecumenical movements; to provide a channel for meeting the physical needs of the destitute; most importantly, to "support Lutheran Churches and groups as they endeavor to meet the spiritual needs of other Lutherans and to extend the Gospel." The Lutheran World Federation consists of an assembly which meets normally every six years, an executive committee which meets annually, national committees, and commissions. Its headquarters are at Geneva, Switzerland. There, too, the executive staff, headed by a general secretary, is located.

The department of theology of the LWF has made some basic studies into the problems facing Lutheranism in the twentieth century. Its studies have centered on the unity of the church, freedom and unity in Christ, justification, and the church and her confessions. The Lutheran World is a quarterly journal published by the LWF.

Lutheran doctrine, polity, church structures, and federations cannot be treated as completely united. Even in doctrine Lutherans are not totally at one. Some Lutherans and Lutheran church bodies have been influenced greatly by modern biblical criticism in recent decades and have repudiated strongly held Lutheran beliefs. In the age of the Reformation there were the so-called Crypto-Calvinists, Lutherans who held to the Calvinistic doctrines of the Lord's Supper. In the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries Pietism* gained a strong foothold in Lutheranism, both in Germany and in Scandinavian countries. Rationalism muffled Lutheranism's doctrinal accents, which were heard again only as a result of the revival of Lutheran Confessionalism in the nineteenth century. Lutheranism in North America, in general, has been more conservative than European Lutheranism.

Lutheranism's involvement in the questions of society and social welfare have varied from time to time and country to country. Lutheranism did not fail to emphasize the need to "love thy neighbor as thyself" and to be helpful in meeting his bodily needs. Due to the state control practiced by the Lutheran countries of Europe, this was often made a matter for the state rather than the church. In North America, Lutheran quietism resulted in a "hands off" policy in political and societal problems that persisted into the twentieth century.

Lutheranism's contributions to music, literature, the arts, and sciences cannot be recounted here. Its contributions are not confined to the "Lutheran" countries, but are evident in many parts of the world. Lutheranism's outreach has been an extensive one in the nineteenth and twentieth centuries, and its influence pervasive. Lutheranism has emphasized the educational aspects of the church's total task.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: H. Schmid, The Doctrinal Theology of the Evangelical Lutheran Church (ET 1899; rep. 1961); E.L. Lueker (ed.), The Lutheran Cyclopedia (1954); C. Lund-Quist (ed.), Lutheran Churches of the World (1957); T.G. Tappert (ed.), The Book of Concord (1959); J. Bodensieck (ed.), The Encylcopedia of the Lutheran Church (3 vols., 1965). CARL S. MEYER

LUTHERAN WORLD FEDERATION, see LUTHERANISM

LUX MUNDI. The title of a book containing "A Series of Studies in the Religion of the Incarnation," edited by Charles Gore,* bishop of Oxford, published in 1889. Dissatisfied with the superficial level of the Anglo-Catholic movement during the latter half of the nineteenth century, the contributors to this volume pressed for a more liberal and socially informed Catholicism in the Church of England. Bishop Gore, in his preface, maintained that the old faith and the new scientific hermeneutics were not necessarily incompatible; changing times, he said, required "new points of view." Nevertheless, these Oxford essays were violently attacked by the conservative members of the Church of England and assailed publicly in Convocation. H. CROSBY ENGLIZIAN

LYNE, JOSEPH LEYCESTER (1837-1908). Religious community leader. As "Father Ignatius" he revived Benedictine monasticism in the Church of England. Ordained deacon in 1860, he started communities at Claydon (1863) and Norwich (1864). In 1870 he began building a monastery at Capel-y-ffin, near Llanthony. As abbot he adapted the Benedictine Rule, although perforce remaining a deacon until irregularly ordained priest in 1898 by an Episcopus vagans, Mar-Timotheus. He was often away on missions and in fund-raising, including an extended visit to America (1890-91). During these times the life of the abbey became unsettled. Despite his ritualism, his theology was soundly evangelical after his conversion in 1866. He rejected penance and purgatory as detracting from Christ's finished work. Evangelical hymnbooks often include his hymn, "Let me come closer to Thee, Jesus." Crowds flocked to his simple preaching of Christ as Savior. Gladstone put him among the first of contemporary orators. In Wales he was admitted to the gorsedd of the bards. J. STAFFORD WRIGHT

LYONS, COUNCILS OF. Two general church councils were held at Lyons. The First Council of Lyons, or Thirteenth Ecumenical Council, met in 1245 and held three sessions. It was summoned by Innocent IV, who told the assembled prelates that five problems tormented him: the sins of the priests; the loss of Jerusalem; the dangerous situation in the Byzantine Empire; the Mongol attacks on Europe; and Emperor Frederick II's* persecution of the church and pope. Although the council recommended a new crusade, nothing actually happened. Its main concern was with the dispute between Frederick II and the pope, a conflict which had its origins in Gregory IX's* excommunication of Frederick because he had not gone on crusade as promised. Frederick naturally forbade the imperial prelates to attend the council and blocked the routes to Lyons, and only 150 bishops, mainly French and Spanish, participated. The formal deposition was announced on the grounds of perjury, sacrilege, heresy, and felony, and the Franciscans and Dominicans were deputed to promulgate the decision throughout Europe.

The Second Council of Lyons, or Fourteenth Ecumenical Council, met in 1274. It held six sessions and voted seventeen canons. Some 1,600 ecclesiastics attended, including 500 bishops. Its convener, Gregory X,* wanted to organize a general crusade, but only one king came—and he soon left, convinced like many other European rulers that Gregory's plans were impractical in the current political climate. Gregory's efforts to obtain general peace in Europe, an obvious precondition for a crusade, were not entirely successful either. All he really achieved was a six-year tithe for financing such a future crusade. The council also strove for reunion between the Roman and Byzantine churches. Agreement would reopen a crusading route across Anatolia, guarantee the Eastern emperor Michael VIII against attack from Charles of Anjou, and make possible joint action against the Saracens. The council also decreed that in future, on the deaths of popes, the cardinals were to wait only ten days for absent colleagues before going into conclave, and in an effort to avoid long interregnums, they were to receive no salaries or emoluments until after the election. Further, the council suppressed a number of recent Mendicant orders, but specially commended the Franciscans and Dominicans.

L. FEEHAN

LYRA, NICOLAUS DE, see NICHOLAS OF LYRA

LYTE, HENRY FRANCIS (1793-1847). Born near Kelso in Scotland, he was educated at Enniskillen and Trinity College, Dublin, where he three times won the prize for an English poem. In 1815 he became curate at Taghmon, near Wexford. In 1817 he moved to Marazion, Cornwall, where he underwent a great spiritual change after attending a friend's deathbed. His whole outlook was altered, and his preaching revitalized. After various curacies he went as perpetual curate to Lower Brixham, Devon, in 1823 and remained until his delicate health broke down. He died at Nice. His main works were Tales on the Lord's Prayer in Verse (1826); Poems, chiefly Religious (1833; 2nd ed., 1845); The Spirit of the Psalms (1834), consisting of paraphrases, e.g., "God of mercy, God of grace," and "Pleasant are Thy courts above"; also an edition of The Poems of Henry Vaughan (1846). Among his many hymns were "Abide with me," and "Praise, my soul, the King of Heaven." JOHN S. ANDREWS

M

MABILLE, ADOLPHE (1836-1894). Swiss missionary to South Africa. Born in Switzerland, he went to Lesotho in 1860 with the Paris Evangelical Mission. Apart from enforced absences and an expedition to the E Transvaal in 1873, he spent his entire ministry at Morija, where he operated a printing press and established normal, Bible, and theological schools. He initiated a local synod but aroused resentment by his negative attitude to tribal custom. He was the trusted adviser of Chief Moshweshwe and his successor Letsie. The British annexation of Lesotho in 1868, which prevented Boer domination, owed much to his advocacy. When the Cape Colony, which took over the administration, tried to disarm the Basuto in 1879, Mabille opposed the measure but vainly urged the chiefs to obey. During the subsequent rebellion he presented the Basuto case in England and helped to obtain the transfer of Lesotho to direct British rule in 1884.

D.G.L. CRAGG

MACARIUS (d.333). Bishop of Jerusalem from c.313. He was probably the Macarius whom the heretical Arius labeled an "uneducated heretic" in his letter to Eusebius of Nicomedia, since we have the tradition from several sources that Macarius attended the Council of Nicea (325) and may have actively debated the Arians and helped draft the Creed. Further, his differences with his metropolitan, Eusebius of Caesarea,* the church historian, stemmed from the latter's soft stand against Arianism,* though a more basic cause was Macarius's attitude that Jerusalem, birthplace of Christianity, ought not to be subordinate to Caesarea, provincial capital. Indeed Jerusalem later became a patriarchate. Constantine's letter assigning construction of the Church of the Holy Sepulchre to Macarius is extant in Eusebius. The church complex, enormous with porticoed courtyard and sumptuous in gold coffered ceilings and marble from all parts of the empire, took nearly ten years to build. Macarius may also have helped identify the true cross discovered by St. Helena.

DANIEL C. SCAVONE

MACARIUS MAGNES (fourth/fifth century). Christian apologist. Nothing is known for certain of his life. Some have identified him with the bishop of Magnesia who accused Heraclides at the Synod of the Oak* (403). He was the author of the Apocriticus, in which the objections formulated against the Christian message by a learned Neoplatonist (possibly Porphyry) were attacked. In the ninth century the treatise was used by the Iconoclasts in defense of their doctrines. It was quoted by Francisco Torres in the sixteenth century from a copy then in the Marciana Library, Venice, but later this was lost. In 1867 a defective MS was found at Athens, but this also is missing. There do survive fragments of a spurious series of Homilies on Genesis which have been ascribed to him.

J.G.G. NORMAN

MACARIUS OF ALEXANDRIA (c.320-c.404). Desert Father. He is also surnamed "Politicus" (i.e. "of the city") or "Junior" to distinguish him from Macarius of Egypt, his older contemporary and rival in asceticism, prophecy, and healing, with whom he was banished to a Nilotic island by Lucius, Arian patriarch of Alexandria, during Valens's persecution of orthodoxy (364-78). An extant monastic rule containing thirty regulations for his 5,000 monks of the Nitrian desert and a sermon on the eschatology of souls are among the writings ascribed to him.

MACARIUS OF EGYPT (d. c.390). Ascetic writer. Also called "the Elder" or "the Great," he was a native of Upper Egypt and lived for some sixty years in the wilderness of Scete, the center of Egyptian monasticism. He gained a reputation as an ascetic and therefore became a highly respected holy man. Palladius and Rufinus give accounts of him, although without mentioning that he was a writer. From the sixteenth century, however, he has been credited as the author of fifty homilies. These are of great importance in mystical theology, and scholars point out that they have similarities to the Messalian* heresy. It is possible these writings were by an anonymous writer who was called "blessed" (makarios). Seven further homilies were discovered in 1918, but it is not now considered that these can be attributed to Macarius.

C. PETER WILLIAMS

MACARIUS OF MOSCOW (1810-1882). Metropolitan of Moscow. Educated at the seminary at Kursk, then at Kiev, he became a leading theologian in the Russian Orthodox Church, holding the professorship of dogmatic theology at the Academy of St. Petersburg. In 1857 he was made bishop of Tamlov, and in 1879 metropolitan of Moscow. In this position he became an authority on the official theology of the Roman Catholic Church. His best-known works are his Introduction à la Théologie dogmatique orthodoxe (1845), Théologie dogmatique orthodoxe (5 vols., 1845-53), and History of the Russian Church (12 vols., 1857-82).

MACAULAY, ZACHARY (1768-1838). Evangelical leader. Son of a Scots Presbyterian minister, he went to Jamaica at the age of sixteen as a bookkeeper on an estate which used slave labor. Deeply impressed with the evils of slavery, he returned to England in 1792 and became a member of the Sierra Leone Company. From 1793 to 1799 he was governor of the colony and ruined his health with overwork. Thereafter he was secretary of the company till the colony was transferred to the Crown in 1808, and editor of the Christian Observer (1802-16). He resided in Clapham with other prominent evangelicals and played a leading role in the abolition of the slave trade in 1807 and in the renewal of the antislavery agitation in 1823. He took a great part also in the affairs of the Bible Society and the Church Missionary Society. He failed in business in 1823 and was thereafter dogged by ill-health till his death. His son was Thomas Babington Macaulay, historian and essayist.

IAN SELLERS

M'CHEYNE, ROBERT MURRAY (1813-1843). Church of Scotland minister. Educated at Edinburgh University, he was moved by the death of an elder brother to seek "a brother who cannot die." In 1836 he was ordained to the charge of St. Peter's, Dundee, where the fruitfulness of his ministry and his own spiritual growth were the outcome of a strict daily program of Bible study, prayer, meditation, visiting his people, and preparation of sermons—and all this despite frequent illness. His missionary interest involved a visit to Europe and Palestine in 1839 to study the possibility of a mission to the Jews—the beginning of a notable Church of Scotland work. Few ministers have so greatly influenced their own and succeeding generations in so short a life. He became known as a preacher throughout Scotland and even more widely known through Andrew Bonar's Memoir and Remains of Robert Murray McCheyne (1862). McCheyne's other writings include the moving hymn, "When this passing world is done."

J.W. MEIKLEJOHN

McCULLOCH, THOMAS (1777-1843). Presbyterian minister in Nova Scotia. Born in Scotland and educated at Glasgow University, he was ordained a minister of the General Associate Synod. He migrated to Pictou, Nova Scotia, where he founded a church and (in 1808) Pictou Academy, which was incorporated in 1816 with McCulloch as principal. In 1838 he became president of Dalhousie College in Halifax, a post he held until his death. He devoted his life to the cause of educational freedom and labored in Nova Scotia to break the Anglican monopoly of higher education and of access to the professions.

MacDONALD, GEORGE (1824-1905). Scottish novelist and poet. Born at Huntly, Aberdeenshire, he studied at King's College, Aberdeen, and Highbury Theological College and became minister of a Congregational church at Arundel, Sussex, in 1850. For expressing views on final judgment that left some hope for the heathen, he was opposed by his deacons and had his salary reduced from £150. By 1853 the situation had become intolerable, and he resigned, thereafter supporting himself and his wife by lecturing, tutoring, writing, and occasionally preaching. Though his health was poor and his poverty great, his writings show little trace of this, and much of a deep faith in God. He reacted against the Calvinism of his day, but not violently, and never became liberal in theology. C.S. Lewis,* who owed much to him, rated Phantastes (1858), the Curdie books, and Lilith (1895) among his great works. MacDonald's novels, while containing many quotable sayings, are too verbose to be good. He was at his best as a myth-maker, and it was the quality of cheerful goodness in his work that captured Lewis's imagination and convinced him that real righteousness is not dull.

P.W. PETTY

McGIFFERT, ARTHUR CUSHMAN (1861-1933). American church historian and educator. Born at Sauquoit, New York, he graduated from Western Reserve College and Union Theological Seminary, afterward pursuing studies in Paris, Rome, Berlin, and Marburg (Ph.D., 1888). Ordained to the Presbyterian ministry, he taught church history in Lane Theological Seminary (1888-93) before succeeding Philip Schaff* as professor of church history at Union in 1893, where he was subsequently also president (1917-26). Under the influence of Harnack, he wrote A History of Christianity in the Apostolic Age (1897). His ideas aroused such opposition that he withdrew from the Presbyterian Church and became a Congregationalist (1899). Other major works include a translation of Eusebius's Church History (1890); The Apostles' Creed (1902); Protestant Thought Before Kant (1911); Martin Luther, The Man and His Work (1911); The Rise of Modern Religious Ideas (1915); The God of the Early Christians (1924); and A History of Christian Thought (2 vols., 1931-33).

ALBERT H. FREUNDT, JR.

McGREADY, JAMES (c.1758-1817). Presbyterian revivalist. Born in W Pennsylvania and raised in North Carolina, he studied theology between 1785 and 1788 in Pennsylvania and was thereafter licensed to preach. His revivalistic zeal appears to have been kindled during a visit to Hampden-Sydney College in Virginia. His early ministry in North Carolina resulted in the conversion of some twelve young men who entered the ministry, among them B.W. Stone.* In 1796 McGready moved to pastor three churches in Kentucky. Revival began in 1797 and was climaxed during the summer of 1800 at a great outdoor camp meeting to celebrate Communion and admission of church members. The revival spread throughout the W and S states (see SECOND GREAT AWAKENING). McGready is credited with originating the camp meeting* in 1800 at Gaspar River, and with helping in the origin of the Cumberland Presbyterian Church.* He finished his life as a pioneer missionary in S Indiana.

HOWARD A. WHALEY

MacGREGOR, JAMES (1759-1820). Presbyterian minister in Nova Scotia. Born in Perthshire, Scotland, and educated in Edinburgh, he was ordained a Presbyterian minister in 1786. In 1787 he was sent to Pictou, Nova Scotia, by the General Associate Synod. He became concerned about the decline of the moral and cultural life of the Nova Scotian Scottish communities, which he felt was caused by the lack of clerical leadership. For this reason he acted as a part-time itinerant minister while appealing for more workers from Scotland. He was the first Presbyterian minister to preach in New Brunswick and on the Island of St. John (Prince Edward Island). He also aided the establishment of the Pictou Academy and in 1817 became the first moderator of the Presbyterian Church assembly in Nova Scotia.

ROBERT WILSON

MACHEN, JOHN GRESHAM (1881-1937). American Presbyterian scholar and apologist. Born in Baltimore, he was educated at Johns Hopkins, Princeton University and Theological Seminary, Marburg, and Göttingen. He was ordained in 1914. He taught NT at Princeton Seminary from 1906 to 1929, apart from a brief period of YMCA service in France. As a defender of the classic Reformed position, he was influenced by his teacher B.B. Warfield.* When Warfield died in 1921, the mantle of leadership for the "Princeton Theology" fell upon Machen. He resigned in 1929 due to the Liberal realignment of the seminary. Machen was a principal founder of Westminster Theological Seminary (1929) and what is now the Orthodox Presbyterian Church* (1936). He served as president and professor of NT at Westminster from 1929 to 1937.

In 1935 he was tried and found guilty of insubordination by a presbytery convened at Trenton, New Jersey, on charges brought by the general assembly of the Presbyterian Church in the USA. It condemned him for activities in connection with an independent mission board. He was forbidden to defend himself and was suspended from the Presbyterian (PCUSA) ministry. Machen is regarded by friend and foe as a leading conservative apologist in the modernist-fundamentalist era. Among his most significant publications are The Origin of Paul's Religion (1927); Christianity and Liberalism (1923): most definitive of his thought; New Testament for Beginners (1923); and The Virgin Birth of Christ (1930).

ROBERT C. NEWMAN

MACHRAY, ROBERT (1831-1904). Anglican primate of Canada. Born in Scotland, he was educated at the universities of Aberdeen and Cambridge, and after Anglican ordination and three years of travel returned to Sidney Sussex, Cambridge, as a dean, to which was added four years later the vicarage of Madingley (1862). In 1865 he was consecrated as the second bishop of Rupert's Land. His revival of St. John's (Anglican) College in Winnipeg (1866) was but a prelude to the establishment of the University of Manitoba (1877), of which he was first chancellor. In 1875 he became metropolitan of Western Canada, and in 1893 primate of All Canada, at which time, despite English reluctance, each of the two Canadian metropolitans received the designation of archbishop. These changes reflect the strong sense in which Machray helped the church in Canada pass from missionary status dependent on England to a self-sustaining independence indicative of the growing needs of the dominion.

CLYDE CURRY SMITH

MACK, ALEXANDER (1679-1735). Organizer and first leader of the New Baptists, or Brethren. This group, founded in 1708, in 1871 adopted the name German Baptist Brethren, but its main body today is known as the Church of the Brethren.* Born in Schriesheim, Germany, of Reformed parents, and a miller by trade, Mack was attracted to radical Pietism, and became a close associate of one of the leaders of that movement, E.C. Hochmann* von Hochenau. Mack accompanied Hochmann on some of his preaching missions. Due to governmental persecution of Pietists, Mack sold his mill and moved to Schwarzenau in the county of Wittgenstein. There eight Pietists under the leadership of Mack and because of Anabaptist influence became convinced that complete fidelity to the NT required the actualization of the gathered community of believers. The Brethren were born. Mack shepherded the body through persecution, resettlement, and finally to Pennsylvania. The first party reached the New World in 1719; the second, including Mack, arrived in 1729. Some 250 reached William Penn's land. Mack provided leadership until his death.

Mack's leadership role is ably exemplified in his two writings. The shortened titles of the works are Basic Questions (1713) and Rights and Ordinance (1715). Total obedience to Jesus Christ, including the constituting of the visible brotherhood community, was the key concept. English translations of Mack's two writings are in D.F. Durnbaugh (ed.), European Origins of the Brethren (1959).

Alexander Mack, Jr. (1715-1803) followed in his father's footsteps, guiding the Brethren in his adult life.

MARTIN H. SCHRAG

MACKAY, ALEXANDER MURDOCH (1849-1890). Missionary to Uganda. Born in Aberdeenshire, he studied at the Free Church training college for teachers, and in 1873 went to Berlin to acquire qualifications with an engineering firm. In 1875, having read H.M. Stanley's book on David Livingstone,* he changed his original intention about working in Madagascar and applied to the Church Missionary Society for work in Uganda. He arrived in East Africa* and began work on making a road through to Lake Victoria Nyanza, 230 miles inland. It took two years. He arrived on the lake shortly after the murder of two CMS colleagues, and after all others had left because of ill-health. The boat, intended for the lake and brought up in sections, had suffered severe damage, but Mackay's engineering knowledge and resourcefulness resulted in its completion and made an enormous impression. While work was going on, Mackay resolved to visit Lkonge, whose warriors had murdered his colleagues, and he succeeded in reaching an agreement with him. The boat completed, the party set out for Entebbe, headquarters of King Mtesa. Mackay's skill with metal won him acceptance, and on Sundays he was free to read and expound the NT. Arab traders opposed him, and French Catholic priests introduced a divisive element. Mackay protested at appalling cruelties without entirely losing favor.

James Hannington* had been consecrated bishop and approached Uganda from the East. There was an old prophecy that the country would be conquered by invaders who came that way, and though Mackay assured the king no harm was intended, warriors were dispatched to kill the party. There followed a general persecution of Christians; the lives of the missionaries at court were saved by one of the ministers who interceded for them. Mackay finally withdrew to the south of the lake. There he taught and translated, and there he met Stanley. Mackay died from malaria, but not before he saw the first copies of Matthew's gospel printed.

See J.W. Harrison, A.M. Mackay, Pioneer Missionary of the C.M.S. in Uganda (1890).

P.W. PETTY

MACKAY, GEORGE LESLIE (1844-1901). Scots-Canadian Presbyterian missionary. Born in Zerra, Canada, he was educated at the universities of Toronto and Edinburgh and Princeton Theological Seminary, and ordained in 1871. He spent the rest of his life in missionary service in Formosa, an island then scarcely touched by Protestant missionary societies. He made converts among both the Chinese and the aboriginal inhabitants, built up a strong church, and trained indigenous leaders. He compiled a Chinese Romanized dictionary of the Formosan vernacular and wrote an important account of his work, From Far Formosa (1896). In 1894 he became moderator of the general assembly of the Presbyterian Church in Canada. He died on the mission field.

IAN SELLERS

McKENDREE, WILLIAM (1757-1835). First American-born bishop of the Methodist Episcopal Church. He was converted at the age of twenty-nine and began preaching two years later with but scant formal education (he had previously been a small planter and an officer in the Revolution). He was first a helper on Mecklenburg's circuit, and in 1790 Bishop Francis Asbury* ordained him deacon, and in 1791 elder. Finally working closely with Asbury after nearly siding with the Republican Methodist schism, McKendree served on circuits for twenty years in Virginia, Ohio, Kentucky, and parts of Illinois, Tennessee, and Mississippi. He was a leader in the Great Revival in the West. He was elected bishop in 1808 and served ably until his death in Tennessee.

ROBERT C. NEWMAN

MACKENZIE, JOHN (1835-1899). Scottish missionary to South Africa. Born in Morayshire, he went to South Africa under the London Missionary Society in 1858. His wife's health prevented his joining the disastrous Makalolo mission. He eventually settled among the Ngwato at Shoshong (1864-76) and gained the confidence of Kgama III. From 1871 to 1882 he superintended the Moffat Institution, first at Shoshong, later at Kuruman. Mackenzie was convinced that the protection of the Africans demanded the extension of British rule to the Zambesi. He therefore became politically involved, first as a government representative in Bechuanaland, and in 1885-91 as a propagandist of imperial expansion in Britain. His efforts were repeatedly frustrated, principally by his fellow-imperialist C.J. Rhodes, whose motives and methods differed fundamentally from Mackenzie's humanitarianism. Mackenzie's closing years (1891-99) were spent as missionary at Hankey, Cape Colony.

D.G.L. CRAGG

MACKINTOSH, HUGH ROSS (1870-1936). Scottish theologian. Born in Paisley, he was educated at the universities of Edinburgh, Freiburg, Halle, and Marburg, and ordained to the ministry of the Free Church of Scotland* in 1897. He served parishes in Tayport and Aberdeen before appointment as professor of systematic theology at New College, Edinburgh (1904-36). He was moderator of the general assembly of the Church of Scotland in 1932. Mackintosh, who had a wide grasp of the teaching of German theologians, was regarded as a liberal evangelical. His works include The Doctrine of the Person of Jesus Christ (1912), The Christian Experience of Forgiveness (1927), and Types of Modern Theology (1937).

J.D. DOUGLAS

MACLAREN, ALEXANDER (1826-1910). Baptist minister. Born in Glasgow to Baptist parents, he was baptized in 1840 and trained at Stepney College. He ministered successfully at Portland Chapel, Southampton (1846-58), and Union Chapel, Manchester (1858-1903), where he acquired the reputation of "the prince of expository preachers." His sermons drew vast congregations and his methods of subdivision and analogies drawn from nature and life have been widely imitated ever since. In the pulpit he expounded evangelical certainties, yet his writings and private conversations show him prepared to accept a critical position. His attitudes are thus ambiguous, though Spurgeon* excepted him from the "Downgraders." Maclaren was twice president of the Baptist Union and chairman of its Twentieth Century Fund and the first president of the Baptist World Alliance* (1905). He strove unsuccessfully to unite the Baptist and Congregational denominations, but saw the establishment of many "Union" churches at a local level.

IAN SELLERS

MACLEOD, NORMAN (1812-1872). Scottish minister. Son and grandson of famous West Highland ministers, and grandfather of the founder of the Iona Community, he belonged to a celebrated clerical dynasty that gave six moderators to the Church of Scotland general assembly. Queen Victoria's favorite chaplain, he was also her personal friend and spiritual adviser. Minister successively of Loudoun Parish, Ayrshire, of Dalkeith, and of the celebrated Barony Church in Glasgow, in the latter city he made his name as pastor, evangelist, author, editor, churchman, and social reformer. He became widely known as editor of the immensely popular Good Words, as a champion of the working man, and as a foreign missionary enthusiast. He wrote the hymn "Courage, brother."

D.P. THOMSON

McNICOL, JOHN (1869-1956). Bible college principal. Born in Ottawa, he read classics at Toronto University and divinity at Knox College. For two years he was secretary of the University YMCA and a leader in the Student Volunteer Movement.* He was minister of the Presbyterian church in Aylmer, Quebec (1896-1900), then in 1902 began lecturing in Toronto Bible College, where he was principal from 1906 to 1946. He wrote much on the Holy Spirit; other books were Thinking Through the Bible (4 vols.) and The Bible's Philosophy of History.

McPHERSON, AIMEE SEMPLE (1890-1944). Canadian-born evangelist. She was converted through the ministry of Robert J. Semple, later married him, then went with him to China in 1908 as a missionary. He died of malaria after three months, and she came home with their baby. A second marriage to Harold McPherson brought the birth of a son, Rolf. Ill-health with two major operations ended with the adoption of an evangelistic career and a later divorce. She and her mother between 1918 and 1923 crossed the continent eight times. By 1922 she had built the 5,000-seat Angelus Temple in Los Angeles and developed her "foursquare gospel" of Christ as Savior and Healer, the baptism of the Holy Spirit with speaking in tongues, and the Second Coming. She broadcast what was claimed as the first radio sermon (1922). In 1927 she incorporated her International Church of the Foursquare Gospel (see PENTECOSTAL CHURCHES) and sent students from her Bible school to preach that gospel. She disappeared for a time in 1926. The Los Angeles grand jury challenged her story of kidnaping, but finally dismissed the case. She died of a heart attack shortly after trips to the Holy Land and the British Isles. EARLE E. CAIRNS

MACRINA THE YOUNGER (c.328-379/380). Eastern ascetic. Granddaughter of Macrina the Elder, she was born in Neocaesarea, Cappadocia, sister of Basil* of Caesarea and Gregory of Nyssa.* She won her brothers Basil and Peter (of Sebaste) to religious vocations. While Basil was choosing the ascetic life, she was establishing one of the earliest communities of women ascetics on the family estate in Pontus. Returning from the Synod of Antioch in 379. Gregory visited her and at the request of the monk Olympus wrote her life Vita Macrinae Junioris, also providing details about her brothers. This book, together with Gregory's De Anima ac Resurrectione, gives a vivid account of their meeting on her deathbed. Manuscripts of this biography suggest that her cult spread through the Eastern churches; it came much later in the West. C.G. THORNE, JR.

MADAURAN MARTYRS (second century). First reputed martyrs in Africa. Their names are given as Namphano, Miggin, Lucitas, and Sammae, all of which are Punic names. They are said to have suffered at Madaura in Numidia in 180. The record of them comes from the writings of Maximus of Madaura, a pagan grammarian of the late fourth century, who vigorously protested against the popular practice of visiting the tombs of such uncultured barbarians, deserting the pagan cults for the new religion. It has been argued by some scholars (e.g., J.H. Baxter) that the evidence for the martyrs is very uncertain.

MADSEN, PEDER (1843-1911). Danish bishop and theologian. In his youth he studied theology at Erlangen and was strongly influenced by F.H.R. Frank* and "the theology of experience." In 1874 he became lecturer, and in 1875 professor in Christian dogmatics and NT exegesis at Copenhagen University. In 1909 he was appointed bishop of Zealand. Madsen was not distinguished by any special originality, but combined influences from various directions into a full-blown doctrinal system, mainly biblical conservative and orthodox Lutheran, but seriously weakened by tendencies of subjectivism, a mild synergism, a kenotic view of Christology, and by some unnecessary concessions to biblical criticism. He exercised an extensive influence on many students preparing for the ministry. His personal seriousness and piety left a lasting mark on many, and he was the most influential Danish theologian of his time. His principal literary works are a commentary on the Book of Revelation (1887) and a posthumously published textbook on Christian dogmatics (1912-13). N.O. RASMUSSEN

MAGDALENES. A name for convents or communities of penitent females founded under the patronage of Mary Magdalene, the converted prostitute. The monastic revival influenced by Francis of Assisi much helped in the move to form communities in the thirteenth century—e.g., at Goslar, Worms, and Strasbourg. Bulls confirming the privileges of such communities were issued between 1227 and 1251 by Gregory IX and Innocent IV. In the main, the Augustinian Rule was followed, but in a few German houses it was the Franciscan or Dominican Rule. Refuges for fallen women were also established, e.g., at Marseilles in 1272 and Naples in 1324. In 1640 the Magdalenes adopted a new rule after a long period of weak discipline, but they are now virtually extinct. PETER TOON

MAGDEBURG CENTURIES (1559-74). A major Protestant reinterpretation of the history of the Christian Church to 1308, originally in thirteen volumes as Centuriae Magdeburgenses. It was written by Matthias Flacius,* in collaboration with six other Lutherans. The work is highly polemical, severely antipapal, and based on selected sources. But it did make some contribution to the development of historical criticism. It also provoked an equally polemical response, the Annales ecclesiastici (1588-1607) by Cesare Baronius,* based on sources in the Vatican Library.

