Preface to the Second Edition

We are gratified that the first edition of this work should have been so quickly taken up as to make this second edition necessary. Publisher and editor are both deeply appreciative of the friendly letters that have come from all over the worldwide Christian fellowship. Many, in response to the editorial invitation, have made comments critical and constructive, as indeed have numerous newspapers and journals. All have been carefully noted, not a few of the points have been incorporated in this new improved edition, and others have been kept for future reference. Through the time and trouble taken by these thoughtful correspondents, this project has been made an even more notable piece of international and ecumenical teamwork.

Because of the short time that has elapsed since the initial publication, and because we wanted to ensure that the book remained the same convenient size, major additions have been precluded at this time. Many new entries and features have nonetheless been introduced, others updated. All this has involved several additions to our list of contributors, all of whom helpfully completed assignments at short notice. We apologize to the Reverend Reginald Kissack whose name was inadvertently omitted from the earlier list of contributors; we remember with affection and thankfulness to God our colleagues Dr. Harold R. Cook, Dr. Arthur Fawcett, and Principal Robin Nixon who have died since the book enriched by their pens was published.

While it is manifestly impossible to include everything and everyone with a claim to appear in such a volume, we have tried to be sensitive even at the expense of departing from strict historical method. Thus, for example, we have included some less well-known missionaries as in some sense representative of all the noble army of men and women who down the ages for Christ's sake have taken the Gospel throughout the world.

This new edition has meant urgent editorial demands on busy people. We are grateful for timely responses and tasks readily undertaken. Finally, of the warm cooperation given by the publisher, renewed acknowledgment is made by the editor across the water.

Preface

Church history cannot be discussed in isolation; it is not something that is happening in a vacuum while the rest of the world goes by untouched and untouching. To make a distinction between spiritual and natural phenomena is on one view to fall into that dualism which Christianity itself has roundly condemned down the centuries. Opinions will nonetheless differ on what then falls within the scope of a dictionary of the Christian Church, especially one audacious enough to restrict treatment to a single volume.

The editor who is given a million words and carte blanche will quickly learn the futility of approaching his task in terms of what he is not producing. He is not aiming at a theological word-book, but what record of Christian history could exclude reference to such subjects as Justification and the Atonement? His brief ostensibly excludes the major non-Christian religions, but how can he ignore, say, Islam, which has profoundly affected the course of Christianity and been a perennial challenge to Christian missions? Similar difficulties attend any attempt to reject other areas, and the editor finds himself reluctantly fathering something which is variously gazetteer, archaeological record, compendium of saintly lore, and liturgical primer.

An even thornier problem concerns how much he should do the work of a Bible dictionary. He cannot exclude an entry on the Old Testament and features of Judaism. Various aspects of the New Testament must be covered, and major New Testament characters call for separate entries. Despite the extraordinary tendency of kindred publications, moreover, he might feel that a volume on the Christian Church should have entries on God and Jesus Christ. The fact that he cannot treat a subject comprehensively is no valid reason for ignoring it altogether.

In handling the articles, clarity has been preferred to consistency in cases where to combine both was impracticable, and conciseness has precluded polish. To a large degree writers have been given a free hand to treat the space allotted to them in the way which they as experts have felt best. In biographical entries this may result in only the briefest allusion to the subject's life history so that more consideration can be given his work. In the case of subjects still alive some information inevitably will be out of date by the time of publication; under this category there are, however, very few entries, and such as there are usually concern only those who have retired from their main life's work. The rules governing matters of style and layout were modified as the project developed—hopefully always in the interests of greater lucidity.

This volume sets out to give information not easily available elsewhere in such convenient form, and thus to encourage the reader to marvel at the richness, diversity, and wholeness of the Christian tradition. Church history lends itself to very different interpretations, but a concerted attempt has been made here to be factual rather than apologetic, and to avoid a misguided manipulation of history that would result in a partisan manifesto where it has no right to be. At the same time, few historians in reality do much worshiping at the high altar of impartiality: even the attempt to present the facts may, through selectivity and omission, reflect the interests and prejudices of the author or editor.

The aim has been to steer a middle path between academic textbook and popular introduction. In projects such as this, allocation of space confronts the organizer with countless pitfalls and trip-wires. There is a colossal arrogance about sitting down and cold-bloodedly assessing at 150 words the lifetime labors of some bygone saint who knew incredible hardship in taking the Gospel to desolate places—and even more about excluding one of his colleagues altogether. No two editors will have the same views on how space should be apportioned, and any enterprising reviewer will find what to his mind are glaring anomalies. Why should C.S. Lewis have more lines than Lollards? Why write at all about Witchcraft or American Indians? Those who get the scent of too many peripheral hares rushing down the byways of history might at least be led on, as it were, to marvel at how colorful and exciting and many-faceted is our Christian record, and how musicians and missionaries, seers and soldiers, kings and councils, poets and persecutors, humanists and heretics have all, for better or worse, made a contribution that ought to be delineated.

In certain subjects where hard facts have been lost in the mists of history and only legend or speculation remains, only the merest mention is given of them, or they are omitted altogether. In other areas where history has thrown up a significant question mark, recourse has been made to the policy of Bishop Gilbert Burnet: "Where things appear doubtful ... deliver them with the same uncertainty to the world." If an inordinately large amount of space seems to have been given an entry, it may mean that there are few if any complementary articles on that subject in the dictionary.

Of cross-references there could be no end; because no hard-and-fast policy was practicable here, we have tried to be sensible about them and to indicate them as economically as possible. Thus, for example, a cross-reference asterisk in the text against "Monophysite" will be understood as alluding to the entry headed "Monophysitism." The asterisk is generally found at the end of a complete name—e.g., "William of Malmesbury*"—even where it is the first part that determines alphabetical order, but exceptions have here and there been made to avoid more serious ambiguities.

In dealing with several thousand entries covering twenty centuries of history, no gift short of infallibility would prevent occasional editorial slips. We would not only ask the forgiveness of readers for such, but invite their cooperation in pointing them out, so that a future edition of the volume may benefit.

The editor is keenly and humbly aware that this dictionary has been a piece of teamwork, an ecumenical enterprise which has joined Christian writers from many lands and denominations. Their faithful and knowledgeable labors have immeasurably enriched the project, and their understanding letters and friendship have lightened the editorial load. Four of our colleagues have died since completing their contributions; we thank God for these tangible reminders which are a small part of the total work and witness of Dr. S. Richey Kamm, Dr. Carl S. Meyer, Dr. Matthew Spinka, and Dr. D.P. Thomson.

The project is indebted particularly to scholars, notably Peter Toon and Jim Norman, who came to the editor's rescue with eleventh-hour works of supererogation after many articles were disconcertingly orphaned. To his American associate, Dr. Earle E. Cairns, the editor owes a great debt for counsel in the initial stages and for giving time amid a busy life to read so many manuscripts, and to help and encourage in so many areas. Dr. Robert K. DeVries and Mr. James E. Ruark, fellow-laborers at The Zondervan Corporation, have shown considerable expertise both in preparing for press a most demanding piece of work and in their cheerful and patient coping with an editor 4,000 miles away. The task of proofreading, finally, has been considerably aided by the technical ability and the initiative with which the printers have carried out their task.

It is our prayer that this volume will give readers a renewed sense of history; an identification and feeling of fellowship with those who have carried the torch before them—many of them, in David Livingstone's words, "the watchmen of the night ... who worked when all was gloom"; and most of all an appreciation of the priceless heritage which is ours in Christ.

AACHEN, SYNODS OF. Church assemblies held between 789 and 1023. Aachen (Aix-la-Chapelle) had political importance in the empire of Charlemagne and his successors and thus was a natural venue. There were synods, meetings, or councils of clergy (with state officials) there in 789, 797, 799, 801-2, 809, 816-17, 819, 825, 1000, and 1023. Their pronouncements related mainly to the ecclesiastical discipline of the parish clergy, monks, and nuns. Also discussed were the faithful performance of duty by servants of the state, and doctrinal issues. Charlemagne himself saw that Adoptianism, which had its roots in Spain and which had been condemned at Regensburg (792) and Frankfurt (794), was again condemned at Aachen in 799. In addition, he disagreed with the pope on the doctrine of Double Procession,* and had this discussed in 809. Alcuin of York was present in both 802 and 816 and contributed to discussion about implementing the Benedictine Rule. The last synod of Aachen was called to decide which diocese, Cologne or Liège, should control the monastery at Burtscheid.

PETER TOON

ABA I, THE GREAT (d.552). Patriarch of the East from 540. Persian-born sometime before 500, he was converted about 520 through the courtesy and testimony of a catechist Yusuf and took the name Aba. He studied at Nisibis, went to the Byzantine Empire possibly for safety, and visited Constantinople. Around 533 he returned, a distinguished scholar, and taught at Nisibis, revising the Syrian Bible. Appointed patriarch, he toured the church with two metropolitans and seven bishops, taking vigorous and practical steps to end schism and restore Christian morals and church discipline. Accused in 543 of enforcing Christian standards in church courts and of converting Zoroastrians, he was arrested, tried, and finally exiled to Azarbaijan. Under house arrest he continued to administer the church, and he held a synod in 544. After attempted assassination by an apostate Christian in 549, he fled to Ctesiphon and threw himself on the shah's mercy. Arrested and heavily chained by Magians in 550, he was formally pardoned and released by the shah in 551. Worn out by long suffering, he died the following year.

ABAILARD, PETER, see ABELARD

ABBÉ. The title given to a class of unbeneficed secular clerks in France and Italy. Originally French for "abbot", an extension of meaning took place in the sixteenth century, when the Concordat of 1516 authorized Francis I to nominate secular priests in commendam. Laymen were often appointed and, not being bound to residence, many abbés commendataires never saw the monasteries of which they were titular rulers. The term is now applied to secular clerics in general as a title of courtesy.

ABBESS (Lat. abbatissa). The female head of a community of women known as a nunnery or convent. She is elected to her position of authority, which is similar to that of an abbot* over the monks, by the secret votes of the sisters or nuns of the community. It is customary for a bishop to install her in her office with an abbatial cross, staff, and ring. She usually holds her office for life. In the Middle Ages she was often of noble or royal birth and so played an important part in the life of the church—e.g., St. Hilda in England who ruled over a double monastery* and took a leading part at the Synod of Whitby. The Council of Trent tried to regularize the position of the abbess and to bring her under the control of the diocesan bishop. In the German Lutheran Church the title remained in use for the head of collegiate foundations of unmarried women known as stiftsdamen.

NOEL S. POLLARD

ABBEY. A building occupied by, or the group name for, a particular house of a religious order of monks or nuns. The name was originally confined to one of the orders of the Benedictine family (e.g., Cistercian, Carthusian, Trappist). Under the rule of St. Benedict, each abbey is to be regarded as a family unit under the nearly autonomous authority of its abbot. It is now also used for a building once used as an abbey.

ABBO (945?-1004). French Benedictine abbot. Born near Orléans, he became a Benedictine monk at the great abbey of Fleury. He studied at Paris, Rheims, and Orléans and subsequently became widely recognized as an authority on astronomy, mathematics, and philosophy. In 986 he took charge of an English monastery at Ramsey, but two years later returned as abbot to Fleury, where he installed the Cluniac observance. Under him a flourishing culture arose, marking perhaps the beginning of a renaissance movement which came to fruition in the eleventh century. Abbo may have been responsible for a treatise on Aristotle's Categories, and certainly the earliest manuscript containing Aristotle's Analytics dates from Fleury during this period. Much in demand as an arbitrator in monastic disputes, he was killed while attempting to separate two groups of quarreling monks in Gascony. J.G.G. NORMAN

ABBOT. The title given to the head of a community of monks of the Benedictine Order or some of the regular canons. The name comes from the Hebrew word for "father", and was commonly used in the Eastern churches for all the older monks. In the West, where it derives from the Latin abbas, it was applied to the head of the community alone. At first the abbot was a layman and was under the control of the local bishop. During the Middle Ages abbots became responsible to the pope and assumed authority sometimes greater than that of the bishop. At first the abbot was appointed by the bishop, but in time the monks elected the head of their house. The bishop now confirmed and blessed the new abbot, giving him a mitre, crosier, and ring. These symbols recognized his semi-episcopal power, which was wielded in both church and state. At the end of the Middle Ages his authority over his own house had become such that he often lived in great state. In the sixteenth century the long struggle to gain exemption from episcopal control ended, when all orders of monks gained immunity. The abbot is now directly responsible to the pope. He is elected to his office for a period of years, or more usually for life.

NOEL S. POLLARD

ABBOT, GEORGE (1562-1633). Archbishop of Canterbury from 1611. Born in Guildford, son of a cloth worker, he was educated at Oxford and became successively master of University College and vice-chancellor (three times), dean of Winchester (1600), and bishop of London (1609) before becoming primate. His rise to power followed his defense of the hereditary monarchy (1606) and his efforts to join the English and Scottish churches (1608). For many years he was the recognized leader of the English Calvinists and showed pronounced Puritan sympathies. He took a leading part in the translation of the Authorized Version and is regarded as one of the first to establish Anglicanism as a militant force based on the concept of a godly king. He was less tolerant toward Roman Catholics, insisting that the designation was nonsensical, Rome being a local place and "Catholic" meaning "universal". Though he was often in favor with James I and Charles I, he firmly stood his ground against them when they demanded compromise with conscience, especially on matters of divorce. Throughout much of his career he was bitterly opposed by the Oxford High Churchmen, especially by Laud,* who was to succeed him at Canterbury. Abbot was temporarily under a cloud when in 1622 he accidentally shot a gamekeeper while hunting, but the king was responsible for his exoneration from blame.

ABBOT, GEORGE (1603-1648). English Puritan. He was born in Yorkshire, but little is known of his early life. He later excelled in Hebrew studies and patristics. Although he remained a layman, he is chiefly known for his theological writings, which were clear and succinct for his age. A Paraphrase of the Whole Book of Job appeared in 1640, and an important contribution on the Sabbatarian controversy in Vindiciae Sabbath in 1641. A volume published posthumously in 1651 contained his brief notes upon the whole Book of Psalms.

ABBOT OF UNREASON/MISRULE. A person selected in medieval times to preside over the Feast of Fools* or other revels and games celebrated at the Christmas/New Year season. He received a staff of office, retaining his authority throughout the feast. In a secularized form the institution survived into the seventeenth century.

ABBOTT, EDWIN ABBOTT (1838-1926). Educationist and religious writer. Distinguished student in classics and mathematics at Cambridge, he became fellow of St. John's and was ordained in 1862, was appointed headmaster of City of London School in 1865, and resigned in 1889 to devote himself to study and writing. Though chiefly remembered for his educational work, Abbott (a Broad Churchman) also wrote biographies of Francis Bacon, Cardinal Newman, and Thomas à Becket, books on textual criticism, and several religious romances. Reflecting learning, piety, and originality, his works still repay study. Philomythus (1891) is a superb psychological treatment of theological rationalizing, with Newman as the butt. His science-fiction novel Flatland (by A. Square, 1884) describes a two-dimension world into which the world of three dimensions impinges seemingly miraculously. Abbott suggests that miracles in our world may be incursions from a fourth dimension. R.E.D. CLARK

ABBOTT, LYMAN (1835-1922). Congregational minister. Born in Massachusetts, he was educated at New York University and practiced law before deciding to enter the ministry of the Congregational Church. He became a pastor in Terre Haute, Indiana, in 1860 and after the Civil War served as an executive of the American Union Commission which promoted reconstruction in the South. He wrote for Harper's Magazine, then became editor of the Illustrated Christian Weekly in 1870. In 1876 he joined H.W. Beecher* as an editor of the Christian Union. In 1888 he was called to succeed Beecher as pastor of Plymouth Church in Brooklyn. Abbott was one of the most influential American religious thinkers of his time. Until the 1880s he remained fairly orthodox, then gradually accepted radical biblical criticism and became a theological liberal. He accepted Darwinism and applied the evolutionary principle to religious questions: even God could be conceived as an immanent evolutionary power; history is the record of divinity out of humanity; "what Jesus was, humanity is becoming". Abbott's books include The Theology of an Evolutionist (1897) and Reminiscences (1915).

ABBREVIATORS. Papal chancery officials who drafted the pope's written statements. The name came from the highly developed system of abbreviations used in papal documents. Pius II (1458-64) fixed their number at seventy; Pius VII (1800-1823) reduced it to seventeen. Their duties were transferred in 1908 to the Collegium Pronotariorum Apostolicorum.

ABECEDARIANS. A name given to Anabaptists who scorned normal methods of education and affirmed that God could provide enlightenment by more direct methods such as visions and ecstasies. Academic study was repudiated as idolatrous, and learned preaching was regarded as falsifying God's Word. Some went to such lengths of obscurantism as to assert that it was necessary to be ignorant even of the letters of the alphabet—hence A-B-C-darians. Among the group were Nicholas Storch and the Zwickau* Prophets, and even Carlstadt* was influenced to the extent of renouncing his title of doctor of divinity.

ABELARD (Abailard), PETER (1079-1142). Scholastic philosopher and theologian. Born in Pallet, Brittany, he studied successively under the Nominalist Roscellinus, the extreme Realist William of Champeaux (whom he made appear inconsistent on the issue of universals), and Anselm of Laon. A brilliant debater and lecturer, Abelard attracted large numbers of enthusiastic students, first in dialectics and later in theology. His arrogance, however, and his celebrated love affair with the beautiful and talented Héloïse almost ruined his professorial career. About 1115, Abelard was in Paris where he lived in the home of Fulbert, canon of Notre Dame, whose teenage niece Héloïse he had agreed to tutor; but the relationship became too personal, and they had a son whom they named Astrolabe. To pacify Fulbert, Abelard secretly married Héloïse after the son's birth. When calumnious rumors began to circulate, Héloïse agreed to retire to the convent of Argenteuil rather than further damage Abelard's teaching career. Fulbert in anger hired a band of men who broke into Abelard's quarters one night and castrated him.

After this humiliation Abelard entered the monastery of St.-Denis, at the age of forty. In 1121 he was condemned unheard by the Council of Soissons for his view of the Trinity, and his book on the subject was burned. Pursued from place to place by both the authorities and large numbers of students, Abelard finally became abbot of the secluded monastery of St. Gildas in Brittany in 1125. Conditions at St. Gildas were unbearable, and he soon went back to Paris where he once again became a popular lecturer.

At about the same time he incurred the animosity of Bernard of Clairvaux* because of alleged heretical statements about the Trinity in his writings. In 1141, several propositions selected from his works were condemned at the Council of Sens. On his way to Rome to appeal his case, Abelard stopped at Cluny where he was convinced by Peter the Venerable of the hopelessness of any further attempts to defend himself. He died at a Cluniac priory.

He left a considerable body of works on logic and theology, including his famous Sic et Non (1122), in which he arranged contradictory statements from the Scriptures and the Church Fathers to force students to reconcile them; his autobiography, Story of My Misfortunes, personal letters, and a number of poems, sermons, and letters. His influence lived on through his students, among whom were a number of future popes and cardinals, John of Salisbury, and Otto of Freising.

A century ago historians generally hailed Abelard as the precursor of modern free thought, but recent scholarship has challenged this view, emphasizing rather that he was an intellectual who approached his faith with new methods and who sought to understand faith by the use of reason. Although he is best remembered for his affair with Héloïse, his greatest contribution to medieval Christian history was to help initiate the task of reconciling faith and reason. He held to the existence of individual things, but added that man had a mental idea of common elements in things as well as the existence of ultimate universals in the mind of God.

See ATONEMENT concerning his "moral theory" of that doctrine.

ABELONIANS. An obscure sect in Roman North Africa known of only from Augustine (Heresies 87), formerly active in the country around Hippo, but defunct when he wrote in 428 through the recent conversion of its last adherents to the Catholic Church. Both marriage and total sexual abstinence were obligatory for its members. Each couple was required to adopt a boy and a girl, who after the death of both adoptive parents formed a new pair and themselves adopted children. Augustine believed the sect's name derived from Punic, but knew that others connected it with Abel (whence they were called also Abelians or Abeloites), presumably because in Jewish, Christian, and Gnostic legends Abel died not only childless but also in unsullied chastity though (in some versions) married (cf. L. Ginzberg, The Legends of the Jews, 5, 1925). The sect was perhaps related to the Gnostic-Manichaean tradition in Africa.

ABERCIUS, INSCRIPTION OF (c.182). In 1883 Sir William Ramsay discovered an incomplete epitaph of Avircius of Hieropolis in Phrygia. Without mentioning Christ or the Church, Avircius speaks of the all-seeing Shepherd who taught faithful Scriptures, and of Paul, of faith, of the fish from the spring, of the Virgin, of the wine and loaf, which guided him through the plains of Syria, across the Euphrates to Nisibis and to Rome. At each place he met "brethren." He invites prayers for himself, warning against using his tomb for others, on pain of paying gold into the treasuries of Rome and Hieropolis. Interpretations vary, but the symbolism suggests a Christian context. The mutilated word basil? may refer to the Roman emperor or to the sovereign church at Rome, the latter suggesting growing imperialism.

If Avircius Marcellus, addressed favorably in an anti-Marcionite tract in Eusebius, wrote the inscription, his warning was possibly against Montanist activity. The legendary fourth-century Vita Abercii identifies Avircius as bishop of Hieropolis. G.T.D. ANGEL

ABERDEEN DOCTORS. A group of early seventeenth-century Scottish divines, so called because they had all taken the degree of doctor of divinity by thesis at King's College, Aberdeen. (The degree had been in abeyance since the Reformation, but was revived by James VI.) They came into prominence because of their opposition to the National Covenant* of 1638. The Covenant had revived the anti-Romanist Negative Confession of 1581 and had given it an anti-episcopacy and anti-Prayer Book interpretation. The Doctors objected to this and to the undermining of the royal authority implicit in the Covenant, to take which, they asserted, was to separate the Church of Scotland from the other Reformed churches and from the early church. They had hoped to dispel the notion that the Fathers were on the side of Rome and to show the essential catholicity of the Reformed Church, but despite them episcopacy was abolished, Presbyterianism restored. Most famous of the Doctors was John Forbes.* The effectiveness of their advocacy of episcopacy is seen in the comparative strength of the Episcopal Church in NE Scotland even today. HENRY R. SEFTON

ABERHART, WILLIAM (1878-1943). Baptist lay preacher and politician. Born in Ontario, he graduated from Queen's University in 1906 and as a young schoolteacher migrated to Calgary in 1910. From 1915 to 1935 he was principal of Crescent Heights High School. He was a lay preacher and in 1918 began a Bible class in Westbourne Baptist Church, soon outgrowing the building. After a period in downtown theaters, the Bible class developed into the Prophetic Bible Institute. This was the period of the modernist-fundamentalist controversy, and Aberhart's preaching of the Gospel, with a strong premillennial emphasis, drew a large following. Realizing the potential of radio, he began broadcasting in 1925 and soon was on the air several hours each Sunday. By the mid-thirties, radio evangelism had resulted in a movement of near-revival in parts of Alberta and western Saskatchewan, bringing an unparalleled proliferation of Bible institutes and an army of volunteers for overseas missions. As the worldwide economic depression of the 1930s settled upon the Canadian prairies, with the concomitant of a ten-year drought, Aberhart came across the "social credit" theory. He began to weave this theme into his Sunday broadcasts, broadening his appeal to include the Mormons and many who had not been sympathetic with his theology. In 1935 his Social Credit Party won a landslide victory in the Alberta provincial election. Aberhart became premier, and Social Credit became an orthodox and conservative administration, with strong religious and evangelical overtones, all of which was carried on after Aberhart's death in 1943 by his outstanding pupil, E.C. Manning.* IAN S. RENNIE

ABERNETHY, JOHN (1680-1740). Irish Presbyterian minister. Trained at Glasgow and Edinburgh, he became minister of the Presbyterian congregation at Antrim in 1703. In 1718 he refused the general synod's appointment to a Dublin congregation—an unprecedented exercise of independent judgment which led to a division between "Subscribers" and "Non-Subscribers." The latter, led by Abernethy, were excommunicated in 1726. From 1730 he ministered in Wood Street, Dublin. Abernethy asserted that terms of Communion, fixed in the NT, do not include subscription to humanly devised confessions of faith, and he opposed the exclusion of men from the service of the state on religious grounds. His published works include Discourses concerning the Being and Natural Perfections of God. HAROLD H. ROWDON

ABGAR, LEGEND OF. Eusebius quotes two letters and a story from the record office at Edessa, in which King Abgar V Ukkama invites Jesus to visit and heal him. Jesus commends Abgar's faith, explains that He must accomplish His work where He is, but promises to send a disciple after the Ascension. The story relates the mission of the Apostle Thaddaeus (alias Addai*) to Edessa. An expanded Syriac version, Doctrina Addai, discovered in 1876, mentions a portrait of Jesus painted by Abgar's messenger and the reply of Jesus promising safety to Edessa. This letter of Jesus became a charm to avert evil and appeared on doorposts, sepulchers, and city gates throughout the empire, even as far afield as twelfth-century Britain. G.T.D. ANGEL

ABJURATION. In ecclesiastical usage the term denotes the renunciation on oath of heresy, made when the penitent is reconciled with the church. Gregory the Great (d.604) had occasion to set out the practice of the early church when it dealt with heretics such as Montanists, Eunomians, and others. There was added to the abjuration a solemn profession of faith, especially after the rise of Nestorianism* and Eutychianism.* The procedure was further elaborated during the time of the Inquisition,* according to the degree of heresy. In modern times abjuration in its formal sense is normally restricted to receptions into, or reconciliation with, Greek and Roman Catholic churches. J.D. DOUGLAS

ABJURATION, OATH OF. Originating under William III in 1690 and made compulsory in 1701, this required holders of public office in England, such as members of Parliament, lawyers, and clergy, to renounce the claims of the recently overthrown Stuart dynasty. It was reimposed under Hanoverian kings, when in addition Roman Catholics had to reject papal claims to jurisdiction in England. The oath was later modified in order to give relief to Roman Catholics, Jews, and others.

ABLUTIONS. These are of two types: first and most common, the washing of the fingers and chalice by the celebrant after the Communion in the Mass. The custom became part of the Eucharist by the eleventh century, but was regulated by the Missal of Pius V, which prescribed a double ablution: the chalice with wine, then the chalice and fingers with wine and water. Most Eastern rites have a similar procedure, but in the Greek rite ablutions are made privately by the celebrating priest after the Mass. The need for such ablutions is necessarily connected with the belief that the bread and wine are truly the body and blood of Christ. The second type of ablution is the rinsing of the mouth with wine after the reception of the sacrament by newly ordained priests and the rinsing of the mouth with water after the communion of the sick. Both these customs probably originated in the medieval custom of giving communicants unconsecrated wine after the actual Communion; but they may go back to the time when the Lord's Supper was part of a larger Christian meal (1 Cor. 11). PETER TOON

ABOLITIONISM. The movement which opposed slavery and the slave trade in North America prior to the American Civil War (1861-65). Although the practice of slavery was criticized by a few Christians, notably Quakers and other radical sectarians, the importation of Negro slaves from Africa into the American colonies was supported by the vast majority of the churches and churchmen up to the end of the first decade of the nineteenth century, on the basis of Scripture, tradition, and economic necessity. The beginning of the nineteenth century saw the growth of public opinion against slavery, especially in the Northern States, though it was an uphill struggle; at the same time the position in the Southern States was hardened in the defense of slavery, adding to the traditional arguments the theory of the racial inferiority of the Negro. This difference of white opinion on both sides eventually led to the war between the states. Notable centers of abolitionism were the religion-oriented colleges of the North and Midwest, such as Knox, Oberlin, Western Reserve, and Wheaton. The movement was spread by a host of newspaper editors (some of whom were killed), lecturers, clergymen, and authors, including William Lloyd Garrison, C.G. Finney,* T.D. Weld,* Horace Greeley, and Wendell Phillips. Garrison's Liberator (founded in 1831) early gave teeth to the movement so effectively advanced two decades later by Harriet Beecher Stowe's* Uncle Tom's Cabin.

ABORTION. Criminal abortion of illegitimate and unwanted legitimate pregnancy is widespread. Its adverse effect on the health, future fertility, and even survival of the woman is a main cause in the demand for the more ready availability of legal abortion.

Therapeutic abortion, often without legal sanction, has long been practiced by reputable gynecologists in situations where the woman's life or health is endangered by pregnancy. The problem of defining "health," especially "mental health," is great. In practice it is impossible to separate physical, mental, and socioeconomic factors. Despite this, there is a real place for termination of pregnancy, especially in the worn-out, defeated mother, although adverse medical sequelae and remorse occur in probably five to twenty percent of women.

Recent liberalizing legislation in Scandinavia (from 1935), in Britain (1967), and in many of the United States (from 1967) has resulted in a flood of abortions far beyond the aim of the legislatures —the vast majority of abortions being requested for merely emotional disturbance due to situational conflicts. Safeguards for hospital staff who have conscientious objection to participating have proved inadequate. Abortion on demand or by negotiation between mother and doctor free of all legal restraint had been allowed, or at least practiced, in parts of the Soviet bloc and in Japan. Following decisions of the Supreme Court in 1973 this is so throughout the United States. In some countries of Eastern Europe four pregnancies out of every five have been aborted; Romania has now severely restricted its earlier permissive laws.

The commandment "Thou shalt not murder" is not appropriate to therapeutic abortion, the intention of which is towards the health of the woman, not against the fetus. Exodus 21:22f. refers to unintentional miscarriage and is generally held to indicate that the fetus has a different status from the person. The "sanctity of life," based on such Scriptures as Genesis 9:5f., is an important concept, but is relevant not only for the fetus but also for the life of the mother which may be overwhelmed by a further pregnancy. Scripture places a greater emphasis on the quality of life than on mere existence. Whether the fetus has a soul, and when that is implanted, has been debated since pre-Christian times. With the success of in vitro impregnation of ova by sperm in the laboratory it becomes an acute problem. Similarly, the realization that from fifteen to fifty percent of all pregnancies are lost by spontaneous miscarriage, often unrecognized even by the mother, increases the difficulties of visualizing the afterlife if all such are ensouled. Many would rather consider that the person is a soul and therefore esteem the fetus as a potential person, its value and importance increasing with gestational age.

The moral dilemma of weighing the value of a fetus with all its human and spiritual potentialities against the cost to the life of the mother and existing family is a real one, felt by all who have to give permission or have to operate. This dilemma will soon be felt by all women if the abortion "pill" in process of development comes into use as a standard contraceptive and self-abortive technique.

ABRAHAM, APOCALYPSE OF. This Jewish apocryphal work survives only in a Slavonic version, translated from a lost Greek version dependent possibly on a Hebrew or Aramaic original. The extant form was edited by a Christian and has Christian editions. The original was composed in the period A.D. 70-130. Chapters 1-8 expound the conversion of Abraham from idolatry. The remaining chapters (9-32) contain the apocalypse proper, where God tells Abraham of the fall of man and of the idolatry of his seed which leads to the destruction of the Temple (A.D. 70). When, however, the present age, lasting twelve "hours," is over, the End will come when the heathen will be destroyed, the apocalyptic trumpet will sound, and the people of God will be gathered together.

ABRAHAM, TESTAMENT OF. An apocryphal writing originating among first-century Jews (Kö hler) or second-century Jewish-Christians (M.R. James). It describes how the patriarch is shown the universe and told that it will survive seven thousand years. Then the archangel Michael at the first gate of heaven shows him the paths to hell and paradise, and three different judgments taking place. Praying for the forgiveness of sinners, Abraham is returned to earth and on to paradise. The major interest is in the fate of individual souls and not with the impending crisis characteristic of conventional Jewish apocalyptic. The Greek text, which includes Christian passages (interpolations?), survives in a longer and a shorter recension, with translations in Coptic, Arabic, Ethiopic, Slavonic, and Romanian.

ABRAHAM ECCHELLENSIS (1600-1664). Maronite* scholar. Surnamed from his birthplace Hekel (Ecchel) on the Syrian slopes of Mt. Hermon, he was a brilliant student at the Maronite college in Rome, where he obtained philosophical and theological doctorates. His valuable contributions to Le Jay's Polyglot Bible* (Arabic, Latin of Ruth, Arabic of III Maccabees) were cut short by an unfortunate jealous quarrel with his collaborator Gabriel Sionita. His immense labors included compiling, translation, philosophy, church history, and Christian biography (see L. Petit in Dictionnaire d'histoire et de géographie ecclésiastiques, vol. I). Though a man of prodigious scholarship, he is expertly judged (like many students of minutiae) to have failed in critical faculty or total synthetic grasp.

ROY A. STEWART

ABSALON (1128-1201). Archbishop of Lund. Born in Denmark, he studied and taught in Paris. In 1158 he became bishop of Roskilde, served as papal legate to Scandinavia, and after 1178 was appointed to Lund. He introduced into Denmark Western religious customs like clerical celibacy and monasticism. In fortifying his diocese against an invasion of Slavs (Wends) he built at Havn a castle-keep which became the nucleus of the city of Copenhagen. He served as counselor to Waldemar I and Canute IV, doing much to arrange wise legislation. He patronized the arts and encouraged Saxo Grammaticus to write the history of Denmark. He founded a monastery at Soro, where he was buried.

ABSOLUTION. There is no discussion of this subject as such in the Bible, and the word never occurs there. But the sinner's need of forgiveness, of which absolution speaks, is entirely scriptural. So is the truth that forgiveness of sin is the gracious work of God in Jesus Christ, who died for our sins and was raised for our justification (Rom. 4:25; cf. 1 John 1:9). He alone has the authority to absolve (Luke 7:47f.; cf. Col. 1:13f.).

In the early church, when postbaptismal sin became a problem, the power to announce forgiveness to the penitent (stemming from the word of Jesus in Matt. 16:19; 18:18; cf. John 20:23, "if you forgive anyone his sins, they are forgiven") was associated with the clergy. At first this declaration was public; but later, and with the development of sacramental theory during the scholastic period, absolution was mostly given after auricular confession in private, by means of the formula "I absolve you," or (especially in the East) in the course of a prayer. The former tended to obscure the real source of absolution.

Since the Reformation and the decline of private confession, absolution in the technical sense has tended, in the Protestant but not in the Roman Catholic Church, to be confined to public worship. The Anglican Book of Common Prayer, for example, returns to a biblical emphasis by following the general confession with an announcement of God's forgiveness in Christ.

ABSTINENCE. The practice within the Christian Church of abstaining from the consumption of certain kinds of food. The principle behind it has often been traced to the custom of fasting* in the OT and its continuation in the NT. The latter considers the question in a new light. While it is encouraged as a means of defeating sin or helping the weak in conscience, it is condemned when it is set up as a new law (Col. 2:20-23; 1 Tim. 4:1-3). Abstinence was made a prominent ideal in the early church, especially in the growing monastic communities. The ideal was translated for lay people into a rule of abstinence from meat on Fridays, which continued in the Roman Catholic and other churches until modern times. The Eastern Orthodox churches have made even stricter rules. The sixteenth-century Reformers tried to restore the balanced view of the NT and attacked medieval views of abstinence. The evangelical revival in the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries fostered the growth of a specialized use of the word. Symptomatic of a return to a more legalistic view in Protestantism, societies in the USA and Britain formed to advocate total abstinence from alcohol.

NOEL S. POLLARD

ABSTINENTS. The title given to several sects that flourished in SW Europe in the third and fourth centuries. Partly a revolt against the worldliness of the established churches, the movement shared the Gnostic concept of matter as intrinsically evil. Strict asceticism was demanded, including the proscription of marriage. There was total abstinence from animal food, and constant prayers, fasts, and vigils were further evidence of the adherents' austere devotion. Priscillian,* their most prominent member, was executed at Trier in 385 for alleged magic and heresy.

ABUNA ("our father"). The name used of the patriarch of the Ethiopian Church.*

ABYSSINIAN CHURCH, see ETHIOPIA

ACACIAN SCHISM (484-519). A schism between the Eastern Church and Rome during the Monophysite* controversy, arising from the high-handed excommunication of Acacius of Constantinople* by Felix III of Rome. Attempts by succeeding patriarchs and emperors to heal the breach failed because of Rome's extravagant demands. On the accession of Justin I, however, Patriarch John yielded to Pope Hormisdas, and removed the names of Zeno, Acacius, and his five successors from the "diptychs," ending the schism.

ACACIUS (d.366). Semi-Arian theologian and bishop of Caesarea in Palestine. A friend of Eudoxios of Antioch and George of Alexandria, he opposed the dogmatic (homoousios) theology of the Council of Nicea (325). He enjoyed the patronage of the emperor and in 340, after the death of Eusebius, became bishop of Caesarea and inherited the great library of his predecessor, of which he made much use. He became leader of the Court Party or Homoeans*—those who asserted that Jesus Christ was like (homoios) the Father but not necessarily of the same essence. He played a major role at the Council of Seleucia (359), but was deposed by those who were defenders of the Nicene orthodoxy. Constantius nevertheless stood by him. When Jovian was emperor, Acacius found it expedient to accept the Creed of Nicea, but he later returned to Arianism* when Valens began to rule. He wrote much in his lifetime, but only fragments now remain.
PETER TOON

ACACIUS OF CONSTANTINOPLE (d.489). Patriarch from 471. He opposed the anti-Chalcedon encyclical of the usurping Emperor Basiliscus (475) and, on Zeno's restoration (476), collaborated in the deposition of Monophysite* bishops. In 479 he consecrated Calanaion, a Chalcedonian, as bishop of Antioch, and was criticized by Pope Simplicius for interfering in another see. At the instigation of the Monophysite Peter Mongus he encouraged Zeno to promulgate the Henoticon in the interests of theological peace (482), for which Felix of Rome excommunicated him. Rejecting this with contempt, Acacius erased Felix's name from the "diptychs." Thus arose the Acacian Schism. J.G.G. NORMAN

ACADEMIES, DISSENTING, see DISSENTING ACADEMIES

ACCIDENT. Ancient and medieval philosophy distinguished between accident ("nonessential property") and substance, as both Plato and Aristotle considered the former as secondary at most and Aquinas emphasized its relative and dependent aspects. Philosophical understanding prepared the way for its use in theology, in the doctrine of the Eucharist, to elucidate the nature of the divine presence in the bread and wine. As early as about 1200 Alain of Lille spoke of transubstantiation (Theologicae regulae), and Aquinas taught that after the consecration the physical accidents existed with the divine substance but without inhering. This was accepted until the widespread rejection by the Reformers, who thought not at all of accidents but much more symbolically rather than literally about the substance itself. The Council of Trent continued the medieval teaching, though without mention of accidents, and this continues to be the Roman position. Reformed theology has never ceased to disagree fundamentally, though it has its differences in interpreting the nature of the actual presence. C.G. THORNE, JR.

ACCIDIE (Gr. akēdia, "negligence"). Used in both the Septuagint (Isa. 61:3) and in Cicero (Att. xii:45) in its basic meaning, it later also became a technical term for the mental prostration, induced by fasting and bodily discipline, experienced by hermits, monks, and recluses. As such it is described by Cassian (360-435) in his Institutes and by medieval writers such as Aquinas. The word has, however, commonly been used to describe the fourth cardinal sin and is thus a synonym for sloth and sluggishness. As a description of a spiritual condition it was given a new lease of life in the English-speaking world by F. Francis, bishop of Oxford, because of his treatment of it in The Spirit of Discipline (1891). PETER TOON

ACCOMMODATION. As a technical term this refers to the adaptation by God of the manner (including the language) in which revelation has taken place to suit the finitude, needs, and culture of men. In Calvin's phrase, God "lisps" His word to man. The logical and epistemological problems such a view raises are similar to those raised by any attempt to speak of divine reality in human language. God may also be said to adapt the content of His revelation to suit the historical progressiveness of His purposes. Regarding the limits of this process of accommodation, some argue that the Old Testament incorporates pagan ideas and mythical legends. It is also held by some that Christ in "emptying himself" of His glory (Phil. 2:17) took on the erroneous beliefs and thought patterns of His age on such matters as demon possession and the authority of the Old Testament. But it is hard to credit that, while fiercely condemning the Pharisees on so many matters, He should have left other errors untouched. If it is said He was unaware of the extent of His ignorance, this involves not accommodation but outright error, and is of course incompatible with His true deity. H.D. MC DONALD

ACOEMETAE (Gr. = "the sleepless ones"). A monastic group, founded by the abbot Alexander in Constantinople, which flourished in the Eastern Church in the middle of the fifth century. Their name was derived from the fact that in their monasteries the members were divided into choirs which engaged alternately in psalm-singing without intermission, day and night, the whole year round. Alexander met with opposition and was forced to flee from Constantinople, but later the Studite monastery, founded in Constantinople by Studius, a Roman consul, became an influential center of the Acoemetae. Possibly through the influence of Studius, the group had some imitators in the Western Church, and in the sixth century they were established in the abbey of St. Maurice of Agaune in Valois, by King Sigismund of Burgundy. Theologically their main contribution was their strong defense of the orthodox faith against the Monophysites, but this laid them open to a charge of Nestorianism,* for which they were excommunicated by Pope John II in 534, after which their influence became negligible.
HUGH J. BLAIR

ACOLYTES. First attested about 250 at Rome, these were listed after subdeacons among the clergy, and in Cyprian's Epistles in Africa as couriers for letters and gifts. Their Greek title ("attendants") indicates an origin in the Greek-speaking Roman Church, probably earlier in the century by devolution from the diaconate. For some time observed only in major churches, they later acquired eucharistic functions, especially as candlebearers. They became increasingly prominent in Rome from the seventh century as the chief of the four "minor orders"* of Latin clergy (officially under Innocent III in 1207), with special papal duties. Today their liturgical role is often performed by laity. In the East they appear only briefly as a distinct order (cf. Justinian, Novels, 59), except in the Armenian Church.

ACONCIO, GIACOMO (1492-c.1566). Advocate of toleration. Known also as Jacobus Acontius and Jacopo Aconzio, he was an evangelical Catholic (following the teaching of Juan de Valdés) who later supported Protestantism. On the accession of the strict Pope Paul IV in 1557 he had fled to Basle and joined the circle of Castellio and Curione. In 1559 he went to England, was naturalized, and remained there until his death. For services as an ordinance officer he received a state pension. He attached himself to the "Strangers' Church" in London, but was excommunicated for defending Adrian Haemstede, pastor of the Dutch congregation, who had befriended Anabaptists. Aconcio's famous Satanae Stratagemata (1565) was a powerful plea for tolerance, stressing that religious strife was devil-inspired and that peaceful discussion was the best way to defeat Satan. He supported this by six articles of faith, imprecise but orthodox. J.G.G. NORMAN

ACRELIUS, ISRAEL (1714-1800). Lutheran clergyman and author. Born in Öster-Aker, Sweden, son of the local pastor, Acrelius studied at the University of Uppsala and was ordained in 1743. He served Swedish pastorates for six years, then sailed for missionary service among the Swedes on the Delaware River south of Philadelphia. Finding church discipline at Christina indecently lax, he put his church in order. He gave active help to the German Lutherans in Pennsylvania and during leisure hours gathered material for his History of New Sweden which, published in 1759, is the chief literary monument of the Swedes on the Delaware. Poor health forced his return to Sweden in 1756. BRUCE L. SHELLEY

ACTA SANCTORUM. The monumental collection of biographies and legends of the saints, organized according to the ecclesiastical calendar of saints' days, published by the Bollandists,* a group of Belgian Jesuit scholars named for John Bolland, under whom the first volume appeared in 1643. Work continued until interrupted in 1773 by the dissolution of the Society of Jesus and halted in 1796 by the French Revolution, not to be renewed until 1837. The critical attitudes of the Bollandists brought them under the censures of the Spanish Inquisition* in 1695 and caused some of their publications to be placed on the Index. The project is now complete through 10 November. Earlier sections have been supplemented in Analecta Bollandiana, a review devoted to hagiography published since 1882.

ACTION FRANÇAISE. The name of both a political league and its journal, it was founded in 1898 in the aftermath of the Dreyfus Affair with the intention of restoring French national unity under monarchical rule. Hostile to parliamentary government, never a mass movement, it attracted many Roman Catholic students and intelligentsia. Its leaders, notably Charles Maurras, were atheistic and on a naturalist basis held that the national interest had absolute primacy in moral matters. They valued Catholicism for its social function, regardless of its religious truth. Roman Catholic authorities were soon worried by the movement. A prohibition of Catholic membership was prepared in 1914 but not published, for political reasons. Public condemnation in 1926 spelled the eventual end of Action Française's appeal to Catholics, though only at the cost of much conflict in the 1930s. HADDON WILLMER

ACTION SERMON. A term formerly used in Scottish Presbyterian churches to denote the sermon immediately preceding the sacrament of the Lord's Supper. It has been suggested that the term derived from actio gratiarum, the offering of thanks.

ACTS OF THE APOSTLES. The first history of the Christian Church, covering certain important phases of the first thirty years of its existence, was originally the second and concluding part of a record of Christian origins, the first part of which is the gospel according to Luke. The traditional titles borne by the two parts were given them in the church of the second century; originally the complete work may have been called "Luke to Theophilus." Luke,* to whom the twofold work is ascribed without dispute from the second century onwards, is probably identical with Paul's friend of that name, his "beloved physician" of Colossians 4:14. The sections of Acts which are narrated in the first person plural, the "we" passages (Acts 16:10-17; 20:5-21:18; 27:1-28:16), are best regarded as extracts from his travel diary on occasions when he was present at the events related.

Contents. The book may be divided into six parts, of which Part 1 (1:1–5:42) deals with the beginnings of the church in Jerusalem. After the last appearance of the risen Christ, the disciples in that city waited for the fulfillment of His promise that the Holy Spirit would come upon them to empower them for their world-mission. This fulfillment was experienced on the Day of Pentecost, when, led by Peter, they bore such effective witness to the act of God in the resurrection of Christ that 3,000 believed and were baptized in Christ's name, thus forming the nucleus of the church. The life of this primitive community is then illustrated by a series of incidents showing its public triumphs and private problems.

Part 2 (6:1–9:31) tells how the peace of the community was shattered by the campaign of repression launched by the Jewish establishment against the Hellenistic members of the church in particular, after the capital conviction of Stephen, one of their leaders, before the Sanhedrin on a charge of blasphemy against the Temple. In its earliest days the Jerusalem church included Hellenists as well as Hebrews, and the Hellenists appear to have taken up a radical attitude towards the temple order and religious tradition in general, whereas the Hebrews, led by the apostles, were more conservative in these matters. It is significant that in the persecution which followed the stoning of Stephen the apostles were immune from molestation. The Hellenists in the church were forced to leave Jerusalem and Judea, and in their dispersion they spread the Gospel, not only among their fellow Jews, but among the Samaritans (8:4-25). In this work Philip, another leader of the Hellenists, played an important part. The prime agent in the campaign of repression was Saul of Tarsus, an alumnus of the school of Gamaliel; with his sudden conversion to faith in the risen Lord, who confronted him when he was in midcareer as a persecutor and called him into his service, the campaign quickly collapsed.

Part 3 (9:32–12:24) records the beginnings of Gentile evangelization. The first step in this was taken—hesitantly—by Peter, who accepted an invitation to visit the house of the Roman centurion Cornelius in Caesarea and explain the way of salvation. Peter, as he spoke, was presented with a divine fait accompli when the Holy Spirit came on his hearers; Cornelius and his family were baptized as those who, despite their being formerly outsiders, had now been manifestly admitted to the believing community. This fraternizing with Gentiles may have lost the apostles much of the general good will which they had formerly enjoyed in Jerusalem, which explains how Herod Agrippa I could attack them with popular approval (12:1ff.) and how James replaces them in the leadership of the mother church (12:17; 15:13; 21:18). Not long afterward the Gospel was presented to Gentiles on a much larger scale in Syrian Antioch,* by Hellenists who made their way there from the persecution in Jerusalem. Barnabas,* sent by the Jerusalem leaders to supervise this forward movement, secured the help of Saul of Tarsus in his work, and under their guidance the church of Antioch flourished. It gave evidence of its positive Christianity by sending a gift to the Jerusalem church in time of famine.

Part 4 (12:25–15:35) continues the record of Gentile evangelization. Antioch became a base for missionary outreach: Barnabas and Saul (to whom Luke henceforth refers mostly by his Roman cognomen Paul*) were released by the church there to carry the Gospel to Cyprus and Asia Minor. Churches were planted in the Phrygian and Lycaonian cities of Pisidian Antioch, Iconium, Lystra, and Derbe. The rapid increase of Gentile members in the church caused misgivings in Judea, but the Council of Jerusalem (15:6-29), at which Barnabas and Paul were present with a delegation from Syrian Antioch, turned down a proposal that Gentile converts should be circumcised and taught to keep the Jewish law, contenting itself with some simple provisions which made it easier for Jewish and Gentile Christians to live together as fellow members of one fellowship.

Part 5 (15:36–19:4) records a new advance in the Gentile mission—the evangelization of the provinces west and east of the Aegean—Macedonia, Achaia, and Asia. West of the Aegean, Paul's principal base was Corinth, where he spent eighteen months founding and consolidating one of his most important churches (18:1-18); east of the Aegean, his base was Ephesus where, during nearly three years, he and his colleagues planted Christianity not only in that city but throughout the province of Asia. In Corinth the proconsul Gallio's refusal to take up the charge that Paul was propagating an illegal religion must for several years thereafter have provided other Roman magistrates with a more powerful precedent than appears on the surface of Luke's narrative (18:12-17). In Ephesus the demonstration in the theater illustrates the sensitivity of property interests when threatened by the Gospel (19:23-41).

In 19:21 Luke records Paul's plan, conceived towards the end of his Ephesian ministry, to make for Rome after visiting Jerusalem. Part 6 (20:1–28:31) tells how this plan was realized by means unforeseen by Paul—his rescue by Roman soldiers from a hostile mob in the temple court at Jerusalem, his two years' custody at Caesarea, his appearances before Felix, Festus, and Agrippa II, his appeal to Caesar, and his consequent voyage to Rome (in the course of which he and his company were shipwrecked off Malta). The book ends with his spending two years under house arrest in Rome while he waited for his appeal to be heard, preaching the Gospel unhindered to all who visited him.

Purpose and Perspective. In Paul's last words to the Roman Jews, "God's salvation has been sent to the Gentiles and they will listen!" (28:28), we have one dominant theme of Luke's narrative. He is concerned to trace the advance of the Gospel throughout the world as a further stage in the continuous history of salvation. He concentrates on its advance along the road from Jerusalem to Rome, ignoring its advance in other directions. The greater part of his account is bound up with Paul's missionary career, but reference to Paul's letters shows that there are several phases of Paul's career which are not recorded in Acts. Even so, our indebtedness to Luke may be measured by our difficulty in constructing a history of Christian advance in the subsequent generations, for which no such record as Acts is available. After Luke we have no church historian until Eusebius* in the fourth century.

Luke lays distinctive stress on the presence, power, and guidance of the Holy Spirit in the Church from His descent at Pentecost onward. The current age is the age of the Spirit. In this, as in his emphasis on salvation, with special reference to the Gentile mission, Luke shows himself a disciple of Paul. The Parousia, resurrection, and judgment are fixed by divine appointment, but they are not so imminent as to foreclose the irresistible progress of the Gospel in the world. Yet there is no hint that their "delay" was felt to be a problem.

Luke anticipates the later Apologists,* not only by presenting Christianity as the true knowledge of God, as in Paul's Areopagitica (Acts 17:22-31), but more particularly by arguing that Christianity is no menace to imperial law and order. It has come to stay, as a factor to be increasingly reckoned with in public life. Several responsible officials throughout the provinces give their witness to this effect, and the note on which Acts ends, with Paul discharging his missionary task at the heart of the empire without interference, clinches the argument. The rioting which follows the arrival of the Gospel in city after city is mostly instigated by local Jews who refuse it themselves and resent its being offered to the Gentiles. Like Paul, Luke holds that blindness has befallen Israel, but he does not add, like Paul, that this condition is partial and temporary.

The date of Acts cannot be determined with certainty. A date about the outbreak of the Jewish War of A.D. 66 has its attractions, and is probably not ruled out by the consideration that this is very early for Luke's historical perspective to have taken shape.

ACTS OF THE MARTYRS. Accounts of early Christian martyrdoms, divisible into several categories:

(1) Official transcripts of court proceedings (acta proper; gesta), deposited in archives: e.g., Justin, the Scillitans, Cyprian.

(2) Broader, more literary narratives compiled by Christians from the personal testimony of participants (e.g., Perpetua) or spectators (Gr. martyria; Lat. passiones): e.g., Polycarp, martyrs of Lyons and Vienne, Perpetua and Felicitas.

Both these genres were liable to interpolation (e.g., the Scillitans' acta), normally with embellishment of the miraculous, a feature not always absent from the original versions.

(3) Largely legendary stories constructed around a slender historical core, sometimes solely the martyr's name: e.g., Ignatius, Vincent, Lawrence, George, Catherine of Alexandria. As the golden age of martyrdom faded into the past, this literature multiplied and became the Christians' novels and romances. Their reflection of popular Christianity gives them a secondary historical value.

These various accounts served for apologia ("the blood of the martyrs is seed") and edification (the martyr's imitatio Christi) as well as commemoration (in the West, especially Africa, the acts were read liturgically on the martyr's "birthday," natalitia). There existed models both Jewish (e.g., 2 Maccabees) and pagan (H.A. Musurillo, The Acts of the Pagan Martyrs, 1954).

ADALBERT OF BREMEN (c.1000-1072). Archbishop of Bremen from 1045. Of noble birth, able and ambitious, Adalbert was influential during the reign of Henry III. He consecrated bishops for the Orkneys and Iceland, sent a missionary to the Lapps, and divided the Slavic diocese of Oldenburg into three. Made papal vicar and legate of the Nordic nations in 1053, he attempted to create a patriarchate for the north, in a vain attempt to counter the desire of the church in Denmark for independence from Hamburg. After the death of Henry III in 1056, Adalbert had to face strong opposition from the Saxon dukes, and although he held a dominating position during the minority of Henry IV he was banished from court (1066-69) and never regained his former influence. Pagan Wends ravaged the Christian north during Adalbert's closing years, and their destruction of Hamburg prevented his being buried there.

HAROLD H. ROWDON

ADALBERT OF PRAGUE (956-997). Missionary and martyr. Born in Bohemia, he was educated in Germany by Adalbert of Magdeburg, taking his name at confirmation. His native name was Woytiech. He became the second bishop of Prague about 982, but incurred much opposition through his attempts at moral reformation. In 990, under political pressure, he went to Rome and became a Benedictine. Twice he returned to Prague, but finally left in 996 when nobles seized a prisoner in the cathedral and thus violated the law of sanctuary. He shared in the conversion of Hungary and is reputed to have baptized its great king, Stephen. At the request of Duke Boleslaus of Poland, he led missions to Pomerania and Danzig and possibly Russia. He was martyred by pagans along the Nogat River. He was buried at Gnesen in Poland and his shrine attracted many pilgrims, but after an expedition by Duke Bratislav of Bohemia in 1039 his bones were solemnly transferred to Prague. J.G.G. NORMAN

ADALBERT OF UTRECHT (fl. 700). Northumbrian-born missionary. Possibly the grandson of Oswald, king of Deira, he went to Ireland with Egbert, then joined Willibrord,* the famous Northumbrian missionary, and ten others on a mission to Friesland. After the conversion of the Frisians, he served as the first archdeacon of Utrecht. His name occurs among a list of preachers sent into western Germany and Kennemaria in 702 by order of the Council of Utrecht, with Egmont specially mentioned as the scene of his labors. The abbey of Egmont founded by the counts of Holland in his honor was completely destroyed by the Spaniards at the siege of Alkmaar in 1573. J.G.G. NORMAN

ADAMANTIUS (probably late third century). The unknown writer of a dialogue, De Recta In Deum Fide ("On the Correct Faith in God"). In the Greek version the author's name is given as "Adamantius who is also Origen." The Cappadocian Fathers mistakenly but understandably identified him with the great Alexandrian teacher, but this is impossible as Adamantius draws freely on Methodius who was one of Origen's chief opponents. The dialogue, an anti-Gnostic work in five books, deals with the heresies of Bardesanes* and Marcion.* The Latin translation is the work of Rufinus. Precise dating of the dialogue is impossible, but it can be no later than the end of the Great Persecution in 313. G.L. CAREY

ADAMITES. A term given to small groups on the fringes of Christianity at various periods of church history, who were said to have practiced nudity or indulged in sexual promiscuity. Epiphanius gives an account on hearsay of a sect of Adamiani who were said to worship naked and call their meetings paradise. Among later groups were a sect of Bohemian Taborites,* said to have committed wild excesses in nocturnal dances, who were suppressed in 1421, and an Anabaptist sect in the Netherlands about 1580, who were alleged to require candidates for admission to appear naked before the congregation. The followers of an Anabaptist called Adam Pastor were also given the name Adamites. HAROLD H. ROWDON

ADAMNAN (624-704). Abbot of Iona. Born in County Donegal of the same royal blood as Columba,* he was educated at the monastic school at Clonard and converted during a visit to Northumbria about 676. Three years later he became the ninth abbot of Iona, which position he held to his death, proving himself to be the most distinguished incumbent since Columba. Adamnan wrote two books. His De Locis Sanctis is an account of a visit to the Holy Land and Constantinople about the year 690 by Arculf, a French bishop, and is of interest for the light it throws on similarities between monastic settlements in the Celtic* and Syriac Churches. His Life of Saint Columba is not a regular biography, but a compilation of the prophecies, miracles, and visions of the saint, interspersed with anecdotes that give us a fair picture of the man. Deeply concerned about the detachment of the Celtic Church from Rome, he persuaded the monks of the Irish Church to accept the Roman method of determining Easter, but could not convince his own monks to do so. A schism on this issue that occurred at his death was settled in 716 when Iona acknowledged the authority of Rome. ADAM LOUGHRIDGE

ADAM OF MARSH (Adam de Marisco) (d.1258). English Franciscan monk. Born in Somerset, he studied under Robert Grossteste at Oxford, was ordained and received the living of Wearmouth, County Durham, and about 1232 became a Franciscan monk at Worcester. He accompanied Grosseteste, now bishop of Lincoln, to the Council of Lyons (1244-46), and thereafter taught at Oxford for some three years. Known in his lifetime as "Doctor Illustris," he had such learning and sagacity that his advice was sought by Henry III, Boniface of Savoy (archbishop of Canterbury), and the pope. In addition to some 250 letters, he is said to have been the author of commentaries on Canticles and Hebrews. J.D. DOUGLAS

ADAM OF ST.-VICTOR (c.1110-c.1180). Liturgical poet. Born probably in Britain or Brittany, he was educated in Paris and about 1130 entered the monastery of St.-Victor, where he stayed until his death. His theological ideas are Augustinian. He is chiefly renowned for his composition of about forty-five "sequences," rhythmic pieces to be used in the liturgy of the Mass preceding the Gospel. These were approved by the Fourth Lateran Council in 1215. He is credited with having brought to perfection the sequence poetry initiated by Notker Balbulus (d.912) and nurtured at St.-Victor even before Adam's time. He used ideas borrowed from contemporary theology, biblical allusions, and legendary material, and presented a highly developed system of allegory, typology, and symbolism. The melodies for his sequences were composed by a fellow monk, H. Spanke. The sequences have been translated into English, and some have been used as hymns (e.g., four in Hymns Ancient and Modern). He was thought to be the author of scholastic and biblical works, but this has been disputed.

See D.S. Wrangham, The Liturgical Poetry of Adam of St.-Victor (1881). J.G.G. NORMAN

ADAMS, THOMAS (d.1653). "The prose Shakespeare of puritan theologians." Little is known about his early life, but he appears as a preacher in London and the Home Counties from about 1612. He shows the typical Puritan pastoral interests, but no interest in sectarian or separatist Puritan groups. He wrote a commentary on 2 Peter and published sixty-five sermons and some meditations on the creed. His style is somewhat allegorical. Adams was probably a Royalist in the Civil War, which may explain his sequestration under the Commonwealth.

ADAMSON, PATRICK (1537-1592). Archbishop of St. Andrews. Born in Perth and graduate of St. Andrews, he was briefly minister of Ceres before going to the Continent for eight years. He studied theology in Geneva under Beza.* He was evidently in hiding for seven months after the massacre of St. Bartholomew's Day.* On returning to Scotland he became chaplain in the household of the Regent Morton, and minister of Paisley. The regent, his patron, made him archbishop of St. Andrews in 1576, though according to Robert Keith (Scottish Bishops, 1824, p.40) he was not consecrated. He served for a time also as James VI's ambassador to England. An accomplished scholar, he debated much with the Presbyterians, against whom he instituted strong legislation. He was accused of heresy and other offenses, but two attempts to excommunicate him failed. It is said that he recanted just before his death and condemned episcopacy as unlawful, but no evidence of this exists. It was Adamson who, before gaining high office, made the famous distinction between "my lord bishop," "my lord's bishop," and "the Lord's bishop." His collected works, including Latin verse translations of Job and Revelation, were printed in 1614. J.D. DOUGLAS ADDAI. Founder of the church at Edessa. He was allegedly one of the seventy disciples of Jesus sent to King Abgar V Ukkama by the Apostle Thomas after the Ascension. Eusebius records the legend and calls Addai "Thaddaeus." The Syriac Doctrina Addaei was published in 1876. The conversion of King Abgar IX (179-216) points more reliably to evangelism at Edessa, possibly in the late second century, by a Jewish Christian Addai (Baus, Handbook of Church History, vol. 1, p.207).

See ABGAR, LEGEND OF.

ADDAI AND MARI, LITURGY OF. The extant manuscripts contain the ancient rite of the Syrian Church of Edessa, traditionally founded by the apostle Addai* and his disciple Mari. Nestorians claim that Theodore of Mopsuestia redacted the liturgy. Its Greek interpolations are not universally recognized by liturgical scholars. The Nestorian schism about 431 is a commonly held date of origin of the liturgy, but Jewish traits and its kinship with Hippolytus* suggest a date about 200. These traits are: the eucharistic prayer is addressed to the Son, not to the Father; there is no account of the institution of the Lord's Supper nor even of the eucharistic words; the invocation of the Spirit is not a prayer of "consecration" but a petition for blessings such as forgiveness and new life, as in the rite of Hippolytus; peculiarly Jewish is the stress on the Name and on divine activity in the doxology. G.T.D. ANGEL

ADDAMS, JANE (1860-1935). Social reformer and intellectual. Born in Cedarville, Illinois, she was greatly influenced by the moral earnestness of her Quaker father. She attended Women's Medical College in Philadelphia, but poor health forced her to discontinue medical studies. She traveled and studied in Europe, and after a long period of dissatisfaction and uncertainty returned in 1889 with her friend Ellen Gates Starr to establish Hull House, a settlement house in a poor immigrant neighborhood in Chicago, patterned after Toynbee Hall in London. She worked tirelessly to serve the needs of people, identifying and attempting solutions to numerous problems encountered by poor city dwellers. She contributed to efforts to secure adequate welfare legislation, mothers' pensions, juvenile courts, tenement house codes, workmen's compensation, and improved sanitation. Although she was not an orthodox Christian, she inspired people of all kinds to become concerned about the lot of the poor. She participated in the women's suffrage movement which was committed to pacifism as a way of life. She received the Nobel Peace Prize in 1931. Her books include Twenty Years at Hull House (1910) and Democracy and Social Ethics (1902).

HARRY SKILTON

ADDISON, JOSEPH (1672-1719). English essayist. Graduate of Oxford, he had a distinguished political career (being a member of Parliament for the last eleven years of his life), but is usually remembered as one of the founders of the Spectator, which set out to restore good sense and high standards to a society that had not yet recovered from the imbalance of the Restoration. Although no friend of Puritanism, he rated Milton above Homer and Virgil. To the Christian Church he bequeathed the magnificent hymns "When all thy mercies, O my God" and "The spacious firmament on high."

ADELARD OF BATH (twelfth century). English philosophical writer. Little is known of his career, but he evidently studied at French universities, traveled extensively in Europe, Africa, and the Near East, and wrote a book on Arabic science. One of the most versatile men of his age, he was distinguished in many fields, including philosophy, theology, natural sciences, and mathematics. Of his published works the best known are De Eodem et Diverso (Identity and Difference), and Quaestiones naturales in which he used Aristotle's argument from motion to establish the existence of God.

ADELOPHAGI (fourth century). A sect that adhered to the doctrine attributed to Macedonius of Constantinople: that the Holy Spirit is a created being, ranking with the angels. They were said by Philastrius, the antiheretical writer, to be unsocial at meals, hence their name which indicates that a Christian should eat in secret.

ADHEMAR LE PUY (de Monteil) (d.1098). French bishop. A nobleman who became bishop of Le Puy about 1080, he seems to have made a pilgrimage to the Holy Land about 1086-87. Thus, when Urban II proclaimed the First Crusade* at Clermont in 1095, Adhemar was named as the pope's legate and deputy with the crusading armies. His functions included giving military advice, mediating between the rival Christian princes in the crusading force, and establishing harmonious relations between the Crusaders and the Eastern Christians in the territories conquered by the Crusaders. He also tried to integrate Eastern and Western clergy into a single church in the Holy Land. ROBERT G. CLOUSE

ADHERENTS. Used in the Church of Scotland, the term covers parishioners who wish to be permanently connected with a particular congregation, and in the case of whom there would be no reason for refusing to admit them to communicant membership if they should apply for such. Adherents, who must be over twenty-one and not in membership of any other church or congregation, may on formal application be added to the electoral register and thus be permitted to participate and to vote in congregational meetings. In the Highlands and the Western Isles many adherents, including those of smaller Presbyterian bodies, maintain this status because of a feeling of unworthiness to come to the Communion table. J.D. DOUGLAS

ADIAPHORISTS (Gr. adiaphora, "things indifferent"). Those who supported Philip Melanchthon* when, on the ground of necessity, he maintained that concessions made by Protestants in the Leipzig Interim (1548-52) were in any case adiaphora. The terms included the necessity of good works, and the restoration of the Mass with most of its ceremonies. Many Protestants, such as Illyricus Flacius* and John Calvin,* believed that Melanchthon had sacrificed too much. The adiaphora argument has recurred often in Christian thought. It can concern actions that are indifferent (neither bad nor good, being neither commanded nor forbidden by God), ceremonies (neither forbidden nor commanded so they may be used or discarded), and doctrines (although taught in the Word of God, they are of such minor importance that they may be disbelieved without injury to the faith). The Interim was never in fact implemented, but it caused bitter controversy. The Peace of Augsburg* (1555) removed the occasion of the argument. ROBERT G. CLOUSE

ADMONITION TO PARLIAMENT (1572). An anonymous English tract, secretly printed, which probably represents an extreme reaction to Archbishop Parker's attempts to secure conformity and Queen Elizabeth I's suppression of parliamentary attempts to reform the Prayer Book. The first part was written by Thomas Wilcox in clear, concise style, with many biblical references and without abuse. It asserted that the church had not yet been fully reformed since the biblical model had not been followed in such matters as the appointment of elders and maintenance of discipline. The second part, written in cutting phrases by John Field, objected to papal associations in the Prayer Book and vestments. The Admonition quickly ran to three editions, but its authors were apprehended and imprisoned for a year. Later in 1572 a second Admonition appeared, possibly written by Thomas Cartwright. This outlined a Presbyterian structure for the church. HAROLD H. ROWDON

ADO (799?-876?). Archbishop of Vienne. Successively a monk at Ferrières, head of the monastic school at Prum, and priest of a parish church at Lyons, he became archbishop of Vienne in 859. Charles the Bald sent him to the pope to argue (successfully) the cause of Theutberga, after a compliant Synod of Metz had allowed her husband, Louis II of Lorraine, to marry his mistress. So that Vienne could boast apostolic foundation, Ado claimed spuriously that Vienne's first bishop, Crescens (died first century), was the same Crescens Paul had sent—but not, he argued, to Galatia (2 Tim. 4:10), but to Gaul. Clerical reformer, author of saints' lives and a chronicle of world history, Ado is best known for his martyrology Passionum Codices Undecumque Collecti (c.858), a model for later martyrologies, especially that by his contemporary Usuard.* The Roman martyrology also has certain links with Ado's, which was mostly copies from Florus of Lyons and partly from an ancient martyrology he claimed to have found at Ravenna (Martyrologium Romanum Parvum), though modern authorities believe he wrote it himself. L. FEEHAN

ADOPTIANISM. The view that Jesus was a man of blameless life who became the adoptive Son of God. In the early centuries some maintained that the divine Spirit descended upon Jesus—a man of perfect virtue, sometimes granted to have been born of a virgin—at His baptism, and that He was deified after His resurrection. A form of Adoptianist theology was expounded by Dynamic Monarchians, e.g., Theodotus and Paul of Samosata. The Antiochene* School, particularly Theodore of Mopsuestia and Nestorius, expressed themselves in ways which appear Adoptianist, though their language is insufficiently precise to make this certain. Adoptianism was canvassed in Spain during the eighth century, possibly due to the influence of Latin translations of works of Theodore of Mopsuestia. Alcuin attributed it to the influence of Nestorian writings, and Leo III suggested that it was derived from contact with the Muslims. It may have originated out of the Arianism* from which Spain had been converted at the Third Council of Toledo* (589). The Spanish liturgy still spoke of "the man who was assumed." The immediate cause seems to have been reaction against the teaching of Migetius,* who held that Jesus was one of the divine persons of the Trinity. Elipandus* of Toledo reacted by drawing a sharp distinction between the second person of the Trinity and the human nature of Christ. The Logos, eternal Son of God, had adopted the humanity—not the person—with the result that Jesus in his human nature became the adoptive Son of God. Such views met with opposition in Spain, particularly from the Asturian monks Beatus and Etherius, whose appeal to Rome led to the doctrine's condemnation by Adrian I.

Support for Elipandus came from other Spanish bishops, particularly Felix of Urgel, who defended Adoptianism at the Council of Regensburg (792) but signed an orthodox confession at Rome (which he subsequently repudiated). The Council of Frankfurt (794) accepted two memoranda drawn up by Italian and Frankish bishops, and the English scholar Alcuin* wrote several treatises against him. In 798 Felix agreed to meet his opponents, including Alcuin, in the presence of Charlemagne at Aix-la-Chapelle. He eventually acknowledged defeat and was received back into the church, but not to his bishopric. Whether he fully repudiated Adoptianism is doubtful. A Roman council under Leo III reiterated the orthodox view and anathematized Adoptianism. The latter died out in Spain, but the Scholastic theology (see SCHOLASTICISM) of men like Abelard and Peter Lombard caused them to draw a distinction between the two natures in order to safeguard the immutability of God. This involved them in a position rather like Adoptianism.

ADRIAN I (d.795). Pope from 772. A Roman of noble birth, he was an able diplomat, administrator, and builder. Following Stephen III's policy, he aligned himself with Charlemagne.* By persuading Charlemagne to conquer the Lombards and depose their king, Desiderius, he freed the papacy from a formidable threat. He also secured Charlemagne's help against Adoptianism. Adrian supplied the emperor with the Dionysio-Hadriana collection and a copy of the Gregorian sacramentary which were to provide the basis for Western church law and worship. Charlemagne failed to implement his promise to grant to the pope all the territory named in the Donation of Pepin, occasionally intervened in purely ecclesiastical matters, and at Frankfurt (794), apparently due to a misunderstanding, condemned a decision of the Council of Nicea (787). It was probably Adrian who first used the years of the pontificate and the pope's name and image on papal documents and Roman coins.

ADRIAN IV (Nicholas Breakspear) (c.1100-1159). Pope from 1154. The only English pope, he was born on the estates of St. Alban's, studied at Paris and Arles, and entered the house of secular canons of St. Rufus near Avignon where he became abbot in 1137. A visit to Rome in connection with a dispute with his canons brought him to the notice of Eugenius III. He was made cardinal bishop of Albana and was sent as papal legate to Norway and Sweden (1152). He reformed the rudimentary canon law of the Scandinavian churches, made Trondheim a metropolitan bishopric for Norway, created a new bishopric, Hamar, and introduced the payment of Peter's Pence.* As pope he was confronted by the reforming zeal of Arnold of Brescia and the relentless enmity of Frederick Barbarossa. The former combined moral indignation against clerical abuses with advocacy of a Roman republic independent of the pope. Adrian banished Arnold from Rome, and subsequently secured his repudiation by Frederick and execution (1155). He withstood Frederick, exacting full homage before consenting to crown him as emperor, and insisting that his crown was a beneficium held from the pope. In similar vein the Benevento Treaty (1156), which recognized the territorial rights of the Sicilian kingdom, was granted on condition that William of Sicily did homage to the pope. The claim that Adrian granted overlordship of Ireland to the English king, Henry II, is based on the bull Laudabiliter, which may be a forgery.

See E.M. Almedingen, The English Pope (1925).

ADRIAN VI (1459-1523). Pope from 1522. Born in Utrecht, son of a ship's carpenter, he was educated by the Brethren of the Common Life* and at Louvain, where he became a teacher (1488) and a doctor of theology (1492). He published several theological works. In 1507 he became tutor to the future Charles V. Sent to Spain to prepare the way for Charles's succession, he became bishop of Tortosa (1516), Inquisitor of Spain and cardinal (1517), and regent of Spain (1520). As pope he attempted to reform the Roman Curia, unite the powers of Europe in defense of Christendom against the Turks, and combine the crushing of Luther with the reform of the church. His attempts at reform were blocked by inertia and vested interest. Despite strenuous efforts, Rhodes (which he regarded as strategically vital) fell to the Turks in 1522. Although he at first instructed his legate at the Diet of Nuremberg to adopt a conciliatory stance, and expressed willingness to modify the theory of indulgences, his resolute opposition to the teachings of Luther—in 1521 he had demanded the suppression of Lutheran literature in Spain—made compromise impossible.

ADVENT. The liturgical season of preparation for Christmas (i.e., advent of Christ into the world). It thus marks the start of the Christian Year,* and serves also to complete the cycle by drawing attention to Christ's "second coming to judge the world." Historically this season followed the development of the parallel one of preparation for Easter, known as Lent. Accordingly Advent grew in the East, and in parts of western Europe, to a full six weeks in length. In the late fifth century in Gaul a fast began on St. Martin's Day (11 November), but there is no evidence for Advent at Rome until the time of Gregory the Great,* a century later, when it contained only four weeks; nor was the period regarded as a time of fasting there. In fact, the origin of the fast in the East seems to have been (as in Lent) a preparation for baptism, in this case at Epiphany* (6 January). There is strictly no liturgical season of Advent in the East (i.e., allusion to the Advent theme in prayers and readings). The more limited Roman season gradually prevailed in the West, where Advent Sunday is now always the one nearest to St. Andrew's Day (30 November).

ADVENTISTS. Christian groups holding as a distinctive tenet the expectation of an imminent and literal Second Advent of Christ. Adventism has been found in all periods of church history; early noteworthy proponents include Polycarp, Ignatius, Papias, Hermas, Justin Martyr, and Montanists. Reaction against Montanism and Donatism led to a lull until about 1000, when interest revived. Exponents in later centuries include Joachim of Floris, the Hussite Taborites, and the Anabaptists. In Britain, John Napier, Joseph Mede, Isaac Newton, and in Germany, the Pietists, Campegius Vitringa, and J.A. Bengel held adventist views, as did eighteenth- and nineteenth-century sects such as the Ronsdorf sect, the Shakers, Irvingites, and Mormons. A well-defined interchurch movement in the USA came into being with William Miller,* who taught that Christ would return in 1843 and 1844. When the predictions failed, Miller frankly admitted his error and gave up the movement. Dissensions arose, leading to the formation of the Seventh-day Adventists,* and a later splinter group, the "Church of God (Abrahamic Faith)." Another Adventist group, the Advent Christian Church, was organized about 1855. Smaller bodies include the Life and Advent Union, the Primitive Advent Christian Church, and the United Seventh-day Brethren. Adventists in the strict sense of the definition are found in most denominations, and there are also interchurch organizations such as the Prophetic Witness Movement International.

AELFRIC (c.955-c.1020). Abbot of Eynsham and creator of a new level of grammatical anglo-Saxon prose. A product of the monastic revival in England, he was first a disciple at Winchester of the famous Ethelwold, whose life he later wrote. In 987 he transferred to the new foundation of Cerne Abbas and there published his most influential prose works in English, including two sets of homilies (c.991) and his Lives of the Saints (before 998). In 1005 he became abbot of Eynsham in Oxfordshire. Apart from his importance for English literature, he made a notable contribution to the education of the rural clergy of his own time; and he also received fresh attention for his theological views in the sixteenth century, when the Reformers, in their search for an ancient English church free from the errors of Rome, noticed that his teaching on the Eucharist, probably influenced by Ratramnus, excluded transubstantiation. Archbishop Parker published Aelfric's "Paschal Homily" in 1567. JOHN TILLER

AELRED, see AILRED

AERIUS (fourth century). Companion of Eustathius* in pioneering monasticism in Pontus, he was appointed presbyter to supervise a hostel for the poor when Eustathius became bishop of Sebaste in Armenia Minor about 355, but, thus frustrated in his own episcopal ambitions (according to Epiphanius, Heresies 75), quickly assumed hostility towards Eustathius. He abandoned the hostel about 360, and his propaganda campaign issued in ostracism and heretical condemnation for himself and numerous followers. He was still active when Epiphanius wrote about 375. Viewed in later controversy as anticipating Reformation protests, he advocated the parity of bishops and presbyters, and the rejection of Easter, of prescribed fasts as relics of Jewish bondage, and of prayers and almsgiving for the dead as futile and detrimental to sanctification during life. Like Eustathius, he was Arian in inclination, but was not condemned as such. Philaster (Heresies 72) wrongly confuses the Aerians with the Encratites.* D.F. WRIGHT

AETHERIA, see PILGRIMAGE OF ETHERIA

AETIUS (d. c.367). Intellectual leader of Anomoean* heretics. A Christian tutor to Julian, later the "open-minded" emperor, Aetius was exiled in 358 by Constantius II for having unwelcome contacts at court and for opposition to the Homoiousion doctrine. In 360 he was banished for denying that God and the Son are in any way alike. Recalled in 362 by Julian, he helped the Anomoeans form a distinct group. In his Syntagmation Aetius teaches that the uncreated God and his offspring can be neither identical nor alike. Logic forbids someone transcendent submitting to change or being located in time. Nothing can be two things in essence. God is entirely uncaused, absolute, and indivisible; the Son is entirely caused and relative. They must be unlike one another (anomoios). G.T.D. ANGEL

AFFIRMATION. The right to affirm is provided for those giving evidence in English civil courts who, with or without religious faith, object on conscientious grounds to taking an oath. Affirmation is distinguishable from oath-taking in that no penalty can be invoked for false witness. The practice probably arose originally because of the scruples of witnesses in court who were afraid to invoke the name of God (as in oath-taking) in case false evidence should be given unconsciously.

Historically, affirmation is associated particularly with the Quakers,* who were persecuted in the seventeenth century for refusing to take oaths. By an Act of 1696 they were eventually allowed to affirm instead, except in criminal proceedings; but even this restriction was in due course removed. The Common Law Procedure Act of 1854 extended the right of affirmation to any who for conscientious reasons objected to being sworn; but this option did not explicitly include atheists until the Oaths Act of 1888.

Affirmation in this sense is to be distinguished from the (Auburn) Affirmation in America (1924), the Presbyterian document pleading for a liberal statement of Christian truth.

AFRICA, ROMAN. Obscurity shrouds Christian beginnings in Africa, i.e., the Roman provinces of Proconsular Africa, Numidia, and Mauretania (with later subdivisions), extending today from Tripolitania in Libya through Tunisia and Algeria into Morocco. Carthage, second only to Rome in the West and seat of a strong Jewish population, must quickly have attracted missionaries. They may have been Jewish Christians, whether from Palestine via the Jewish colonies of Cyrenaica, Asia Minor, or Rome (alternatively, an African group may early have influenced Roman Christianity; Pope Victor was an African); but Christianity did not prosper there until the later second century. The story begins in martyrdom, with the Scillitans in 180 at Carthage. Most if not all of the NT was already in Latin. Christianity also took root in Greek-speaking communities (perhaps from the first), but there is scant evidence that its coming rejuvenated native Punic or Berber cultures.

Around the turn of the second/third centuries, the Passion of Perpetua and the works of Tertullian* and Minucius Felix* (perhaps later third century) portray a thriving church reaching well to the south and west of Carthage and the more Romanized towns and littoral. The Latin Bible was now complete, close ties bound Africa to Rome, and some seventy bishops attended the Carthage council about 220 which under Agrippinus (the first known bishop of Carthage, unless the Optatus in the Passion of Perpetua was a predecessor) decreed the rebaptism of heretics. African Christianity owed its distinctive features largely to Tertullian, who created an African Latin Christian culture out of the raw materials of the Greek tradition. It became a religion of the sacred Book, interpreted literally, and eschewed profane literature. Apocalyptic and "enthusiastic" in tone and uncompromising in its defiance of the rulers of this world, it prized the martyr and confessor as the true Christians, possessed of and by the Spirit. Its church was the elect remnant; its holiness, in Judaistic fashion, legal; and its discipline severe. Tertullian attests the presence of Gnostic groups and was himself the channel of a significant Montanist influence.

In Cyprian* this rigorist Christianity was wedded to the episcopate, which in his hands through frequent councils exercised a collegial authority as yet unparalleled elsewhere. Provincial organization was well developed; in Proconsular Africa the primate was the bishop of Carthage, in other provinces the senior bishop. The church suffered severely in the persecutions of Decius* and Valerian,* in whose reign the martyrs of the Massa Candida at Utica probably died. Cyprian's handling of the ensuing controversies—over the lapsed, schism, and rebaptism—demonstrated a typically African combination of deference and ultimate independence towards the Roman see.

Late in the century Manichaeism reached Africa where Augustine,* its most famous adherent, was to crown its successes, despite proscription from 297 onwards. Diocletian's Great Persecution was foreshadowed by military martyrdoms (295-c.300) in North Africa, where alone in the West it hit really hard, the victims including all forty-seven Christians of Abitina, SW of Carthage. Two important writers were produced by Africa in these years, Arnobius the Elder* and Lactantius.* The disruption of persecution gave birth to the Donatist schism which for over a century divided African Christianity in its characteristic preoccupation with ecclesiology and baptism. The Donatist appeal to earlier African tradition in support of a rigorist purity was countered by the inclusivist vision of the church of the empire developed by Optatus of Milevis* and Augustine, but the eclipse of Donatism through the leadership of Aurelius and Augustine early in the fifth century after its dominance in the fourth was achieved only with imperial assistance. Against the Pelagians the African bishops secured Roman support on their own terms, but soon rejected anew Rome's claims of superior jurisdiction in the case of Apiarius.* Augustine's contributions to African Christianity were manifold, e.g., the propagation of monasticism and the supply of bishops from his own community of the "servants of God" in Hippo.

The century of Vandal rule in Africa (429-533) brought renewed persecution under three kings, Geiseric (429-77), Huneric (477-84), and Thrasamund (496-523). To the Arian Vandals at war with the empire the Catholics appeared like a Roman fifth column. Organized church life was overthrown, monasteries dissolved, bishops exiled (among them Quodvultdeus of Carthage [d. c.453], a writer and preacher of some note), new appointments barred, and Arian rebaptism imposed. In 484, at Huneric's conference of Arians and Catholics at Carthage, 466 Catholic bishops were present. But there were interludes of peace, especially under Gunthamund (484-96) and Hilderic (523-30). In 525 an all-African council could meet in Carthage, and Catholics and Donatists, probably treated alike by the Vandals, learned to live together, with Moorish pressure from the south an added incentive. Writers of this era mostly dealt with Arianism.* They included Victor of Vita, Vigilius of Thapsus, Fulgentius, and Christian Africa's only poet of merit, Dracontius of Carthage (fl. under Gunthamund).

The Byzantine reconquest in 533 enabled some recovery of earlier vigor but hardly of peace. The Moors were repeatedly disruptive, and the bishops and monks who defended the Three Chapters* against the condemnations of Justinian, the Council of Constantinople, and Pope Vigilius, whom they excommunicated, experienced signal imperial repression for thus maintaining Africa's independence vis-à-vis the imperial and papal authorities. Writers favoring the Three Chapters included Ferrandus (d.546/7)—a Carthaginian deacon, biographer of Fulgentius, and canonist—and Facundus of Hermiane, while Primasius of Hadrumetum opposed them. Gregory the Great found frequent occasion to rebuke African bishops, especially for tolerating a resurgent Donatism,* now perhaps scarcely distinguishable from Catholicism, but they naturally thwarted attempts at more direct papal control.

In the seventh century, Monothelitism* was rejected by African churchmen (except briefly For-tunatus, bishop of Carthage about 639-46), and again for a time the imperial will was resisted.

The Muslim Saracens' conquest of Africa, begun in 642/3 and completed by 709 with Carthage falling in 698, meant flight, slavery, or apostasy for many Christians and the reduction of Africa's bishoprics to three by the mid-eleventh century and to none by the thirteenth. The Turkish conquest of the late sixteenth century effaced the last vestiges of a Christian presence in North Africa, except, that is, for the rich archaeological remains which have so illuminated its church history.

AGAPE (Gr. = "love"; technically "love feast" in Jude 12). The communal religious meal or "love feast" of the early church, closely associated with the Lord's Supper. The fullest account occurs in 1 Corinthians 11:17-34. Normally held in the afternoon, rich and poor met together for the occasion. Ignatius and the *Didache join Agape and Eucharist together, but during the second century they were separated, as Pliny apparently implies (Epp. 10:96). Tertullian linked the Agape with monetary contributions for poor relief (Apology 39) and speaks of the Eucharist as celebrated before daylight (De Corona Militis 3). Clement of Alexandria still associated the two, held in the evening, publicly at church and privately at home (Paedagogus 2). To Augustine it was just a charity supper, and it fell into disuse. The Trullan Council (692) excommunicated those holding love feasts in churches. It has persisted in sections of the Orthodox Church, in the Mar Thoma Church in India, in the Unitas Fratrum and the Moravians (whence John Wesley introduced it to Methodism), and among small groups like the "Peculiar People." AGAPEMONISM. A religious movement founded by Henry James Prince (1811-99), an evangelical perfectionist. Ordained in 1840, Prince became a curate first in the Bath and Wells diocese and later in the diocese of Ely. Both bishops inhibited him. It was probably in 1843 that he began to make extravagant statements which gave the impression that he was claiming to be in some sense an incarnation of God. A community was formed at Spaxton where a magnificent residence was acquired and called Agapemone (Abode of Love). Prince declared that community of goods was binding upon believers, and numerous devotees handed over their property to him. The legal case Nottidge v. Prince revealed grave disorders, and the movement was generally discredited, though Prince and a number of followers continued to live in the Agapemone. In the 1890s the movement enjoyed a revival under J.H. Smyth-Pigott, formerly a curate of St. Jude's, Mildmay Park. Calling themselves "Children of the Resurrection," his followers built a meeting place known as the "Ark of the Resurrection." In 1902 Smyth-Pigott proclaimed himself to be Jesus Christ, and the movement lost its vogue. Some of Prince's writings breathe a spirit of devotion to Christ, but they are marred by an erotic element. Regarding himself and Samuel Starky, his former Somerset rector, as the two witnesses of Revelation 11, Prince proclaimed the doom of Christendom, for example in The Council of God in Judgment. HAROLD H. ROWDON

AGAPETAE (Gr. = "beloved") or Syneisaktoi ("brought in together"; Lat. subintroductae), women who lived with men (or men with women) under vows of continence in "spiritual marriages" (which otherwise resulted from the "conversion" of ordinary marriages). First condemned, mostly for its actual or potential abuse, about 250-60 in Syria and Africa, and regularly in canons dealing with clergy from the early fourth century, the practice remained widespread and was repeatedly censured, notably by Chrysostom. Its original inspiration was union in asceticism,* but the setting determined the form: the anchorite and his female servant; a wealthy lady keeping a steward-cum-chaplain; the cleric and his housekeeper (especially as clerical celibacy became normative). It was common in monastic circles, even on a communal basis (with a precedent among the Jewish Therapeutae described by Philo). Its prevalence prior to the third century is variously estimated. Many discern it in 1 Corinthians 7:36-38 (cf. NEB) and in Hermas's symbolism. The first unambiguous reference is Irenaeus's rebuke of the Valentinians (Against Heresies 1:6:3). The Montanist Tertullian favored it. D.F. WRIGHT

AGAPETUS (d.536). Bishop of Rome from 535. A Roman by birth, he succeeded John II as pope in June 535. One of his first acts was to repeal the anathemas of Boniface II against Dioscorus* (530). The following year he visited Constantinople, arriving there in February 536. His mission was to avert the war threatened by Justianian against Theodahad, and although he failed in this he was successful in another respect. In 535 Anthimus, a Monophysite, had been appointed patriarch of Constantinople through the influence of Theodora. Agapetus refused to acknowledge him, demanding proof of the emperor's orthodoxy and denouncing Anthimus's heresy. Anthimus was deposed and Mennas became patriarch. Agapetus followed his success against Anthimus by denouncing the other heretics who had come to Constantinople through Theodora's influence. He died in Constantinople on 21 April and was buried at St. Peter's, Rome, on 17 September.

DAVID JOHN WILLIAMS

AGATHANGELUS. Author of the first two books of the History of Armenia. He claims to have been the royal secretary of King Trdat (or Tiridates) II (289-317), but the legendary nature of much of his work suggests a date about the late fifth century. The History begins with the official conversion of Armenia to Christianity through the missionary work of Gregory the Illuminator.* Trdat, his persecutor, was converted and empowered Gregory to organize Christianity as the national religion of Armenia. Pagan temples and priests were replaced by Christian churches and clergy.

AGATHO (c.576-681). Pope from 678. At the invitation of Constantine IV, who hoped to effect a reconciliation between Western and Eastern churches, Agatho sent legates to the sixth ecumenical council* at Constantinople in 680. The legates read Agatho's letter in which he declared the inerrancy of the Roman Church and held that the Roman bishops had always strengthened their brethren in terms of Christ's injunction to Peter (Luke 22:32). He then set forth the orthodox doctrine of the "two wills." The letter was accepted with acclamation by all present, including the emperor, but unfortunately for Agatho's interpretation of Luke 22:32 the council condemned as a heretic one of his predecessors, Honorius (d.638).

AGDE, COUNCIL OF (506). A synod held at Agde, S France, under the presidency of Caesarius of Arles. Thirty-five bishops were present. Of the seventy-one canons published, only forty-seven were regarded as genuine by Sirmond. They deal, inter alia, with clerical celibacy, the canonical age of ordination (twenty-five for deacons, thirty for priests or bishops; nuns must be forty before receiving the veil), relations of bishops with their diocesan synods, public peace, and the religious obligations of the faithful. No bishop shall alienate buildings, slaves, or furniture belonging to the church; if it is absolutely necessary, the consent of two or three neighboring bishops is required. If a bishop grants liberty and property to slaves, his successors must respect the act. A clergyman becoming intoxicated is excommunicated for thirty days or corporally chastened.

AGGREY, JAMES E.K. (1875-1927). African orator and educator. Born at Anamabu, Ghana, he attended as a young Christian convert a Methodist mission school at Cape Coast and himself taught school until he went to the USA in 1898 to study at Livingstone College, Salisbury, North Carolina, from which he graduated with honors in 1902. He taught there for several years and served two small rural churches. He twice toured Africa with the Phelps-Stokes African Education Commission. In 1924 he became vice-principal of the new Achimota College in Ghana (then the Gold Coast). He died while in the USA to write his doctoral dissertation. Aggrey was a gifted Christian educator, an advocate of cooperation between the races, and a mediator between African and Western cultures.

ALBERT H. FREUNDT, JR.

AGLIPAY CRUZ Y LABAYAN, GREGORIO (1860-1940). First bishop of the Philippine Independent Church. A Catholic priest in Manila, he accepted in 1898 a post as military chaplain of the revolutionary army of General Aguinaldo. He was the only priest-member of the revolutionary congress. The latter appointed him vicar-general, for which he was later excommunicated. He convened the Paniqui Assembly of clergy which set up a provisional government for the church until such time as the pope would name Filipino bishops. When Rome refused, the Philippine Independent Church was formed and Aglipay was consecrated supreme bishop. A militant nationalist, he ran unsuccessfully for the presidency of the Commonwealth of the Philippines in 1935. He remained Supreme Bishop of the "Aglipayan" Church until his death.

RICHARD DOWSETT

AGNELLUS OF PISA (1194-1236). Franciscan provincial minister. Recruited personally by Francis of Assisi in 1211, he became guardian at the Paris house till 1224. Then, as first English provincial with eight brethren, he introduced the order into England. After a brief stay at Canterbury, they rented a house in Cornhill, London. Ordained priest in 1229, Agnellus exhibited tremendous humility and personal charm. He adhered strictly to the Rule's ideals of poverty and its rigid observance, but he was one of the group of officials whose policies quickly transformed the order from the original absolute simplicity of Francis's ideals through their enthusiasm for learning and papal privileges. He established a school at Oxford with Robert Grosseteste as lecturer about 1229 (the precursor of the university) and successfully defended his order's rights against the bishops in 1231.

L. FEEHAN

AGNES. Roman Christian martyr. She was renowned for the heroic defense of her chastity, probably in the persecution by Maximian in the West (304-5). Constantina, daughter of the Emperor Constantine, built a basilica about 350 over her reputed grave near the Via Nomentana. She is depicted on several cups with eyes uplifted and arms raised to God in prayer. Fiction is mixed with fact in her Passio, falsely attributed to Ambrose of Milan.

AGNOETAE (Gr. agnoeō, "to be ignorant"). Monophysite sect. The Monophysite* issue in the Eastern Church blossomed forth following the Council of Chalcedon* (451). Even though the Monophysites were agreed that Christ had only one nature and not two, they themselves divided internally into factional parties. The two most important were the Severians—from Severus, patriarch of Antioch—and the Julianists—from Julian of Halicarnassus. These split further into subdivisions. The Severians divided into the Agnoetae, sometimes called the Themistians, and the Theodosians. The Themistians—from Themistius, deacon of Alexandria—were known as Agnoetae because of their particular emphasis about Christ's nature: Jesus Christ as a man was not totally omniscient, but shared man's ignorance of many things. The strict Monophysites would naturally reject this view.

GEORGE GIACUMAKIS, JR.

AGNOSTICISM. The term (derived from Acts 17:23, "to the unknown god") was introduced by T.H. Huxley in 1869 to denote the doctrine that man does not and cannot know whether God exists. He based his case on Locke's maxim that man ought not to accept "propositions with more certainty than the evidence warrants," and this dogma in opposition to faith characterizes agnosticism. The term is now used in several senses in addition to the above: (1) as the view that we should suspend judgment on all ultimate issues, such as God, free will, immortality; (2) to describe a secular attitude to life, i.e., that God is irrelevant to modern man; (3) for an emotionally tinged anti-Christian and anticlerical attitude; (4) as a synonym for atheism.

The modern agnostic often argues on the basis of the open-mindedness required in science, but if we cannot in science know the answer until we have collected evidence, how can we expect to know the answer beforehand in religion? The basic principle of agnosticism is belied by what Koestler has called "the act of creation": a study of creativity and invention in the artistic, literary, and scientific fields proves that confidence in the truth of propositions beyond what is intellectually justified by available facts is usually essential to success.

AGOBARD (c.779-840). Archbishop of Lyons. A refugee from Moorish Spain, he became a priest in France and in 816 was appointed to the Lyons post. He had an unrealistic vision of a Carolingian Empire encompassing all Christendom whose subjects, despite their racial origins, would be Christian, under one law and all called Franks. Participation in Carolingian political struggles led to his temporary deposition as archbishop at the Council of Thionville, from 835 to 837, by order of the Emperor Louis the Pious. His replacement, Amalric of Metz, was condemned by the Synod of Quiercy (838) for his interpretation of the ceremonies of the Mass in his book De Ecclesiasticiis Officiis (820) which Agobard subsequently attacked. He also wrote against the Jews (De Insolentia Judaeorum) and against superstitious beliefs and practices (Liber de Grandine et Tonitruis) but did not write the Liber de Imaginibus once attributed to him. His theological writings were mainly against the Adoptianists,* especially Felix, bishop of Urgel. Agobard was a severe critic of the German proprietory church system which was to cause great troubles in the future.

AGONIZANTS (Lat. = "to be at the point of death"). A religious order founded by Camillus of Lellis* in 1584. His followers (also known as Camillians) vowed to devote themselves to the plague-stricken. In 1591 Gregory XIV gave them the privileges of a Mendicant Order.

AGRAPHA (Gr. = "unwritten sayings"). Generally understood to mean sayings of Jesus not found in our four canonical gospels. Sources are (1) the New Testament (i.e., 1 Thess. 4:16ff.; Acts 20:35; Codex D after Luke 6:4); (2) Christian writers, Papias and after; (3) papyri, especially Oxyrhynchus papyri;* (4) Arabic and Islamic agrapha.

AGRICOLA, JOHANN (1494-1566). German Reformer. Born in Eisleben in 1494, he studied at Wittenberg under Luther. In 1519 he served as Luther's recording secretary at the Leipzig Disputation. In 1525 he went for a short time to Frankfurt and was later appointed director of the school in Eisleben and preacher in the church of St. Nicolai. In 1527 he had a dispute with Melanchthon* on the relation between repentance and faith. There may have been personal reasons behind their theological differences, as in 1526 Melanchthon was preferred to him for appointment to a chair in the University of Wittenberg. Melanchthon's view, shared by the other Reformers, was that the moral law was needed to bring the sinner to repentance, leading on to faith in Christ. Agricola held that the law has no place in Christian experience. Luther, who gave Agricola and his followers the title of Antinomians,* refuted his arguments and elicited some form of recantation, but bitterness remained. In 1540 Agricola went to Berlin, where he was appointed court preacher and general superintendent. In addition to theological works he compiled a collection of German proverbs.

HUGH J. BLAIR

AGRICOLA, MIKAEL (c.1510-1557). Finnish Reformer. After schooling in Viborg (Viipuri) he came to Abo (Turku), where he became acquainted with the Reformation through Peter Särkilax.* Working as secretary to the bishop, Agricola had the opportunity to preach the evangelical truth in Abo as well as in the countryside. He studied in Wittenberg (1536-39), and returning to Finland brought with him a letter of recommendation from Luther. For nine years he was principal of the school in Abo, the main institution for theological training. He strove to renew the inner life of the church in the spirit of the Reformation. In 1554 he was appointed bishop of Abo. Agricola did outstanding and significant work as author and publisher of books in Finnish. He published an ABC-book (1542) and a prayer book (1544) of prayers taken from the Bible and from the writings of Luther and other Reformers. His translation of the NT was finished in 1543 and published in 1548. The translation is from the original Greek, but the influence of Luther is evident. Agricola also translated parts of the OT into Finnish, among others the Psalms. In 1549 he published a church manual and a missal which greatly determined the development of the Finnish church services. These books are in the main based on the Swedish manual and missal by Olavus Petri. Agricola, who has been called "the Father of Finnish Literature," laid the foundation of evangelical Christianity, theological training, preaching, education, and liturgy in Finland.

STIG-OLOF FERNSTROM

AGRICOLA, RUDOLPHUS FRISIUS (Rudolf Husmann) (1444-1485). Dutch humanist. Born at Baflo, Groningen, he studied at St. Martin's School there under the influence of the Brethren of the Common Life,* and at Erfurt, Louvain, and Cologne universities. He experienced Italian Renaissance culture in Pavia and Ferrara (1469-79) and formed an excellent Latin style and mastered Greek. He spent his last three years lecturing informally on rhetoric and the classics at Heidelberg. His major work, De Inventione Dialectica (1479), was concerned with the relation of logic to rhetoric and harmonized new and traditional views. In De Formando Studio (1484) he put forward enlightened views of education. His ideas greatly influenced Erasmus* and the sixteenth-century German humanists. He was also a famous lutist and composer of part-songs.

J.G.G. NORMAN

AGRIPPA VON NETTESHEIM, HEINRICH CORNELIUS (1486-c.1535). Soldier and wandering scholar. Born in Cologne, he wandered all his life from one place to another in Europe, including England, seeking patronage. His polemical attitude, combined with tactlessness, created many enemies. At the age of twenty-three, disillusioned with the learning of the day, Agrippa sought to make a synthesis of Christianity, Neoplatonism, Pythagoreanism, and cabalism. The result (De Occulto) was a standard work still in use by magicians two centuries after his death. Later he published De Vanitate, a ruthless satire of Scholasticism, monkishness, belief in witchcraft, indulgences, and image worship in the Roman Church. Though he had much in common with the Reformers, he did not seek the destruction of the church; and his attitude to the Bible, which he believed to contain mistakes, was different. His books, often reprinted, found acceptance in many quarters. De Vanitate became a favorite of atheists and skeptics on account of its anticlericalism and misgivings about human reason; his work on magic lined him up with occultism, and his exposure of Roman Catholic abuses with the Reformation. Though his writings sometimes show him to be inconsistent, empirical, and opportunist, he was also prepared to fight for the right and suffer as a result.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: His two books mentioned above have appeared in a number of English editions under the titles Occult Philosophy and The Vanity of Arts and Sciences; see also H. AIDAN (d.651). First bishop of Lindisfarne, England. After his victory at Heavenfield near Hexham in 633, Oswald,* king of Northumbria, requested the monks of Iona* to send someone to teach his people the Christian faith. The first missionary made no impression and on his return to Iona complained of the barbarous nature of the people. In his place was appointed another monk, Aidan, who was consecrated bishop. He chose for his headquarters the small island of Lindisfarne not far from Oswald's capital at Bamburgh. He founded a monastic community and adapted himself fully to the new situation, having close links with Oswald and his successor Oswin, and identifying himself with the common people. He made many missionary journeys on the mainland, largely on foot, sometimes accompanied by Oswald as interpreter. He founded a school for twelve boys, including Eata, Wilfrid, Cedd, and Chad, to continue his work. He displayed notably the Celtic virtues of simplicity, humility, and gentleness, and such was his missionary success that J.B. Lightfoot could say: "Not Augustine, but Aidan, is the true apostle of England."

AILRED (Aelred) (1109-1167). Abbot of Rievaulx in England. He was born at Hexham, son of a priest at the abbey there. He spent his youth at the court of King David of Scotland who wished to make him a bishop. Ailred preferred the monastic life and entered the Cistercian house at Rievaulx in Yorkshire in 1131. He became master of the novices and in 1143 was appointed abbot of Revesby in Lincolnshire. In 1147 he was recalled to Rievaulx to become abbot. He was present at the canonization of Edward the Confessor* in Westminster Abbey and later wrote on his life and miracles. Ailred made various evangelistic journeys, including one among the Picts of Galloway in 1164. He wrote a prose eulogy of Cuthbert,* and a number of treatises on the Christian faith and life from a mystical viewpoint. He came to be known as "the English St. Bernard."

R.E. NIXON

AINSWORTH, HENRY (1571-1622). Puritan divine. Educated at Caius College, Cambridge, he became a separatist* and fled to Holland, where he became first a porter to a bookseller and then teacher to a London congregation which had reassembled in Amsterdam under the pastorship of Francis Johnson. He drew up a confession of faith, and with Johnson wrote in 1604 a Defence of the Brownists.* Ainsworth was a good scholar, learned particularly in Hebrew and rabbinism. Though a controversialist, he was gentle by the standards of the time in his replies to John Ainsworth who had joined the Roman Church, to Richard Bernard, and to John Smyth. Later he parted from Johnson over principles of church government (Ainsworth leaned to congregationalist principles). He established a considerable scholarly reputation for his Annotations on various OT books, the whole Pentateuch, the Psalms, and the Song of Solomon, which first appeared separately and then in collected form in 1627, and was reprinted later. G.E. DUFFIELD

AIRAY, HENRY (1560-1616). Puritan divine. Born in Westmoreland, he was educated at the expense of Bernard Gilpin,* "the Apostle of the North," both at a local school founded by him and at Queen's College, Oxford. He became provost of his college in 1598 and vice-chancellor of the university in 1606. William Laud* was accused of Romish tendencies before him in 1606 and narrowly escaped public censure. "A frequent and zealous preacher," Airay delivered a series of lectures on Philippians in which he denounced popery and expounded evangelical Calvinism at its best.

AKHMÎM FRAGMENT. A portion of the *Gospel of Peter found at Akhmîm in Upper Egypt in 1886-87 in the grave of a Christian monk. It is clear from the ornamentation of the manuscript that the scribe possessed no more of it than has now been discovered. Some scholars unite this incomplete fragment with the Apocalypse of Peter because a Greek text of part of the latter was discovered in the same grave. The earliest witness to the Gospel of Peter is Serapion, bishop at Antioch at the end of the second century, who agreed to the reading of this book in the church at Rhossus until he discovered its Docetic* teaching. From this it may be deduced that the Gospel of Peter probably came from Gnostic circles in Syria, but the Akhmîm fragment is evidence that it enjoyed circulation over a much wider area. Origen refers to such a gospel, but may not have been acquainted with its contents.

DONALD GUTHRIE

ALACOQUE, MARGUERITE MARIE (1647-1690). Founder of the devotion to the Sacred Heart of Jesus. She entered the Visitation convent at Paray-le-Moniae, central France, in 1671, and after a regime of severe austerities declared that Christ had revealed to her His heart burning with love for man and had commanded her to establish the Holy Hour, Communion on the first Friday of each month, and the feast of the Sacred Heart to be observed on the Friday after the octave of Corpus Christi. The skepticism with which her visions were at first regarded was gradually dispelled, and devotion to the Sacred Heart quickly spread throughout the Christian world. She was pronounced venerable in 1824, beatified in 1864, canonized in 1920. J.D. DOUGLAS

ALAIN OF LILLE (1125-c.1203). Theologian and eclectic philosopher; sometimes called "Doctor Universalis" because of his encyclopedic learning. He may have been an auditor of Gilbert de la Porrée. He taught in Paris (c.1157-70) and Montpellier (c.1171-85), took part in the Third Lateran Council (1179), and eventually entered the monastery at Cîteaux. He held a rational-mystical view of the relation of philosophy and religion, maintaining that the truths of religion are discoverable by unaided reason. Belonging to no particular school, his outlook was largely Neoplatonic, influenced especially by Boethius and Proclus, and his method was an accentuated dialectic. His works include sermons, poems, proverbs, besides philosophical and theological writings. He wrote Contra Haereticos against the Waldenses, Albigenses, Jews, and Muslims. His epic Anticlaudianos (c.1184) inspired Dante and Chaucer. J.G.G. NORMAN

ALARIC (d.410). Visigothic king. German nomads settled in Romania in the second and third centuries, where Arians later evangelized them. About 375, Huns from the northeast forced these Visigoths into Bulgaria, where they became federated with the Roman Empire, but Alaric, their elected king, led their search for land and wealth around Greece. Though given land in Albania and the prestige of the imperial title magister militum, Alaric demanded Hungary and then Austria, and on refusal marched on Rome, which he ransacked in August 410. The sack disillusioned both pagans and Christians who had believed that piety guaranteed the political freedom and social security of Rome. Augustine* tackled this dilemma in The City of God. Within a month of the sack Alaric died in southern Italy.

G.T.D. ANGEL

ALB. A white linen garment reaching from the neck to the ankles, with tight-fitting sleeves, usually gathered in at the waist by a girdle, worn by the ministers at the Mass or Eucharist in the Roman and some Anglican churches. Derived from the classical undertunic it was not at first regarded as a specifically eucharistic vestment.

ALBAN (latter third century?). First known British martyr. According to Bede's Ecclesiastical History he was a pagan of Verulamium (later named after him St. Albans) who sheltered a fugitive priest and as a result was converted to Christianity. When soldiers came in search of the priest, Alban disguised himself as his guest, and suffered martyrdom in his place. Bede places the episode in the Great Persecution around 303, but since there is little evidence for persecution in Britain at this time, scholars have suggested that it may have taken place earlier, either under Decius or Valerian (250-60) or even at the beginning of the third century. Evidence for the authenticity of the event is strong, since its undoubtedly early record in the Acta Martyrum shows detailed knowledge of the topography of Verulamium. The cult of St. Alban can be traced back to 429. HAROLD H. ROWDON

ALBERT OF BRANDENBURG (1490-1545). Elector of Mainz and cardinal. Younger son of the elector of Brandenburg, he is a notorious example of the multiplication of ecclesiastical benefices in one person. Before becoming archbishop of Mainz (1514) and later cardinal, he had held two bishoprics and a number of rich abbeys. To meet his debts, Pope Leo X permitted Albert to sell indulgences in his diocese, the proceeds to be divided between him and the pope, and this work, entrusted to John Tetzel,* led to Luther's historic protest. Yet there were times when Albert seemed well-disposed to the work of reformation. He had many friends among the humanists, notably Ulrich von Hutten, and up to the time of the Peasants' War it seemed possible that he might be won over to the Reformed faith. As late as 1532 he accepted and rewarded the dedication of Melanchthon's commentary on Romans, but from 1525 he had ranged himself definitely on the side of the papacy. He was one of the princes who met at Dessau in 1525 to unite in the defense of Romanism, and he was a member of the League of Nuremberg which was formed in 1538 to counteract the Smalcald League. Realizing the threat posed by the Reformation, he helped to muster the forces against it, and particularly in his later years lent his support to the new Jesuit order in its work of counter-Reformation.

HUGH J. BLAIR

ALBERT OF PRUSSIA (1490-1568). Grand Master of the Teutonic Order. He is noted for his success in bringing the Prussian state under the influence of the Reformation. Initially his aims were largely political—he endeavored to secure Prussia's independence from Poland. He was defeated and in 1521 consented to a truce for four years. Anticipating a renewal of the war, he sought allies and visited Nuremberg in 1522. There he came under the influence of the Reformer Andreas Osiander,* who won him over to the Reformed faith. On the advice of Luther he dissolved the Teutonic Order and determined to make Prussia a hereditary duchy for himself. The spread of Lutheran teachings in Prussia furthered this aim, and in 1525 he became duke of Prussia, though still under the suzerainty of the Polish king. He did much to make Prussia a Protestant state, encouraged education, founded the University of Königsberg in 1544 (he appointed Osiander professor in 1549). Theological differences between Osiander and Melanchthon* led to political disputes, but a strict form of Lutheranism was adopted and declared binding on all teachers and preachers in Albert's dominions.

HUGH J. BLAIR

ALBERTUS MAGNUS (1193-1280). Dominican theologian. Born in Swabia of noble parents, he entered the Dominican Order (1223) and lectured in Dominican schools in Germany (1228-45). He then taught at Paris (1245-48) and Cologne (1248-55), after which he was successively provincial governor of the order in Germany and bishop of Regensberg until 1262, when he retired to the Dominican convent at Cologne. Albert was the first medieval Christian scholar to master the whole corpus of Aristotle.* During his active and varied career he wrote twenty-one massive volumes consisting mainly of commentaries on Aristotle's works and theological books based on Aristotelian philosophy. His main interest lay in the natural science of Aristotle and the problem of reconciling philosophy and Christianity. In natural science he did not blindly follow the teaching of Aristotle. He stated clearly that he did not believe that Aristotle was a god but that he was a man who was liable to error as are others. Albert was such a careful student of nature that he was accused of neglecting sacred studies, and a host of incredible legends were circulated about his miraculous power. Although his theological work was not so successful as that of Aquinas,* Albert did defend the distinction between the realm of revelation and that of human reason. He maintained that no truth could contradict revelation. At the same time, he taught the superiority of revelation and the right of scholars to use all of human knowledge in the investigation of divine mysteries.

ROBERT G. CLOUSE

ALBIGENSIANS (Albigenses). Adherents of a religion derived from the teaching of Mani who lived in Persia in the third century. In a modified form his ideas spread into Asia Minor in the late Roman period, and from there into the Balkans in the early Middle Ages. By following the trade routes they appeared in northern Italy and southern France by the eleventh century. Although given various names such as Cathari* and Bogomiles,* in the West they were generally called Albigensians because the center of their greatest strength was the town of Albi in Languedoc. This religion was dualistic, with a god of light (Truth, the god of the NT), and a god of darkness (Error, the god of the OT). Life on earth was a struggle between these gods and their principal forces, spirit, and matter. The good life for man was a gradual purification from matter. Hence the Albigensians condemned marriage, procreation, eating food, war and the use of anything material in worship. Because they refused to take oaths they were subversive to a society that rested on the oath of a vassal to his feudal lord. They also believed that human government was wicked and evil. All of these positions represent the extreme of Albigensian doctrine and in most cases the teaching was compromised. For example, a good Albigensian did not have to stop eating, but he was required to be a vegetarian.

The followers of this religion were divided into the few (perfecti, their clergy) and the many (credentes, the believers). The perfecti lived up to the rigid asceticism of their faith, and the credentes tried to become perfecti. This was accomplished by receiving the only sacrament allowed, the consolamentum. If the newly consecrated perfectus showed signs of not being able to live up to the ascetic discipline of his calling, his friends could insure the salvation of his soul through a ceremonial death by self-starvation (the endura). The Albigensians, however, did not believe in hell or purgatory. The only "hell" they taught was imprisonment of the soul within the body. This led some to licentious living, so many of their leaders began to teach that the souls of those who were not saved transmigrated into the bodies of lower animals.

The Albigensian homeland, S France, at the end of the twelfth century was a pleasant, tolerant, prosperous land, the center of a flourishing Provençal civilization. One of the rulers of this area, Count Raymond VI of Toulouse, was also the leading supporter of the Albigensian cause. Raymond's agents murdered a papal legate, thus provoking a crusade which crushed the religion and the Provençal civilization (1209-1229).

ALBRIGHT, JACOB (1759-1808). Founder of the Evangelical Church.* Born near Pottstown, Pennsylvania, son of German immigrants, he received little formal education. He grew up in the Lutheran Church, served as a soldier in the Continental Army, and became a prosperous brickmaker. The unexpected death of several of his children led to his conversion in 1790. He joined a Methodist class and was later licensed as a lay preacher. By 1800 several classes had been formed, and three years later Albright was ordained to the ministry by his congregation. In 1807 the Albright People were organized as "The Newly Formed Methodist Conference" with Albright as the first bishop. Later they became known as "the Evangelical Association" and then as the Evangelical Church (1922). The church adopted Arminian* doctrine and Methodist* polity. HARRY SKILTON

ALCUIN OF YORK (d.804). Medieval Christian scholar. Educated at the cathedral school of York where his teacher had been a pupil of Bede, Alcuin was the most important and influential of the scholars invited to Charlemagne's* court (782) where his teaching and writing provided the basis on which later Carolingian writers were to build. A prolific author, he wrote commentaries on the Bible, dogmatic treatises, and controversial manuscripts. After his work at the palace school he became abbot of the monastery of St. Martin of Tours, where in addition to his writing he added many volumes to the library and supervised the monastic school. At Tours, Alcuin labored to raise the intellectual level of the monks. One of the results of his work was the development of the style of handwriting called Caroline minuscule. This system, which used both small and capital letters, was easier to read than the earlier Merovingian cursive or the Italian hand and it has influenced the printing of books today through roman type. Alcuin also led a group of scholars in the revision of the Vulgate* text of the Bible. These men collated the oldest manuscripts, correcting many errors and discrepancies in the text. Although a uniform text was not attained, it halted further scribal corruptions.