MAGI. According to the gospel of Matthew, magoi, guided by a mysterious star, came from the East to Bethlehem with gifts for the infant Jesus (2:1-12). The word magoi can mean either "wise men" or "magicians." The only other use in the NT is Acts 13:6ff., where it clearly means "magician." Whether Matthew also intended the word to be understood in this sense is not certain. Ignatius of Antioch did. Commenting on the appearance of the star, he says that from that time magic lost its power, since God had appeared in human form. At any rate, it is reasonable to infer that the evangelist looked upon the Magi as representatives of the Gentiles. Tradition has embellished the story in various ways. Origen stated there were three wise men, probably on account of their three gifts. In the sixth century they were named as Gaspar, Melchior, and Balthasar. The Adoration of the Magi soon became a popular subject in art. By the Middle Ages they were venerated as saints. What were claimed to be their relics were taken to Germany by Frederick Barbarossa in 1162 and are now enshrined in Cologne cathedral.

R.J. MC KELVEY

MAGNIFICAT. The song of praise sung by Mary (Luke 1:46-55) when she visited Elizabeth to tell her about the forthcoming birth of Jesus. The name is derived from the first word of the hymn in the Latin version. There are considerable similarities between the Magnificat and the Song of Hannah (1 Sam. 2:1-10) and there is no doubt that the memory of this formed the background. The situation of Elizabeth makes a closer parallel in some ways to that of Hannah, and there is some slight MS evidence for ascribing the hymn to Elizabeth. It has been suggested that the original text may have included no name and that scribes have inserted one or the other. The hymn is one of praise for the gracious action of God on behalf of His people and in particular of the singer herself. It is fully appropriate to the occasion and shows no sign of having Christian theology read back into it. It has been used as an evening canticle in the worship of the Western Church since at least the time of Benedict.

R.E. NIXON

MAIER, WALTER ARTHUR (1893-1950). American Lutheran scholar and radio preacher. After graduating from Boston University (1913), he went to Concordia Theological Seminary, was ordained in 1917, and received his Ph.D. from Harvard in 1929. He taught OT language and studies at Concordia from 1922 and established several churches in St. Louis. From 1920 to 1945 he edited the Walther League Messenger. He gained international prominence as the regular speaker of the "Lutheran Hour" from 1935 until the late forties. At his death the broadcast went to over 1,200 stations worldwide. Maier's blend of scholarship and practical devotion enabled him to reach both scholar and common man.

ROBERT C. NEWMAN

MAIMONIDES, MOSES (1135-1204). A leading Jewish philosopher of the Middle Ages. His Guide to the Perplexed is of central importance. "Perplexity" is what was aroused by the supposed opposition of the Greek sciences to Jewish religious belief. Maimonides, who was concerned with the socially divisive effects of popularized Greek learning, responded by attempting to make Aristotle as *un*systematic and contradictory as possible. This makes the Guide something of an enigma. On one view Maimonides seeks to show the limitations of philosophy; on another, he is showing that the practical worth of religion is undiminished by the existence of supposedly alien philosophies. On his view, God cannot be known, but can be appreciated and loved through an acquaintance with His workings in the natural order. Revelation has the role of educating the believer to know God in knowing nature, and not of imparting distinctive truths. The Guide not only became a fundamental text of medieval Jewish thought and the subject of much debate, but exercised an influence on medieval discussions of the relation between faith and reason, and later it had a somewhat different influence on Spinoza.*

PAUL HELM

MAISTRE, JOSEPH, see JOSEPH DE MAISTRE

MAITLAND, SAMUEL ROFFEY (1792-1866). Anglican historian and writer. Born in London, son of a Scottish merchant, he was educated at Cambridge but left without a degree. A man of very wide intellectual tastes which ranged from mesmerism to music, he had at first intended to pursue a legal career, but in 1821, his religious views having changed, he was ordained deacon in the Church of England and from 1823-27 was perpetual curate of Christ Church, Gloucester. He made significant contributions to the study of contemporary Judaism and in 1832 produced a masterly account of the Albigenses and Waldenses. Associated with the Clapton sect of High Churchmen, he contributed notable historical essays to the British Magazine, which he later edited. In 1838 he was made librarian at Lambeth Palace. Maitland was equally unpopular with the Tractarians,* whose ritualism he deplored, and with the evangelicals, for his attacks on Foxe the martyrologist and on Milner's Church History.

IAN SELLERS

MAJORISTIC CONTROVERSY. This was occasioned by George Major (1502-74), professor at the University of Wittenberg. Major taught that "good works are necessary to salvation" and that "it is impossible for a man to be saved without good works." He was attacked especially by Matthias Flacius.* Before this, Flacius had attacked Major because he had subscribed to the Augsburg Interim* (1548) in which the sola had been omitted in the phrase "sola fide justificamur." In the controversy Justus Menius sided with Major, both of them contending that faith alone justifies, but that faith is not present without confessing and persevering. In the seven propositions of the Synod of Eisenach (1556), Menius repudiated the proposition "good works are necessary to salvation." Major maintained that "good works are necessary." Nicholas von Amsdorf* opposed Major, saying "good works are harmful to salvation." Article IV of the Formula of Concord* (1577) repudiated both Amsdorf and Major, teaching that good works should be excluded from the question concerning salvation and the article about justification, but that regenerate man is bound to do good works.

CARL S. MEYER

MAKEMIE, FRANCIS (1658-1708). Regarded as the founder of American Presbyterianism, he was born of Scotch-Irish parents in County Donegal, but received his education at the University of Glasgow. He was ordained in 1682 for missionary work in America and arrived there in 1683. He labored as an itinerant evangelist in North Carolina, Maryland, the Barbados, and Virginia. He was the moving spirit in the organization of the Presbytery of Philadelphia in 1706. When he preached in New York colony in that year, Governor Cornbury had him arrested for preaching without a proper license. Makemie ably defended his right to free speech and was acquitted, but Cornbury forced him to pay over £83 for the costs of the trial.

EARLE E. CAIRNS

MALABAR CHRISTIANS. The "Syrian" or "Saint Thomas" Christians of SW India,* the word "Malabar" here being broadly equivalent to the present state of Kerala. There are now three main groups of them: Roman Catholics (who are in two separate blocs); the Syrian Orthodox Church; and the Mar Thoma Church. All trace a common origin to early Christian centuries and generally hold the tradition that Thomas* landed at Cranganore in A.D. 52 and founded churches in seven places in Kerala. A separate tradition concerns immigration of Syrian Christians at Cranganore in 345, after the king and the bishop of Edessa had resolved to reinforce the churches in Kerala. The leader was Thomas of Cana. A section of the Syrian Christians today, known as Southists, comprises those said to be descended from the Cranganore colonists. In the Roman Catholic Church the diocese of Kottyam is explicitly for Southists. The earliest account of the detailed tradition about Thomas in Kerala comes from the Portuguese writer, Antonio de Gouveau.

A subsequent immigration of Syrians, at Quilon, is traditionally dated 823. Five copper plates exist, recording grants of lands and privileges to the Tarisa Church, but are of uncertain date. Five carved stone crosses, with inscriptions in Pahlavi (language of the Sassanid Persian Empire), exist, one at the supposed St. Thomas shrine in Mylapore (Madras) and four in Kerala. They are of the seventh or eighth centuries. The Alexandrian writer Cosmas (c.525) had found Christians in Malabar and some at Kalliana, with a bishop appointed from Persia. Not much is known about the Syrian Christians in the Middle Ages, but the general picture is clear: an established church in Kerala with an outpost at Mylapore; a church dependent on the church of the Persian Empire; and consequently a church with a Syriac liturgy and ultimately with a creed reflecting Nestorianism.*

Roman Catholic influence began with Franciscans calling en route to China in the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries, by which time the Syrians' link with the mother church in Mesopotamia was weakened by the circumstances of the Muslim era. In 1330 a French Dominican, Jourdain de Severac, became bishop of Quilon, the initial papal claim to jurisdiction in India. In 1503 the Nestorians were reinforced by five bishops of their own, but simultaneously the Portuguese had come to India, and Jesuit pressure proved too much. The Syrians' metropolitan submitted to Rome, and finally the Synod of Diamper* (1599) severed the Syrian Church from its past and from its Mesopotamian patriarch. Syriac continued to be used in the Romanized liturgy. Resentment at Jesuit rule, however, boiled over in a revolt at the Coonen Cross* in 1653. For a time it seemed that most of the Syrians had seceded from Rome, but within a decade Rome had won back much of the lost ground, using Carmelites instead of Jesuits and appointing one of them as titular bishop in Malabar, thus bypassing the Portuguese hierarchy.

The Syrians who did not return to Rome were free to look abroad for a bishop, especially when Dutch power replaced Portuguese in Kerala and the foreign Roman clergy were cleared out. But the bishop who came to them in 1665 was not from the Nestorian patriarch, but from the Jacobite one at Antioch—hence the subsequent description of the Syrians as "Jacobite." The Syrians were now in two groups: Roman Catholic and Jacobite. Through the initiative of the British authorities in South India, and partly because of the findings of Claudius Buchanan,* work among the Syrians was begun by the Church Missionary Society in 1816. The purpose was not to make Anglicans of the Syrians, but to seek the renewal of the ancient church. Unhappily, after two decades the mission was unacceptable to the Syrian authorities, and the missionaries turned to other work in Kerala. Some of the Syrians at this point seceded and became Anglicans; the outcome is the Central Travancore diocese of the Church of South India* today.

Others remained within the Syrian Church as a reform party. One of its leaders, Abraham Malpan, was excommunicated because of his reforms, but sought to change things at the top by having his nephew sent to the patriarch of Antioch. The nephew returned to India as Bishop Mar Athanasios and with a claim to be made metropolitan of the Syrian Church. After lengthy legal battles, the reform party lost all claim to property and in 1889 had to begin separate existence as the Mar Thoma Church, which proved to have an evangelistic concern.

The Jacobite Church had to endure continued legal struggles in the twentieth century until a 1958 decision of the supreme court of India led to reconciliation between parties of the metropolitan (catholicos) and of the patriarch of Antioch. The title "Orthodox Church" was now preferred to "Jacobite." The Roman Catholics were the largest single group of Syrians, most of them belonging to the Syro-Malabar Rite, but a smaller number to the Syro-Malankara Rite which owes its origin to an accession of Jacobites in 1930. There are, in addition, Roman Catholics of the Latin Rite in Kerala, but fewer in number than the Syrians. There are other smaller groups, including a Nestorian Church which derives from a split from the Roman Catholic Syrians.

See C.B. Firth, An Introduction to Indian Church History (1961), and D.P. Matthew and

M.M. Thomas, The Indian Churches of Saint Thomas (1967). ROBERT J. MC MAHON

MALACHY (1094-1148). Archbishop of Armagh. A zealous reformer, he was born at Armagh, son of a clergyman, was educated at Armagh and Lismore, and became successively abbot of Bangor, bishop of Connor, and archbishop of Armagh. He was greatly attracted to the monastic system in Gaul. With four Irish clergy he visited Bernard of Clairvaux* and studied the system with the result that a Cistercian abbey, the first in Ireland, was established at Mellifont, County Louth, in 1142. It was his burning desire to bring the Celtic Church under the supervision of Rome. With this end in view he summoned a synod to Inishpatrick in 1148. The synod appointed him delegate to visit Rome and to receive the pallium, the vestment that indicated the holding of office of papal authority. On his journey he visited his friend Bernard, and on the day he was to have continued his journey to Rome he died. His biography, written by Bernard, gives rather a sad picture of the state of affairs in Ireland. Malachy was a man of ardent temperament, sincere piety, and outstanding influence. He resisted the attempts of Nigellus and Maurice, two laymen who sought to usurp the see of Armagh. ADAM LOUGHRIDGE

MALAN, CÉSAR HENRI ABRAHAM (1787-1864). Swiss preacher. Born in Geneva, he studied theology there and was ordained in the Reformed Church. Previously under the influence of Voltaire and Rousseau, he had been converted in 1817. His conversion brought him into conflict with the ecclesiastical power in Geneva, and he was forbidden to preach on original sin, election, and related doctrines. When Malan disregarded this order he was expelled from his pulpit. Although he may have never formally left the established church, he gathered a group first in his own home, and then in the Chapelle du Témoignage, and may have joined the Scottish Church. After 1830 he engaged in missionary tours to other parts of Switzerland, Germany, France, the Netherlands, and Scotland. C. GREGG SINGER

MALCHION OF ANTIOCH (fl. c.270). Christian rhetorician. As presbyter and leading teacher of rhetoric in Antioch he opposed his own bishop, Paul of Samosata,* at the Synod of Antioch in 269, where the latter's view that Christ was by nature merely an ordinary man was condemned. Paul, bishop since 260, was deposed and excommunicated. Eusebius records portions of the actual debate. Jerome further reports that Malchion also drafted the long encyclical announcing the synod's decision.

MALDONALDO, JUAN (1534-1583). Spanish exegete. Otherwise known as Johannes Maldonatus, he was born at Casar de la Rema, Estremadura, and after studies at Salamanca (1547-58) and Rome (1558-62) he became a Jesuit and was ordained. He taught philosophy at Rome (1563) and Paris (1564-65) and became theology professor at the Collège de Clermont (1565-74). At first his lectures were traditional, but in 1570 he initiated his own theological course. The Sorbonne accused him of heresy (1574). He was vindicated by the bishop (1576), but withdrew to Bourges where he wrote commentaries on the gospels (1596) which became famous. In 1581 Gregory XIII called him to Rome to work on a critical edition of the Septuagint. J.G.G. NORMAN

MALEBRANCHE, NICHOLAS (1638-1715). French Catholic philosopher. He entered the Oratorians* in Paris (1660) where he remained throughout his life. He was ordained priest (1664). His philosophical work concentrated on the relation between faith, reason, and empirical observation, seeking therein to find an accommodation between Catholicism and Cartesian philosophy. De la recherche de la vérité (2 vols., 1674-75), Traité de la nature et de la grace (1680), and Entretiens sur la métaphysique et sur la religion (1688) are his greatest works and embroiled him in constant polemics, with Bossuet, Leibnitz, Fontenelle, and many others. As a scientist he studied insects, mathematics, and color; simultaneously he was a méditatif in the Oratory.

He agreed with Descartes that we do not perceive the actual physical objects, such as the sun; they are mediated to us via idées in our minds. Against Descartes, however, he claimed such idées are archetypes of objects in the mind of God. We are assured that the actual objects do exist by supernatural revelation which we accept on faith. This notion is termed the "vision in God." Concerning causation in the physical world, he postulated "occasionalism" by affirming that God, acting through his general laws of motion, is the true cause of all motion (i.e., causing a ball to move), while particular or occasional causes (i.e., a ball striking another ball causing it to move) exist. C.T. MC INTIRE

MALINES CONVERSATIONS. A series of meetings between Anglican and Roman Catholic theologians at Malines (Mechelen), Belgium, extending over five years from 1921. The prime movers were D.J. Cardinal Mercier* and Lord Halifax, a High Church Anglican. Two such groups inevitably found substantial areas of agreement after the manner of ecumenical exchanges. Mercier did, however, raise the possibility of the Church of England's uniting with Rome as a uniate body with a patriarch. The conversations petered out with Mercier's death in 1926. It was he who had engendered much of the warmth on the Roman side, and in 1928 indications from the Vatican confirmed that the talks had been quietly dropped. Low Church Anglicans had always entertained grave suspicions about the exchanges. J.D. DOUGLAS

MALTA, KNIGHTS OF, see HOSPITALLERS

MANALO, FELIX (1886-1963). Founder of the Iglesia ni Kristo in the Philippines. Born near Manila in a devout Catholic home, he was converted to Protestantism in 1902. After study with the Methodists and Presbyterians, he became first a Disciples and then a Seventh-day Adventist preacher. In 1912 he turned to agnosticism, but after special revelations during Bible study in 1913 he began to preach his own doctrine, and in 1914 founded the Iglesia ni Kristo. He denied the divinity of Christ and justification by faith, argued that the church did not exist between A.D. 70 and 1914, and therefore claimed that salvation is to be found only in the Iglesia ni Kristo. In 1922 he declared himself to be the angel from the East mentioned in Revelation 7:1-3. He built many splendid chapels of distinctive architecture, personally appointed all his clergy (and wrote their sermons), and dictated to his members how they should vote in state elections. He appealed to contemporary nationalism by teaching that there were many specific references to the Philippines in Bible prophecy. The INK doubtfully claimed 3,500,000 members in 1963. Felix's son Erano succeeded him as "Executive Minister."

RICHARD DOWSETT

MANDAEANS. The only-known Gnostic* sect surviving into the present century. Numbering only a few thousand, they are located in S Iraq and Khuzistan, and no longer use the language of their sacred books, speaking instead dialectal Arabic. Mandaic thought from the beginning (i.e., A.D. second century, at latest) was assimilated less to Western concepts than was Hellenism, and remained characterized by a syncretism of highly complex elements which defies systematization. These elements include biblical and other West Semitic materials, late Babylonian ingredients (especially astrological), Iranian dualism, and a peculiar concern for a highly legendized John the Baptist (the source of their designation as "St. John's Christians").

Their significant literature includes doctrinal treatises, liturgical materials, and a variety of popular works including phylactery rolls and incantation bowls. There are three ranks of cult officials; assistants, ordinary priests, and overseers. These preside over two fundamental rites: a frequent ritual washing in the name of Life and the "knowledge of life," and a "deathbed" washing. The former includes anointing with oil and a sacramental meal of bread and holy water.

While known to Westerners since the sixteenth century, publication of Mandaean texts began in the late nineteenth century. Mandaean studies are valuable for the history of religions, and gained further significance with R. Bultmann* and his school in their work on John's gospel.

See E.S. Drower, The Mandaeans of Iraq and Iran (1937; rep. 1962), and G. Widengren, "Die Mandäer," in Religionsgeschichte des Orients in der Zeit der Weltreligionen (1961), pp. 83-101.

CLYDE CURRY SMITH

MANDE, HENDRIK (c. 1360-1431). Dutch mystic, associated with the Brethren of the Common Life.* Born in Dordrecht, well educated, for a time in the service of Count Willem VI of Holland, he was influenced by the fiery preaching of G. Groote,* and in his thirties joined the Brethren as a lay brother in their cloister at Windesheim. This remained his base for the remainder of his life, spent in conducting various business affairs for the Brethren, and also in compiling several treatises on mysticism. These are taken largely from the thoughts and writings of the famed Flemish mystic, Jan Van Ruysbroeck,* and are thus theologically orthodox.

MANEGOLD OF LAUTENBACH (c.1030-c.1103). Roman Catholic scholar. Born at Lautenbach, he entered the monastery there, and when followers of Henry IV ravaged it in 1086 he fled to the cloister of Raitenbuch, Bavaria, where he became dean. Later he assumed priorship of the monastery at Marbach, Alsace. His fame and consequent difficulty with the imperial party stems from his staunch defense of papal policy in the Investiture Controversy.* In Manegoldi ad Gebhardum liber he defined kingship as based on a contract between monarch and subjects which becomes void by royal breach. Hence the pope legitimately dissolved the German oath to Henry IV, argued Manegold. Opusculum contra Wolfelmum Coloniensem indicates the danger of studying pagan classics. In 1096 Manegold was delegate to the Synod of Tours, and in 1098 he was an imperial prisoner.

JAMES DE JONG

MANICHAEISM. Mani (Gr. Coptic Manichaios), of aristocratic Parthian family and religious father, was born in 216, and grew up in S Babylonia probably among adherents of Elchasai. Revelations at the ages of twelve and twenty-four led him to leave the community of his youth and after study and meditation to embark in 240/41 upon his mission of proclamation of the revealed truth. After the conversion of members of his family, and a time in India, he returned to the center of the Persian Empire, by this time having royal princes among his followers. King Shapur I (241-72) received him, gave him leave to preach his message, and made him one of his entourage from admiration or political expediency. Under this patronage he was able to write the six books and the letters that made up the Manichaean Canon, and to travel widely through the empire spreading his message. Under Hormizd I royal protection continued, but after one year Bahram I succeeded him and the climate changed: Mani was first denied traveling rights, then summoned to the presence, and at the instance of Karter, Zoroastrian high priest, imprisoned in chains. After suffering for a month, he died in February of either 276 or 277.

His religion, which had already reached Egypt in his lifetime, spread throughout the Roman Empire and eastward beyond Persia to Sogdia, by the eighth century reached China, and in the late eighth century was the state religion of the Turkic Uigurs. Almost everywhere bitterly persecuted, it eventually died out. Manichaean writings have come to light only this century, mainly in Coptic, Sogdian, and Uigur, but also in Chinese, Greek, and Persian. The doctrine, though claimed as a system, is highly mythological. Two principles, Light and Dark, God and Matter, are eternal. The invasion of the Light led to the saving expedition of the Primeval Man, some of whose substance remained imprisoned in matter after his return. The creation of sun, moon, stars, and plant life was part of a plan to redeem this imprisoned Light. The appearance of Adam was a counterplot to retain Light imprisoned, through reproduction; "Jesus the Brilliant Light" redeemed him by a vision. The Jesus of the gospels is but an instance of the suffering of imprisoned Light in matter.

The religious practice of Mani's followers (among whom the "elect" or "righteous" ate no meat and abstained from sexual life) was an ascetic means of continuing the process of gradual liberation. At length, after the second coming of Jesus and a millenial reign, the end comes, when the elect are reunited with Light, and this creation is destroyed. The precise relation of Iranian, Mandaean* Gnostic, Buddhist, and Christian elements in the teaching of Mani (who called himself "apostle of Jesus Christ") remains a matter for debate and research. The relation to the medieval "Manichee" is problematic.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: F.C. Burkitt, The Religion of the Manichees (1925); S. Runciman, The Medieval Manichee (1947); H-C. Puech, Le Manichéisme. Son Fondateur. Sa Doctrine (1949); G. Widengren, Mani and Manichaeism (ET 1965); A. Adam, Texte zum Manichaismus (2nd ed., 1969); A. Henrichs and L. Koenen, "Ein griechischer Mani-Codex," in Zeitschrift für Papyrologie und Epigraphie 5 (1970), pp. 97-216; A. Henrichs, "Mani and the Babylonian Baptists," in Harvard Studies in Classical Philology 77 (1973), pp. 23-59.

J.N. BIRDSALL

MANNING, BERNARD LORD (1892-1941). English church historian. Son of a Congregational minister, he was educated at Jesus College, Cambridge, where he was successively fellow, bursar, and senior tutor (1933). His chief historical publications, in which he argued that Dissent stood inside the common tradition of Latin Christendom, were The People's Faith in the Time of Wyclif (1919); The Making of Modern English Religion (1929); Essays in Orthodox Dissent (1939); and The Protestant Dissenting Deputies (1954). His scholarship, wit, and piety are seen in The Hymns of Wesley and Watts (1942), to which all hymnologists are indebted. Similar qualities pervade two volumes of sermons (1942-44). Of delicate health, he was mourned at his death by Christians of all persuasions.

JOHN S. ANDREWS

MANNING, ERNEST C. (1908- ). Premier of Alberta and radio preacher. He grew up in W Saskatchewan. Hearing William Aberhart broadcasting from Calgary, he proceeded to the Prophetic Bible Institute and was its first and most distinguished graduate. In the 1935 Social Credit landslide in the Alberta provincial election, Manning was not only returned to the legislature, but was made a cabinet minister. On the death of Aberhart in 1943, Manning assumed the office of premier. Early showing signs of competence and integrity, Manning was the beneficiary of the Alberta oil strikes of the late forties and early fifties. He managed the oil boom well, and as provincial coffers overflowed he channeled much of the money into an enlightened program of social welfare. People so often did not vote for Social Credit; they voted for him. During all these years Manning conducted the weekly nationwide "Back to the Bible" broadcast. In his sepulchral tones he preached the Gospel, expounding prophecy with decreasing emphasis on its predictive element and increasingly using the prophetic passages as a basis for calling the nation to repentance and revival. In all of this Manning was an expression of the western prairies revival movement of the hungry thirties, with its rather sectarian attitude and compelling worldwide missionary vision.

When he retired from politics, Manning quickly became a member of Canada's economic establishment, his prestige readily opening directorships in the country's major corporations. But when he retired an era ended. Although his successor, Harry Strom, was equally evangelical, represented Scandinavian Pietism, and was lay moderator of the Evangelical Free Church, the exciting days of the mid-thirties had run their course. Social Credit was roundly defeated eighteen months after Manning retired.

IAN S. RENNIE

MANNING, HENRY EDWARD (1808-1892). English cardinal, archbishop of Westminster. Born in Hertfordshire, son of a member of Parliament, he was educated at Harrow and Oxford, then followed a career in two parts. He was an Anglican until his forties (1851), then as a Roman Catholic he helped consolidate the Catholic revival in England. He began as an Anglican Evangelical, ordained (1832), then archdeacon at Chichester (1841). Gradually his interest in the Oxford Movement* became commitment to its principles; he wrote Tract 78 and was considered a leader of the movement after Newman's conversion (1845). But Manning himself converted (1851). N.P.S. Cardinal Wiseman,* amid opposition from older Catholic families, took a personal interest in him, ordaining him a priest (1851), encouraging him to found in England the Oblates of St. Charles (1851), then appointing him inspector of schools in the Westminster diocese (1856) and provost of the metropolitan chapter (1857). In 1860 Manning became the chief English defender of papal temporal power.

Upon Wiseman's death (1865), Pius IX made Manning the new primate, an appointment he held for twenty-seven years, meanwhile becoming cardinal (1875). At the Vatican Council (1869-70) he was a leader of the Ultramontane move to define the dogma of papal infallibility as necessary to defend the principle of authority. He consistently promoted Catholic social consciousness, especially concern for the condition of the poor and working men. Leo XIII's social encyclicals were to him the supreme definition of Catholic social principles. He generally supported Gladstone's policies.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: E.S. Purcell, Life and Times of Cardinal Manning (2 vols., 1896); P. Thureau-Dangin, La renaissance catholique en Angleterre au XIX^e siècle (3 vols., 1923); J. Fitzsimons (ed.), Manning, Anglican and Catholic (1951); V.A. McClelland, Cardinal Manning: His Public Life and Influence, 1865-1892 (1962).

C.T. MC INTIRE

MANNING, JAMES (1738-1791). Founder and first president of Brown University. Graduating from the College of New Jersey (Princeton University) in 1762, he had by 1765 finally secured a charter for Rhode Island College and founded a Baptist church in Warren, Rhode Island. He was appointed president of the college in 1765 and held the position of professor of language until 1791. The school was moved from Warren to Providence, where he also served as pastor of the First Baptist Church from 1771 to 1791. In 1786 he represented Rhode Island in the Congress on the Confederation, and in the summer of 1791 he wrote a report that suggested the creation of the state's present free public school system.

EARLE E. CAIRNS

MANSEL, HENRY LONGUEVILLE (1820-1871). Dean of St. Paul's. Born at Cosgrove, Northamptonshire, he was a scholar, then tutor, of St. John's College, Oxford, and was ordained in 1844. In 1859 he was appointed first Waynflete professor of moral and metaphysical philosophy at Oxford; in 1866 he succeeded to the regius chair of ecclesiastical history; and in 1868 was made dean of St. Paul's. He achieved eminence as a teacher of logic, though his real interest lay in the field of metaphysics, which he approached by way of psychology. As a metaphysician, however, he gained little distinction. His Bampton Lectures of 1858 brought him into conflict with F.D. Maurice* and John Stuart Mill. Mansel maintained that man acquires knowledge of the nature of God only from supernatural revelation. In What is Revelation? Maurice replied by challenging both Mansel's concept of revelation and his concept of Christianity. The conflict dragged on with a heatedness which did little credit to either man.

JOHN A. SIMPSON

MANSON, THOMAS WALTER (1893-1958). British biblical scholar. Educated at Glasgow and Cambridge universities, he was Yates professor of NT Greek and exegesis, Mansfield College, Oxford (1932-36); Rylands professor of biblical criticism and exegesis, Manchester University (1936-58). In his greatest contribution to NT scholarship, The Teaching of Jesus (1931), written while he was Presbyterian minister at Falstone, Northumberland, Manson propounded the thesis with which his name is distinctively associated—that the title "Son of Man" on the lips of Jesus had corporate significance until the end of His ministry, when it became evident that His disciples were not yet ready to take their share in enduring the destiny of suffering appointed for the Son of Man, and Jesus endured it alone. While he published much of lasting value on the NT epistles and on ministry and priesthood in the church, his most important work was concerned with Jesus and the gospels.

F.F. BRUCE

MANTEGNA, ANDREA (1431-1506). First N Italian Renaissance painter. Born near Vicenza, son of a carpenter, he profited from the tutelage of the painter Francesco Squarcione of Padua, an avid antiquarian who adopted him and from whom he may have derived his classical and archaeological interests. A precocious and arrogant genius, member of the guild of painters at eleven, he strengthened a fruitful association with these artists in his marriage in 1454 to Nicolosia Bellini, daughter of Jacopo and sister of Giovanni and Gentile. Mantegna's austere classicism is evidenced in the monumentality of his figures, his concern with perspective, his zeal for historical precision, his use of architectural detail, and his choice of much of his subject matter, particularly the triumphs. He was more preoccupied with fidelity to nature than with idealized beauty, especially in his later works, which proclaimed his sense of tragedy, as shown in his foreshortened Dead Christ. He decorated the Belvedere Chapel (now destroyed) in the Vatican for Innocent VIII. His influence on his contemporaries and successors in Italy and beyond, including Dürer,* was tremendous.

MARY E. ROGERS

MANUSCRIPTS OF THE BIBLE. Manuscripts are written texts copied individually by hand. Until the invention of printing in W Europe about 1450, practically all written texts were manuscripts. This was so with biblical texts, in whatsoever language they were written. Here we limit ourselves to biblical manuscripts in Hebrew, Aramaic, and Greek, the three original languages of Scripture. These were written with carbon ink and a reed pen on skin (parchment, vellum, etc.) or papyrus, in scroll or codex form.