ALDRED (Ealdred) (d.1069). Archbishop of York. Previously monk and abbot, he became bishop of Worcester in 1044, was Edward the Confessor's ambassador to Emperor Henry III (1054), and went to York in 1060. He was degraded from the episcopate for various offenses, but submitting to William the Conqueror after Hastings (1066), he was chosen to crown the new king that year and Queen Matilda in 1068. He was buried in his own cathedral.

ALEANDER, GIROLAMO (1480-1542). Roman Catholic scholar. He headed the opposition to Luther at the Diet of Worms.* Born in Venice, he studied medicine and theology, and was said to have been one of the most learned men of his day. He taught Latin, Hebrew, and Greek at the University of Paris from 1508 and was for a time rector of the university. In 1519 Leo X appointed him librarian of the Vatican, and thereafter he was employed on various papal missions. Evidence of the virulence of his attacks on Luther is provided by copies of his letters which are in the Vatican Library. At the Diet of Worms he made a lengthy speech advocating the sternest possible measures against Luther and his teaching, and it was he who drew up the edict, accepted by Charles V and the Diet, by which Luther was condemned. Later, in the Netherlands, it was at Aleander's instigation that two monks were burned at the stake in Brussels in 1523, the first martyrs of the Reformation. HUGH J. BLAIR

ALESIUS, ALEXANDER (1500-1565). Scottish Reformer. Born Alexander Alane in Edinburgh, he graduated at St. Andrews and became canon of the priory there. Applauded for public refutation of Luther's arguments (he admitted later to have borrowed his major points from Bishop Fisher of Rochester), he was selected in 1528 to reclaim Patrick Hamilton* from Lutheranism. This produced only a change of heart in himself and his own imprisonment and subsequent flight to Germany (1532), where he met Luther and Melanchthon. About 1535 he went to England, was warmly welcomed by Cranmer and Latimer, and by Henry VIII himself who secured for Alesius a teaching post at Cambridge where he was said to have been the first to deliver lectures on the Hebrew Scriptures. Finding his life endangered there, however, he returned to London and practised medicine. When the king changed direction once more and issued decrees upholding transubstantiation and clerical celibacy, Alesius went back to Germany (1540). He taught briefly at Frankfurt, then spent the rest of his life at Leipzig University, where he was rector at least twice. It was Melanchthon* (with whom he was a great favorite) who gave him the name Alesius, because of his earlier wanderings. Alesius revisited England and translated into Latin Edward VI's first liturgy, and published also many exegetical, dogmatic, and controversial works. In Germany he was continually active in the Protestant cause, and arranged many disputations. He was the first to plead in his writings for free circulation of the Scriptures in Scotland—a land which inexplicably has failed to realize the full significance of the contribution made by this great native son.

ALEXANDER (d.328). Bishop of Alexandria (c.313-328). He held that the Son is eternally the Son of the Father. Both in a local clerical debate and at a council of about 100 bishops from Egypt and Libya, he accused (perhaps mistakenly) a presbyter in his see named Arius* of following Paul of Samosata and opposed his views that "the Son had a beginning" and that the Son "was from nothing." Rejecting the pleas of Eusebius of Nicomedia and others on behalf of Arius, he in council anathematized Arius and his adherents about 321, prior to the embargo on synods by Licinius. Although regarded by Constantine in late 324 as overscrupulous, Alexander was upheld by the synods of Antioch and Nicea in 325, and consistently opposed Arians and Melitians until his death. He believed that the Father and the Son are exactly alike except that the Father is unbegotten. This exception made Arius stress "being begotten" as a temporal moment and as a sign of distinct identity between Father and Son.

ALEXANDER II (d.1073). Pope from 1061. The former Anselm, bishop of Lucca, was one of the leading popes of the Hildebrandine or Gregorian reform. He was elected without the participation of the German king and against the will of many of the Roman nobles. Hence these groups elected Cadalus of Parma (antipope Honorius II). Later they withdrew allegiance to the antipope. Under Alexander's pontificate the reform of the Church continued through correspondence and the activity of legates. The latinization of Greek sees proceeded with the Norman conquest of S Italy and the pope encouraged moves against the Muslims in Spain and the Saxons in England. He also condemned the maltreatment of the Jews in S France and Spain. During the later part of his reign a dispute over the appointment to the bishopric of Milan increased tension with the Roman emperors. This argument continued into the reign of Gregory VII and led to the Investiture Controversy.*

ALEXANDER III (c.1105-1181). Pope from 1159. Orlando (Roland) Bandinelli, born in Siena, was a professor at Bologna celebrated as theologian and canonist. Becoming cardinal in 1153, he advised Adrian IV, whom he succeeded. A strong antagonist of Emperor Frederick I (Barbarossa), he was opposed by three antipopes* set up by Frederick (Victor IV, Paschal III, Callistus III). The schism lasted seventeen years, ending only when Frederick was defeated by the Lombard league at Legnano in 1176, followed by the Peace of Venice (1177). During the schism Alexander lived mainly in France. He supported Thomas à Becket* and imposed penance on Henry II of England for Becket's murder. First of the great lawyer-popes, he convoked the Third Lateran Council (1179), which vested the exclusive right of electing a pope in a two-thirds majority of the cardinals.

J.G.G. NORMAN

ALEXANDER IV (d.1261). Pope from 1254. A nephew of Gregory XI, he was cardinal bishop of Ostia from 1231. As pope he continued Innocent IV's policy of implacable hostility to the House of Hohenstaufen. In 1255 he attempted to secure English help in return for granting the kingdom of Sicily to Edmund, second son of Henry III of England. He vainly attempted to unite the powers of Europe in crusade. He was a notable friend of the Franciscans. Early in his reign he canonized Clare.* He took the friars of Paris under his protection in the violent controversies aroused by William of St. Amour.

ALEXANDER V (c.1339-1410). Pope from 1409. Peter of Crete, Greek by birth, became a Franciscan and studied at Oxford and Paris where he became master of theology (1381) and lectured on the Sentences of Peter Lombard. His Commentary, which has survived, shows Nominalistic leanings and suggests that he played a role of some importance in the development of medieval thought. He became bishop of Piacenza (1386), Vicenza (1387), Novara (1389), and archbishop of Milan (1402). In an effort to end the Great Schism he was chosen by the Council of Pisa (1409) in place of two rival popes. He died less than a year later, and there is some doubt as to the validity of his reign. The council had no authority in strict canon law, as it was summoned not by papal order but by certain cardinals who had deserted the two rival popes.

HAROLD H. ROWDON

ALEXANDER VI (1431-1503). Pope from 1492. While he was a young man in the service of the church, the scandalous private life of Rodrigo Borgia called forth a rebuke from Pius II. Ruling in an age of trouble for both Italy and the church, he pursued a papal, Italian, and family policy until 1498 when he became interested in greater cohesion for the Papal States* and supported the political activities of his son Cesare. Alexander can be credited with several achievements during his pontificate. He supported the work of Pinturiccio and subsidized the Pietà by Michelangelo. He also encouraged evangelization in the New World and ensured peace between Portugal and Castile by arbitrating a line of demarcation. Despite these achievements, he is remembered as the father of Lucrezia Borgia and as the pontiff with whom Girolamo Savonarola* struggled. He was a type of pope that gave the early Protestants reason to condemn the Roman Church.

ROBERT G. CLOUSE

ALEXANDER VII (1599-1667). Pope from 1655. Fabio Chigi was born at Siena, where he studied philosophy, law, and theology, receiving his doctorate in theology in 1626. He entered papal service at Rome. After being Inquisitor of Malta, he became nuncio at Cologne (1639-51). During negotiations leading to the Peace of Westphalia* (1648), he urged Catholic princes not to sacrifice the rights of the church. Secretary of state to Innocent X (1651) and cardinal (1652), after his election as pope he at first strongly opposed nepotism, but in 1656 he gave way to pressure and called his brother and nephews to Rome.

His pontificate was marked by disputes with Catholic powers, notably with France. When he resisted French claims, Louis XIV seized Avignon and Venaissin, and threatened to invade the states of the church, and Alexander had to accept the humiliating Peace of Pisa (1664). Theologically strongly anti-Jansenist, in 1665 he condemned the Jansenists'* views, but they refused to submit. Following the controversy on Probabilism,* he condemned in 1665-66 forty-five Laxist propositions, though not the Probabilist system. He befriended the Jesuits and procured the readmission of the order to the republic of Venice. He encouraged foreign missions and did much to modernize and embellish Rome. J.G.G. NORMAN

ALEXANDER VIII (1610-1691). Pope from 1689. Pietro Vito Ottoboni was born at Venice, where his father was chancellor. At seventeen he won a doctorate in civil and canon law at Padua. He went to Rome in 1630 and was made governor of Terni, Rieti, and Spoleto and auditor of the Rota. Innocent X made him cardinal in 1652 and bishop of Brescia two years later. Under Innocent XI he became Grand Inquisitor of Rome and secretary of the Holy Office. As pope he was conspicuous for his nepotism. He sought to diminish tensions with France, and persuaded Louis XIV to restore Avignon and Venaissin and to renounce the privilege of diplomatic residence. As a result of this reconciliation with Louis, however, his relations with Emperor Leopold I worsened. He was interested in a possible Stuart restoration in England and established a group to study English affairs. He supported Venice in the Turkish wars. He condemned thirty-one Jansenist propositions and the Four Gallican Articles* of 1682 in 1690.

ALEXANDER, ARCHIBALD (1772-1851). Presbyterian theologian and educator. Born near Lexington, Virginia, he studied at Liberty Hall Academy (now Washington and Lee University). Shortly after confessing faith in Christ, he began theological studies under William Graham, who encouraged him to preach. Two years after ordination in 1794 he assumed the presidency of Hampden-Sydney College, a position he held for almost a decade. Early in 1807 he became minister of Pine Street Church, Philadelphia, one of the largest congregations in the nation. In 1812 the general assembly (whose moderator he had been) established a theological seminary at Princeton and selected Alexander as its first professor. BRUCE L. SHELLEY

ALEXANDER, CECIL FRANCES (1823?-1895). Irish hymnwriter. Born in Dublin, she married William Alexander, rector of a country parish in Tyrone and later archbishop of Armagh. On a complaint from her godsons that they found the catechism difficult, she was prompted to write verses illustrating the creed. Well-known hymns resulting from this include "All things bright and beautiful," "Once in royal David's city," and "There is a green hill." She became a prolific writer, and nearly 400 hymns and poems came from her pen, many of them written for her Sunday school class who heard them before they were published.

ALEXANDER, CHARLES McCALLON (1867-1920). Evangelistic songleader. Born on a Tennessee farm of devout Presbyterian parents, he was educated in the state and at Moody Bible Institute, where he developed unusual ability in leading large groups of people in the singing of gospel songs. He conducted evangelistic meetings from 1902 with two of the most famous American revivalists, R.A. Torrey* and J.W. Chapman,* not only in America but also in Great Britain, Australia, and Asia. Both men were dignified and serious in their preaching, but "Charlie" Alexander preceded their evangelistic appeals with a period of "warming up" the audience with jovial humor and lively singing. His style was copied by many others and continues to influence evangelical churches in America.

ALEXANDER, JOSEPH ADDISON (1809-1860). Linguist, educator, and author. Born in Philadelphia, he received most of his early education from his minister father, Archibald, and quickly revealed remarkable linguistic gifts. At fifteen he entered the junior class of Princeton College, graduating with highest honors in 1826. After two years' private study of ancient languages, he became adjunct professor of ancient languages and literature at the college in 1830. In 1834 he moved to Princeton Seminary, instructing first in oriental and biblical literature and after 1851 in biblical and ecclesiastical history. During these years he was the author of several biblical commentaries, which established his reputation in Europe as well as America.
BRUCE L. SHELLEY

ALEXANDER, MICHAEL SOLOMON (1799-1845). Anglican bishop in Jerusalem. Born in Germany of an Orthodox Jewish family, he was educated there and became a rabbi. In 1820 he went to England, but five years later lost his status as rabbi when he was converted to Christianity. He taught Hebrew in Dublin, was ordained in the Anglican Church in 1827, and for three years served as missionary among the Jews in Danzig. He then continued his work in London, adding to it in 1832 the chair of Hebrew at King's College. He participated in the revision of the NT in Hebrew. In 1841 he became the first Anglican bishop in Jerusalem, an appointment that did not go undisputed. Four years later he died in Egypt on his way back to England. J.D. DOUGLAS

ALEXANDER, SAMUEL (1859-1938). Jewish philosopher. Born in Sydney, Australia, he became a fellow of Lincoln College, Oxford, and (in 1893) professor of philosophy at Manchester. Alexander is best known for his work Space, Time and Deity (1920), in which he sought to reconcile philosophy with the ideas of his day, dominated by materialism, evolution, belief in progress, and (later) relativity. Starting with Spinoza's* static concept of the god-world, he made it dynamic by "taking time seriously." Matter, he taught,

"emerges" from motion in space-time; mind from brain structure; deity from cosmic structure (in fact, several deities may emerge). God exists only in the sense that the universe tends, in evolution, to produce a deity-quality. R.E.D. CLARK

ALEXANDER OF ABONUTICHUS IN PAPHLAGONIA (c.150-170). Popular cult-founder hostile to Christians in Pontus. He is described as a charlatan by the apostate satirist Lucian of Samosata. His oracles relied on glossolalia, extrasensory perception and trickery; staged "theophanies" established his revival of Aesculapius in the form of a new "god" Glycon; elaborate ritual acted out the mythical claims of the prophet, whose clientèle came from Bithynia, Galatia, and Thrace.

ALEXANDER OF HALES (c.1170-1245). Theologian and philosopher. Born at Hales in Gloucestershire, he probably studied first at Oxford and then at Paris where he took his master's degree in arts and theology. In 1220 he became a teacher in Paris and soon was one of the most widely celebrated theologians of the university. He created a sensation in the scholastic world when about 1236 he joined the Franciscans.* This in itself marked a highly important landmark in the involvement of the Minors with the university and hence with academic theology. He at once made a mark. He helped to instigate opposition to the very unsatisfactory Franciscan minister-general Elias. He became regent master of the Franciscan convent in Paris and soon had a famous school with students of the calibre of John de la Rochelle, William of Melitonia, and Bonaventura. Alexander and his school are important because they attempted to understand the rediscovered Aristotelian* philosophy and its implications for theology. Alexander himself wrote a commentary on the Sentences and his name is associated with the Summa Theologica—but this was a composite work finished by his followers. It is therefore difficult to identify with certainty his own work, but the evidence is that he did not assimilate Aristotle and remained faithful to his Augustinian theological roots. At the same time he indicated the problems posed by the new learning and also paved the way for the more satisfactory solutions of his followers.

C. PETER WILLIAMS

ALEXANDER OF LYCOPOLIS (Nile Valley). Third-century writer of an anti-Manichaean tract entitled "of Alexander of Lycopolis who turned from pagans against the opinions of Mani." One interpretation is that he turned from paganism to Christ. The tract favors Christian orthodoxy against Manichaeism* for its practical concern to make mankind virtuous and for its plausible interpretation of the Crucifixion. According to Photius, Alexandria gained archieratic (episcopal?) rights. On another interpretation (e.g., Brinkmann), Alexander was pagan. After sketching the Manichaean system he criticizes it from the standpoint of Greek philosophy; his admiration of Christianity simply highlights the defects of Manichaeism. Alexander received information from acquaintances of Mani, who died in 272. A date for the tract about 275 seems appropriate.

ALEXANDRIAN THEOLOGY. Alexandria even in pre-Christian times was a center of learning. Philo* flourished there at the turn of the first century, and subsequently several streams of thought flowed together to give vogue in Alexandria to the Neoplatonism of Photinus and the Gnosticism of Basilides and Valentinus. The coming of Christianity to Alexandria is generally attributed to the preaching of Mark the Evangelist; the organization of the church seems to have been simple and to have accommodated itself somewhat to the prevailing climate of opinion. It was not until the beginning of the third century that Alexandria became important as a seat of Christian theology. Pantaenus* is generally regarded as the first head of the school there, which seems to have continued the ancient catechetical school. The latter combined aspects of the Hellenistic "Museum" and the Jewish schools. The general program of the Alexandrian School found expression in Clement's trilogy: Protrepticus (Exhortation, addressed to the heathen), Paedogogus (Instruction in Christian morals), and the Stromata (Miscellanies, training in Divine Wisdom, the true gnosis for the mature believer).

The Alexandrian School reached its highest peak of influence under Origen*; later leaders include Pierius, Theognostus, Serapion, Peter the Martyr, and Didymus the Blind. Arius held high office in the church of Alexandria, and this may have been one reason for the decline of the school, since he could use one aspect of Origen's thought as high authority for his own theory of Christ as a created Son of God. During the fourth century the school passed more and more into obscurity, though Alexandria had as bishops Alexander and Athanasius,* who led the attack on Arianism* and were foremost in the establishment of Christian orthodoxy.

During its heyday the school greatly influenced the leaders of the Palestinian Church, notably Julius Africanus* and Alexander of Jerusalem. Early in the fifth century a new school of Neoplatonism arose in Alexandria under the leadership of the learned woman Hypatia. The main features of the Alexandrian School are three: (1) the use of the weapon of philosophy. In contrast with the North African, Tertullian, the Alexandrians were Christian philosophers par excellence, using its method and terms in the interest of the Faith, seeking to beat opponents with their own weapons; (2) the supremacy of Logology. The Alexandrians stressed the Logos*-doctrine in an effort to bridge the gap between God and the world, and as the bond of union between the religion of the gospel and Gentile science; (3) the radical application of the allegorical method of biblical exegesis (see ALLEGORY). The main opponent of the Alexandrian School was that of Antioch,* in contrast to which the Alexandrians tended towards a Logos-flesh Christology and towards Monophysitism.

ALFORD, HENRY (1810-1871). Dean of Canterbury. Born in London, he early showed precociousness by writing Latin odes and a history of Jews before he was ten. In 1829 he entered Trinity College, Cambridge, and in 1834 was elected fellow. In 1835 he became vicar of Wymeswold in Leicestershire. From 1853-57 he ministered to a large congregation at the Quebec Chapel, Marylebone, until he became dean of Canterbury. Alford edited the works of John Donne (1839) and was the first editor of the Contemporary Review. He wrote hymns including "Come ye thankful people come" and "Ten thousand times ten thousand." He is chiefly known, however, for his monumental edition of the Greek New Testament which appeared over the years 1849-61.

ALFRED THE GREAT (849-899). King of Wessex from 871. Although he was concerned to restore the condition of the English Church after the devastation of the Danish raids, the continuing financial burden of military defense severely limited what he could achieve. A general revival of monasticism was still out of the question, although communities were precariously established at Shaftesbury and Athelney, for women and men respectively. Plans for diocesan reform likewise had to be delayed beyond Alfred's death. The king concentrated on restoring the most important treasure that had been lost: education. Even here, Latin scholarship could not flourish without the abbeys and minsters. But something of greater significance at the time was possible. With the help of an international band of scholars, Alfred translated into English some of the fundamental works of theology, philosophy, history, and spiritual direction, by authors such as Augustine, Boethius, Orosius, and Gregory the Great. As one who had traveled on the Continent and visited Rome, Alfred understood the importance of maintaining these links with wider Christendom in an age when disruption of the monasteries could quickly mean the end of civilization.

ALISON, FRANCIS (1705-1779). Presbyterian minister and educator. Born in Ireland, he studied at Glasgow University and in 1735 moved to America, settling first in Maryland, then in New London, Pennsylvania. In New London he was licensed to preach and shortly afterwards opened a school (1743). In 1752 he became rector of a new academy in Philadelphia. At his suggestion the trustees of the school approved the granting of degrees, and in 1755 Alison was chosen vice-provost of the college, with which his name was linked for over twenty-five years. He founded the Presbyterian Society for the Relief of Ministers and their Widows.

ALLAH. The unpluralizable, monotheistic Islamic proper name for God, like Hebrew Yahweh. It designates omnipotent creator, merciful, unbegotten, unbegetting, fiercely rejecting the incarnation of Christ. The name is used also by modern Arab Christians who say concerning future contingencies: "in sha' Allah" as other Christians might say "D.V." The Koran* and traditions use ninety-nine names for God, yet a cardinal point of Islam proclaimed from every minaret is "la ilah illa' Allah"—"there is no God but Allah."

ALLEGIANCE, OATH OF. The oath to the sovereign taken by the clergy of the Church of England at ordination and on admission to a benefice. Such an oath existed before the Reformation; but at that time a supplementary Oath of Supremacy was introduced, recognizing the Crown as supreme in spiritual as well as temporal matters, and renouncing allegiance to any foreign jurisdiction (i.e., the pope). The equivalent declaration enjoined in the Elizabethan Supremacy Act was later incorporated in the 1604 Canons as part of clerical subscription to the Anglican establishment, alongside acceptance of the Book of Common Prayer and the Thirty-Nine Articles.* In 1865 the form of clerical subscription laid down in this canon was altered, and all reference to royal supremacy thereby omitted. Consequently, the form of the oath of allegiance was altered by Parliament in 1868. The occasions when the oath is required remain unaltered, but exceptions are made in the new Canons of 1969 to cover overseas clergy serving in England.

JOHN TILLER

ALLEGORY. The use of language to convey a deeper and a different meaning from that which appears on the surface. The methodology was elaborated in the rhetorical schools of Greece, originally to relieve Homer of any charge of impiety or ignorance. The Jews of the Diaspora, influenced by Hellenistic culture, adopted the allegorical canon of exegesis in the interpretation of Scripture. The Jew Aristobulus (first half of the second century B.C.) appears to have been the first to apply the Stoic method to the Old Testament, but the Alexandrian Philo* is the Jewish allegorist par excellence. Any passage of Scripture where the literal sense would impugn the transcendent and holy character of God, or which suggests a contradiction, must be interpreted allegorically. In Palestinian usage the allegorical principle was less marked, less radical, and sought to keep close to the literal meaning of the text.

In biblical usage a distinction must be drawn between allegory as a medium of revelation and allegory as a method of interpretation. There are undoubtedly allegorical passages in Scripture; Paul explicitly declares his use of the method in Galatians 4:21-31 (cf. 1 Cor. 10:1-4), but evidently this was a departure from his usual practice. In the early church, allegory found expression, e.g., in the works of Clement of Rome,* Irenaeus,* and Tertullian*; it was carried to excess in the Alexandrian School.* Jerome, Hilary, Ambrose, and Augustine gave more or less prominence to the allegorical hermeneutic. Bernard of Clairvaux* was the supreme allegorist of the Middle Ages. Aquinas took up the earlier fourfold system of interpretation and made it normative for Catholicism. At all periods there were those who felt uneasy about or were openly opposed to allegory —e.g., the Antiochene School.* Theodore of Mopsuestia* wrote five books, Against the Allegorists. It was not, however, until the time of the Reformation that the allegorical method was seriously challenged; Reformed theologians generally rejected it, subscribing instead to the principle "Do not carry a meaning into but draw it out of (the Scriptures)."

ALLEINE, JOSEPH (1634-1668). Nonconformist* divine. Born at Devizes in Wiltshire, he was converted during a spiritual crisis provoked by the death of his eldest brother. He began studies at Lincoln College, Oxford, in 1649, then received a scholarship to Corpus Christi College, where he became tutor and chaplain. Oxford was ruled at the time by John Owen and other Puritans. Alleine preached in the villages around Oxford and at the prison. In 1655 he received Presbyterian ordination and became assistant to George Newton, minister of St. Mary Magdalene, Taunton, where he visited and catechized assiduously. In 1662 he was ejected and subsequently suffered under the Clarendon Code.* In 1663 he was imprisoned at Ilchester for singing psalms in his own house and preaching to his family. He evangelized with John Wesley, grandfather of John and Charles. Alleine was one of the best-known Nonconformist preachers. A lost work, Theologica Philosophica, was esteemed, according to Richard Baxter, for its harmonizing of revelation and natural theology. But Alleine is best remembered for his Alarm to the Unconverted which was published in 1672 after his death and sold 20,000 copies. Republished in 1675 as the Sure Guide to Heaven, it sold a further 50,000. Later debtors to this work included George Whitefield and Charles Spurgeon. He wrote other books, including an explanation of the Westminster Catechism. P.H. BUSS

ALLEINE, RICHARD (1611-1681). Nonconformist* divine. Born at Ditcheat in Somerset where his father was rector, he was educated at St. Alban's Hall and New Inn Hall, Oxford. After ordination he first assisted his father, then in 1641 became rector of Batcombe, Somerset. He signed the Presbyterian manifesto "Testimony of the Ministers of Somerset," as well as the Solemn League and Covenant.* During the Protectorate of Cromwell he served as a ministerial assistant to the commissioners for ejecting scandalous ministers. In 1662 he refused to conform and was ejected. Because of the Five Mile Act* he moved to nearby Frome Selwood, where he preached in private homes. His writings are all in the tradition of Puritan practical divinity. The Vindiciae Pietatis appeared in four parts between 1663 and 1668, and his Instructions about Heart-Work in 1681. P.H. BUSS

ALLEN, ETHAN (1737/8-1789). American soldier and exponent of Deism.* Born in Connecticut, he became military leader of the Green Mountain Boys of Vermont in their struggle during the 1770s to maintain their land grants against the efforts of New York to take possession of the disputed land. During the American Revolution Allen captured Fort Ticonderoga. He then identified himself with the ideals of the French Enlightenment and became Deistic in outlook. In 1784 he wrote the first book to be published in the USA openly attacking the Christian religion, Reason the Only Oracle of Man, in which he rejected the Christian claim that the Bible is the special revelation of God to man. He asserted that priestcraft and superstition in the churches had imposed a tyranny upon mankind, but that their time was coming to an end. Knowledge of nature and science would exalt reason and bring men "back to the religion of nature and truth," free from clergy-imposed ignorance. HARRY SKILTON

ALLEN, RICHARD (1760-1831). Founder of the African Methodist Episcopal Church. Born a slave, he was sold to a farmer near Dover, Delaware. Converted under Methodist influence, he was permitted to hold services in his home which resulted in the conversion of his master—and freedom for Allen and his family. He educated himself and preached while working at woodcutting and hauling. He was accepted as a Methodist preacher at Baltimore in 1784 and made preaching journeys with Richard Watcoat and Bishop Asbury.* He preached occasionally at St. George Methodist Church, Philadelphia, where his forceful approach attracted many Negroes, resulting in white protests. The former withdrew and formed the "Free African Society" (1787). From this body Allen influenced the majority to form the African Methodist Episcopal Church, which Bishop Asbury dedicated in 1794. Fifteen other Negro churches joined them. Allen was ordained in 1799 and became first bishop in 1816. Before his death he won national standing for the denomination. J.G.G. NORMAN

ALLEN, WILLIAM (1532-1594). Scholar and cardinal. Born in Rossall, Lancashire, he went to Oriel College, Oxford, and in 1556 was chosen principal of St. Mary's Hall. When Elizabeth acceded, Allen was deprived and left England in 1561 for refusing the Oath of Supremacy. He was an ardent Romanist and soon gathered around him, at Louvain, other English refugees to study theology and reestablish the Roman faith. Allen himself returned secretly to England to encourage the recusants. He moved from place to place to avoid arrest and finally left England in 1565 for Flanders. After ordination as priest he lectured at the Benedictine College in Malines. He established a college at Douai in 1568, in response to the call of the Council of Trent,* and became a professor there. In 1575 he founded the English College in Rome and in 1589 a further college at Valladolid. He was the overseer of the Douai version* of the Bible project. All the while Allen continued his theological study and writing, and he regarded Protestantism in England as a temporary and passing phase to be hurried on as quickly as possible. His meeting with the Jesuit Robert Parsons brought a new element to his activities—that of political intrigue. Parsons dominated Allen; they both went to Rome in 1585, where Allen remained for the rest of his life. The Jesuit mission to England begun in 1580 was now under Parsons' control. Allen was made cardinal in 1587 and was intended to be the first Roman Catholic archbishop of Canterbury if English Protestantism were undone. He took part in numerous intrigues, writing a defense of the traitorous surrender of Deventer to the Spaniards by Sir William Stanley. He urged Roman Catholics to rebel against Elizabeth, but lost his influence after the defeat of the Armada. Later he came to regret his intrigue and Parsons' methods. He ended his days as Vatican librarian and in revising the Vulgate. While his scholarship and integrity are not in dispute, it cannot be doubted that his activities, with those of Parsons, gave the English real grounds for suspecting Jesuit institutions of sedition and treason.

ALLINE, HENRY (1748-1784). Leader of the Great Awakening* in Nova Scotia. Born in Rhode Island, he received little formal education. In 1775 he underwent an unusually powerful conversion experience which gave him a new sense of wholeness. At once he sensed a call to become a preacher of the Gospel. Initially hindered by his lack of theological education, a second moving experience gave him the conviction that he "needed nothing to qualify me but Christ." He began preaching as he wandered through the countryside and started the revival which became known as the "New Light" movement. He was considered a fanatic and destroyer by many in the established denominations, but he indirectly fostered the growth of the Baptist churches in Nova Scotia. He wrote hymns, a journal of the revival, and Two Mites Cast Into the Offering of God for the Benefit of Mankind (1804).

ALLIX, PIERRE (1641-1717). French Reformed pastor. He ministered at St. Agobile, then at Charenton, but revocation of the Edict of Nantes* in 1685 compelled him to flee to England, where he began a church for French exiles in London. He was a prolific writer, replying to Bossuet and seeking to show that the Albigensians* were true Christians and not heretics. Bishop Gilbert Burnet appointed him canon of Salisbury cathedral, and he received doctorates from both Oxford and Cambridge.

ALL SAINTS' DAY. A feast kept on 1 November in the West, and on the first Sunday after Pentecost in the East, to celebrate the fellowship of all Christians, in the Church Triumphant as well as on earth. Its origins are uncertain. A hymn by Ephraem (in 359) refers to a commemoration of all martyrs on 13 May, while a sermon of John Chrysostom (d.407) shows that Antioch remembered its martyrs on the Sunday after Pentecost. Such feasts soon included other saints besides martyrs. On 13 May, 609 or 610, Boniface IV received the Roman Pantheon from the Emperor Phocas (d.610) and dedicated it under the title S. Maria ad Martyres. The anniversary of this event was later observed as a major festival and may have been the origin of All Saints' Day. How there came to be a feast of all the saints on 1 November is unknown; but it possibly stems from the dedication on that day in St. Peter's basilica by Gregory III (731-41) of an oratory to "all the saints."

STEPHEN S. SMALLEY

ALMONER. One who is an official distributor of the alms of a person or institution. He may be acting for a religious house, a bishop, a prince, or a person of rank. In England the royal almoner distributes the royal almony on Maundy Thursday.* The term is sometimes applied to the chaplain of a hospital, infirmary, or orphanage.

ALMS. Almsgiving constituted standard OT righteousness (Deut. 15:7-11; Prov. 25:21f.; 28:27; Isa. 58:7-11), emphasized dominical precept (Matt. 5:42; Luke 12:33), and was a familiar apostolic virtue (2 Cor. 9:5-7; Heb. 13:16). The Hebrew term for "righteousness" had acquired by Mishnaic times (c.A.D. 200) the secondary meaning "almsgiving." The Talmud constantly advocates charity: impoverished, even aid-receiving, persons thus acquire virtue. Didache XV, 4, the earliest postcanonical Christian document emphasizing almsgiving, claims dominical authority. Generosity is never the root of justification, but merely the fruit of redeemed life (Rom. 5:1; cf. James 2:14-17). Good pagans practiced almsgiving, as is demonstrated by Egyptian tomb inscriptions about 2400 B.C., and by Confucianism and Buddhism nearly 2,000 years later. The good Buddhist seeking the "Noble Eightfold Path" of holy living also cultivates Dana (generosity, renunciation). Islam (c.A.D. 650 onward) requires legal and recommends voluntary almsgiving.

True poverty pleads for kindly benevolence; human hearts are naturally warm. Dangers exist, however: ostentatious pride in the benefactor (Matt. 6:1-4), habitual parasitism on the part of the recipient. The Mishnah pungently states that he who takes yet does not need will come to real hardship; he who needs yet does not take will live to endow others.

ROY A. STEWART

ALOGI. An obscure Christian group in Asia Minor about 175 which, in reaction to Montanism,* questioned the authority of those sacred books on which they based their claims. Hence they rejected en bloc the gospel of John and the Apocalypse which, according to them, were written by Cerinthus. They also objected to the Logos* theology of the Apologists. The nickname Alogi (Gr. alogoi) was scornfully applied to them by Epiphanius, who used it in a double sense to denote that they were "irrational" people who were without the "Logos."

ALOPEN (seventh century). First known Christian missionary to China. Native of Syria, he arrived in China in 635, according to the inscription on the "Nestorian Tablet," first erected in 781 and uncovered in 1625 by workmen near Sian. Alopen was received with honor by the Emperor T'ai-tsung, a monastery was built, sacred books were translated, and a measure of success gained. But Nestorian Christianity failed to survive persecution under subsequent emperors and was finally suppressed in 845, leaving no permanent influence on Chinese life and thought.

ALSTED, JOHANN HEINRICH (1588-1638). German Calvinist. Trained at the Reformed Academy of Herborn, he then studied at Marburg, Frankfurt, Heidelberg, Strasbourg, and Basle. Returning to his alma mater, he taught in the preparatory school and later joined the faculty of the philosophy department at Herborn. When dissension broke out between Reformed and Arminian, and the Synod of Dort* (1618) was called to settle the dispute, Alsted was chosen to represent his area. After the synod he became professor of theology. The Thirty Years' War brought devastation to the Rhineland, causing Alsted to leave Herborn and take a position as a teacher at Stuhl-Weissenburg in Transylvania, where he remained until his death. A prolific writer, he tried to unify all knowledge through an approach that combined Aristotelianism, Lullianism, and Ramism. The finest illustration of this work is his Encyclopedia Septem Tomis Distincta (1630). He was also a premillenarian and his Diatribe de mille annis Apocalypticis (1627; ET Beloved City, 1643) was a major influence in seventeenth-century English apocalyptic speculation.

ALTAR (Lat. altus, "high"). A place where sacrifice is offered. There is frequent mention in the early period of the OT of altars at which various animals were ritually killed. In later years sacrifice was centered on the altar in the Temple at Jerusalem. The death of Christ, being "for all time one sacrifice for sins" (Heb. 10:12 NEB), put an end to sacrificial worship and hence any need for altars. The reference to an altar in Hebrews 13:10 is a reference to the death of Christ. Although both Greek and Latin writers in the early church used the term "table" for the place where the Eucharist was celebrated, the word gradually became replaced by "altar." This was a consequence of the Eucharist itself being regarded as sacrifice, which partly arose from patristic exegesis of Malachi 1:11, partly from the habit of signs being called by the names of that which they represented.

Altars were originally made of wood, but while the material varied in the East, in the West stone became increasingly the rule. As the material changed, so did the shape from a table to that of a tomb, possibly because the Eucharist was often celebrated at the tomb of a martyr. This latter practice is reflected in the way in which later altars were consecrated by having relics of martyrs placed within them, a practice supported by an interpretation of Revelation 6:9. As altars became fixed they acquired greater architectural importance; churches were built so that the altar was the focal point. In the beginning there was only one altar in each church, but gradually, perhaps under the influence of private masses, altars were multiplied. In Eastern Orthodox Churches there is only one altar, and only one Eucharist may be celebrated at it during any one day.

At the Reformation, change from the sacrifice of the Mass to the Lord's Supper meant that the altar was replaced both in name and fact by tables usually of wood. The rubrics of the Book of Common Prayer refer only to tables, and these have to be movable. The word "altar," however, is often popularly used to refer to the Communion table. Where reference is made to a high altar this means the principal altar of the church.

PETER S. DAWES

ALTAR FELLOWSHIP. Some denominations allow only those to receive Holy Communion at their altars who are from their own denomination or from denominations which are in doctrinal agreement with them. Churches which practice "close communion" or "fencing the table" have such restrictive policies. The Roman Catholic Church does not permit altar fellowship with other churches. In Lutheranism in America, the Akron (1872) and Galesburg (1875) rules were adopted which said, "Lutheran altars for Lutherans only."

ALTHAUS, PAUL (1888-1966). Lutheran scholar. Born in Obershagen, he taught in Göttingen (1914), Rostock (1920), and Erlangen (1925). He was editor of Das Neue Testament Deutsch: Göttinger Bibelwerk and contributed extensively to New Testament studies by his expositions particularly of the Pauline Epistles. He became involved in the Synoptic problem for which he wrote Fact and Faith in the Kerygma Today, a translation of his Die sogenannte Kerygma und der historische Jesus. His chief contribution to systematic theology was Die christliche Wahrheit: Lehrbuch der Dogmatik, which reached its eighth edition in 1969. The doctrines of justification by faith in the theology of Martin Luther, law and gospel, and the problem of the relationship between church and state according to Luther are some of Althaus's major concerns. Die Ethik Martin Luthers combined his interests in Luther and ethics, the latter evidenced also in his Grundriss der Ethik. He investigated also Luther's doctrine of the Lord's Supper (Die lutherische Abendsmahlslehre). Although a Lutheran, Althaus frequently differed with Luther, not least in the doctrine of the Lord's Supper. One of his major emphases was on eschatology. His work on this subject, Die letzten Dinge, was in its ninth edition in 1964. His sermons, some of which were published, and his devotional writings added to his fame. CARL S. MEYER

ALUMBRADOS (or Illuminati, "enlightened"). A mystical Spanish sect of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries. First appearing among the Franciscan friars about 1512, the movement emphasized passive surrender to, and personal sinless unity with, God as the object of the spiritual life. Sacraments and good works were consequently undermined. The criticisms it brought against the organized church gave it some common ground with Erasmianism and Lutheranism. In the mind of the Inquisition* it became identified in some measure with the latter, and its beliefs were condemned in 1525. From then the Alumbrados were persecuted, and indeed the sexual excesses of some of its leaders, such as Francisca Hermández, made them an easy target. Francisca exercised a fatal fascination for many, and the involvement of some of the Erasmian leaders with her helped to secure their downfall also. Many of the Illuminati, however, lived in a morally orthodox fashion. Ignatius Loyola* was temporarily imprisoned for suspected sympathy with them in 1527. C. PETER WILLIAMS

ALYPIUS (latter fourth/early fifth century). Bishop of Thagaste. Friend of Jerome and Augustine, he is mentioned as collaborating with Augustine* in the conversion of an Arian physician, Maximus, of the town of Thenae in Byzacena. With Augustine and five others he was a spokesman for the Catholic bishops at a conference between Catholics and Donatists at Carthage in 411. Again with Augustine he represented Numidia at a council at Carthage in 418, at which the Catholic view of original sin and of grace was set forth in nine canons. Alypius is mentioned also among the African bishops summoned to a council at Spoleto in 419 to settle the question of the rival claims of Eulalius and Boniface I to the papacy. He was also a friend and adviser of Pinianus and Melania, a notable Roman couple who had fled before the threat of Alaric and had finally settled at Thagaste. DAVID JOHN WILLIAMS

AMALAR OF METZ (also Amalaric or Amalarius) (c.780-c.850). Liturgical writer. His work as a disciple of Alcuin* furthered that fusion of Roman and Gallican practice which produced the medieval Mass. He attempted in his chief work De ecclesiasticis officiis and elsewhere a thoroughgoing allegorical interpretation of the Mass which gave every prayer, chant, and ceremony a symbolic reference to the life and work of Christ. Allusions to the OT and other teaching were also introduced. Much of the symbolism was highly artificial. When Amalar was appointed in 835 to administer the see of Lyons in the absence of Archbishop Agobard,* he found considerable opposition to his views, some of which were condemned by the Synod of Quiercy (838). Yet he set the trend for the future and actually influenced developments in ceremonial which were modified to fit in better with his overall pattern of symbolism. Apart from this he remains a fundamental source for the history of the liturgy, being the first to give evidence, for example, of the practices of incensing the altar and of reading the Gospel from a higher place than the Epistle.
JOHN TILLER

AMALRIC (d. c.1207). French mystic and philosopher. Born at Bena, near Chartres, he lectured at Paris in theology and philosophy, and enjoyed the favor of Louis VIII. His teaching, influenced by his study of J. Scotus Erigena,* contained pantheistic elements, and he was condemned in his own diocese. He was also summoned to Rome to appear before Innocent III to give an account of his beliefs. Returning to Paris, he recanted and died soon afterward. He evidently held that "God is all things" and that Christians are to accept that they are in the body of Christ and to walk in love in order to be forgiven. His followers, the Amalricians, extended his teaching, and seven of them were burned at the stake as heretics soon after his death. His teaching and that of his disciples was condemned at a synod in Paris in 1210 and five years later at the Fourth Lateran Council. PETER TOON

AMANA CHURCH SOCIETY. A Pietistic sect in Iowa, called also "The Community of True Inspiration," it includes about 730 members in seven congregations. The Amana Society arose in 1714 when a company of German Pietists was awakened by the message of Johann Rock and Ludwig Grüber, who claimed that the days of true and direct inspiration from God had not ended. After Rock's death in 1749 the movement waned until 1817, when three new "instruments of true inspiration," Michael Krausert, Christian Metz, and Barbara Heinemann, led in a renewal of the fellowship. To escape government persecution, over 800 migrated from Germany in 1842 and settled in a village called Ebenezer near Buffalo, New York.

In 1855 the society moved to Iowa, where Amana and six other small communities were established and incorporated in 1859 under the Amana name. These constituted for a time an outstanding experiment in communal living. Their worship was simple, consisting of hymns, testimonies, prayers, reading of Scripture (or the writings of the "Inspired"), and occasional exhortations by the elders. In 1932 the society was reorganized—many of the communistic practices were abandoned—and reconstituted as a corporation for profit. Today members might be called cooperative rather than communistic. They are stockholders in a multimillion dollar corporation, conducting fifty different businesses. Though still a dominant influence, the church is now separated from the business affairs of the community. Many of the society's traditional rules, such as those regarding pacifism and worldly amusements, have been surrendered. BRUCE L. SHELLEY

AMANDUS (584?-679). A founder of Belgian monasticism. Apparently at twenty he became a monk at Ye, and later he lived many years as a hermit. In 629, after consecration as a missionary bishop, he evangelized in Flanders and Carinthia. There is confusion about the next phase of his life. Temporary exile for criticism of King Dagobert I's moral behavior (628-39) might explain subsequent missionary work which could have been in the Danube or in the Basque country. Ultimately Dagobert forgave him and asked him to baptize his son Sigebert. Amandus then proselytized in the Scheldt and Scarpe river regions, becoming bishop of Tongeres-Maasricht about 649. Founder of eight abbeys, he retired to one at Elnon near Tournai as abbot in 675 and there wrote his Testamentum, the only reliable evidence about his life. L. FEEHAN

AMBO. The raised platform in a basilica from which the Scriptures were read. Subsequently there were two ambos, for the Epistle and Gospel respectively, on the south and north sides. The pulpit replaced them after the fourteenth century.

AMBROSE (c.339-397). Bishop of Milan. Born at Trier in Gaul into the Christian family of Aurelius Ambrosius, the praetorian prefect of Gaul, he trained in law, followed his father into an administrative career, and about 370 was appointed governor of the province of Aemilia-Liguria, the leading town of which was Milan. When Auxentius, bishop of Milan, died in 374, Ambrose (an unbaptized catechumen) was baptized, ordained, and consecrated bishop. His first act as bishop was to distribute his great wealth among the poor. He was outstanding as preacher and teacher; his De Fide, De Spiritu Sancto, and De Mysteriis are testimony to his diligence in teaching the faith and refuting heresy. Among the many influenced by him was Augustine,* whose fame and ability were one day to eclipse even his own. Ambrose was also a fearless church leader. Events brought him into contact with the rulers of the West. When Theodosius had put down a seditious movement in Thessalonica with exceptional severity by killing thousands of people, Ambrose wrote to him refusing the sacrament of Holy Communion until he had openly made penance. Ambrose's attitude was to affect profoundly relationships between church and state for generations to come. "The emperor," he declared, "was within the church and not over it." Ambrose was influential also in encouraging monasticism in Italy and molding psalmody and hymnody in the direction of congregational participation. His main work, De Officiis Ministrorum, was a book on Christian ethics for the clergy.

AMBROSE, ISAAC (1604-1664). Nonconformist* minister. Born in Ormskirk, Lancashire, he was educated at Brasenose College, Oxford, and ordained to the parish of Castleton, Derbyshire. Appointed in 1634 as one of the king's four itinerant preachers in Lancashire, he became vicar of Preston, where he developed Presbyterian leanings. In the Civil War he was twice captured by the royalists, but served on the committee for the ejection of scandalous and ignorant clergy and schoolmasters. In 1654 he left Preston for Garstang, but was turned out in the 1662 ejection. He was a vivid writer and was much given to prayer and meditation. After recovering from an illness he determined to write his experiences, and in 1658 his Looking unto Jesus was published and achieved considerable popularity.

AMBROSIANS. Anabaptist* sect. One of the biblical doctrines rediscovered at the Reformation was the priesthood of all believers: every believer could have direct access to God without the intervention of a human priest, and every believer was called to Christian witness and service. Inevitably, reaction against the clericalism of the medieval church became in some instances overreaction. Many of the Anabaptist groups denounced by Luther overstressed the direct operation of the Holy Spirit in the individual soul. Among these were the Ambrosians, named after their leader Ambrosius, who based their theology on their interpretation of John 1:9. If there were in fact direct illumination from God in every soul, then there was no need of a formal order of priests or ministers to interpret the Bible. The Bible itself was not the only authoritative medium of divine revelation—Ambrose held that the spiritual and direct revelations given to him had a higher authority than that of the Scriptures. To some extent the Quakers were the lineal descendants of groups such as the Ambrosians.

The name of Ambrosians had been used earlier by an order founded under the patronage of Ambrose of Milan. Given the Rule of Augustine in 1375, the order was dissolved in 1650.

HUGH J. BLAIR

AMBROSIASTER. A pseudonym applied since Erasmus to a commentary on the Pauline epistles which appeared in Rome about 375, falsely attributed to Ambrose* of Milan. The pseudo-Augustinian Quaestiones Veteris et Novi Testamenti are also attributed (e.g., by J.N.D. Kelly) to this author. His identity is not yet established. Augustine attributes part of the commentary on Romans 5:12 to "sanctus Hilarius," possibly the Christian praefectus urbi at Rome in 383. Ambrosiaster relates Pauline teaching to contemporary legal institutions (Heggelbacher). Like Ambrose and Jerome, he believed the Cross to have broken the hold which the devil gained on men at the Fall, and the eucharistic elements he saw as "types" of Christ's body and blood. His eschatology included a Millennium. Original guilt he did not hold, but his understanding of universal sin in Adam quasi in massa, based on the Old Latin mistranslation of Romans 5:12, did lead on to the Augustinian doctrine. G.T.D. ANGEL

AMERICAN ANTI-SLAVERY SOCIETY. Established in 1833 in Philadelphia by members of state and local abolition* societies. About 1830 the abolitionist movement began to organize and spread quickly as a religious and humanitarian crusade. William Lloyd Garrison, an outspoken radical leader of the abolitionists in New England, in 1832 organized the New England Anti-Slavery Society. Abolition of slavery in the British Empire by the British government in 1833 led American abolitionists to unite quickly to form a national organization. Western leaders of the revivalist reform movement which had arisen from the work of C.G. Finney* joined the generally more radical New Englanders to form the American Anti-Slavery Society with the announced goal of immediate abolition, but with the expectation by many members that the process of emancipation would be gradually and moderately accomplished. Influential evangelical supporters of the society were the philanthropists Arthur and Lewis Tappan, and T.D. Weld,* an eloquent spokesman, organizer, and traveling agent of the national movement. Weld at Lane Seminary was successful in training effective antislavery agitators who converted entire communities to an awareness of the sinfulness of slavery and the need to abolish it. But the national society lacked unity and was considered too radical by many advocates of abolition. Differences among the factions within it led the anti-Garrison abolitionists to leave it in 1840, thus bringing its effectiveness to an end. HARRY SKILTON

AMERICAN BAPTIST CHURCHES. Fourth largest of a dozen major and scores of minor Baptist denominations in the USA, with over 6,000 congregations. From 1950 to 1972 the group was known as the American Baptist Convention, and from 1907 to 1950 as the Northern Baptist Convention. Before 1907 the congregations were joined only in local and state associations and were served on the national level by specialized agencies, the most important of which were the American Baptist Foreign Mission Society (founded 1814), the publication society (1824), and the home mission society (1832). By the close of the nineteenth century, the American Baptist membership and ministry was reluctantly but effectively confined chiefly to the northern and western states. For the ABC, the twentieth century has brought three major developments: considerable theological diversification; increased organizational coordination; and resulting loss of the overwhelming predominance it had long held among Baptists outside the South.

Northern Baptists in the twenties shared in the modernist–fundamentalist controversies, and tension has continued on various fronts. Conservative seminaries were formed near the older, changing schools. Northern Baptist Seminary began in 1913; Eastern started in 1925 near Crozer in the Philadelphia area; and a seminary began in Covina, California, in 1944 even though there was already one in the state, at Berkeley. Extremists on both sides have left the convention over the years, but the ABC still includes probably a greater diversity of theologies with strength than any other American denomination. This diversity is on fundamental issues such as the deity and the second coming of Christ.

Financial pressures and desires for efficiency led many to seek the formation of the convention in 1907 and even greater coordination of the various districts and specialized agencies. Conservatives tended to distrust such moves because theological liberals and moderates effectively controlled most of the denominational machinery and were able to repel the major attempts to wrest it from them in the annual conventions of 1922 and 1946.

Unlike the Baptist groups in the South, the ABC has always been comparatively small. Only in Maine and West Virginia have Baptists been as much as ten percent of the churchgoing population. In the Midwest and West the approximately 2,500 American Baptist congregations are now greatly outnumbered by Southern Baptist* congregations (3,400 outside the South), and former ABC-linked groups including the General Association of Regular Baptist Churches (1,400), Conservative Baptist Association (1,100), Baptist General Conference (600), and North American Baptist General Conference (300).

Although other Baptist denominations, including some that withdrew from the SBC, have shown greater growth rates, the American Baptists did unite most Arminian-rooted northern congregations beginning in 1910, in recent years have increased black participation in their activities, and have gained some congregations from the South. The ABC and many of its members have made important contributions to the ecumenical movement, though not participating in the Consultation on Church Union. Burma, China, Haiti, India, Japan, the Philippines, Puerto Rico, Thailand, and Zaire are some of the countries where ABC missionaries and funds have played a significant role in developing Protestantism.

AMERICAN BOARD OF COMMISSIONERS FOR FOREIGN MISSIONS. The first American foreign missionary society. Organized in 1810 in Massachusetts in response to a request for guidance by a group of missionary-minded students, it sent out the first contingent of missionaries to India in 1812, resulting in missions at Bombay and in Ceylon. In 1818 it appointed the first two Protestant missionaries to the Near East, and in 1819 sent out the first missionary group to Hawaii. Within fifty years it had also established missions in other parts of Asia, including China and Japan, in Africa and Micronesia. It engaged also in home missions on the frontiers, among Indians and Negroes. Though started by Congregationalists, for many years the board served also Presbyterians, Dutch Reformed, and German Reformed, until these churches set up their own mission societies. When the Congregational-Christian churches and the Evangelical and Reformed Church merged in 1961, the ABCFM became part of the United Church Board for World Ministries.

AMERICAN COLONIZATION SOCIETY. Formed in 1816 to return freed slaves to Africa, the society established the country of Liberia. Started by minister Robert Finley with government help, its members hoped that Christian freedmen might help evangelize Africa. Even some slaveholders supported the scheme. It never, however, gained a broad base of support. After initial difficulties, a tract of land was secured for a colony. Disease almost wiped out the first group of 114 settlers in 1820-21. In 1822 a group of fifty-three under minister Jehudi Ashmun made a permanent settlement near Monrovia. The Maryland branch of the society in 1833 established a colony at Cape Palmas. When Britain refused to recognize the authority of the society to govern, an independent government was set up in 1847, patterned after and sponsored by the United States. By 1867 about 10,000 freedmen had been transported to the colony. HAROLD R. COOK

AMERICAN COUNCIL OF CHRISTIAN CHURCHES. An association of militant fundamentalists organized under the leadership of Carl McIntire in 1941 to promote and defend the historic orthodox Protestant faith, and to counter the activities of the Federal (since 1950 the National) Council of Churches. Its membership includes conservative separatist denominations such as the Bible Presbyterian Church and the Bible Protestant Church, as well as individuals from churches which belong to the National Council. The ACCC seeks to bring about a reformation of the doctrine and practice of the American churches on the basis of acceptance of the entire Bible as the verbally inspired, inerrant, authoritative Word of God. The NCC is considered apostate because it is tolerant of denials of orthodox doctrine and promotes programs of a communist and pacifist nature. True believers are urged to leave their corrupt denominations and join or form pure churches. In recent years the movement has been disrupted by serious internal squabbles.

AMERICAN INDIANS, CHRISTIANITY AND. The motivation to discover and develop the New World derived from several sources, political and economic as well as religious. When in June 1523 Charles V instructed Lucas Vasquez de Ayllon regarding his mission to the New World, he stated that "the chief motive you are to bear and hold in this affair" was the conversion of the Floridian Indians. Although Vasquez de Ayllon was not successful, by 1634 Florida had forty-four missions conducted by thirty-five Franciscans, and the converts from the Indian population numbered more than 25,000. In the Far West, much the same development occurred. In New Mexico in 1630, the number of Christian Indians numbered more than 35,000. In 1609, the governor and councillors of Virginia, an Anglican colony, issued a proclamation that "the principal and Maine Endes ... were first to preach and baptize into Christian Religion, and by propagation of the Gospell, to recover ... a number of poore and miserable soules."

The Puritans likewise sought to extend their theocratic kingdom to the Indians. The charter of the Massachusetts Bay Colony included the Macedonian call of Acts 16:9 as a description of the spiritual plight of the Indians. But after direct contact with the Indians and especially after the Pequot War of 1637, the Puritan attitude was one of mixed pity and hatred. The Puritans were fascinated by the natives and speculated as to their origins. Some held they were a cursed race and were therefore prime subjects for slaves. Many were sold into bondage. Thomas, John, and Experience Mayhew did carry on successful work among the Indians of Martha's Vineyard; Experience translated the Psalms and the gospel of John into the Indian language and published a book, Indian Converts (1727). John Eliot* translated the Bible and published a Catechism (1653), the first book to be printed in the Indian language. Through the influence of Eliot and Thomas Shepard, the Long Parliament established the "Society for the Propagation of the Gospell in New England" in 1649. Periodic uprisings constantly set back the progress of these missions, and few Indians were able to gain the fame of Pocahontas.

But preaching and churches were not the only attempts to improve the state of the natives. In 1618 in Virginia, separate schools, even a college, had been established to educate the Indians. Rev. Eleazer Wheelock in the 1750s organized Moor's Indian Charity School (now Dartmouth College) in Lebanon, Connecticut, to train Indians to minister to their own people. Throughout the colonial period the Indians were caught in the cross-fire of either their own conflicts with warring tribes or the struggles for power in the New World among the Spanish, French, and British. With the westward expansion the Indians were gradually moved to government-established reservations, and during the late nineteenth and most of the twentieth century, the major American denominations as well as many independent missionary agencies have attempted not only to convert the Indians to the Christian faith but to help them adjust to the modern world. One peculiar fact about the Indians always stimulated discussion: whence did they come? Joseph Smith in his Book of Mormon identified them with the "Ten Lost Tribes of Israel."

AMERICANISM. A condemnatory term for the adaptation of church doctrine and practice to American culture which provoked controversy (and condemnation by Pope Leo XIII) within the Roman Catholic Church in the late nineteenth century. The trouble originated in conflict between progressives and traditionalists in the American Church over the value of parochial schools, and whether it was wise to try to preserve the native language and culture of immigrants in order to protect their faith, or rather to help them adopt American customs. When the biography of an American progressive priest, I.T. Hecker,* by W. Elliott was translated into French, conservative French priests denounced the ideas contained in it as "Americanism." American progressive bishops such as James Gibbons* were accused of subverting the Faith. In his apostolic letter of 1899 addressed to Gibbons, Leo condemned such errors as the rejection of religious vows, the assertion that external religious authority is unnecessary in a time of liberty, and the view that natural and active virtues are more valuable in the modern world than are supernatural and passive. Gibbons denied that such views were held by American Catholics.

AMERICAN NEGRO CHURCHES. Removed from their African environment, slaves in colonial America were introduced to the Christian religion which helped them adjust to the social structures of a new civilization. At first there was little organized effort to evangelize them. Slaves ordinarily attended the church of their master or were provided minimal religious instruction by master, pastor, or missionary. After the Great Awakening* in the eighteenth century, aggressive evangelists, particularly Baptists and Methodists, reached them with a simple, personal, and emotional Gospel that injected new meaning and hope into their lives.

Except among free Negroes, the Negro church rarely emerged as an independent institution before the Civil War. Separate congregations existed, some under white and some under black leadership, but most Negro church members belonged to congregations where membership was shared with white members who were frequently in the minority. After the Revolutionary War there were numerous secessions by free Negroes from white churches.

The first known Negro church in America was a Baptist church founded at Silver Bluff, South Carolina, in 1775. Soon Baptist congregations were formed in Savannah (1788), Boston (1805), New York (1807), Philadelphia (1809), and subsequently in many other places. Several Methodist congregations were established at the end of the eighteenth century, but they were soon organized into Negro denominations. The African Methodist Episcopal Church was founded in Philadelphia (1816) and the African Methodist Episcopal Zion Church in New York City (1821).

After the Civil War, Negro church organizations grew rapidly as ex-slaves, withdrawing from white churches, were for the most part absorbed by the institutions begun by free Negroes before the war. In 1870 the Christian Methodist Episcopal Church, originally part of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, was constituted a separate denomination. In 1886 the majority of Baptists were brought together in what was to become the National Baptist Convention, U.S.A., Inc., from which the National Baptist Convention of America separated in 1916; these are the two largest Negro denominations in America. The Negro church—the one institution in which Negroes could find self-expression, develop leadership, and provide social services—became and still remains for many the most important agency for the achievement of a sense of community and status.

More than two-thirds of Negro church members are concentrated in five denominations: National Baptist Convention, U.S.A., Inc. with 5.5 million (1958); National Baptist Convention of America with 2.669 million (1956); African Methodist Episcopal Church with 1.66 million (1951); African Methodist Episcopal Zion Church with 940,000 (1970); and Christian Methodist Episcopal Church with 467,000 (1965). Negroes are also found in smaller denominations and in predominantly white denominations, though usually in black congregations. Of white Protestant denominations, the United Methodist Church has the largest Negro membership. Since World War II, the Roman Catholic Church has become one of the leading religious bodies among Negroes, and its Negro membership is believed now to equal that in predominantly white Protestant denominations.

The migration to the cities after World War I contributed to the rise of "storefront" churches and numerous organized cults for Negroes who did not feel at home in more conventional churches. Typical of many groups that were hostile to traditional religious expressions are the Black Muslims, Black Jews, and Father Divine's Peace Mission.

Negro churches follow American religious patterns, reflecting in large measure the other churches of corresponding or parent denominations and of the same educational and economic level. Their theology is typically fundamentalist, pietist, and evangelical. The "otherworldly" emphasis of the "spirituals" is still prominent; the Church remains a refuge and a source of hope in a hostile world. As Negro education and economy improve, their theology and worship become more intellectual, sophisticated, and emotionally disciplined.

The Negro community is "overchurched," with a higher ratio of ministers and churches than the general population. The minister has the historic role of leadership. Unfortunately, too few possess adequate formal education, and the supply does not appear to be increasing.

The Negro church is predominantly urban, with more and more of its members sharing the middle-class ideals and common secular attitudes. Increasing emphasis upon this world has induced many church leaders to head movements for civil rights, economic justice, and better educational opportunities. The expectation among Negroes is substantial and growing that churches should be involved in community improvement through cooperation with other organizations and through social and political action. The struggle for racial and social justice has created a crisis of role and identity for the church and its leaders.

The Negro church exists for the purposes of a yet deprived and troubled people. As long as Negroes are excluded from or are uncomfortable in white churches, the Negro church will remain an instrument for the expression of racial identity and a medium for shaping and expressing their aspirations.

AMES, WILLIAM (1576-1633). Puritan theologian. Educated at Christ's College, Cambridge, where he was tutored and greatly influenced by W. Perkins,* he was suspended for a sermon attacking card-playing and for refusing to wear the surplice, and prevented from seeking a pastorate at Colchester by the bishop of London. He became chaplain to Sir H. Vere, English governor of Brill in Holland. After attending the Synod of Dort*—where his theological acumen became apparent—as an English observer, he became professor of theology at Franeker in 1622 and rector in 1626. Ill health led to his retirement, and he died within a year. His great reputation as a theologian and marked ability as a teacher attracted students from all over Europe, but in contemporary opinion his genius was better adapted to the professor's chair than to the pulpit. A considerable controversialist, against Anglicanism (Fresh Suit against Roman Ceremonies), Arminianism (Medulla Theologiae), and Remonstrants (Animadversiones in Synodalia), he was also a careful casuist. His De Conscientia, eius Iure et Casibus was one of the first systematic Protestant attempts to clarify general principles. G.S.R. COX

AMILLENNIALISM (Amillenarianism). A particular interpretation of Revelation 20. The premillennialist maintains this chapter teaches a thousand-year reign of Christ after His second advent, the postmillennialist before the second advent, while the amillennialist denies such a thousand-year reign: he stresses that the Apocalypse normally treats numbers symbolically. The binding of Satan for a thousand years simply means that he is completely bound; this has been effected through the victory of Calvary. Some amillennialists hold the expression to refer to the Church's rest from spiritual conflict beyond death. Most apply it, however, to her present victory over Satan in Christ crucified and exalted. Many Reformed and Lutheran theologians hold this view, and elements of it can be traced in Augustine. G.W. GROGAN

AMMONIAN SECTIONS. Most Greek and Latin manuscripts of the four gospels contain divisions into longer or shorter sections, which can be collocated in parallel columns to reveal synoptic correspondences. These are called "Ammonian Sections," since Eusebius* of Caesarea attributes to Ammonius of Alexandria an edition of Matthew containing parallel passages from the remaining three gospels in the margin. Eusebius himself numbered the sections and arranged them into his ten "canons." This Ammonius (c.220?) was neither the Neoplatonist philosopher nor the commentator on Daniel, John, and Acts. It is uncertain how far Eusebius himself was responsible for the divisions. G.T.D. ANGEL

AMMONIUS SACCAS (c.174-c.242). Philosopher and teacher. Thought originally to have been a porter, he taught rhetoric and an eclectic and esoteric form of Platonism at Alexandria. His pupils included Origen, Plotinus the famous Neoplatonist, and a pagan Origen. The pagan biographer Porphyry claimed that learning made Ammonius reject his Christian upbringing for traditional paganism and that he left no writings. Eusebius is regarded as mistaken in his counterclaim that Ammonius was consistently a Christian philosopher and left such writings as On the Agreement of Moses and Jesus. His theories on Providence, the soul, and the cosmos echo the Christian Origen. G.T.D. ANGEL

AMOUN (d. c.348). Ascetic. A native Egyptian Christian, he began semi-eremitic asceticism about 325 at Nitria in the Wadi Natron, where his followers traded niter. Out of sight or sound of one another during the week, his hermits met for worship both on the Sabbath and on the Lord's Day, according to Egyptian custom, at a central church governed by a disciplinary "Sanhedrin." His example inspired Macarius of Scete and was admired by Antony.

AMPHILOCHIUS (d. after 394). Bishop of Iconium. A lawyer at Constantinople, he became bishop in 373 at the instigation of his friend Basil (the Great)* of Caesarea. Associated also with Gregory of Nyssa and Gregory of Nazianzus, he affirmed the Cappadocian Trinitarian model of one substance and three modes of existence or relation. His Christology held fast, without change or confusion in either, both a divinity consubstantial with that of the Father and a humanity preserving free will. The surviving remains of his large literary output reveal wide interests. They are (1) thirty-three Laudi ad Seleucum on devout living and successful study, a list of biblical books putting the Apocalypse outside the canon; (2) eight sermons on church feasts and texts of Scripture; (3) a Coptic treatise against the Apotactites and Gemellites, hyperascetic sects which, in addition to the Arians and Messalians, Amphilochius opposed vigorously. G.T.D. ANGEL

AMSDORF, NICHOLAS VON (1483-1565). German Reformer. Born at Torgau near Leipzig, he began his education at Leipzig (1500), then was one of the first students at Wittenberg (1502). There he came under the influence of Luther and became his close friend and ardent defender. Lecturer in theology, philosophy, and canon at Wittenberg from 1508 and professor from 1511, he accompanied Luther to the Disputation at Leipzig in 1519 and to Worms in 1521. He was ordained in 1524 and became pastor and superintendent at Magdeburg, where he introduced the Reformation along the lines established under Luther in Wittenberg. He helped to reform Goslar (1531) and Einbeck (1534). In 1539 he disagreed with Luther's advice on the bigamous marriage of Philip Landgrave of Hesse. He attended the Regensburg Conference in 1541 and allegedly was partly responsible for its failure, his position being described as "fearless as it was narrow." John Frederick I, elector of Saxony, over the objections of the chapter but with the support of Luther, placed Amsdorf in the position of Lutheran bishop in Naumberg-Zeitz in 1542. After the Protestant defeat at Muhlberg in 1547, Amsdorf went to Magdeburg where he was a counselor to the dukes of Eisenbach.

Much of Amsdorf's life was spent in acrimonious theological disputation. Among others, he wrote against Melanchthon, Bucer, Melchior Hoffman, George Major, the Zwinglians, and anyone he considered outside the pale of pure Lutheran doctrine. This was apparently part of his motivation for founding Jena University, the calling of Matthias Flacius* to teach and assist him there, and the issuance of the Jena edition of Luther's works. He was sure the Wittenberg edition was full of error. During the Synergist controversy (see SYNERGISM) his contentiousness carried him to the extreme of arguing that good works were not only useless but harmful. This was criticized in the Formula of Concord.* Many of the letters and works of Amsdorf survive. When Flacius and his followers were forced out of Jena, Amsdorf was allowed to stay due to his advanced age and former association with Luther.

AMSTERDAM ASSEMBLY. Following the Oxford Conference* of 1937 it was decided to set up a committee to plan to inaugurate a World Council of Churches which would carry on the interests of both the Life and Work and the Faith and Order conferences. World War II prevented any early realization of this plan, although member churches had approved the formation of such a council, and a provisional committee existed. Fears that the ecumenical movement might be hindered by the war guilt question were dispelled by the German delegation's acceptance of this with the Stuttgart declaration.

In 1948 the long-postponed assembly met at Amsterdam, and on 23 August the WCC came into being. The basis was: "The World Council of Churches is a Fellowship of churches which accept our Lord Jesus Christ as God and Saviour." As before, it was stressed that the WCC was not a superchurch and that its pronouncements would carry no external authority but only "the weight it carries with the churches by its wisdom." The conference was attended by 351 delegates from 147 churches. The Roman Catholic Church was invited, but permission was not given by that communion for any to attend. The Orthodox were only partly represented. Although representation from the younger churches would by modern standards be considered poor, it was considerably more than at any previous conference. The conference was still, like its predecessors, overwhelmingly Western in outlook. Amsterdam was a landmark in that the churches accepted responsibility as churches for the ecumenical movement, and vice versa the ecumenical movement became more fully rooted in the participating churches.

AMYRALDISM. The doctrine that God wills all men to be saved, on condition that they believe. Expressed by Moses Amyrald (1596-1664), a French Protestant pastor, the doctrine was designed to be Calvinistic rather than Arminian and to provide the basis for conciliation between Reformed and Lutheran theology. Agreeing with Calvin on the absolute sovereignty of God, expressed in history through the realization of God's sovereign purpose, Amyrald affirmed that individual redemption and the establishment of the kingdom of God were wholly divine prerogatives and could in no case be either accidental or contingent. Nevertheless, he found scriptural warrant for a universalism in the divine decree to salvation, averring that God wills all men to be saved.

But this universalism in the system of Amyrald does not issue in the actual salvation of all men—by virtue of the corresponding universalism of man's sinfulness. The commonness of man's sin has destroyed the true purpose and end of life provided by God through His providence, in accordance with His love. Hence the universalism is seen to be purely ideal or hypothetical. Yet, though man's sin is universally corruptive, God's goodness remains infinite, expressing itself to all persons and throughout all history, since His desire to save remains forever unabated. This means that the salvation of individual persons is quite unaffected by the ideal universalism explicit in the system. The result is a combination of ideal universalism and of actual particularism.

Though it had a wide following during the latter half of the seventeenth century, Amyraldism was much opposed, especially by French and Swiss scholars. The opponents of the scholastic Calvinists were in no way satisfied by the Amyrald interpretation, arguing that the universalism, being only hypothetical, to no degree mitigated the absolute predestinarianism of Calvinism. The purer Calvinists tended to look upon Amyraldism as an inconsequential, even misleading, addendum to the Institutes, creating, rather than resolving, problems relating to the basis of salvation: God wills all to be saved, but man's sin prevents any from being saved. The view, however, may be more in keeping with Calvin's own theology than with that of his scholastic interpreters.

ANABAPTISTS. These groups, variously called the radicals or left wing of the Reformation, agreed in denouncing the baptism of infants. They held that only those who were old enough to understand the meaning of faith and repentance should be baptized. The majority of Christians regarded the baptism of infants as a most important Christian ordinance and as initiation into a state church. Generally the Anabaptists showed a deep moral earnestness, insisting on the primacy of Scripture and the separation of church and state. Some were millennialists, and others were pacifists and distrusted the state. They believed in a pure believers' church and strict church discipline.

The most biblical Anabaptism appeared and flourished in Switzerland, where it developed in Zurich in the time of Zwingli under the leadership of Conrad Grebel* and Felix Manz*; south Germany, where Balthasar Hubmaier and Hans Denck* were the leaders; Moravia, where the Hutterites* were located; and the Netherlands and N Germany, where the Mennonite* movement grew. The movement began in 1523 in Zurich, where the Reformation caused the questioning of traditional values including the rite of baptism. Grebel and Manz preached and baptized adults in the Zurich area. Their success brought both converts and official persecution in 1526. Manz was drowned, and many of his followers and fellow preachers were exiled. Those who remained in Switzerland went underground, where the movement continued until the seventeenth century. Anabaptists who left this area spread the movement into S Germany and Moravia.

Strasbourg became the center for Anabaptism in Germany from 1527 until the establishment of the Magisterial Church. In 1533 both Capito and Bucer, leading reformers of that city, upset by the separatist tendencies of the Anabaptists, agreed in opposing them. Melchior Hoffman was another Anabaptist preacher who lived for a time in S Germany. His preaching bore little fruit in Strasbourg, but it led in Münster to the Anabaptists' gaining control. A man named John Matthys became leader, claiming that he was Enoch who should prepare the way for Christ by establishing the community of goods and doing away with all law codes. Many hundreds in the city were baptized, and "the ungodly" who would not submit to rebaptism had to flee or be slaughtered. Despite a siege and the death of Matthys, the Münsterites held out for more than a year before the defense collapsed; there followed the slaughter and torture of the defenders. This episode discredited the Anabaptist movement, and a wave of persecution swept the Low Countries. Tens of thousands of Dutch Anabaptists died during the sixteenth century, but from this persecution emerged the Mennonites.

The Anabaptists developed along with the Magisterial Reformation, but rejecting some of the important features of this reform, such as infant baptism and the state church, they became prophetic of free church life in our own time, and ancestors of the Baptists, Mennonites, and Schwenkfelders.* The Left Wing Reformation upheld the need for toleration and sealed this testimony with blood.

ROBERT G. CLOUSE

ANACLETUS (Gr. anegklētos, "blameless"). According to tradition the third bishop of Rome, following Linus (64-76) and preceding Clement (88-96). Anacletus or Anencletus is to be identified with Cletus, although the Liberian Catalogue assumes that Anencletus and Cletus were different persons. The ascription of twelve years to his office and that of Linus may indicate that tradition was anxious to provide a link between Peter (d. 64) and Clement of Rome. It is unfortunate for this theory that no trace of monepiscopacy can be found in Rome until the middle of the second century.

ANAPHORA (Gr. = "offering"). The central prayer in the Eucharist, containing the Consecration, the Anamnesis, and the Communion. The traditional order is Sursum Corda, Sanctus, Memorial of the Incarnation, Words of Institution, Epiclesis, and sometimes an Intercession.

ANASTASIA. (1) Daughter of Constantius Chlorus (293-306), father of the sole emperor, Constantine. Her name, based on the Greek for "resurrection," is paralleled elsewhere in the late third century only among Jews and Christians, and therefore she is regarded generally as evidence of Christian influence within the home of Constantius.

(2) The name given to an oratory by Gregory of Nazianzus after his translation to the see of Constantinople in 379, to mark the resurrection of the Nicene faith after the supremacy of Arianism from 360 onwards.

(3) A fourth-century saint apparently martyred at Sirmium in Pannonia. G.T.D. ANGEL

ANASTASIUS BIBLIOTHECARIUS (c.810-c.880). Antipope. Family connections and a knowledge of Greek learned from Greek monks resident in Italy helped his early promotion to cardinal-priest by about 847. Unexplained events led to his excommunication (850), anathematization, and deposition (853). In 855 Benedict III was elected pope, but a rival group chose Anastasius, who captured the Lateran Palace and Benedict himself. The imperial legate mediated in favor of Benedict, who forgave Anastasius, and henceforward the latter remained a loyal and influential official. Abbot of Santa Maria, Trastevere (858-67), he then became papal librarian (hence "Bibliothecarius"). In 868 a cousin murdered Pope Adrian II's daughter and her mother; this was a temporary setback to Anastasius's fortunes, but by 869 he was back in papal favor and acting unsuccessfully as Louis II's negotiator in Constantinople for a marriage between his daughter Ermengard and the Eastern emperor Basil I's son. In Constantinople Anastasius successfully championed the papal claims of supremacy at the Eighth Ecumenical Council (Fourth Council of Constantinople, 869-70) which upheld Nicholas I's deposition of the Byzantine Patriarch Photius* and condemned his heretical teachings. Later Anastasius translated into Latin the Acts of this council and of the Seventh Council at Nicea (787). He also wrote a number of saints' lives, the Chronographia Tripartita (derived from Byzantine chronicles), and translated many Greek religious works. L. FEEHAN

ANATHEMA. The Hellenistic Greek word means literally "something set up" or "placed" for a divinity. Both this and the rather stronger classical Greek form were originally used of a votive offering (cf. Luke 21:5). In the LXX the word anathema corresponds to the Hebrew term "consecrated (to God") or "accursed." Becoming anathema in the OT period could involve extermination (Deut. 7:1f., etc.). The NT use of the word implies exclusion, being banned, rather than complete extinction (Rom. 9:3; 1 Cor. 16:22, lect. vid.; Gal. 1:8f.; cf. 1 Cor. 12:3; Acts 23:14). The early church extended the biblical meaning (see A.F. Walls, NBD, p.35) to make it synonymous with excommunication. The earliest example of anathematizing beyond the NT occurs in the legislation of the Council of Elvira.* Normally the conciliar anathema was invoked against heresy (cf. the twelve anti-Nestorian anathemas of Cyril of Alexandria*). From the sixth century onward, anathematizing (as complete banning from the church) is distinguished from excommunication (as exclusion from worship and the sacraments).

See also EXCOMMUNICATION.

ANATOLIUS (d.458). Bishop of Constantinople. In November 449, through the Monophysite* sympathies of Dioscorus of Alexandria and ambition for his see's primacy in the East, Flavian was deposed from the see of Constantinople. His successor, Anatolius, an Alexandrian apocrisiarius at Constantinople, was consecrated probably early in 450. Pressure from Pope Leo and the emperor Marcian in May 451 made Anatolius accept the Tome. At Chalcedon (451) he denied that Dioscorus had been deposed for heresy, and he headed a committee which drew up a pro-Cyrilline Definitio. This Leo rejected, also refusing later to recognize canons secured by Anatolius reaffirming the primacy of Constantinople in the East and securing rights of jurisdiction and consecration over neighboring metropolitans. In February 457 Anatolius was the first Christian bishop to crown a Christian monarch, Emperor Leo I. Shortly before his death, Anatolius raised clerical support at Constantinople for the Chalcedonian party against the violent Monophysite Timothy Aelurus who had usurped the see of Alexandria.

ANCHORITE; ANCHORESS. A person who becomes a hermit in order to triumph over the flesh by prayer, contemplation, and mortification. Such a way of life became respected with the great escape to solitude of the fourth and fifth centuries. Gradually the solitary asceticism of Antony developed into the organized monasticism of Pachomius and Basil of Caesarea. Though technically the term "anchorite" could be applied to the monk who had withdrawn from society, it became more precisely used of those who lived as hermits —usually after a period of probation in a monastery. Some, especially in Syria, and most notoriously Simeon the Stylite,* engaged in amazing acts of asceticism in their anchorite existence. As a way of life it was generally considered superior to monasticism. The word is not now quite synonymous with "hermit" and is used of those who live in very confined quarters. C. PETER WILLIAMS

ANCYRA (modern Ankara). Capital of the Roman province of Galatia, prominent ecclesiastically from the second century, and scene of important councils:

(1) In 314, after the Great Persecution, a synod of between twelve and eighteen bishops widely representative of Syria and Asia Minor promulgated canons apportioning penalties to the different categories of the lapsed, and regulating sundry ecclesiastical cases, mainly clerical, and standard penitential discipline. Canon 13 seems to allow presbyters to ordain, an interpretation perhaps unknown to antiquity. These canons have special significance in the elaboration of canonical penance, and as the earliest canons of a provincial synod included in the universal code of canons. The council which met at Nicea in 325 was originally planned for Ancyra. Constantine changed its venue.

(2) In 358 Basil of Ancyra presided over a synod of twelve bishops acknowledged as voicing conservative Eastern opinion, misleadingly called semi-Arians, more accurately Homoiousions,* and even deserving the description semi-Nicenes, since their deliberations marked an advance in theological reconstruction in reaction against the extreme Arianism of the "Blasphemy" of Sirmium and the Anomoeans like Aetius and Eudoxius. Their synodal letter and nineteen anathemas still rejected Nicea's homoousios ("of one substance") but declared the Son to be "like in essence" (equivalent to homoiousios) to the Father. Hilary of Poitiers and Athanasius welcomed this development and sought to overcome the unhappiness with homoousios.

(3) An Arian synod in 375 deposed several bishops, including Gregory of Nyssa, who had earlier convened synods at Ancyra to support the endeavors of his brother Basil. D.F. WRIGHT

ANDERSON, SIR ROBERT (1841-1918). Lay theologian and Bible teacher. He was a barrister in Dublin and London, adviser to the British Home Office in matters relating to political crime (1868-88), and then assistant police commissioner for the metropolis and head of the criminal investigation department, Scotland Yard (1888-1901). A Presbyterian layman, he was active as a speaker and writer; his work centered principally on apologetics and Bible prophecy (i.e., eschatology). A leading popularizer of the dispensational* interpretation of Scripture, he taught that there was a radical distinction between the Pauline gospel (the gospel for the church) and the gospel of the kingdom (the gospel given to the apostles as a message for Jews), between the authority for the church of the Pauline letters and the rest of the Bible. His books, which were very popular, include The Gospel and Its Ministries (1876); The Coming Prince (1882); The Silence of God (1897); The Bible and Modern Criticism (1902); and Christianized Rationalism and the Higher Criticism. W. WARD GASQUE

ANDOVER CONTROVERSY. The debate over the doctrine of "future probation" involving the faculty of Andover Theological Seminary from about 1886 until 1893. The seminary had been established by New England Congregationalists in 1808 to counter the Unitarian tendencies of Harvard. Attempting to preserve Andover's orthodoxy, the founders required faculty subscription to the Andover Creed, summarizing Edwardsean theology restated by Samuel Hopkins.* After the Civil War, however, faculty members joined other New England progressives in restating their faith along the lines of the liberal emphasis upon the immanence of God, emerging biblical criticism, and the doctrine of progress. Future probation developed when the Andover men applied the "new theology" to missions. In a series of articles in the Andover Review, E.C. Smyth and colleagues argued that heathen who die without knowledge of the Gospel will have an opportunity in the future life either to accept or to reject the Gospel before facing final judgment. In 1887 Smyth was deprived of his chair, but in 1891 his dismissal was voided by the Supreme Court of Massachusetts. BRUCE L. SHELLEY

ANDREAE, JAMES (1528-1590). Lutheran scholar. Born in Weiblingen, Württemberg, he studied in Stuttgart and Tübingen, and in 1546 became pastor in Stuttgart but was deposed for his refusal to subscribe to the Interim (1548). He then went to Tübingen as pastor. In 1553 he became successively pastor and superintendent at Göttingen. He was appointed professor in 1561 and later chancellor of the University of Tübingen. Between 1567 and 1580 he was adviser to the elector August of Saxony. He participated in many of the religious colloquies of the time, among them the conference with Farel and Beza in 1557. He sided with Joachim Westphal against John Calvin in the controversy regarding the Lord's Supper. Andreae probably prepared the Strasbourg Formula of Concord (1563). Besides his reformatory activities, his work was focused on reconciling the Lutheran factions. With men like John Brenz, Martin Chemnitz, and David Chrytaeus, he belonged to the center party, between the Gnesio-Lutherans and the Philippists. His Six Sermons (1572) treated the points in controversy: original sin, justification and good works, free will, the Lord's Supper, adiaphora, predestination, and the person of Christ. He drafted the Swabian Concordia. He favored the Maulbronn Formula and was responsible in part for the Torgau Book and the Bergic Book, together with Chemnitz and Selneccer. He is the editor of the official German edition of the Book of Concord, published on June 25, 1580. His works run to over 200 titles. CARL S. MEYER

ANDREAE, JOHANN VALENTIN (1586-1654). Lutheran theologian, grandson of James Andreae.* Born at Herrenberg, he studied at Tübingen University, but was dismissed in 1607. During his subsequent journeyings he gained some sympathy for the Calvinistic churches. In 1614 he was ordained deacon in Veihingen and six years later was appointed superintendent minister in Calw. Here he showed courage in the ravages of the Thirty Years' War. In 1639 he went to Stuttgart as a court chaplain and was also a member of the consistorial court. By 1650 he was general superintendent and abbot of Bebenhausen. In 1654 he was appointed abbot of Adelberg; here he sought to reorganize and help the churches in Württemberg. When the storms of theological controversy raged around him, he took an irenic stance and hopefully wrote of a form of utopian state based on the example of Geneva—see his Rei publicae Christianopolitanae descriptio (1619). He died at Stuttgart. PETER TOON

ANDREW. Apostle. The brother of Simon Peter, he was a native of Bethsaida, but carried on business as a fisherman at Capernaum. He became a disciple of John the Baptist, who directed his attention to Jesus as the Lamb of God (John 1:29). When later Jesus called several disciples to follow Him, Andrew was among the first to do so. It was he who introduced his brother Simon to Jesus and was later responsible for directing some Greek inquirers (John 12:21,22). He was of a practical turn of mind, as is seen from John 6:8,9 on the occasion of the feeding of the five thousand. His name appears in all the lists of the twelve apostles. Nothing is known of his contribution to the developing church, but the many apocryphal works which were later ascribed to him testify to the respected place he held in popular tradition even of an unorthodox kind. DONALD GUTHRIE

ANDREW OF CRETE (c.660-740). Theologian and hymnwriter. Born at Damascus, he became a monk at Jerusalem. Attending the Council of Constantinople in 680, he was ordained deacon of Hagia Sophia and became warden of the orphanage. Appointed archbishop of Gortyna, Crete, in 692, he participated in the Monothelite Synod of Constantinople in 712, but in 713 recanted his Monothelitism.* He was later involved in the Iconoclastic Controversy.* He helped to introduce in Constantinople the liturgy of Jerusalem, based upon the Rule of St. Sabas and favoring hymn-singing. He composed the "Great Canon," containing 250 stanzas, and many other canons and hymns. J.G.G. NORMAN

ANDREW OF LONGJUMEAU (d.1270). French Dominican missionary. Born at Longjumeau (Lonjumel), he spent much of his life in the East as a missionary. In 1238 Louis IX of France sent him to Constantinople to collect a relic, the Crown of Thorns, which the Latin emperor Baldwin II had given to Louis in return for help and money. Before Andrew's arrival, debt forced Baldwin II to sell the crown to the Venetians. Andrew was thus obliged to take the relic first to Venice, where a high price was wanted for it, before he could take it to France. In 1245 Innocent IV sent him to the Holy Land to heal a reported schism there. Between 1248 and 1252 he accompanied Louis IX's ill-fated Crusade to Egypt, and he also visited the Great Khan, who rumor wrongly alleged had become a Christian. L. FEEHAN

ANDREWES, LANCELOT (1555-1626). Bishop of Winchester. Born in London and educated at Pembroke Hall, Cambridge, he was in 1576 elected fellow of his college and on his ordination in 1580 was appointed catechist. At the beginning of his academic career he held views similar to those of the predominant Puritanism of the Cambridge of his day. During the 1580s, while the struggle with the Puritans was at its height, Andrewes sided with the episcopal leaders of the Church of England. He became chaplain to both Queen Elizabeth and Archbishop Whitgift about 1587, and this led to his appointment as master of Pembroke Hall and other appointments in London in 1589. His opposition to Whitgift's Lambeth Articles* of 1595 showed that he was starting to oppose Calvinism in the Church of England.

His considerable reputation as a preacher in a new and ornate style brought him episcopal office under James I. He became bishop of Chichester in 1605, of Ely in 1609, and of Winchester in 1619. He was responsible for the Pentateuch and the historical books of the Old Testament in the Authorized Version of 1611. He was taken by James to Scotland to help enforce his policy of episcopal church government in that country in 1617. While William Laud* regarded Andrewes as his master, he should be linked with his friends Richard Hooker and George Herbert. Andrewes held a strong view of episcopacy, but was unwilling to unchurch continental churches which had lost the episcopate. Though he favored a more ordered ceremonial in his private chapel, he did not try to enforce these ideas in his dioceses. He is famous for his book of private devotions, the Preces Privatae, which was published posthumously in 1648. His reputation for saintliness has somewhat overshadowed his activities as a court ecclesiastic. NOEL S. POLLARD

ANDREWS, CHARLES FREER (1871-1940). Missionary to India and friend of the oppressed. Brought up in the Catholic Apostolic Church* (Irvingites) of which his father was a minister, he went to Cambridge after an intense conversion experience and subsequently joined the Church of England. In 1904 he went to the Cambridge Mission in Delhi. The Indian people he found very congenial, and his many friends included Sadhu Sundar Singh,* whose biography he wrote. Over the years, Andrews's doubts about the Athanasian Creed made him unhappy about his Anglican orders. He was helped greatly by Albert Schweitzer's* writings. In 1913 he went to South Africa to help Indian laborers who were being penalized by the notorious indenture system, and there he met Gandhi, who became a firm friend. Returning to India, Andrews left the Anglican Mission and joined Rabindranath Tagore at his ashram at Santiniketan. The Bengali poet's words might well be applied to Andrews, whose life was given to the service of "the poorest, the lowliest, and the lost." J.G.G. NORMAN

ANGEL. By derivation the term means "messenger," from God manward. Judaism and Christianity have full angelologies, like their corrupt syncretistic derivative, Islam. Biblical angels are created, higher than unfallen man, spiritual, incorporeal, rational, moral, immortal, all originally good and perfectible. Satan with his hosts revolted through vainglorious pride, desiring equality with God (Isa. 14:12-15; Ezek. 28:12-17; 2 Pet. 2:4; Jude 6), and became the implacable foe of God and man, seducer and accuser of the brethren, yet restricted by the permissive will of God. Familiar throughout the OT, angels gain firmer contour in exilic and later prophets, and in the Apocrypha, Pseudepigrapha, and rabbinical sources.

The NT references speak of angels as primarily created for the ceaseless praise of Father and Son in heavenly surroundings (Heb. 1:6; Rev. 5:11ff.), but the subsequent creation and sin of man gave them commissions on earth. Guardian angels are popularly attributed both to individuals (Matt. 18:10; Acts 12:15) and to nations (cf. Dan. 10:13), though this should perhaps be interpreted broadly and not in exclusive or individualistic terms.

The six-winged seraphim are probably of the highest angelic order, the four-winged cherubim perhaps of slightly lesser rank. Other titles used in Scripture include: watchers, holy ones, princes, thrones, dominions, principalities, powers, morning stars; also the "living creatures" of Revelation 4:6-8. Scriptural authority for hierarchical detail is minimal.

The Roman Catholic doctrine of angels is dubiously indebted to the Greek writings of Dionysius the Pseudo-Areopagite, through the Latin rendering of John Erigena. This totally unscriptural elaboration has prompted widespread abuse. The Council of Trent* taught that angels intercede for men and that "it is good and profitable to invoke them suppliantly . . . for the purpose of obtaining benefits from God through His Son Jesus Christ."

Orthodox Protestant views are copiously quoted in Heppe, Reformed Dogmatics, pp. 201-219: these follow familiar biblical lines. While angels are incorporeal and immortal, they were originally created ex nihilo and therefore lack true eternity, the prerogative of deity, which has to be retrospective as well as anticipatory. Though finite and therefore limited spirits, they possess powers far outstripping those of man, with knowledge based on "nature, use and revelation."

ANGELA MERICI (1474-1540). Foundress of the Order of Ursulines.* A tertiary* of St. Francis, she began religious schools for girls in her native Desenzano and at Brescia. In 1524 she was a pilgrim to the Holy Land, becoming blind at Crete but cured there on her return. In 1525 Clement VII unsuccessfully invited her to establish her work in Rome. In 1535 she founded the Order of Ursulines at Brescia, having had a vision of such in 1506, and she was superior until her death. The order existed to combat immorality and to train wives and mothers in the faith. With no formal vows, the sisters lived outside to exercise their apostolate widely. Angela wrote a Testament, Counsels, and the order's Rule. She was canonized in 1807. C.G. THORNE, JR.

ANGELA OF FOLIGNO (c.1248-1309). Umbrian mystic. Born into a wealthy family at Foligno, she spent most of her life there. She married and, when nearly forty, underwent sudden conversion and became a Franciscan tertiary.* After the death of her husband and children she lived an austere, cloistered life surrounded by disciples. It is recorded that she received frequent visions, which she dictated later to her confessor Arnold and circulated eventually as Liber Visionum et Instructionum. She analyzed the "twenty steps of penitence" by which she was initiated into the mystical life, culminating in a vision of herself in God. She was beatified by Innocent XII in 1693.

ANGELICO, FRA (1387-1455). Florentine painter. Known also as Giovanni da Fiesola or Guido di Pietro, he entered when twenty the Dominican monastery at Fiesola. Between 1409 and 1418 the Great Schism forced him to go first to Foligno and then to Cortona, where some of his greatest paintings are to be found. He decorated the convent of San Marco in Florence and did frescoes in two chapels in the Vatican. It is not known where or when Angelico began his training as a painter, but his early work (1418-30) shows a close relationship to international Gothic style. Examples of this type of painting include his Coronation of the Virgin and The Last Judgment. His later work is characterized by Renaissance realism with the use of more natural backgrounds rather than an abstract gold setting. His works of this period, including Deposition from the Cross and the Crucifixion and other scenes from Christ's life, decorate the convent of San Marco. ROBERT G. CLOUSE

ANGELUS. The practice in the Roman Catholic Church of reciting, at morning, noon, and evening, three "Hail Marys" together with versicles and responses, and a collect of the Annunciation. It is intended as a continual reminder of the Incarnation. Warning of the observance is given at the appropriate hours by the ringing of the Angelus bell. It is rung three times for each "Ave" and nine times for the collect. The name of the rite is derived from the first word of the opening versicle: "Angelus Domini nuntiavet Mariae." Different words are used, however, at Eastertide. The practice of the Angelus was begun in Italy during the thirteenth century and did not spread into general use until after the Reformation.

ANGLICAN COMMUNION. It is not possible to give an exact date at which the Anglican Communion came into being. The Anglican churches of England, Scotland, Ireland, and Wales certainly formed the original provinces, to which was added in 1789 the Protestant Episcopal Church of the USA. Thereafter, chiefly through the pioneering work of the Church of England's missionary societies and their later counterparts in North America and Australasia, the structure developed until in 1971 there were some 365 dioceses. These are mainly to be found in countries which were, and in many cases still are, parts of the British Commonwealth, though China, Japan, and Brazil are notable exceptions.

It is also difficult to define precisely what constitutes a sufficient qualification for membership in the Anglican Communion. The 1930 Lambeth Conference adopted a descriptive resolution which set out its understanding of the situation thus: "The Anglican Communion is a fellowship, within the one Holy Catholic and Apostolic Church, of those duly constituted dioceses, provinces or regional Churches in communion with the See of Canterbury, which have the following characteristics in common: (a) They uphold and propagate the catholic and apostolic faith and order as they are generally set forth in the Book of Common Prayer as authorised in their several Churches; (b) They are particular or national Churches, and, as such, promote within each of their territories a national expression of Christian faith, life and worship; (c) They are bound together not by a central legislative and executive authority, but by mutual loyalty sustained through the common council of the bishops in conference."

This became the classical statement, but is misleading not least with regard to the reference to the Book of Common Prayer, since this is no longer the touchstone to which modern Anglican liturgies are brought when revisions are taking place. Nevertheless, the above definition was sufficiently flexible to allow for the very considerable range of opinion, theology, and liturgical practice which has marked the Anglican churches during the nineteenth and twentieth centuries. In large measure the "color" of the originating missionary organizations determined the practice of the dioceses which emerged. Some provinces (for example, South Africa) were almost monochrome in their Anglo-Catholicism; others (such as Kenya) were marked by their evangelicalism. In West Africa, where the four former British Crown Colonies of Nigeria, the Gold Coast, Sierra Leone, and the Gambia were associated with different missionary societies, a province ultimately came into being with traditionally Catholic churches in Ghana and the Gambia, and traditionally evangelical churches in Nigeria and Sierra Leone. Between 1945 and 1970 it became evident that the various traditions were slowly modifying, at least at episcopal level, due to the increasing contacts which were developing on a worldwide scale.

The focal point of the Anglican Communion since 1867 has been the succession of Lambeth Conferences* which in a consultative capacity guided and interpreted Anglican thinking. Lacking any formal constitution, their resolutions carry no mandatory power within the various provinces, but their influence cannot be denied; at times it has virtually determined Anglican policy (for example, the Lambeth Quadrilateral of 1888, in which Scripture, the two Creeds, the dominical Sacraments, and the Historic Episcopate were laid down as the basis of reunion for churches within the Anglican family). Some indication of growth is to be seen in the increase in the number of bishops attending Lambeth Conferences—from 70 in 1867 to 310 in 1958. By tradition the conference is chaired by the archbishop of Canterbury, but this office is one of honor and carries no legal rights vis à vis provinces outside Canterbury.

During the twentieth century three Pan-Anglican Congresses were held (London, 1908; Minneapolis, 1954; Toronto, 1963), at which both clerical and lay representatives were present, but the 1968 Lambeth Conference recommended that these should be discontinued. As a result of the 1958 Lambeth Conference, the post of Anglican Executive Officer was created. His task was to be that of informing and coordinating the various provinces in order to avoid duplication and waste. Three bishops (Stephen Bayne, Jr., Ralph Dean, and John Howe) successively held the office between 1959 and 1971, in which latter year the title was changed to that of Secretary General to the Anglican Consultative Council, a body set up at the request of the 1968 Lambeth Conference to supersede the Lambeth Consultative Body and Advisory Council on Missionary Strategy, which were composed entirely of primates and other archbishops and metropolitans.

The council held its first meeting at Limuru, Kenya, in 1971 and meets on alternate years. It has a membership of fifty-five, drawn from all the Anglican provinces. Each province sends two representatives—one bishop and one clergyman or layman; the larger churches (Australia, Canada, England, and the United States of America) have a representation of three—one bishop, one clergyman, one layman. The council has an advisory function.

The developments which have taken place in ecumenical relationships since 1947, and which have led in some places to united churches and in others to reunion schemes yet unfulfilled, have posed obvious questions about the future of the Anglican Communion in general and its relationship with united churches in particular. This has led to a continuous reconsideration by the Anglican churches of their standing in relation to such united and uniting bodies.

In 1966 an Anglican Centre was set up in Rome to facilitate better understanding between the Anglican churches, the Roman Catholic Church, and others; this action was endorsed by the 1968 Lambeth Conference which also called for the Anglican presence in Geneva to be strengthened.

The Anglican Communion grew out of the work of mission. Since the Toronto Congress of 1963 it has made a special effort to integrate the worldwide mission of the Anglican churches through the implementation of a document entitled "Mutual Responsibility and Interdependence in the Body of Christ." Certain aspects of this scheme have received widespread criticism, and its operation has not been universally successful.

ANGLO-SAXON CHURCH. Christianity had existed in Britain as early as A.D. 156, but the fourth- and fifth-century pagan Anglo-Saxon invasions drove the Britons, and with them Christianity, into ever-diminishing enclaves. Through hatred of the Anglo-Saxons, the Britons refused to bring them the consolation of Christianity. Their conversion finally came through two main channels, of which the more famous one was launched by Gregory the Great who sent Augustine of Canterbury* with forty monks to England. Augustine landed in Kent in 597 and its king, Ethelbert, gave him land and a disused church at Canterbury. This is the historical origin of Canterbury's subsequent claims to primacy in the English Church. Much of N England was converted from Ireland and Scotland by missionaries of the Celtic Church.* The conversion of Anglo-Saxon England was a slow process; paganism was never very far below the surface. Famine or natural disaster might see a kingdom relapse into paganism; kings relapsed as a result of personal quarrels with the church, and the ninth- and tenth-century pagan Scandinavian invasions ensured that paganism remained a problem up to and beyond 1066.

By the eleventh century a parish system had developed, and there were sixteen often large and unwieldy dioceses, some of which were coterminous with the boundaries of ancient Anglo-Saxon folk-groups and kingdoms. Kings and nobles played a great part in the affairs of the Anglo-Saxon Church. Missionaries always tried to convert and gain the support of the king first of all. A converted king would order his subjects to accept baptism—however tenuous their subsequent level of belief and understanding. Royal protection was very necessary when evangelizing in pagan areas. Grateful kings and nobles gave rich gifts of land and buildings to the church. In return, the kings expected and usually got the support of the church, which preached loyalty to the king and placed religious sanctions on those who disobeyed or plotted against the kings and generally buttressed law and order. The church assumed responsibility for the Ordeal.* Kings naturally assumed that they could appoint their nominees as bishops and abbots. Similarly, nobles who founded local parish churches or monasteries claimed the right to appoint. The church had a civilizing effect upon the Anglo-Saxons, and it gradually replaced the anarchic private wars of the blood feud by a wergild, or money compensation, and it brought literate government. The Celtic and Roman churches brought a fusion of two outstanding cultural traditions which continued right up to the Norman conquest, despite the turbulence of the Scandinavian invasions.

Monasticism was very popular, though apparently monasteries and nunneries admitted only nobility. The Scandinavian invasions supposedly caused a deterioration in monasticism, but informed critics claim that wealth and idleness were the main culprits in the eighth and ninth centuries. As it became institutionalized, the church had become also very wealthy, and some like Bede looked back nostalgically to the pioneer days of the early conversion as a "golden age." There was a monastic revival in the tenth century, Dunstan and Aethelwold being the key figures, and it lasted into the eleventh century when books produced in English monasteries were in demand throughout the Continent. Subsequent Norman allegations of the eleventh-century church's corruption were largely propaganda and generally unfair.

ANNA COMNENA (1083-after 1148). Byzantine historian. Eldest daughter of Emperor Alexius Comnenus, she sought to commemorate "with truth dear and sacred" the excellences of her father's reign in the Alexiad. He had saved the empire against hostile tribes, participated in the First Crusade (he later became antagonistic toward it as a threat to his rule), and was zealous in persecuting the Bogomiles.* Aided by her mother, Empress Irene, Anna sought in vain to persuade her father during his last illness to appoint her husband, Nicephorus Bryennius, his successor in place of her brother John. Failing in a conspiracy to overthrow her brother, she was retired in 1118 to a convent where she used her considerable literary skill in eulogizing the exploits of her father's reign. The Alexiad is an ex parte and uncritical statement of the Byzantine conception of government and the religious and intellectual outlook of the period.

ANNATES (Lat. annatae from annus, "year"). The first year's revenue of an ecclesiastical benefice paid to the pope. Originating in a bishop's right to the first year's profits of the living from a newly inducted incumbent, first mentioned in the thirteenth century, popes under financial stress later claimed the privilege for themselves, temporarily at first. Thus Clement V in 1305 claimed them from all vacant benefices in England, and John XXII in 1319 from all Christendom. Protests became frequent, e.g., from England at the Council of Lyons in 1245. Henry VIII transferred the English annates to the Crown in 1534, and these were in 1704 converted into "Queen Anne's Bounty." With the gradual transformation of the system of benefices, annates as such fell into disuse. J.G.G. NORMAN

ANNE (1665-1714). Queen of Great Britain and Ireland from 1702. Second daughter of James II, she was brought up as a Protestant member of the Church of England and was married in 1683 to the Lutheran Prince George of Denmark. She differed from her family, who adopted Roman Catholicism. Under the influence of Sarah Churchill (later the duchess of Marlborough) she did not follow her family into exile in 1689. As a result she succeeded William III to the throne in 1702. Anne supported the High Church party in the Church of England. Her appointments to the episcopal bench replaced Latitudinarians with High Church bishops. By 1710 her ecclesiastical policy led to the overthrow of the Whig party in the state, of which the fall of Marlborough was a sign. The creation of "Queen Anne's Bounty" was typical of her great loyalty to the Church of England. The reverse side of this loyalty appeared in the growing intolerance shown to the Dissenters during the short-lived supremacy of the Tories in the last years of her reign. The brevity of her support of the High Church party and her failure to produce an heir meant that her policy died with her. NOEL S. POLLARD

ANNIHILATIONISM, see CONDITIONAL IMMORTALITY

ANNO DOMINI. Meaning "in the year of the Lord," this anchors the modern Gregorian calendar to the calculation of the birth of Christ made in 527 by Dionysius Exiguus. NT exegesis cannot confirm the calculation; Matt. 2:19 sets the Nativity before Herod the Great died (4 B.C.). Some interpreters of Luke 2:3 associate it with the Augustan census of Quirinius in A.D. 6-7.

ANNUNCIATION. The account given in Luke 1:26-38 of the visit of the angel Gabriel to Mary to tell her that she was to be the mother of the Messiah. The message is largely cast in terms of one who is to bring to true fulfillment the promises made to David. In reply to the hesitation of Mary, the angel makes clear that the conception will take place through the Holy Spirit without the agency of a human father and that the child will be the Son of God. Mary's attitude of wondering and willing submission is in contrast to that of Zechariah when the coming birth of John was announced to him (Luke 1:8-23). In Matthew's gospel there is no record of the annunciation to Mary, but Joseph is told by an angel in a dream what has happened.

The Feast of the Annunciation has been observed from early times. It is dated March 25 (sometimes known as Lady Day), as that comes nine months before the date chosen for the observance of Christmas. At one time it was observed on April 6 (nine months before the Epiphany, which celebrated the birth of Christ in the East).

ANOINTING. The application of oil (or similar substance) as a religious ceremony. In the OT, objects thus anointed included battleshields, sacred rocks, and tabernacle appurtenances, using unguents sternly forbidden elsewhere. Kings, priests, and prophets were solemnly anointed in God's name and presumed thereby to receive the Spirit. The enormity of slaying, even by command, the Lord's anointed remained. Symbolically, anointing is every believer's portion. Messiah is the Anointed One par excellence. In both Testaments, anointing symbolizes outpoured Spirit; experience remains potential, outward symbols are changed. Paganism too had its sacral anointings. Chrism, episcopally consecrated oil, is still used by Roman and Eastern churches for baptism, confirmation, ordination, and extreme unction, and by Anglicans for coronations and sporadically for the requesting sick. Roman Catholic extreme unction* is invalidly based on James 5:14f. which intended counsel to qualified apostles.

ROY A. STEWART

ANOMOEANS. Radical Arians. Led by Aetius* and Eunomius (see EUNOMIANISM) in the period 357-61, they held that the Son is unlike (Gr. anomoios) the Father. Aetius maintained "unlikeness" consistently and later influenced the Pneumatomachi, who excluded the Son and the Spirit from the Godhead. Other Anomoeans, however, such as Eudoxius of Antioch and Acacius, supported the Creeds of Sirmium (357) and of Constantinople (360) which excluded "substance" (ousia) from its formulae but affirmed that the Son is like the Father. Aetius was excommunicated by this group in 361, but according to the historian Socrates some of these reverted to Aetian views, interpreting "God from God" in the sense that all things are from God. Anomoeans were anathematized at the Council of Constantinople in 381.

ANSELM OF CANTERBURY (c.1033-1109). Archbishop of Canterbury from 1093. Born in Aosta, Italy, he quarreled with his father as a youth and left home. After years of wandering, at the age of twenty-six he settled in Normandy at Bec, becoming a monk under the influence of Lanfranc. When he was sixty years old he left the abbey and was made archbishop of Canterbury, a post he held until his death. Anselm took part in the intellectual development of eleventh- and twelfth-century Europe when, due to the increase in wealth and the challenge of new ideas, the Scholastic* tradition was formed. At the beginning of this process, the monastic communities took the lead. They had various advantages over the secular schools, the greatest of these being the close and continuing contact between the teacher and the student. Given a bright teacher, a tradition of learning, and the unhurried pace of a monastic community, the results could be very impressive. This was the situation at Bec while Anselm was prior and then abbot. Most of his works take the form of dialogues with students as he attempted to answer the worried questions of the young men in his care.

While archbishop of Canterbury, Anselm worked to apply the Hildebrandine reforms to the English Church. This led to conflict with William II (Rufus). Anselm refused to cooperate with lay investiture and so was forced to leave England. At the death of Rufus in 1100 Anselm was asked by Henry I to return to England, but he argued with the English monarch and so went into exile once more (1103). Finally, by 1107, a compromise was reached between the pope and the English king, and Anselm returned to his see. The remaining years of his life were spent in enforcing clerical celibacy and other Gregorian reforms on the church in England.

His writings are divided into (1) systematic works, (2) prayers and meditations, and (3) letters. In the first category one should note the Monologion, the Proslogion, Cur Deus Homo (Why God Became Man), On the Virginal Conception and Original Sin, On the Procession of the Holy Spirit, and De Concordia. Although he did not work out a complete system of theology as the later medieval scholars were to do, his treatises cover much of Christian thought. Anselm believed that faith was a necessary foundation and support for philosophic speculation. As he wrote, "I do not seek to understand that I may believe, but I believe that I may understand: for this I also believe, that unless I believe I will not understand." He proceeded to formulate the "ontological proof" for God's existence. He held also that the Atonement was necessary to satisfy the majesty of God rather than the older view held since Origen's time that Christ died to pay a ransom to the devil. Anselm's dependence upon Platonic thought made him a leader among the medieval realists.

The most recent edition of Anselm's works is F.S. Schmitt, S. Anselmi Opera Omnia (5 vols. and index, 1942). For excellent biographical detail see R.W. Southern, Saint Anselm and His Biographer (1963). ROBERT G. CLOUSE

ANSELM OF LAON (d.1117). A famous Schoolman known as the "Doctor Scholasticus." He was educated at Bec under Anselm of Canterbury. From 1076 he taught in Paris where his pupils included William of Champeaux and then, towards the end of the century, with his brother Ralph established a renowned school at Laon. Its celebrity was sufficient to attract Abelard as a pupil and, though Abelard had a low estimate of his teacher, it is now clear that Anselm did much to develop the quaestio—the setting up of opposing authorities and attempting to reconcile them —which became the standard method of later thinkers, including Abelard's Sic et Non. Also very important was Anselm's contribution to biblical exegesis in terms of commentary glosses. He was responsible for part of the exegetical work Glossa Interlinearis. C. PETER WILLIAMS

ANSELM OF LUCCA (1036-1086). Bishop of Lucca. Of a noble Milanese family (his uncle of the same name became Alexander II), he firmly supported Pope Gregory VII and became bishop in 1073. Soon he resigned to retire to the Cluniac monastery at Polirone. At Gregory's behest he returned, but the austerities he imposed brought expulsion by Henry IV and the antipope Clement III, and he spent the rest of his life as spiritual director to Countess Matilda of Tuscany and as papal legate in Lombardy. His Collectio canonum, compiled about 1083, aided the Gregorian reform by discussing ecclesiastical privileges, episcopal elections, lapsed clergy, sacraments, and excommunication. Based on several sources, it was later incorporated in Gratian's Decretum. C.G. THORNE, JR.

ANSKAR (Ansgar) (801-865). "Apostle of the North." Frankish-born, at the age of five he was placed in the Benedictine monastery at Corbie where he remained until 822, when he was transferred as master of the daughter school at Corvey in Saxony. About four years later he and a colleague went to Denmark, where a few important Christian converts seem to have been made, and established a small wooden church at Hedeby. By 829, however, he had returned to the Frankish court when there arrived from Björn of Sweden a request for help. With a fellow monk, Witmar, Anskar again went north, to the trading center of Birka, where a bishopric was established under Simeon-Gauzbert. In 831 he became archbishop of Hamburg, which post he held until his death despite the disruptive plunder of the city by Horik in 845. Anskar maintained his interest in Birka, and when Simeon-Gauzbert was driven out by his own Frankish people, Anskar spent two years in the diocese from 852 under the protection of Horik. On his way he again visited Hedeby. Schleswig along with Hamburg and Bremen (he had assumed pastoral oversight also of the latter see in 847) remained the area of his movements until he died—not by the martyrdom he sought. He was buried in St. Peter's Church, Bremen.

Anskar is sometimes considered to have failed, since Christianity was not firmly established in Scandinavia at his death, yet a major factor in his relative accomplishments is that no stable dynasty had been formed in any of the nation-states there. But foundations had been laid, and Christianity was officially to come within a century with the conversion of Harald ("Bluetooth") Gormsen (c.940-86).

ANTHROPOMORPHISM. Literally "in the form of man," it is usually applied to God either (1) in the strict sense that God or the gods (e.g., the Olympian gods of Greek mythology) has or have a body like man's, or (2) that God's mental or spiritual qualities can only be understood in terms of those of man. The term may also be applied to the natural world, both inorganic (e.g., force, conceived as an extension of feeling in our muscles) and organic (e.g., the mental life of animals). The charge that theism is anthropomorphic in sense (1) above is often leveled against Christianity. It is urged (e.g., by Winwoode Reade in the Martyrdom of Man, 1872) that God is infinitely greater than man and cannot therefore be conceived in human terms. But this does not follow. If, whether directly or indirectly, God created man, then God must at least be familiar with the qualities inherent in man. Man can only think with his mind, the tool given him for thought, and this limits his conception of God to an anthropomorphic one. Man can and does know God intuitively, but if he reasons about God he must do so in anthropomorphic terms such as those used in the Bible. R.E.D. CLARK

ANTHROPOSOPHY. A system of Christian mystical philosophy developed by the Austrian, Rudolf Steiner (1861-1925). Son of a stationmaster, he studied science at Vienna University and thereafter worked till 1897 on the Weimar edition of Goethe's works. He joined the Theosophists,* but finding them overinfluenced by oriental religious ideas, he left them to develop a Christianized version of theosophy which he called "anthroposophy." In 1913 he established an institute at Dornach near Basle, to incorporate the newly formed Anthroposophical Society and to provide a publishing house. Similar institutes were later set up in other countries as were also the Rudolf Steiner schools which specialize in the education of maladjusted children.

Steiner's thought encompassed the whole range of speculative philosophy. Basically his aim was "to raise the faculties of the soul to develop organs of spiritual insight." He held that the story of evolution represented the various stages by which man as a created spiritual being became clothed in flesh. Though spiritual man was made in God's image, this image was soon distorted and Christ often intervened (e.g., by giving man an upright posture) to aid his restoration. The last and most important spiritual intervention was at Calvary by which means man is finally offered salvation from earthly entanglement. Steiner held that the Parousia, heralding the completion of man's redemption, started in our own century with the appearance of Christ in the etheric sphere. The anthroposophical movement owed much to Steiner's magnetic personality: he attracted many, some "cranky" and unbalanced, but many too of acknowledged ability who were unconventional but religiously and mystically inclined. Perhaps his most enduring work was in the field of education.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Steiner's autobiography (ET 1928) is the main source of information about the man; his views are contained in his numerous books, notably Spiritual Science and Medicine (1948 ed.); see also Rudolph Steiner: Recollections by some of his Pupils (1958); works by G. Kaufmann (1922) and A.P. Shepherd (1954); and particularly the centenary volume, The Faithful Thinker (ed. A.C. Harward, 1961).

ANTICHRIST. A biblical term found only in 1 John 2:18,22; 4:3 and 2 John 7. Its meaning has often been enriched by concepts from Daniel 7:8; 8:8-14; 2 Thessalonians 2:3; Revelation 13:4-18, etc. Antichrist has generally been understood as a person (sometimes an institution) opposed to Christ and even a deliberate counterfeit. Early Christian writers (e.g., Chrysostom) were agreed that he would appear immediately before the second advent of Christ and be a person under the direct inspiration of Satan. With Tertullian the idea was put forward that he would not appear so long as the Roman Empire remained intact, but that he would arise to reunite the ten kingdoms into which it would have disintegrated. Sometimes it was thought that he would be Nero resuscitated (Lactantius, Jerome, Augustine) or that he would be a Jew of the tribe of Dan (Irenaeus). He would simulate the powers and functions of Christ (Hippolytus) and be an incarnation of the devil (Theodoret). The Tiburtine Sibylline introduced the idea of a great emperor who would arise prior to the appearance of antichrist. Pseudo-Methodius, written under the shadow of Islam, envisaged such an emperor overcoming Islam. Such writings became influential in the West. The Crusades intensified apocalyptic speculation which found a focus in Joachim of Floris. Antichrist, or his forerunner, was seen in numerous ecclesiastical, political, national, or social opponents. The Spiritual Franciscans viewed the pope of Rome as antichrist, or at least his forerunner. Similar ideas were held by men like Wycliffe and Huss. Luther held that every pope was antichrist, since antichrist is collective, the institution of the papacy. Modern interpreters of the idealist school view antichrist as the timeless personification of evil. Futurists believe in a personal antichrist who will initiate a period of tribulation prior to the return of Christ.