Old Testament (Jewish Bible). The earliest known biblical manuscripts are those discovered in 1947 and the following years in the caves of Qumran and other places west of the Dead Sea. These go back to the closing centuries B.C.: they include fragments of all the books of the Hebrew Bible except Esther, and a few portions of the pre-Christian Greek version of the OT, commonly called the Septuagint. But the great majority of manuscripts of the Hebrew Bible exhibit the Massoretic Text, the text edited by the Jewish scholars called Massoretes (i.e., custodians of massorah, "tradition") from the sixth century A.D. onward. The oldest Massoretic fragments came to light toward the end of the nineteenth century in the "Ezra Synagogue" of Fustat (Old Cairo). Of complete Massoretic manuscripts, the oldest known is a codex of the Prophets belonging to the Qaraite synagogue in Cairo, dated A.D. 895. Others of comparable date are a codex of the Pentateuch in the British Museum (Or 4445), only a few years younger; an early tenth-century codex of the whole Hebrew Bible, formerly (until 1948) belonging to the synagogue in Aleppo and now, unfortunately mutilated at the beginning, preserved in Israel; a Leningrad codex of the Latter Prophets (P) dated A.D. 916; a Leningrad codex of the whole Hebrew Bible (L) completed in 1008, on which the text of Kittel's Biblia Hebraica (3rd ed.) is based; and an almost complete codex of the whole Hebrew Bible in the Bodleian Library, Oxford, a few years younger. Some of these codices exhibit the specially pure form of text edited by the Ben Asher family of Massoretes, of Tiberias.

Other manuscripts which exhibit the Ben Asher text are the British Museum Or 2626-2628 and 2375, together with the "Shem Tob" Bible belonging to the Sassoon family; these were used by N.H. Snaith for the Hebrew Bible published by the British and Foreign Bible Society in 1958.

Samaritan Bible. The Hebrew Pentateuch has been preserved independently by the Samaritan community, which recognizes no other part of the OT as canonical. The Samaritan Bible is based on a popular Palestinian text (of which some samples have been identified among the Qumran manuscripts), with the addition of some sectarian readings upholding distinctive Samaritan beliefs, such as that Mt. Gerizim and not Jerusalem is the dwelling-place of the name of God, where He desires to be worshiped (cf. John 4:20). The oldest known Samaritan codex (in Cambridge) contains a note indicating that it was sold in A.D. 1149-50; it must have been written some decades before that. The Abisha scroll, which is shown to visitors at the Samaritan synagogue in Nablus as the oldest book in the world, is actually composite: the oldest part (Num. 35—Deut. 34) may go back to the eleventh century A.D., but when the remainder of the scroll (Gen. 1—Num. 34) was accidentally lost or destroyed in the fourteenth century, it was replaced by a new copy.

Septuagint. The "Septuagint" (abbreviated LXX) is the name traditionally, though imprecisely, given to the pre-Christian Greek version of the Hebrew Bible and some associated documents. Some fragments of this version have been identified among the manuscripts from the west shore of the Dead Sea. The John Rylands Library, Manchester, possesses a papyrus fragment of Deuteronomy 25–28 in Greek, of date not later than c.150 B.C. (P. Ryl. 458), and there is another pre-Christian portion of the Greek Deuteronomy in Cairo (P. Fouad 266), containing a few verses of chapters 31 and 32. In this last papyrus the consonants of the divine name (YHWH) are left in square Hebrew characters, instead of being turned into Greek.

All our other Septuagint manuscripts are of Christian origin. The Chester Beatty biblical papyri, now housed in Dublin, include seven codices of various parts of the Septuagint, written in the second and third centuries A.D. With the NT papyri in the same collection these probably belonged to the multivolumed Bible of a Greek-speaking church in Egypt which could not afford more expensive or durable copies. One of these codices, containing parts of Ezekiel, Daniel, and Esther, is of special interest because it is one of the very few witnesses to the original "Septuagint" version of Daniel—a version which is so free a paraphrase that in nearly all manuscripts of the Greek OT it is replaced by a later and more accurate version ascribed to Theodotion (late second century A.D.). The principal witness to the original "Septuagint" text of Daniel is a codex in the Chigi collection in Rome (eleventh century A.D.).

Most manuscripts of the Septuagint form the OT part of a complete Greek Bible; they are thus witnesses also to the Greek text of the NT, and can be conveniently treated under that heading.

New Testament. The oldest surviving manuscripts of the Greek NT are written on papyrus. Such are the three NT codices in the Chester Beatty collection, containing the gospels and Acts (P 45), the Pauline letters and Hebrews (P 46), and Revelation (P 47), and dating from the late second-to-mid-third century. The oldest piece of any part of the NT is the papyrus fragment of John 18 in the John Rylands Library (P. Ryl. 457 or P 52), dated before the middle of the second century. The Bodmer Library, Geneva, houses another important collection of NT papyrus codices, including a copy of John's gospel dated c.A.D. 200 (P 66), an incomplete copy of Luke and John perhaps a decade or two earlier (P 75), and a third-century copy of 1 and 2 Peter and Jude with a number of other early Christian documents (P 72).

The most important manuscripts of the NT are the great uncials of the fourth and fifth centuries —so called because they are written in uncial letters, which were based on lapidary capitals. The Vatican and Sinaitic codices (B and Aleph respectively) are the best-known examples of these; they are fourth-century copies of the whole Greek Bible, beautifully produced on vellum, exhibiting a text characteristic of Alexandria. These two manuscripts form the chief biblical treasures respectively of the Vatican Library and the British Museum. The British Museum also houses the Alexandrine Codex (A), which was presented to King Charles I in 1627 by Cyril Lucar, who had recently been patriarch of Alexandria and thus legal owner of the manuscript. The Ephraem Codex (C) in the Louvre, Paris, is also a fifth-century manuscript of the Greek Bible; it owes its name to the fact that in the twelfth century its biblical text was scraped off to make room for some writings of the fourth-century Syriac father Ephraem. The original writing was later made visible again by the use of chemical reagents. A manuscript which has received this treatment is called a palimpsest (from a Greek adjective meaning "scraped again"). In Cambridge University Library the Codex of Beza (D) is preserved; this is the best-known example of a group of bilingual (Greek and Latin) NT manuscripts. This codex, containing the gospels and Acts, was written in the fifth or sixth century; it came into the possession of the Geneva Reformer Theodore Beza, who presented it to Cambridge University in 1581. It exhibits the "Western" text, which is marked by a number of peculiar deviations from other types of NT text, mainly amplifications and additions.

Two important gospel uncials are the Washington Codex (W), in the Library of the United States Congress, and the Koridethi Codex (Theta), in the Georgian State Library, Tiflis. They are important especially for the evidence they provide of the conventionally called "Caesarean" text of Mark; in addition, the Washington Codex includes a substantial expansion of the unauthentic ending of that gospel after Mark 16:14.

While the best-known uncials are traditionally designated by capital letters, all the uncials are officially listed in a series beginning 01 (Sinaitic).

In addition to nearly 270 uncials of the NT, there are about 2,800 minuscules, written (that is to say) in smaller letters approximating to ordinary cursive script. Whereas the official list of uncials is distinguished by 0 preceding each serial number, the official list of minuscules is numbered 1-2800. In addition to the regular uncial and minuscule manuscripts, well over 2,000 lectionaries containing the Greek text of the NT have been listed (their serial numbers are preceded by l ); in them the text has been arranged in selections for reading in church. In all, the Greek NT text in whole or in part is preserved in some 5,250 extant manuscripts, covering a range of nearly 1,400 years—a wealth of attestation such as no other body of ancient literature can approach.

The majority of later uncials, minuscules, and lectionaries exhibit the Byzantine Text—a revised form of the NT text standardized throughout Greek-speaking Christendom after the peace of the church, from the later years of the fourth century onward. This text was in its main essentials taken over into the earliest printed editions of the Greek Testament (the "Received Text") and is represented in the English AV and other early printed vernacular versions.

See BIBLE (ENGLISH VERSIONS).

BIBLIOGRAPHY: B.J. Roberts, The Old Testament Text and Versions (1951); E. Würthwein, The Text of the Old Testament (ET 1957); F.M. Cross, The Ancient Library of Qumran and Modern Biblical Studies (1958); F.G. Kenyon, Our Bible and the Ancient Manuscripts (revised by A.W. Adams, 5th ed., 1958); P.E. Kahle, The Cairo Geniza (2nd ed., 1959); F.F. Bruce, The Books and the Parchments (3rd ed., 1963); B.M. Metzger, The Text of the New Testament (2nd ed., 1968).

F.F. BRUCE

MANZ, FELIX (c.1498-1527). Anabaptist* Reformer. Son of a Zurich canon, he acquired a thorough knowledge of Latin, Greek, and Hebrew, joined Zwingli in 1519, but was alienated by his caution in reform, and with Grebel and Hetzer formed the original Swiss Brethren congregation. He distributed some of Carlstadt's* eucharistic tracts (1524). In 1525 Grebel, Manz, and others faced Zwingli in what was the first baptismal disputation. The council proclaimed Zwingli victorious and decreed that all children were to be baptized on pain of banishment. The brethren promptly performed "believer's baptism" in Manz's house, thus breaking with Zwingli. Manz endured several imprisonments, but his quiet, steadfast witness encouraged many to become Anabaptists. After further baptismal disputations, severer measures were introduced in 1526, including capital punishment by drowning for those rebaptizing. Manz and Blaurock were arrested later that year. On 5 January 1527 Manz was drowned in the River Limmat, the first Protestant martyr at the hands of Protestants.

J.G.G. NORMAN

MANZONI, ALESSANDRO (1785-1873). Romantic poet and Italian novelist. Though educated in the Somaschi schools, he was influenced by the theories of the Encyclopedists,* Voltaire, and the Revolution. By 1810, however, having come in touch with the Jansenist circle in Paris (led by the Abbé Degola), he had returned to the Christian faith, thence devoting his literary talent to the writings of works which had as collateral aim the proclamation of Christianity. Between 1812 and 1832 he published Inni sacri, sacred lyrics in which he exalts the great events of Christendom (Christmas, Easter, Pentecost, etc.) and their significant influence on humanity, while in his tragedies (Conte di Carmagnola, Adelchi) he develops the theme of justice and sovereignty of God as opposed to the oppression of the rulers. But it is in his great novel I promessi sposi ("The Betrothed," 2nd ed., 1820-42) that the author concentrates all his favorite Christian themes, i.e., the absolute control of Providence over men's lives and actions, the beauty and comfort of the simple faith of two humble peasants and other poor people who lived in the seventeenth century—one of the most difficult times in Italian history—and the sanctity of priestly vocation as opposed to the interests and ambitions of many Roman Catholic clergy.

Though Manzoni's conversion took place in Jansenist circles, it is difficult to assess to what extent he adhered to their doctrines. Throughout the novel he attacks with Jansenist rigorism any aspect of morale facile such as the end justifying the means; but in the conversion of one of his major characters he compromises, and the event is an act of grace completed by good works. Of interest here is also a treatise Osservazioni sulla morale cattolica (1819) in which Manzoni attempted to refute the attacks made by the historian Sismondi in his Histoire des republiques italiennes.

See RISORGIMENTO. DAISY RONCO

MARANO, see ANUSIM

MARBECKE, JOHN, see MERBECKE

MARBURG COLLOQUY (1529). A meeting of Protestant theologians to try to form a united front against the Roman Catholic threat. The efforts at harmony originated with Martin Bucer* and the Strasbourg theologians, but were frustrated by Luther's firmness. It was in response to political pressures that Landgrave Philip of Hesse brought Zwingli, Oecolampadius, Bucer, Capito, and John Sturm and other Swiss and Strasbourg theologians together with Luther, Melanchthon, Jonas, Brenz, Cruciger, and Osiander, the Lutherans at Marburg. The main question of debate was the meaning of the Lord's Supper. The S German group followed the teaching of Zwingli* that Communion was a sign or seal of divine grace already bestowed on the believer; the bread and wine were symbols of the body and blood of Christ, who was locally present in His own body in heaven and not on earth. Luther adhered to the interpretation that Christ's words "This is my body" meant a real presence of Christ and were not to be interpreted metaphorically.

As a result of their discussion, fifteen articles were issued expressing general agreement on doctrines such as the Trinity, the person of Christ, justification by faith, baptism, good works, confession, and secular authority. The fifteenth article, which dealt with Communion, rejected transubstantiation and the idea of the Mass as a sacrifice, insisting on the laity receiving both the bread and the wine as the spiritual partaking of the body and blood of Christ. Despite these articles the colloquy served to divide rather than unite the Protestants, setting the pattern of church splits which has continued into the twentieth century.

See W. Köhler, Das Marburger Religions-Gespräch (1929). ROBERT G. CLOUSE

MARCELLA (325-410). Christian ascetic. Of a noble Roman family, after her husband's early death she devoted herself to charitable works and ascetic practices. Her palace on the Aventine Hill became a center of Christian influence, and a retreat for Christian patrician women. Jerome was her guest for three years, and under his direction she gave herself to Bible study, prayers, and almsdeeds. When Alaric sacked Rome (410), the Goths ill-treated her, thinking she was concealing her wealth, and she died as a result.

MARCELLINA (c.330-c.398). Sister of Satyrus* and Ambrose* of Milan. Born in Rome, she helped her mother in Ambrose's education after her father's death. She was consecrated a virgin by Pope Liberius (353). Later she lived at Milan with Ambrose, who tried to dissuade her from excessive austerities. He dedicated his De Virginibus to her.

MARCELLUS OF ANCYRA (d. c.374). Bishop of Ancyra in central Anatolia. We know of him through his letter to Pope Julius I* (337-52), preserved by Epiphanius, which includes the oldest Greek text of the Old Roman Creed* and 115 fragments of a treatise of his embodied with but one exception in Eusebius of Caesarea's Contra Marcellum and De ecclesiastica theologia. These same fragments serve also as a principal source for the teachings of Sabellius. Marcellus had been a supporter with Athanasius* of the homoousion position at the Council of Nicea* (325), though his Christology seems to have been based on the notion that the Word of God became the Son only at the Incarnation. This fragmented treatise written about 335, which led to his deposition at the synod in Constantinople in 336, was his continuing effort in the homoousion cause, and was specifically directed against Asterius,* Eusebius of Nicomedia,* and Eusebius of Caesarea.*

In exile Marcellus found refuge with Julius in Rome, and subsequent to the arrival of Athanasius (339) participated in those council sessions (Rome, 341; Sardica, 343) which cleared him of all charges: namely, "the falsehood of Sabellius, the malice of Paul of Samosata, and the blasphemies of Montanus." While Marcellus was temporarily restored to his see (344), the emperor Constantius again removed him upon dissent of the Eastern bishops (347). He died in exile, only to have his position condemned as heretical at the Council of Constantinople in 381. Jerome indicated that Marcellus was the author of other works; it has been argued that some of them are confused among the writings of Athanasius.

CLYDE CURRY SMITH

MARCIAN (c.396-457). Eastern emperor from 450. An obscure retired tribune who became part of the dynasty through a marriage in form only with the virgin Pulcheria,* an ardently Nicene Christian and sister of the deceased Theodosius II. Marcian was persuaded by her and Leo I of Rome into calling the 451 Council of Chalcedon.* One result was the imperial espousal of the orthodox Definition. Marcian's reign saw also the termination of the raiding activities of the Huns under Attila.*

MARCION (second century). Prominent heretic. A wealthy shipowner from Sinope in Pontus (NE Asia Minor), he came to Rome shortly before 140. He was active for a time as a member of the orthodox community, but was excommunicated c.144. He organized his followers into a rival movement to orthodox Christianity; his churches were established in many parts of the empire and were both numerous and influential for nearly two centuries (though the movement did not die out until later).

Marcion stressed the radical nature of Christianity vis-à-vis Judaism.* In his theology there existed a total discontinuity between the OT and the NT, between Israel and the church, and even between the god of the OT and the Father of Jesus. Jesus came to reveal the true God, who was totally unknown up to the Incarnation. The god of the OT, the *demiurge, an inferior being who created the material world and ruled over it, was not exactly an evil being, but he was not good in the same sense as the God and Father of Jesus, a God of love and grace.

Paul was Marcion's hero and the one from whom (he thought) he derived his doctrine. His canon of sacred writings consisted of ten Pauline epistles (minus the Pastorals and and Hebrews) and the third gospel, both appropriately edited to suit his teaching (e.g., all passages were deleted from the letters of Paul which spoke of the Father as Creator, and the birth narratives were absent from his edition of Luke). His theology consisted of a series of antitheses (the title of his major work) —primarily between law (the principle of the demiurge and of the Jews) and gospel (the principle of the God of love and of redemption in Jesus), and between flesh (that which marks the material order and is evil) and spirit (the characteristic of the eternal realm). The law stresses rewards and punishments, and justification by works; the gospel features faith, freedom, and grace.

Scholars debate whether it is right to classify Marcion as a Gnostic.* He is certainly gnostic in his emphasis, especially in his negative attitude toward the body and the physical world; and his docetic Christology (see DOCETISM) and asceticism* also link him with the Gnostics. He does not, however, reproduce their fantastic mythology of redemption.

None of his writings have survived, though we can reconstruct large portions of his Antitheses from the extensive quotations in Tertullian's* Against Marcion, as well as from the refutations by other Church Fathers (notably Irenaeus*). His prologues or brief introductions to the epistles of Paul found their way into Latin biblical MSS of orthodox origin and have been preserved in this way.

The significance of Marcion lies in the fact that he compelled representatives of orthodox Christianity to deal seriously with the problem of evil, to think deeply about the biblical teaching concerning creation and redemption, to reexamine the Pauline writings, and to decide upon the question of the canon.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: A. Harnack, "Marcion," TU 45 (1921; rev. 1924), and Neue Studien zu Marcion (1923); J. Knox, Marcion and the New Testament (1942); E.C. Blackman, Marcion and His Influence (1948). W. WARD GASQUE

MARCIONITE PROLOGUES. These short introductions to the various Pauline epistles are so called because it is generally believed that they originated in Marcionite circles. They are to be found in some of the manuscripts of the Vulgate. Modern scholarship generally admits Marcionite origin (Hans Lietzmann explains their appearance in the Vulgate as the result of Marcionite teachers at Rome in the second century who translated the Greek epistles of Paul into Latin), although there is some disagreement (cf. M.J. Lagrange, Revue Biblique XXXV [1926], pp. 161-73).

MARCUS (second century). Gnostic.* Perhaps an Alexandrian, he taught in Asia Minor. Irenaeus and Hippolytus described him as a charlatan who deceived women by magical devices to become his prophetesses. He developed the ideas of Valentinus* in a one-sided fashion. A characteristic feature is "number-symbolism"; from the numerical values of divine names he sought to discover the nature and order of the aeons, and the mode by which the world came into being. His followers, Marcosians, flourished in the Rhone valley in the mid-second century. They stood right outside the church with their own institutions and special baptismal rites. As scriptures they used the *Acts of Thomas and other apocryphal books. They lingered into the fourth century. J.G.G. NORMAN

MARCUS AURELIUS (121-180). Roman emperor from 161. A Stoic philosopher, he in his Meditations expressed a high sense of duty toward mankind. Many of the Apologists*—including Justin, Athenagoras, Miltiades, Apollinaris, and Melito—felt that he might view the position of Christianity without prejudice and thus addressed their works to him. In fact, his particular intellectual stance made him less flexible. Faced with great military challenges on, and plagues within, his frontiers, he saw a successful outcome in loyalty to the old state religion. His mentors, Cornelius Fronto and Junius Rusticus, believed that Christianity was a dangerously revolutionary force, preaching gross immoralities and with an obstinate longing for death. Marcus Aurelius was sufficiently convinced to allow anti-Christian informers to proceed more easily, and the result was several outbreaks of severe local persecution, notably in Lyons in 177. During his reign the climate of educational opinion regarded Christianity as a sufficient challenge for anti-Christian intellectuals to thrive, most notably Celsus.* C. PETER WILLIAMS

MARGARET (d. 1093). Queen of Scotland. This gifted and masterful woman, famous alike for her austerities and her charities, became in 1070 the second wife of Malcolm Canmore, king of Scotland. The wedding took place a few months after she and her brother and sister, of the English royal line, had landed on the coast of Fife after fleeing from the Norman invasion. Over Malcolm and his subjects she exercised a remarkable influence, bringing Scotland fully under the Roman obedience and sweeping away most of what remained of Celtic Church* life and practice. Guardian of the orphan and succourer of the prisoners in her husband's dungeons, she cleansed the sores of the leper and washed the feet of the beggar with her own hands. Her work was carried to completion by her son, David I. Margaret lives today in the pages of Bishop Turgot's remarkable biography, enshrined in history as a saint and commemorated by the lovely Norman chapel in Edinburgh Castle which bears her name. She was canonized in 1250. D.P. THOMSON

MARGARET OF ANTIOCH. While there is no positive evidence of her existence, she was probably a martyr under Diocletian (303). Ambrose and John Chrysostom knew a Margaret, or Pelagia, who at fifteen preserved her chastity from violation by jumping off a building; others so named have suffered fabulous afflictions. Margaret became the subject of a medieval cult (she was one of the voices heard by Joan of Arc), though she was honored even earlier in the East. More recently she has been included among the fourteen auxiliary saints as a patron of childbearing. In art she is usually represented as a shepherdess or with a dragon.

MARGARET OF NAVARRE (1492-1549). Champion of the reform movement in France. Sister of Francis I, she first (1509) married Charles, duke of Alençon, and after his death Henry d'Albret, king of Navarre. She early came under the influence of the French Reformers Lefèvre d'Étaples, Guillaume Briçonnet, and others, giving them refuge when persecuted, first at Angoulême and later in Navarre. She also sought to reform the churches under her control and to influence her brother Francis to favor the reform movement which was growing at the time in France. She entered into correspondence with a number of the prominent Reformers, eventually becoming a Calvinist. She wrote several books of poetry and prose, the two best known being Miroir de l'âme pécheresse and l'Heptaméron. She died shortly after being forced by Henry II to marry her daughter to Antoine de Bourbon, who became the parents of Henry of Navarre, later Henry IV of France. W.S. REID

MARHEINEKE, PHILIPP KONRAD (1780-1846). German Protestant theologian and historian. He studied at Göttingen and taught there and at Erlangen and Heidelberg. In 1811 he became professor at the University of Berlin and from

1820 preached in the influential Dreifaltigkeitskirche as an associate of Schleiermacher.* He was an ardent admirer of Hegel's philosophy, and he attempted to use the Hegelian dialectic to support and interpret Christianity. His major work lay in the history of doctrine and in the study of symbolics. Among many published lectures and other writings, his most important works are Christliche Symbolik (3 vols., 1810-14), Geschichte der deutschen Reformation (2 vols., 1817), and Vorlesungen über die Bedeutung der hegelschen Philosophie in der christlichen Theologie (1842). A warm admirer of Luther, he espoused a liberal Pietism in his later years, claiming that because a thing was true it was in the Bible, not that because a thing was in the Bible it was true. HOWARD SAINSBURY

MARIANA, JUAN DE (1536-1623/24). Spanish Jesuit. Born at Talavera, he became a Jesuit in 1554 and read philology, history and theology at Alcalá, after which he lectured in theology at Rome (1561-64), Sicily (1564-69), Paris (1569-74), and Toledo, as well as preaching widely. His De Rege et Regis Institutione (1599), written at the request of Philip II, made him famous. It advocated the people's right to tyrannicide and made the Jesuits responsible for the assassination of Henry IV of France* and the Gunpowder Plot* in England. This view was condemned by the order in 1610. In De monetae mutatione he openly accused the Spanish officials of fraud and when imprisoned wrote a diatribe against the Jesuits. He wrote also several volumes on Spanish history and Scholia in Vetus et Novum Testamentum (1613). C.G. THORNE, JR.

MARIANISTS. Founded in 1817 in Bordeaux by William Joseph Chaminade (1761-1850), known as the Society of Mary, and distinguished from the Marists.* The Marianist Order introduced an original note in that priests and lay members have equal rights and privileges, except for those relating to administration of the sacraments. Members consecrate themselves irrevocably to the Blessed Virgin and wear a gold ring on the right hand as a token of this fact. Chaminade established the order as a cooperative effort between clergy and laity in fighting religious indifference, especially by means of educational works. The order was recognized by the pope in 1865, and in 1963 had 2,900 members throughout Europe, America, and Asia. ROYAL L. PECK

MARIAVITES. A Polish sect founded in Warsaw in 1906 by Jan Kowalski and Maria Felicja Kozlowska, who had both founded communities under the Franciscan Rule, but because of their suspected mysticism had been excommunicated from the Roman Church. The new union took its name from devotion to the Virgin Mary and was recognized by St. Petersburg and the Duma. Having negotiated with members of the Utrecht Schism, they ultimately joined the Old Catholics* (1909) with Kowalski their bishop. With Kozlowska's death, fanaticism within the sect increased noticeably and took the form of "mystic marriages" between priests and nuns, whose children were considered to be without original sin, destined to found a new, sinless race. In 1924 the Old Catholics renounced them. Kowalski, dethroned in 1935, was held by the Nazis and a split occurred. The majority followed bishops C.P. Feldmann (1935-45) and M. Sitek (1957- ), with a minority at the Felicjanów monastery. By 1962 their total number was but a fraction of the 200,000 it had been in 1911. C.G. THORNE, JR.

MARIOLATRY. The worship of Mary. The term is used critically by Protestants, but strictly speaking the Roman Catholic Church does not encourage latria (worship which is due to God alone) but hyperdulia (special veneration). The references to Mary in the NT do nothing to encourage such a cult, and it seems to have come unofficially into the church in the fourth century. Pressure arising from popular devotion led to the definition of the dogma of the Immaculate Conception of Mary in 1854, and that of her Assumption in 1950. She was thus officially provided in the Roman Catholic Church with a beginning and end of life parallel to those of Jesus, and terms like "our Lady" and the idea of her as mediatrix of redemption have helped to increase her importance as an object of devotion. R.E. NIXON

MARIOLOGY. The study of doctrine concerning the Virgin Mary connected with her person as such and her role in the plan of redemption, with special reference to the Incarnation. It is thus parallel to Christology, ecclesiology, pneumatology, etc. It has been pursued far more in the unreformed churches than in the Reformed because of different attitudes to Mariolatry.*

MARISTS (Society of Mary). Founded in 1816 by Jean Claude Courveille and Jean Claude Marie Colin, the order held that Mary desired to aid the church through a namesake congregation. Courveille joined the Benedictines at Solesmes (1826) and Colin carried on, drafting the constitutions with Rome's final approval in 1836. Comprising priests and lay brothers, the society sent missionaries to Oceania and spread rapidly to Europe, North America, and the Antipodes. Based on the Jesuit Rule, the Marists did parish work, taught school and seminary, and held home missions and chaplaincies. Four independent congregations constitute the Marists: fathers (with the third order attached), brothers, sisters, and missionary sisters. C.G. THORNE, JR.

MARITAIN, JACQUES (1882-1973). French philosopher. He is noteworthy both as an interpreter of Thomas Aquinas and as an independent thinker. Reared in liberal Protestantism, he was converted to the Roman Catholic Church in 1906, and in 1914 was appointed to the chair of modern philosophy at the Institute Catholique in Paris. From 1945 until 1948 he was French ambassador to the Vatican, and followed this by teaching at Princeton until his retirement in 1956. He lectured at many other places and was the author of over fifty books.

In his philosophy Maritain used not only Aristotle and Aquinas, but insights from other philosophical sources, and has taken account of modern empirical research in anthropology, sociology, and psychology. Maritain claimed there were different ways of knowing reality, as "mobile being" (nature), quantity (mathematics), and being as being (metaphysics), the last involving the use of a metaphysical intuition. Maritain refashioned the Five Ways of Thomas Aquinas and added his own sixth way. This proof involves coming to see, through intuition and reflection, that the "I" who thinks has some pre-personal existence in God, and hence that God exists.

In his moral philosophy, Maritain claimed that account must be taken of the data of revelation, amd allowed that though this made his work not strictly moral philosophy, he claimed that philosophical method is appropriate to it. He expended considerable effort in working out a truly Christian politics. He made a sharp contrast between sacral and secular civilization. Man is necessarily social, as is seen by his needs and his possession of gifts, though he is of greater value than society because he is destined for union with God. PAUL HELM

MARIUS MERCATOR (fl. c.418-452). Latin Christian polemicist. Augustine's* grateful response to two anti-Pelagian writings (now lost) submitted to him by Marius places this layman in Rome about 418. Probably originally from Africa, he resided in Constantinople from about 429 to about 451, perhaps as Pope Celestine's legate. His treatise of 429 against Celestius, presented to Theodosius II, and his rebuttal of Julian of Eclanum* helped secure the imperial banishment of these Pelagians from Constantinople. His works on the nature of Christ against Theodore of Mopsuestia* and Nestorianism,* supporting the position of Cyril* of Alexandria, aided in the condemnation of both heresies at the Council of Ephesus* in 431. Marius's extant writing consists chiefly of Latin translations of heretical treatises and orthodox refutations, rendering him a major source for the history of the Nestorian and Pelagian controversies. DANIEL C. SCAVONE

MARK, GOSPEL OF, see SYNOPTIC GOSPELS

MARK THE EVANGELIST. The widespread ancient tradition that the author of the second gospel was Mark is generally accepted today, but it is not so generally accepted that all the references to "Mark" in the NT refer to the same person, particularly as the Roman name "Marcus" must have been so common. John Mark, mentioned in Acts, was the son of Mary who played an important part in the earliest days of the church in Jerusalem and whose house was used for prayer (Acts 12:12,25). There is no mention of his father. Saul and Barnabas chose him as their companion on their first missionary journey in some subordinate role (Acts 13:5). He later left them and returned home (Acts 13:13), and after a quarrel with Paul, Barnabas took Mark with him on a tour of Cyprus (Acts 15:36-40). The Mark mentioned in the Pauline epistles was a cousin of Barnabas (Col. 4:10) who was a useful and faithful companion of Paul (Col. 4:11; Philem. 24; 2 Tim. 4:11). It does not seem hard to imagine that this is the same Mark, now reconciled to Paul. A Mark is also found with Peter at "Babylon" (almost certainly Rome) when 1 Peter was written. John Mark had dealings, with Peter as well as with Paul in Acts, so that this further identification seems natural enough and particularly as Papias connected Peter with the writing of Mark's gospel. Eusebius said Mark later became bishop of Alexandria. R.E. NIXON

MARK THE HERMIT (d. after 430). Eremite. He had been abbot of a monastery in Galatia, a contemporary and probably a disciple of John Chrysostom.* His extant works, written for the edification of the monks in his care, deal with theological questions in a manner which indicates Mark's ethical and practical rather than mystical approach, his independence of tradition, and his intention to base his arguments upon Scripture. He wrote opposing those who expect to gain grace by works, insisting like Paul that grace and justification are free gifts and that all good works are evidences of a prior work of grace. Both the Roman Catholic Bellarmine and the Protestant Ficker claimed to see a Protestant tone to his concept of justification, such that the former charged the Protestants with interpolating the text. Like Chrysostom, Mark accepted the doctrine of original sin, but denied that it utterly destroyed free will, which he felt was perfectly restored at baptism. MARY E. ROGERS

MARNIX, PHILIP (Philip van Marnix van St. Aldegonde) (1540-1598). Calvinist diplomat and religious writer, active in the revolt of the Low Countries* against Spanish rule. Born at Brussels, he was an able student who studied law at Louvain, Paris, and Padua, then went to Geneva where he studied under Calvin and Beza. As a young Calvinist nobleman in the Low Countries, he joined the rising opposition to Spain, defended the anti-Catholic rioting of 1566, fled over the German border to escape reprisal, and rejoiced as revolt broke out (1568). At twenty-nine Marnix wrote his famed anti-Catholic satire, the Beehive (Den Byencorf), which gained wide popularity, going through some twenty-five editions. He met the rebel leader William of Orange in Germany, helped influence his conversion to Calvinism, and became a trusted assistant. As the first territory was "liberated" (Brill, 1572), Marnix represented Orange at the Estates of Holland and Zeeland. As military governor of the Rotterdam area, he was captured by the Spanish, but freed in an exchange of prisoners (1574).

As the revolt spread to the S Lowlands, he had a major role in drafting the Pacification of Ghent (1576), demanding religious toleration and traditional liberties. Orange appointed him to his Council of State, and Marnix had a hand in the negotiations leading to the brief exercise of rule by Anjou, in an attempt to gain French aid. The military situation worsened; in 1583 Orange named him to defend Antwerp, in danger of capture. Marnix failed badly, lost Antwerp, and was called before the rebel Estates-General to defend his conduct. Orange's assassination in 1584 meant the end of Marnix's political career. He retired to his estate at Souberg in Walcheren, and spent the next decade in writing, working on a rhymed version of the Psalms, a translation of the Bible, and a lengthy treatise on religious differences. He died in Leyden. Marnix is sometimes credited with the anonymous rebel anthem "Wilhelmus van Nassua," but its authorship remains uncertain.

See A. Gerlo, Marnix van St. Aldegonde (1960).

DIRK JELLEMA

MARONITES. The only fully Roman Catholic Uniate church in the East. The name is derived from Maron, a Syrian solitary who died around 423. According to their tradition, Maronites have always been orthodox and in union with Rome, but in fact they were originally Monothelites* who followed Sergius* of Constantinople. In the last quarter of the seventh century they formed their own hierarchy. After associating with Crusaders they entered a rather unstable union with the Roman see in the thirteenth century. This union was strengthened at the Council of Florence in 1445 and at later synods, particularly one in 1736. A Jesuit named John Eliano worked hard at cementing the union, and due to his effort Rome has had a Maronite college since 1584. At a council in 1616 the Maronites moved against abuses in their fellowship; and again at a council between 1733 and 1742 under Patriarch Joseph IV they attacked abuses and inserted the Filioque in the creed.

Maronites have communed under one species since 1736. They follow a W Syriac liturgy. Their patriarch, with his auxiliary bishops living at his side, was known as "Patriarch of Antioch and All the East." Two cloisters, Bkirki and Kannobin near Beirut, serve as his residence. Dioceses were first established in 1736; diocesan clergy usually are married. Since 1926 the Maronite faith has been the chief confession of the Lebanese state, although Maronites make up only 30 per cent of the population (Muslims number 50 per cent). No census has been taken since 1932, to avoid trouble. The Lebanese president is always a Maronite. About 470,000 Maronites reside in Lebanon, and 380,000 in North and South America, the majority in the south. Other Maronites are found in Palestine, Syria, and Egypt. Congregations in the diaspora are subject to local Latin Rite bishops, but the Maronite patriarch remains their true head.

JOHN GROH

MAROT, CLÉMENT (1497-1544). French Protestant hymnist and poet. Born at Cahors, son of the court poet to Anne of Brittany, Marot in 1514 presented the future King Francis I with the Judgment of Minos and in 1518 entered the circle of Margaret of Navarre,* whose Protestant teachings influenced him. After his capture at Pavia in 1525 Marot wrote a poem on the NT for Francis I. Following the Placard affair, Marot fled to Ferrara. In 1536 at Lyons, Marot rejected Protestantism, receiving a house in the Paris suburbs from Francis I in 1539. Here he completed the metrical version of the Psalms from Vatable's Latin Version. This work appeared as twelve of the eighteen psalms in the first Calvinist hymnbook published at Strasbourg in 1539. In 1542 thirty such psalms were published with a royal dedication. Fleeing to Geneva for a year, Marot translated twenty more psalms at Calvin's urging for the 1542 Cinquante pseaumes. In 1562 Beza completed the hymnbook with 101 of his psalms added to 49 by Marot. Sixty-two editions appeared in three years.

MARVIN W. ANDERSON

MARPRELATE TRACTS. The violent tone of these pamphlets which appeared in 1588-89, their vigorous and often crude humor at the expense of the bishops, the mystery of who wrote them and the fascinating circumstances of their printing—all these have made them seem to be more important than in fact they were within the Puritan reforming program. Written by a fictitious "Martin Marprelate," there are eight extant: The Epistle, The Epitome, Certain Mineral and Metaphysical Schoolpoints, Hay any worke for Cooper (all printed by Robert Waldegrave); and Martin Junior, Martin Senior, More worke for the Cooper, and The Protestatyon of Martin Marprelat (all printed by John Hodgkins). All these titles are shortened forms. Their main importance lies in the fact that they spread alarm in official circles concerning secret printing presses and led to more repression of Puritans. There have been various suggestions as to the authorship of the pamphlets, e.g., John Udall, Thomas Cartwright, Job Throckmorton, John Penry, and Michael Hicks (Burghley's secretary). Whoever it was, he caused not a few leading ecclesiastics (e.g., Richard Bancroft) to write in reply.

PETER TOON

MARQUETTE, JACQUES (1637-1675). French Roman Catholic missionary and explorer. Born in Laon, France, he entered the Jesuit Order in 1654 and after twelve years of study and teaching went to Canada, where he was assigned to mission outpost work. He served among the Ottawa and Huron Indian tribes in the Lake Superior and Lake Michigan area. In 1673 he and Louis Joliet explored toward the west, discovering the Mississippi River. Marquette wanted to found a mission among the Illinois Indians, and died after spending some time preaching among them. He is known today mostly for his explorations, yet his missionary labors have not been forgotten.

MARRANO, see ANUSIM

MARRIAGE. The Christian concept of marriage is the union between a man and a woman that is recognized by society and has intended permanency. This ideal has not been, nor is now, practiced by all societies. The number, rights, and duties of married persons and the dissolubility of the marriage are sources of variance from society to society.

The OT presents a definite practice of polygyny with a marked tendency toward monogamy in the latter sections. Celibacy was foreign to the Hebrew culture. Marriage was patriarchal in form and consummated for the purposes of procreation (maintenance of family line and name were important), joy, fellowship, and companionship.

There was an ontological basis for the marriage, and the initial intercourse established the ontic bond. There tended to be a positive attitude toward sex and a general repugnance for its illicit use. Divorce was primarily the prerogative of the man and became much more frequent in the post-exilic age.

The Greeks and Romans saw marriage as a divine institution of importance to the state and to the family. Monogamy became the model for the institution, but divorce and remarriage were common. Since the primary reason for marriage was procreation, the wives often became bearers of children while the husbands amused themselves with concubines and prostitutes. Even with these discrepancies the Roman form of marriage had its effect upon the Christian institution.

There is a basic kerygmatic core in the biblical view of marriage determined primarily by the fact that marriage rests upon a primeval order of creation and is at the same time symbolically or parabolically incorporated in the order of salvation. Jesus declares that marriage as an original order of creation is indissoluble (Mark 10:2-12; Matt. 5:31,32 does give the possible exception of fornication), but marriage was not compulsory; for some the demands of the kingdom might involve a celibate life. Monogamy, based upon the henosis concept of one flesh, was rapidly becoming the ideal.

The NT exalts marriage to a new height of sanctity. "Marriage should be honored by all, and the marriage bed kept pure, for God will judge the adulterer and all the sexually immoral" (Heb. 13:4). The epistle to the Ephesians presents a very high view of marriage and even compares it to Christ's relationship to His church (5:22ff.).

Paul advocated celibacy for himself and for others who wished to serve the kingdom without hindrances. He recognized that family responsibilities encumbered a man's ability to serve (1 Cor. 7:32-34), and he wished that all the Corinthians might share his celibacy; but, like Jesus, he recognized that every man's marital status must be determined by God's gift of continency (1 Cor. 7:7). He encourages the unmarried and the widows to abide in the celibate state, but if they do not have this gift then by all means marry rather than burn in passion (1 Cor. 7:8,9). Paul's entire view of celibacy and marriage is greatly colored and even dictated by his eschatology. Paul looked for the imminent return of Christ, and he deemed it advisable not to change one's marital status during this time. It was time to prepare for the world where "those . . . will neither marry nor be given in marriage" (1 Cor. 7:29-31; cf. Luke 20:34,35). Although the celibacy passages are strong, Paul had a high view of marriage (1 Cor. 7:7, 10-11, 17,28,36).

The early Church Fathers, Clement of Alexandria* and Tertullian,* began to emphasize that all sexual desire was evil and that for most, marriage was an escape from sin. Clement thought marriage was superior to celibacy because a married man must practice self-denial and is less selfish; yet at the same time he speaks of the higher spiritual perfection of widows and virgins. Spritual marriages are advocated.

Augustine* advocated celibacy. Virginity was not necessarily higher than marriage, but those who lived it experienced a higher type of life. Marriage was given a sacramental position in the church, but the basic reasons for matrimony were procreation and the curbing of lust. Augustine came close to equating venereal emotion with original sin. Evil accompanied all acts, especially the coital act. Sex, even in marriage, was evil.

The basic teachings of the Roman Catholic Church were propounded by Thomas Aquinas.* Aquinas followed Augustine in exalting celibacy and still maintained that marriage was for procreation, for the curbing of lust, and to experience a sacrament. Coition was not an integral part of marriage, and the very act transmitted original sin. Continence should be practiced as much as possible. Divorce was not possible if the marriage was lawful, consummated, and Christian; Aquinas did recognize that the wife was more than an instrument of sexual gratification and thus exalted her place in marriage.

The monastic ideal, which Luther had once embraced, became the object of his bitter criticism. Even Catholic historians agree that the abuse of monasticism in Luther's time was rife. Clerical concubinage was an accepted institution, and homosexuality was lightly condoned. However, Luther condemned not only these desecrations, but the very institutions of celibacy. He felt that God had ordained marriage for all men as a remedy for sin. Only a very few men were given the ability to lead chaste lives outside the bonds of marriage. These few were to be considered angels on earth.

The rite of marriage, for Luther, was a "worldly" (civil) act for which the church had no constitutive importance. In the very order of creation, marriage was constituted for all men and not only for Christians; the church can only give her blessing to the marriage that has already been contracted. The marriage becomes the business of the church only when a matter of conscience is involved. For Luther to designate marriage as "worldly" did not mean that it had not spiritual relevance; on the contrary, the worldly and spiritual poles of marriage are not antithetical, but complementary. Luther denied the sacramental nature of marriage, but held tenaciously to its permanency. The Reformer John Calvin* gave new and refreshing interpretations of marriage. First, he elevated woman to a position of mutual responsibility within the marriage. He still saw marriage as an institution for procreation and as a remedy for sin, but he went much further. He taught that the primary purpose of marriage is social and not generative and is the highest relationship known to man. No bond in human relations is more sacred than that by which husband and wife unite to become one body and one soul. He did not condemn virginity, but did disapprove of celibate vows. He also was willing to grant grounds for divorce for adultery, impotency, desertion, or religious incompatibility.

The Puritans* built upon the teachings of Calvin and gave greater equality and independence to women; discouraged celibacy; liberalized divorce laws (but few were granted); proclaimed marriage a civil ordinance; and encouraged the companionship concept of marriage. The sexual ethics of Calvin were, however, reinterpreted in a more legalistic, narrow way. Coitus was just for procreation, but was not to be refused if the other partner felt it necessary. Along with the early Church Fathers they saw all sexual relationships, even in marriage, as bad or evil.

In more recent decades the attitudes of Christians toward the sexual aspects of marriage have changed considerably. The deeper understanding of personality and human behavior made possible by modern psychology has caused sexual activities to be viewed as a more positive element within marriage—not merely a "remedy against sin" or a means of procreation. This new understanding has brought about a wide acceptance of contraceptive methods. (Officially the Roman Catholic Church is opposed to these, but many Catholics use them.)

Much has been made of the psychological understanding of the sexual consummation of marriage. The psychological unity produced is akin to the biblical henosis and affects the vital wills of these persons. It also produces an intuitive self-awareness and self-understanding that is unavailable in any other context. This too is amazingly kin to the biblical concept of "to know."

Contextual ethics with respect to divorce, remarriage, and all borderline cases have become acceptable to many. They maintain that men must, as Paul did, make their standards relative but never forget that all relative achievement must fall under the judgment of God. As far as the order of creation is concerned there can be no divorce and hence no remarriage, but the "order of necessity" is real and the allowance for divorce is in keeping with reality. Many reject this as being too arbitrary.

Patterns of marriage continue to change in modern society—group marriage, monogamy, polygyny, exogamy, and polyandry are all found to some degree. However, monogamic marriage with premarital chastity and marital fidelity seem to be the ideals established by the Christian community. The ideal of premarital chastity has been heavily challenged by the younger generation, but the church has stood firm on its NT interpretations.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: O.D. Watkins, Holy Matrimony: A Treatise on the Divine Laws of Marriage (1895); G.H. Joyce, Christian Marriage: An Historical and Doctrinal Study (1948); R.H. Bainton, What Christianity Says about Sex, Love and Marriage (1957); W.M. Capper and H.M. Williams, Towards Christian Marriage (4th ed., 1958); D.S. Bailey, The Man-Woman Relation in Christian Thought (1959); H.A. Bowman, A Christian Interpretation of Marriage (1959); P.G. Hansen et al., Engagement and Marriage: A Sociological, Historical and Theological Investigation ... (1959); O.A. Piper, The Biblical View of Sex and Marriage (1960); H. Thielicke, The Ethics of Sex (1964).

JOHN P. DEVER

MARROW CONTROVERSY, THE. One of the most significant controversies the Church of Scotland has ever known, it began in England in 1645 with publication of a work entitled The Marrow of Modern Divinity. Authorship was traditionally attributed to Edward Fisher,* but this seems improbable. An exposition of Federal Theology, the book largely comprises extracts from Reformers, including Luther and Calvin, and from the English Puritans. It had gone through seven editions by 1648, when a second part was published: an exposition of the Ten Commandments which, like the first part, contrived a middle course between antinomianism and legalism.

About 1700 Thomas Boston* purchased the first part from a Berwickshire parishioner, and it greatly influenced his preaching. His recommendation led finally to the book's reprinting in 1718, with a preface by James Hog of Carnock. It proved anathema to the legalism of the Moderates,* and in 1720 the general assembly, condemning the book as heretical and antinomian, passed an act prohibiting ministers from commending it, and enjoining them to warn their parishioners against it. Despite a document signed by Boston, Ebenezer Erskine,* and ten other "Marrowmen," who saw an attack on evangelical truth, the protesters were formally admonished and rebuked by the 1722 assembly. Many Moderates had urged a more severe sentence, and embarked on a systematic persecution of Marrowmen, whose preaching nevertheless attracted great numbers. The controversy gradually subsided, and when Boston produced in 1726 a new edition of The Marrow with extensive notes, the establishment found it prudent not to pursue the matter further.

See D. Beaton, "The 'Marrow of Modern Divinity' and the Marrow Controversy," Records of the Scottish Church History Society, vol. I, part III (c.1925), pp. 112-34. J.D. DOUGLAS

MARSDEN, SAMUEL (1764-1838). Anglican chaplain to the convict colony of New South Wales. He was educated at Magdalene College, Cambridge, but at the suggestion of William Wilberforce* left for Australia without taking his degree. He arrived in Sydney in 1794 and was stationed at Parramatta, where he remained until his death. On the departure of Richard Johnson* in 1800 he was the only chaplain in the colony, and in 1810 he became senior chaplain after a visit to England to recruit others. Marsden's activities have been the subject of much controversy. Like most officials in the colony, he took up farming, and his very success occasioned comment. On appointment as a magistrate he gained a reputation for severity scarcely excused by the character of the colony. There is no evidence that he neglected parish duties and church affairs. He is famous as the founder of the mission to the Maoris of New Zealand under the Church Missionary Society. He preached the first sermon in New Zealand in 1814 and made seven journeys in support of the infant mission, often at his own expense. He did much too to establish the Evangelical character of the Church of England in Sydney.

NOEL S. POLLARD

MARSHALL, PETER (1902-1949). Presbyterian minister. Born in Coatbridge, Scotland, he studied at technical school and mining college, but in 1927 went to the USA, read theology at Columbia Seminary, Georgia, and was naturalized in 1938. Ordained to the Presbyterian ministry in 1931, he held pastorates in Georgia before becoming minister of New York Avenue Presbyterian Church, Washington, D.C., in 1937. He was chaplain to the U.S. Senate from 1947, where he was known for remarkably pithy prayers. He wrote The Mystery of the Ages (a study in Ephesians) and Mr. Jones, Meet the Master.

MARSHALL, STEPHEN (1594?-1655). Puritan divine. Born in Huntingdonshire and educated at Emmanuel College, Cambridge, he became lecturer at Wethersfield and then vicar of Finchingfield, Essex. During Archbishop Laud's supremacy he was often in trouble; his Puritan and Presbyterian influence in Essex was far-reaching from 1630 to 1655. In the electioneering for the Short and Long Parliaments of 1640 he was active on behalf of Puritans. He preached before the Long Parliament many times. He was a member of the Westminster Assembly* and one of the commissioners sent by it to Scotland. Despite his earlier Presbyterianism he cooperated with the Independents when they came to power in 1649. In Cromwell's state church he was a "Trier." His most famous publications were sermons preached before Parliament—e.g., Meroz Cursed (1641). He died of consumption and was buried in Westminster Abbey, but his body was removed in 1661. PETER TOON

MARSHMAN, JOSHUA (1768-1837). Baptist missionary. Born at Westbury Leigh, Wiltshire, he had a scanty education but read avidly while working with his weaver father. He married Hannah Shepherd (1791), and they had twelve children. He became master of a Baptist school at Broadmead, Bristol (1794). He offered for the Baptist Missionary Society and sailed for India with William Ward to join William Carey* in 1799. Forbidden to land by the East India Company, they settled at Danish Serampore, where Carey joined them. There they preached, taught, itinerated, and translated. Joshua and Hannah opened boarding schools to help pay for printing the Scriptures. An able Orientalist, he published the works of Confucius, Chinese grammars, and a Chinese version of the Bible. J.G.G. NORMAN

MARSIGLIO (Marsilius) OF PADUA (c.1275-1342). Political philosopher. Born in Padua, Italy, he began his academic career in medicine there. Later he went to Paris where he became rector of the university in 1313. In 1324 he completed the work for which he is famous, Defensor pacis ("Defender of the peace"). Because of the very strong antipapal tone of the work, when his authorship was discovered in 1326 he was forced to leave Paris and went to the court of King Louis IV of Bavaria, who was excommunicated as the result of a dispute with Pope John XXII. In 1328 Louis IV seized Rome, and Marsiglio was named the imperial vicar of the city. Some of his political theories were put into practice, but the people of Rome turned against Louis and he left, taking Marsiglio with him. Marsiglio went back to Bavaria and spent the rest of his life there. Toward the end of his life he wrote another work, Defensor minor, basically a restatement of his earlier and more important work.

Defensor pacis is divided into three books: the first deals with a philosophy of the state; the second with the theology of the church; and the third is a summary. Marsiglio argued that the unifying element in society is the state and not the church. The chief function of the secular ruler is to maintain peace. He gave power to the people to create law, to govern the common welfare, and to choose a ruler whom they could overthrow if he violated their laws. In book two he chastised the papacy for causing dissension in the world as it improperly attempted to control the temporal world. Papal claims for such control were invalid since Christ supported submission to temporal power, the church's hierarchy was not divine but human, and the temporal prerogatives claimed dated to the Donation* of Constantine and thus were ultimately secular in origin and not inherent right of papacy. He stated the only power possessed by the church was spiritual in nature. He was in favor of the secularly called general council as supreme in the church. His ideas ran counter to political theory of the papacy and help to explain why he was condemned by the papacy and why he is often seen as one of the forerunners of the Reformation period political thought. Defensor pacis was published in 1517, placed on the Index in 1559, but studied carefully by many Reformers.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: E. Emerton, Defensor Pacis of Marsiglio of Padua (1920); C.W. Previté-Orton (ed.), Defensor Pacis (1928); A.P. D'Entrèves, Medieval Contribution to Political Thought (1939); A. Gerwith, Marsilius of Padua: The Defender of the Peace (2 vols., 1951-56); C. Pincin, Marsilio (1967); J. Quillet, La philosophie politique de Marsile de Padoue (1970).

ROBERT SCHNUCKER

MARTEL, CHARLES, see CHARLES MARTEL

MARTENSEN, HANS LASSEN (1808-1884). Danish bishop and theologian. As a student he was impressed by N.F.S. Grundtvig*; later on a study tour to Germany he was greatly influenced by Hegel and the Roman Catholic philosopher of religion, Father Baader. In 1838 he was appointed lecturer and in 1840 professor of systematic theology at Copenhagen University; from 1854 until his death he was bishop of Zealand. As a teacher he exerted extraordinary influence upon his students. He held also a preaching ministry through which many were reached. His two principal works are Den christelige Dogmatik (1849; ET and other languages) and Den christelige Ethik (1871-78). He makes a strong attempt to bring about a harmonious synthesis between faith and thought, theology and philosophy, Christianity and culture. He insists upon the principle "credo, ut intelligam." Nevertheless, his theology is stamped by mystical and speculative elements. As a bishop he carried on the "centripetal" policy of his predecessor, J.P. Mynster.* Unlike most other church people of his time, Martensen displayed some understanding of socialism and the legitimacy of the claims of the workers. This finds expression in his book Socialisme og Kristendom (1874). He wrote also Katholicisme og Protestantisme (1874), provoked by the 1870 Vatican Council. N.O. RASMUSSEN

MAR THOMA CHURCH, see MALABAR CHRISTIANS

MARTIN I (d. 655). Pope from 649. A native of Tuscany, he was elected successor to Pope Theodore I, but before his election had been confirmed by the emperor Constans II, he had condemned Monothelitism* at the Lateran Synod (649). In 648 Constans had issued the "Typos," a mandate forbidding further discussion of the matter. The Lateran Synod condemned the "Typos" and the earlier "Ecthesis,"* and affirmed its adherance to the doctrine of two wills and two energies corresponding to the two natures of Christ. Constans tried vainly to induce Olympius, the exarch of Ravenna, who was friendly to Martin, to arrest the pope. However, the next exarch, Theodore Calliopas, did seize him. After a year's captivity at Naxos, Martin was brought to Constantinople in December 654. He was charged with treason, publicly stripped of his episcopal robes, and banished to the Chersonesus (Crimea). He was treated with great cruelty and seems to have died en route. He was the last of the popes to be venerated as a martyr. J.G.G. NORMAN

MARTIN IV (c.1210-1285). Pope from 1281. Simon de Brie, a native of Touraine, was appointed chancellor of France by Louis IX in 1260, and in 1261 he was created cardinal of St. Cecilia and papal legate by Urban IV. As legate he negotiated the advancement to the Sicilian throne of Louis's brother, Charles of Anjou. In 1281 he was elected pope through pressure exerted by Charles, whose tool he remained. He restored Charles to the position of Roman senator of which he had been deprived by Pope Nicholas III. With a view toward aiding Charles's projected attack on the Eastern Empire, Martin excommunicated Emperor Michael VIII Palaeologus, thus destroying the union of the Latin and Byzantine churches achieved at the Council of Lyons in 1274. The "Sicilian Vespers,"* the anti-French rebellion in Sicily in 1282, forced Charles to abandon his plans to reconquer Constantinople. Pleas by the Sicilians for papal suzerainty were refused by Martin, so they turned to Peter of Aragon. Martin thereupon excommunicated the Sicilians and organized a crusade against Peter under Philip III of France, but it failed dismally. Deeply interested in the Franciscan Order, he extended their privileges in the bull Ad fructus uberes in 1281. Martin's pontificate marked the decline of papal political power. J.G.G. NORMAN

MARTIN V (1368-1431). Pope from 1417. Elected pope at the Council of Constance, he ended the Great Schism,* winning general recognition in W Europe except in Aragon, where the former Avignonese antipopes maintained their positions until 1429. Although the French offered Avignon as his residence, he decided to return to Rome. He reached Florence in 1419, but stayed there until 1420 because Rome was in the hands of Joan of Naples. When he got to Rome, the city was in ruins, and other parts of the Papal States were either in revolt or in the hands of usurpers. The pope reestablished papal control, not only over central Italy, but also in the entire Western Church. He corresponded with the sovereigns of Europe and sent peace missions to England and France, who were involved in the Hundred Years' War.

The pope also devoted attention to the Hussites who, reacting violently to the martyrdom of Jan Hus* at Constance, rebelled against the Holy Roman Emperor, Sigismund,* spread terror in neighboring Catholic countries, and necessitated several crusades in an attempt to crush them. In 1423, five years after Constance, Martin summoned the Council of Pavia-Siena, but the attendance was poor and he quickly dissolved it. Despite his previous commitment to conciliarism, he successfully opposed limitation of the papal monarchy. Martin also reorganized the Roman Curia, uniting the bureaucracies of Rome and Avignon and establishing a model administration. A rebuilding program was initiated in Rome, and efforts were made to end the schism between the Eastern and Western churches.

See P. Partner, The Papal States Under Martin V (1958). ROBERT SCHNUCKER

MARTINEAU, JAMES (1805-1900). English Unitarian minister and teacher. Born at Norwich, he held various teaching posts before becoming in 1832 minister of a church in Liverpool and simultaneously professor of philosophy in Manchester New College. He became principal there in 1869. He began his career as a follower of Joseph Priestley,* holding the characteristic doctrines of Unitarianism because of their allegedly biblical character. Later, in his Rationale of Religious Enquiry (1836) he adopted a more rationalistic position, and came finally to advocate a philosophical theism grounded on the moral consciousness, opposing the materialism of Spencer and Tyndall. Martineau had a great literary output (e.g., Types of Ethical Theory, 1885) and became a popular figure in his attempts to harmonize religion and the "modern thought" of the Victorian era. He was also active in the temperance movement. PAUL HELM

MARTIN OF BRAGA (Bracara) (c.510/520-579). Archbishop and writer. Born in Pannonia (modern Hungary), he became a monk in Palestine and moved to Gallaecia in the NW part of Spain around 550. He established a quasi-eremitical monastery in Dumio and became its abbot, then was named bishop of Dumio in 561. Sometime before 572 he was elevated to be metropolitan of Bracara, the Suevian royal city, where he worked successfully to convert Arians, including the king whom he baptized in 556. A competent translator well trained in theology, Martin read and referred to the writings of Seneca, Augustine, Cassian, and Caesarius of Arles. One of his treatises, dedicated to King Miro (570-83), examined the four cardinal virtues on the basis of one of Seneca's lost works. A sermon titled De correctione rusticorum, composed for Bishop Polemius of Astorga, contributes much to the history of culture with its description of peasant superstitions. Well respected outside of Spain, he also composed works on canon law, liturgy, and the church calendar. JOHN GROH

MARTIN OF TOURS (c.335 - c.400). Pioneer of monasticism in Gaul. Born at Sabaria, Pannonia (modern Hungary), the son of a pagan soldier, he became a catechumen at the age of ten. His father enlisted him in the Roman army at fifteen, and three years later came the famous incident when he divided his military cloak with a beggar at Amiens and subsequently had a vision of Christ wearing the half-cloak. About two years later he was baptized. Obtaining his discharge from the army in 358, he visited Pannonia seeking his parents' conversion. In 361 he joined Hilary of Poitiers,* adopted the monastic life, and founded a monastic community at Ligugé. His disciples lived as hermits at first, meeting occasionally for common exercises. He wrote no rule; they simply followed the general traditions of the ascetic life. Later he moved his monastery to Marmoutier. In 372, by popular acclaim he was unwillingly made bishop of Tours. He engaged in active missionary work in Touraine, introduced a rudimentary parochial system, and encouraged monasticism. In 386 he protested to Emperor Maximus against the first execution for heresy, that of the Spaniard, Priscillian. His life was written by his friend Sulpicius Severus. J.G.G. NORMAN

MARTYN, HENRY (1781-1812). Anglican missionary to India. Born in Cornwall, he received his early education there before embarking on a brilliant academic career at Cambridge. The sudden death of his father led eventually to a spiritual awakening, and to his ordination in 1803 as curate to Charles Simeon* at Holy Trinity Church, Cambridge. He was the first Englishman to offer to the newly formed Church Missionary Society, but for reasons beyond his control he was not accepted. Further disappointment and intense unhappiness came when after a protracted period his proposal of marriage was not accepted. In 1805 Martyn sailed for India as a chaplain to the East India Company, and arrived at Calcutta where he enjoyed fellowship with two other Evangelical chaplains, Daniel Corrie and David Brown.

His outstanding linguistic gifts led to his great life-work, the translation of the NT and the Book of Common Prayer into Hindustani. His forthright preaching to British congregations caused offense, as did his constant attempts to make contact with native Indians, both Hindus and Muslims. Posted at first to Calcutta, he was appointed to Dinapore in 1806, and to Cawnpore in 1809, where incipient tuberculosis and the intense summer heat almost caused his death. In 1810 he was advised to take a sea voyage, and being anxious to complete an Arabic and Persian translation of the NT, he traveled to Shiraz, where he talked and worked for long hours with Persian scholars, gaining their respect and confidence in argument and debate, and finishing his task in February 1812. He set out for home, but hard traveling and constant fever brought about his death at Tokat in Armenia in October of that year. He was buried there. His Journals were brought home after his death and remain among the classics of English devotional literature, revealing the intensity of his dedication to the service of Christ and the cause of Christian missions.

See C.E. Padwick, Henry Martyn, Confessor of the Faith (1953). G.C.B. DAVIES

MARTYR; MARTYROLOGY. A basic definition of the term "martyr" is provided by Origen: "One who of his own free choice chooses to die for the sake of religion." The Greek word (martys) means simply "witness" in the legal sense, and it carries this neutral connotation in several NT passages (e.g., Mark 14:56,59,63; Luke 22:71). The ground, however, is already prepared in the NT for the later development of the term, when it becomes the equivalent of a blood witness, i.e., one who dies for his faith and "prefers to die rather than deny his religion and live" (Origen). Stephen (cf. Acts 22:20) is appealed to in the later church as the "perfect martyr" as well as the protomartyr. An otherwise unknown figure, Antipas (Rev. 2:13) is mentioned as both a martyr and a Christian who was killed for his faith. In the Apocalypse the term receives its full technical sense (cf. 6:9; 17:6; 20:4).

The background of the idea, if not the precise term itself, lies in Jewish history, especially in the prophets' fidelity to their mission and consequent suffering. In particular, at the time of the Maccabean struggle against the Syrians, the main traits of Jewish martyrdom which later were to influence the Christian martyrs were fixed. These are seen in such features as the expiatory element in human suffering and an apocalyptic dimension that provided the necessary fanaticism to overcome first the Syrian dictator and then the Roman power. The belief in resurrection, clearly articulated in the Maccabean age, obviously was a needed conviction to sustain the Christian heroes and heroines.