ANTICLERICALISM. A basic attitude of hostility directed against clerical power and civic privilege—especially that of the hierarchy—which in modern times has found expression at two levels, the religious and the political, and has been of two types, active and passive. Anticlericalism dates from the early days of institutionalized Christianity. Medieval anticlericalism was sporadic and most unorganized, but the Reformation stimulated its growth as Protestants assailed clerical abuses and proclaimed the priesthood of all believers. The impetus for modern political anticlericalism, however, came principally from the Enlightenment,* with its opposition to organized religion and its teaching that the clergy were a bulwark of political reaction. Thus nineteenth-century Europe saw numerous fierce battles between anticlericals and defenders of the traditional role of the established churches. This conflict intensified with the growth of liberalism and nationalism, especially in largely Roman Catholic countries like France, Italy, and Spain.

As a result of the Revolution of 1789 in France, the homeland of modern anticlericalism, Roman Catholicism was abolished as the state religion. Restored in 1815, the Roman Church became the focal point of a bitterly divisive political struggle which culminated in the permanent separation of church and state in France in 1905. In Italy, political anticlericalism climaxed with the liquidation of the Papal States in 1870, while in Germany the Kulturkampf* in the 1870s resulted in a large body of anticlerical legislation. Similar attempts to limit clerical power and privileges made at about the same time in Spain and Spanish America met with varying degrees of success.

In the USA, anticlerical feeling among radical political thinkers and religious nonconformists expressed itself in the constitutional separation of church and state after 1787. A similar alliance led to the reforms of the 1830s in Britain which virtually disestablished the Church of England. In the USA, however, anticlericalism subsided in the nineteenth century with the growth of civic religion; but since World War II there has been a resurgence of anticlerical feeling among American Christians with the "revolt of the laity" in many denominations and the advent of the Jesus Movement and Catholic Pentecostalism. Much recent anticlericalism is passive rather than active, religious rather than political. Nonpracticing Catholics reflect this trend, as do many active Protestants who exhibit considerable indifference toward the clergy. Such passive anticlerical-ism usually stems from the rejection by the laity of the traditional authoritarian role of pastor and priest. ROBERT D. LINDER

ANTILEGOMENA. This term relates to those NT books over which there was some dispute within the Christian Church during the first four centuries. It was used by Eusebius* in his classification of Christian books to distinguish certain books from those admitted by all, which he called the homologoumena. Among the Antilegomena he placed James, Jude, 2 Peter, 2 and 3 John of the canonical books, together with others which were revered but not included in the NT canon. Among these latter he included the Acts of Paul, the Shepherd of Hermas, the Apocalypse of Peter, the Epistle of Barnabas, and the Didache, all of which attained only a local significance, mainly in Egypt. The Antilegomena were sharply distinguished by Eusebius from spurious works which were emphatically rejected. DONALD GUTHRIE

ANTI-MARCIONITE PROLOGUES. Many manuscripts of the Vulgate contain prologues to individual books of Scripture. But these early Latin translations of prologues to Mark, Luke (also extant in Greek), and John were dated by De Bruyne within A.D. 160-80 and interpreted as anti-Marcionite, as possible imitations of Marcionite prologues to some Pauline epistles. W.G. Kummell (Introduction to the New Testament, ET 1966) disputes the conclusion by De Bruyne that the four prologues (Matthew is lost) reveal the united expression of an orthodox NT canon in the late second century. Their origin is unknown, their date uncertain, and the opposition to the heretical Marcion* is most explicit in the Johannine prologue. They claim to describe biographical details of the evangelists, the place and order of writing the gospels, and their relationship to their sources. G.T.D. ANGEL

ANTINOMIANISM (Gr. anti, "against"; nomos, "law"). While Luther was apparently the first to use the term "Antinomian" in his controversy with Johann Agricola* to describe the rejection of the moral law as a relevant part of Christian experience, Antinomianism clearly goes back to the time of the NT. Paul refutes the suggestion that the doctrine of justification by faith alone leaves room for persistence in sin, and frequently in the NT Epistles the view that the Gospel condones licentiousness is forthrightly condemned. Such counterattacks make it evident that antinomian views were current in the apostolic age. It is probably wise not to apply the title "antinomian" to the Gnostic heresies whose libertinism was based not on any supposed implications of the doctrine of justification by faith alone, but on a philosophical view of matter as intriniscally evil. Omitting these, there are two main forms of antinomian rejection of the law. Some Antinomians, like Agricola, maintain that the moral law is not needed to bring the sinner to repentance. This runs counter to Paul's experience and teaching (Rom. 7:7; Gal. 3:24). Others who accept the pedagogic use of the law, to convince the sinner of his sin and lead him to Christ, insist that the moral law has no place in the life of the believer, who is not under the law but under grace, and so not bound by the law as the rule for Christian living. Some of the English Puritans, notably Tobias Crisp and John Saltmarsh, held this view. The Brethren movement, consistent with the teaching of J.N. Darby* on the sharply contrasted dispensations of law and grace, is antinomian in the same sense. This form of Antinomianism seems to arise from a misunderstanding of the teaching of Paul who, while he utterly rejected the law as means of salvation, nevertheless affirmed the continuing validity of the law for the Christian (Rom. 3:31; 8:4).

For the protracted antinomian controversy in England between 1690-1700, see P. Toon, Emergence of Hyper-Calvinism (1967), chap. 3. HUGH J. BLAIR

ANTINOMISTIC CONTROVERSY. This arose from a dispute between Johann Agricola* and Philip Melanchthon* about the relationship between repentance and faith, and the place of the moral law in the experience of the believer. Melanchthon held that the moral law was required to produce conviction of sin and repentance, as the prelude to faith. Agricola's view, to which Luther gave the name "Antinomian,"* maintained that repentance is the fruit not of the law but of the Gospel, and that the law has no relevance for the Christian. The dispute was temporarily settled at Torgau in 1527 in a conference between Luther, Melanchthon, and Agricola, but was revived later and, becoming acute in 1537, was never really resolved. HUGH J. BLAIR

ANTIOCH, COUNCILS OF. They include:

(1) in 268: Paul of Samosata, bishop of Antioch, was condemned for his Adoptianist* theology at a series of councils culminating in his deposition in 268. It is noteworthy that for the first time bishops in council passed judgment by asking the accused to sign a doctrinal formulation.

(2) In 325: a council met to elect a new bishop of Antioch but took the opportunity to severely condemn Arianism* and to announce that certain bishops, including Eusebius of Caesarea, had not signed their credal statements.

(3) About 327-330: Eustace, bishop of Antioch, was deposed by the supporters of Eusebius of Nicomedia because of his anti-Origenist theology.

(4) In 341: the Dedication Council of Antioch was a meeting of ninety-seven Eastern bishops at the time of the dedication of a new cathedral and in the presence of the Eastern emperor Constantius. They put forward four creeds. In the first they denied Athanasius's accusation that they were Arians ("how should we who are bishops follow a presbyter?"). Further, though they avoided the use of homoousios, they did insist that the Son was begotten before all ages and coexisted with the Father. They clearly condemned Marcellus, bishop of Ancyra (who taught that one day Christ's lordship would be handed back to the Father), by asserting that Jesus "continues King and God for ever." In the "Second Antiochene Creed" they stated that there were three separate hypostases united by a common will ("in agreement one"). Here again they were attacking Marcellus. If the council showed that the Western picture of the East, as being totally Arian, was untrue, it also reflected the Eastern conviction that the West was wholly Marcellan. (See ANCYRA.)

(5) In 375: 153 Eastern bishops met under Melitius of Antioch and agreed to reconciliation with the Western Church, thus paving the way for the ecumenical Council of Constantinople.

(6) Throughout the fifth and sixth centuries there were frequent synods concerning the Nestorian* and Monophysite* controversies.

(7) Under Latin rule there were synods in 1139 and 1204. The former deposed an arrogant patriarch, Radulf, while the latter decided that the count of Tripolis had claims to the principality of Antioch. C. PETER WILLIAMS

ANTIOCH (Syrian). A Hellenistic city in NW Syria (modern Antakya), it was situated on the Orontes River some twenty miles from the sea. As the third of the greatest cities in the Greco-Roman world, it had been founded about 300 B.C. by Seleucus Nicator in honor of his father—one of some sixteen cities of that name. Its main outlet to the sea was Seleucia Pieria, one of the finest harbors on the coast. Antioch also lay on the most important land route between Asia Minor, Syria, and Palestine. As a royal city it had a splendid palace, with spacious boulevards, parks, and gardens. It was the only city of its time that had street lighting at night. The population of early Antioch is not known, but by the end of the fourth century A.D. it was estimated as high as 800,000. It had a mixed ethnic character, with large numbers of Jews. Its interest in mystery cults also gave it an eclectic intellectual spirit and an interest in religious inquiry. After the persecution of Stephen some followers of Jesus fled as far as Antioch (Acts 11:19), and many of its inhabitants were converted (Acts 11:21); it was here that the followers of Christ were first called "Christians" (Acts 11:26) following the year's ministry of Paul and Barnabas. The conversion of these Gentiles raised the question of the application of the Jewish law (Acts 15:1ff.) and some understanding was reached (Acts 15:19-35; Gal. 2:1-10). Following the visit of Judas Barsabbas and Silas as emissaries of James, who sought to win over the Gentile converts to the view that the law must be enforced, Peter and Barnabas disputed and broke away from Paul (Acts 15:22-29; Gal. 2:11-13). In time, the Jewish Christian community in Antioch disappeared. In subsequent debates over Roman primacy, it has been said that Peter was "the founder" and "the first bishop" of the church at Antioch. But the problem of his episcopacy is obscure, as is the rabbinical character of the Antiochene School of Theology (see ANTIOCHENE THEOLOGY).

See Downey and Glanville, Ancient Antioch (1963). JAMES M. HOUSTON

ANTIOCHENE THEOLOGY. Malchion, a converted Sophist of the second half of the third century A.D., is sometimes regarded as the founder of the Antiochene School of theology. He gained prominence as an opponent of Paul of Samosata, whose heretical views were condemned at Antioch in 268. But the originator of the distinctive Antiochene emphasis was Diodore, later bishop of Tarsus (d. c.390), the instructor of John Chrysostom and Theodore of Mopsuestia. Earlier Lucian, one of the ablest biblical scholars of his time, went to Antioch (c.260-65) and became the teacher of Arius and Eusebius of Nicomedia (he cannot with certainty be held responsible for their heretical views).

In Scripture and Christology the Antiochene theology's methodology was more rational, historical, and literal than that of Alexandria, opposing the latter's mystical and allegorical treatment of the biblical text. The Antiochene approach to Scripture was critical insofar as some parts of it were regarded as having more doctrinal and spiritual value than others. Philosophically Antioch favored Aristotle as more empirical and down-to-earth, whereas Alexandria allied itself to Plato's more mystical views. A less ontological view of the Trinity distinguished the Antiochene from the Alexandrian theology.* The tendency was toward Sabellianism,* due to its recoil from the tritheistic drift of the Alexandrian Trinitarianism (but the charge of modalism was strongly repudiated).

In Christology the divergence between Antioch and Alexandria is sharpest. The Antiochene teachers generally insisted upon Christ's true humanity and approached an understanding of his person from the human end. But their more radical advocates, Theodore and Nestorius especially, tended to destroy the concrete unity of Christ's person and to see him, not as the God-man, but a man indwelt by God. Lacking any clear doctrine of a substantive Logos,* interest centered on the historical Jesus. The general movement was thus towards an "adoptive" understanding Christ's person. On the other hand, His full humanity was denuded of a human soul. At this point the two schools overlap. Some Antiochenes developed their Christology in a Logos-sarx ("Word-flesh") framework, while some Alexandrians presented theirs in Logos-anthropos ("Word-man") terms.

The emphasis on moral achievement in the Antiochene Christology, in its attempt to solve the problem of the relation of human and divine in Christ, found prominence in its soteriology which admitted a significant place to human merit. This fact may explain Nestorius's sympathy for Pelagius. The Antiochene School continued to exercise a powerful influence until its decline in the eighth century, but meanwhile its christological doctrine was carried by its zealous missionaries to the utmost bounds of Asia. H.D. MC DONALD

ANTIPOPE. A pope elected in opposition to one held to have been canonically chosen. Although on general reckoning there have been some twenty-five antipopes in the history of the Church, the term is especially applied to the Great Schism* in the Western Church (1378-1417), during which period there was always a pope and an antipope (latterly two antipopes).

ANTI-SEMITISM. A term coined in the late nineteenth century which signifies hostility toward Jews (not all Semites). In the ancient world, Jews were ridiculed and often persecuted, particularly in Alexandria and later throughout the Roman Empire, on two main grounds: religious exclusiveness seen in their rejection of idolatry, and social exclusiveness arising from their stress on food laws and ritual purity. Christian antagonism to Jews—they were assailed for their unbelief and even regarded as deicides—ensured that the conversion of the Roman Empire brought them little relief. In the Middle Ages, the wealth of many Jews, gained through money-lending as well as trade, provoked hostility. Wild accusations were made: that Jews murdered Christian children at Eastertime (this developed into the "blood accusation," current from the thirteenth century, that they used Christian blood for ritual purposes); that they desecrated the Host; that they poisoned wells, etc.

The French Revolution worked in the Jews' favor. The National Assembly repealed all repressive measures against them (1791), and the Constitution of Year iii gave them equal rights (1795). Some repressive legislation subsequently enacted was set aside by the July Revolution of 1830. Absolute religious equality was granted throughout the N. German Federation (1869), and this was subsequently extended to the German Empire. Nevertheless, modern anti-Semitism arose in Germany in the 1870s. This seems to have resulted from growing Jewish prosperity, influence, sensitivity, and belligerence. The situation was exacerbated by signs of unified Jewish influence in the Alliance Israëlite Universelle and by the migration of Jews from E Europe, especially Russia and Romania, to Germany (and then to England and America).

Anti-Semitism flourished in Germany (where it came to a head in the Nazi atrocities), Austria-Hungary, France (e.g., the Dreyfus case), Romania (where a resolution of the Berlin Congress of 1878 that all Romanian citizens should enjoy equal civil rights was circumvented by the declaration that Jews were foreigners), and Russia (where massacres took place in the early twentieth century). Jews were treated as scapegoats in both Germany and Russia, where millions were liquidated. Today, anti-Semitism often takes the form of anti-Zionism. In the Middle East, the influence of European anti-Semitism and endemic intolerance of ethnic and religious minorities has strengthened anti-Zionism in Arab countries.

Anti-Semitism has causes deeper than Jewish particularism and allegations of ritual killings, secret literature, low Jewish standards of behavior, etc. Its deepest roots lie in Christian, especially fundamentalist, soil. It may well be true, as James Daane has argued, that the belief that the Jews were responsible for the death of Christ and that the Jewish nation lies under the total and final curse of God are the causes of its strength. Jules Isaac sees a third factor in belief that the spiritual life of the Jews was degenerate at the time of Christ.

ANTONELLI, GIACOMO (1806-1876). Cardinal and Vatican secretary of state to Pius IX, 1848-76. He was the principal political executive of the States of the Church, known as the Temporal Power of the pope. His work and policy consisted chiefly in resisting, unsuccessfully, the final and revolutionary overthrow of the pope's political rule and its incorporation into the secular kingdom of Italy (1859-61, 1870). Although not a priest but only a deacon, he formulated an active ultramontane policy in internal and foreign affairs, relying upon, and resenting, the occupation by French and Austrian troops from 1850 to maintain basic order and support the papacy. His education was to the rank of doctor in law and philosophy. His character remains much debated, but his competence was never questioned.

ANTONIANS. The name used by several communities claiming descent from the Egyptian hermit Antony:

(1) The original disciples of Antony organized by him around 305 into the first hermit community to possess a rule.

(2) The Hospital Brothers of St. Antony, founded in 1095 by Gaston de Dauphine. It survived in France, Italy, and Spain until the time of the French Revolution.

(3) An order of the Armenian Church founded in the seventeenth century to maintain the connection with the Roman Catholic Church.

(4) A community founded in Flanders in 1615.

The Antonians are to be found also among the Chaldean and Maronite Uniats of Eastern Christendom. The Orthodox monastery of Mt. Sinai, dedicated to Catherine of Alexandria, claims to follow the Rule of Antony. "Antonians" was also the name used by a Swiss sect founded by Anton Unterhäher (1759-1824), who claimed to be the ruler of the world. JAMES TAYLOR

ANTONINUS (1389-1459). Archbishop of Florence. Born in Florence, he joined the Dominican Order at the age of sixteen. Successively he became prior at Cortona (1418), at Friesole (1421), at Naples (1428), and at Rome, the Convent of St. Maria Sopra Minerva (1430), and was made auditor-general of the Rota under Eugenius IV in 1431 and vicar-general of the Dominican Order (1432-45). He participated in the Council of Florence (1439), dealing with the reunion with the Eastern Church. In 1446 he was appointed archbishop of Florence, and he was canonized by Adrian VI in 1523. He is the author of a Summa confessionalis, which included writings for those who were making confession, and a manual for priests who heard confessions and made absolutions. He also wrote a Summa Theologica. His Chronicon printed in Venice (1474-79) is a compilation of world history up to the year 1457.

A noted preacher, living as a simple friar also as archbishop, he was much concerned about the poor, was a ready counselor, and was deeply disturbed about corruption in the church. The repair of church buildings, the regularity of church services, pastoral ministration, and the reform of religious communities were major concerns. In his theology he was influenced by Thomas Aquinas. The humanism of the Italian Renaissance affected him little. His Opera a ben vivere was printed in 1858. His statue is the only statue of a priest in the Uffizi Palace in Florence. CARL S. MEYER

ANTONINUS PIUS (86-161). Roman emperor. Succeeding Hadrian and entitled "Pius" by the Roman Senate, he was a mildly progressive ruler, eager to relieve taxation and to foster public building in Italy. He sought to centralize the government with senatorial cooperation. During his principate but not at his instigation Bishop Polycarp of Smyrna was executed.

ANTONY (c.251-356). Pioneer of anchoritic* monasticism. Born at Coma in middle Egypt, his well-to-do Christian parents not long dead, at about the age of twenty Antony heard read in church, "If you want to be perfect, go, sell, ..." followed by "Do not worry about tomorrow" (Matt. 19:21; 6:34). Bequeathing his property to the poor and his sister to a convent, he became an ascetic devotee, directed by an older solitary—first near his house, later outside Coma, and then in a tomb further afield. Seeking isolation about 285, he crossed the Nile eastward to his Outer Mountain, where for twenty years he occupied a disused fort at Pispir. Finally, after 312 he retreated to his remote Inner Mountain, Mt. Colzim, near the Red Sea. Although opting out of civilization to escape from one's troubles was not uncommon in third-century Egypt, Antony was the first to attract influential publicity in "taking to the bush" (anachōrein), for Christian reasons. His utterances enjoy first place in the Sayings of the Fathers. He was beset by visitors, people seeking help and imitators, whose attachment to "Father" (Abba, Apa) Antony created colonies of hermit cells (monastēria) around Pispir.

Knowledge of Antony depends largely on the Life written soon after his death by Athanasius and translated at least twice into Latin by 379. Inspired partly by classical or Hellenistic lives of heroes and sages, it was influential in disseminating monasticism in both East and West and became a model for later Christian hagiography. Antony is depicted as the pattern of anchoritic life, one of severe austerity, incessant prayer, supernatural healings and perceptions, and above all perpetual warfare with the demons peopling the deserts. This individualistic quest for perfection, i.e., the recovery of the soul's created nature, bypassed the Church, although Antony remained a champion of episcopal orthodoxy, hostile only to schismatics (Melitians) and heretics. In 338 he visited Alexandria to disavow any sympathy towards Arianism. In 311 he was there during the persecution of Maximin Daia, sustaining the confessors but being denied the martyrdom he desired. A Copt who knew no Greek, untutored (as a boy too shy for school) and perhaps barely literate, he left eight extant letters.

ANTONY OF PADUA (1195-1231). Patron saint of the poor, of Portugal, and of Padua, Italy. Born of noble parents at Lisbon, he joined the Augustinian Canons* in 1210. In 1212 he entered the Augustinian study house at Coimbra, where he took his doctorate, gaining a reputation for preaching skill and biblical and theological learning. Seeking to emulate the first Franciscan martyrs in Morocco, he joined that order, exchanging his baptismal name of Ferdinand for Antony, and left for Africa, but illness forced his return. His ship was carried in a storm to Sicily, from which he traveled to the general chapter at Assisi in 1221. He then retreated for further study and contemplation with the celebrated mystic, Thomas Gallo, translator and commentator on the so-called Dionysius the Areopagite. Summoned from this life of seclusion at the behest of St. Francis,* who at the urging of Elias of Cortona reluctantly commissioned him the first teacher of the order, Antony subsequently taught at Bologna (1222), Montpellier (1224), Toulouse, and Padua, and is credited with introducing Augustinian theology among the Franciscans. He served his order at Puy (1224), Limoges (1226), and in the Romagna. His zeal against the Cathari,* Patarines,* and most probably the Albigensians,* earned him the title Maleus hereticorum ("Hammer of heretics"), while his persuasiveness led him to establish a brotherhood of penitents among his converts at Padua. From 1230 he devoted himself to preaching, with repentance and contempt for the world providing frequent topics. His theology was mystical, and his interpretation of Scripture allegorical rather than literal. His gifts as a preacher were extraordinary including, in addition to a clear voice and compelling manner, prophetic powers and miracles, accounts of which have been embellished since his death. His Lenten series in Padua in 1231 reached the proportions of a revival, with 30,000 reported auditors at one time in an open field. The response was massive reconciliations and restitutions, such that the clergy were insufficient for the needs of the people. Antony was canonized by Gregory IX in the year following his death at thirty-six.

ANTWERP, SYNOD OF (1566). A clandestine conventicle held by the Reformed Church. Its chief importance was the adoption of a Latin recension of the Belgic Confession* as the Netherlandish statement of faith. This confession, originally composed in 1561 by Guido de Bres, pastor at Tournay, was revised for the synod by an Antwerp pastor, Francis Junius of Bourges, a pupil of Calvin, who later became professor at Leyden. This adoption marked the final acceptance of Calvinistic principles in the Netherlands.

ANUSIM (Maranos). Spanish or Portuguese crypto-Jews outwardly professing Christianity through expediency, compulsion, or fear. The subterfuge began with a frightful anti-Semitic pogrom in Seville in 1391, when 4,000 Jews were massacred. Others simulated faith and accepted baptism to save their lives. Some were cynical apostates who lacked Jewish faith, but the majority conformed secretly. The persecution continued when, with imaginary atrocities charged against them, the Maranos were hounded by the Spanish Inquisition.* Many outstanding men were among the refugees who from that time were scattered all over the globe. The excommunicated Jew, Baruch Spinoza,* was of Marano stock. The bloodcurdling record stresses the brutality of bigoted persecution, the impervious disregard of human liberty, and the final impossibility of proselytizing by force.

APHRAATES (Aphrahat). The twenty-three Syriac Tractates of Aphrahat, written 337-45, are the earliest extant evidence of Syrian church life and thought. A Bible handed on from Jewish Christian sources and gospel citations from the Diatessaron of Tatian combine with a background of virile apologetic against rabbinical Judaism to produce a doctrinal outlook almost unaffected by Greek speculation and Nicene theology. An ascetic from Mosul in Persia, Aphrahat taught God in Christ, the Spirit and Resurrection, baptism and asceticism. God the Creator gave the Law to Moses; Christ is the Son of God, whose Holy Spirit enters a man at baptism and helps him attain resurrection. Baptism commits the believer to moral virtues and ascetic practice. In principle Aphrahat associates postbaptismal life with renunciation of the world, direct warfare with Satan, and celibate asceticism. He advises priests to discriminate against baptismal candidates who have little ascetic potential. G.T.D. ANGEL

APIARIUS. A priest from Sicca Veneria in Proconsular Africa, he is a test case for relations between the African and Roman churches in the fifth century. Excommunicated and deposed by the pro-Augustinian diocesan Urbanus, Apiarius appealed to Zosimus of Rome (417-19), who demanded his reinstatement by the African bishop (Council of Carthage, 418) on the basis of canons of the Western Council of Sardica (343) which, he claimed, were Nicene. The Africans after inquiry to the East failed to find them among Nicene canons, Apiarius confessed, and the case was closed. Excommunicated later for offenses at Tabraca, Apiarius appealed to Celestine of Rome (422-32), who ordered him restored. At another Council of Carthage (424), Apiarius confessed and the African bishops asserted their right to judge their affairs exclusively, while conceding to Rome primacy of honor. G.T.D. ANGEL

APOCALYPTIC LITERATURE. The Greek word apokalypsis, from which "apocalyptic" is derived, means "unveiling" (Lat. revelatio) and indicates the unfolding of things hitherto hidden or secret. In the literature thus described, the subject-matter concerns the future rather than the present, the spiritual rather than the material world, the purposes of God rather than the actions of men. It transports the reader out of his immediate existence and allows him to share in the mysteries of what God will finally do with His universe. It is no accident that the period when such writings flourished (c.200 B.C.–A.D 150) was an age of persecution for both Jews and Christians, spanning the Maccabean Wars, the fall of Jerusalem, and the Bar-Kochba uprising, and including the persecutions of Nero and Domitian.

Although a few complete books like Daniel, 2 Esdras (in the Apocrypha*), and Revelation* can be firmly classified under this term, apocalyptic describes a style of writing, elements of which can be discerned in quite different literary categories, such as Isaiah (24-27), Ezekiel (38, 39), Joel (3:9ff.), Zechariah (9-14), and Mark (13). Most apocalyptic writings are noncanonical, however, and are to be found among the Pseudepigrapha* and the sectarian literature of the Qumran* community. Of these the best-known examples are the two Books of Enoch, the Book of Jubilees, the Assumption of Moses, the Apocalypse of Baruch, and (from Qumran) the War of the Sons of Light against the Sons of Darkness, though many other writings with marked apocalyptic features could be added to the list, notably the Christian Shepherd of Hermas.

Among the characteristics of apocalyptic are these four elements:

(1) Its esoteric framework: the secrets of the universe and of the last days are revealed to the author or chief character of the book in a series of visions, often through angelic mediation.

(2) Its developed imagery: great use is made of symbols and symmetrical patterns. Numbers play an important part in the unfolding of world history, especially seven (as in Daniel's "week of years" [Dan. 9:24]), forty-nine (as in the Book of Jubilees) and a thousand (cf. the many millennial references). Wild animals appear as representing nations, as also do angels (cf. Dan. 10:13). Apocalyptic literature thus develops a language of its own, which must be interpreted in the light of earlier usage. This is especially important for the correct interpretation of Revelation.

(3) Its eschatological setting: in many visions the whole of history is surveyed from the Creation onward, but the prime interest is always the end of the age. This is frequently preceded by the most dreadful persecution of the faithful and a period of conflict between the forces of good and evil. Satan and his demonic satellites feature strongly, as do messianic and angelic figures. There is great stress on divine judgment, the day of the Lord and the messianic age, and doctrines of resurrection and the afterlife.

(4) Its pseudonymity: because of the ascendance of the Mosaic law in the Judaism of this period, these apocalyptic revelations were often attributed to great men of the past, who were either exponents of the law like Moses and Ezra, or precursors of it like Enoch, Abraham, and the patriarchs. It does not follow from this, however, that the two canonical books, Daniel and Revelation, are also pseudonymous. Daniel is a composite work, combining narrative episodes with visions, and has unique problems regarding authorship which have to be studied separately. In Revelation, the exiled disciple is using conventional apocalyptic imagery to reveal truths that could be published in no other form without fear of reprisal.

Whereas most apocalyptic writers leaned heavily on the ideas and expressions of their predecessors in the genre, it is less easy to say what actually gave rise to this style of writing. To regard Daniel as the prototype of all subsequent apocalyptic writing ignores both the uniqueness of that book and also the many apocalyptic patterns within prophetic literature. There is a continuity between prophecy and apocalyptic which B.W. Anderson catches well in his description of the latter as "prophecy in a new idiom." On the other hand, Von Rad traces its origins, not to prophecy, but to wisdom, on the grounds of its totally different theological standpoint and the primacy it gives to inner knowledge and illumination. Certainly there are significant differences between the theologies of prophecy and apocalyptic: the first saw God's activity as being primarily in this world, the latter despaired of the present age and looked to His judgment beyond the limits of time and human history; the first endeavored to apply the ethical demands of God's righteousness to the immediate situations of Israel and her neighbors, the latter applied the principle of God's determinism to the wider setting of national destinies in the last days. Apocalyptic shows signs of a cosmic dualism between good and evil, light and darkness, God and Satan, which the prophets would never have allowed and which may be attributable to Persian influences. It is noteworthy, however, that in the canonical writings at any rate this dualism never degenerates into a power struggle between two equally balanced forces. In both prophecy and biblical apocalyptic God is at all times supreme and the Lord of His creation.

APOCRYPHA. Derived from a Greek neuter plural adjective meaning "hidden things," the word "apocrypha" has a different meaning for different church traditions. The Protestant use refers to the books which are sometimes printed in Bibles as a separate block of literature between the OT and the NT. Apart from 2 Esdras, which originates from the Vulgate, these books together with the OT books constituted the Septuagint. In Roman Catholic usage these writings are called "deuterocanonical," and the term "apocrypha" is reserved for those books wholly outside the canon which Protestants call the pseudepigrapha."* This article will restrict itself to the books of the Protestant tradition. The books are:

(1) 1 Esdras (= 3 Esdras in Vulgate, which uses 1 and 2 Esdras for Ezra and Nehemiah; = Esdras B in Septuagint). This consists of material, paralleled in 2 Chronicles, Ezra, and Nehemiah, but rearranged by the editor/author, dealing with the story of the Jerusalem temple from Josiah to Zerubbabel and Ezra's restoration. An interesting fictional addition is the debate of the three youths, which Zerubbabel, a guardsman of Darius, wins by showing that truth is the strongest power on earth.

(2) 2 Esdras (= 4 Esdras in Vulgate) is a Christian expansion of a Jewish apocalyptic work consisting of seven visions about the age to come. In its present form it dates from about A.D. 90.

(3) Tobit is a delightful short story about the adventures of Tobit's son, Tobias, who journeys to Media in company with the angel Raphael disguised as a mortal. With his help two healing miracles take place, one on Sarah, Tobias's betrothed, who has been tormented by a demon, and the other on the aged Tobit, whose sight is restored.

(4) Judith tells the equally fictitious story of how a young widow of Bethulia (= Bethel), which was besieged by Holofernes's army, delivered the city by enticing the enemy general to his death.

(5) The rest of Esther. These are some additions to the canonical book, designed to deepen its religious content and to strengthen its claim to canonicity.

(6) The Wisdom of Solomon is in the finest tradition of Hebrew wisdom, though it betrays considerable Hellenistic influence and is one of the few parts of the Apocrypha written originally in Greek and not translated from a Hebrew or Aramaic original.

(7) Ecclesiasticus, or the Wisdom of Jesus, Ben-Sira, written about 180 B.C., is a guidebook to the good life, summed up in the word "wisdom," and is probably the most significant of the apocryphal books.

(8) Baruch, a composite work including the letter of Jeremiah, is a first-century B.C. compilation attributed to Jeremiah's scribe and companion.

(9) The additions to Daniel, viz., The Song of the Three Holy Children in the fiery furnace (known as the Benedicite) and the legendary tales of Susanna and Bel and the Dragon. (Alternative accountings list these as separate books, resulting in enumeration of up to fourteen apocryphal books as compared with this listing of twelve.)

(10) The Prayer of Manasseh is a brief but moving expression of penitence for sin.

(11) 1 Maccabees is a historical survey of the events from 175 to 134 B.C. in which the Maccabean house is exalted as the means of bringing salvation to Israel. It is a reliable account of the period and was written in Hebrew about 100 B.C., after the death of John Hyrcanus.

(12) 2 Maccabees covers roughly the same period but is much less reliable as history, containing a number of highly colored episodes from the story of the uprising.

None of these books was accepted into the Hebrew canon by the Jewish synod of Jamnia, which met at a time (c. A.D. 100) when the authentic Jewish heritage was thought to be in danger of erosion from the syncretistic tendencies of apocalyptic writing and from the increasing influence of Christianity. The Septuagint tradition reflects an earlier, pre-Christian stage of development where the need for rigid norms had not yet arisen. The early Christian Church never resolved its attitude to these divergent approaches: Clement, Cyprian, and Augustine were among those who followed the Septuagint canon, while Origen, Cyril, and Jerome held to the Hebrew books. Although Jerome's Bible, the Vulgate (which became the official Roman Catholic text of Holy Scripture), incorporated the Apocrypha, Jerome himself wrote that these libri ecclesiastici (as distinct from the libri canonici of Hebrew tradition) could be read for edification, but not for confirming the authority of church dogmas.

In the Reformation Luther incorporated the Apocrypha into his translation of the Bible (1534), adding that the books were not equal to Scripture but nevertheless were "profitable and good to read." The Reformed churches went further and excised them altogether from the canon of Scripture,* Article 3 of the Westminster Confession* (1647) explicitly rejecting their inspiration, authority, and spiritual usefulness.

The Roman Catholic Church at the Council of Trent* (1546) anathematized those who did not regard as sacred and canonical all the books contained in the Vulgate, and this view was substantially upheld by the Vatican Council of 1870. The Greek Church, after a period of uncertainty, eventually settled at the Synod of Jerusalem (1672) for the Jamnia canon, with the addition of Tobit, Judith, Wisdom of Solomon, and Ecclesiasticus.

Questions of canonicity apart, the Apocrypha has considerable value for biblical scholarship for the light it sheds on the intertestamental period—the development of apocalyptic thought, of wisdom and nomistic theology, and the increasing impact of Hellenistic ideas on Judaism.

APOCRYPHAL NEW TESTAMENT. This is a general description of those books circulating during the first centuries of the Christian era which purported to relate details about Christ and the apostles, but which were never considered to be canonical. The title probably developed on the analogy of the OT Apocrypha,* which was, however, a more specific collection of books. In the NT apocrypha there was never a collection of books which offered an alternative to the NT canon, but rather a motley variety of literature whose only unity was its common non-canonical status. The popularity of these books is demonstrated by the number which are extant in whole or in part and the wide geographical distribution of their use. Many of them have been preserved only in versions, although a number of originals are known.

One of the most striking features about the Christian apocrypha is the fact that the majority are attempts to produce literary forms parallel to those of the NT books. It is possible therefore to classify them under gospels, acts, epistles, and apocalypses, plus a small group of miscellaneous works. Of these literary forms the most prolific was the acts and the least prolific was the epistolary form. This reflects the differing degrees of difficulty surrounding their production. To produce a narrative of events in which various apostles figured as heroes was clearly a simpler procedure than to produce an epistle which possessed some air of validity.

It will be possible here only to mention the major examples of these apocryphal works to illustrate both their variety and their characteristics. Among the gospels there were three main types. The first shows some influence from the Synoptic gospels in its literary form. There is a small fragment known as *Papyrus Oxyrhynchus 840 which consists of only a few verses but belongs to the early second century. Of about the same date is the *Egerton Papyrus 2 which combines Synoptic-type material with Johannine. But these may be instances of the combining of written material. The Gospel of Peter draws some material from the Synoptics, but mixes it with Gnostic overtones. Another work which may belong to this type is the Gospel of the Egyptians, but the remains of this are too fragmentary to provide an accurate picture of its original form.

The second type of gospel is essentially Gnostic, imparting Gnostic doctrine in the form of teaching attributed to the exalted Lord. Examples of this kind are the Apocryphon of John, the Gospel of Thomas, and the Sophia Jesu Christi. Two other Gnostic works which have the word "gospel" in their title, but which bear no relationship to the canonical gospels, are the Gospel of Truth and the Gospel of Philip.

Because of the fact that the canonical gospels confine themselves almost wholly to the ministry of Jesus, it is not surprising that there was an urge in the third type of apocryphal gospels to fill in some of the gaps by recourse to imagination. This is particularly true of the Infancy gospels, which offered considerable scope for descriptions of the early years of Jesus about which the canonical books are silent. A work like the Gospel of Nicodemus is an example of an attempt to fill out the Pilate story. The proportion of legendary material in works of this type is high.

The apocryphal acts offer a more varied form of literature, bound together by what was loosely considered as possibly "apostolic." Sometimes the emphasis was on polemic, sometimes on apologetic. Some of these apocryphal acts made attempts to edify, some only to entertain. There is no easy way of classifying these works. All of them are attributed to apostles. The earliest books of this character which are extant are those which circulated under the names of John, Peter, Paul, Andrew, and Thomas. There is abundant evidence to show the high esteem in which apostolic names were held in the earliest period of church history, and this literature corroborates this evidence. It is significant that although these books purport to have the same form as the canonical Acts, the attribution to individual apostles at once sets them apart. Moreover the frequency with which heterodox doctrine occurs further reveals the gulf between the canonical and apocryphal books.

In addition to these books, epistles and apocalypses circulated. Examples of the former are few because of the difficulty of producing this type of literature with any appearance of authenticity. The most notable is that known as 3 Corinthians which appeared as part of the Acts of Paul but circulated separately at least in the Syriac-speaking church where at one time it seems to have been accorded canonical status. The only other epistle which deserves special mention is the Epistle to the Laodiceans which had a wide circulation during the Middle Ages, although there is nothing distinctive about its contents. In fact it is almost wholly a plagiarization from the canonical Philippians. Such works as the pseudocorrespondence between Paul and Seneca and the pseudo-Epistle of Titus make no attempt to imitate the epistolary form.

Among the apocalypses, the most notable are those ascribed to Peter, which in certain quarters achieved some sort of semicanonical status (it is mentioned in the Muratorian Canon, although doubts regarding it are reported) and the Ascension of Isaiah, which shares the form of Jewish apocalypses but has clear Christian allusions. The Apocalypse of Paul and another ascribed to Thomas are both later productions.

It is important to examine the motives which prompted these apocryphal books. It is worth observing the comment of Tertullian that truth precedes forgery, for it is clear that the widespread acknowledgment of the canonical books was a necessary prelude to the production of imitations, at least in title. By means of pseudonymous literature the producers hoped to gain acceptance for their ideas. The importance of apostolicity in relation to Christian tradition largely dictated the pseudonyms which were chosen.

Some of the literature was simply the result of the desire to satisfy imagination. It is not difficult to see that such a reference as Colossians 4:16 could have proved sufficient impulse for someone to produce an epistle to the Laodiceans. The author of this epistle may well have thought that nothing written by Paul should have been lost and therefore an epistle to suit this reference was desirable. Many of the narrative forms in these apocrypha are fanciful and clearly fictional. In an age which was mainly uncritical, particularly among members of the general public, there was an ever-ready market for romances about the earliest Christian leaders.

Another motive which was particularly dominant was the desire to add details which are missing from the canonical books. The most prevalent source of such a motive was Gnosticism,* which by this means introduced its own particular tenets into much of the pseudepigraphical literature. A book like the Gospel of Thomas, for instance, contains a medley of sayings, some closely parallel to the synoptic gospels and some couched in the language of Gnosticism. Other books, like the Gospel of Peter, which is in the main orthodox but has Docetic implications in its account of the crucifixion, are less pronouncedly Gnostic (see DOCETISM). In many cases the introduction of heterodox doctrine is subtly done.

Apocryphal literature offered a suitable medium for those who wished to claim a secret source for their doctrines as many of the authors of this kind of literature did. There was no reasonable alternative when pseudonymous works were published a considerable time after the putative author had died. Moreover, a favorite device was to concentrate on the post-resurrection appearances of Jesus, which offered most opportunity for the creation of speeches containing deviating doctrine. Indeed, Gnostics generally showed little interest in the humanity of Jesus, and thus the resurrection experiences came into greater prominence.

The history of the canon shows that the orthodox Christians had a discerning approach to the mass of apocryphal literature. None of the books came to be generally received, although some enjoyed extensive popularity. There is a wide gap between the canonical books and their apocryphal imitations. In spite of their use of apostolic names they completely lack the apostolic content. They are nevertheless a witness to the unrestrained character of much that passed for popular Christianity. The vigilance of the leaders of early Christian thought deprived them of any authority.

APOLLINARIS, SIDONIUS, see SIDONIUS APOLLINARIS

APOLLINARIUS; APOLLINARIANISM. Born about 310 at Laodicea in Syria, Apollinarius became a reader under the Arian bishop Theodotus and shared with his priestly father a delight in pagan literature. When Julian deprived Christians of pagan classics, they restyled parts of the Bible in poetic meters or as philosophical dialogues. He had welcomed Athanasius back from exile in 346, supported the homoousion (see ANCYRA) and became bishop of the Nicene church at Laodicea about 361. His views were opposed when the Council of Alexandria, chaired by Athanasius in 362, attributed a human soul to Christ, and about 375 he seceded from the orthodox church. By 377 the Western Council of Rome under Bishop Damasus condemned him, followed by the Eastern councils of Alexandria (378), Antioch (379), and Constantinople (381). Theodosian decrees (383-88) forbade Apollinarian worship and outlawed his adherents.

Apollinarius wrote extensively, but few writings remain. Some are attributed to orthodox writers: to Gregory Thaumaturgus, a detailed creed; to Athanasius, a sermon Quod unus sit Christus, De Incarnatione Dei Verbi, and a creed addressed to the emperor Jovian; to Julius I of Rome (337-52) De Unione Corporis et Divinitatis in Christo, De Fide et Incarnatione, and a letter to Dionysius. Two works can be reconstructed from his opponents: a Demonstratio de Divina Incarnatione from Gregory of Nyssa's Antirrheticus, and a brief Recapitulatio from a dialogue attributed to Athanasius. Only fragments of his other works can be gleaned from patristic writers and catenae. These included commentaries on both OT and NT, apologetic works against Porphyry and Emperor Julian, and dogmatic polemical works against Origen, Dionysius of Alexandria, Eunomius of Cyzicus, Marcellus of Ancyra, Diodore of Tarsus, and Flavian of Antioch. Of the metrical version of the Bible, only the Psalms are extant, and their authenticity is suspect.

Apollinarius belongs to the tradition of Alexandrian* Christology seen earlier in Athanasius and later in Cyril of Alexandria. Like the former, he held that Christ has one active principle, the divine Logos,* and that the essential attribute of His humanity (flesh) is its capacity for experience, not for initiative. His error was to exclude even the potential for initiative from the humanity of Christ.

Christ had one active principle alone, because according to the biblical evidence Christ is one and never experienced volitional conflict. The Logos was that principle, since only God (not man) can redeem, resurrect, and avoid error; only God could have performed miracles, displayed authority, and created. To see Christ as an inspired man, as Paul of Samosata did, or to attribute both divine and human active principles, is to rob Him of worship and to risk His being fallible. Christ became one in the union of the Logos and the flesh of Mary. The Spirit of God "sanctified" (cf. John 10:33-36) her flesh and formed Christ. Independently the Logos and flesh were incomplete, but together in the union they became someone living, "a mixture of God and man." This vital union alone distinguishes the flesh of Christ from human flesh in general, since in the latter case the "soul" of man (variously described as pneuma or psyche + nous) unites with flesh.

The Logos alone motivated Christ. His flesh, like Solomon's temple, had no independent life, mind, or will, but it "experienced" passively. Their dynamic unity was so close that Christians worship the flesh of Christ, becoming divine as they assimilate it in the Eucharist. Christ had no human source of initiative, no human soul, for the Logos alone saves, the flesh passively experiencing human conditions. Critics like Gregory of Nyssa pointed to the biblical evidence of Christ's human experience, to the principle of Hebrews 2:17, and to the presupposition that full salvation requires identification with full humanity, soul and flesh. Was Christ bound to sin if he had a human will?

APOLLINARIUS, CLAUDIUS. Bishop of Hierapolis, c.175. An apologist for the faith and critic of heresy, he wrote four apologies (to Emperor Marcus Aurelius, against the Greeks, on Truth, and against the Jews), an encyclical against the Montanists* who became active during his episcopate, and a treatise on Easter. All the writings are lost, but his loyalty to the Roman state and his fierce opposition to the Montanists are clear from the use made of his writings by Serapion of Antioch and the historian Eusebius.

APOLLONIUS OF TYANA (d. c.98). A Neopythagorean philosopher whose virtuous life and ascetic practices attracted widespread attention after his death. Philostratus, sophist at the emperor's court, was commanded by Julia Domna, wife of Severus, to write a "Life of Apollonius," possibly as a pagan counterpart to the life of Christ. In Philostratus's account, leading points of the gospel story are followed: Apollonius was the son of Jupiter and conscious of his filial sonship, and he went around doing good and performing miracles. Like Christ he was brought to trial, but unlike Christ he was miraculously delivered. Subsequently he ascended to heaven. This "Life" is the story of the gospels revised and made more palatable by non-Christians who were impressed by Christ. It is what the enlightened pagans around Julia Domna thought Christ should have been. It is significant that they omit the Crucifixion. G.L. CAREY

APOLOGETICS. The use of theology in order to justify Christianity before men, in the claims it makes to be ultimate truth, in the demands it makes on its followers, and in its universal mission. Jesus Himself was often ready to answer objections and insinuations made against Him and His teaching (cf. John 8:41-58; 18:19-24), which latter He developed and justified against His opponents (cf. Mark 2:6-12; 10:2-9; Luke 4:22-28, etc.). Paul also tried to speak about the wisdom and power of the Cross in the light of deep-seated objections (cf. 1 Cor. 1:18-31). "Always be prepared," wrote Peter (1 Pet. 3:15), "to give an answer to everyone who asks you to give the reason for the hope that you have."

Defensive statements of faith, or "apologies," appear as early as the second century when a group known as the "Apologists"* (Justin, Tatian, Athenagoras, Tertullian, etc.) took up the task of answering current slanders against Christianity—e.g., that it encouraged cannibalism and impiety, that it discouraged loyalty to state religion—and was therefore atheistic—and that its central doctrines were ridiculous and offensive. The Apologists stressed the antiquity of the Gospel, the genuineness of its miracles, and its striking fulfillment of prophecy. They had to show Christianity, not only as a superior religion, but as the ultimate truth. They tried to bridge the gap between their opponents and themselves by laying hold of what they believed were similarities as well as differences between the Gospel and pagan philosophy.

After the establishment of the Church under Constantine, apologetics became an aspect of the work of great constructive theologians such as Augustine and, later, Aquinas. Even Calvin's Institutes was presented with a noble introductory letter to the French king Francis I as a defensive statement of the faith he was mistakenly persecuting. Wherever theology has pursued its main task, the apologetic aim has never been lacking: demonstrating the validity of the claims it makes for Christ, and showing that the faith is not unreasonable but has its own inner logic and consistency. In the late eighteenth and nineteenth centuries, however, apologetics developed as a special branch of theology dealing with the defense and proof of Christianity.

Among other matters, apologetics has sought to meet questions about the historicity of the main events on which Christianity is based, and of the Bible. It has discussed miracles, the existence of God, the knowledge of God, the harmonizing of the biblical account of Creation with that of science (i.e., "Christian Evidences").

There are dangers in a too specific and conscious apologetic approach in our statement of the Gospel: overmuch attention to specific objections can lead to an unhealthy one-sided emphasis. A defensive program, moreover, tends to produce the mentality that prefers seclusion to open Christian warfare. In defending the Gospel, theology must never change what is essential either in its content or form or message, or remove the offense of the Cross. But dialogue need not involve compromise. Growth in understanding can come by struggling with the questions and even the unjust accusations of opponents (cf. 2 Sam. 16:9-12). An alien world needs to be shown that the Gospel has also the only teaching and power that can enable man to recover and express his true humanity.

APOLOGISTS. The term given to a number of early Christian writers (c.120-220) who belonged to a period in history when the growing Christian Church was meeting with ever-increasing hostility in every department of public life. They include Quadratus, Aristides, Justin, Tatian, Theophilus, Minucius Felix, and Tertullian. They worked on the frontier of the church, seeking to defend the Faith from misrepresentation and attack, commending it to the inquirer and demonstrating the falsity of both Judaism and polytheism. These writers did not need to create a literary form for their purpose, because it already existed in the legal speech for the defense (apologia) which was delivered before the judicial authorities and subsequently published. There was also the literary form of the dialogue which was usually based upon fictitious circumstances. As the person of Christ was the central difficulty to pagan thinkers, the Apologists found the Logos concept common to both Platonism and Christianity a welcome means of making this doctrine acceptable to Hellenistic philosophy.

APOPHTHEGMATA PATRUM. An anonymous collection of ascetic sayings and anecdotes which illustrate early monastic thought, especially in Egypt. A Greek edition, produced probably in the sixth century, ranks the material in alphabetical order according to the names of speakers. The basic core stems from Coptic* monks in the Wadi Natron, and their words and deeds have been added to from other areas. The sayings or examples arose when inquirers induced ascetics to break their accustomed silence with the request, "Grant me a word." The reply was recorded orally and later in writing with the veneration given to divine revelation. Corresponding disregard for biblical teaching is illustrated by Amoun: "We prefer to use the Sayings of the Fathers and not passages of the Bible; it is very dangerous to quote the Bible."

G.T.D. ANGEL

APOSTASY. The abandonment or renunciation of Christianity, either voluntarily or by compulsion. The use of the term for religious apostasy in the Hebrew-Christian tradition derives probably from Septuagint usage. Both voluntary (Josh. 22: 22; 2 Chron. 22:9) and involuntary aspects occur (1 Macc. 2:15). Mattathias's refusal to apostatize to pagan rites was the occasion for the Maccabean revolt; it denoted deserting from, rebellion against, or abandonment of the Mosaic teaching. While the term does not occur in the KJV, it does in the Greek (Acts 21:21; 2 Thess. 2:3).

There are frequent biblical allusions to the evils and the dangers of apostasy. It is described as departure from the faith (1 Tim. 4:1-3), being carried away by the error of lawless men (2 Pet. 3:17), and falling away from the living God (Heb. 3:12). The great apostasy, "The Rebellion" of 2 Thess. 2:3, is associated with the return of Christ. The serious consequences of apostasy are stressed in Hebrew 6:4-6; 10:26 (cf. 2 Pet. 2:20). It occurs through the subverting activities of false teachers (Matt. 24:11; Jude, etc.), but it may also occur because of persecution and stress (Matt. 24:9, 10; Luke 8:13). Thus the NT warns against both voluntary and involuntary apostasy so identified.

Church history reflects the activities of apostates and alleged apostates, and as well the problems of persecution, involuntary recanting, and what to do with the lapsed. The use of the civil power by both Catholics and Protestants to punish those charged with apostasy resulted in great cruelties during the Middle Ages and later. The Anabaptist concept of a religiously composite society prevailed in the New World and later in the Old also. Compositism does not diminish the seriousness of doctrinal error, but it does tolerate divergent views within society under law in the belief that persuasion not coercion reflects the Christian ideal. This in no way abrogates the responsibility of the Church to maintain and defend its doctrinal purity in relation to the norms of biblical teaching.

APOSTLE. The Greek word apostolos means "one sent out." In the New Testament it derives part of its meaning from the Hebrew shaliah, who acted as a representative for others. It is conferred on Jesus in Hebrew 3:1, but is normally reserved for those appointed for a special function in the church. From the large number of disciples who followed Him in His ministry, Jesus chose twelve whom He called apostles (Luke 6:13). They were to act in His name (Mark 9:38-41). After Jesus' resurrection there had to be found a replacement for the traitor Judas so that the number could be made up to twelve, and Matthias was chosen (Acts 1:15-26). There is no record of a replacement for James bar Zebedee (Acts 12:2). The qualification was to have been with Jesus from John's baptism to the Ascension and to have been a witness of the Resurrection. This meant an experience of the saving events and therefore the ability to preach the kerygma firsthand.

To Paul, who did not have the same contact with Jesus during the ministry, there was given a special resurrection appearance and a special commission to go to the Gentiles (Acts 26:16-18; 1 Cor. 9:1; 15:8). There was a division of spheres of responsibility arranged between him and the Jerusalem apostles (Gal. 2:1-10). The apostles were seen as a gift of the Spirit to the church (1 Cor. 12:28; Eph. 4:11), and the work of the true apostle was accompanied by signs and wonders and mighty works (2 Cor. 12:12; cf. Acts 8:14-19). The apostles were seen as part of the foundation of the church (Eph. 2:20), and it was through them as witnesses to the saving events and as interpreters of them, as well as chief ministers in the church and propagators of the Gospel, that the mission of Christ was completed. The term is also used of others such as James the brother of Jesus apparently (Gal. 1:19; 2:9; cf. 1 Cor. 15:7), Barnabas (Acts 14:4, 14), Silvanus and Timothy (1 Thess. 2:6), and Andronicus and Junias (Rom. 16:7).

APOSTLES' CREED. A statement of faith used by both Roman Catholic and Protestant churches in the West. Originally treated with suspicion by the Eastern churches, it is now accepted as orthodox, but not used in public services. The origin of the Apostles' Creed is to be found in the form learned by the catechumen in the course of his preparation for baptism in the early church. This kind of confession was called a symbolum and was not intended to be a complete summary of Christian doctrine, but rather a brief statement about the Trinity and the person and work of Christ. Since an important part of the catechesis consisted of memorizing the symbolum and repeating it to the bishop after scrutiny, it is not surprising that few written specimens of the early baptismal creed have survived. The old Roman form is known, however, from a commentary by Rufinus (c.404). Since virtually the same creed exists in a Greek version by Marcellus of Ancyra (c.340), it is supposed to date from the time when the liturgical language at Rome was still Greek (i.e., before c.250). The baptism service described in the Apostolic Tradition of Hippolytus (c.215) puts a similar creed in the form of a question to the candidate in three parts, demanding a threefold response of faith.

The structure of the Old Roman Creed was Trinitarian, with a considerable expansion of the second article about Christ to include a list of His saving acts which were proclaimed in the primitive kerygma. Three German scholars (K. Holl, A. von Harnack, and H. Lietzmann) have argued strongly that in fact the creed was produced by welding together a Trinitarian formula (perhaps derived from Matt. 28:19) with an originally independent christological summary. Other scholars (e.g., J.H. Crehan) believe the christological part was the primitive baptismal confession.

The Old Roman Creed became the standard pattern for the church throughout the West. Nicetas of Remesiana was using a similar text at the end of the fourth century. In the sixth century Caesarius of Arles gives evidence of a process of elaboration which took place in Gaul and eventually gained acceptance at Rome itself. These additional phrases are seven in number: "maker of heaven and earth"; "conceived"; "dead"; "He descended into hell"; "almighty"; "catholic"; and, "the communion of saints." The earliest example of the Latin text in exactly its modern form dates from the eighth century. While there is no foundation for the story of Rufinus that each apostle contributed an article to this creed, it has commended itself as a useful and succinct statement of faith which is today used frequently in worship. Although no longer confined to baptism, it should serve as a constant reminder of the Christian's baptismal confession.

APOSTOLIC CANONS. Eighty-five canons attributed to the apostles are contained in book 8 of the *Apostolic Constitutions (c.381). They deal both with the election, ordination, official responsibilities, and moral conduct of clergy and with Christian life in general. Deposition and excommunication of offenders are given as sanctions. They are first referred to as a set at the Council of Constantinople in 394, but some are paralleled by canons of the Synod of Antioch (341). Canon 85 provides a list of sacred books; the Apocalypse is omitted, but included are three books of the Maccabees, three letters of Clement, and the Apostolic Constitutions themselves. Dionysius Exiguus* translated canons 1-50 into Latin and included them among his larger collections of canons. This formed the basis of Western canon law. The East accepted all the canons while rejecting the Apostolic Constitutions as a whole at the Trullan Council (692). G.T.D. ANGEL

APOSTOLIC CONSTITUTIONS. Eight books on church pastoral and liturgical practice, they are attributed to Clement of Rome, but were compiled by an Eastern Arian in the late fourth century. Rejected because of heretical influence by the Trullan Council in 692, they had little regulative influence on the Greek Church, although excerpts are found in Eastern collections of canon law. Material from earlier works such as the *Didascalia (early third century) and the Apostolic Tradition of Hippolytus (c.200-220) is taken over and brought up to date. For example, the epiclesis in the Apostolic Constitutions is more concrete than the invocation of the Spirit in the Apostolic Tradition, and a forty-day fast now precedes Easter, whereas the Didascalia appoints a fast for Holy Week alone. Again, minor orders* have increased to subdeacon, janitor, and psaltes. Significant inclusions are the Gloria and the so-called Clementine liturgy of the Mass. Book 8 contains the *Apostolic Canons. G.T.D. ANGEL

APOSTOLIC DELEGATE. An official permanent papal representative from the Holy See to the Roman Catholic Church of a given area, usually where no Nuncio* is appointed. His office is ecclesiastical, not diplomatic, with the duties of observing and reporting to the Holy See on the life of the church and of communicating instructions of all kinds from Rome to the church. A delegate was appointed to the American Catholic Church in 1892-93, the British in 1938, the Canadian in 1899.