In retrospect, both Paul's and Peter's deaths are hailed as acts of martyrdom. With Ignatius of Antioch (c.115) the thought of the martyr's conscious imitation of his Lord's passion appears (Phil. 2:7; Rom. 6:3), and this formed a powerful motif in the later martyrologies.

One early martyrdom became the model for all subsequent resistance unto death. Polycarp* of Smyrna died after interrogation in the amphitheater; and his hagiographer has graphically recorded his last days in a way which became standard for later Acta. The veneration of the martyrs' bones was a practice which began with Polycarp's remains, and an annual event was observed as a "celebrating of the birthday of his martyrdom." This is the origin of the idea of martyrology by which is meant the commemoration of the martyrs' sacrifice. Later, intercessory powers were attributed to the martyr.

The fullest description of early Christian martyrs is that of those who died in Lyons and Vienne in Gaul. The later persecutions under Decius (whose edict in 250 initiated the first universal and systematic persecution of the church) and Diocletian (303) produced their crop of martyrs both in the strict sense of those who chose to die rather than recant and those who were confessors and were tortured for their faith.

The standard work with its full bibliography is W.H.C. Frend, Martyrdom and Persecution in the Early Church (1965). RALPH P. MARTIN

MARVELL, ANDREW (1621-1678). English poet. Born near Hull and educated at Cambridge, he traveled on the Continent and acted as tutor to the daughter of Lord Fairfax at Nunappleton House, which provided the subject for a poem and may also have inspired "The Garden." He was subsequently assistant Latin secretary to Milton under Cromwell and after the Restoration was member of Parliament for Hull. In this latter period he wrote much controversial prose and satiric verse, most of it now forgotten. His poems were not published until 1681. His fame rests on a slender but nonetheless firm base. "To His Coy Mistress" is a fine love-poem in the carpe diem witty manner, and "The Coronet" is a subtle, Metaphysical exploration of the sin that inevitably mars man's noblest efforts at worship. It is "The Garden," however, that marks his supreme achievement with its quasi-mystical treatment of the retirement theme, the mind rediscovering Paradise in its own creative self-sufficiency.

ARTHUR POLLARD

MARY (the Virgin Mary). Mother of Jesus. The Greek name Maria or Mariam renders the Hebrew Miriam. There is comparatively little reference to Mary in the NT outside the birth and infancy stories of Matthew and Luke. Matthew records these largely from the point of view of Joseph. He is referred to as "the husband of Mary, of whom was born Jesus" (Matt. 1:16), but it is made plain that the conception of Jesus took place when they were betrothed but before they had intercourse (Matt. 1:18-25). The Holy Spirit was stated to be the one through whom she had conceived. The statement that he had no intercourse with her until she had borne a son (Matt. 1:25) implies that they had normal marital relations afterward.

Luke's first two chapters are centered around Mary. The angel Gabriel announces to her that she is to bear a son called Jesus (Luke 1:26-38). Here also it is emphasized that she is betrothed to Joseph, that she has had no intercourse with him, and that it is the Holy Spirit who has brought about the conception. We see also in this passage Mary's willing dedication of herself to this unique role of being the mother of the Son of God, and the angel's address to her as "highly favored" (the recipient, not the giver of grace). Luke then records the visit of Mary to her cousin Elizabeth (Luke 1:39-56). Elizabeth describes her as "blessed among women" and "the mother of my Lord." Mary then gives voice to her song, based upon the song of Hannah (1 Sam. 2:1-10), which is known as the Magnificat. In this she praises God for His gracious action on behalf of His people and in particular of herself. She exults that all generations shall call her blessed because of what God has done for her. Luke then records the birth of Jesus of Mary at Bethlehem and the visit of the shepherds at the angel's command (2:1-20).

After reference to the circumcision of Jesus, there follows the account of the presentation in the Temple (Luke 2:21-40). Simeon tells Mary that a sword will pierce her soul because of Jesus. Finally in these chapters, there is the visit to Jerusalem for the Passover when Jesus is twelve (Luke 2:41-51). In this Mary is lovingly rebuked by Jesus for not understanding that He must be in His Father's house. A similar sort of rebuke is found in the story of the wedding at Cana (John 2:1-11). Otherwise, references to Mary in the ministry are almost entirely incidental, and it is stressed that obedience to the will of God is more important than blood relationship (Mark 3:31-35; Luke 11:27f.). John records Mary's presence at the crucifixion (John 19:25-27) and her commendation to the care of the beloved disciple. She is mentioned elsewhere in the NT only in Acts 1:14.

Mary clearly holds in the gospels a considerable place of honor because of her unique role, but there is no justification in history or in theology for the cultus which was to grow up around her figure in the church. In the fourth century Epiphanius had to rebuke heretics who worshiped her, but the Nestorian* controversy of the fifth century led to catholic Christians describing her as Theotokos, "bearer of God." Together with this went the idea of her perpetual virginity, and these led on to the idea of her immaculate conception. The antithesis between Eve—the cause of the fall of the human race—and Mary—the cause of its redemption—was developed into the idea of her having a mediatorial role in the economy of salvation. This was particularly stressed in popular medieval devotion because of the apparent remoteness of Christ. The idea of the assumption of Mary to heaven was also developed. In 1854 Pius IX* proclaimed the dogma of the Immaculate Conception* and in 1950 Pius XII* that of the Assumption.* Many liturgical observances are associated with Mary, but Reformed churches have at most observed the Annunciation (25 March) and the Purification (or Presentation of Christ in the Temple—2 February).

See G. Miegge, The Virgin Mary (ET 1955), and M. Thurian, Mary, Mother of the Lord, Figure of the Church (ET 1963); J. McHugh, The Mother of Jesus in the New Testament (1975).

R.E. NIXON

MARY, GOSPEL OF. The Gnostic work which goes under this title is found in the Coptic Papyrus Berolinensis 8502, found in Egypt and brought to the British Museum in 1896. It is preserved only in part, with the text of the final pages preserved in Greek (its original form) in Papyrus 463 (Oxyrhynchus). As the text is transmitted, it contains two separate parts. The first is a fragmentary conversation between the risen Christ and His disciples in which the discussion about matter and sin and preaching the Gospel to the heathen is a source of bewilderment to them. Mary (Magdalene) intervenes to comfort them, and she is then besought (in the second part) to reveal secrets of Gnostic redemption. The exchange between Mary and Peter is interesting since it departs from the normal antifeminist Gnostic line in defense of Mary, as Levi is made to rebuke Peter. The document is dated from the second or third century. RALPH P. MARTIN

MARY, GOSPEL OF THE BIRTH OF. The existence of this treatise is known only from the reference to it by Epiphanius.* He ascribes the work to a Gnostic source which twisted the record of the canonical gospels (here Luke 1) into an anti-Judaic polemic. The document tells how Zechariah, father of John, was killed in the Temple. The title (Genna Marias) evidently refers to the birth or genealogy of Mary, the mother of Jesus.

MARY, QUEEN OF SCOTS (1542-1587). Daughter of James V and Marie de Guise-Lorraine, she became queen when six days old. During her minority the pro-English and Protestant interests gained at the expense of the pro-French Catholic group, and in 1560 the Estates of Parliament abolished the authority of the pope in Scotland, forbade the celebration of Mass, and adopted a Reformed Confession of Faith (the Scots Confession*). Mary's upbringing was French and Catholic, and she was consort of Francis II of France, 1559-60. She returned to Scotland in 1561 after thirteen years in France. Regarded by Catholics as the rightful queen of England because of her descent from Henry VII and Elizabeth's alleged illegitimacy, Mary was for the rest of her life the focus of international intrigue. Her personal rule in Scotland was remarkably successful at its beginning. While she incurred the opposition of John Knox* over Mass in her private chapel, she conciliated moderate opinion by acquiescing in the division of church revenues whereby a third was shared by the Protestant ministers and the Crown, and in legislation implying the recognition of the Reformed Church.

Her downfall was caused by the English succession question and her marriages to Henry (Lord Darnley) in 1565 and James Hepburn, earl of Bothwell, in 1567. Darnley's claim to the English throne was almost as good as her own, but the marriage was disastrous personally and politically. Her marriage to Darnley's supposed murderer, Bothwell, completed her ruin. In 1567 she was deposed by a coalition of nobles who proclaimed her son by Darnley as James VI. After an unsuccessful bid to regain power, she fled to England where she was imprisoned as an alleged accomplice to Darnley's murder. A series of Catholic plots to place her on the English throne resulted in her execution at Fotheringay.

See A. Fraser, Mary, Queen of Scots (1969), and I.B. Cowan (ed.), The Enigma of Mary Stuart (1971). HENRY R. SEFTON

MARY MAGDALENE. The name probably refers to her being an inhabitant of Magdala on the western side of the Sea of Galilee. She is first mentioned in Luke 8:2 as someone out of whom seven demons had been cast. The exact nature of her complaint—physical, emotional, or spiritual—is unknown. It is unlikely that she is to be identified with the sinful woman who anointed Jesus (Luke 7:37ff.), as Luke fails to make any explicit connection. She was a witness to the crucifixion along with the other women who had accompanied Jesus on His last journey to Jerusalem (Mark 15:40, etc.). She was particularly prominent at the time of the resurrection. She went with the others to the tomb (Mark 16:1, etc.), but John mentions her alone as running to tell the disciples that the stone had been removed (John 20:1f.). John also records the moving scene where she meets Jesus but does not recognize Him until He addresses her by name, then she seeks to cling to Him instead of accepting a new relationship with Him on a different plane (John 20:11ff.).

R.E. NIXON

MARY OF EGYPT (c.344-c.421). Said to have had an infamous early life in Alexandria, she was supposedly converted in the precincts of the Holy Sepulcher, Jerusalem, whereupon she spent the remaining forty-seven years beyond Jordan in isolation doing penance for her sins. Zosimus, a priest, met her there, giving her Communion before she died that evening. Sources include Cyril of Scythopolis's Life of Cyriacus and later Byzantine hagiographers who used details from Jerome's Life of Paul the Hermit.

MARY TUDOR (1516-1558). Queen of England. Mary was the third and only surviving child of Henry VIII* and Catherine of Aragon. Early in life she was a pawn on the chessboard of international politics. At the age of two she was betrothed to the dauphin of France and at six promised to Emperor Charles V. In 1526 she was sent as Princess of Wales to Ludlow. The divorce of her parents greatly troubled her, and after 1531 she never saw her mother again. In 1533 she was declared a bastard and cut out of the succession to the throne. Between 1534 and 1536 her father tried to break her "Spanish pride" by petty persecution; after her mother's death in 1536 she even acknowledged under duress that the marriage of her parents was "by God's and man's law incestuous and unlawful." But during 1536-47 her life was fairly easy and carefree. For six years after the death of her father her problems were chiefly religious. She liked Edward VI,* but disliked his Protestantism. She conceded nothing and remained faithful to Catholicism.

On 19 July 1553 she was proclaimed queen in London, and on 3 August entered her capital in triumph. Parliament annulled the divorce of Catherine of Aragon, established Mary's legitimacy, and restored the church to what it was at the end of Henry VIII's reign. But within weeks Mary's popularity had gone. The most sincerely religious and moral of the Tudors was opposed by most of her people. This was because she was a Spaniard first, a Tudor second, and an English Tudor last. She insisted on restoring papal Catholicism and seeking a husband in Spain (Philip II in July 1554). Reginald Pole arrived as papal legate and archbishop of Canterbury, and in 1555 the statute de heretico comburendo was re-enacted, giving power to ecclesiastical courts to deal with "heresy." In 1555-56 T. Cranmer,* J. Hooper,* H. Latimer,* and N. Ridley,* with others, were burned as heretics. Mary's actions ensured that England would be a Protestant country after her death.

See J.M. Stone, History of Mary I, Queen of England (1901), and H.F.M. Prescott, Mary Tudor (1952). PETER TOON

MASHTOTZ, see MESROB

MASON, LOWELL (1792-1872). American composer. Beginning as an amateur church musician, he became perhaps the greatest single influence in Protestant church music in the United States during the nineteenth century. He edited and published a great number of collections of hymn-tunes and simple anthems, and devoted much of his energy to music education and the betterment of church music. He wrote a great many hymn-tunes, of which "Missionary Hymn," "Olivet," "Boylston," and "Bethany" are still among those widely used. He was active in the Handel and Haydn Society of Boston, and he founded the Boston Academy of Music. Unhappily, he discouraged the early folklike and often modal tunes that were part of the distinctive American heritage of the late eighteenth and early nineteenth centuries, considering them inferior to those based on European and particularly German models. J.B. MAC MILLAN

MASS, THE. A term used mainly in the Roman Catholic Church for Holy Communion.* The word is derived from Latin missio, "dismiss," referring to the dismissal of catechumens before the Eucharist was celebrated. J.A. Jungmann suggested that missa came to be synonymous with "blessing" and so linked with the "consecration" of the elements. It was first used strictly for the Eucharist by Ambrose.* The Roman Catholic Mass still closes with "Ite, missa est."

Two main ideas are involved in the doctrine of the Mass: (1) the change whereby the bread and the wine become the actual body and blood of Christ, i.e., transubstantiation*; (2) the conception of the Mass as a sacrifice. According to the Council of Trent,* "in this divine Sacrifice which is performed in the Mass, that same Christ is contained in a bloodless sacrifice who on the altar of the cross once offered himself with the shedding of his blood: the holy Synod teaches that this sacrifice is truly propitiatory."

This particular sacrificial interpretation begins with Cyprian. Earlier writers had used the term "sacrifice," but with the ideas of self-offering and commemoration of Christ's passion, e.g., Justin and Irenaeus. The process continued in the following centuries, e.g., Gregory the Great in the sixth century, Paschasius Radbertus in 844. A tendency in the later Middle Ages associated with each Mass the idea of a distinct offering for sin, leading to the multiplication of Masses. The cup was also denied the laity (Council of Constance,* 1415). The Reformers' rejection of these concepts led to the Tridentine definition which established subsequent Roman Catholic doctrine.

See also under MUSIC, CHRISTIAN.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: B.J. Kidd, The Later Mediaeval Doctrine of the Eucharistic Sacrifice (1898); D. Stone, A History of the Doctrine of the Holy Eucharist (1909); C. de L. Shortt, The Mass (1936); C.A. Scott, Romanism and the Gospel (1937); W. Barclay, The Lord's Supper (1967). J.G.G. NORMAN

MASSILLON, JEAN BAPTISTE (1663-1742). French preacher and bishop. Native of Provence, he studied in the Oratorian colleges in Hyères and Marseilles, and in 1681 entered their congregation at Aix, later lecturing in their colleges at Pézenas, Marseilles, Montbrison, and Vienne. He was ordained in 1691, and as directory of the Seminary of Saint-Magloire, Paris, from 1696, he gained a great reputation for preaching. He was said to have been the one court preacher to have made Louis XIV dissatisfied with himself. Consecrated bishop of Clermont (1718) and elected to the French Academy (1719), he assisted at Louis XV's coronation and gave Louis XIV's funeral oration. Respected by Voltaire and others, and militantly anti-Jansenist, he was a moralist and brilliant panegyrist, described as the Racine of the pulpit, combating impiety and incredulity. C.G. THORNE, JR.

MATHER, COTTON (1663-1728). Puritan minister. Born in Boston, Massachusetts, the eldest son of Increase Mather, he was educated at Harvard College. Entering the ministry, he served the Second Church of Boston, first as his father's colleague and then as senior pastor. In 1690 he was elected a fellow of Harvard. The greater part of his 400 publications was published after 1692. They reveal that he was primarily a theologian and historian, with amateur interests in a wide variety of subjects. His Magnalia Christi Americana (1702) was and is much used. His Bonifacius (1710), later called Essays to do Good, was widely read in America. Through his books and voluminous correspondence he enjoyed a European reputation. He was also well known as a philanthropist, supporting, for example, a school for slaves. Though his influence in politics diminished when Joseph Dudley became governor in 1702, he exercised influences in the churches of Massachusetts all his life. The theology he expounded in his later life (e.g., in Christian Philosopher, 1721) suggests a move away from orthodox Calvinism. PETER TOON

MATHESON, GEORGE (1842-1906). Scottish minister and hymnwriter. A merchant's son, practically blind by his eighteenth year, he was a brilliant student of philosophy at Glasgow University. Licensed to preach in 1866, he was minister in Glasgow and Innellan (Argyllshire) before moving to St. Bernard's, Edinburgh, where he stayed until 1899. He was an influential preacher. He published books on theology which tended toward Neo-Hegelianism (e.g., Aids to the Study of German Theology, 1875); on apologetics (e.g., Can the Old Faith Live with the New?, 1885); and of devotion (e.g., Studies of the Portrait of Christ, 2 vols., 1899-1900). His collection, Sacred Songs (1890), included "O Love that wilt not let me go" (which Tyler argues did not arise from a disappointed love affair) and "Make me a captive, Lord." JOHN S. ANDREWS

MATHEWS, SHAILER (1863-1941). American theologian. Born in Portland, Maine, he graduated from Colby College and afterward served on the faculty there (1887-94). He then joined the theological faculty at the University of Chicago, first teaching NT, then theology until 1933. He was the leading voice of the "Chicago School of Theology." Mathews's own thought was a functionalism of extreme clarity and simplicity, which he used not only in biblical and historical theology, but in the problems of the school and its role as champion of the modernist cause against American fundamentalism. His role in the formation of the Federal Council of Churches and the Northern Baptist Convention reflects his view that the work of the school should be carried into the church. CLYDE CURRY SMITH

MATINS (Mattins). The Breviary office for the night, derived from the practice of Vigils in the early church. Designed to be said at midnight in the Roman Church, it is now usually said on the preceding afternoon or evening. The term is used in the Church of England for the service of Morning Prayer.

MATTHEW. Apostle. The name means "gift of Yahweh." He is mentioned in the lists of the Twelve (Matt. 10:3; Mark 3:18; Luke 6:15; Acts 1:13), but only Matthew's gospel gives us any further information. Matthew 10:3 describes him as a tax collector, and the name "Matthew" occurs in the story of the call of the tax collector who is named Levi and, in Mark, "the son of Alphaeus" (Matt. 9:9; Mark 2:14; Luke 5:27). There are some difficulties about the identification of this Levi with the Apostle Matthew, but it should probably be made and it would then be likely that he had two names, "Matthew" being a sort of "Christian name." He seems to have been an official of Herod Antipas collecting dues near Capernaum on goods passing along the road from Damascus to the Mediterranean ports. He appears to have been a man of wealth, as he provided a banquet in his house (Luke 5:29) with a large number of tax collectors present. The first gospel has been traditionally associated with the Apostle Matthew, and, whether he was directly the author or not, it is likely that he lies close behind it. The particular skills which he would have had in his profession would equip him well for recording and arranging systematically material about the ministry and teaching of Jesus, and the keen numerical interest in the gospel has sometimes been connected with his previous way of life. R.E. NIXON

MATTHEW, GOSPEL OF, see SYNOPTIC GOSPELS

MATTHEW OF AQUASPARTA (c.1240-1302). Franciscan philosopher. Born in Aquasparta in Umbria, he studied at Todi and Paris and became Bonaventure's* most important pupil. Lector sacri palatii in Rome in 1281, he became general of the Franciscans in 1287. In 1288 he was made cardinal and in 1291 cardinal bishop of Porto and Reufina. His Commentary on the Sentences and Questions underline Bonaventure's position and put him in the Augustinian tradition. He was opposed to the Aristotelianism of Aquinas by which faith and reason were divided. He posited a parallelism between the essence in things and the ideas of these essences; hence, knowing was less intellection than recognition, and the source of knowledge was supernatural illumination. He produced many sermons and biblical commentaries. HOWARD SAINSBURY

MATTHEW OF JANOV (c.1355-1393). Czech Reformer. He studied at Paris (1373-81), gaining first a master's degree, and then spent six years studying Scripture. He returned to Prague through Rome and was received as titular canon of the cathedral, but prevented from fulfilling the office. Appointed a confessor in 1381, he held this office for seven years until granted a poor parish. Greatly influenced by Milic*—"father of the Czech Reformation"—he followed his pattern of biblical preaching, which brought him many enemies, but this served to make him study Scripture more diligently as the exclusive source of doctrine and preaching. This resulted in his profound work in five volumes, Regulae veteris et novi testamenti, which served as a source of inspiration to subsequent leaders of the Czech reform movement. Either Matthew himself or his followers translated the whole Bible into Czech. GORDON A. CATHERALL

MATTHEW PARIS (c.1200-1259). English Benedictine historian and artist. A monk at St. Albans in England after 1217, be became chief of the epistolary section in 1236. An unsuccessful attempt to reform the abbey of St. Benet Holm in Norway in 1248-49 led to a friendship with King Haakon IV, whom he invited to join in a crusade with St. Louis of France. As a writer Matthew decorated his manuscripts with illustrations, including coats of arms and the events he was describing in the text. Among his works were Flores historiarum; Historia Anglorum; Abbreviatio chronicorum; and his major work, Chronica majora, which summarized the chronicle of Roger of Wendover up to 1235, but then relied on firsthand experiences and documents down to 1259. This work pointed up royal foibles, attacked mendicants, and decried the avarice of the papal court. Matthew replaced mere chronicling with a sense of history; he recognized the responsibility of the historian. Some of his information he secured from royal figures who visited the abbey. His account of contemporary times repeatedly mentioned the Beguines,* a new women's movement without a rule that originated in the vicinity of Liège but centered in Cologne. His chronicles blamed Rome for the schism with the Greeks. Wycliffe later took this line of reasoning to its extremes. JOHN GROH

MATTHEW'S BIBLE. First English authorized version of the Bible, and basis of later versions. Its editor was John Rogers,* chaplain to the English merchants at Antwerp, friend of Tyndale, and the first Marian martyr. It is made up of Tyndale's Pentateuch, Tyndale's 1535 New Testament, Coverdale's Ezra-Malachi and Apocrypha, and Joshua-Chronicles in a version later shown to be Tyndale's. Carefully edited by Rogers, it appeared in 1537, probably printed in Antwerp, and was commended by Cranmer to Cromwell. Dedicated to King Henry and Queen Anne under the pseudonym "Thomas Matthew," its use in churches was prohibited, despite its royal license.

MATTHIAS. Apostle. The name is probably an abbreviation of Mattathias, meaning "gift of Yahweh." He was chosen to take the place of Judas Iscariot among the twelve apostles (Acts 1:15-26). The qualifications for the office were, to have been a companion of the Twelve during the ministry of Jesus until the ascension and to have met the risen Christ so as to be able to witness to the resurrection. This in effect meant he must be able to preach the kerygma from firsthand experience. The choice was by lot, as in the Urim and Thummim of the OT, a system not apparently used after Pentecost. The idea that the choice was a mistake and that the place was meant for Paul is based on a misunderstanding of the nature of Paul's apostleship. Nothing else is known with certainty about Matthias, but Eusebius suggests that he was one of the seventy (Luke 10:1).

R.E. NIXON

MATTHIAS, GOSPEL OF. An apocryphal gospel according to Matthias (Acts 1:23) is reported by Eusebius as part of a corpus known among the heretics. Other Fathers, such as Origen, Ambrose, and Jerome, also mention it. Cognate with this lost work is a document containing "Traditions" ascribed to Matthias. Sayings from this are preserved by Clement of Alexandria; and there are affinities uniting this document with the Gnostic *Gospel of Thomas.

MAUNDY THURSDAY. The Thursday before Easter, so called from Christ's command (Lat. mandatum) that His disciples should love one another (John 13:34). In fourth-century Jerusalem there were special services at the Mount of Olives and Gethsemane, and in North Africa an evening Eucharist commemorating the Last Supper. By the sixth century in the West, the Blessing of Oils and the Reconciliation of Penitents took place on this day, and by the Middle Ages the stripping and washing of altars and the pedilavium (footwashing) were added. The latter ceremony was sometimes performed by sovereigns, and the modern English Royal Maundy Service is a modified survival of this. At Mass, the Kiss of Peace was omitted in commemoration of Judas's kiss.

JOHN A. SIMPSON

MAURIAC, FRANÇOIS (1885-1970). French Roman Catholic writer. Born in Bordeaux, he lived as a child a somewhat idyllic life on a beautiful estate controlled by his family. He was early put under the rigors of a Jesuit education. A serious-minded, voracious reader, he studied at the University of Bordeaux and in Paris. His earliest published work in 1909 was a collection of verse. The first of his many novels, A Kiss for the Leper, appeared in 1922, followed by Genetrix (1923) and The Desert of Love (1925). By 1930, besides his novels, he had written literary criticism, biography, plays, and articles on a variety of subjects. During the French Resistance movement in World War II, Mauriac wrote anti-Nazi papers at the risk of death. His best novels are Viper's Tangle (1933) and A Woman of the Pharisees (1946).

All his novels come intensely to grips with man's sinful nature, his greed, lust, hatred, pride. Critics have noted traces of Jansenism in his outlook on life. In an age of naturalism and realism, he wrote about the unlovely under the restraint of his own artistic ideal: "To dare to say everything but to say everything chastely. Not to divorce ardor from purity." He is a moralist whose conception of his artistic responsibility is suggested in this statement: "If there is a reason for the existence of the novelist on the earth it is this: to show the element that holds out against God in the highest and noblest characters—the innermost evils and dissimulations; and also to light up the secret sources of sanctity in creatures who seem to us to have failed." He was awarded the Nobel Prize in 1952.

PAUL M. BECHTEL

MAURICE. Leader of the Theban Legion. Evidence derived from the account written by Eucherius of Lyons about 445. Emperor Maximian (Caesar from 286 to 305), joint emperor with Diocletian, had occupying forces in Gaul, among which was a Legion of Egyptians from Thebeid, consisting of Christians led by Maurice. The emperors outlawed Christianity, demanding the destruction of churches and the sacrifice to the old pagan gods. The Theban Legion led by Maurice mutinied at Agaunum (St. Maurice en Valais, Switzerland), for which they were massacred. The accuracy of the account is doubted, with the possible source the action of some Christian soldiers during Maximian's campaign against Bagaudae (286). There exists a sixth-century monastery at the place of the martyrdom.

GORDON A. CATHERALL

MAURICE, FREDERICK DENISON (1805-1872). Christian Socialist. He was son of a Unitarian minister; the religious conflicts of the home partly explain his later preoccupation with a search for unity. In 1823 he entered Trinity College, Cambridge, but being a Nonconformist was unable to take a degree. He moved to London and wrote in criticism of Benthamite materialism and developed an interest in social reform. Influenced by Coleridge's writings, he accepted Anglicanism and, deciding to be ordained, went to Exeter College, Oxford, where he was attracted to Tractarianism.* In 1834 he was ordained to a country curacy in Worcestershire and in 1836 became chaplain at Guy's Hospital, London, by which time he had broken with the Tractarians over baptism, which he saw as assuring every man that he is a child of God.

In 1838 he published his most enduring work, The Kingdom of Christ, in which most of his fundamental beliefs are expressed—the basic tenets of incarnational theology and, in particular, his belief in Christ as the head of every man, and universal fellowship and unity being possible in Christ alone. While at Guy's, he was doing practical work in the cause of education, and later in 1848 he was associated in the founding of Queen's College, London, the first higher educational establishment for women. In 1840 he was appointed professor of English literature and history at King's College, London, and in his Warburton Lectures (1846) he replied to J.H. Newman's* theory of development. In 1846 Maurice was appointed chaplain at Lincoln's Inn and also professor of theology at King's.

The political events of 1848 restirred his concern in the application of Christian principles to social reform, and with J.M.F. Ludlow* and Charles Kingsley,* he formed the Christian Socialists,* aiming at a Christian reform of the social bases of society, not just charity to the sufferers in society. At King's his orthodoxy was being questioned, and in 1853 the publication of his Theological Essays, in which he attacked the popular view of eternal punishment, resulted in his expulsion from the college. In 1854 he started the first Working Men's College in London. He came to prominence again in 1859 with his book What is Revelation?, a reply to H.L. Mansel's* Bampton Lectures of 1858. In 1860 Maurice was appointed to St. Peter's, Vere Street, London; in 1866, Knightsbridge professor of moral philosophy at Cambridge; and in 1870 also incumbent of St. Edward's, Cambridge. Throughout his ordained life he was unwilling to attach himself to any church party, yet remarkably he represented the unity those parties lacked. He was a prolific writer and one of the seminal, though much misunderstood, thinkers of the nineteenth century.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: F. Maurice, Life and Letters of F.D. Maurice (2 vols., 1884); F. Higham, Frederick Denison Maurice (1947); A.M. Ramsey, F.D. Maurice and the Conflicts of Modern Theology (1951); W.M. Davies, An Introduction to F.D. Maurice's Theology (1964); A.R. Vidler, F.D. Maurice and Company (1966).

JOHN A. SIMPSON

MAURISTS. French Benedictine monks of the Congregation of St. Maur, named after St. Maurus (d. 565). Founded in 1621 to represent in France the reform initiated in the abbey of St. Vanne near Verdun, they eventually numbered nearly 200 houses. From 1672 the Maurists devoted themselves to historical and literary works, producing an extraordinary number of large works of erudition. The full Maurist bibliography names some 200 writers and more than 700 works. The congregation was affected by the ecclesiastical controversies that distracted the French Church in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, and some members supported Jansenism.* Suppressed by the Revolutionary government (1790), it was finally dissolved by Pius VII in 1818.

J.G.G. NORMAN

MAXIMILLA (d. c.179). Ecstatic prophetess. With Montanus and Priscilla, another prophetess, she formed the leadership of the rigorous Montanist* sect in Asia Minor. The three proclaimed the imminent return of Christ to establish a New Jerusalem in Pepuza in Phrygia, where they made their headquarters. Charged like Priscilla with forsaking her husband to follow Montanus, she seems to have survived the others, and claimed that after her there would be no more prophecy, only the end of the world. She complained of persecution: "I am driven away like a wolf from the sheep. I am not a wolf; I am Word and Spirit and Power." Two bishops, Zoticus of Comane and Julian of Apamea, endeavored unsuccessfully to confute the spirit which prompted Maximilla's utterances, identified by the Montanists as the Holy Spirit. The wars and revolutions she predicted failed to transpire in the period immediately following her death, characterized by contemporaries as thirteen years of peace.

MARY E. ROGERS

MAXIMUS (c.380-c.468). Bishop of Turin. Little is known about his life, though 116 of his sermons and 118 homilies have been preserved and show him to have been influenced by Ambrose,* with whose works many of Maximus's sermons are included. There are also six tractates on baptism ascribed to Maximus, though three are fragmentary and his authorship is doubtful. The only certain dates in his life include his attendance at the Synod of Milan in 451, where he subscribed to the Tome of Leo,* and that of Rome in 465, where his signature stands immediately after that of Hilarius on the decision regulating nonappointment by bishops of their successors. Maximus was probably born near Tridentum (Trento) in the Raetian Alps. Several of his homilies include significant data: the creed of Turin, which is daughter to the Apostles' Creed; the destruction of Milan by Attila. Others are valuable for the religious life of the populace of his area, still greatly influenced by older agrarian fertility rites. While trying to comfort his people in the face of the raiding Huns (though his exhortation comparing David and Goliath failed to save Turin), he also rebuked their readiness to profit from plunder or slaves as the Huns withdrew.