APOSTOLIC FATHERS. A group of early Christian writers believed at one time to have had direct contact with apostles. J.B. Cotelier's edition (1672) of the Epistle of Barnabas, 1 and 2 Clement, the Shepherd of Hermas, and the Epistles of Ignatius and Polycarp spoke of "the Fathers who flourished in Apostolic Times," while L.T. Ittig published Clement, Ignatius, and Polycarp as "Apostolic Fathers" in 1699. Severus of Antioch had used the phrase similarly in the sixth century. Other works have featured among later collections: the fragments of Papias and Quadratus, the Epistle to Diognetus, the *Didache, and the Martyrdoms of Clement, Ignatius, and Polycarp. Recent editors have generally omitted Quadratus, the Martyrdoms except for Polycarp's, and often the Epistle to Diognetus. The designation "apostolic" is problematic in every case, but is most appropriately applied, if at all, to Clement, Ignatius, and Polycarp. As used today of the earliest noncanonical writings of the late first and early second centuries, it is more conventional than descriptive.

In emphasis they are broadly pastoral and practical rather than theological or speculative, concerned with the internal life of the Christian communities moving toward "early Catholicism." Their alleged decline from apostolic Christianity (e.g., T.F. Torrance, The Doctrine of Grace in the Apostolic Fathers, 1948) appears less flagrant when their limited aims and changed circumstances are taken into account, but remains inescapable. They frequently recall NT books, especially the Pauline epistles, but not always as Scripture on a par with the OT. Their access to written gospels rather than other forms of the gospel tradition is often difficult to demonstrate, but has been too readily denied by H. Koester. Some of these writings enjoyed for varying periods localized recognition on the fringe of the NT canon.

APOSTOLICI. Several bodies and sects have used this name. Epiphanius (c.315-403), bishop of Salamis, used the name for several Gnostic communities of his day. The title was also adopted by ascetic groups which flourished in the twelfth century near Cologne and in France. They claimed to imitate the apostles in renouncing the world, believing all matter to be absolutely corrupt. Several groups rejected marriage. They attacked the hierarchy of the church, believing it was so corrupt as to have vitiated all the sacraments except baptism. The name was used also for a sect founded in Parma in 1260 by Gerard Segarelli who, after his sect had twice been condemned by Rome, was burnt to death in 1300. His successor, Fra Dolcino, who expounded apocalyptic doctrines, was also put to death. The name has further been used by some Anabaptist sects.

APOSTOLIC SUCCESSION. The theory of a continuing line of descent from the apostles to the present-day church transmitted through episcopal consecration. The death of the apostles left a problem of continuity for future generations because they had been the representatives of the ascended Christ as witnesses and interpreters of the saving events. At first there were claims to a succession of doctrine. Where the Gnostics* claimed a secret tradition traceable to the apostles, catholic Christians asserted that the succession of bishop to bishop in a see would mean that the teaching originally given by the apostles was faithfully preserved. The idea which gained greater currency seems to be first found in the West in the third century among Christians with legal minds, such as Tertullian and Cyprian. This was that the apostles had by consecration appointed bishops as their sucessors and that they in turn had consecrated other bishops. In this way the apostolate was kept alive in the episcopate, and this became a guarantee of truth and grace. In modern times this view has had particular attraction for "Catholic" Christians who did not acknowledge the see of Rome, because it seemed to ensure their "catholicity." It was held particularly strongly among a number of Anglicans from the time of Newman and has strongly influenced the practice of the Anglican Communion in relations with other churches. Its last major defense was in The Apostolic Ministry (ed. K.E. Kirk, 1946). Since then it has been demonstrated to the satisfaction of most scholars that the argument derived from the concept of shaliah is invalid because the shaliah could not pass on his commission, and that the NT evidence is strongly against there being monepiscopal succession throughout the Church.

APPIAN WAY (Lat. Via Appia). The road from Rome to southern Italy. It is named after the censor Appius Claudius Caecus who built the section from Rome to Capua in 312 B.C. By 244 B.C. it had been extended to Brundisium (Brindisi), a total of 234 miles. Acts 28 tells how Paul, on his journey to Rome, landed at Puteoli and presumably from there went to join the Appian Way at Capua. He met groups of Christians on the road at the Forum of Appius and the Three Taverns. The section of the road from Rome to Beneventum is well preserved, but beyond there it came to be neglected because of the building of the Via Traiana. By the roadside there are many tombs—some of them of famous Romans—and some ancient pavement, bridges, and milestones. Christian monuments along this part of the Appian Way include the catacombs of St. Callistus, the burying place of most of the third-century bishops of Rome

AQUARIANS. A description of certain people and sects in the early church (e.g., Tatian the Syrian and the Encratites*) who used water (aqua) instead of wine in the celebration of Holy Communion. Such people were also called Hydroparastatae (Gr. = "those who advocate water"). This practice was attacked by such men as Cyprian, Augustine, and Philaster.

AQUAVIVA, CLAUDIUS (1543-1615). Fifth general of the Jesuit order. Born into the aristocratic family of the duke of Atri, in Abruzzi, he became a student of civil and canon law at Perugia. He was a Jesuit novitiate in Rome in 1567, served as a provincial at Naples and Rome, and was elected superior general in 1581. A gifted leader and statesman, he consolidated the work of the order and promoted its wider influence. His leadership was tested in the early days of his generalship: persecution in England, trouble with the Huguenots in France, unpopularity of the order resulting in expulsion from Venice, and division within the society in Spain, organized by C. Vasque, backed by Philip II and the pope. Aquaviva placated the pope and withstood a demand for an examination into the order's constitution by the Inquisition (a possible indication of the rivalry between Dominicans and Jesuits). An attempt by Sixtus V to alter the order's organization was averted by the pope's death. During Aquaviva's leadership the society developed its missionary work, e.g., substantial work in Japan and educational work in the Philippines. The order was also involved in theological controversy, in particular with the Dominicans on the matter of grace. Aquaviva stressed the spiritual life and discipline with the establishment of a system of rules that have been the basis of the Jesuit system of education, Ratio Studiorum, issued finally in 1599, as well as a comprehensive interpretation of Ignatius's Spiritual Exercises.

GORDON A. CATHERALL

AQUINAS, THOMAS (1224-1274). The greatest philosopher and theologian of the medieval church. Born in Italy, he studied at the University of Naples and became a Dominican in 1244. Later he studied under Albertus Magnus at Paris, and also at Cologne. Most of the remainder of his life was spent as a teacher in Paris. In 1273 he had to discontinue his Summa Theologica due to ill health. He died the following year.

His thought is expressed in an enormous literary output, not only the Summa contra Gentiles (1261-64), intended as a manual of apologetics and doctrine for missionaries, and the Summa Theologica (1265-73), on which his reputation as a theologian and philosopher chiefly rests, but also in commentaries on Scripture, and on Aristotle,* and a variety of miscellaneous discussions. The Summa Theologica must be seen as a marvelous systematizing of the data of Christian revelation (as understood by Aquinas) along Aristotelian lines, impressive in the thoroughness and the success with which the program was executed. The Augustinian contrast between the certainty of the intelligible order (known through intellectual illumination) and the uncertainty (and hence/unreliability) of sense impressions was replaced by the Aristotelian contrast between "form" and "matter." All human knowledge is regarded as being sensory in origin, and the human understanding, through abstraction, is able to build up knowledge of the forms of things. But if knowledge is sensory in origin, how may God be known? Much of Thomas's work may be considered an answer to that question.

He made a sharp distinction between "sacred doctrine" and philosophy. Sacred doctrine proceeds from the data of revelation, philosophy from data accessible to (and acceptable to) all men. It is a mistake to think of Aquinas as a Christian philosopher if by this is meant someone who elaborates answers to philosophical questions on the basis of Christian revelation. The different places assigned to philosophy and theology may be vividly illustrated by Thomas's view of creation. Philosophically the universe might be eternal. But the Christian believes from revelation that creation is an act of God.

Aquinas claimed that God's existence can be established philosophically. His famous "Five Ways" are five a posteriori arguments (some say, five variants of one basic argument) based on God's effects in the world, data open to all men. The Five Ways may be seen as an effort to fill a gap in explanation, to show that if certain contingent states of affairs exist, there must be some necessary ground for their existence. How much Thomas's arguments depend on outmoded science, whether the arguments are sound, and whether, if at least one of them is sound, the God whose existence is established is the god of Christian revelation—these are all debatable and much-debated questions.

The Five Ways provide a part of one answer to the question, How may God be known? He is knowable only by His effects. Yet not only by His effects in nature, but also by His revelation in Scripture, to the acceptance of which the Five Ways are a natural, rational preamble. Not only was Aquinas a natural theologian, he was an eminent philosopher of revelation, employing philosophical concepts in elucidating the propositions and notions of revealed truth.

Despite the elaborateness of his theological discussions, Thomas's stress was on how little God is known. God is categorically distinct from His creatures, unique, transcendent. How then can He be spoken about? Only imperfectly. Such speech is by means of analogy (God's wisdom is in some respects the same as Solomon's wisdom, in some respects different) and negation (God is not embodied, He does not exist in time) from speech about finite things. Hence the doctrine of analogy (in particular) plays a crucial role in Thomas's account of the knowledge of God.

He distinguished between faith, opinion, and knowledge. Faith, an act of the mind, is stronger than opinion. It involves a firm assent to its object. But because it lacks full comprehension (vision) it is less than knowledge. Religious faith is a species of this genus. (Aquinas knows nothing of faith as a "leap in the dark" or as "personal but not propositional.") The disposition to have faith in divinely revealed matters is a product of God's grace.

God's sovereignty is expressed by saying that He is the "first cause" of all that is, evil (regarded by Aquinas, following Augustine, as a privation of goodness) excepted. Does this mean that God is the efficient cause of all that is? If so, what about human freedom? Aquinas is firmly Augustinian as well in his insistence on God's providential ordering of human actions, and of his foreknowledge of them. Foreknowledge does not causally necessitate actions, it makes them certain, as from God's point of view all actions take place in an "eternal present."

In ethics Thomas's thinking stresses the purposive, end-directed character of human action. He distinguishes between moral theology (action viewed in accordance with divinely revealed law) and general ethical principles which, through an appreciation of natural law, are accessible to all. In his account of human action Aquinas stresses voluntariness (not freedom in the sense of indeterminacy) as a necessary condition of fully human (i.e., responsible) action.

The influence of Aquinas on the Christian Church has been enormous, although the acclaim his work received was not instantaneous (several of his teachings were condemned as errors after his death, a decision later reversed). The strong modern revival of his influence and of "Thomism" dates from the publication of the encyclical Aeterni Patris by Leo XIII in 1879, praising and endorsing Thomism and giving it an "official" (though not exclusive) place in the thinking of the Roman Catholic Church.

The influence of Aquinas on Protestantism must not be minimized. Though what were regarded as his (and others') speculative excesses and unbiblical errors were repudiated at the Reformation, the Augustinian character of much of his theology was gratefully recognized. Post-Tridentine Protestant systematic theologians such as F. Turretin were obviously indebted to him both methodologically and for detailed arguments on points held in common. Similarly, Thomas's view of apologetics—the sharp distinction between "nature" (accessible to all) and "grace" (derived from revelation, but perfecting, not repudiating, the conclusions of reason)—has been a recurring theme in Protestantism, which the strong post-Kantian tradition, culminating in the work of Karl Barth, ought not to be allowed to hide. The influence of Thomas will always be felt where philosophical theology is pursued vigorously. But Thomism, pursued uncritically, can have an intellectually cramping effect. And where religion is understood primarily in terms of values and not of truths, his influence can be expected to be much less.

ARABIC VERSIONS OF THE NEW TESTAMENT. Christianity was established in Arabia well before the rise of Islam, but evidence is lacking of any attempt to translate the Bible into Arabic in the pre-Islamic era. The first complete Arabic Bible is attributed to Hunayn b. Ishâq (ninth century), but it is not extant. Parts of the New Testament were translated before then; the Mt. Sinai monastery has provided a manuscript of the gospels dating from perhaps as early as the eighth century (as well as a tenth-century MS of some of Paul's epistles). The great majority of Arabic New Testament MSS are late, however, few of them antedating the sixteenth century. The lateness of the MSS limits their usefulness for NT textual criticism; moreover they are of very mixed ancestry, some of the material being translated, not from Greek, but from Syriac, Latin, and Coptic sources. The two surviving Arabic recensions of Tatian's Diatessaron are of greater importance. The first printed Arabic NT appears in the Paris Polyglot (1629-45). The Society for the Propagation of Christian Knowledge first published an Arabic NT in 1727, the British and Foreign Bible Society in 1816. More recently, translations have been produced under both Roman Catholic and Protestant auspices. Some parts of the NT are also available in certain of the Arabic colloquials.

ARAMAIC. A Semitic language closely related to Hebrew and the language of certain parts of the OT (Ezra 4:8–6:18; 7:12-26; Jer. 10:11; Dan. 2:4–7:28). Numerous references to the Aramaeans occur in Assyrian inscriptions of the second millennium B.C., but the earliest Aramaic inscriptions come from the tenth or ninth centuries B.C. Aramaic was a diplomatic language in the Assyrian Empire (cf. 2 Kings 18:26) and consolidated its position in the Babylonian and Persian empires, becoming the official language of the latter (cf. the fifth-century Aramaic papyri from the Jewish colony on Elephantine). In the postexilic period Aramaic took over from Hebrew as the language of the common people in Palestine (cf. Acts 22:2). Included among the Dead Sea finds are some fragments of early Aramaic Targums and the so-called Genesis Apocryphon dating perhaps from the first century B.C. Aramaic, in the Galilean dialect, was spoken by our Lord and His disciples (cf. Matt. 26:73; Mark 5:41; 7:34, etc.); the amount of Aramaic spoken in first-century Palestine is currently a matter of debate. Aramaic idiom can frequently be detected beneath the Greek form of the gospels (cf. Mark 4:12), but theories of Aramaic originals are generally regarded as untenable. By the beginning of the Christian era Aramaic had divided into two branches: West Aramaic (Nabatean, Palmyrene, Jewish Palestinian) and East Aramaic (Syriac, Babylonian Aramaic, Mandaean). The Aramaic Palestinian Targums to the Pentateuch, and the residual Palestinian material in the Babylonian versions of the Pentateuch and Prophets, preserve much valuable material roughly contemporary with the NT writings.

ARBROATH, DECLARATION OF (1320). A letter drawn up by a large number of Scottish nobles and barons and "the whole community of the realm," and sent to the pope who had declared against Robert the Bruce. The document stated that Providence, the laws, the customs of the country, and the choice of the people, had made Bruce their king, and that if he betrayed his country they would elect another. They cared not for glory, continued the declaration, but for that liberty which no man renounces until death.

ARBUTHNOTT MISSAL. Transcribed between 1471 and 1491 for use in Arbuthnott Church, Kincardineshire, it is the only missal of the pre-Reformation Scottish use now extant. The Sarum use is followed, but there are also masses for St. Columba, St. Ternan (patron of Arbuthnott), and St. Ninian. Prepared at the expense of Sir Robert Arbuthnott by James Sibbald, vicar of Arbuthnott, it includes an obituary of the Arbuthnott family from 1314 to 1551 and is notable for its ornaments of flowers, leaves, scrolls and fruit, showing the beginnings of the Renaissance style. It is preserved along with the Arbuthnott Prayer Book and the Arbuthnott Psalter in Paisley Museum.

ARCHAEOLOGY AND THE EARLY CHRISTIAN CHURCH. Some definition of the period under study in this article is necessary because of the vast field. The Christian Church was born at Pentecost in the days of the Roman procurator Pontius Pilate (A.D. 26-36). The upper limit of the term "early" is presumably at the start of the medieval period. Discussion here is limited, therefore, to the period between the beginning of the second century and the first half of the seventh century. The archaeological evidence from the first century is normally covered by the archaeology of the NT. In Palestine the year 638 marks the time that Jerusalem fell to the Muslims. The Muslim conquest of the Middle East marked the end of an age, although in the West no such transition is recognized. In the interests of brevity this article shall examine the period c.100-650—i.e., to the later Roman and earlier Byzantine periods.

In the early decades after the death and resurrection of Jesus Christ, the Christian Church spread rapidly and by the early second century had taken root in Egypt, Palestine, Syria, Mesopotamia, Asia Minor, Greece, Rome, and even further to the west. During the centuries that followed, significant structures of many varieties were erected throughout these areas—churches, chapels, monasteries. There were also tombs, catacombs, and various memorial structures. The churches contained a vast range of items of furniture used in their services: floor mosaics, painted frescoes, jeweled crosses, manuscripts, etc.

An important aid in the interpretation of the archaeological finds is the writings that have come down to us from these early centuries—church histories like that of Eusebius* (c.265-c.339), accounts of pilgrims like that of the Bordeaux Pilgrim* (c.333), important geographical mosaics like the one from Madaba in Transjordan from the second half of the sixth century, and a wide variety of inscriptions.

We commence with a brief review of the churches of Palestine up to the seventh century. Approximately two hundred of these remain for study although some are in very fragmentary form. The earliest churches were in houses and have disappeared. During the second and third centuries in both East and West, the church adopted the basilica* type of structure for worship. This was an oblong building with interior colonnades. The advent of Constantine the Great as emperor of Rome (312-37) brought a tremendous impetus to church building everywhere in the Roman world. In Palestine there is little evidence of pre-Constantine structures. Constantine remains have now been identified in the Church of the Holy Sepulchre in Jerusalem and in the Church of the Nativity in Bethlehem.

Sacred edifices of the post-Constantine period are known both from excavation and from literary sources. Excavation and archaeological survey show that there were three main types of church —the basilica with one, three, or five naves; the circular or octagonal church; and the mixed type which combined these two into a cruciform church.

In Palestine the majority of the larger churches which were built from the fourth to the seventh centuries were basilicas with a nave and two aisles. At the end of the nave stood an apse, and at the end of the aisles a small chamber or an apse. The original Church of the Nativity at Bethlehem had three aisles and a single apse. The later church built by Justinian (527-65) had five aisles and a central apse in the east wall and an apse in each of the north and south walls. Other early Palestinian churches are St. Lazarus at Bethany, the Church of the Probatic Pool in Jerusalem, the Church of the Finding of the Head of John the Baptist at Sebaste (Samaria), and the Church of the Multiplying of the Loaves and Fishes at Tabgha near the Sea of Galilee—all fifth-century churches.

Some basilicas had one protruding external apse. This was common in the West but not in Palestine. In some cases the apse was polygonal. Side apses took the place of side chambers in many churches. In a few churches the apses were arranged in a trefoil as at Bethlehem and in the Church of St. Theodosius near Jerusalem.

A few churches with a central plan, circular, octagonal, or trefoil, are known. The oldest is from the end of the fourth century—the Church of the Ascension on the Mount of Olives. The old cathedral of Beisan and the church on Mt. Gerizim (fifth century) are examples. The cruciform plan is rare. Probably there was one such church at Shechem and another at the Tomb of the Virgin in Jerusalem.

Both the contemporary literature and modern excavations provide evidence of a flourishing church in Transjordan in the early Christian centuries. The most important center is Jerash. In the days of Justinian no fewer than seven churches were built, but thirteen are known in the area, mostly closely dated. The cathedral (c.350-75) is pre-Justinian and, probably the earliest; it was a three-aisled basilica with an enclosed apse. The Church of St. Theodore built between 474 and 476 is nearby, and just to the west are three churches side by side. The central one of St. John the Baptist is circular; the two others, that of St. George and that of SS. Cosmas and Damianus, are basilicas, all built between 529 and 533. All these churches are rich in mosaic floors. Several other fine churches existed in Jerash.

Further south at Ras Siyagh on Mt. Nebo stood the fine fifth-century church and adjacent monastery. Other churches including traces of a fourth-century structure have been found in the same area. At Madaba stood the Church of Theotokos going back to the sixth century. The floor of another sixth-century church yielded the famous Madaba map which, though partly destroyed, has preserved valuable geographical information about Palestine and an excellent map of Jerusalem. At Petra there were Christian churches. One tomb has an inscription referring to its conversion into a church in the fifth century. At Umm al-Jimal, northeast of Amman, numerous Christian churches go back to the Byzantine period. The cathedral dates to 557. There are at least nine other churches in the city.

Syria too had its quota of ancient churches. According to Eusebius, a magnificent church was built in Antioch. This has disappeared, but two other fine churches are known in the same area. In the village of Kaoussie the Church of St. Babylas was built in 387, according to information preserved in the floor mosaics. Then at Seleucia, the port of Antioch, may be seen the ruins of the Martyrion, a quatrefoil-shaped church with an ambulatory adorned with rich mosaics and a chancel projecting east. It was built originally in the late fifth century.

In the interior of Syria many early churches were lost and rediscovered a century ago. The greatest was Qalat Siman, the Church of St. Simeon Stylites, northeast of Antioch, built at the end of the fifth century. In southern Syria at Bosra (Bostra), once the seat of an archbishop, there stood an impressive cathedral, circular in shape, enclosed in a square with circular apses at the corners and a chancel and apse. There are other old churches in the region. The house church of Dura-Europos on the Euphrates is of particular interest. A room in a private house was transformed into a church in the early third century. Later a wall was removed to include a second room. A baptistery stood in the northwest corner of the house. Wall paintings and graffiti identify the building as a church. Further east at Edessa and Nisibis and also in Persia there are the remains of numerous churches in use long before the Muslim conquest.

Anatolia was opened to the Christian gospel following Paul's work. By the time of the Council of Nicea in 325 there was a network of bishoprics all over the area. Significant archaeological work has been done this century.

*Constantinople, the former Byzantium, was named by Constantine as his new capital in 330. He adorned the city with many structures, among them houses of prayer and memorials to martyrs. At least two churches were founded by him, the Church of the Apostles, which has now disappeared, and the Church of St. Eirene, formerly a Christian sanctuary but considerably enlarged. The original church was damaged by fire in 532, restored, and again damaged by earthquake in 740. Some elements of these older churches remain. Another famous church, Hagia Sophia, has likewise suffered through the ages. It became a mosque but is today a museum of Byzantine art. Ancient mosaics have been excavated.

The city of Rome is of very great importance in the field of Christian archaeology. Here Constantine built the most famous basilicas of the fourth century, chief among them being the Church of St. Peter. Due to many changes over the centuries little remains of the original basilica, but there are traces, and its outlines are clear. The whole area of St. Peter's has been subject to intense archaeological investigation. The question of Peter's tomb has been raised many times. The site was formerly a pagan cemetery but later used by Christians also. Constantine built churches at places associated with strong Christian traditions. A tradition about Peter's burial here must have existed when Constantine built the basilica.

The Liber Pontificalis, a series of biographies of the popes from the seventh century, refers to many churches in Rome, among them the Church of St. Paul Outside the Walls, originally built by Constantine. Little of Constantine's church remains, yet there is a vast task for the archaeologist to unravel the many reconstructions in this church. Numerous other churches in Rome have a long history of destruction, extension, and reconstruction. All of them are of interest to the archaeologist.

Space does not permit discussion of other churches in Greece, Italy, France, Britain, Spain, Egypt, North Africa—all of which have many Christian remains from the early Christian centuries.

Brief mention must now be made of several other aspects of the archaeology of the early Christian Church—mosaics, church furniture and utensils, tombs, catacombs, inscriptions, papyri, Christian symbols, and art.

Following secular practice, the Christian Church in every land made great use of mosaics in the floors of its churches, courtyards, and other structures, Palestinian towns and villages during these centuries paved their churches with mosaics, generally with geometrical designs but sometimes with beautiful compositions of plants, animals, and human figures. Important centers for this craft lay in the regions of Nebo, Jerash, Bethlehem, Et Tabgha, Beit Jibrin, 'Amwas. Sometimes inscriptions woven into the mosaic work preserve valuable geographical and historical information.

The recovery of church furnishings including altars, reliquaries, ciboria, basins, crosses, chalices, pattens, candlesticks, thuribles, and lamps is a feature of early Christian archaeology.

The tombs and catacombs of the early Christian Church have contributed greatly to our understanding of the burial practices and the art of the early church. The best known of the Christian catacombs are in Rome. The four oldest are those of Lucina, Callistus, Domitilla, and Priscilla. In 1867 it was estimated that Christian catacombs covered a surface area of 615 acres. The total length of the corridors was 500 miles. Today thirty-five or more Christian catacombs are known around Rome alone. One section of the catacomb of Praetextatus goes back to the second century. Other sections belong to the third and fourth centuries. In the catacomb of Sebastian, among numerous graffiti scratched on the walls in Greek and Latin are more than a hundred short prayers addressed to Peter and Paul. Apart from the catacombs, hundreds of Christian sarcophagi, ossuaries, and burial chambers have been excavated. Many bear inscriptions or graffiti and display a distinctive Christian art.

Not the least exciting of the discoveries from the early Christian centuries are important biblical manuscripts. A fragment of John's gospel found in Egypt and dated to the first half of the second century attests the presence of Christians there at an early date. The Chester Beatty Papyri* dating from the second to the fourth century, also from Egypt, contain parts of nine OT and fifteen NT books. The Bodmer Papyri from about the second century include the gospels of Luke and John and some of the NT epistles, parts of Genesis, and some apocryphal works.

Finally, in the area of art and Christian symbols there is a wealth of detail to be obtained from church architecture and ornamentation, floor mosaics, frescoes, catacomb and church paintings, church statuary, sarcophagi, and ossuaries.

Clearly the contribution of archaeology to our understanding of the early Christian Church is enormous and demands the attention of specialists for every land and for each significant area of the subject.

ARCHBISHOP. The title given to a bishop who has jurisdiction over the other bishops of a province besides exercising episcopal authority in his own diocese. The title seems originally to have been given in the fourth and fifth centuries to prelates of outstanding sees such as Rome or Alexandria, or when provincial synods were held in the chief town of the province under the presidency of the bishop.

ARCHDEACON. An Anglican cleric who has administrative authority of part or all of a diocese delegated to him by his bishop. He is particularly concerned with the proper maintenance of church property and also with a general disciplinary role toward the parish clergy. He must be in priest's orders. In the Eastern and Roman churches the office now has virtually no significance. From the third/fourth century and archdeacon was the chief deacon at the bishop's church with responsibilities for preaching, supervision of the deacons' pastoral and administrative work, and the distribution of alms. With the expansion of the church from the fourth century and the increase in revenue, the archdeacon's role became increasingly important. In the Middle Ages in the West he was second only to the bishop until rivalry led to a radical curtailment of his power.

HOWARD SAINSBURY

ARCHIMANDRITE (Gr. archimandritēs, "head of the fold"). In patristic Greek the word mandra served as a designation for the temple or the church, but in the late fourth century it was applied to emerging monasticism, which was legally regulated by Justinian I (527-65) following the Basilian pattern, placing each monastery or group of monasteries under the control of the archimandrite. Though he was usually a presbyter, he could be a deacon or even a lay monk elected by majority vote of the community, though receiving the staff of his office from the diocesan bishop.

ARCHITECTURE, CHRISTIAN. As the science of building for distinctively Christian activities, Christian architecture has as its principal task to provide accommodation for the different forms of worship. The style of the resulting structures has varied according to the needs and wishes of the worshiping community of believers.

The earliest buildings for Christian worship were the homes of individual believers. When the need was felt for a building set apart as a "church," a house such as that excavated at Dura-Europos (232) in Syria was adapted for the purpose. A single entrance door in the north wall opens into a vestibule and thence into a court on the east side of which is a portico. In the northwest corner a room containing a cistern has been made into a baptistery* decorated with frescoes. The cistern has become a font with a canopy. Two rooms on the south side have been made into one and a small platform provided for an altar. A room leading off this one may have been used for preparations for the Lord's Supper. The room on the west side of the court may have been used for the instruction of catechumens. This was the period of persecution which varied in intensity and duration from place to place. The Christians in Rome found it safer to worship in suitably appointed places near subterranean burial chambers or catacombs. Thus was established the association of Christian worship with the remains of the faithful departed.

With the publication of the Edict of Milan* (313), the Christian Church led by the emperor himself became an established community worshiping openly. The natural result was the building of magnificent places of worship. The model which was followed was the basilica.* The elevated bishop's throne placed in the apse and surrounded by the seats of the presbyters took the place of the judge's seat in the civil basilica. In front of these stood the altar, below which were often housed the remains of a saint. Beyond this was the main part of the building where the rest of the worshipers assembled.

Besides the basilica two other types of Christian building developed, the baptistery and the martyrium (chapel), housing the tomb or relics of a martyr. Both were constructed with their focal point in the center and not, as in the basilica, at one end. The martyria were often round in shape; in the center was the tomb over which was a dome. These buildings had a considerable effect on the development of church building in the East. The basic plan of a Byzantine church was frequently a combination of a domed superstructure with a squarish basilican plan.

In both East and West the altar became more and more distant from the ordinary worshiper. In the East it became customary to separate the altar from the rest of the church by a massive solid screen (iconostasis), adorned with icons (pictorial representations) of the saints. In the West the basic basilican plan was retained, but as in the East the church was divided by a screen, though not usually solid. The chancel, or room for the clergy, contained the high altar. The nave, or room for the lay people, contained the pulpit and sometimes a second altar. The baptismal font was placed at the back of the nave at the entrance to the church. These arrangements prevailed throughout the Middle Ages and still influence the design of churches today. The links of worship with the faithful departed were strengthened with the establishment of side altars, often containing relics, for the saying of masses for the souls of the founder and his friends.

In the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries, immediately preceding the dawn of the Renaissance, the focus of Christian architecture took on the lofty, overpowering exaggerations of the Gothic style: cavernous vaulted arches, flying buttresses, soaring spires. It effected feelings which further distorted church life and worship as a relevant, comforting source of life and thought. At the time of the Reformation the buildings inherited by the Reformers were considerably adapted. The screen was either removed so that the church became one room again, or else it was made into a proper wall and either the chancel or the nave used by the worshiping community. Sometimes each was used by a different congregation when the population increased. In this single-chamber place of worship, the pulpit was placed on one of the long sides and the people gathered around it. The altar was removed and long tables set up when the Lord's Supper was observed. A bracket attached to the pulpit held the basin for the administration of baptism. Not content with adaptation, the Reformers soon began to build new churches and often adopted the circular plan. The congregation faced the center, and the seats were tiered in circular rows. The pulpit was placed near the center, where there was space reserved for baptisms and for the communion table which was set up when the sacrament was observed.

Up to this point Christian architecture was strictly functional. The design and arrangement of a church building reflected the theology of worship. The Eastern iconostasis separated the mystery of the Eucharist from the eyes of the layman. The distant altar, only dimly discerned, made the same point in the churches of the West. The division of the church also reflected the strict separation of clergy from laity. And so the removal of the screen at the Reformation emphasized the unity of the body of Christ, the Church. Likewise, the gathering of the people around the pulpit and the table emphasized the corporate nature of Reformed worship, as opposed to the individualism of the many side altars. The Anglican middle road was seen most clearly in the churches built after the Great Fire of London in 1666. Although the congregation could not gather around the pulpit and table, both were related to each other and to the font in what was clearly one room.

A radical change came over Christian architecture with the Romantic revival of the late eighteenth and early nineteenth centuries. The appearance rather than the function of a church became determinative. The revived appreciation of the great medieval cathedrals* led to a desire for a "cathedral" in every community. Up to now churches had been built in a contemporary style, but henceforth Gothic became the "right" style for churches. The distant altar was restored to the end of a long chancel because of the vista, and it was further separated from the ordinary worshiper by stalls for the clergy and a robed choir. In Reformed churches a "cathedral" exterior often bore no relation to the interior, where an organ might occupy the apse. A high proportion of existing church buildings were erected during this period.

The twentieth century has been slow to discard this Gothic inheritance, preferring to modernize it. Where contemporary styles of architecture have been adopted, the medieval arrangements of the interior have often been retained. There have recently been signs of radical rethinking of the ways in which the functions of a church building can best be expressed and provided for.

Christian architecture has never been concerned exclusively with church buildings.The house-church at Dura-Europos had a room which may have been used for the instruction of catechumens, and church schools have existed in various forms throughout the Church's history. The early Christians lived together, and this ideal has never been lost. Monasteries and nunneries, retreat houses, lay academies, and church conference centers have been a concern of Christian architecture. The growth of the church hall and the parish house has challenged the position of the church as the principal Christian building in many parishes.

It has been pointed out that the Church can baptize in a river, preach in the open air, and celebrate the Lord's Supper on any table, and many young people are critical of the money spent on Church buildings. It is not without significance that in many lively parishes much of the Church's worship is offered in the houses of the members.

ARCHPRIEST. From Herodotus on, Greek designates by archiereus any "high priest" of whatever religion—classical, Jewish, or the Roman pontifex maximus. The NT follows Septuagint usage for various members of particular priestly families (plural) and contemporary practice for the president of the Sanhedrin (singular), while extending figurative meaning to Christ (Heb. 2:17, etc.). Patristic citations retain all these values while broadening their range to include archangels, the Byzantine emperor, Christian ministers (especially the bishop), and metaphorically Christians in general. In traditions where the title "dean" has not come into usage, archpriest identifies the one who services his bishop's cathedral. As a special title from 1598 to 1623 an archpriest headed the Roman Catholic seminarians who were sent to England. CLYDE CURRY SMITH

ARESSON, JON (1484-1550). Icelandic bishop and poet. The son of poor parents, he rose quickly to eminence in the church and was consecrated bishop of Holar, the northern diocese, in 1524. He administered his diocese prosperously until Christian III of Denmark began to impose Lutheranism. With Bishop Ögmundr Palsson of Skalholt he protested vigorously, and he continued his resistance after his colleague was deported in 1541. He captured the Lutheran Bishop Marteinn and seized his see (1549-50), but soon after he was captured and beheaded at Skalholt with two of his sons. He was the author of several religious and satirical poems, notably one entitled "Lamentations on the Passion." He invited a Swedish printer to set up the first printing press in Iceland about 1530; he published the Breviarium Holense in 1534. J.G.G. NORMAN

ARGUE, ANDREW HARVEY (1868-1959). Pioneer of Pentecostalism and evangelist in Canada. Born in Ontario of a line of Methodist lay preachers, beginning with George Argue who went to Canada from Ireland in 1821, he was a successful young businessman in Winnipeg when he came under the influence of such holiness teachers as A.B. Simpson.* Thus when news of a "Pentecostal" revival in California (1906) and Chicago (1907) reached him, he went to Chicago to investigate. There he received an ecstatic religious experience including "tongues-speaking" which he interpreted as "the baptism of the Holy Spirit." He became an apostle of this Pentecostal experience: first opening a mission in Winnipeg, which grew to be one of the largest Pentecostal churches in Canada, then touring Canada and the USA to conduct large revivals and to establish churches. In 1908 he published The Apostolic Messenger, known later as The Revival Broadcast. KENNETH R. DAVIS

ARIANISM. A heresy that denied the eternality of Jesus Christ the Son of God as the Logos.* It was condemned at the Council of Nicea* in 325. Very little of the written work of Arius, presbyter of Alexandria (d.336), remains, but the Arian controversy (c.318-81) was strategic to the crystallization and development of Christian doctrine. Along with Eusebius of Nicomedia, Arius studied under Lucian of Antioch, whose views foreshadowed Arius's Christology. Arius's genius was to push the christological question back to the origin of the pre-incarnate Logos. The controversy seems to have arisen in a dispute between Arius and his bishop, Alexander of Alexandria,* though after Nicea it was the young Athanasius,* deacon to Alexander, who carried the argument against Arius and whose defense of biblical Christology* eventually triumphed over the Arians in the fourth century.

Affirming a univocal sense of "begetting" with reference to our Lord's being the "only begotten Son," Arius said (to quote Socrates Scholasticus): "If the Father begat the Son, he that was begotten had a beginning of existence: and from this it is evident, that there was (a time) when the Son was not. It therefore necessarily follows, that he had his subsistence from nothing."

On the basis of a certain logic of terms, Arius's subordinationist Christology is consistent, but it is also patently heretical judged by the apostolic witness. If God is indivisible and not subject to change, then, on one reading of "begotten," whatever is begotten of God must derive from a creative act, not from the being of God. Hence it has a beginning of existence. Therefore the Son is not coeternal with the Father.

Fastening upon the term "begotten," Arius said that because Christ is begotten He must have had a beginning. Athanasius countered that because Christ is begotten of the Father, He could not have had a beginning. To say that a father begets a child is one thing, but to say that the Father begat the Son is another. The one is temporal, the other eternal; the one is of the will, the other from the being of the Father. Thus the Nicene Creed insisted that Christ is of the substance of the Father, thereby sacrificing neither the impassibility of God nor the deity of the Son. To say that the Son is begotten from the Father from eternity is not to divide the indivisible God but to accept the testimony of the apostles.

Crucial to the question are the doctrines of Creation and the Trinity. At Nicea, Christians adopted the teaching that the one Lord Jesus Christ from eternity is of one substance with the Father (note John's prologue, 1:1-18). This marked the end of the period in which Christ could be thought of as God's intermediary in His work of creation and redemption. Thus was vindicated the OT doctrine of the direct creation of the world by God, rather than the Greek concept of an intermediary or intermediaries who linked the world to God but not God to the world. The concept of intermediaries (as in Gnosticism) was formulated to overcome the antinomy of how God could be ingenerate and impassible yet act to create the world. Against Arius, Athanasius insisted there is no room in Christian thought for any being of intermediate status between Creator and creature, and because redemption is a divine prerogative, only God in Christ, not some intermediate being, could redeem.

The Arian controversy was protracted and involved many complicated documents circulated in the fourth century. The Arians achieved great popularity after the Council of Nicea, especially following the death of Constantine in 337, because his son and successor Constantius was fond of Arius (see separate articles on ANOMOEANS, and HOMOEANS). Eventually the force of Arian teaching was dissipated, though only through fierce struggle involving Athanasius. The Nicene Symbol was confirmed at the Council of Constantinople in 381.

The most noteworthy Arian-like Christology in modern times is the teaching of the Jehovah's Witnesses, who deny the eternality of the Son of God, the doctrine of the Trinity, and who, like Arius, posit the Logos as an intermediate being between the Creator and creation.

ARIMINUM (Rimini), COUNCIL OF. Constantius II in 359 summoned two parallel councils for the West and East, at Ariminum and Seleucia.* The Homoiousion group led by Basil of Ancyra wished to gain universal episcopal support at a time when Constantius had expelled the extreme Anomoeans Aetius and Eunomius. Less radical Anomoeans* (also called Homoeans*) such as Valens of Mursa, having persuaded Hosius of Cordova and Constantius to recognize their position (357), suggested with success that Constantius should summon two councils, facilitating their attempt to outmaneuver Basil. The Homoeans had constructed a creed "dated on the 22 May," indicating, according to Athanasius, its novelty. Bishops at the Council of Arminum rejected it at first in favor of the creed of Nicea. When their delegates announced the decision to Constantius, however, he induced them to accept the "Dated Creed," which was formally ratified at Constantinople in 360.

ARISTIDES (second century). Christian Apologist* and philosopher of Athens. Until the last century Aristides was only a name in the writings of Eusebius and Jerome. Then in 1878 the Armenian Fathers of the Lazarist Monastery at Venice published an Armenian version of his "Apology" and in 1889 Rendel Harris discovered the Syriac version in a monastery on Mt. Sinai.

Shortly afterward, J.A. Robinson made the astonishing discovery that the Greek version of Aristides has been taken over almost wholly into a popular Oriental Christian romance, "Barlaam and Josaphat." The Apologist opens his "Apology" with an outline demonstration of God's existence based upon Aristotle's argument from motion. He states that mankind is divided into four races—Barbarians, Greeks, Jews, and Christians—and that Christians have the most complete understanding of the nature of God and a correspondingly satisfactory moral code. The treatise was addressed, not as Eusebius said to Emperor Hadrian, but to his successor Antoninus Pius (138-61).

ARISTION. Papias reports that Aristion along with John the Elder was a primary witness for the early tradition about Christ. Nothing further is known for certain of him, but in an Armenian MS of the gospels dated 986, discovered by F.C. Conybeare in 1891, Mark 16:9-20 is attributed to the "Elder Ariston." This may be an authentic tradition, but further proof is lacking. Aristion must be distinguished from Aristo of Pella.

ARISTO OF PELLA (second century). According to Maximus the Confessor in the seventh century, Aristo wrote a "Dialogue between Jason and Papiscus concerning Christ," in which proofs from the OT (version of Aquila) adduced by the Jewish Christian Jason led to a request for baptism from the Jew Papiscus. Celsus, Clement of Alexandria, Jerome, and apparently Tertullian knew the work which, dated about 140, might make Aristo the earliest known Apologist against Judaism. Eusebius found in Aristo information about the defeat of Bar-Kochba and of the exclusion of Jews from Jerusalem by Hadrian.

ARISTOTLE (384-322 B.C.). Greek philosopher. Born at Stagira, he went to Plato's school at Athens (367-347). After the death of Plato he lived in the Troad and on Lesbos, eventually becoming tutor to the son (the future Alexander the Great) of Philip II of Macedon. In 335 he returned to Athens to open a new school called the Lyceum. When Alexander died in 323, the school was in danger from the anti-Macedonian forces, so Aristotle took refuge on Euboea.

Although a student of Plato, Aristotle came to differ with his teacher. Werner Jaeger (Aristotle, Fundamentals of the History of His Development, ET 1934) has distinguished three periods in his life. In the first (to 347 B.C.) he was a defender of Platonism, presenting his material in dialogues holding the Platonic view of the soul and adhering to the doctrine of form. In the second period (347-335) he became increasingly critical of Platonism, especially of the idea of forms. Finally, in the period after 335, he became an exponent of empirical science, and by the end of his life had come to reject all the essential features of Platonic otherworldly metaphysics.

The material on which Aristotle's fame rests is not in dialogue form, but apparently in lecture notes preserved perhaps by his students. His work is encyclopedic, which may help to explain why it was so popular in the Middle Ages when knowledge sources were limited. Among his major works are Ethics; Physics; Metaphysics; the works on logic known as the Organon; a variety of writings on natural science such as On the Heavens, On the Soul, On the Parts of Animals; Politics; Rhetoric; and Poetics.

His teachings were not very influential among Christians until the high Middle Ages (A.D. 1050-1100). During these years knowledge of his work was gradually gained from Arabic translation made by Jews and Muslims. These were then translated into Latin during the twelfth century. The logical works were recovered first, and then the entire Aristotelian metaphysical system became available. The intellectual shock this work caused may be likened to that occasioned by Copernican cosmology in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, or to Darwinian biology in the nineteenth and twentieth centuries. Aristotle presented a complete explanation of reality without any reference to the Christian God. His "unmoved mover" or "first cause" was a principle of existence, not a personal being. The universe he described was eternal, without beginning or end, and man had no individual immortality in the Aristotelian system. Some medieval scholars wished to ban his works, while others opted for a "double truth" theory in which Aristotle should guide logic and Christianity should be supreme in revelation, but the two fields could not be reconciled. The future of Western thought, however, lay in the work of scholars such as Albertus Magnus* and Thomas Aquinas* who attempted to harmonize Aristotelian philosophy with Christianity and then developed the Scholastic movement.

ARLES, SYNODS OF. The most important were:

(1) In 314. The Donatists* refused to accept the decision of the Synod of Rome against them and, as a result, Constantine who regarded Christian unity as very important ordered a new synod at Arles to give judgment. No previous gathering had had such a representative section of Western clergy—it included three British bishops. The synod decided that Caecilian* had been rightfully elected, and the Donatists were condemned. In addition, twenty-two canons were issued dealing with various aspects of church life, including the fixing of one day to observe Easter and the repudiation of the Cyprianic practice of rebaptizing heretics.

(2) In 353. One of the Arian synods in the West which condemned Athanasius.

(3) In 813. Charlemagne called five councils, one of them at Arles, to ensure adequate ecclesiastical education for the clergy and to emphasize the preaching and teaching of the Catholic faith.

(4) In 1234. Canons were issued against the Albigensian* heresy, emphasizing observation of the decrees of the Lateran (1215) and Toulouse (1229) councils and urging bishops to counter heresy by closer surveillance of their dioceses.

(5) About 1260. An attempt to order details of church life and to condemn the doctrines of Joachim of Fiore. C. PETER WILLIAMS

ARMAGH. Founded by St. Patrick* in the fifth century, it is the ecclesiastical capital of Ireland in the sense that it is the seat of the primates of the Roman Catholic Church and the Church of Ireland. The Church of Ireland cathedral dates probably from the thirteenth century, though it was completely rebuilt in the eighteenth century; the Roman Catholic cathedral was consecrated in 1875. Traditions of Patrick's links with Armagh gave it a prominent place in Irish ecclesiastical history from an early date: it was a seat of learning from the fifth century, and its college achieved considerable international fame. Patrick's successors in Armagh were called the heirs of Patrick and claimed some measure of jurisdiction over other churches in Ireland. Up to the early years of the twelfth century Armagh maintained the independence of the Celtic Church from the Roman and English churches. In 1152 at the Synod of Kells it was made the primatial see of Ireland.

ARMENIAN CHURCH. Ancient Armenia, south of the Caucasus chain, nurtured a highly intelligent Indo-Germanic race, later dispersed and dispossessed like the Jews. Her native, autonomous dynasty ruled 300 years before Persian/Byzantine partition (387-190), thereafter surviving in the Persian sector until A.D. 428. Apostolic Christianization is claimed from A.D. 34—legends enshrining factual substratum abound in the considerable early indigenous literature. The secular background was Roman/Iranian, the religious affiliation Syriac/Greek. Gregory the Illuminator* inaugurated hereditary religious rule. The Adoptianist* heresy was widespread and may have affected Gregory. The native Armenian alphabet and vernacular Bible proved stabilizing influences.

Armenians consistently repudiated both Nestorianism,* upholding the Councils of Ephesus (431, 449), and Cyril of Alexandria who encouraged Monophysitism.* Abhorring the overhuman Nestorian Jesus, they posited an altogether suprahuman Christ. Struggling against Persia for religious independence, they missed the Council of Chalcedon (451), were out of touch and misunderstood, and the result was a hopeless split with the West that weakened the entire church and facilitated Islam's conquest.

The independent national Gregorian Church, repudiating Chalcedon, began about 506 and suffered two later splits: (1) the Romanizing Armenian Uniat Society, founded in 1335, with its renowned monastery of Mechitarists at St. Lazaar's Island, Venice; and (2) the lively evangelical Protestant Church, fruit of the American Mission after 1831, and speedily anathematized by the parent body.

Like Palestine the battleground of greater powers, and the victim of Muslim expansionism, Armenia suffered centuries of devastation by Persians, Turks, Russians, and others. The 1895 Turkish massacres shocked the world; Gregorian nationals, together with the hated Protestants, were the marked victims, while the Uniats enjoyed protection under Rome (see UNIAT CHURCHES). Dispersed Armenians still prosper in the Mediterranean basin and beyond.

ARMENIAN VERSION. Armenia (or Hayastan) was converted in the late third or early fourth century under King Tiridates by Gregory the Illuminator.* The beginnings of biblical translation are attributed to Mashtotz (otherwise Mesrob*) who created an alphabet for this purpose. As some traditions say and as scholars deduce, the basis of his work was the Syriac versions. No MS of this earliest stage of the version survives, and the scholar must work from the data of quotations in the earliest writers. In the case of the gospels, it is debated whether the earliest form was a harmony of the gospels related to the *Diatessaron of Tatian. The canon of Scripture continued to bear the mark of its Syriac origin for a long time in its retention of the apocryphal 3 Corinthians, and in the absence of the Book of Revelation, which although translated as early as the fifth century did not figure in canonical lists until late. From about the sixth century there were increasing movements of revision to a Greek model, which in the gospels was akin to the textual use of Caesarean scholars such as Origen and Eusebius. The complexion of the OT Armenian text is basically Lucianic with some hexaplaric readings. This former may derive from a Syriac base akin to the Peshitta,* the latter from the stage of revision to Greek norms. The data in the two Armenian forms of Ecclesiasticus throw this double line of descent into high relief. The version in its revised form is notable for its careful technique and accuracy.

J.N. BIRDSALL

ARMINIANISM. A theological system named after Jacobus Arminius (Jakob Hermandszoon), a Dutch theologian (1560-1609) who was educated at Leyden, Basle, and Geneva. After studying under Beza he went to Amsterdam to serve as minister of the Reformed congregation (1588). Holland had become a center of Calvinism during the sixteenth century, but during his fifteen years as pastor Arminius came to question some of the teachings of Calvinism. Disputes arose, and he left the pastorate and became professor of theology at the University of Leyden. Here he gave a series of lectures on the doctrine of predestination* which led to a violent controversy with his colleague, Francis Gomar.* This conflict continued until it divided the student body as well as the ministers of the Reformed Church. The Gomarists or Strict Calvinists wished to have the matter settled by a national synod, but Jan van Oldenbarneveldt, a liberal Dutch politician then in control of the government, did not wish such a meeting. The protagonists even debated their ideas before the States General of the Dutch Provinces, but still no agreement could be reached.

After the death of Arminius, his followers issued the Remonstrance of 1610 which outlines the system known as Arminianism. The major points of departure from strict Calvinism are that (1) the decree of salvation applies to all who believe on Christ and who persevere in obedience and faith; (2) Christ died for all men; (3) the Holy Spirit must help men to do things that are truly good (such as having faith in Christ for salvation); (4) God's saving grace is not irresistible; (5) it is possible for those who are Christians to fall from grace.

In an attempt to stop this teaching, the Calvinist party made an alliance with Maurice of Nassau, son of William the Silent. Their desires for a synod coincided with Maurice's policy of centralizing the United Provinces and transforming them into a monarchy. For eight years after the Remonstrance, the political forces of Oldenbarneveldt and Maurice struggled for supremacy. Finally Maurice won and his opponent was accused of treason and beheaded (1619). This cleared the way for Maurice to try to use religious ideology to centralize the state. Consequently the Synod of Dort,* one of the most famous meetings in the history of the Reformed Church, met (1618-19). The synod passed a point-by-point refutation of the Remonstrance. The Belgic Confession* and the Heidelberg Catechism* were confirmed as standards of orthodoxy, and the Arminians were condemned.

Following the synod, many of the disciples of Arminius, among them such able men as Hugo Grotius,* were imprisoned or banished. By 1625 there was a reaction against this severity, and a limited toleration was extended to the Arminian Remonstrants. Although the Arminians were not numerous in Holland, their teaching has exercised considerable influence in other lands. In seventeenth-century England, the Laudian anti-Calvinist movement was influenced by the Arminians. John Wesley also followed this belief, and so it has left its mark on the Methodist Church. Among groups with a Calvinist heritage the debate over the points that Arminius raised still continues.

ROBERT G. CLOUSE

ARNAUD, HENRI (1641-1721). Savoyard pastor and Waldensian leader. Born in France of Piedmontese parents, he became the organizer of the Waldensians* (also called Vaudois) on their historic return to their ancestral home in Savoy. Going back to Piedmont, he became a Waldensian pastor there in 1685. He and many others were forced to flee a short time later during the persecution inaugurated by Victor Amadeus II of Savoy. Arnaud went to Switzerland where he helped plan the so-called Glorious Return of the Waldensians in 1689. Financed and encouraged by numerous English and Dutch Protestants, Arnaud led the Waldensian band of about 1,000 as it fought its way back home. Shifting international political alliances brought relief from persecution in 1690 and its revival in 1696. Once again several thousand Waldensians went into exile, many of them to Württemberg in Germany, Arnaud founded a Waldensian settlement there and served as its pastor until his death.

ROBERT D. LINDER

ARNAULD, ANTOINE (1612-1694). French theologian and philosopher. He is generally considered the foremost member of a distinguished French family, a number of whom embraced Jansenism* and exercised a formative influence over the movement. Born in Paris, he first studied law and later theology at the Sorbonne. In 1638, influenced by his mother, he placed himself under the spiritual tutelage of the Abbé de Saint-Cyran* (d.1643) who was a close friend of Cornelis Jansen (d.1638) and at that time chief apostle in Paris of the movement Jansen founded. Saint-Cyran encouraged Arnauld's ordination as priest in 1641 and inspired him to write his first major work entitled De la fréquente communion in 1643. The book provoked a storm of protest from the Jesuits and established Arnauld as the head of Jansenism in France after Saint-Cyran's death. Arnauld was caught up in the struggle between Jansenists and Jesuits for control of the French Church. After suffering numerous indignities but seeming to enjoy controversy, he finally left France and settled in Brussels where he spent the remainder of his life after 1682, writing against the Jesuits and in defense of Jansenism. His 320 works now collected in 43 volumes stand as an eloquent testimony of his intellectual vigor and reforming zeal. ROBERT D. LINDER

ARNAULD, JACQUELINE-MARIE-ANGELIQUE (1591-1661). Abbess of Port-Royal, France, and a leading figure in Jansenism.* Born in Paris, she was the daughter of the distinguished lawyer and fervent Gallican, Antoine Arnauld the elder. She entered the lax Cistercian abbey of Port-Royal-des-Champs at the age of eight, became abbess within three years, and began her thoroughgoing reform work after a conversion experience in 1608. In 1625 she moved Port-Royal to Paris and, though removed as abbess in 1630, she helped to bring Saint-Cyran* to Port-Royal as spiritual leader. Under his influence the convent became a hotbed of Jansenism. During her second period as abbess (1642-55) she helped spread Jansenist ideas widely, especially since the Fronde filled the convent with refugees. She died shortly after signing Louis XIV's formulary against Jansenism. BRIAN G. ARMSTRONG

ARNDT, ERNST MORITZ (1769-1860). German hymnwriter and historian. Having studied theology at Greifswald and Jena, he lectured in history at Greifswald, but fled to Sweden because of his anti-Napoleonic Vom Geist der Zeit (1806-1818). He wrote patriotic pamphlets and poems, including Des Deutschen Vaterland, before becoming in 1818 professor of history at the University of Bonn. He was suspended two years later because of alleged republicanism, but was reinstated in 1840. After doubts caused by contemporary philosophy, he adopted from 1817 (under Schleiermacher's influence) a more Christian position. His attack, Von dem Wort und dem Kirchenliede (1819), on the rationalistic bowdlerization of evangelical hymns helped to restore original versions. Of his own eighty-three hymns, notably Ich weiss, woran ich glaube, fourteen have been translated into English; no translation is in common use now. When hopes of a Protestant-Catholic union had foundered he became a staunch Protestant (see his Über den gegenwärtigen Stand des Protestantismus, 1844). JOHN S. ANDREWS

ARNDT, JOHANN (1555-1621). German Lutheran mystic. After studying theology at Helmstedt, Wittenberg, Strasbourg, and Basle, he became in 1583 minister at Padeborn, but an argument with the lay rulers over the place of pictures and ceremonies in the church caused him to leave. Later he served churches at Quedlinburg, Brunswick, and Eisleben. In 1611 he became general superintendent of the church at Celle, where he remained until his death. Here he exercised an important influence on the development of the Lüneburg church system. His fame rests upon his writings, especially Four Books Concerning True Christianity (1606-9). Arndt emphasized mysticism in his interpretations of the Christian life by asserting that orthodox belief is not enough to attain true Christianity, but moral purification made possible by righteous living and communion with God is also necessary. Though remaining within the Lutheran Church he nevertheless helped prepare the way for the Enlightenment* and for Pietism.* ROBERT G. CLOUSE

ARNDT, WILLIAM FREDERICK (1880-1957). American Lutheran scholar. Born at Mayville, Wisconsin, and educated at various Lutheran seminaries, he was ordained in 1903 and pastored churches in Bluff City, St. Joseph, and Brooklyn. He taught theology at St. Paul's College, Missouri (1912-21), and at Concordia Seminary, St. Louis (1921-51). A keen advocate of Lutheran unity and missions, he wrote Does the Bible Contradict Itself? (1926) and a number of popular apologetical works, a commentary on Luke, a life of Paul, and with F.W. Gingrich edited a Greek-English Lexicon of the New Testament (1957). He edited also the St. Louis Theological Monthly (1926-30) and its successor, the Concordia Theological Magazine (1938-50). IAN SELLERS

ARNOBIUS JUNIOR (fifth century). Attested only by his writings from Rome in the fifth century, his biblical works were allegorical commentaries on the Psalms (criticizing predestination at Psalm 108) and scholia on gospel texts. About 440 he wrote Praedestinatus, in which he catalogues ninety heresies largely described in Augustine's De Haeresibus, including Pelagians, Nestorians, and the *Praedestinati. The views of the last are reviewed in a sermon circulating falsely under the name of Augustine; in the end the author refutes them. After 454 Arnobius wrote The Conflict of Arnobius the Catholic with the Egyptian Serapion, in which he refutes Sabellian, Arian, and Pelagian views and defends the Leonine doctrine of the Two Natures. He gives the writings of Augustine* the respect due to the Scriptures. About 440 he probably represented anti-Augustinian moderates supporting Julian of Eclanum. G.T.D. ANGEL

ARNOBIUS THE ELDER (fl. c.304-310). A teacher of rhetoric from Sicca in Numidia, he was converted from paganism to Christ. His defense of Christianity, entitled Ad Nationes, concentrated on exposing the errors of pagan worship and mythology. The divinity of Christ he based primarily on the miracles, and he advocated hope in Christ as the only real basis for immortality. Despite his respect for pagan philosophers like Plato, he argued that the soul is not immortal by nature. As a recent convert he lapsed occasionally into unorthodoxy; Christ, for instance, is not coequal with the Father, he said.