CLYDE CURRY SMITH

MAXIMUS THE CONFESSOR (c.580-662). Byzantine theologian and writer. As a young, well-educated aristocrat he was appointed chief secretary to Emperor Heraclius I. About 615 he renounced his civil career for monasticism, eventually becoming abbot of the monastery of Chrysopolis. Having fled to North Africa during the Persian invasion (626), Maximus contended with the Monothelites,* notably Pyrrhus, temporarily exiled patriarch of Constantinople, whom he bettered in a famed disputation at Carthage in 645. His victory was instrumental in the triumph of orthodox, Chalcedonian Christology at several local African synods and at the Lateran Council of 649, in which he participated at the invitation of Pope Martin I. For his theology, sympathy with Roman hierarchical claims, and opposition to Emperor Constans II, he was tried for treason and exiled to Thrace. His tongue and right hand were subsequently cut off for his recalcitrance, and he was banished to Lazica on the Black Sea, where he died eighteen years later. His approximately ninety remaining works include commentaries on Scripture and the Fathers, doctrinal and polemical writings, and literature on ascetics, ethics, and liturgics. Known for interpreting the mysticism of Pseudo-Dionysius* for the West, Maximus was studied in Byzantium as a doctrinal theologian in his own right.

JAMES DE JONG

MAXIMUS THE CYNIC. Egyptian Cynic of the late fourth century. He was installed as bishop of Constantinople in an election so irregular that it received canonical denunciation at the second ecumenical council (381). Maximus's subsequent attempts to gain Western support, while initially successful, were short-lived, terminating with the Synod of Rome (382). Nothing by him survives, but literary productivity was not a Cynic trait. Maximus is known solely from historical accounts by others with whom he was involved—unless he is identified with the pagan philosopher and miracle-worker under whom the emperor Julian (361-63) had studied.

MAX MÜLLER, see MULLER, FRIEDRICH

MAXWELL, JAMES CLERK (1831-1879). Scottish physicist. Born in Edinburgh, he was educated at the universities of Edinburgh and Cambridge, and became professor successively at Aberdeen, London, and Cambridge. Maxwell was the Newton of his century. His investigations and discoveries cover a wide field, but he is best known as the creator of the electromagnetic theory. Throughout his life he was a committed Christian, whose philosophic consideration of his faith led him to some of his greatest scientific discoveries. He read widely, and "all he read helped only to strengthen that firm faith in the fundamentals of Christianity in which he lived and died" (Sir Richard Glazebrooke).

R.E.D. CLARK

MAYFLOWER COMPACT (1620). With the Virginia Assembly of 1619, this stands as the foundation stone of American institutions. The Mayflower passengers, before disembarking on Cape Cod, signed a compact which provided a "civil body politic" for their full protection. Some of these original Massachusetts settlers had been exiled in Leyden for ten years because of religious intolerance in England, and their English instinct for self-government demanded "equal laws, ordinances, acts, constitutions, and offices." While remaining loyal subjects of the king, their freedom was assured by this compact, which remained Plymouth Colony's principal governmental charter until 1691, when that colony was absorbed by Massachusetts.

C.G. THORNE, JR.

MAY LAWS. Legislation associated with Bismarck's *Kulturkampf directed against German Catholicism. Passed in May 1873 under the direction of Adalbert Frank in the Prussian Landtag, they were based on the theory of the absolute supremacy of the state. They limited the extent of episcopal powers of excommunication and discipline, instituted a supreme ecclesiastical court whose members were appointed by the emperor and directly under state control, placed priestly training under close governmental supervision, and required all ordinands to pass through a state university and submit to state examinations in literature, history, and philosophy, and subjected clerical appointments by bishops to government veto. The laws were condemned by Pius IX in the encyclical Quod nunquam (1875) and were opposed also by many German Protestants. One effect of the laws was to unify Catholics and strengthen their resistance. They were eventually modified in 1886-87 after agreement between Bismarck and Leo XIII.

J.G.G. NORMAN

MAYNE, CUTHBERT (1544-1577). English Roman Catholic martyr. Born in Devon, he was educated at Oxford, and after Anglican ordination was appointed chaplain of St. John's College there, where Edmund Campion was a colleague. Under the latter's influence Mayne was converted to Roman Catholicism, and in 1573 went to the newly founded English seminary at Douai. Ordained priest in 1575, he returned to England in the following year and settled, ostensibly as steward, at Francis Tregian's estate in Cornwall. He secretly carried out his priestly functions until his arrest in 1577. Despite some disagreement among judges, he was condemned for refusing to take the oath of royal supremacy and for celebrating Mass, and was executed at Launceston. He was beatified in 1888.

J.D. DOUGLAS

MAZARIN, JULES (1602-61). French statesman. Born at Piscina, Abruzzi, he was educated by Jesuits in Rome and spent three years at Alcalá University in Spain. Returning to Rome, he graduated as doctor of laws and became captain in the army of Colonna. Turning to diplomacy, he averted war between France and Spain at Casal. He entered the church and was vice-legate at Avignon and papal nuncio in Paris. He became a naturalized Frenchman (1639) and was created cardinal (1641). He succeeded Richelieu as prime minister (1642) and rapidly became all-powerful through the favor of Anne of Austria, who perhaps married him secretly. At the Peace of Westphalia (1648) he increased France's possessions, but could not control the deteriorating financial situation which led to the civil wars of the Fronde (1648-53). He was banished (1651-52), but returned to be as powerful as ever, using the young Louis XIV to break any opposition. He raised France to the first rank in Europe, maintained its influence in the Baltic, concluded a trade treaty with Cromwell, and fought Spain successfully, eventually securing Louis's marriage to Maria Theresa after the treaty of the Pyrenees (1659). Toward the Hugenots he pursued a policy of reconciliation. He held the see of Metz and numerous abbeys, enriching himself from their revenues, out of which he founded the Collège Mazarin.

See A. Hassall, Mazarin (1903), and K. Federn, Mazarin (1922).

J.G.G. NORMAN

MAZARIN BIBLE. The name given to a rare and beautiful Bible printed by J. Gutenberg* of Mainz about 1455, probably the first book to be printed in Europe. The copy which first attracted the attention of bibliographers was discovered in Cardinal Mazarin's great library, hence the name. It was issued in two volumes, in double columns with forty-two lines to the column. Of the forty copies said to survive, only two (at Munich and Vienna) are known to be complete.

MAZZARELLA, BONAVENTURA (1818-1882). Italian patriot, preacher, and philosopher. Born in Gallipoli (Puglie), he studied law at the University of Naples. As a barrister and judge he fought against poverty, ignorance, and social injustice. Actively involved in the liberation movements and the war of 1848, he was persecuted and took refuge first in Greece, then in Geneva, afterward at Genoa. During this time he came into touch with the Gospel and was converted. He first joined the Waldensian Church, but soon his independent spirit found a more congenial atmosphere in the rising Free Italian Church (see GUICCIARDINI) caring for a large community of believers in Genoa. In 1860 he became professor of pedagogy at Bologna, and then at Genoa, an extraordinary achievement for a non-Roman Catholic. Finally he entered parliament, where he championed the cause of religious liberty and the interests of the much neglected southern regions, and was much respected for his moral integrity and deep humanity. One of the finest intellects of Italian evangelism, he wrote two remarkable philosophical works, La Critica della Scienza and Della Critica. DAISY RONCO

MECHITARISTS. Congregation of Armenian monks in communion with the Church of Rome. The founder was Mechitar, born at Sebaste in 1676 who formally joined the Roman Catholic Church, and in 1701 with sixteen companions formed a religious institute with himself as superior. Their Uniate propaganda incurred Armenian opposition, and they were forced to move to Morea which then belonged to Venice, where they built a monastery in 1706. On the outbreak of hostilities between Turks and Venetians, they migrated to Venice where they were granted the island of St. Lazzaro in 1717. Mechitar died there in 1749, and it has remained the headquarters of the congregation. J.G.G. NORMAN

MECHTHILD OF MAGDEBURG (c.1212-c.1280). German mystic. From about the age of twenty-three, for the greater part of her life, she lived in Magdeburg as a Beguine, virtually as a hermit. She claimed to have visions and revelations, which she wrote down in a book of six parts with the help of a Dominican, Heinrich von Halle. Later she added a seventh part. Her work is known as Das fliessende Licht der Gottheit. During the last twelve years of her life she lived as a nun in Helfta. About 1345 her book was transferred into High German by Heinrich von Nördlingen. A Latin translation was made of the first six parts. Mechthild's strong individualism and her poetic qualities distinguish her from most mystics. She has been called a Minnesängerin of God's grace. CARL S. MEYER

MEDALS, RELIGIOUS. A piece of metal (gold, silver, copper, etc.) fashioned in the form of a coin but not circulated as money. Struck to commemorate a religious event, person, or idea, Christian medals are probably to be traced back to the custom, practiced in the Roman Empire, of issuing special coins at temples on which was an inscription of a god, and to the custom of wearing a talisman. John Chrysostom, for example, reproached Christians in his day for wearing medals of Alexander the Great. Only by the ninth century did medals effectively enter the church. In the British Museum there is a gold coin of Wigmund, archbishop of York (b.837), which has on the reverse side a cross in a wreath and the legend MVNVS DIVINUM. At the Renaissance the medallic art was quickly revived and from the sixteenth century a whole series of medals depicting popes, the Virgin Mary, saints, and even Christ have been issued by the Vatican, by heads of religious houses, and at shrines. PETER TOON

MEDE, JOSEPH (1586-1638). English biblical scholar. Born in Essex, he graduated from Cambridge, where he subsequently became professor of Greek and taught several Cambridge Platonists, including B. Whichcote,* Henry More,* and R. Cudworth.* In addition to being one of the greatest biblical scholars the English Church has ever produced, Mede demonstrated his universal interests by being a philosopher, botanist, astronomer, and a pioneer Orientalist. He twice refused the provostship of Trinity College, Dublin, preferring to teach. His expository fame rests upon the Apocalyptica (Key of the Revelation, 1627, 1643). He attempted to construct an outline of the Apocalypse based solely upon internal considerations. In this interpretation he advocated premillennialism in such a scholarly way that this work continued to influence eschatological interpretation for centuries. ROBERT G. CLOUSE

MEDHURST, WALTER HENRY (1796-1857). Missionary to China. Born in London and educated at St. Paul's School and Hackney College, he was a trained printer who went first to Penang, then to Batavia, with the London Missionary Society. In 1843 he went to the newly opened Treaty Port of Shanghai, which was to be his base until his death. In addition to evangelistic work, he had already earned a reputation as a Chinese scholar, and became a member of the Bible Society committee commissioned to produce the first union version of the Bible. Medhurst was a prominent figure among early Protestant missionaries to China.

MELANCHTHON, PHILIP (1497-1560). German Reformer. Born in Bretten, Baden, the son of George Scharzerd, he was given the Greek-derived name "Melanchthon" by his great-uncle, Johannes Reuchlin,* because of his aptitude in languages and humanistic interests. He attended the grammar school at Pforzheim and went on to graduate from the universities of Heidelberg, Tübingen, and Wittenberg. In Tübingen he was a member of a humanistically oriented circle of friends and came to the attention of Erasmus.*

Reuchlin recommended him to the elector Frederick the Wise* as professor of Greek at the University of Wittenberg, where he soon embraced Luther's* cause. In his inaugural address at Wittenberg in 1518 he made a strong plea for the classics and the reform of studies. In his B.D. thesis of the following year he defended the proposition that the Scriptures alone are authoritative, not the decrees of popes and councils. In that same year he accompanied Luther to the Leipzig Disputation.* He published Luther's early commentaries on Galatians and the Psalms and under the pseudonym "Didymus Faventinus" defended Luther against the Parisian theologians. In 1519 Melanchthon lectured on the epistle to the Romans. In that year his Rhetoric appeared and in the following year his Dialetics. Melanchthon occupied a position on the faculty of liberal arts and on the theological faculty at Wittenberg. By 1519 his concept of justification, the forgiveness of sins, and reconciliation was already fashioned, a concept to which Melanchthon clung throughout his life.

During Luther's stay at Wartburg Castle after the Diet of Worms* (1521) Melanchthon was called on for theological leadership in the Lutheran movement. He and Andreas Carlstadt were not always in agreement, and Melanchthon was not positive what steps were to be taken in regard to the Zwickau Prophets.* Luther's return to Wittenberg (March 1522) arrested the radical movement. The first edition of Melanchthon's Loci Communes, the first systematic treatment of Lutheran theology, was published in 1521. In it Melanchthon treated the doctrines of the bondage of the will, the Law-Gospel dichotomy, justification by grace through faith. Scholasticism* was repudiated.

Melanchthon drew up the Visitation Articles (1528), the Augsburg Confession* (1530) and the Apology of the Augsburg Confession (1531), the Confessio Saxonica (1551), and the Responsio to the Questions of the Bavarians (1558). He has been criticized for altering the Augsburg Confession, in the so-called Variata (1540), but Luther did not fault him. His Wittenberg Articles were the basis of the discussion with the English theologians in 1536. He formulated the Wittenburg Concord* (1536) in which Luther and Martin Bucer* reconciled their views on the Lord's Supper and which was embodied in the Formula of Concord* (1577). He participated widely in the negotiations between the Lutherans and Roman Catholics, notably in the Ratisbon Colloquy* (1541).

He was the foremost humanist among the Lutheran Reformers. He became the center of religious controversies because of his stand on the Interim in 1548 and the more extreme statements of some of his followers on free will, conversion, and the Lord's Supper. Recent scholarship has asserted Melanchthon's integrity as a Lutheran theologian against those who fault him for deviations.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Melanchthon's Opera (ed. K. Bretschneider and E. Bindseil, 28 vols., 1834-60); Supplementa Melanchthonis (6 vols., 1910-26); Melanchthons Werke (ed. R. Stupperich, 1951- ).

Bibliography of works by and about Melanchthon in W. Hammer, Melanchthon im Wandel der Jahrhunderte (3 vols., 1967- ).

See also K. Hartfelder, Melanchthon als praeceptor Germaniae (1889); C.L. Manschreck, Melanchthon: The Quiet Reformer (1958); V. Vatja (ed.), Luther and Melanchthon (1961); R. Stupperich, Melanchthon (1965); M. Rogness, Melanchthon: Reformer without Honor (1969).

CARL S. MEYER

MELCHIORITES, see RADICAL REFORMATION

MELCHITES (Melkites). A name given to those Christians who adhered to the creed supported by the authority of the Byzantine emperor. Derived from the Greek form of a Syriac adjective, it means "royalists, emperor's men." It was coined by the Jacobites in the tenth century and implies they could only stand with the emperor's support. It was applied to Christians of Syria and Egypt who rejected Monophysitism* and Nestorianism,* accepted the decrees of Ephesus and Chalcedon, and remained in communion with the imperial see of Constantinople.

The term applied also to Arabic-speaking Catholics of the Byzantine Rite in Syria, Palestine, Egypt, etc. They were organized from 1724 when Cyril Taras, a Catholic, became patriarch of Antioch.

J.G.G. NORMAN

MELITIAN SCHISMS. Fourth-century controversies.

(1) Egypt. Melitius, bishop of Lycopolis, traveled around consecrating new presbyters and deacons while Peter of Alexandria was imprisoned during the Diocletian persecution (305). Objections were made, and eventually Peter excommunicated him. During further persecution Peter was martyred and Melitius banished to the mines in Arabia Petraea. On returning he formed a schismatic church. He appears to have ordained Arius, thus sharing in the making of the Arian controversy. The Council of Nicea* (325) decreed that the Melitian clergy should be permitted to function under Alexander, Peter's successor, and their bishops, if legally elected, could succeed the orthodox bishops when they died. Melitius himself was to retain his title without a see. When Athanasius* acceded, the arrangement broke down, and the Melitians, encouraged by Eusebius of Nicomedia,* again went into schism. Melitius was succeeded by John Arcaphos of Memphis, who strongly opposed Athanasius. The sect apparently survived till the eighth century.

(2) Antioch. Melitius of Sebaste became bishop of Antioch (360), immediately fell foul of the Arians there by preaching an orthodox sermon on Proverbs 8:22, and was sent back to Armenia. The orthodox separated from the new bishop, Euzoï os, an Arian sympathizer, holding their own services. Already there was another orthodox congregation, the Eustathians, led by Paulinus, and soon there was an Apollinarian group. An attempt by Athanasius to unite the Melitians and Eustathians failed. Allowed back under Julian (362), Melitius was twice banished under Valens (365-66; 371-78). Basil of Caesarea worked for his reinstatement, though Rome and Alexandria opposed him. He finally returned through Gratian's edict of tolerance (379). He presided over the Council of Constantinople (381), during which he died. The council ignored the opportunity to heal the schism by consecrating the aged Paulinus, and elected instead Flavian as the new bishop.

J.G.G. NORMAN

MELITIUS (d.381). Bishop of Antioch. Born in Melitene of Armenia Secunda (Armenia Minor), he is counted among the fourth-century members of the Antiochene* School of exegetical literalism. Of a wealthy and noble family, he first appears among the homoean supporters of Acacius* of Caesarea in 357. It appears that he was not old enough to have been a student of Lucian of Antioch, the school's founder, but should have been a contemporary of both Apollinaris of Laodicea and the school's fourth-century master, Diodorus of Tarsus (d.390). It was Melitius who discovered John Chrysostom,* sent him as a youth to Diodorus, and later ordained him deacon (381). Although venerated for his holy and ascetic life, he was caught up in the controversy of the times (see MELITIAN SCHISMS). Held at first to be too Nicene, he was hotly opposed as bishop of Sebaste, then (from 360) as bishop of Antioch where he had both Arian and ultra-Nicene rivals. When Theodosius I became emperor (379), Melitius was not only established in his see, but was designated to preside over the Council of Constantinople* (381), at which he died. Both the funeral oration by Gregory of Nyssa and the panegyric by John Chrysostom survive, as does a homily by Melitius preserved in Epiphanius.

CLYDE CURRY SMITH

MELITO (second century). Bishop of Sardis. Among the known prolific second-century Christian authors preserved solely in testimony and fragment, Melito has fared well in the twentieth-century recovery of papyrus copies. Eusebius placed him as bishop of Sardis in the reign of Marcus Aurelius (161-80) and gave a catalog of his works. He quoted Melito's "petition to the emperor," an early apology dated shortly after the announcement of Commodus as heir in 175, in which Melito initiates the thesis that the church and the imperial state are two conjoint works of God for the benefit of mankind. Another fragment, known already to Clement of Alexandria, to which Eusebius adds reference, indicates that Melito was fully involved in the problem of the date of Easter. Completely recovered texts demonstrate Melito's rhetorical style and his use of the typology of the slain Pascal Lamb to account for Christ's death and resurrection. He had evidently traveled to the places important to Christian origins, making him the first known Christian pilgrim. An analysis of the recovered fragment of his treatise On Baptism indicates his pioneering importation of Stoic Homeric exegesis into Christian thought; his theology falls within the Logos Christology of other apologists.

CLYDE CURRY SMITH

MELKITE CHURCHES, see EASTERN ORTHODOX CHURCHES

MELLITUS OF CANTERBURY (d.624). Third archbishop of Canterbury (619). Probably a Benedictine at St. Andrew's monastery in Rome, he was part of the second contingent of missionaries sent by Gregory the Great in 601 to help Augustine in Britain. After three years' work in Kent he was consecrated bishop of the East Saxons by Augustine (604). He established his see in London where St. Paul's was built as his cathedral. In 610 he returned to Rome on business. When the East Saxon king Sigebert died, he was banished to France (617), but he returned the next year and was soon elevated to Canterbury.

MELVILLE, ANDREW (1545-1622). Scottish Reformer. He was born near Montrose and was well educated in Scotland and France. He came under the influence of Beza* in Geneva and was appointed there to the chair of humanity. He returned to Scotland in 1574, soon becoming principal of Glasgow University and later of St. Mary's College, St. Andrews. His academic career was most distinguished, but of greater importance was his influence on the Scottish Church. He had returned to Scotland just two years after the death of John Knox, when Regent Morton was forcing the so-called Tulchan* bishops on an unwilling Kirk. Melville was strongly Presbyterian in conviction and rejected all attempts to "buy" him for episcopacy, including the offer of the archbishopric of St. Andrews.

He was regarded for many years as the leader of the Scottish Presbyterians and in 1582 was moderator of the general assembly. He led the assembly in its ratification of the Second Book of Discipline,* written in 1578, which has been described as the "Magna Charta of Presbyterianism." King James (VI of Scotland and I of England) was a staunch Episcopalian and was keen to impose this system of church polity on the Scots. Because of a sermon, Melville was summoned to appear before the Privy Council, but refused to accept its jurisdiction and fled to Berwick, across the border in England. In less than two years he was back in Scotland continuing the fight. James tried both conciliation and opposition in the attempt to deal with him. Eventually in 1606 he and seven other Scottish ministers were summoned by the king to Hampton Court. Melville's frankness at this interview led to his detention in the Tower of London for four years. He became professor of divinity at the university of Sedan, where he died. His nephew James undoubtedly expressed the feelings of many of Andrew Melville's Presbyterian contemporaries when he wrote, "Scotland never received a greater benefit at the hands of God than this man."

G.W. GROGAN

MELVILLE, HERMAN (1819-1891). American novelist. Born in New York City, he was one of eight children whose father was a cultivated gentleman (he died when Herman was twelve). In 1837 he shipped as a cabin boy to Liverpool, and in 1841 sailed on a whaler to the South Seas. The latter trip provided the material for his first books—Typee (1846), Omoo (1847), Redburn (1849), White-Jacket (1850)—and his greatest work, Moby Dick (1851), one of the finest of all American novels. In 1849 he made a trip to England and in the following year moved to a farm in Massachusetts, where he established a firm friendship with his neighbor, Nathaniel Hawthorne,* to whom he was to dedicate Moby-Dick. Pierre was the tale of an intellectually troubled and overwrought young man. Billy Budd was one of his best tales, written shortly before his death, though not published until 1924. Melville's last years were spent in New York City where he died in poverty and obscurity. His rediscovery around 1920 by literary scholars brought him the acclaim which was his due as one of America's greatest authors. Like Hawthorne's, Melville's work is rich in allegory and symbol. His style has a graceful, lyrical beauty rarely matched in American literature. He ceaselessly sought some absolute in the world and the lives of men, but he never acknowledged the sovereignty of the Christian God.

PAUL M. BECHTEL

MEMPHITIC, see EGYPTIAN VERSIONS

MENAS (sixth century). Patriarch of Constantinople from 536 to 552, succeeding the deposed Anthimos. Menas unwaveringly condemned the heresy of the Monophysite* leaders and subscribed to Justinian's edict against the Origenists in 543. In 547 and again in 551 Pope Vigilius deposed him, but he remained firmly committed to Justinian's religious program. He conducted a council at Constantinople on assuming office in 536. The council's acts show that by this time eucharistic services in Constantinople customarily included the Constantinopolitan creed. Paradoxically, Monophysite initiative was responsible for this innovation.

MENDELSSOHN-BARTHOLDY, FELIX (1809-1847). Musical composer. He came of a wealthy and cultured Jewish family that had turned to the Lutheran Church. He was extraordinarily precocious, not only in music but in intellect, and was also talented in art. Many of his finest works were produced while he was in his teens. His presentation of Bach's St. Matthew Passion in 1829, for the first time since the composer's death, was a historic musical event of importance, and marked the beginning of the revival of Bach's great legacy of choral music. Mendelssohn spent much time in England, where he was enthusiastically received. His Elijah was written for the Birmingham Festival in 1846 (although to a German text and then translated) and is one of the greatest nineteenth-century oratorios. He wrote choral music with particular facility. While little of it was specifically for the church, extracts from his oratorios and cantatas are often used as service music. His setting of Psalm 43 for unaccompanied chorus is a fine piece of its kind. He exerted a perhaps too powerful influence on the lesser choral composers of his day.

J.B. MAC MILLAN

MENDICANT ORDERS. The early Mendicant orders developed during the thirteenth century when both the contrast between the church's wealth and the poverty of the primitive church, and the church's weakness in meeting the pastoral requirements of many people were being underscored by groups outside the church such as the Albigenses and the Waldenses. Orders such as the Franciscans* (1210), the Dominicans* (1216), the Carmelites* (1247), the Augustinians* (1256), and the Servites* (1256) provided a response to these challenges by uniting the concepts of apostolic poverty and obedience to the church, and often by proving quite effective in their ministry, particularly to the poor and destitute in the towns. At their founding the characteristic emphasis on poverty among the Mendicant orders was evident in their commitment to the renunciation of all common as well as individual possessions. Difficulties encountered in attempting to function in society while adhering to such a renunciation, however, induced a relaxation of this commitment. Furthermore, although Francis at least intended the members of his order to support themselves normally by work rather than by begging, growth in numbers and specialization led to an increasing reliance upon the latter method, from which arose the appellation "Mendicants" (mendicare, "to beg").

T.L. UNDERWOOD

MENNONITES. A body of conservative and evangelical Christians descended from the Anabaptists* of the sixteenth century. The founder was a disciple of Zwingli* named Conrad Grebel.* A free-lance reformer, Melchior Hofmann, carried the basic ideas of Anabaptism to the Low Countries* where Melchiorites were for a time the dominant reformation body. Melchior was imprisoned in 1533, after which his followers broke into a revolutionary movement led by Jan Matthijs (Münster, 1534-35), and a peaceful wing led by Obbe and Dirk Philips.* Menno Simons* united with the Obbenites in 1536 and his name came to be applied to the movement, first as Mennists, now as Mennonites. Dutch Mennonites began settling in the Danzig area in the 1540s and from there went to Russia beginning in 1788. There were 5,000 martyrs by 1600 (see T. J. van Braght, Martyrs Mirror [Dutch, 1660], now available in English and German).

Mennonites began to settle in the New World as early as the 1640s, but the first permanent settlement was Germantown near Philadelphia, 1683. About 1700, Mennonites, largely of Swiss ethnic origin, began to locate in Pennsylvania, from which they later migrated to Virginia, to Ontario, and to Ohio and states farther west. In the 1870s, the 1920s, and after World War II, three waves of Mennonites from Russia migrated to the Americas, the three groups settling respectively in Manitoba, Kansas, and other prairie states; in Canada; and in Canada and South America, mostly Paraguay and Brazil. The Mennonites of North America are in three major conferences: (1) the Mennonite Church representing those who came to the USA before the Civil War of the 1860s; (2) the General Conference Mennonites comprising many of the three waves of immigration from Russia; and (3) the Mennonite Brethren who originated as a revivalist movement in Russia in 1860. Mennonites operate a number of colleges and seminaries.

From the beginning, Mennonites have stressed the Free Church principle as well as believer's baptism and biblical nonresistance (pacifism). Discipleship to Christ is stressed, as is church discipline. They emphasize a life of prayer and of holiness and are concerned not to allow the "world" to weaken their strict New Testament values. Infants are regarded as saved, although often a dedicatory service is held to invoke the blessings of heaven on parents and infants. Children are generally baptized (by pouring) in their teen years, but the Mennonite Brethren baptize by immersion. The Lord's Supper is solemnly yet joyfully observed, often semiannually. The more conservative groups practice footwashing. A vigorous program of missions is carried on, as well as the humanitarian service of the Mennonite Central Committee (1920), ministering to the needy in many lands, including the care of the emotionally ill, helping racial minorities, and the like. The Mennonite World Conference (1925) meets every five years. Around the globe Mennonites number 560,000, of which 300,000 are in North America.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: C.J. Dyck (ed.), Introduction to Mennonite History (1968); H.S. Bender (ed.), The Mennonite Encyclopedia (4 vols., 1955-59); Complete Writings of Menno Simons (tr. L. Verduin, ed. J.C. Wenger, 1956). J.C. WENGER

MENNO SIMONS (1496-1561). Founder of the Mennonites.* Born in Friesland, in his twenties a Catholic priest there, he began reading Luther and other Reformers and was attracted to Anabaptism, though opposed to its militant wing (writing, in 1535, a pamphlet against John of Leyden*). In 1536 he joined the group around Obbe Philips* and soon became a leading figure in the Anabaptist* movement. For the next twenty-five years he traveled through the Netherlands and the German North Sea coasts, spreading the Gospel as he saw it, organizing congregations, disputing with other Protestants (e.g., 1544, against the Calvinist Jan à Lasco*), often forced to move on, continually writing. His last years were spent in Holstein; he died in Wüstenfelde, near Lubeck. Menno stressed the idea of the community of believers, committed to a new life, sealed by adult baptism, tightly knit (e.g., no marriage outside the community), withdrawing from the secular world and its follies (thus, distrust of learning, refusal to take part in politics or bear arms). Suspicious of dogmatic theology, Menno relied on Scripture taken literally. He thus refused to use terms and concepts not clearly scriptural, such as (in his view) the Trinity. At some points, curiously, he seemed to question Christ's full humanity. He held to a speedy second coming of Christ.

See I.B. Horst, A Bibliography of Menno Simons (1962), and Complete Writings of Menno Simons (tr. L. Verduin; ed. J.C. Wenger, 1956).

DIRK JELLEMA

MENTAL RESERVATION. The "reserving" of some clause within one's own mind which makes one's expressed statement true. It arises out of conflicts between the obligation to tell the truth and the obligation to keep a secret. A politician facing an embarrassing question may reply, "I don't know"; his mental reservation is "in my capacity as a private citizen." The doctrine of mental reservation is found in Roman Catholic moral theology, which holds that lying is always and necessarily sinful. A lie is the intentional assertion of what is contrary to a man's inward thought. It is also an offense against justice, truth being a debt which we owe to others. Roman Catholic teaching has distinguished two types of mental reservation. Strict mental reservation involves the speaker's mentally adding some qualification to what he has said so that the sense is different and the hearer deceived. Wide mental reservation, on the other hand, arises from the permitted ambiguity of the words or the circumstances in which they are spoken. Strict mental reservation was condemned by Innocent XI in 1679. Wide mental reservations, however, are not lies, provided there is a good reason. In this case the speaker is permitting the hearer to remain in his misunderstanding of words susceptible to a different interpretation. HOWARD SAINSBURY

MERBECKE, JOHN (d. c.1585). English musician and theologian. He was organist of St. George's Chapel, Windsor, from 1541 until at least 1565. A Calvinist, he was sentenced to the stake in 1544 for his writings against the Six Articles* and for his compilation of the first biblical concordance in English (thus threatening the use of Latin for worship). He was pardoned evidently because Bishop Stephen Gardiner had a high regard for his musicianship. Merbecke dedicated that concordance later to Edward VI. That same year (1550) came also his Book of Common Prayer Noted, an adaptation of the plain chant to Edward VI's first liturgy (1549), issued to prevent diversity in "saying and singing." He wrote many theological works, a hymn for three voices, and Mass for five. C.G. THORNE, JR.

MERCATOR, MARIUS, see MARIUS MERCATOR

MERCEDARIANS. The Order of Our Lady of Mercy, derived from the Spanish word merced ("mercy") and known also by other names, was founded in 1218 by Peter Nolasco to attend the sick and rescue Christian captives from the Moors. Their white habit facilitated entrance into Muslim territories; and following the Austin Rule, they took a fourth vow pledging themselves as hostages when needed, thus liberating some 70,000. They spread through Europe to the Americas, changing from a military to a clerical order (1319) and becoming mendicant. A post-Reformation discalced* group arose, and though major setbacks came during the nineteenth century, the order was revived under Valenzuela in the 1880s. Parishes, charities, schools, and chaplaincies occupy them, and there are congregations of women. C.G. THORNE, JR.