ARNOLD, GOTTFRIED (1666-1714). Lutheran theologian and devotional writer. He was educated at Wittenberg and afterward, through the influence of Philip Spener, became a teacher at Quedlinburg. He became identified with exponents of mystic and separatist tendencies and in 1696 published Die erste Liebe, a eulogy on the simplicity and poverty of the primitive church and a condemnation of what he considered the later addition of dogma and ecclesiasticism. The next year he was invited to Giessen as professor of church history, but finding himself out of sympathy with the school resigned and returned to his former position. There he wrote the monumental work, Unparteiische Kirchen-und Ketzer-Historie (1699-1700) in which he showed more impartiality to heresy than to the church. In this study of heretical movements, Arnold refused to accept as evidence the statements of hostile contemporaries and based his work on the writings of the sectarians themselves. This, with his presuppositions about the weaknesses of the orthodox position, led him to favor the separatists of various ages and caused controversies which forced him deeper into a mystical position. In 1704 he became pastor and inspector at Werben in Prussia and was reconciled with establishment Christianity. In 1707 he became inspector at Perleberg. In addition to his church history he wrote over fifty works and composed many beautiful religious songs, some of which are still used.

ROBERT G. CLOUSE

ARNOLD, MATTHEW (1822-1888). English poet. Eldest son of Thomas Arnold,* he was born at Laleham and educated at Winchester, Rugby, and Balliol College, Oxford. He was government inspector of schools from 1851 to 1886, and from 1857 to 1867 he was also professor of poetry at Oxford. Though popular as a poet in his lifetime, his poetic ability has been severely criticized in this century. He attacked many of the religious attitudes of his time, particularly tendencies to rely on unprovable assumptions and neglect of reason. He saw "culture" as man's greatest need, deplored bibliolatry as alien to the scientific spirit, stressed the personal and moral sides of Christianity, and denied miracles. His important religious works were Culture and Anarchy (1869); St. Paul and Protestantism (1870); Literature and Dogma (1873); God and the Bible (1875); and Last Essays on the Church and Religion (1877).

JOHN A. SIMPSON

ARNOLD, THOMAS (1795-1842). Anglican teacher and Broad Churchman. Educated at Warminster, Winchester, and Corpus Christi College, Oxford, he was ordained and in 1828 was appointed headmaster of Rugby School. There he laid the foundations of the modern public school system in England, with its emphasis on religious training, moral character, and public service. He became in 1841 regius professor of modern history at Oxford. He opposed the Oxford Movement,* and his reaction to the church crisis was to propose a comprehensive English Church, excluding only Roman Catholics, Unitarians, and Quakers. The essence of Christianity was to him practical goodness, which both church and state exist to realize, each needing the other. He stressed the universal priesthood of the laity, and considered matters of doctrine and ritual inessential. He wrote Principles of Church Reform (1834) and Fragment on the Church (1844).

JOHN A. SIMPSON

ARNOLD OF BRESCIA (1100-1155). Radical church reformer. After studying under Peter Abelard,* he joined the Augustinian order. He returned to Italy where he advocated the necessity of apostolic poverty by the church. His proposals were condemned by the Second Lateran Council and he was banished. Arnold then went to France, where he helped his teacher Abelard defend himself at Sens (1141). They were unsuccessful and were condemned to confinement in separate monasteries. Arnold resumed his teaching in Paris, but was banished from France and lived for a time in Zurich, afterward in Bohemia. In 1145 he was reconciled with the pope, but this was short-lived. After condemning the papal power once more, he allied himself with a rebel political party that wished to abolish the temporal power of the pope and establish a commune at Rome. The community had created a senate and appointed a patrician in place of the city prefect, who was dependent on the pope. In this situation Arnold advocated the idea of reclaiming for Rome her ancient powerful position in the world. He encouraged his followers to appeal to Frederick I with a statement that included a condemnation of papal approval of the emperor, the allegation that the Donation of Constantine* was a fable, and a claim that the empire belonged to the city of Rome. The more extreme schemes in this statement repelled many, and in the election of 1152 Arnold's group was defeated. Later he was excommunicated and expelled. Frederick I captured him and returned him to Rome, where he was condemned by the prefect to be hanged and his body burned (1155). A movement grew in memory of Arnold called the Arnoldists. They stressed apostolic poverty and repudiated the power of the hierarchy, holding as invalid sacraments administered by clerics who had worldly goods.

ROBERT G. CLOUSE

ARNOT, FREDERICK STANLEY (1858-1914). Pioneer Brethren missionary. Born in Glasgow, Scotland, and acquainted with the family of David Livingstone,* he wished to follow the latter's example and in 1881 set out for Africa, making his way alone from Durban to the Zambezi. In Barotseland (1882-84) he preached to Chief Lewanika and his people, but suffered severely from malaria and dysentery. He started work in Benguela, Angola (1884), then moved to Katanga where he gained the confidence of Chief Msidi, warning him against signing papers submitted by Europeans (1886). After a furlough in Britain (1888), where he married, he opened new work in Northern Rhodesia (now Zambia), and spent his remaining years establishing mission stations from Benguela to Katanga. He was the foremost architect of Brethren missionary work in central Africa.

See SOUTHERN AFRICA. J.G.G. NORMAN

ARNOT, WILLIAM (1808-1875). Scottish preacher and author. Born at Scone, Perthshire, a farmer's son, he was apprenticed in early life to a gardener. He studied for the ministry in Glasgow, gaining distinction especially in Greek. After an assistantship at Dunipace, he became minister of St. Peter's Church, Glasgow, continuing the ministry in connection with the Free Church after 1843. He was ejected from the church by decision of the Court of Session (1849), thereafter opening a new church in Main Street, Glasgow (1850). He was called to the Free High Church, Edinburgh, in 1863 and ministered there until his death. He visited the USA three times. His many books include Illustrations of the Book of Proverbs (1857-58). J.G.G. NORMAN

ART, CHRISTIAN. Art done by nominal or professing Christians is not a sufficient condition for calling the product "Christian art," since a Christian's right hand of faith sometimes does not know what his artistic left hand is doing. Christian art must be bona fide art, and the art product itself must by the spirit at work in its colors or sculptured form bear witness to the Lord God revealed in Jesus Christ, if it would legitimately be called "Christian art." Secular treatment of a biblical topic, like the Crucifixion, does not make the painting Christian art. Church use of a wooden sculpture—an icon of a woman as the Madonna, for example—does not qualify it as intrinsically Christian art. It is also not helpful to constrict the notion of "Christian art" to a given historic style, as if "Gothic" or "baroque" or "Pre-Raphaelite" contours be the definitive model. It depends rather upon whether a spirit of compassion for creation plagued by sin and hope for reconciliation of life to God through Jesus Christ is embodied in the painterly elements.

Within this distinctive guideline one's sense of Christian art should be catholic enough to include: (1) a Roman (Catholic), worldly wise Christian appeal in the line, color, and design of an art product to a higher realm of grace beyond what is naturally visible; (2) an ascetic, (Greek) Orthodox Christian temper to the composition, texture, and color of a painting appealing somewhat mystically to a heavenly spirituality beyond the earthly; (3) the full-orbed, Reformational Christian spirit showing up within the layout, shape, and color of art products calling for a renewed cosmic life under Jesus Christ's rule; and (4) an internalized, evangelical Christian cast to pieces of art that breathe devotional piety and withdrawal from worldliness. The committed Christian spirit that distinguishes painting and sculpture as Christian art from pagan and secular art is not always readily discernible in a given artifact (no more than it is always easily discernible in the daily walk of a Christ-believer), but it is a matter of historical fact that Christian art, as herewith defined, has been extant, in varyingly corrupted forms, especially in Western civilization.

Historical development. Early Christians decorated the walls of their catacomb burial and worship places with little figures representing the Good Shepherd, Jonah with the whale, and the like, in a manner derived from pagan Roman imagery. When the Christian Church came above ground in the fourth century with the conversion of Constantine, its architectural art was pressed to be commensurate with the status of a grand, official state religion. From its beginnings, then, "Christian art" was more a concessive modification of current pagan fashion than a radically new start in plastic art internally demanded by faith in the new Gospel of Jesus Christ. Original features showed up, nonetheless: delicate, miniature forms carved into the marble of sarcophagi replaced the larger-than-life, Greco-Roman sculptural tendency; and instead of floor mosaics of marble common to Rome, now shiny glass tesserae, especially glittering gold pieces, were used to cover whole vaulted ceilings and walls of churches, producing an unreal, luminous, ethereal effect.

Byzantine art continued the use of sumptuous, jewellike colors so typical of an Eastern feeling for enthroned majesty and, more importantly, it discarded the illusionistic perspective of pictorial art rooted in pagan Hellenism. The glorious works at Ravenna (the Pantocrator Christ apse of Sant' Apollinaire in Classe, for example) show something new in the West. A Plotinian, Neoplatonizing aesthetic helped Christian craftsmen in the sixth century replace the old, natural, plastic realism with dematerialized figures, flattened space, and luxuriant, green colors that testified, without spiritualizing, to a new earth reality. The mimetic ideal which had chained art to what is three-dimensionally visible got broken; now there was an opening for disproportionately large eyes, abstractly schematized trees, and animals with ornamental colors to celebrate ceremonially, as it were, a life that had conquered and gone beyond our normal creaturely existence weighted down by burdens.

Imaging art was banned by imperial edict in 726. Western Christendom, especially with the rise of Charlemagne, by mid-ninth century did not honor such iconoclasm; but the attendant severity did seem to introduce depiction of Christ's suffering passion into Western art. Independent Celtic monasticism, meanwhile, contented itself with the enormously intricate, decorative embellishment of capital letters copied in biblical manuscripts, spilling over sometimes into margins and whole pages with colorful plants, flowers, and strange, allegorical beasts (related, perhaps, to the later famous gargoyles of Gothic church architecture). Only with the rise of "lay" pilgrimages and beginning of the Crusades in 1095 did sculptured human figures, with flexibly slenderized, softened classical contours, appear in stone again on church exteriors. "Christian art" during this Romanesque period was channeled mainly into cathedral architecture north of the Alps; craftsmen worked with the base plan of a cross to fashion places of height and light proper for worship. (Dogmatic concern on the matter of representation and spirituality was simply unimportant, academic, to them.)

Architecture, sculpture, and (stained glass) painting of the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries canonized the gradual restriction of Christian art to churchly art in a particular way: whether it was the overwhelming grandeur of Notre Dame in Paris, of Chartres, Amiens, the Reims cathedral, or the piteous Andachtsbilder, such "Gothic" art conspired to drown the human believer in an ocean of deeply moving, contemplative stupor. Both the explicit Babel of ribs and flying buttresses and countless pinnacles outside the church and the endlessly soaring lines of ascent inside, as well as the cavernous Pietà sculptures with relic overtones, worked at losing a man in quasi-mystical ecstasy, touched always by a feeling of unworthiness and an uncertain closeness to death. (The Black Death killed half the urban population in some areas of Europe, 1347-51.) So Gothic art is only questionably "Christian," arousing pity rather than recognition of mercy, exalting an unattainable sublimity rather than testifying of grace freely given, quickening apprehensive awe instead of a firm hope. Gothic art is the culturally powerful embodiment of a devotionalistic disintegration of Scholastic theology and the imperialistic church, and the pious, nondescript beginning of a frank humanism. A less introverted and very chaste humanization of Christian sentiment during the same period is found in Giotto's* murals, where the presence of grace on earth shows up in Christ's solemnity as well as in the golden halos worn by the saints.

The tremendous secularizing spirit of Renaissance culture which arose in Italy and northern Europe during the fifteenth century tended to rub out further the fits and starts toward Christian art begun in the so-called Middle Ages. Masaccio's (1400-1428) deep allegiance to the truths of the Christian faith still showed through in his Bible story frescoes bursting with the rediscovery of actually naked bodies and a foreshortening perspective that spelled a sturdy, this-worldly reality coming into focus. Fra Angelico's* (1387-1455) limpid and breathlessly still Madonnas, Annunciation, and Adorations hold on more tightly to the passing order, the devout severity of monastic vow and quiet retirement away from the bustle of commerce and worldwide exploration. Flemish Jan van Eyck (c.1390-1441), however, typifies the new fascination with perceptible things, with people as personages, with painting in oil the very atmospheric tangibleness of one's natural surroundings (see WEYDEN, VAN DER). Of course, the "supernatural double truths" were iconographically dubbed in, but this left-handed acknowledgment to the realm of grace became an increasingly specious mannerism as the fabulous quattrocento century progressed. Renaissance masterpieces by Donatello, Botticelli,* Leonardo da Vinci,* Michelangelo,* Raphael,* Titian,* and others may have had biblical titles, Christian motifs, and been under the patronage of popes; but their bold, exciting lines, voluptuous colors, and confident show of three-dimensional perspective—greatly extending the expressive reach of painting, sculpture, and architecture—was by and large driven by an utterly worldly spirit, a this-worldly, man-honoring commitment. Art was no longer a means sanctified by the end of instructing the illiterate people of God in otherworldly matters; now art was an autonomous glory itself, wielding its own lordly (secular) authority among the rich and powerful.

Grünewald's (c.1485-1528) Isenheim altarpiece is unique. Technically pre-Reformation, it is unspoiled by a worldly Renaissance grandeur, too rough-hewn and dynamic to be caught in Gothic introspective mysticism; Grünewald's spread-eagled Christ hanged on the cross against a stark blue blackness of sky portrays unforgettably the cursed dead end of sin, while his panel on the Resurrection uses strange, unearthly colors and shifting masses of rock to suggest with startling power the God-man's triumph over death. Other painters in the Reformation period, like Hans Holbein the Younger (1497-1543), also treat the reality of death and distortion, not with the delight of earlier Hieronymous Bosch and his grotesqueries, but with a biblical matter-of-factness that catches the awful finality and punishment character of death without any hope. Holbein, like his German contemporaries (see DURER; CRANACH), served the taste of his royal patrons too (e.g., the magnificent portrait of Henry VIII). Like Luther's makeshift alliances with German princes, this development freed artists from the dominance of ecclesiastical commissions, but it opened wide the door for compromises with secular humanism.

The Council of Trent (1545-63) tried to pull art back into liturgical bondage by giving its sanction to "sacred art," that is, art which by its reverent realism or clear allegorical touches could be used to instruct people in tenets of the Roman Catholic Church. The great El Greco (1541-1614), situated in Spain, inflamed by a visionary, Byzantine ecstasy, epitomizes at its best what the Counter-Reformation wanted (cf. The Burial of Count Orgaz): admission of secular opulence at a lower level, topped by a nervous, metallically colored, austere affirmation of floating, celestial glory. The Jesuits baptized use of baroque art similarly, accepting its sensuous, rhetorical luxuriousness (see RUBENS) favored by the aristocracy and so imposing to the masses, so long as it ended by pointing to the sins-absolving office of the church. Art oriented more toward the Reformation, however, as it developed in the Netherlands, took a quite different, Christian direction. The late portraits done by Rembrandt,* the landscapes and interiors of Vermeer (1632-75), Pieter de Hooch, and other Dutch masters, presented in loving detail, pellucid color, and with a quiet, panoramic dignity, both the outdoor world and intimate daily life as a creation able to be filled with shalom. Their canvases never monumentalized scenes, but gave both the cosmos and ordinary, homely activities the deepened dimension of God's ordering presence.

Current problems and options. A hardening secularism of the eighteenth-century Enlightenment* simultaneously robbed "Christian" of definite, biblical meaning, and divorced "fine art" (cf. rococo style) from the realm of a normal workaday task. With the nineteenth-century advent of a dominant positivism's facticity, art seemed to get lost in esoteric Romantic genius, l'art pour l'art escapism, and the brilliant, sensational irrelevance of Impressionism; "Christian" became increasingly a dirty weasel-word for past holy wars and simple bigotry. Christian art, therefore, was at best considered an anachronism. The Pre-Raphaelite movement (see HUNT, W.H.) seemed to confirm that judgment in its abortive attempt to reconstruct Bible-pure art by undoing the Renaissance. An intense sculptor like Ernest Barlach (1870-1933) and the important painter Georges Rouault* (1871-1958) demonstrate, however, that bona fide Christian art is possible in our post-Christian age, even though it is desperately difficult for an artist to escape being formed by the total, secularistic, cultural matrix.

Significant art that is harnessed for ecclesiastical service in our day (like some work of Matisse, Leger, Chagall, and many others) is really a forced surrogate for what was done more naturally in the medieval period, and may be less fruitful for Christian art than it appears, for today the hybrid is less integral—the artist seeks a rooted context without bowing to all the dogma of Mother Church, and the institutional church seeks the engagement sometimes merely to show its tolerant modernity. Devotionalistic art consciously conceived for outright evangelistic propaganda, however well intentioned and executed, shall necessarily fall short of Christian art in our differentiated culture, because it denatures the norming symbolic quality of art into a matter of pop illustration. The most fruitful alternatives for Christian art to pursue may well be: (a) a visionary reach, in sorrow, for the real heavenly certainties beyond our technocratized, broken world, pulling on the mask of a Byzantine tradition, El Greco, William Blake, and some of Rouault. Salvador Dali exemplifies a slick, effete secular engulfment of this option. And (b) the Christ-transforming-culture perspective initiated by seventeenth-century Dutch art—too clean then, perhaps, of historical struggle—tuned with grit to the meanness of our hollowed-out lives and the pied beauty visible to the faithful. The earthy insight of certain contemporary Jewish artists, like Abraham Rattner and sculptor Chaim Gross, may give body to the largess of this option.

Christian art is a calling for professionally competent craftsmen, not a fait accompli if one applies certain formulae. That means Christian art has been begun, but will not be wholly perfected until the Lord returns to rule completely. To support the communal, generation-building development of Christian art, for the well-being of society at large, is a mark of the obedient body of Christ.

ARTEMAS (third century). A Monarchian heretic, he taught that "the Saviour was a mere man." He maintained that his view had been orthodox at Rome until the time of Bishop Zephyrinus (198-217). Associated with Theodotus at Rome about 195, he lived on to influence Paul of Samosata about 260. The Little Labyrinth attributed to Hippolytus of Rome was written to refute him.

ARTICLES, THIRTY-NINE, see THIRTY-NINE ARTICLES

ARTICLES OF RELIGION. The doctrinal standard of the United Methodist Church of America. In 1784 John Wesley prepared a revised and shortened version of the Thirty-Nine Articles* for use in American Methodism.* Fifteen were eliminated altogether, three were rewritten, and the remainder subjected to minor verbal alterations and omissions. Apart from abbreviation, Wesley's objective was to remove from the Anglican formulary whatever inclined toward either ritualism or Calvinism. It is significant that no additions were made to cover distinctive Methodist emphases, but Wesley offered the Twenty-Four Articles to complement his sermons and Notes on the New Testament which were already accepted in England as indicating the theological standpoint of Methodism. The American Methodists added an article of their own affirming their loyalty to the American government, following the war of independence. The Twenty-Five Articles were adopted by the Baltimore Conference of 1784.

ARTICLES OF WAR. Before being "sworn in" publicly under the Salvation Army* flag, a soldier must be converted, serve a period as a recruit, be accepted by the local corps board, and sign the Articles of War. This document blends Methodist doctrines of holiness with a measure of military discipline. The recruit declares that he or she "now, and forever, renounces the world with all its sinful pleasures, companionships, treasures and objects ... no matter what I suffer, do or lose...." Other articles include abstinence from alcohol, baneful drugs, "low and profane language," "impurity," and "the reading of any obscene paper or book"; renunciation of "deceit or dishonesty" and of "oppressive, cruel or cowardly" behavior; and pledge to give everything to the "salvation war," and to obey the lawful orders of officers and carry out "all the orders and regulations of the Army." Within this framework of total obedience the Army keeps strict discipline with the aim of setting its members free to concentrate on their Christian service. In recent years there has been some evidence of restiveness, particularly on the part of the younger generation.

ARUNDEL, THOMAS (1353-1414). Archbishop of Canterbury from 1396. Third son of the earl of Arundel, he was consecrated bishop of Ely in 1374 and was thereafter lord chancellor (1386-89) to Richard II, during which time he became also archbishop of York. A determined opponent of the Lollards* and of reform movements within the church, he was impeached in Parliament in 1397 and banished. He returned to power with Henry IV, both as chancellor and in his see, which he retained till his death. Arundel opposed the "Lacklearning" Parliament of 1404 and its successor of 1410 over attempts to disendow the church; in 1408 he helped a provincial council at Oxford against the Lollards, being instrumental for the trial and burning of Lord Cobham for that heresy in 1413.

ASAPH (d.600?). Welsh bishop. Little is known about him. He was possibly descended from an important N Welsh family, and was related to Saints Deiniol and Tysilio. He apparently became bishop and abbot of Llanalwy (Denbighshire) and later established a monastery at Llanasa (Flintshire) which was renamed St. Asaph by the Normans when they erected a diocese in the area.

ASBURY, FRANCIS (1745-1816). American Methodist bishop. Born and reared near Birmingham, England, in a deeply religious home, he experienced religious awakening at the age of thirteen or fourteen and soon joined the Methodists. Of limited schooling, he was apprenticed for about six years in a now unknown trade. For five years (1766-71) he had various appointments as an itinerant minister before volunteering to serve in America in response to an appeal by John Wesley. During the Revolutionary War he alone of Wesley's appointees stayed in America and after some internal struggle identified with the emerging nation. In 1784 Wesley appointed Asbury and Thomas Coke* joint superintendents, though Asbury insisted that his appointment be ratified by the Conference of Methodist preachers. Against Wesley's wishes he assumed the title of bishop, and in the frequent absence of Coke was until his death the major force shaping American Methodism. Never well and constantly beset by numerous maladies, he nonetheless traveled nearly 300,000 miles, mostly on horseback, and endured the rigors of the American frontier to nurture the emerging denomination. Viewed by some as autocratic, he emphasized discipline and the values of the itinerant ministry. Under his leadership Methodist membership grew from a few hundred to over 200,000.

ASCENSION. The only narrative of the Ascension which can with confidence be ascribed to the original text of the NT is found in Acts 1:4-11. The reference in Mark 16:19 comes in a passage which is a late addition to the gospel, and the reading in Luke 24:51 is uncertain. The story does not suggest that Jesus was taken on a long journey upward into the sky. It simply states that "he was lifted" (a symbolic movement but not necessarily involving any great distance) and that "a cloud took him out of their sight" (again a symbolic way of veiling His divine presence as it was removed in that mode from earth). The ascension brings to a close the post-resurrection appearances of Jesus (apart from the special one to Saul in Acts 9) and so marks the end of the once-for-all revelation of God in Christ and opens the way for His universal presence through the Holy Spirit.

Theologically the Ascension is closely associated with the Resurrection as demonstrating the vindication and exaltation of Jesus (Acts 2:32f., 5:30f.; Rom. 8:34; Eph. 1:20). He is present in heaven in His glorified humanity as a pledge of the completion of His act of redemption and of the final salvation of His people (John 14:2; Heb. 1:3; 6:20). There He continues His priestly work in interceding for His people (Rom. 8:34; Heb. 7:25). The present sovereignty of Christ over all will be demonstrated clearly at the parousia (1 Cor. 15:24-26).

Ascension Day has been celebrated since at least the fourth century; following, perhaps overliterally, the "forty days" of Acts 1:3, it has been kept on the fifth Thursday after Easter.

R.E. NIXON

ASCETICISM. The Greek askēsis, "training," was used of both athletic exercises and, especially among Stoics and Cynics, moral training through education, mastery of passions, and beneficence. Greek antecedents for ascetic renunciation and privation, however, are few and probably insignificant. The OT, particularly the Wisdom tradition, also emphasizes self-discipline, but asceticism is only marginally evidenced in Judaism. Fasting was thus a mark not of asceticism but of piety.

In the NT, detachment rather than abandonment (e.g., of property) is the basis for asceticism, though apocalyptic-eschatological contexts import a puritan radicalism, e.g., in warnings to the wealthy. The NT attacks dualist-Gnostic contempt for the body and foods (cf. Col. 2:21-23; 1 Tim. 4:3-4). Jesus, an example for ascetic imitation in several regards, e.g., homelessness (cf. ascetic ideals of wandering, exile, and removal to alien territory), taught that self-denial might involve celibacy, but as a charisma, not self-willed (Matt. 19:11,12). More influential for Christian asceticism was the Lukan form of His statement that "those who are considered worthy of taking part in . . . the resurrection from the dead neither marry nor be given in marriage, and they can no longer die; for they are like the angels" (20:35,36), which restricted marriage to this (fallen) world and was readily applied to present experience of the Resurrection. Paul's letters, as well as instilling spiritual discipline (e.g., 1 Cor. 9:25-27), had the effect of boosting virginity and depreciating marriage as belonging to the old aeon, but they condemned an anticipated resurrection-celibacy at Corinth (cf. 1 Cor. 7:1, NEB mg., and passim).

By the second century, virginity had become the basis of asceticism. The superiority of the unmarried is prominent in apocryphal writings, especially acts of apostles. In Syria celibacy was required for baptism. The underlying theology, discernible in the Coptic Gospel of Thomas, ascribes to Adam's fall the origins of sexual differentiation and marriage, which Christ therefore came to abolish (cf. the agraphon in the Gospel of the Egyptians, "I am come to undo the works of woman"). The paradisal state to which the baptized is restored approximates to angelic existence (cf. Luke 20:36), which includes bodilessness, asexuality, and absence of need of food. Marcion's prohibition of marriage reflects such beliefs, but his case illustrates the difficulty of assessing the alternative influence on asceticism of a Hellenistic or Gnostic flesh-spirit dualism.

The eschatological orientation, whether of imminence (Paul and the Montanists) or realization (Syria), easily fuses with a dualist hostility to the body that was virtually universal in Gnostic and Manichaean groups and tended to develop in Hellenistic philosophy. Such enmity towards the flesh may be an introjection of disgust for the material world as a whole. Mortification of the flesh, which among the hermits of Egypt, Syria, and Celtic Ireland assumed bizarre forms, even self-destruction (cf. too the Circumcellions*), releases the imprisoned soul and prepares for discarnate angelic life. The anchorite* asserts, "I am killing the body because it is killing me." The ascetic—especially in the desert, the demons' home territory—fights the same battle as the martyr. He prepares for death by despising the body and may see himself hastening the kingdom by conquering the flesh.

Encratite* (Gr. enkrateia, "self-restraint") was the title given to heretical groups which insisted on continence and practices like abstinence from animal flesh held to mark life before the Fall, but encratism was more widespread than condemned sects. Behind Syrian encratism probably lay a Jewish-Christian outlook elaborating traditions concerning Adam. The Qumran* covenanters were perhaps crucial generators of Jewish eschatological asceticism.

It has been argued that the Greek monachos in pre-monastic contexts meant "celibate," solitary as lacking a spouse, and the Syriac īhīdāya, literally "beloved," and Greek monogenēs, "only (begotten)," and agapētos, "beloved," were similarly used to designate the ascetic's true following of Christ, the Only Beloved Son who was unmarried. The Gospel of Thomas uses monachos also in the sense of "unified," i.e., restored to asexuality.

Clement of Alexandria* and Origen,* drawing on Philo (who described the Therapeutae and depicted Jacob as the model ascetic), developed a more permanent basis for asceticism, while rejecting the dualistic foundation for Gnostic antagonism to the world. Under Stoic influence, Clement stressed apatheia, the "passionlessness" of inward detachment and purification from passions as a condition for the soul's ascent to God. Origen's approach was more radical (cf. his self-castration and zeal for martyrdom), and his works were widely read by monks. The Alexandrian understanding of salvation as divinization (cf. 2 Pet. 1:4) provided a ground similar to the angelic view for purification from everything corruptible in anticipation of divine life. The Alexandrians perpetuated a double standard by regarding ascetics as the pneumatikoi, the "spiritual" elite. In the long tradition of Byzantine mystical theology, Origen and Neoplatonism were major sources of ascetic themes, and the latter also influenced Augustine* and others in the West. The holy ascetic's conquest of the material order gave him an exalted role in Eastern society, while from the mid-fourth century most church leaders in East and West were committed to ascetic ideals.

Others of note among ancient writers on asceticism are Methodius of Olympus,* Evagrius of Pontus,* Ps-Macarius and Gregory of Nyssa,* John Cassian,* Nilus the Ascetic,* and Dorotheus* of Gaza, with Aphraates* and Ephraem* among the Syrians and the historians Palladius* and Theodoret of Cyrrhus.*

Later centuries displayed forms of asceticism more refined or simple (cf. the friars), more Christ-centered (cf. the imitatio Christi motif), more "secular" (cf. the Calvinist-Puritan tradition), but the early centuries provided the patterns basic to all subsequent manifestations.

ASH WEDNESDAY. The first day of Lent.* It is so called from the custom in the ancient church and continued in the Roman Catholic Church of marking the foreheads of worshipers with ashes which have been previously blessed. The appointment of Ash Wednesday as the first day of Lent occurred sometime in the seventh century and the custom of imposing the ashes upon the congregation probably from sometime in the eighth century. The significance of this rite is based on the OT where we often find imposition of ashes as a sign of penitence and mourning. In the early church, Christians who had fallen into grave sin were admitted to the "order of penitents" to do their penances so that they could be reconciled to the church in Holy Week ready for their Easter Communion. The widespread use of this form of public penance decreased in the early Middle Ages, but the ceremonies associated with it—notably the ashes—were extended to the whole congregation. In the Roman Church the ashes are obtained by burning the palms from the previous Palm Sunday. They are then placed on the heads of the worshipers with the words "Remember, man, that thou art dust and to dust shalt thou return." The ceremony was abolished by the Reformers, and in the Anglican Book of Common Prayer there is provided a service of Scripture readings and prayers for Ash Wednesday known as the Commination Service. The theme of the service is indicated in its subtitle, a "denouncing of God's anger and judgements against sinners."

ASKE, ROBERT (c.1501-1537). Leader of the "Pilgrimage of Grace."* Lawyer and fellow of Gray's Inn, he came from an old Yorkshire family. The suppression of the monasteries and the rumors that further changes were imminent, together with dislike of the emerging Reformation doctrines and also dislike of new taxes, were the cause of discontent first in Lincolnshire in 1536. This was soon quelled by threats and promises from Henry VIII. The Lincolnshire rising, however, proved to be the spark to a much more serious uprising in Yorkshire, and Aske came south with 30,000 men. Henry broke up this formidable threat by promising to listen to their cause, and the pilgrimage disbanded. Aske came to London and stayed at court, receiving promises from the king that most grievances would be put right. Relying on Henry's word, Aske kept the north quiet, even assisting at putting down another riot in Yorkshire. The king, however, now felt strong enough to repudiate his promises and to have Aske hanged.

ASKEW, ANNE (c.1521-1546). Protestant martyr. Born at Stallingborough, Lincolnshire, she read the Bible avidly and came as a result to dispute transubstantiation, causing a stir in her home area. She moved to London and there made friends with Joan Bocher. In March 1545 Anne was examined for heresy and committed to prison. She was then examined by Bishop Edmund Bonner,* though the frequent Roman assertion that she recanted is untrue. In June she was charged as a sacramentarian under the Six Articles, but the jury acquitted her. Shortly after, she was again brought before Bonner and others, condemned on her own confession, and sent to the Tower to be racked into recantation. But her courage overcame her torturers, and in July 1546 she was burned at Smithfield, having refused consistently to recant. The facts about Anne Askew are to be found in Bale and Foxe.

ASPERGES. This ceremony of sprinkling with holy water is observed, chiefly by the Roman Catholic Church, when consecrating churches or purifying houses, as an aid to unction and immediately before the principal Mass. Sprinkling the congregation at Mass was ordered by Pope Leo IV in 847, but the practice is attested in the eighth century. The words of Psalm 51:7 usually accompany the ceremony, although the original objective of the psalmist was inward purification by the merciful Lord.

ASSEMBLIES OF GOD. The largest denomination to stem from the Pentecostal movement of the early twentieth century. Pentecostals were at first reluctant to form separate churches, hoping to transform existing churches. As early as 1914, however, American Pentecostal leaders agreed to form a simple fellowship of churches with the name "Assemblies of God" as a scriptural designation. A Presbyterian type of structure was adopted in 1918, with headquarters at Springfield, Missouri. In Canada, assemblies were incorporated in 1917 as "The Pentecostal Assemblies of Canada" (see PENTECOSTAL CHURCHES).

In Britain, the sole Pentecostal organization till 1924 was the Pentecostal Missionary Union (1909). The opposition aroused by the movement, its growing self-consciousness, its lack of large assemblies to act as points of concentration (as in Scandinavia), and concern over the development of the Apostolic Church combined to produce growing desire for some form of organized fellowship. An application by Welsh Pentecostal assemblies for acceptance as a Welsh District Council of AOG, USA, precipitated action. On the initiative of Thomas Myerscough and J. Nelson Parr, a preliminary conference in Birmingham (1924) recognized the need for unity and fellowship, and agreed to the name "Assemblies of God." Three months later a conference in London adopted a constitution which created an executive presbytery of seven with Parr as chairman and secretary and as editor of a paper, Redemption Tidings. The first annual conference followed in London. In 1925 the Pentecostal Missionary Union merged with AOG which also undertook responsibility for the annual Pentecostal Whitsuntide convention, then held in Kingsway Hall, London. The 1925 conference agreed to compile a hymnbook, Redemption Tidings. Two independent Pentecostal Bible colleges, at Hampstead and Bristol, were united in 1951 and handed over to conference. Situated on a new site at Kenley, this institution became the official AOG Bible school in Britain.

AOG support a large missionary force which has established assemblies in most parts of the world. They are particularly strong in France and Italy, Congo and Nigeria, and especially in Brazil.

AOG describe themselves as "Pentecostal in experience, evangelical in outlook, and fundamental in their approach to the Bible." They include baptism in the Holy Spirit with the initial evidence of speaking in tongues among the fundamental truths of Christianity. In organization they use a Presbyterian structure, accepting the autonomy of the local church, but also utilizing district councils and a general council which acts as "the controlling body." This latter operates through a general conference which meets annually.

ASSOCIATIONS, LAW OF (1901). This defined the legal status in France of all voluntary societies including Catholic religious orders. It formed part of a new wave of secular anti-Catholic legislation during the Third Republic, culminating in the rupture of relations between France and the Vatican (1904) and between church and state (1905). Promoted by the ministry of Pierre Waldeck-Rousseau, the law was believed by its supporters to be necessary to check the influence of a rival religious force within the state threatening to break the "moral unity" of France which, they asserted, rested on "revolutionary and republican principles." The law provided, inter alia, that no religious congregation or any of its dependent institutions (e.g., schools, hospitals) may be formed, or continue to exist, without state authorization, that any congregation may be closed by simple decree, that no member of an unauthorized order could teach, that the state will determine the liquidation of property of dissolved orders. Some 615 congregations complied while 215 did not, including the Benedictines and Jesuits. The successor ministry of Emile Combes used the law severely and extended its provisions to prohibit teaching by any religious order. By 1904, Combes boasted, he had closed 13,904 schools.

ASSUMPTION. The belief that "Mary, immaculately conceived by God and ever virgin, when the course of her earthly life had been finished had been taken up in body and soul to heavenly glory," which was defined as an article of faith in the Roman Catholic Church by Pius XII (Munificentissimus Deus, 1950). Previously the belief had the status of a pious and probable opinion which Benedict XIV refused to make into an article of faith in 1740. There had been pressure since 1870 for some such definition to be made. Nothing is said in the NT about the death of Mary, and the belief is first found in some apocryphal documents with a Gnostic flavor in the late fourth century. They include such titles as The Passing of Mary, The Obsequies of Mary, and The Book of the Passing of the Blessed Virgin. These writings vary in their accounts of when the assumption took place and indeed when Mary's death took place. One work was condemned in the Decretum Gelasianum and they were not accepted in orthodox circles in the West until the time of Gregory of Tours in the late sixth century. There are texts in Greek, Latin, Syriac, Coptic, Arabic, and Ethiopic. The Coptic texts may be the most important, as the legend was probably first elaborated in Egypt. The standard Greek writing is one attributed to John the Evangelist and the standard Latin writing one attributed to Melito of Sardis. In the East, Andrew of Crete in the eighth century believed, on the evidence of the pseudonymous work Concerning the Divine Names, that Dionysius the Areopagite had witnessed the assumption; John of Damascus presented it as an ancient catholic doctrine. The idea has been less precisely defined in the East and is known as the Koimēsis ("falling asleep").

ASSUMPTIONISTS (Augustinians of the Assumption). A congregation of priests with simple vows, founded at Nîmes about 1843-45 by the diocesan vicar-general, Emmanuel Daudé d'Alzon. The purpose was "to restore higher education according to the mind of St. Augustine and St. Thomas, to fight the Church's enemies in secret societies under the revolutionary flag; to fight for the unity of the Church. . . ." They were expelled from France in 1900 by an anticlerical government, but spread to many parts of the world. Their work includes care of asylums and schools, the dissemination of literature, and missionary endeavor. Their "Institute for Byzantine Studies," established in 1897, has especially fostered the study and theology of the Eastern Church, notably through the publication Revue des Études Byzantine.

ASSURANCE. The English word is used to translate two Greek words: pistis, "faith" (Acts 17:31), and plērophoria, "full confidence" (1 Thess. 1:5). That assurance was necessary for the full enjoyment of salvation was dimly recognized in the OT (cf. Isa. 32:17). In its NT context, the word has both objective and subjective references. As objective it denotes the ground of the believer's confidence and certainty (Acts 17:31; cf. 1 Tim. 1:15). This external ground of assurance is the "so great salvation" wrought by Christ, His heavenly session at the right hand of God, and the Scriptures of truth which make wise unto salvation. As subjective, assurance has reference to the actual experience of the believer. Saving faith brings an experience by the Holy Spirit of the Gospel with "full conviction" (1 Thess. 1:5 RSV) and a firm certainty (Col. 2:2). Living in "full assurance of hope" to the end (Heb. 6:11 KJV), the trusting soul can come to God with a true heart in "full assurance of faith" (Heb. 10:22; cf. Eph. 3:12). But inward assurance must be checked by moral and spiritual tests (cf. e.g., 1 Cor. 6:9; Eph. 4:17; 1 John 2:3-5, etc) by which we know that we are of the truth and that our hearts are assured before God (1 John 3.19).

In contrast with the teachings of the Roman Catholic Church and the decrees of the Council of Trent,* and with some Arminian declarations, Reformed theology generally has stressed the possibility of, and blessing attendant upon, the assurance of salvation. Recent Lutheranism, however, has weakened, if not denied altogether, full assurance, while the influence of Schleiermacher and Ritschl on modern theology has been in the direction of a revived Pelagianism.* The subjectivism of many present-day charismatic movements has, in some evangelical circles, tended to move the ground of assurance from the objective Word to the inward state of the believer. The result has led, in several instances, to an unhealthy introspection and a clouding of the full biblical perspective.

ASSYRIAN CHURCH. Born of the controversy over the Incarnation, christologically unorthodox but fervent in mission and evangel, the Assyrian (Syriac-speaking, Nestorian) Church carried its particular version of the Gospel from its first center in Mesopotamian Edessa Callirrhoe, and its second in Nisibis, to earth's remotest known ends. Repudiated and anathematized for Nestorianism* by Western Christendom (Council of Ephesus, 431), and harried out of the Roman Empire, these sectarians advanced ultimately to China and India, making tremendous impact. They suffered innumerable persecutions, culminating in the Kurdistan mountains in World War I. Settled in Edessa long before 431, they expanded to Nisibis in 435, but lost the Edessa foothold in 489—which merely sparked astounding missionary expansion. Celibacy was originally essential, even for laymen seeking baptism. By a decree in 499, clergy, including bishops, received sanction to marry, and some did this, much to the scandal of the Roman Church. The mendicant praying monks (Euchites) were probably lazy rather than immoral, as enemies unkindly insinuated. Lofty in ideals, they have similarities with later Quietists and perfectionists.

ASTERIUS THE SOPHIST (d. after 341). Arian* theologian. Fragments remain in the works of Athanasius and of Marcellus of Ancyra from his Syntagmation, which was published possibly before the Council of Nicea (325). A disciple of Lucian, the teacher at Antioch, Asterius was too moderate in his Arianism for the historian Philostorgius. Recently M. Richard has edited his homilies on the Psalms, which provide liturgical evidence for the turn of the third century. He confirms that baptism was a regular part of the Easter vigil leading up to the Eucharist on Easter Day. An intriguing hymn to Easter night survives in his homilies.

ASTROLOGY. The prediction of events on the basis of the positions of heavenly bodies started in ancient Babylonia, but did not reach Greece until about 410 B.C. After Alexander's campaigns it spread rapidly, and from the second century B.C. it influenced the entire intellectual world until the time of Newton. Its greatest protagonist was Ptolemy (second century A.D.), whose book Tetrabiblos became the standard astrological text of the Middle Ages. Astrology still exerts enormous influence throughout the world; it is particularly prevalent in India and Ceylon. In the West it is usually taken half-seriously, but not always; in World War II Hitler and Himmler maintained regular contact with astrologers.

Astrology takes three forms: (1) meteorological or astronomical phenomena are regarded as omens relating to rulers and their peoples; (2) planets are supposed to exert influences at birth as in the germination of seeds or the birth of children (such influences are commonly depicted in horoscopes); (3) planets are regarded as ruling over particular geographical regions. Horoscopes and geographical astrology date only from the Greek period.

According to the medieval view, man the microcosm is influenced by the external universe, the macrocosm. The planets in particular are linked with both the parts of man's anatomy and his dispositions. Though now regarded as a superstition, horoscope astrology was once regarded as the zenith of intellectual achievement; universities maintained chairs of astrology while even professors of astronomy (as in early seventeenth-century Oxford) were compelled to lecture on astrology. Even Kepler* cast horoscopes.

The orthodox Christian view was that though man is influenced by his stars, his actions are not determined by them. Paracelsus* speaks of man controlling his stars, meaning that despite the influences they exert, man is not deprived of freedom. Paul (Rom. 8:39) insists that neither zenith ("height") nor nadir ("depth")—believed to be astrological terms—can separate us from the love of God.

Astrology steadily declined as the heliocentric system gained credence. Proper evidence for the older view was not forthcoming, and the difficulty of understanding how planets could act in the manner supposed proved insuperable. Nevertheless, the principle underlying astrological beliefs is not entirely wrong; astrology rightly insists on the interrelatedness of the natural order. In addition there is scientific evidence favoring the view that the positions of planets may affect the earth physically (e.g., conjunctions of the major planets may trigger earthquakes).

Astrological predictions are particularly dangerous because they can be self-fulfilling, e.g., if astrologers predict a financial crisis many businessmen may sell their shares and precipitate the crisis predicted. Similarly, an astrological prediction of death on a particular day may suggest suicide.

ASTRUC, JEAN (1684-1766). Physician; founder of modern Pentateuchal criticism. Possibly of Jewish extraction, he was born at Sauve, Languedoc. His father, a Huguenot* pastor, became Roman Catholic when the Edict of Nantes was revoked (1685), so Jean was brought up a Catholic. He studied at Montpellier, taught medicine there (1707), at Toulouse (1716), and at Paris (1731) and was court physician to Augustus II of Poland (1729) and to Louis XV of France (1730). In 1753 he published anonymously his Conjectures sur les mémoires originaux dont il paraît que Moise s'est servi pour composer le livre de la Genèse. He concluded that Moses made use of earlier documents; the two primary sources used YHWH and Elohim respectively as divine names. Though some ridiculed his hypothesis, J.G. Eichhorn* later established its importance.

ATHANASIAN CREED. Two creeds need to be distinguished: (1) the Nicene Creed*; (2) the Athanasian Creed or the Quicunque Vult, known also as the Fides Catholica.

How the latter became known as the Athanasian Creed (beyond the fact that it expresses Nicene sentiments) is unknown, but it was apparently written originally in Latin, then translated into Greek, and is later than Athanasius.* It has been widely used in the West among Anglicans (in the Book of Common Prayer), Catholics, and Protestants. The late medieval controversy between the East and the West on the double procession* of the Holy Spirit (that the Holy Spirit is from the Father and the Son) intensified its use in the liturgy of Western churches. But its use is now diminishing.

In the preface and conclusion, belief in the truths it declares is said to be necessary to salvation and it anathematizes divergent faith. It is made up of forty rhythmical sentences and is thus more a sermon or instructional hymn than a creed. It expounds the doctrine of the Trinity and the divine relationships, the Incarnation, and the two natures of Christ, and includes statements about our Lord's work as Savior and Judge. It is a valuable compendium of orthodox faith and contains one of the best Christian confessions on the Trinity, "we worship one God in Trinity, and Trinity in unity; neither confounding the persons, nor dividing the substance."

As to its origin, Babcock suggests it be dated either in the latter half of the fourth or the fifth century, but not later than the sixth century. It seems to reflect Augustinian views or was known to him. Recently some attribute it to Ambrose, while others attribute it to writers from Gaul such as Hilary. The errors it opposes are primarily Arian,* Apollinarian, and Sabellian, rather than Nestorian and Eutychian. Parallels between the Quicunque Vult and the letters sent from the Council of Constantinople in 382 seem to confirm the period 381-428 as the time of its writing. It appears in the handbooks of certain Eastern Orthodox churches, including the Greek Horologium and Russian service books from the seventeenth century, but as translated from the Greek version omitting the Filioque clause.

SAMUEL J. MIKOLASKI

ATHANASIUS (c.296-373). Champion of orthodoxy against Arianism.* Born to wealthy parents, he was Egyptian by birth but Greek by education. In the excellent catechetical school of Alexandria he was deeply moved by the martyrdoms of Christians during the last persecutions and was profoundly influenced by Alexander,* bishop of Alexandria, by whom he was ordained deacon. Of small stature but keen mind, Athanasius took no official part in the proceedings of the Council of Nicea (325), but as secretary to Alexander his notes, circulars, and encyclicals written on behalf of his bishop had an important effect on the outcome. He was a clear-minded and skilled theologian, a prolific writer with a journalist's instinct for the power of the pen, and a devout Christian—which endeared him to the large Christian public of Alexandria and the the vast majority of the clergy and monks of Egypt.

Athanasius contested Arius and the Arians during most of the fourth century. Arius taught that Christ the Logos* was not the eternal Son of God, but a subordinate being, which view attacked the doctrines of the Trinity, the Creation, and redemption. Athanasius said the Scriptures teach the eternal Sonship of the Logos, the direct creation of the world by God, and the redemption of the world and men by God in Christ. On the Incarnation of the Word of God, written while Athanasius was in his twenties, expounds these truths.

Alexander died in 328, and by public demand Athanasius was enthroned as bishop when he was only thirty-three. The victory at Nicea remained in political jeopardy for two generations, and Athanasius was the focal point of Arian attack. Arianism had a wide following in the empire and also the sympathies of Constantius, Constantine's successor in 337. The history of the Church in the fourth century parallels the events of Athanasius's life and his public ministry. He was hounded through five exiles embracing seventeen years of flight and hiding, not only among the monks of the desert, but often in Alexandria where he was shielded by the people. During one exile, at Rome in 339, he established firm links with the Western Church which supported his cause. His later years were spent peacefully at Alexandria. G.L. Prestige declares that almost single-handedly Athanasius saved the Church from pagan intellectualism, that "by his tenacity and vision in preaching one God and Saviour, he had preserved from dissolution the unity and integrity of the Christian faith."

The volume and scope of his writings is impressive. Contra Gentes, a refutation of paganism, and de Incarnatione, the exposition of the incarnation and work of Christ, were both written early (c.318) and are really two parts of one work. De Decretis and Expositio Fidei are also important doctrinal writings. The polemical and historical essays include Apologia Contra Arianos, ad Episcopos Aegypti, and de Synodis. He wrote many commentaries on biblical books. There are numerous other writings, including letters, many of which are readily accessible (The Nicene and Post-Nicene Fathers, Series 2, IV). Key doctrines which he discusses include Creation, the Incarnation, the Holy Spirit and the Trinity, the work of Christ, and baptism and the Eucharist. Athanasius greatly influenced the monastic movement, especially in Egypt.

ATHANASIUS (the Athonite) (c.920-1003). Byzantine founder of cenobite* monasticism (in 961) on Mt. Athos. After studies at Constantinople, he first went to Mt. Athos as a hermit to avoid court honors. He established there the first of the famous monasteries (the Lavra) through the support of the emperor Nicephorus Phocas. He introduced a rule for cenobites based on the common-life ideals of Basil the Great and Theodore the Studite. Opposition, on the grounds that his experiment was a result of imperial influence, followed the death of the emperor in 969 and drove him into exile. The new emperor, John I Tzimisces, supported his return. Athanasius became abbot-general of all the communities on Mt. Athos before his death in a building accident.

JAMES TAYLOR

ATHEISM. The denial that God exists. Atheism in the strict sense is rare; self-styled atheists are often agnostics or secularists. Tillich (1948) defines atheism as the view that "life has no depth, that it is shallow." For Toulmin (1957) atheism is the view that cosmic powers are indifferent or "positively callous" to man. Atheists have been classified as "tough" and "tender," or "crude" and "sensitive." The tender atheist accepts higher values (empathy, truth, beauty, etc.) and so has a good deal in common with the Christian, even though his intellectual position differs radically.

Arguments for atheism are based on: (1) logical positivism and linguistics: God's existence cannot be empirically verified, and the word "God" is asserted to be meaningless; (2) alleged fallacies in the traditional proofs of God's existence; (3) the claim that theism does actual harm, e.g., by encouraging persecution; (4) the claim that science offers an adequate explanation of the world without need for the supernatural; (5) the claim that accepted psychological laws or principles explain belief in God.

To these arguments, taken in order, it may be replied: (1) we cannot determine truth by the way we talk which, in any case, is often equivocal; a criterion of meaning which makes God meaningless cannot be sustained—no one doubts the reality of the past even though it cannot be perceived or empirically verified; (2) the classical "proofs" can be restated in modern terms, and one or two of them are remarkably cogent; (3) persecutions by atheists and pagans (Communists, Nazis) have been more cruel in our time than those perpetrated in the past by theists; cruelty is not the result of theism—genuine belief in a forgiving God predisposes to kindness; (4) this is not true. Science gives no account of the very small, of the very large, or of origins. Nor can it be shown that scientific explanations exclude explanations of other kinds (artistic, teleological as applied to machines, as well as theological); (5) psychological explanations are double-edged weapons. Atheism can be explained psychologically by disappointment in the father; alternatively a masochistic desire not to be happy may result in a repudiation for oneself of the happiness associated with belief.

ATHENAGORAS (second century). Christian Apologist of Athens who presented Christian doctrine within the framework provided by a Middle Platonic epitome of Plato's philosophy. His Apology petitions Emperor Marcus Aurelius* and his son Commodus on behalf of the Christians and refutes the calumnies leveled against them, namely, atheism, eating human flesh, and practicing incest. He draws attention to the peaceful and blameless living of Christians and claims equal rights for them with other citizens. His treatise On the Resurrection of the Body defends a doctrine which the cultured pagans of his time found most difficult to accept. Athenagoras's lucid discussion is addressed to the philosophers, and the argument is kept entirely on their ground. It is therefore deficient in that the incarnation and resurrection of Christ are ignored. He also stressed the divinity of the Logos* and the triadic nature of God. The description of him as the "Christian Philosopher of Athens" is most appropriate.

G.L. CAREY

ATHENS. Capital of Attica, metropolis of ancient Greek culture, and capital of modern Greece. Its name seems to have derived from that of its patron goddess, Athene. The city has a striking situation with the rock of the Acropolis rising more than 500 feet above the plain. A monarchy in its early days and then an oligarchy, it became a pioneer in democracy from about 500 B.C. It played a leading part in the Persian wars and reached the peak of its political and cultural power in the fifth century B.C. After its conquest by the Macedonians in 338 B.C., there began the Hellenistic period in which Athens was still revered for her culture and learning though it had passed its peak. Athens was taken by the Romans in 86 B.C., but was made a free city under Augustus and was adorned with new buildings, particularly by Hadrian.

Acts 17 records the visit of Paul and his preaching the Gospel in the Areopagus. He showed himself able to present it in terms which were related to current philosophy, but he made only a few converts, among them Dionysius the Areopagite and a woman named Damaris. Apart from an allusion in passing in 1 Thess. 3:1, there is no further mention of Athens in the New Testament. The first reference to the church in Athens comes from Melito of Sardis who states (according to Eusebius) that the emperor Antoninus Pius tried to stop the harassment of Christians which was going on there in the middle of the second century.

Because of the importance of its schools of philosophy Athens was the home of a number of Christian Apologists* such as Quadratus, Aristides, and Athenagoras. Among those who studied at the philosophical schools were Julian, Basil, and Gregory Nazianzus, but in 529 Justinian forbade the study of philosophy. During the Byzantine period it had the status of a provincial town, and the ancient temples were used as Christian churches. In 869 it was given its own archbishop. From 1204 it came under Latin rule until its conquest by the Turks in 1456. The Greek Church was allowed to continue during the period of Turkish domination, which ended in 1833 with the setting up of the modern kingdom of Greece, of which Athens became the capital. At the same time the Orthodox Church of Greece became independent under the archbishop of Athens.

ATHOS, MOUNT. The "holy mountain" on which developed a famous monastic community. During the tenth century there were two dominant monastic centers in the Byzantine Church. One was the monastery at Studium, the other was the monastic community on Mt. Athos. The Athos community went on to become the more important center of the two. The mountain is 6,350 feet above sea level, located on a rocky peninsula protruding into the Aegean Sea in northern Greece. There are over 900 places of worship (churches, chapels, etc.) on this mountain. As early as the fourth century there appears to have been hermit monks carrying out their asceticism at Athos. The style of monastic life went from the secluded hermit existence, to the monastic community, and then to very regulated monasteries.

Today the mountain contains about twenty semi-independent monasteries, plus smaller houses and hermit cells. Seventeen of the twenty identify themselves as Greek. Also included are a Russian house, a Serbian house, and a Bulgarian one. In Byzantine times there were Georgian and Latin houses also. It is said that at one time the population of Athos was about 40,000 monks, but by 1965 the numbers had dwindled to a little less than 1,500.

When the Ottoman Turks conquered Greece, Mt. Athos submitted quickly to their conquest. The monks were well treated, and the monastic community was allowed its independence subject to a tribute.

GEORGE GIACUMAKIS, JR.

ATONEMENT. This is one of the few theological terms of Anglo-Saxon origin. It means "at-one-ment" and signifies the process of making God and man one after the tragedy of man's sin had separated them (Isa. 59:2) and made them enemies (Col. 1:21). The NT has much to say about the way Christ's death brings them together, and in the literal sense the Atonement is the crucial doctrine of Christianity.

The Christian Church has never accepted any one way of viewing the Atonement as the orthodox way. There is no doctrine of the Atonement equivalent to the two-natures doctrine in Christology, for example. The result is that there are many ways in which Christians have answered the question, "How does the death of Christ long ago and so far away save me here and now?" We can detect three broad trends in the multiplicity of theories of atonement emerging during nineteen centuries of church history.

The first trend is seen in what Gustav Aulén has called the "classic" or "dramatic" view. It leans heavily on those biblical passages which speak of the Atonement as a ransom. It sees sinners as justly belonging to Satan because of their sin. But in the death of His Son God paid the price of their redemption. Satan accepted Jesus in place of sinners but he could not hold Him. On Easter Day Jesus rose triumphant, leaving Satan without either his original captives or their ransom. Aulén maintains that the essential point is not the grotesque imagery in which the Fathers expressed this theory but the authentic note of victory. He sees the essence of the Atonement as a process of victory over all the forces of death and evil. Most agree that victory is important, but they do not see this as the whole story.

The second group of theories may be said to have originated with Anselm of Canterbury, who saw sin as dishonor to the majesty of God. On the cross the God-man rendered satisfaction for this dishonor. Along similar lines the Reformers thought that Christ paid the penalty sinners incurred when they broke God's law. The strong points of this theory are its agreement with biblical teaching (e.g., on justification) and its insistence that the moral law cannot be disregarded in the process of forgiveness.

The third group of theories (especially linked with the name of Abelard) sees the Atonement in the effect on man of what Christ did. When we contemplate the love of God shown in the death of his Son we are moved to repent and to love Him in return. We are thus transformed. All is subjective.

All three theories have something to say to us. Each is inadequate by itself (especially the third, for it sees Christ as doing nothing except setting an example; the real salvation is worked out by sinners themselves). But taken together they help us to see a little of Christ's great work for men.

ATTICUS. Patriarch of Constantinople, 406-425. From Sebaste in Armenia, he was educated among Eustathian monks (Pneumatomachi*) but joined the Catholic Church. According to the historian Socrates, Atticus was kind, courtly, scholarly, and able; he did not persecute. This is confirmed by his protection of Novatianists but denied by his attitude towards Pelagians, Messalians, and followers of John Chrysostom. He expelled Celestius about 413, and Julian of Eclanum about 418. He urged the bishops of Pamphylia and Amphilochus of Side to suppress the Messalians. In 406 he secured a rescript expelling and dispossessing bishops who refused communion with himself and Theophilus of Alexandria and Porphyry of Antioch. Such bishops, including Innocent of Rome, supported John Chrysostom* and pressed that his name should appear on the diptychs of Constantinople, where several congregations were refusing to acknowledge Atticus. Eventually popular pressure on Theodotus of Antioch (420-29) and the generous influence of Acacius of Beroea persuaded Atticus to restore the name of John; his defense of this failed to convince Cyril of Alexandria. Atticus's kindness was shown in shelter given to Persian refugees about 420 and in financial aid sent to famine-struck Nicea. At court he had advised the regent of the young Theodosius II, who in 421 transferred the ecclesiastical jurisdiction of Illyricum to Constantinople. G.T.D. ANGEL

ATTILA (d.453). King of the Huns. From victories in the East his hordes swept westward, were checked in Gaul (451), but in 452 invaded Italy and were halted only when Pope Leo I somehow convinced Attila of the wisdom of remaining beyond the Danube. There was no persecution of Christianity as such—the invaders were not without religion, and Attila himself is said to have besought the prayers of Lupus, bishop of Troyes—but the invasions erased or eroded the Christian presence in a large area of central Europe. In Latin Christendom, tales of Attila's ferocity grew, prompting the description "the Scourge of God."