MERCERSBURG THEOLOGY. The creation of Philip Schaff and J.W. Nevin,* professors at tiny Mercersburg Theological Seminary in south central Pennsylvania, the Mercersburg Theology was a mediation between head and heart, or objective and subjective, in an age of extremes typified by reckless westward expansion and revivalism. Born in an obscure German Reformed Church seminary, it reflected Nevin's desire to embrace "not the notion of supernatural things simply, but the very power and presence of the things themselves." Both men were converts—Nevin from Princeton Presbyterianism and Schaff from the United Church of Prussia—who praised the sacramentalism of the tradition. Nevin the theologian and Schaff the historian found satisfaction in the centrality of the Eucharist, for only it—not the Bible or individual experience—gave the believer true spiritual knowledge. Celebration of the Lord's Supper, in which the believer received the "spiritual real presence," united the believer with a historical and organic church, and kept the church from being a mere aggregate of individuals. That also symbolized divine governance of all society.

The Mercersburg Theology, which had little influence in its day, was strongest from 1840 until the departure of Nevin and Schaff—the former retired because of ill-health in 1853, and the latter went to Union Theological Seminary after the Civil War had virtually destroyed the seminary. The theology survived at the church's new seminary in Lancaster, Pennsylvania, and was revived in twentieth-century American Christianity because of its Christocentrism, organicism, and ecumenism. The first attempt to reconcile German Idealism and American Protestantism, it was also the first substantial critique of American Calvinism.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: T. Appel, The Life of John Williamson Nevin (1889); D.S. Schaff, The Life of Philip Schaff (1897); J.H. Nichols, Romanticism in American Theology: Nevin and Schaff at Mercersburg (1961). DARREL BIGHAM

MERCIER, DÉSIRÉ JOSEPH (1851-1926). Belgian cardinal and philosopher. Educated at Malines and Louvain, he was ordained in 1874. In 1877 he became professor of philosophy at the Petit Seminaire at Malines, and from 1882 to 1906 was professor of Thomist philosophy at Louvain. An ascetic, deeply pious, and an able organizer, he was appointed archbishop of Malines and primate of Belgium in 1906. He was made cardinal in 1907. Believing that in the long run reason will lead to the same conclusions as faith, he worked to create a synthesis between Thomist philosophy and the experimental sciences. He made Louvain a major center of Neo-Thomist philosophy by founding the Higher Institute of Philosophy there. He attacked modernism in general and G.H. Tyrrell in particular in a pastoral letter in 1908. He was a fearless spokesman for the Belgian people during the German occupation of World War I. He was the Roman Church's chief representative in conversations (see MALINES CONVERSATIONS) with the Anglicans at Malines (1921-26). His writings include Psychologie (1892), Logique (1894), Métaphysique (1894), and Critériologie (1899). HOWARD SAINSBURY

MERIT. Medieval Catholic theology distinguished between bonitas (the ethical value of human acts) and dignitas (the religious value of those same acts). Merit in this sense has to do with the dignity or religious significance of human acts rather than with their goodness or inherent moral value. A merit is an act which is rewarded by God because it has met certain conditions, only one of which is inherent moral goodness. What those conditions are differ from theologian to theologian, though a representative list would include such items as the use of free will, the assistance of actual or habitual grace, and the promise of God to reward such an act. The exegetical basis for the promise of God to reward works done in His name and for His glory includes such texts as Exodus 23:20-22; Deuteronomy 5:28-33; Matthew 5:3-12; 6:4, 19ff.; 7:21.

The Scholastic doctors distinguished between meritum de condigno, a good work which God is obligated to reward because of His own promise, and a meritum de congruo, which God is not obliged to reward because it does not meet the usual conditions, but which, nevertheless, it is fitting that God reward in view of His own liberality and merciful goodness. While Franciscan theologians admitted the possibility of merita de congruo for someone still in a state of sin, they restricted merita de condigno to works performed in a state of grace. Thomas Aquinas,* on the other hand, denied the possibility of merit, though not of moral goodness, prior to entry into a state of grace, while radical Augustinian theologians such as Gregory of Rimini* denied to the sinner the possibility of both. Protestant theology rejected the doctrine of merit, though in certain forms of Reformed, Anglican, and Free Church theology the notion of reward was not consistently excluded. DAVID C. STEINMETZ

MERLE D'AUBIGNÉ, J.H., see D'AUBIGNE

MESROB (Mashtotz) (c.361-440). Important figure in the history of Armenian culture and spirituality. According to the best sources "Mashtotz" is the more correct version of his name. His life is known from the biography by his pupil Korium (mid-fifth century). Mashtotz was a pupil of Nerses the Great (353-73). He entered the royal service well versed in languages, became a monk in 390 or shortly afterward, and after a brief time in evangelism was the associate of Sahak III, whom he succeeded as patriarch. He died the following year. The main activity of his association with Sahak was in the field of translation of biblical and patristic writings; he was acquainted with Persian, Syriac, and Greek. The earliest tradition asserts that biblical translation was the basis of the Greek, but internal evidence shows strong Syriac influence. Similarly both traditions appear active in early patristic translation. For his work Mashtotz devised the Armenian alphabet, since Armenian had previously had no satisfactory means of transcription. Tradition asserts also that he was the inventor of the Georgian alphabet and of the alphabet of the Caucasian Albanians (of which few traces remain). Although these traditions have been contested, they rest on early evidence before the Armenian-Georgian schism and the destruction of the Albanians. Even the Armenian alphabet alone indicates the knowledge and acumen of Mashtotz. J.N. BIRDSALL

MESSALIANS. From an Aramaic word meaning "praying folk." Also known as Euchites and by other names, they were a heretical sect originating in Mesopotamia about 360, spreading to Syria, Asia Minor, and Egypt. The so-called Christian Messalians were vagrant Quietists, ignored the sacraments, and wandered about sleeping in the streets. They feigned orthodox practice to avoid persecution; prayer was their only occupation, and they claimed to see the Trinity as well as evil spirits. They emphasized the indwelling of the Holy Spirit, saying that every man including Christ was possessed of demons. Although they survived until the seventh century, attempts to suppress them were many—by Flavian of Antioch, the Synod of Side (388-90), Nestorians in Syria, decrees in Armenia (mid-fifth century), and the councils of Constantinople (426) and Ephesus (431) where their Asceticus was called a filthy book of heresy. They were accused of immorality and their monasteries were burned. They were scarcely known in the West. The later Bogomiles* are a derivative. C.G. THORNE, JR.

MESSIAH. From the Hebrew word meaning "anointed" (cf. Gr. christos). Because kings, priests, and perhaps prophets (1 Kings 19:16) were anointed, the term came to be used of God's representatives (e.g., Ps. 89:38; Isa. 45:1). A fundamental tenet of Israel's religion was that God would set up His perfect rule on earth, through an act of decisive divine intervention, the Day of the Lord, a term first found in Amos 5:18 (if a late date is attributed to Joel), but clearly much older. Though in the majority of passages concerned with the setting up and continuance of the rule of God human agency is not mentioned, it is clearly presupposed, for the Mosaic-prophetic tradition throughout sees God working through human representatives, hence the divine attributes given to kings (Isa. 9:6; Ps. 45:6). Hence too, the frequently met distinction between prophetic pictures of the messianic age and of the Messiah has little practical validity.

It is questionable also whether anything is to be gained by the modern tendency to confine Messiah to the royal office. At Qumran two Messiahs were awaited, "the anointed ones of Aaron and Israel," i.e., a priest and king, the former taking precedence. In 4Q Testimonia the promise of a prophet like Moses is linked with the hope of a king and priest. Thus it seems clear that at Qumran at least, and almost certainly in wider circles, the Jewish messianic expectation included all three offices, as in Christian interpretation, though normally the delivering king predominated.

The messianic hope is essentially eschatological, i.e., it emerges from despair at conditions as they are. So far as the king was concerned, it must have become a reality with the failure of Zerubbabel to reestablish the Davidic dynasty after the Exile, but prophetically it emerges with Isaiah's prophecy of the cutting down of the royal tree (11:1) and the implicit rejection of Ahaz and his descendants in the Immanuel prophecies, which become explicit in Jeremiah 22:30. The concept of a coming prophet will hardly have occupied the popular mind until the gift disappeared about the time of Ezra, and it may be seen in 1 Maccabees 4:46; 14:41. There was felt to be a lack in the priestly office as early as the return from exile (Ezra 2:63), but the question did not become acute until the ousting of the Zadokite high priests in the time of Antiochus IV Epiphanes, and brought to a head by the recognition of Simon the Hasmonean as high priest in 142 B.C. (1 Macc. 14:41)—this was one of the basic causes of the Qumran movement. The messianic hope became a burning necessity with the Roman conquest and its imposition of either the Herodian dynasty or direct rule. The rise of the Zealots* with their doctrine that all authority belonged to God made the end of the second Jewish commonwealth inevitable.

The church's recognition of Jesus as Messiah (Christ) has always been central to its theology. It implies that He is the fulfiller of every promise and hope of the OT revelation and the basis of its interpretation. Indeed, without it, the Gentile Christians might well not have retained the OT as a sacred book.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: A. Neubauer and S.R. Driver, The Fifty-Third Chapter of Isaiah According to the Jewish Interpreters, (1876/7); J. Drummond, The Jewish Messiah (1877); F. Delitzsch, Messianic Prophecies (1880); V.H. Stanton, The Jewish and Christian Messiah (1886); C.A. Briggs, Messianic Prophecy (1886); J.H. Greenstone, The Messiah Idea in Jewish History (1906); A.L. Williams, The Hebrew-Christian Messiah (1916); E. Koenig, Die messianischen Weissagungen des Alten Testaments (1923); A.G. Hebert, The Throne of David (1941); C.H. Dodd, According to the Scriptures (1952); H.L. Ellison, The Centrality of the Messianic Idea for the Old Testament (1953); A. Bentzen, King and Messiah (1955); J. Klausner, The Messianic Idea in Israel (1956); S. Mowinckel, He That Cometh (1956); H. Ringgren, The Messiah in the Old Testament (1956); F.F. Bruce, This is That (1968); H.L. Ellison, The Corner Stone (1973). H.L. ELLISON

METHODISM. A movement which originated in a search for an effective method to lead Christians toward the goal of scriptural holiness. The epithet was applied to members of the Wesleys'* Holy Club* at Oxford in 1729. Their disciplined, methodical practices gave rise to what Charles Wesley called "the harmless nickname of Methodist." It was readily accepted by his brother John, who provided his own definition: "A Methodist is one who lives according to the method laid down in the Bible." The term had previously been employed in an ecclesiastical context in the sixteenth century with reference to Amyraldists* or Semi-Arminians. Despite the theological similarity, there is no evidence of any direct derivation.

When the subsequent revival got under way, after the evangelical conversion of George Whitefield* and the Wesleys, the title "Methodist" was attached to all who were influenced by it, whether within the Church of England or beyond. Only at a later stage were Methodists distinguished from Anglican Evangelicals. In its strictest connotation "Methodism" refers only to the adherents of Wesley, although it is extended to include the followers of Whitefield and Lady Huntingdon who subscribed to the doctrines of Calvin rather than of Arminius.

Methodism is now accepted as a general term to cover the worldwide family of Methodist churches, stemming from Wesley's societies, most of which are affiliated to the World Methodist Council.

See also METHODIST CHURCHES and CALVINISTIC METHODISM. A. SKEVINGTON WOOD

METHODISM, CALVINISTIC, see CALVINISTIC METHODISM

METHODIST CHURCHES. The World Methodist Council, to which the majority of Methodist Churches is affiliated, represents a recorded membership of over 18 million, and a community of some 40 million. Approximately 750,000 are to be found in Great Britain and Ireland, while the United Methodist Church of America numbers more than 11 million, quite apart from other Methodist groups. In the countries of the British Commonwealth and in Europe there are autonomous Methodist conferences; in many places elsewhere missionary extension continues.

All these churches derive from the ministry of John Wesley* and the religious societies he founded in the wake of his evangelistic missions in the United Kingdom during the eighteenth century. In 1739 Wesley started a society in London in a former cannon foundry and from 1741 utilized lay preachers. In 1742 the first classes were formed, and in 1743 the rules of society drawn up. The first conference assembled in 1744 with six clergymen and four laymen present. From 1746 the societies were arranged in circuits under the superintendency of Wesley's helpers and, after his death, were grouped in districts.

It was not until 1784, however, that the Wesleyan Connexion was fully established in law. In that year Wesley lodged in the Court of Chancery a Deed of Declaration naming one hundred preachers as constituting the "Conference of the people called Methodists," with provisions for its maintenance. On his death the membership of the conference was extended beyond the Legal Hundred to include all preachers in full connection. Laymen were not added until 1878 and women only in 1911. In 1787 Wesley's chapels were registered as dissenting meeting houses under the Toleration Act of 1559. Separation from the Church of England was made yet more explicit by the Plan of Pacification (1795) which allowed the administration of the sacraments as well as the holding of marriage and funeral services in those Methodist chapels where a majority of officials approved. At the same time it was recognized that reception into full connection with the conference sufficiently validated ministerial orders. Only in 1836 was ordination by the imposition of hands adopted as standard practice.

Within six years of Wesley's death the first secession took place when in 1797 the Methodist New Connexion* was formed. In 1805 a group in Manchester was expelled for holding irregular meetings and became the short-lived Band Room Methodists. In the following year the Independent Methodists appeared at Warrington under Peter Phillips, although they did not officially assume the name until 1898. They still exist. The Camp Meeting Methodists led by Hugh Bourne* joined with the Clowesites to form the Primitive Methodist* Connexion in 1811. William O'Bryan's Bible Christians* emerged in 1815. The Tent Methodists, with George Pocock and John Pyer as leaders, were organized in 1822, and next year the Church Methodists made a move in the direction of reunion with the Anglicans. The Protestant Methodists (1827) joined the Wesleyan Methodist Association (1836), who in turn united the main body of Wesleyan Reformers (1850) to constitute the United Methodist Free Churches (1857). The remainder of the Wesleyan Reformers established an autonomous church in 1859 and continue to the present day. The Arminian or Faith Methodists of Derby seceded in 1832, eventually joining the Wesleyan Methodist Association.

The cause of these divisions was governmental rather than doctrinal, and some of the resultant bodies were comparatively small. Despite the defections, the Wesleyan Church expanded. During the second half of the nineteenth century a period of consolidation set in, and before its end plans for reunification were set afoot. These were to come to fruition in the following century. In 1907 the Methodist New Connexion, Bible Christians, and United Methodist Free Churches combined in the United Methodist Church.* In 1932 the Wesleyan, Primitive, and United Methodists came together to constitute the Methodist Church of Great Britain and Ireland with a membership of 859,652.

The missionary enterprise of Methodism may be said to date from 1769, when Richard Boardman and Joseph Pilmoor volunteered to serve in America (see METHODIST CHURCHES, AMERICAN). In 1785 appointments were made also in Nova Scotia, Newfoundland, and Antigua. The prime mover after Wesley's death was Thomas Coke,* acting under the direction of the conference which from 1786 assumed immediate responsibility for missions overseas. He it was who pioneered the work in the West Indies and whose vision embraced Africa and Asia as well as America. In 1813 the Wesleyan Methodist Missionary Society was formally organized.

Today there are autonomous Methodist Churches in Australasia, New Zealand, South Africa, Italy, Ghana, Nigeria, Zambia, Sierra Leone, Kenya, Ceylon, Upper Burma, and the Caribbean—all derived from the British Conference, with others stemming from American Methodism. Methodists have entered the United Church of Canada, the Churches of South and North India, and the United Church of Japan. There are minority Methodist Churches in Switzerland, Scandinavia, Portugal, Austria, Poland, and Germany—the latter being the strongest. In Belgium, France, and Spain the Methodists have united with other Protestant churches.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: A. Stevens, The History of the Religious Movement of the Eighteenth Century called Methodism (3 vols., n.d.); G. Smith, History of Wesleyan Methodism (3 vols., 1857-61); C.H. Crookshank, History of the Methodist Church in Ireland (3 vols., 1885); W.J. Townsend, H.B. Workman, and G. Eayrs (eds.), A New History of Methodism (2 vols., 1909); G.G. Findlay and W.W. Holdsworth, The History of the Wesleyan Methodist Missionary Society (5 vols, 1921-24); A.H. Williams, Welsh Wesleyan Methodism (1935); H. Bett, The Spirit of Methodism (1937); W.F. Swift, Methodism in Scotland (1947); H. Carter, The Methodist Heritage (1951); C.J. Davey, The March of Methodism (1951); E.G. Rupp, Methodism in Relation to the Protestant Tradition (1952); I.L. Holt and E.T. Clark, The World Methodist Movement (1956); R.E. Davies, Methodism (1963); R.E. Davies and E.G. Rupp (eds.), A History of the Methodist Church in Great Britain, vol. I (1965); H.D. Rack, The Future of John Wesley's Methodism (1965).

A. SKEVINGTON WOOD

METHODIST CHURCHES, AMERICAN. Though John Wesley* had served as a missionary in Georgia (1736-38) before his Aldersgate experience, and George Whitefield* had after 1740 visited America several times during the Great Awakening,* Methodism as such was brought to America in the 1760s by unofficial lay preachers. Among these were Irishman Robert Strawbridge who worked in Maryland and surrounding areas, Philip Embury,* and Captain Thomas Webb, a British officer who reinforced the society in New York and planted Methodism in Pennsylvania, Delaware, and New Jersey. In 1768 Wesley sent the first two official missionaries, Joseph Pilmoor and Richard Boardman. In 1771 came Francis Asbury,* later the greatest leader of American Methodism, and Richard Wright. They were followed in 1773 by Thomas Rankin and George Shadford. That year saw the first American conference at St. George's Church, Philadelphia. The South proved particularly receptive to Methodism, and in Virginia, where Methodists worked with Anglican Devereux Jarratt, a major revival broke out as the Revolutionary War started.

The Revolution precipitated a major crisis. All the British Methodist missionaries except Asbury returned to England. After great internal struggle and a period of forced inactivity, Asbury finally identified with the emerging nation. Anglicanism, with which Methodism had identified, was devastated. To meet the chaotic situation Wesley took the step—a very difficult one for him—of ordaining two elders and Thomas Coke* as general superintendent to establish in America an adequate system of church government. Soon after their arrival in America, the Christmas Conference of 1784 was called to found the Methodist Episcopal Church as an autonomous denomination. Asbury was ordained deacon, elder, and joint superintendent on successive days, though on his insistence only after his appointment had been confirmed by unanimous vote of the conference. According to Wesley's recommendations, a ritual, twenty-five Articles of Religion (abridged from the Anglican thirty-nine), and a discipline were adopted. The church thus founded consisted of 18,000 members, 104 traveling preachers (plus as many local preachers and exhorters), 60 chapels, and 800 recognized preaching places.

The next six decades were a period of phenomenal growth. By 1844 the church had grown to about 4,000 preachers and over a million communicants. After 1792, annual conferences became regional and a general conference met quadrennially. By 1812 the general conference was reorganized on a delegated basis. Leadership fell more and more upon Asbury, who began against Wesley's wishes to use the title "bishop." The itineracy, firmly administered by Asbury until his death in 1816, was admirably suited to the American frontier. Annual conferences and presiding elders supervised the work of circuit riders who followed American pioneers in the westward expansion. Methodism rode the crest of the Second Great Awakening* at the turn of the century and picked up and perfected the institution of the camp meeting.*

But growth was not without tensions. In 1792 Asbury clashed with James O'Kelly over the appointment of preachers. O'Kelly wished the right of appeal to the conference if a preacher should be dissatisfied with his appointment. When O'Kelly's resolution lost, he withdrew with a few other preachers to found the Republican Methodist Church. Perhaps 8,000 members defected, but the group eventually withered away. Similar issues led to the founding of the Methodist Protestant Church in 1830. From 1820 some had advocated an elective presiding eldership, lay representation to conference, and major alteration of the episcopacy. Agitation over these issues continued and led to the 1827 expulsion of several persons in Baltimore and final split in 1830. In 1858 about one-half of this group seceded over the issue of slavery to form the antislavery Methodist Church, but after the Civil War the two parts reunited.

It was over the slavery issue that Methodism really floundered. As early as 1786 friction developed between blacks and whites worshipping together in Philadelphia and Baltimore. Under the leadership of Richard Allen,* a remarkable man who had managed to purchase his freedom and become the first Negro ordained by Asbury, and Daniel Coker, a freed mulatto who became a teacher and preacher, the African Methodist Episcopal Church was founded in 1816 (see AMERICAN NEGRO CHURCHES). Similar problems led to the founding of the African Methodist Episcopal Zion Church in 1821 in New York City. But the white church split also over the issues of slavery and race. For Wesley, slavery was "that execrable sum of all villanies." Asbury seems to have held similar opinions, and slavery was regularly condemned by early conferences, but as Methodism became a national church, pressures toward accommodation increased. Asbury acquiesced, and conference resolutions became tamer. Yet the controversy which split the nation remained in the church and was fired by the rise of abolitionism.

The leading Methodist abolitionist was Orange Scott, who addressed the general conference on the subject in 1836. When abolitionism was consistently repressed in 1840, Scott joined Lucius Matlack, LaRoy Sunderland, and others in founding in 1845 a Wesleyan Methodist Connection which opposed the episcopacy as well as slavery. Within a year the group numbered 15,000, but after the Civil War resolved the slavery issue, many returned to the mother church. The Wesleyan Methodists continued as a separate body and identified themselves as a "holiness" church. In 1968 the Wesleyans merged with the Pilgrim Holiness Church, an early twentieth-century product of the American Holiness Movement,* to form the Wesleyan Church of America.

In 1844 the issue of slavery came to a crisis over slave-owning bishop James Andrew. The general conference deadlocked over this and the polity issues involved, and eventually agreed to a separation of the church into the Methodist Episcopal Church and the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, officially founded in Louisville, Kentucky, in 1845. Controversy continued to rage between the two churches until the Civil War. In 1870 the Colored Methodist Episcopal Church in America was founded in the South for blacks who had been members of the Southern Church but now wished to organize separately. In 1956 this denomination was renamed the Christian Methodist Episcopal Church.

In the latter half of the nineteenth century Methodism came into its own. It was populous, affluent, well respected, even imitated. Theology and theological education flourished, the camp meeting declined, discipline slipped, and holiness preaching began to vanish. The Free Methodist Church was born in protest against these tendencies. A party of "Nazarites" emerged in the Genesee Conference to recall the church to holiness, decry organs and choirs, denounce pew rentals needed to support elaborate churches, etc. B.T. Roberts, leader of the Nazarites, was finally expelled and led in the founding of the Free Methodist Church in 1860. The "free" in the name testified that the new church was delivered from secret societies, slavery, rented pews, outward ornaments, and structured worship.

A similar protest may be discerned in the rise of the Holiness Movement within Methodism. In 1839 Timothy Merritt in Boston launched a periodical entitled Guide to Christian Perfection, later renamed Guide to Holiness. Phoebe Palmer of New York City, founder of the "Tuesday Meeting for the Promotion of Holiness," later edited the Guide and had great influence on those who established the National Camp Meeting Association for the Promotion of Holiness in the late 1860s. At that time nearly all agreed that Methodism had been raised up to spread the message of Christian holiness, but by the end of the century the church had polarized. Most of the holiness advocates drifted into such groups as the Piligrim Holiness Church, the Church of the Nazarene, and the Church of God (Anderson, Indiana). Holiness partisans who remained within Methodism rallied around Asbury College and Asbury Seminary in Kentucky.

Before the turn of the century, some had raised the question of reunion within Methodism. Efforts to bring together the black churches failed. Significant steps were taken toward reuniting the Northern and Southern churches in 1876, but it was not until 1939 that reunion was finally achieved when the Methodist Episcopal Church, the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, and the Methodist Protestant Church merged to form the Methodist Church, which remained the largest American denomination until the mid-1960s. In 1968 the Methodist Church merged with the Evangelical United Brethren to form the United Methodist Church.

In the twentieth century the Methodist Church has distinguished itself by continued emphasis on world mission, social reform, and ecumenism. American Methodists have been active in the National Council of Churches, whose predecessor the Federal Council appropriated in 1908 the Methodist Social Creed, and more recently in the Consultation on Church Union. Theologically Methodism has followed the dominant schools—liberalism earlier in the century and to a lesser extent Neoorthodoxy later. In response to these theological and ecumenical currents the Evangelical Methodist Church was founded in 1948 and the Evangelical Church of North America after the 1968 merger.

Membership of the more than a score of American Methodist bodies numbers some 15 million. Methodists vie with Baptists as the largest American Protestant religious movement. But whatever the statistics, Methodism can claim to be the "most American of Churches"—or in the judgment of Lutheran Jaroslav Pelikan, "Methodism, equally with Puritanism, constitutes the mainstream of American religious history."

BIBLIOGRAPHY: W.W. Sweet, Methodism in American History (1954); J.L. Peters, Christian Perfection in American Methodism (1956); E.S. Bucke (ed.), The History of American Methodism (3 vols., 1964); R. Chiles, Theological Transition in American Methodism 1790-1935 (1965); C.W. Ferguson, Organizing to Beat the Devil: Methodists and the Making of America (1971).

DONALD W. DAYTON

METHODIST NEW CONNEXION. The death of John Wesley* in 1791 forced constitutional changes in Methodism. An existence over against, and not simply within, the Church of England could hardly be denied: it was soon clear that the conference of preachers would hold both power and authority in the movement. Alexander Kilham* and others argued for a more radical recognition of separation from the Church of England, and for lay participation in Methodist government. The Methodist New Connexion, formed after Kilham's expulsion, embodied these ideas: its second conference (1798) had fifteen preachers and seventeen laymen. William Thorn, a respected Scottish preacher of Wesley's, was the first president.

The new body made slow headway—it was twenty-five years before it doubled its numbers. In that period its image of "democracy" and consequent association with revolutionary principles was probably a disability. "Rational liberty" became its watchword, as against tendencies reflected in the type of Wesleyan Methodism represented by Jabez Bunting.* The ferment of the 1840s saw the departure of a radical element associated with Joseph Barker. Barker's chief opponent, William Cooke, was perhaps the Connexion's most considerable mid-century figure. By the end of the century there were some 30,000 members, with a strong movement in Ireland and missions in China. Union with other Methodist bodies was often discussed, and less often sought; but in 1907 the MNC joined the United Methodist Free Churches and the Bible Christians to form the United Methodist Church.* The influence of the MNC was disproportionate to its numbers; it is noticeable that MNC principles were eventually adopted by the main Methodist bodies.

See S. Hulme, Memoir of the Rev. William Cooke, D.D. (1886), and G. Packer (ed.), The Centenary of the Methodist New Connexion (1897). A.F. WALLS

METHODIUS, see CYRIL AND METHODIUS

METHODIUS OF OLYMPUS (d. c.311). Ecclesiastical writer. Few biographical details about him are certainly known, but he was probably bishop of Olympus, Lycia, and was martyred in Chalcis. He has variously been attributed the sees of Tyre, Patara, and Philippi. He wrote extensively, mostly in dialogue form. His only complete work extant in Greek is Symposium; or Banquet of the Ten Virgins, modeled on Plato's Symposium, in which Methodius extols the excellence of virginity (as Plato commended "Eros"), ending with a hymn to Christ as the church's Bridegroom. Portions of two other works survive in Greek. Aglaophon; or On the Resurrection attacks Origen's* doctrine of the soul's preexistence and maintains the identity of the resurrection body with the earthly body. On Free Will attacks the dualism and determinism of Valentinian Gnosticism.* Other works survive only in Slavonic.

J.G.G. NORMAN

MÉTIS. The Métis (from a French word meaning "to mix") are people of mixed European and usually Cree or Ojibwa Indian blood and were originally the offspring of the NW Canadian fur trade. Those of French origin have survived because the French Roman Catholic missionaries encouraged them to keep the language and religion of the fathers while the Métis held to the nomadic way of life of their Indian mothers. During the nineteenth century the Métis began to think of themselves as a "new nation" and sought a way of life which was part Indian and part European, but accepted by neither. They have suffered much during the twentieth century because of the loss of their way of life. ROBERT WILSON

METRICAL PSALTERS. One of the fruits of the Protestant Reformation. Both Luther and Calvin insisted that the people as a whole, not just groups of professional singers, should participate in singing in the public service of worship. Luther was the first to compose metrical versions of the Psalms, but his example was soon followed by others. In France, Clement Marot; in England, Miles Coverdale; in Scotland, two Wedderburn brothers; and in the Netherlands, Souter Liedekens—all produced metrical psalters, or portions of the psalter in the vaious vernaculars. Calvin, however, probably played the most important role in the popularization of Psalm-singing. Not only did he prepare a collection of Psalms while in Strasbourg, but he was responsible for the publication in Geneva of a complete psalter versified by Marot and Theodore Beza. This became the standard work for most Reformed churches, being used either in French or in translation. In England and Scotland the metrical Psalms of Sternhold and Hopkins, Kethe and others eventually became the versions used. The music for these works was often adapted from popular tunes, although sometimes they were composed specifically for a psalm, probably as in the case of Old Hundredth. These psalms often became the battle hymns of the Calvinists in their resistance to oppressive governments, and have formed the basis for most Protestant psalmody and hymnology ever since.

W.S. REID

METROPOLITAN. Used legally for the first time in the canons of the Council of Nicea (325), the term denoted the bishop of the principal city of a province. Insofar as institutional Christianity achieved a shape analogous to Roman imperial administration, and had a membership somewhat proportional to the population distribution of the empire, the centers of one served as centers of the other. The concept goes back to the first millennium B.C., by the end of which "metropolis" was applied to a major center such as Rome, or to a minor location such as Laodicea. By the sixth century, according to Evagrius, the metropolitan was under the exarch, reflecting the regrouping of provinces into dioceses; by the tenth century he ranked above other archbishops.

CLYDE CURRY SMITH

MEXICO, see LATIN AMERICA

MEYER, EDUARD (1855-1930). German historian. One of the greatest authorities on the ancient world, he was professor of ancient history at the University of Berlin (1902-23). Next to Mommsen, he probably contributed more than any other person to the foundation of the modern critical study of antiquity. His multivolumed Geschichte des Altertums (8 vols., 1884-1902) is an amazing feat of scholarship. He wrote a number of works in the area of Jewish and early Christian studies, the more important being Die Entstehung des Judenthums (1896); Der Papyrusfund von Elephantine (1912); Ursprung and Anfänge des Christentums (3 vols. 1921-23). In the last work he argued for the historical value of Luke–Acts and for its early date. W. WARD GASQUE

MEYER, F(REDERICK) B(ROTHERTON) (1847-1929). Born in London of a wealthy family of German ancestry, he graduated from London University in 1869 and completed theological training at Regent's Park (Baptist) College. He was pastor of Pembroke Chapel, Liverpool (1870-72), then moved to Priory Street Chapel, York, where he helped launch on his memorable campaigns the then-unknown D.L. Moody.* Meyer moved in 1874 to Leicester, and in 1881 opened Melbourne Hall, a center of social and evangelistic activity which was Meyer's abiding memorial. In 1888 he went to London and was pastor successively of Regent's Park Church and Christ Church, Westminster Bridge Road. He was president of the Free Church Council in 1904 and retired in 1921. Meyer was a popular convention speaker at Northfield, Keswick, and Portstewart. He was a man of dignified appearance, compassionate heart, ceaseless industry, prolific pen, and graceful style. His devotional studies on biblical characters are still widely read.

ARTHUR CLARKE

MEYER, HEINRICH AUGUST WILHELM (1800-1873). German Protestant clergyman and NT scholar. He studied theology at the University of Jena. His chief contribution to scholarship was the internationally famous commentary series which he founded, Kritischexegetischer Kommentar über das Neuen Testament (1829ff.), which has been steadily revised and kept up to date to the present and is still the most important academic commentary of the NT. In addition to contributing the first two volumes of the series on the Greek text and German translation, he wrote commentaries on the four gospels, Acts, and eight Pauline epistles (excluding 1 and 2 Thessalonians and the Pastorals). In the introduction to the volume on the Greek text, Meyer outlined the principles of historico-grammatical exegesis as he understood them. Although it is customary to award the laurels to F.C. Baur* for founding the modern critical approach to the NT, an equal case could be made for granting the honor to Meyer. In his work one finds the application of historical criticism quite apart from the Hegelian presuppositions and antiorthodox bias of Baur and his school.

W. WARD GASQUE

MIALL, EDWARD (1809-1881). Congregationalist minister. The acknowledged leader of the movement in the nineteenth century to disestablish the Church of England, Miall for this reason left a pastorate in Leicester in 1840 to found and edit a newspaper, The Nonconformist. In 1844 he arranged for a large conference of Nonconformists in London at which was organized the British Anti-State-Church Association (later renamed the Society for the Liberation of Religion from State Patronage and Control). Under Miall's leadership the Liberation Society, as it was popularly called, became a highly organized and vigorous extra-parliamentary pressure group. He also espoused a number of radical causes which he considered to be related to the disestablishment issue—universal suffrage, the ballot, repeal of the Corn Laws, and programs for improving the living conditions of the working classes. He frequently contested parliamentary elections and had two terms in Parliament—as member for Rochdale (1852-57) and for Bradford (1869-74). The climax in his career came when in 1871, greatly disturbed by what he considered to be the too favorable treatment of the Church of England in the Education Act of 1870, he moved, although unsuccessfully, for a committee on church disestablishment. Because of poor health he retired from Parliament in 1874 and shortly afterward from public life.

E. MORRIS SIDER

MICHAEL CERULARIUS, see CERULARIUS

MICHAEL OF CESENA (b. c.1270-1342). General of the Franciscan Order. Born in Cesena, Italy, he came to the leadership of the Franciscans at a delicate moment when the order was torn by strife between factions known as the "Spirituals" and the "Community." The former adhered strictly to the fundamentals of poverty and non-ownership of property laid down by Francis, while the latter faction opted for a more liberal interpretation recognizing papal rulings on the "poor use" of possessions. Michael's support of William of Ockham,* theologian and apologist for the Spirituals, and his association with Emperor Louis of Bavaria brought about his excommunication by John XXII in 1328. Ockham and Emperor Louis opposed not only the papal rulings concerning possession of property, but advocated separation of civil and ecclesiastical authority. Michael disputed the excommunication and until his death was recognized by his faction as general of the order.

ROYAL L. PECK

MICHAELIS, JOHANN DAVID (1717-1791). Protestant Orientalist and biblical critic. He was professor of philosophy (1746-50) and oriental languages (1750-91) at the University of Göttingen. A prolific writer, he authored an entire journal (Orientalische und exegetische Bibliothek, 1771-91) as well as important studies in Hebrew lexicography and Aramaic and Syriac grammar. His multivolumed study of the Mosiac Law (1770-75; ET 1814) was very influential in the early days of biblical criticism in Germany, as were his other critical and exegetical writings on the OT (Messianic Psalms, 1759; Ecclesiastes, 1762; I Maccabbees, 1776). In a serialized translation of the Bible with annotations (OT, 1769-83; NT 1790-92) he introduced the educated German layman to the results of contemporary criticism. His Introduction to the New Testament (1750; ET 1793-1801) laid the foundation for further works of similar nature; he was also author of an Introduction to the Old Testament (1787, incomplete).

W. WARD GASQUE

MICHAEL THE ARCHANGEL. An archangel mentioned in four passages of Scripture (Dan. 10: 13-21; 12:1; Jude 9; Rev. 12:7) and perhaps alluded to elsewhere (e.g., Acts 7:38). In Daniel, Michael is "the great prince" responsible for the guardianship of God's people Israel; in Revelation he leads the angelic host in the struggle against the dragon (Satan) and his angels. The brief passage in Jude also depicts Michael as in conflict with Satan, but on this occasion over the body of Moses; the allusion is thought to be from a work no longer extant, The Assumption of Moses. The OT Pseudepigrapha attribute a major role to Michael (so especially Enoch and the Ascension of Isaiah); here he is given the additional functions of recording angel and intermediary at the giving of the Law at Sinai.

In the course of Christian history, Michael came to be revered as the guardian of Christian armies in their battles with the heathen, and as the conductor of individual Christian souls to God at death (on the basis of the Daniel and Jude passages respectively). In Phrygia he came to be revered as a healer too, a cult which spread widely through Christendom. A fifth-century legend further credited him with an appearance on Mt. Gargano in Apulia, whence a feast of the "Appearing of St. Michael" came into being. He was canonized. In Christian art Michael has usually been depicted in battle with, or victory over, the dragon (cf. Rev. 12:7).

For bibliography see under ANGEL.

D.F. PAYNE

MICHELANGELO BUONARROTI (1475-1564). One of the greatest artists of Western culture, he was a genius in nearly every medium of art. His work marked the culmination of the Renaissance and a transition to the new age of baroque and mannerism. Son of a minor Italian nobleman, he studied under the Ghirlandaio brothers and at the Medici palace, where he was influenced by Neoplatonic thought. He worked in several Italian cities before settling permanently in Rome (1534). He was an example of the Renaissance universal man, for in addition to his sculpture, painting, architecture, and drawing he also wrote lyric poetry. Deeply affected by Savonarola,* he lived an austere life and was given to melancholy, brooding and apprehensive presentiments.

Despite widespread acclaim for his painting, he preferred to think of himself as a sculptor and he produced the Madonna Seated on a Step; Battle of the Centaurs; St. John in the Wilderness; Pietà; Christ the Risen Savior; David; and Moses. His paintings include the great cartoon of The Battle of Pisa He worked for Popes Julius II, Leo X, Clement VIII, and Paul III. The frescoes in the Sistine Chapel took many years to complete (1508-12, 1535-41) and depict the story of the coming of Christ as envisioned by prophets and sibyls in scenes from Genesis, including the ancestors of Christ and the Last Judgment. The work on the ceiling alone covered over 10,000 square feet of surface and included hundreds of figures, some of them twelve feet high. As an architect he completed the memorial chapel for the Medici family and the façade of San Lorenzo and was put in charge of the fortification of Florence (1629). His greatest structural achievement was St. Peter's in Rome. He reworked all the designs of his predecessors and supervised the construction of the supports and the lower sections of the giant dome, although he did not live to see the work finished.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: E. Steinman and R. Wittkower, Michelangelo Bibliographie (1927); C. de Tolnay, Michelangelo (6 vols., 1943- ); G. Vasari, The Lives of the Artists (ed. B. Burroughs, 1946).

ROBERT G. CLOUSE

MICHIGAN PAPYRUS OF ACTS. A fragment containing Acts 18:27–19:6, 12-16, which dates c. A.D. 300. It was discovered in Egypt and now belongs to the University of Michigan Library (inventory no. 1571). It represents the so-called Western text-type of the Greek NT.

MIDDLE AGES. A term used generally to refer to that period in European history between the fall of Rome and the Protestant Reformation. The center of life in this millennium was the church, so much so that the medieval world was a church-state. Emperors and kings received their privilege from the church, and feudal society descended accordingly with an endless round of homage between lords and vassals—all of them ultimately vassals of the church. Cities arose around the bishop's seat (cathedral), and monasteries were writing theology and praying for the souls of men everywhere. Not only was government theocratic, however hypocritically, but also men's interests, whether art, music, education, or economics, were rooted in the church. Architecture was ecclesiastical and achieved an unsurpassed perfection, and the universities began with theology and civil and canon law.

For those who first coined the term, the Middle Ages unjustly meant an age of barbarism, ignorance, and superstition, but historians have long divided this period into workable thirds: early, high, and late. "Early" meant the actual collapse, 476-700, when barbarians again were finding their way. In the high or Gothic period, the rebuilding occurred, and a new civilization flowered; but by 1300, evening had come, and the late period witnessed change that was again preparatory.

C.G. THORNE, JR.

MIGETIUS (eighth century). Spanish theologian. Little is known of him apart from opponents' letters. His obscure teaching contains lurking remnants of Priscillianism,* rejecting all distinction between the Second Person of the Trinity and the Incarnate Christ. He taught that God was revealed successively in David (as Father), Jesus (as Son), and Paul (as Holy Spirit), basing it on an extreme literal exegesis. He was opposed by Elipandus,* whose Adoptianism probably arose out of this controversy. Migetius was condemned at synods at Seville in 782 and 785.

MIGNE, JACQUES PAUL (1800-1875). French Roman Catholic priest, patrologist, and publisher. Because of a controversy with his bishop concerning the revolution of 1830, he left his diocese and went to Paris. He turned to journalism, and after several unsuccessful attempts in newspaper work he decided to publish a universal library for the clergy. In 2,000 volumes he hoped to publish at a moderate price all the Catholic literature to his own day. His press employed 300 people, and he showed himself expert at managing the enterprise. In addition to hundreds of volumes of theology, sermons, church history, apologetics, theological encyclopedias, and works on the Virgin Mary he published editions of the Latin Fathers (221 vols., 1844-64 and the Greek fathers (162 vols. in Greek 1857-66; 81 vols. in Latin 1856-67). His work remains valuable because despite errors it is still the one uniform collection of the Church Fathers which even approaches completion.

ROBERT G. CLOUSE

MILAN, EDICT OF. Generally understood to be that passage quoted by Lactantius and Eusebius in which the two augusti, Constantine and Licinius, meeting at Milan in January 313, redressed the two-century-old policy of the Roman government toward the Christian Church, so that Christians not only were free to worship as they wished, but were to receive compensation and return of confiscated property—in exchange for the divine favor upon the state in its precarious hour. The passage cited, however, cannot be the actual edict, but at best the rescript of Licinius, dated 13 June 313 at Nicomedia, reporting to the governor of Bithynia the action taken.

MILES, JOHN (1621-1683). Welsh Baptist pioneer. Born at Newton Clifford in Herefordshire and educated at Brasenose College, Oxford, he was baptized on profession of faith at the Glass House Baptist Church, Broad Street, London, and migrated to Ilston in the Gower peninsula to begin his career as the main founder of the Particular Baptists* in Wales. Through his diligence Baptist congregations were gathered over a wide area extending from Carmarthen in the west to the English border in the east. Although Miles did not possess the eloquence of some of his Puritan contemporaries, he had a rare gift of organization and a firm grasp of Baptist principles. He linked the congregations together in a quasi-Presbyterian system under his own firm control, with general meetings of representatives to make decisions on matters of common concern. In theology he was a strong Calvinist and firmly opposed any departure from this norm, whether by the Arminian Baptists of central Wales, or Quakers, or millenarians. His position among Welsh Puritans is revealed by his appointment as an approver under the Propagation Act of 1650. He was Puritan minister of Ilston from 1657 to 1660, when he was ejected under the terms of the September Act of the latter year. He emigrated to New England about 1663 and founded a Baptist Church at Rehoboth, Massachusetts, but in 1667 he moved again and founded a new settlement, Swansea, Massachusetts. His life in New England was a somewhat tempestuous one. He died at Swansea.

R. TUDUR JONES

MILIC, JOHN (Jan, of Kromeriz) (d.1374). Reformer. Born in Kremsier, Moravia, he served in the chancery of Charles IV before becoming a priest, canon, and finally archdeacon in Prague. As a wealthy prelate he embraced poverty to preach the simplicity of the early church, openly attacking the laxity of laity and clergy in 1363. The Inquisition in Rome ordered his imprisonment for preaching that the Antichrist had arrived in 1367, but Urban V ordered his release and he worked with outcast women in Prague, founding a home for them in 1372. In 1373 the clergy of Prague denounced his preaching, but Gregory XI cleared him of all charges in Avignon, where he died.

JOHN GROH

MILLENARIANISM. Sometimes known as "Chiliasm," this is the belief that there will be a 1,000-year period at the end of this age when Christ will reign on earth over a perfect world order. The primary biblical support for this belief is a literal interpretation of Revelation 20:1-10. Some Jewish thought envisaged a messianic kingdom of limited duration; others, a "sabbath" of 1,000 years before the final perfect state. Revelation 20 links these two concepts together for the first time. By linking the 1,000-year period with prophetic visions such as in Isaiah 55–66, the concept of a time of peace, justice, and righteousness on earth is built up.

The timing and nature of the "millennium" are disputed. "Premillennialists" hold that at Christ's return the dead will be raised, believers still living will be "caught up" to meet him in the air, and they will then reign on earth with Christ for 1,000 years. Then Satan will be allowed to be active again, but the judgment of the Great White Throne will follow. "Postmillennialists" see the return of Christ as taking place after the millennium, which may be a literal "golden age" on earth, or which may be symbolic of the final triumph of the Gospel, in this age. "Amillennialists" hold that there is no literal millennium; instead, they see the Revelation teaching as standing for the present age, the whole period between the ministry of Jesus on earth and His second coming. Each school of thought has possible ways of explaining the "two resurrections" and other concepts in Revelation 20.

The 1,000-year period is an important element in the doctrinal systems of the various Adventist* groups and of Jehovah's Witnesses.*

BIBLIOGRAPHY: S.J. Case, The Millennial Hope (1918); C.N. Kraus, Dispensationalism in America (1958); N.R.C. Cohn, The Pursuit of the Millennium (1961); S.G.F. Brandon, History, Time and Deity (1964).

A. MORGAN DERHAM

MILLENARY PETITION. So called because about 1,000 ministers were said to support it, this petition was presented in April 1603 to James as he was traveling from Scotland to London to begin his reign as James I of England. The men who composed the petition spoke "neither as factious men . . . nor as schismatics;" they requested not a full program of Presbyterianism but moderate reforms within the diocesan structure of the church. These reforms could be decided, they suggested, by "a conference among the learned." They did, however, ask for the removal of certain grievances. These were the sign of the cross in baptism, less liturgical music, no bowing at the name of Jesus, no profanation of the Lord's Day, the reform of church courts, and other matters. James agreed to the conference, which was held at Hampton Court* in January 1604.

PETER TOON

MILLENNIALISM, see MILLENARIANISM

MILLER, WILLIAM (1782-1849). Founder of Adventism.* Born in Pittsfield, Massachusetts, he educated himself by reading, and farmed in his wife's hometown, Poultny, Vermont, where he served as deputy sheriff and justice of the peace. He gained the rank of captain in the War of 1812 and thereafter settled on a farm in Low Hampton, New York. He was converted from Deism in 1816 and after fourteen years of Bible study decided Christ would return in 1843. In 1833 he was licensed as a Baptist preacher. His book, Evidence from Scripture and History of the Second Coming of Christ, About the Year 1843, published in 1836, and the publicity work of Joshua Himes from 1839 won many to his views. Disenchanted, he dropped out of the Adventist movement in 1845. He died after loss of sight in old age in Low Hampton.

EARLE E. CAIRNS

MILLIGAN, GEORGE (1860-1934). Scottish NT scholar. Son of William Milligan* and born while his father was minister at Kilconquhar, he was educated at Scottish and German universities before ministering at Edinburgh and Caputh (1883-1910). He then held the chair of divinity and biblical criticism at Glasgow until retirement in 1932. He interested himself in the promotion of Christian education and was moderator of the general assembly in 1923. Among his many writings on the NT, which were known outside his own country, was The Vocabulary of the Greek Testament (1914-29).

MILLIGAN, WILLIAM (1821-1893). Scottish NT scholar. Born in Edinburgh and educated at the universities of St. Andrews, Edinburgh, and Halle, he ministered in two Fife parishes before becoming in 1860 professor of biblical criticism at Aberdeen, a post he held until his death. He was moderator of the general assembly of the Church of Scotland in 1882 and became that body's principal clerk in 1886. He was also a member of the company formed for the revision of the NT in English (1870), and the first president of the newly founded Scottish Church Society (1892). A liberal in theology, he published a number of books on biblical and theological subjects.

MILLS, BENJAMIN FAY (1857-1916). Evangelist and Christian Socialist. Born in Rahway, New Jersey, educated at Phillips Academy, Hamilton College, and Lake Forest College, he received Congregational ordination in 1878. He served Minnesota, New York, and Vermont pastorates before entering itinerant evangelism in 1886. Using his District Combination Plan, he conducted the most highly organized citywide revivals of the nineteenth century, perfecting many presently used methods. Believing social and economic problems could be solved only by effecting God's kingdom on earth, Mills became the only major evangelist attempting to unite revivalism with the Social Gospel. Finding this impossible, he terminated his itinerancy in 1895 to preach Christian Socialism* in New York and Boston. In 1899, despairing of an evangelical awakening, he became minister to First Unitarian Church, Oakland, California. He founded and led the Los Angeles Fellowship (1904-11) and Chicago Fellowship (1911-14). Repenting of his heterodoxy, he returned to itinerant evangelism in 1915.

D.E. PITZER

MILMAN, HENRY HART (1791-1868). Anglican historian. Born in London, son of a noted physician, he was educated at Eton and Oxford and ordained priest in 1816, later becoming a canon of Westminster and dean of St. Paul's. At first he achieved acclaim as a poet and translator from the Sanskrit, and was professor of poetry at Oxford from 1821 to 1831, but his History of the Jews (1830) was hailed by liberal divines as a masterly application of German critical methods of OT study. Next he wrote the life of Gibbon,* whose Decline and Fall he had also edited. In 1855 appeared his History of Latin Christianity, which despite mistakes of fact is a work of immense erudition, candor, and balanced judgment. A member of the Broad Church school, Milman was never as extreme as Dean Stanley,* shunned public controversy, and deplored the writings of the more radical German critics, particularly Strauss.

IAN SELLERS

MILNE, WILLIAM (1785-1822). Missionary to China. Born near Aberdeen, he went from Scotland to study at the London Missionary Society's college, where he was ordained in 1812. In the following year he joined Robert Morrison* in Macao, but having been ordered out, he distributed literature in Canton and the East Indies and then made his base in Malacca where he assisted Morrison in the translation and printing of the Chinese Bible. In 1815 he cut the first fonts of Chinese type made by a European, and wrote Christian pamphlets. He ordained his convert Liang A-fah,* and became principal of the Anglo-Chinese College in Malacca founded by Morrison in 1818. Milne died four years later. His son later served in China.

LESLIE T. LYALL

MILNER, ISAAC (1750-1820). Evangelical clergyman. After his father's death when he was ten, he became a weaver but managed to teach himself Latin, Greek, and mathematics. When he was eighteen his brother Joseph* became headmaster of Hull Grammar School and appointed Isaac to the staff. Joseph then paid for him to go to Queens' College, Cambridge. He was ordained in 1775 and the next year became a fellow of his college. In 1784 he went to France with William Wilberforce* and their reading of the NT together led to the latter's conversion. In 1788 he was appointed president of Queens', and his ambitious and forceful personality was asserted in spreading Evangelical influence in Cambridge. In 1791 he was made dean of Carlisle, but never spent more than three or four months a year in residence there. Learned in many fields of science, mathematics, and philosophy, he was a large and jovial man and has been described as "an Evangelical Dr. Johnson." He wrote a number of books, including a life of his brother.

R.E. NIXON

MILNER, JOSEPH (1744-1797). Evangelical clergyman. After education at Cambridge he was ordained and served a curacy at Thorp Arch, near Tadcaster in Yorkshire. In 1768 he became headmaster of Hull Grammar School, where one of his pupils was William Wilberforce.* He was also lecturer at Holy Trinity Church. He employed his brother Isaac* at the school for a short while before paying for his education at Cambridge. In 1770 he became an ardent Evangelical, and his preaching in Hull and at North Ferriby nearby (where he was successively curate and vicar) was very popular among the poor and resented by the more respectable. In due course the opposition died out, and in 1797 he was appointed vicar of Holy Trinity Church, Hull, through the influence of Wilberforce, but died before he could be instituted. His best-known work was his History of the Church of Christ (3 vols., 1794-97). He was not a professional historian, and the work has been subjected to a good deal of criticism, but it was marked by a determination to record the bright side of church history and not just controversies. Some of his essays and sermons were also published.

R.E. NIXON

MILTIADES (second century). Associated with his supposed apologetic writings. His works are mentioned in Tertullian and Eusebius, though none are extant. These writers suggest he wrote against the pagans, Jews, Montanists, and Valentinians. He wrote in Asia Minor.

MILTIADES (Melchiades) (d.314). Pope from about 311. Mentioned in the Liber Pontificalis ("the Papal Book"), he was by birth an African. During his pontificate Constantine defeated Maxentius (312) and issued the so-called Edict of Milan* (313) which marked the triumph of Christianity over persecution. He commissioned a council at the Lateran in 313 to investigate the Donatist Schism. The council decided against the schismatics and condemned them.

MILTITZ, CARL (Charles) VON (1490-1529). Papal secretary and subnuncio to Germany. Born at Rabenau near Dresden of the lesser Saxon nobility, he studied law at Cologne and Bologna. In Rome from 1513 to 1518, through unprincipled maneuvering he advanced rapidly within the Curia until appointed papal secretary in 1518. He is best known for his meetings with Luther, 1518-19. Sent to Saxony with the Golden Rose for Elector Frederick, and commissioned to act only with the approval of Cajetan* (the papal legate), Miltitz precipitously decided to attempt a reconciliation of Luther with the church. By boast, misrepresentation, and denigration of Cajetan and Tetzel,* he convinced Frederick a conference with Luther would be successful. They met at Altenburg early in January 1519. Though theologically ignorant, Miltitz was a clever diplomat and secured Luther's promise of silence-unless-attacked until his complaints were heard by a German bishop—a settlement too shallow to last. Miltitz wrote to the pope, indicating that Luther was ready to recant, then journeyed to Leipzig to further embarrass Tetzel. The accord failed; Miltitz met twice again with Luther without result. His last years were spent as canon of Mainz and Meissen. He died by accidental drowning.

BRIAN G. ARMSTRONG

MILTON, JOHN (1608-1674). English poet. Born in London and educated at St. Paul's School and Christ's College, Cambridge, he was always of a serious turn of mind and felt himself even in his youth called to a high vocation in the service of God. His earliest important poem, On the Morning of Christ's Nativity, (1629) is really a poem, not of Christmas only, but of the Incarnation, its power and effects.

In the next decade he wrote a number of short poems, of which the most significant is Lycidas (1637), and the masque Comus (1634). The former is a pastoral lament for a college acquaintance, Edward King, but it goes far beyond the occasion to question the whole purpose of life and especially of the dedicated life. In addition it contains Milton's scathing lines of the "hireling shepherds" of the church, concluding almost prophetically with the threat that the Civil War would actualize of that "two-handed engine at the door [which] stands ready to strike once and strike no more." Comus presents in a tableau the conflict between chastity and vice (luxuria), personified in the persons of the Lady and Comus. The latter enchains her body, but is powerless against her free spirit.

After the outbreak of the Civil War, Milton was occupied first with pamphleteering in the parliamentary cause and then in the service of government as Latin Secretary under the Commonwealth. His pamphlets cover controversy against episcopacy (e.g., Reformation of Church Discipline in England, 1641), about divorce which he supported more liberally than most of his contemporaries, and on political and miscellaneous questions such as the Tractate on Education (1644) and the immortal plea for freedom of printing in Areopagitica (1644). It is said, though with what degree of truth is conjectural, that his unhappy experience of marriage to Mary Powell led to the first divorce pamphlet. Perhaps it need only be added that, despite the known incompatibilities of this first alliance, Milton later married a second and a third time.

With the Restoration, Milton as a regicide and the most eloquent apologist for regicide stood in danger of his life. By this time he was also blind. The intercession of friends gained him inclusion in the general amnesty, and his last years were spent in a return to the poetry which he had forsaken two decades before. In them he was enabled to fulfill the high vocation he had always felt himself called to perform. Paradise Lost appeared in 1667, followed four years later by Paradise Regained and Samson Agonistes. In the first of these he sought no less than "to justify the ways of God to man" in an extensive epic treatment of the Fall. In verse uniquely sonorous and impressive he characterizes the main protagonists in that event and ranges through heaven, hell, and earth in his examination of motive, conflict, and responsibility.

The later poems are less magnificent, and Paradise Regained in particular seems to lack that rich humanism of which its predecessor is the last and finest flower in English literature. There is also an occasional harsh note that is paralleled too in the flashes of savagery that mark, and possibly mar, Samson Agonistes. So much like Milton himself, Samson, "eyeless in Gaza, at the mill with slaves," wreaks his God's revenge on the Philistine enemy. Yet in the face of suffering and death, Milton's final word on the subject, both stoic and Christian, is: "All is best,/Though we oft doubt what th'unsearchable dispose/Of highest wisdom brings about."

See Poems (ed. J. Carey and A. Fowler, 1968), and W.R. Parker, Milton, (1968).

ARTHUR POLLARD

MIMICRY, RELIGIOUS. The act of ridiculing or making sport of a religious rite. This entry will limit itself to mimicry of the early Christian rites (see also ABBOT OF UNREASON).

Much of the dramatic entertainment for people in the Hellenistic and imperial eras consisted of scenes parodied from daily life. Gestures and facial expressions played an important role in these productions. On rare occasions the strolling companies of mimes approached the level of drama by concentrating on a person's character instead of a plot. A single individual at times performed all the roles in a mime. Mimes frequently buffooned a character in a novel situation, such as a poor man with sudden riches. Simple plots, abrupt endings, and vile language added spice, since the only fixed prop was a movable curtain. Most of the mimes dealt with sordid themes; in imperial times a stock theme was adultery, often performed on stage. Spectators witnessed an actual execution when a condemned criminal took the actor's place at a critical point in the play. Most actors were not known for their high moral character or social station.

The mime's flexibility and adaptability to current tastes gave it perpetual vitality. Popular songs and dances were introduced as needed. But since it lacked the dramatic art of tragedy and comedy, the mime was a drama of escape rather than interpretation. It had deserted the religious basis of earlier classical forms.

The "Christian" had probably become a stock figure in the mime by the second century. The church's rites, especially baptism, were parodied as the baptismal candidate, accompanied by a number of clerics, was led on stage for the ceremony. Tradition has it that St. Genesius, the patron of actors, was converted while performing his parody of baptism in which an emotional "fit" preceded the rite. Updating earlier interests in execution, the mimes also ridiculed martyrdom.

Since the mimes were among the last popular strongholds of paganism, their continuing concern with the old gods and their mimicry of Christian rituals prompted vehement attacks from Christian spokesmen. Such attacks were leveled in the writings of Minucius Felix, Tatian, Arnobius, Lactantius, and others. Augustine distinguished between comedies or tragedies and the mimes with their filthy language.

Special works against the theater were composed by Tertullian, Cyprian, and Chrysostom. Tertullian asked how a Christian could pray "amen" and still praise the mime with the same lips. Cyprian judged it improper for a Christian to act or instruct others in the trade; the community should support such a person with its poor chest. According to Chrysostom, God spoke through monks while the mimes were the devil's spokesmen. Their songs, dances, and shows were his litany and sacrament, and their guiding principle, like his, was disguise and imitation. People who attended the shows were the devil's children. Seductive actresses with curled hair and painted cheeks, singing their "ballads of the brothel," were nothing less than contemptuous. Chrysostom called the mime an incurable plague, a snare of death, a theater of concupiscence. These Christian writers apparently held that it was unlawful to witness what was unlawful to do.

The Council of Illiberis required that a pantomimist renounce his trade before baptism, while the Third Council of Carthage was more moderate. The Council of Trullo denounced both pantomimists and their theaters. The pagan Zosimos reproached the Christian emperor Constance for patronizing the mimes. A decree at Elvira forbidding Christians to be charioteers or pantomimists was reiterated at Arles (452), although no mention was there made of attending plays. Leo the Great contended that the theater attracted greater crowds than martyrs' festivals.

Christian attacks were largely unsuccessful, since a large body of nominal Christians viewed the mime as harmless. Interest in this entertainment never faltered in the Eastern Empire; some of Eastern hymnody bore witness to the power of the mimes' songs. As the church's power increased, it got the upper hand. All performers of mime were excommunicated in the fifth century, and in the sixth Justinian closed all theaters. The mime remained unacceptable to most churchmen even after it was forced to drop its mimicry of sacraments and rites, but it lived on as a form of popular entertainment.

JOHN GROH

MINIMS (Ordo Fratrum Minimorum). An order of friars who regarded themselves as the least of all the religious, below the Friars Minor. Founded initially and informally as a group of hermits in 1435 by Francis of Paola,* and confirmed by the pope in 1474, the order had no written rule until 1493. This rule was similar to that of the Franciscans. A second rule (1501) was less obviously Franciscan, being more austere. Abstinence from animal meats, fish, eggs, cheese, butter, and milk was required; bread, vegetables, fruit, and oil were the staple diet. The brothers dressed in a black wool habit, cord girdle, with cape and hood. The order enjoyed great initial popularity, and by 1550 there were over 400 houses in Europe. Today only a few survive in Italy and Spain.

PETER TOON

MINOR ORDERS. The lowest offices of the ministry: porters, lectors, exorcists, and acolytes in the West, and lectors and cantors in the East. Subdeacons are classed as a Major Order (with bishops, priests, and deacons) in the West, but as a Minor Order in the East. The giving of Minor Orders is still basically governed in the West by the Statuta Ecclesiae Antiqua (c.500). All four (which are first mentioned in a letter of Bishop Cornelius of Rome to Fabian of Antioch in 252) are now usually conferred at the same time by a bishop or abbot upon students who are intended for the priesthood. Though each office did have a specific function, this has now been abandoned since the function has been taken over by the laity or priesthood (e.g., lighting of candles, once done by an acolyte, is now done by a layman). The Minor Orders are now only a step toward full ordination. PETER TOON

MINSTER. Properly a monastery or a monastery church, but applied in England to certain large churches (e.g., Beverley and Wimborne) and to certain cathedrals (e.g., York, Lincoln, Ripon, Southwell, Lichfield). The usage in England derives from the term monasterium (OE mynster) used in the Middle Ages to denote not only monastic foundations but also colleges of secular canons, many of whom lived under the Rule of Augustine and were hardly distinguishable from regular clergy. The term münster is used in this way of certain large churches and cathedrals in Europe (e.g., Ulm, Strasbourg, and Zurich).