ATTO II (c.885-961). Bishop of Vercelli from 924. Of a distinguished Lombard family, son of Viscount Aldegarius, he was also grand chancellor to Hugh of Provence, king of Italy. De pressuris ecclesiasticis (about 940) is his earliest major work, on refutation of charges against clergy, filling of clerical posts especially bishoprics, and lay seizure of church property after a bishop's death. He also wrote Commentary on the Epistles of Paul, Letters and Sermons, Canones statutaque Vercellensis ecclesiae, and Polipticum on moral philosophy. He should not be confused with Atto of Milan (d.1085/6), who wrote Breviarium, which was the basis for Gregorian reforms. C.G. THORNE, JR.

ATTWOOD, THOMAS (1765-1838). English composer. Studies at Naples and with Mozart at Vienna brought him into contact with the finest trends in composition on the Continent. While he devoted his energies chiefly to operatic works, his small number of anthems shows a freshness of melody and a refinement of taste in advance of his English contemporaries. Several pieces, such as "Teach me, Lord, the way of Thy statutes," remain in the repertory of many choirs today. Attwood served as organist of the Chapel Royal and of St. Paul's Cathedral, London. He was a friend of Mendelssohn and was one of those influential in introducing the music of J.S. Bach into England. J.B. MAC MILLAN

AUBURN AFFIRMATION (1924). Issued by a group of Presbyterian ministers meeting in Auburn, New York, this was "designed to safeguard the unity and liberty" of the Presbyterian Church. It asserted that the General Assembly had acted unconstitutionally when in 1923 it declared that all candidates for the ministry must affirm five "essential and necessary" doctrines prior to ordination. These were: (1) the inspiration and inerrancy of the Scriptures; (2) the virgin birth of Christ; (3) "that Christ offered up himself a sacrifice to satisfy divine justice"; (4) that Jesus arose from the dead "with the same body in which he suffered"; (5) that Jesus worked "mighty miracles" which made "changes in the order of nature." The Affirmation held that this was an attempt to commit the church to "certain theories concerning the inspiration of the Bible, the Incarnation, the Atonement, the Resurrection, and the Continuing Life and Supernatural Power of our Lord Jesus Christ." The signatories of the Affirmation claimed to "hold most earnestly to these great facts and doctrines," yet believed that "these are not the only theories allowed by the Scriptures and our standards as explanations of these facts and doctrines." The Auburn Affirmation was essentially a plea for toleration of theological diversity. Many conservative Presbyterians viewed the Affirmation as a shocking revelation of the growth of liberal influence within the denomination. HARRY SKILTON

AUBURN DECLARATION (1837). Declaration of belief issued by a strategy convention of the New School within the Presbyterian Church in the USA. Earlier that year the General Assembly, which was controlled by an Old School majority, exscinded the predominantly New School synods of Genesee, Geneva, Utica, and Western Reserve. The Old School believed that the New School party had departed from the Calvinistic theology of the Westminster Confession and were overly tolerant of the New Haven Theology* of Nathaniel Taylor* which placed a greater stress on human initiative in the process of salvation than did orthodox Calvinism. The Auburn Declaration rejected these accusations, reaffirmed the main, distinctive points of Calvinism, and asserted that "God permitted the introduction of sin, not because he was unable to prevent it . . . but for wise and benevolent reasons which he has not revealed." Because of the sin of Adam all mankind became morally corrupt and liable to eternal death. Saving faith is "an effect of the special operations of the Holy Spirit." The reason why some embrace the Gospel while others reject it is that "God has made them to differ." The Auburn Declaration established the New School's case for its Calvinist orthodoxy and eventually helped bring about reunion with the Old School in 1869.

AUDIANI. A group which took its name from Audi, an ascetic deacon near Edessa about 325, who criticized worldliness in the church and clergy. Maltreated by his opponents, he left the church to become bishop of monastic communities in suburbs and deserts, from Antioch to Arabia and Mesopotamia. The exile of Audi and his followers to Scythia by Constantine won Gothic adherents.

AUGSBURG, INTERIM OF (1548). The attempt by the emperor Charles V* to establish religious unity in Germany. His sympathies were with the Roman Catholic Church, but the strength of the Protestant cause, openly manifested in the League of Smalcald,* could not be ignored. After the defeat of the Protestant princes in the Smalcald War, Charles felt that he could impose some measure of religious uniformity and drew up the Interim, which was to be a provisional arrangement until the Council of Trent* had completed its work of investigating possible reforms. In the Interim Charles sought to reimpose the Roman Catholic hierarchy on the German Church and to reestablish the old fasts, feasts, and ceremonies. To allay the discontent of the Protestants, he introduced certain external reforms, permitting the marriage of the clergy and the giving of the cup to the laity in the Lord's Supper. Inevitably such a compromise satisfied no one; force of arms in the person of Spanish troops was needed to compel the Protestants in particular to accept it. The reaction to this compulsion led to the defeat of Charles and to the Peace of Augsburg* in 1555, when each state was given liberty to choose the creed which it would adopt—Lutheran or Roman Catholic.

HUGH J. BLAIR

AUGSBURG, PEACE OF (1555). An agreement reached after the defeat of the emperor Charles V* by Protestant princes in Germany (1552). A preliminary settlement negotiated with his brother Ferdinand at Passau in 1552 recognized all secularizations of church lands and approved the principle of a religious peace. Failing to capture Metz in 1553, Charles left Germany and commissioned Ferdinand to settle affairs at the Diet of Augsburg.

The terms of the peace were: (1) Lutheran princes, imperial knights, and free cities were guaranteed security equal to that of the Catholic estates. Cities could permit both faiths if they were already established; (2) the peace applied only to Catholics and those Protestants who adhered to the Augsburg Confession.* "Sacramentarians" (Calvinists) and "Sectarians" (Anabaptists) were excluded; (3) each estate or prince determined the religion of his domain and all subjects must conform (Cuius regio, eius religio was the term later used by jurists). Dissenters could sell their property and emigrate with their families; (4) all church lands secularized prior to 1552 would remain in Protestant hands; (5) an "ecclesiastical reservation" provided that archbishops, bishops, and abbots who turned Protestant lost their dignity and rights, and the chapters would select an orthodox successor.

The peace is significant because it meant that both the political unity of Germany and the medieval unity of Christendom were permanently shattered. The power granted secular rulers to control religious matters in their domains weakened genuine Christianity in Germany. The exclusion of Calvinism and vagueness of the ecclesiastical reservation made the settlement fragile, but its principles held until the Peace of Westphalia* in 1648.

RICHARD V. PIERARD

AUGSBURG CONFESSION (1530). A summary of the evangelical faith presented to Emperor Charles V* for the Diet of Augsburg. Commissioned by John, elector of Saxony, it was written by Luther, Justus Jonas, Bugenhagen, and Melanchthon. The group, which met at Torgau, had before it the Schwabach Articles written in 1529 and the articles presented during the Marburg Colloquy. The call for the diet indicated the emperor's hope that some conciliation between Catholics and Protestants might be achieved. This, with the recent failure at Marburg with the Zwinglians, might explain the conciliatory and irenic wording of the document.

The Torgau Articles were reworked by Melanchthon. One of his objectives in writing the Confession was to refute the charges of Johann Eck in his book, 404 Articles, that Lutheranism was reviving certain ancient heresies. The draft was sent to Luther for his perusal and some alterations were made after consultation with Jonas, the Saxon Chancellor Brück, Bishop Stadion, and Alfonso Valdez, the imperial secretary. On 23 June 1530, the Confession was approved by John, elector of Saxony; Philip Landgrave of Hesse; George, margrave of Brandenburg; Dukes Francis and Ernest of Lüneburg; representatives from the cities of Nuremberg and Reutlingen; and other counselors and theologians. Ultimately four more cities accepted it during the meeting of the diet. On the insistence of the Protestant princes and against the objection of Charles V, the Confession was read publicly in German during the diet on 25 April 1530. It took two hours.

The German and Latin texts were then given to a group of twenty Catholic theologians chosen by Campeggius for examination and refutation. The reply, called the Papalist Confutation, approved without qualification nine of the articles; six were approved with qualifications or in part; thirteen were condemned. A revised form of the reply was later adopted by Charles V as his own confession. The emperor demanded that the Protestants conform to the Confutation, but they sought the opportunity to reply to it. This was done by Melanchthon,* and the reply or apology was then affixed to the Confession. The German translation by Jonas in 1532 helped to make this the principal confession of the Lutheran Church. Due to the unauthorized publication of the Confession in 1530, Melanchthon issued the Editio Princeps in 1531, presenting the authorized text. The first twenty-one articles dealt with similarities and dissimilarities between Lutherans and Catholics, the last seven articles with abuses in the church, such as failure to give both bread and cup during the Lord's Supper; celibacy; paying for masses; compulsory confession; equating grace with fasts and festivals; lack of monastic discipline; abuse of ecclesiastical power. Melanchthon issued another text in 1540 called the Variata. There is no sure evidence Luther rejected it. The Variata was used by the Crypto-Calvinists. When the Book of Concord* was adopted, the Latin text of 1531 was chosen over the 1540 Variata text. The Confession was the earliest of the formal creedal statements and became the authoritative confessional standard for the Lutheran Church, having influence upon other confessions.

AUGUSTA, JOHN (Jan) (1500-1575). Leader of the Bohemian Brethren.* The latter, following the suppression of the Taborites in 1453, possessed many of the evangelical and social views of the early Hussites, It was Augusta's hope to encourage his group to initiate the formation of a large evangelical party in Bohemia lacking doctrinal differences. This ambition led several Bohemian nobles to the Brethren. Negotiations, which were protracted and unsuccessful, were begun in 1533 with Luther, Bucer, and Calvin when Augusta assumed leadership of the Brethren. During the persecution of the Brethren, Augusta was held in prison from 1547 to 1564 by Ferdinand of Hapsburg. In 1564 Augusta tried to unite the Brethren with the Utraquists* in order to form a national evangelical church in Bohemia, but the attempt failed.

AUGUSTINE OF CANTERBURY (d.604?). First archbishop of Canterbury. Previously the prior of a monastery at Rome, he was sent by Gregory the Great* in 596 on a mission to convert the pagan English. He was somewhat reluctant and asked permission to turn back before finally crossing the Channel in 597 and landing in Thanet. Gregory knew, however, that the time was ripe. Ethelbert, king of Kent, whose territory lay closest to the Continent, had married a Christian princess of the Franks named Bertha, and she had brought to England with her Bishop Liuthard as her chaplain. Moreover, Ethelbert at this time was the dominant ruler among the Anglo-Saxon tribes south of the Humber. Within four years, and perhaps much sooner, Ethelbert received baptism. Augustine was then made archbishop, and Bede says the consecration took place at Arles, although the authority for this statement is unknown.

It had been Gregory's intention to make the old Roman centers of London and York the metropolitan sees of the English Church. London belonged, however, to the East Saxons, and so Augustine fixed his seat at Canterbury. Later he sent his companions, Justus (to preach west of the Medway as bishop of Rochester) and Mellitus (to convert the East Saxons as bishop of London).

Gregory's sustained interest in the details of the English mission are apparent in the very specific instructions he sent to Augustine. The latter failed (c.603) in his attempt to carry out Gregory's order to reach agreement with the leaders of the ancient Celtic Church in the west of Britain. Beyond Kent, the successful conversion of the English was carried out by other missions unrelated to that of Augustine, the most important of which was the Celtic mission from Iona.* Augustine also established at Canterbury with Ethelbert's help the monastery of St. Peter and St. Paul, where the first ten archbishops and several kings were buried.

JOHN TILLER

AUGUSTINE OF HIPPO (354-430). Aurelius Augustinus (Austin), bishop of Hippo Regius in Numidia in Roman North Africa, and greatest of the Latin Fathers. Born at Tagaste of middle-class parents, Patricius (converted only shortly before his death in 372) and the devout, domineering Monica, he was educated locally, then at Madaura and Carthage (371-75). He excelled in the rhetoric-centered training of late antiquity, but failed to master Greek. A catechumen since infancy, he nevertheless indulged a passion for the theater and disciplined his sexuality only by an unofficial marriage (372) which lasted until 385 and produced a son, Adeodatus ("gift of God," died c.390).

Cicero's (lost) Hortensius converted Augustine to philosophy, the pursuit of divine wisdom (373), which precipitated him, disillusioned with the Bible's style and substance, into Manichaeism.* Attracted by its claim to rational demonstration of wisdom, its rejection of the OT, and the lofty spirituality of its "elect," he remained a Manichaean auditor ("hearer") for a decade; at first an enthusiastic proselytizer but progressively disabused of its intellectual pretensions, he was yet unable to abandon its philosophical materialism and dualistic resolution of the nagging problem of evil. At Tagaste (375-76) and Carthage, Augustine became a teacher of rhetoric and wrote his first (lost) work, The Beautiful and the Fitting (c.380). Ambition took him briefly to Rome (383) and then —through the patronage of Symmachus, the city prefect and doyen of the pagan aristocracy—to Milan, the imperial seat, as professor of rhetoric (384), soon pursued by Monica to mother his professional advance and Catholic recovery. In anticipation of a suitable marriage, his unnamed concubine was dismissed.

Though tempted by academic skepticism, Augustine succumbed to the learned eloquence and allegorism of Ambrose,* bishop of Milan. Prominent Milanese Christian intellectuals introduced him to writings by Neoplatonists Plotinus* and Porphyry* (early 386), which consummated his emancipation from Manichaeism and fanned his devotion to spiritual philosophy. Their vision of transcendent, immaterial being and evil as privation of goodness dissolved his difficulties and exposed him to the impact of repeated accounts of Christian "conversion from the world." His struggles to follow these exempla climaxed in the famous garden with the reading of Romans 13:13,14 (late summer 386). Abandoning a public career, he retreated with family, friends, and pupils to an estate at Cassiciacum for the untrammeled pursuit of wisdom, which the classical dialogues and Soliloquies written there delineate as the quest of a confident Catholic Neoplatonist. Baptism by Ambrose in Milan followed at Easter 387.

On his return to Tagaste, following Monica's death at Ostia after their ecstatic (Neoplatonic?) vision, Augustine formed a fellowship of "the servants of God" committed to contemplative philosophy (cf. True Religion, 389-91). He had already started writing against Manichaeism. While visiting Hippo for ascetic purposes, he was press-ganged into the priesthood (391), first begging time to improve his biblical knowledge. He founded a monastery there, and on succeeding Bishop Valerius in 396 (having been consecrated in advance in 395), turned the episcopal house into a clerical monastic community, a nursery of future African bishops. As Augustine reconciled himself to being Catholic bishop in the teeth of Donatist* ascendancy, Manichaean persistence, and "catholicized" paganism, his outlook changed decisively. A more biblically radical diagnosis of man and history (even church history) progressively displaced an optimistic, Neoplatonic "humanism." The Confessions (c.397-401) interpret his past up to Monica's death in this severer light. Though in emphasis they diverge from his pre-Hippo writings, their basic historicity is unquestioned.

He became deeply involved in a bishop's usual duties—liturgical, pastoral, disciplinary, administrative, judicial. He preached assiduously, with long series on the Psalms and John's gospel, in a style as appealing and profound as any of the Fathers. He traveled often, around his diocese, to Carthage and elsewhere, especially for synods, consultations, and disputations, but never again left Africa. He propagated the monastic life and in league with Aurelius of Carthage reinvigorated African Catholicism.

His theology ripened in controversy. Against the Manichaeans he defended the goodness of creation qua being, defining evil as absence of good and ascribing sin to abuse of free will, and he developed a rationale of faith as evoked by the impressive authority of the universal church and leading to understanding.

The Donatists evaded the personal confrontations in which Augustine worsted Manichaean notables, but his tireless historical and theological refutation, popularized in rhyme, slogan, and poster, advanced African views of the church and sacraments yet left them still underdeveloped. Building on Tyconius's ecclesiology, he stressed that the church's purity was eschatological, incapable of present realization, and its universality as certain as prophecy. Sacraments outside the church are real, because their minister is Christ, but profitless until their recipients rejoin the only body wherein the Spirit, the bond of love and unity, bestows life. Pragmatic considerations led Augustine to abandon his disapproval of the coercion of heretics and schismatics, but he justified it as a corrective, not a punitive, function of the Christian magistrate, and merely one facet of divine discipline for man's good ("Love, and do what you will").

His typically African preoccupation with the church and baptism persisted against Pelagius* and his followers. He refined the African conception of original sin, as the inherited guilt and corruption of Adam, and taught the necessity of inward grace to enable man to obey God, apparently denying his anti-Manichaean voluntarism which Pelagius cited. The impossibility of sinlessness on earth, the indispensability of baptismal forgiveness for infants, and the inclusive "hospitality" of the church were stressed against Pelagius's perfectionist élitism. The inscrutable predestination and perseverance of the elect (but not the reprobate) came to the fore against Julian of Eclanum, and the semi-Pelagian (better, semi-Augustinian) monks of S Gaul.

The City of God (c.413-27) began as an apologia against allegations that Christianity was ultimately answerable for the sack of Rome in 410. It became a disorderly review of Roman and Christian history, interpreted theologically and thus eschatologically, through the entangled earthly fortunes of two "cities" created by conflicting loves.

Augustine died as Roman Africa succumbed to the Vandals besieging Hippo. His friend Possidius, bishop of Calama, compiled a Life and a catalogue of his works. One of the last was the Revisions (Retractationes, 426-27), in which Augustine listed his writings, correcting and defending himself at points. The Trinity (399-419) sums up the patristic Trinitarian achievement and advances psychological analogies, while Christian Instruction (396-426) became an influential manual of Christian culture and hermeneutics. In addition to numerous contributions to controversies, there survive extensive exegetical works, and hundreds of letters (including the monastic Rule) and sermons.

These voluminous writings massively influenced almost every sphere of Western thought in later centuries. In many conflicts, including the Reformation, both sides could claim his patronage, appealing to selected facets of his ever-shifting mind. One of the four Doctors of the Latin Church, he became post apostolos omnium ecclesiarum magister (Gottschalk).

AUGUSTINIAN CANONS. Also known as "Black," "Regular," and "Austin" Canons. Though Augustine of Hippo did try to establish houses wherein there was a complete monastic rule, the origins of these canons who bear his name were connected with the reform movement of Pope Gregory VII's time (c.1021-85). The Lateran Synods of 1059 and 1063, taking note of the revival of the common life in such areas as N Italy and S France, discussed and recommended monastic poverty without making it compulsory—i.e., monks were still allowed to own some property. With the discovery and implementation of the Rule of Augustine by the mid-eleventh century, the title "regular canons" came to be virtually synonymous with Augustinian canons as the monks adopted the Augustinian Rule. The canons did not, however, belong to a single order but were organized into various houses, which in turn subdivided into congregations. Well-known examples of the latter were at Prémontré, St. Ruf, and Windesheim. Thomas à Kempis* and Gerhard Groote belonged to Windesheim. Erasmus* was an Augustinian canon. From the fifth century many of the houses disappeared, but the Canons Regular of the Lateran and the Premonstratensian Canons still survive, as do several convents of canonesses. Two famous London teaching hospitals, St. Bartholomew's and St. Thomas's, owe their origins to the Augustinian canons.

AUGUSTINIAN HERMITS (Friars). A mendicant order formed from several Italian congregations of hermits by Pope Alexander IV in 1256. While the constitution was based on the Dominicans, the rule was that of Augustine of Hippo. Increasing rapidly, they lost their eremitical character and became an important mendicant order. The title "Hermit" was preserved in order to distinguish them from the canons. The order comprised clerical and lay members (who later included women). Its head is the prior general, who is assisted by a council. Each province has a provincial, and each monastery a prior. They wear a black habit, long pointed cowl, and black leather cincture. Two important theological schools—those connected with Giles Colonna (d.1316) and Cardinal Noris (d.1704)—came from their ranks. Martin Luther was a member of the reformed German congregation. Though they experienced many setbacks in the sixteenth century, they remain today. There are two discalced (barefoot) congregations whose origins go back to the Counter-Reformation of the late sixteenth century. PETER TOON

AULD LICHTS. A name given to the group within the Original Secession Church* in Scotland which held that the civil magistrate had a duty to impose the true faith on the people. Those who opposed them, who claimed to have seen a "New Light," rejected such compulsion.

AULÉN, GUSTAV (1879-1978). Swedish theologian. Born in S Sweden, he became doctor of theology at Uppsala in 1915 and was professor of systematic theology at Lund (1913-33) and bishop of Strängnäs (1933-52), thereafter living in retirement at Lund. A great influence on Swedish theology, Aulén's books included Den kristna forsoningstanken (abridged ET Christus Victor, 1931), in which he expounded the "dramatic" or "classic" theory of the Atonement.* During World War II he worked against Nazism, writing Kyrkan och Nationalsocialismen. A determined ecumenical churchman, he was vice-president of the Edinburgh Faith and Order Conference (1937), and later books reflect this interest, e.g., Reformation and Catholicity (1959).

AURELIUS. Catholic bishop of Carthage, and thus primate of Africa, 391/2-c.430. A deacon when Augustine, returning from Italy, met him in 388, and thereafter closely associated with Augustine, especially in measures against Donatism and the Pelagians, he presided over a series of regular African councils, mostly at Carthage but first in Hippo in 393. His contributions to their debates displayed neither erudition nor eloquence. Though a faithful if unsophisticated pillar of the church, he has been eclipsed by Augustine, who regarded him highly and for whose ideas and initiatives Aurelius's authority and organizing ability provided an executive arm.

AURICULAR CONFESSION. Private confession of sins before the priest alone, who is authorized to pronounce absolution on the basis of Matthew 16:19 and 18:18. Resulting from the abuse and dangers of public confessions in the early church, private confession became more frequent until the Fourth Lateran Council* (1215) made annual confession compulsory.

AUSTRALIA. The white population of Australia, from the first settlement in 1788 to the end of World War II in 1945, was almost entirely of British origin. The Church of England, which is in process of changing its name to the Anglican Church of Australia, was the predominant religious force throughout this period. It was, until the 1850s, a distant branch of the "established" church in England, but from the 1860s adopted a synodical form of government. The first synod of the diocese of Sydney was held in 1866. It continued, however, to import its bishops from England; the first Australian-born archbishop, Marcus Lawrence Loane, was elected to Sydney in 1966.

The origins of Christian ministry in the colony of New South Wales go back to the First Fleet, mainly of convicts, whose chaplain was Richard Johnson.* Samuel Marsden, the second chaplain, became involved in the police administration of the colony as a magistrate and in the establishment of Parramatta, west of Sydney. History does not substantiate his reputation as "the hanging parson."

Until the 1830s all education in the colony, of both convicts and free settlers, was in the hands of the Church of England, which was paid in land grants known as "glebes." By the 1970s, such lands as the church retained were valued in millions of dollars, providing an endowment inconceivable when the grants were made. In 1836 W.G. Broughton* became first bishop of the diocese of Australia, thus severing a connection with the diocese of Calcutta.

In the early days of the colony, ministrations by Roman Catholic priests to the convict settlers were forbidden, though there were many Irish political prisoners. This situation was changed by law in 1820, but until 1844 in some places all prisoners were still forced to attend Anglican services. J.B. Polding, OSB, was appointed bishop of Hiero-Caesarea (titular) with jurisdiction over Australia in 1834, and an independent see was set up in 1841 and soon subdivided. Many Irish Roman Catholics entered Australia in the gold rush of the 1850s.

Immigration after World War II brought great changes to the Australian situation. Many immigrants were of S European origin, and with their higher birth rate this vastly increased the proportion of Roman Catholics. By the 1972 census the proportion of Anglicans to Roman Catholics had leveled. Whereas in 1851 fifty-two percent were Anglicans, twenty-six percent Catholics, five percent Methodist, and ten percent Presbyterian, in 1901 the figure was thirty-nine for Anglicans, twenty-three for Catholics; in 1966 it was just over thirty-three for Anglicans, twenty-six for Catholics, as a result of immigration.

A more realistic assessment than census figures, however, needs to be applied to appreciate the relative strength of the churches in Australia. Only one definitive sociological survey has been taken of Australian attitudes toward religion, and it revealed that of those who said at the 1966 census that they belonged to a particular church, actual attendance figures were: twenty-one percent of Anglicans went to church usually (more than once a month), sixty-nine of Catholics, forty-one of Methodists, thirty-four of Presbyterians. While this may lead to the conclusion that in fact Australia has become a Catholic country, the figures need to be amended to allow for Sunday school attendance.

Today the Church of England has organized itself into twenty-seven dioceses, of which the largest are the metropolitan dioceses of Sydney, Melbourne, Brisbane, and Perth. A national general synod brings together representatives of the dioceses (which are autonomous). The church is self-supporting, receiving government grants only for independent schools and for some kinds of missionary work. The church maintains missions in the north of Australia and scattered inland towns among aborigines, but has come under strong criticism for allegedly neglecting aboriginal customs and civil rights. In fact, anthropologists suggest that the full-blooded aborigines would have died out in the 1930s if the missions had not sustained them with food and medicine at a time when the majority of Australians were expressing very little concern. Control of the mission towns has now passed to the federal government, and the church maintains a pastoral ministry and some medical work. Australia as a nation now feels much greater responsibilty for its original inhabitants, and in 1967 a referendum by a huge majority granted full citizenship rights and equality to the aborigines.

The church supports also missionary dioceses in the South Pacific and in Papua New Guinea. Similar support is extended through the other denominations, Protestant and Catholic, throughout the Pacific and Southeast Asian region. The Australian churches are now feeling more a part of Asia and the Third World than of Europe and America.

One of the unusual problems of church extension in Australia is the extraordinary distance and isolation of many people in the outback. The Bush Brotherhoods, founded in 1903, serve the outback by providing low-cost and sacrificial ministry and evangelism in those areas. The Bush Church Aid Society provides clergy and medical staff for the new mining towns of Western Australia and Queensland as well as some outback towns.

Theological training is now indigenous, and relatively few Australians seek overseas degrees. All denominations conduct their own training courses, and most maintain their own colleges in each state. Theological scholarship tends to be conservative, partly because of the distance from overseas radical thought, partly because of the conservative nature of the Evangelical tradition within the Anglican Church and the Irish conservatism of the Roman Catholic hierarchy.

AUTHORITY. In biblical teaching the source of all authority is God Himself (Rom. 13:1; cf. Dan. 4:34; John 19:11). We must distinguish between authority and power, and between religious or ecclesiastical authority and civil authority and power. Christianity claims to be based upon divine revelation, to which reason and conscience must be subject. This does not jettison reason in apprehending the revelation or discovering truth. Reason itself, however, is not autonomous, for one cannot begin thinking—even to examining his own perceptions and thoughts—without making the act of faith that the things he is thinking about make sense. The distinction between natural and special revelation is not absolute. The concept of the revelation of God as Creator and the revelation of God as Redeemer is more comprehensive because all truth is from God and all truth must be grasped by men who have the gift of reason from God. Christians believe that men cannot discover truths behind God's back or without God's assistance and that there is no use in God's giving revelations to creatures incapable of receiving them. In contrast to claims of totally subjective revelatory authority, the Christian claim to historical revelation involves historical events and narratives as the actual form the eternal realities take.

The biblical revelation comprises the utterances of prophets and apostles and the record of the life and teaching of our Lord, which have authority because they are inspired by the Spirit of God (2 Tim. 3:16). For Christians, the biblical writings transcend all other claims to religious authority. Some claims to the authority of church tradition and the episcopacy (including the papacy) have been made, especially in the Orthodox and Roman Catholic traditions, but these have been played down recently in favor of discovering biblical and early church roots of authority for faith.

At the Reformation, the Bible as the Word of God interpreted to faith through the inner witness of the Spirit was reestablished as the norm of faith and practice in Protestant and evangelical churches. The magisterial Word of God was moved to center as the judge of the faith and life of the church, not the church as the judge of Scripture. The canonical Scriptures without supplement from church tradition were seen to be self-interpreting and complete.

The Reformed and Lutheran theologies of the Word were complemented by the Anabaptist personal religion of the Spirit, in which English and American evangelicalism and independency have their roots. Their view that the church is essentially nondynastic, nonterritorial, and a spiritual democracy of believing people has profoundly influenced Western Christianity including rejection of the enforcement of church sanctions by civil powers.

The evangelical principle entails Word and Spirit in which the authoritative Word of God is the chief agency of the Holy Spirit and the chief function of the church. It is the Holy Spirit who makes the Word to be revelation, and it is the Word that makes revelation historic and concrete. Theology is not the mold but the image of the church's spiritual life. Political democracy recognizes no authority but what it creates, but the church as a spiritual democracy recognizes no authoritative principle but that which creates it as Christ's body, namely the Word, the Gospel, and the Spirit under Jesus Christ's lordship.

AUTHORIZED VERSION, see BIBLE (ENGLISH VERSIONS)

AUTOCEPHALOUS (Gr. = "himself the head"). In current usage this term has two meanings. First, it describes any national church which is a part of the Eastern Orthodox Church and in communion with Constantinople but which is governed by its own national synod. Second, it describes an independent monastery as, for example, that on Mt. Sinai. In earlier usage it also had two meanings. First, it described bishops in the early church who were independent of the jurisdiction of either a patriarch or a metropolitan. Such were the bishops of Cyprus. Second, it also described certain Eastern bishops who were directly responsible to the patriarch without any reference to the metropolitan. PETER TOON

AUTO-DA-FÉ (Port. = "act of faith"). A ceremony of the Spanish Inquisition at which, after a procession, Mass, and sermon, sentences were read and the execution process inaugurated. Heretics were dressed in the ceremonial san-benito, a yellow penitential garment with a red cross front and back, grotesquely embroidered for the unrepentant, and they wore a yellow miter. Those sentenced to death were handed over to the secular authority for execution within five days, usually by burning. Most of the great auto-da-fés occurred when Tomás de Torquemada* was head of the Inquisition. The last in Spain was at Seville in 1781, though one was celebrated in Mexico as late as 1815. J.G.G. NORMAN

AUTOSACRAMENTAL. A peculiarly Spanish one-act play produced mostly between the sixteenth and eighteenth centuries on the Feast of Corpus Christi* to elucidate the meaning of the Eucharist. It evolved from clergy bearing the host in a street procession, through floats depicting biblical scenes and choreography and drama, to written sacramental plays. From this emerged the secular and religious theater of the Spanish "golden age." Competitions were held, with poets, actors, and prizes, leading to intercity rivalries and extravagance while the citizenry was entertained. As the cities' contribution to the feast, these plays tried to help the unknown be discovered through the known. Lope de Vega and José de Valdivielso brought this genre to maturity, while Calderón (1600-1681) raised the play to a near sacrament itself: "sermons set in verse, problems of Sacred Theology set in representable ideas. . . ." Rationalism brought the demise of autosacramentals; they were banned under Charles III (1765), but abroad have survived in some places. C.G. THORNE, JR.

AUXENTIUS (d.374). Bishop of Milan. A Cappadocian ordained by Gregory of Alexandria about 343, he succeeded the exiled Dionysius in the see of Milan in 355. Supporting Valens at the Council of Rimini (359), he subscribed to the "Dated Creed." Homoousion* censures on him there and at Paris (360) did not affect him. Toleration of religion under Julian, Jovian, and Valentinian I encouraged Hilary (of Poitiers)* to oppose Arian bishops in Gaul; he overthrew the bishops of Arles and Perigueux, and aided by Eusebius of Vercilli, he sought to dislodge Auxentius while Valentinian was residing at Milan (364-65). Auxentius secured a favorable verdict both by counseling popular quiet in the face of agitation by Hilary and by glossing his affirmation of "one divinity and substance" with a subtle formula capable of either an Arian or a Nicene interpretation. Influenced by Athanasius, Pope Damasus in 372 condemned the "Dated Creed" and its supporters, but Valentinian would not depose Auxentius. G.T.D. ANGEL

AUXILIARY BISHOP. Functionally the bishop was archiereus or archipresbuteros of the incipient Christian congregation, and the remaining priest-presbyters were his assistants. The multiplication of congregations, however, necessitated new measures, and the special meaning of coadjutor* and suffragan* reflect these. Again in modern times with the growth of urban areas under the bishop's jurisdiction, special assistance is often required; those elevated to meet these needs, but without right of succession, can be designated "auxiliary." While in the United States this is Roman Catholic usage, the Protestant Episcopal Church employs "suffragan" in this sense. CLYDE CURRY SMITH

AUXILIARY SAINTS. A group of fourteen saints traditionally venerated together, especially in Germany. They comprise three bishops (Denis of Paris, Erasmus or Elmo, Blaise), three virgins (Barbara, Margaret, Catherine of Alexandria), three knightly patrons (George, Achatius, Eustace), the physician Pantaleon, the deacon Cyriacus, the martyr Vitus, the monk Giles, the travelers' patron Christopher. There are local variations, e.g., Leonard of Noblat, Dorothy, Nicholas ("Santa Claus"), Pancras, the English king Oswald. The cult, first advanced by the Dominicans, reached its climax in mid-fifteenth century.

AVERROISM. The doctrine that man's soul is mortal or, more specifically, that the souls of all men are part of a single soul-substance out of which individuals arise at birth and into which they return at death. The name comes from (Ibn Rushd) Averroes (1126-98), a learned jurist of Cordova who became friend and physician to the ruling caliph when Islam was ascendant. For three centuries Islamic Ash'arite philosophers had denied causality in nature on the ground that it implies the presence of principles other than God in the universe, so making God less than supreme. Averroes saw clearly that the denial of subsidiary causes endangers all knowledge and even reason itself. In support of this view he appealed to Aristotle, who had accepted causality wholeheartedly.

Averroes wrote commentaries on Aristotle* and came to be known to posterity as "The Commentator." To reconcile his views with Islam he interpreted the Koran allegorically and perhaps not overseriously; in late life he was accused of heresy. Apart from his views on immortality and the soul, Averroes identified God with Aristotle's remote and impersonal Prime Mover, denied free will, and taught that both the world and mankind are eternal. In 1253 Aristotle was prescribed for study by the University of Paris, and the Commentaries of Averroes were accepted as the standard text. There was consternation in Christendom when many students accepted their anti-Christian teachings, and the study of Aristotle was prohibited by Urban IV in 1263. Albert the Great in 1256 and Thomas Aquinas in 1257 and again in 1270 wrote works directed against the Averroist heresies, but despite prohibitions the latter survived in places, notably in Padua to the time of the Renaissance.

AVICEBRON (Ibn Gabirol) (c.1021-c.1058). Spanish Jewish philosopher and poet. His biographical details are uncertain, but he was a threshold figure of the brilliant demi-millennium of Jewish learning when it shifted to western Europe. In ethics he was an original; virtues and vices he held to be linked in pairs to five senses, with other physiological details. He probably compiled Choice of Pearls, sixty-four chapters of aphorisms, some originally Arabic. His poems, used in the synagogue, were pure biblical Hebrew and theology, with multiple rhymings. In metaphysics his Arabic dialogue treatise, Fons Vitae, methodologically ignores Bible and Talmud and so is seriously underestimated by Judaism. A monist thinker, his views (Lat. version, 1150) nevertheless profoundly affected scholastic Christendom; the Franciscans considered him to be Muslim or Christian. S. Munk demonstrated (1846) his identity with Ibn Gabirol.

ROY A. STEWART

AVICENNA (Abu Sina) (980-1037). Persian Muslim philosopher. Born in Bokhara, he was a voluminous commentator on Aristotle. A versatile man, his Canon was the standard medical textbook for five centuries in Europe and beyond. Like other Arabic Aristotelians, he helped restore to Judaism and Christendom that Greek learning which had been lost in the Dark Ages. He gave Aristotle a Neoplatonic twist, with his nine descending mediating Intelligences between deity and man, the ninth occupying the lunar sphere. He postulated an eternal universe, with an inbuilt necessity system and a remote deterministic God debarred from direct creative action. Science, metaphysics, and theology are deeply indebted to Avicenna; Dante mentions him respectfully (Inferno iv, 143). He was an eclectic thinker in whose work experts detect unresolved internal inconsistencies. He has been charged with originating a disreputable compromise doctrine of twofold truth to harmonize reason with revelation, which introduces a double standard before which all intellectual integrity would finally crumble.

AVIGNON. In 1309 Clement V moved to Avignon in SE France and so began the "Babylonian Captivity"* of the papacy. Considerations of security led the popes to prefer Avignon to Rome until 1377. Avignon was in a local political pressure area removed from the tensions of Italian politics and was geographically much more convenient than Rome. Its position made it suitable as a center of judicial affairs, and it became the base of a great bureaucratic organization efficient at raising funds for papal purposes. When the papal court returned to Rome, Avignon continued to be the seat, until 1408, of two antipopes, Clement VII and Benedict XIII. By the end of the eleventh century the nearby Abbey of St. Ruf had become famous as a pioneering community living under the rule of Augustine.

JAMES TAYLOR

AVITUS (d. c.519). Bishop of Vienne. Born Alcumus Edicius Avitus in Auvergne of a Roman senatorial family, he succeeded to the see of Vienne in Gaul about 490, on the death of his father Isychius. He became very influential in the ecclesiastical life of Burgundy and won King Sigismund from Arianism to orthodoxy. He was a strong contender against Arianism,* ardently defended the primacy of Rome, and strongly advocated closer ecclesiastical union between Gaul and Rome. His reputation for learning much impressed his generation, including the then pagan King Clovis. Among his surviving writings are five poems inspired by the Book of Genesis (De Mosaicae Historiae Gestis), homilies, a poem in praise of virginity (De Virginitate), and about a hundred epistles.

J.G.G. NORMAN

AVVAKUM (1620-1682). Leader and martyr of the Raskolniki or Old Believers.* Son of a Russian village priest, he was himself ordained and in his early pastoral activity and his family life showed himself an eager exponent of ascetic piety. He became an intimate of Czar Alexis and at length archpriest of Our Lady of Kazan in Moscow. He opposed the liturgical reforms of Patriarch Nikon* and was deported to Siberia in 1653. After the fall of Nikon he returned in 1664, but was soon exiled again when the czar elected to continue the reforms. The council of 1666 excommunicated Avvakum and established the new liturgical practices. In 1670 his companions were punished by mutilation, and Avvakum condemned to imprisonment underground. He continued to direct the dissidents, and finally Alexis's successor Theodore condemned him and his companions to death at the stake. He is regarded as the greatest saint and martyr of the Old Believers. His autobiography, a masterpiece of Russian literature, is still highly regarded.

AYLMER, JOHN (1521-1594). Bishop of London. Educated at Cambridge through Henry Grey, duke of Suffolk, to whose daughter (Lady Jane Grey) he then became chaplain and tutor, he was appointed archdeacon of Stow in 1553, but was forced to flee to the Continent for his opposition to transubstantiation. There he assisted Foxe* in translating his Acts and Monuments into Latin. On his return to England he was chosen as one of the eight disputants against the Roman Catholics. He became archdeacon of Lincoln in 1562 and bishop of London in 1576. His arbitrary and unconciliatory disposition became apparent, and he was bitterly attacked in the Marprelate Tracts* for his exceptional severity in fining and imprisoning all who disagreed doctrinally, whether Puritan or Catholic. Similar in temperament to W. Laud,* he is to be commended for his learning and his discerning patronage of scholars. His only notable work was a reply to John Knox's Monstrous Regiment of Women. G.S.R. COX

AYLWARD, GLADYS (1902-1970). Missionary to China. London parlormaid turned down on educational grounds by missionary societies, she saved most of her very modest wages for several years till she could pay her fare to China, leaving England in 1932. After an incredible journey through Siberia and complications raised by the Russo-Chinese war, she finally reached her destination through Japan and joined Jeannie Lawson in remote Yangcheng. They opened an inn where they told Bible stories. After her colleague's death Miss Aylward continued and extended her work, finding an unexpected friend in the local mandarin. When the Japanese invaded in 1940, she led 100 children to safety on an epic journey, the dramatic appeal of which was realized and exploited by Hollywood moviemakers. After a serious illness she returned to England in 1947. She stayed for eight years, and finally opened an orphanage in Formosa, where she worked till her death. J.G.G. NORMAN

AZARIAH, VEDNAYAKAM SAMUEL (1874-1945). First Indian bishop in the Anglican Church. He was born at Vellalanvillai in Tinnevelly district of Madras state; his father, a convert from Hinduism, was an Anglican minister. After education at Madras—he could not take his degree because of illness—Azariah became in 1895 a YMCA secretary, working among students. His concern for evangelism showed in his helping to form the indigenous Indian Missionary Society of Tinnevelly (1903) and the interdenominational National Missionary Society (1905). He was first secretary of the Tinnevelly society, which sent a missionary to a hitherto neglected district called Dornakal in the Telugu-language part of the Nizam of Hyderabad's territory. In 1909 he himself was ordained and went to Dornakal, having resigned from the YMCA. The Dornakal church expanded and in 1912 Azariah was consecrated missionary bishop. Later Dornakal was separated as a diocese from Madras. Azariah welcomed the mass movements which augmented the Telugu church, including those from depressed classes.

He was a leader at the meeting of Indian ministers in Tranquebar in 1919 which marked the beginning of the church union movement in India. To him, "unhappy divisions" were in fact a "sin and a scandal" in the Indian setting. He did not live to see the two major church unions which resulted from the decades of negotiation. As chairman of the National Christian Council (1929-45) and host at the World Missionary Conference at Tambaram (Madras) in 1938, Azariah had a special place in Indian Christian leadership during the period when the "younger churches" assumed importance and replaced foreign missions. He died at Dornakal.

AZYMITES (Lat. infermentarii, "unleavenders"). An Eastern (non-Armenian) Church term of reproach against the Western Church for the eucharistic use of unleavened bread. It furnished a pretext for the 1054 schism of East from West under Michael Cerularius.* The Council of Florence (1437) authorized (transubstantiationally) wheaten bread, leavened or unleavened. Modern Anglicans use either indifferently; other Protestants prefer leavened.

BABYLAS (d.250). Bishop of Antioch. Noted for his courage, he would not admit Philip the Arabian* to public worship without penance. He was imprisoned and martyred in 250 during the Decian persecution; his martyr cult grew at Antioch. Caesar Gallus removed his corpse to a chapel near the Temple of Apollo in the suburb of Daphne. In 362 the Emperor Julian, frustrated by abortive attempts to acquire oracles from a spring at the temple, ordered the coffin of Babylas to be removed. Local Christians, antagonized by the order, buried the body again in a Christian cemetery six miles away. The temple was destroyed by fire within the year.

BABYLONIAN CAPTIVITY. A pejorative term originating in the inferences of Italian patriots such as Dante and Petrarch that the popes at Avignon* were the captives of the French kings (cf. 2 Kings 24:14-16; 25:11). The popes in fact remained there because Italy was unsafe. The papacy only legally owned Avignon from 1348. Benedict XII (1334-42) and Clement VI (1342-52) built the papal palace to house their expanding administrations—to which development John XXII's pontificate (1316-34) had greatly contributed. Clement VI was responsible for the biggest and finest rooms. The Avignon period was not sterile; apart from administrative developments it removed the popes from incessantly distracting Italian strife. Geographically, moreover, Avignon was more central. The popes never relinquished the desire to return to Italy, devoting large budgets, diplomacy, and force to this end. Though individual popes returned temporarily, it was Cardinal Albornoz's pacification of the Papal States* which decided for Gregory XI that Rome was safe enough for permanent residence in 1377.

BACH, JOHANN SEBASTIAN (1685-1750). German composer. Born in Eisenach, where he went to a school once attended by Luther, this greatest member of Germany's greatest musical family was grounded in the strict Lutheran orthodoxy to which he clung throughout his life. Orphaned at ten, he was taken to live with his brother, the organist at Ohrdruf. Here he was subjected to the Comenian principles of education and probably to Pietistic influences. At fifteen he fended for himself as choir boy and violinist and soon as church organist. At twenty-three he was court organist to the pious duke of Weimar. Here he met and absorbed the Italian concerto and operatic style, which he fused with his N German heritage of churchly choral and organ music.

For six years as Kapellmeister of the princely court at Köthen, his concern was secular chamber music that differed in function but not in essence from that of the church. Many a movement from works written here reappeared in later masterpieces refurbished with sacred words. From 1723 till his death he was cantor of the historic Thomasschule in Leipzig.

Bach was known to his own generation for his transcendent skill at the organ. The worth of his compositions, especially his choral ones, filled with intricate contrapuntal craftsmanship and baroque musical rhetoric, went unrecognized in an age of changing musical taste. They were, however, cherished and perpetuated by a small circle of pupils and connoisseurs. The Welltempered Clavier in particular profoundly influenced the great classical masters, Haydn,* Mozart,* and Beethoven.*

Bach was unquestionably the greatest composer of all time for the organ. His toccatas, preludes, and fugues, and over 100 pieces based on Lutheran chorales were conceived for various functions in the church. He composed five cycles of cantatas for the Sundays and feasts of the ecclesiastical year—about 300 in all, of which almost 200 survive. These were functional service music, related to the Gospel of the day. The Christmas Oratorio is a series of six such cantatas. Today they are largely relegated to the concert hall. The Mass in B minor and the St. Matthew Passion are his most monumental works. The revival of the latter in 1829 by Mendelssohn marked the beginning of a deep and continuing appreciation of Bach's significance as a sacred composer. Every major composer of sacred works since has been in varying degree his debtor.

BACKUS, ISAAC (1724-1806). Baptist minister, historian, and champion of religious liberty. Born in Connecticut, he came under conviction of sin during the Great Awakening* in 1741, and finally experienced evangelical conversion. He joined a "New Light" or Separatist Congregationalist church, but remained rather passive for several years. Aroused by the preaching of G. Whitefield,* he felt a definite call to become a preacher in 1746, and promptly started out on the first of many preaching tours. He ordained in 1748, and in 1751 adopted Baptist principles and was immersed with his wife before his Middleborough congregation, of which he was pastor until his death. He contributed much to the growth of the Baptist movement in New England and was an organizer of the Warren Association of Baptists. He became the most persistent and effective advocate for the cause of religious freedom and separation of church and state, and traveled widely and wrote extensively to improve the status of Baptists. His three-volume work, A History of New England with Particular Reference to the ... Baptists (1777-96), contains valuable source material for historians. HARRY SKILTON

BACON, FRANCIS (1561-1626). English statesman and philosopher of science. A versatile genius, he was distinguished in law, literature, philosophy, and science. His father, Sir Nicholas Bacon, died when Francis was eighteen, leaving him virtually penniless since he was the youngest son. He then turned to a career in law and at the age of twenty-three gained a seat in the House of Commons. After holding a succession of political appointments he became lord chancellor under James I. His rise to power alienated men such as Sir Edward Coke, and this led to Bacon's indictment for accepting a bribe. He was found guilty and removed from his offices (1621). Bacon spent his remaining years writing books and devising schemes for the advancement of science. Among his works are Advancement of Learning, Essays, Novum Organum, and New Atlantis. Bacon emphasized the empirical approach to science and because of this he has been called "the Prophet of Modern Science." The fact that these books appeared during the course of his busy life demonstrates that his interest in science was never entirely separate from his activities as a lawyer and statesman. He believed that science was necessary to improve the lot of mankind and that the state should finance this work. He was never able, however, to interest James I in this goal.

See F.H. Anderson, The Philosophy of Francis Bacon (1948), and I. Levine, Francis Bacon, Viscount of St. Albans (1925).

BACON, LEONARD (1802-1881). Congregational pastor, educator, and editor. Educated at Yale and Andover Theological Seminary, he was ordained as an evangelist to the western frontier in 1824. He accepted a call to the First Church of New Haven the following year, and served there with distinction (1825-66). Although sympathetic to the New Haven School* of theology, he tried to serve as peacemaker in the major theological debates within Congregationalism. He was active in the slavery issue, including among his writings editorials in the Independent that often led to bitter debates within his own congregation. He also wrote a number of hymns. In semi-retirement from 1866 he lectured in Yale Divinity School on revealed theology, church polity, and American church history. DONALD M. LAKE

BACON, ROGER (c.1214-1292). English Franciscan philosopher and scientist. He studied at Oxford and taught at Paris, where he was among the first to lecture on the books of Aristotle. Returning to Oxford, he became familiar with the work of Robert Grosseteste.* Bacon joined the Franciscans about 1257 so that he might secure the experimental equipment he needed. He also became involved with the followers of Joachim of Fiore* and consequently was sent to Paris and forbidden to circulate his writings. Pope Clement IV, learning of Bacon's attempt to construct a universal science, sent for his encyclopedia (1266). Bacon did not have the work ready, but in the short space of eighteen months he composed a preliminary draft, his Opus Maius. The pope died before anything could come of this contact, but Bacon was allowed to return to Oxford where he continued his scholarship until his death.

Many have believed that his fame rested on his emphasizing the need for experimental science. This was probably overstated because, in addition to observation, he believed that a study of the Bible in the original languages would help one to understand nature better. Bacon surpassed his contemporaries in his knowledge of lenses and mirrors. He even foresaw the practical application of science in various ways.

BADBY, JOHN (d.1410). Lollard* martyr. A tailor of Evesham, Badby denied transubstantiation, asserting that the consecrated host remains material bread (although a sacramental sign of the living God). He declared that one John Rackier of Bristol had as much power as any priest to make God. Declared an incorrigible heretic by the bishop of Worcester, he spent more than a year in prison. Tried thereafter before Archbishop Arundel and found to be obdurate, he was committed to the secular arm. Henry, Prince of Wales, was present at his execution in Smithfield. Hearing cries which he took to be pleas for mercy, he ordered the fire to be quenched and offered Badby pardon if he would recant. On his refusal he was burnt to death. HAROLD H. ROWDON

BADER, JESSE MOREN (1886-1963). Disciples of Christ minister and ecumenist. Born in Illinois, he graduated from Drake University, and after various pastorates and YMCA service he was an executive in the evangelism department first of his own denomination (1920-31), then of the Federal Council of Churches (1932-50). He was very active in the ecumenical movement and the World Council of Churches,* attending the founding sessions at Amsterdam in 1948, the Faith and Order conferences at Oxford and Edinburgh in 1937, and the Third Assembly at New Delhi in 1961. He served also as an observer for the Disciples at Vatican II.* He was author of Evangelism in a Changing America (1957) and numerous articles in Christian periodicals.

BAEDEKER, FREDERICK WILLIAM (1823-1906). Evangelist. Son of a Westphalian ornitholo-gist and cousin of the traveler to whose guidebooks he contributed, he settled in 1862 as a schoolmaster in Weston-super-Mare. Together with his English wife, he was converted in 1866 through the ministry of Lord Radstock, who soon encouraged him to evangelize on the Continent. In 1877 he settled for three years with his family in St. Petersburg where in association with Count Bobrinsky, Princess Lieven, and others he played a prominent part in the current "drawing-room" awakening. His evangelistic journeys continued thereafter, at first in the universities and prisons of Scandinavia where he worked with the Finnish Baroness von Wrede, and later in Russia from the Caucasus to Siberia. In 1889, in spite of Pobiedonostzeff's official disfavor, he obtained a unique permit (renewed every two years until his death) enabling him to preach and distribute Bibles in any Russian prison. His associations were mainly with Stundists on the Continent and the Brethren in England.

BAHA'I. A religious movement founded in Iran by Bahā'u'llāh. Its origins are to be found in Shi'a Islam, and in the group of disciples of Sayyid Alī Muhammed, or "the Bāb" (1819-50), who is now regarded by Bahā'īs as the forerunner of the Prophet. Bahā'u'llāh (1817-92) was a disciple of the Bāb, though he had never met him. After the latter's death, the former had a mystical experience in prison (1852), which he interpreted as a divine call. He was exiled to Baghdad, but gathered followers and eventually proclaimed himself as God's manifestation to the present age, not only to his disciples, but to many world rulers. Until 1957 leadership of the movement remained within the Prophet's family, though in the meantime his teachings had spread to many parts of the world.

The main teaching of the Bahā'ī faith is that it is the crown and culmination of all the religions of the world, which it does not seek to overthrow, but to fulfill. Bahā'ī temples contain no accepted religious symbols; they are domed, circular, and have nine doors, representing the existing traditions (there are only four such temples, in Evanston, Illinois; Frankfurt, Germany; Sydney, Australia; and Kampala, Uganda). The movement's principles may be summarized thus: (1) the unity of mankind; (2) the duty of each individual to seek for truth independently; (3) equality between the sexes; (4) the essential unity of all religions; (5) science and religion are not contradictory; (6) religion must be the source of love and unity; (7) all prejudice should be abolished; (8) universal education; (9) the solving of economic problems; (10) the encouragement of international language; (11) peace; and (12) the setting up of an international court of justice.

There are followers of Bahā'ī in most parts of the world, though their numbers are relatively small.

BAILLIE, DONALD MacPHERSON (1887-1954). Scottish theologian and ecumenist. He served various Scottish parishes for sixteen years and was then professor of systematic theology in the University of St. Andrews for a further twenty. An outstanding teacher, he attracted to St. Andrews students from many parts of the world, especially from the USA. His published works are few, as teaching for him took precedence over writing, but his God Was in Christ (1948) went through many impressions and has been described as the most significant book of its time in Christology. The Theology of the Sacraments and two volumes of sermons were published posthumously. Joint editor of a volume on Intercommunion (1952), he was convener of the Church of Scotland committee on inter-church relations and was engaged in the Anglican-Presbyterian conversations at the time of this death.

HENRY R. SEFTON

BAILLIE, JOHN (1886-1960). Scottish theologian. He held various chairs in theology in the USA and Canada (1919-34) and was professor of divinity in the University of Edinburgh (1934-56). Convener during World War II of a commission appointed by the Church of Scotland "for the interpretation of God's will in the present crisis," and moderator of the general assembly (1943), he was a keen ecumenist like his brother, Donald MacPherson Baillie*; was a president of the World Council of Churches,* and a signatory of the "Bishops Report" which in 1957 suggested the introduction of bishops-in-presbytery into the Church of Scotland. Deeply concerned about the doubts which people felt about the Christian faith, he excelled as an apologist (cf. his Invitation to Pilgrimage, 1942). His And the Life Everlasting (1933) and A Diary of Private Prayer (1936) reached a wide public. His Gifford Lectures, The Sense of the Presence of God, were published posthumously. HENRY R. SEFTON

BAILLIE, ROBERT (1599-1662). Scottish divine. Born and educated in Glasgow, he was episcopally ordained in 1622 and after a brief period of teaching was inducted to the Ayrshire parish of Kilwinning. He protested against the service-book which Archbishop Laud* was trying to impose on Scotland, and was a member of the famous Glasgow Assembly of 1638 which reestablished Presbyterianism in Scotland. Baillie became divinity professor in Glasgow University (1642) and a year later attended the Westminister Assembly* in London, where he was to spend much of the ensuing three years. In 1649 he was one of those sent to Holland to invite Charles II to sign the National Covenant,* and after the Restoration he became principal of Glasgow University. A learned, moderate, and modest man, Baillie produced Letters and Journals which are among the most important materials of the century. He died disillusioned after episcopacy was once more forced upon the country and he saw how his temperate policies had been mistaken.

BAINBRIDGE, CHRISTOPHER (1464?-1514). Archbishop of York. Born in Westmoreland, he was educated at Queen's College, Oxford, of which he became provost in 1495. Two years later he was treasurer of St. Paul's, then successively dean of York (1503), dean of Windsor (1505), bishop of Durham (1508), and archbishop of York (1509). He was sent to Rome as ambassador by Henry VIII* in the same year, and in 1511 rewarded for his services to Pope Julius II by a cardinal's hat and the command of a papal army against Ferrara. There are two conflicting accounts of the manner of his death—by stabbing or poisoning—but only one agent, his chaplain, allegedly at the instigation of the bishop of Worcester (permanent English ambassador in Rome) who was finally acquitted. G.S.R. COX

BAIUS, MICHEL (Michel de Bay) (1513-1589). Flemish Catholic theologian. Augustinian in outlook, forerunner of and an influence on Cornelius Jansen and Jansenism,* he had been educated at Louvain and taught philosophy (1544) and later theology there. In his thirties he turned to serious study of Augustine, and developed a radical Augustinian position which denied many of the doctrinal positions developed by medieval Scholasticism.* Attacking the idea of merit in good works, the immaculate conception, papal infallibility, the limited effect of the fall, any conditions on predestination, and similar views, his teachings soon aroused violent controversy. To his opponents, especially the Jesuits, they seemed close to Calvinism. By 1560 the theologians at the Sorbonne denounced his version of Augustinianism, and theological faculties at the Spanish universities followed suit. A trip by Baius and his colleague John Hessels to the Council of Trent* to defend their views proved abortive, and in 1567 Pius V issued a condemnation of several propositions Baius was alleged to have taught. Denying that he had in fact done so, he continued to present his Augustinianism as before. Controversy continued, and in 1579 Gregory XIII issued a further and more specific condemnation, to which Baius submitted, though still claiming he was misunderstood. His teachings were surely contrary to the dominant understanding of the post-Trent church. The controversy did not end with Baius's death, but broke out again and more importantly with the Jansenist movement a short time later.

BAKER, GEORGE, see DIVINE, MAJOR J.

BAKER, SIR HENRY WILLIAMS (1821-1877). English baronet and hymnwriter. For most of his ordained life (i.e., from 1851) vicar of Monkland near Leominster, he had distinctly High Church sympathies, and this is reflected not only in his hymns but also in his published tracts and devotional books. The original Hymns Ancient and Modern (1861) owed its existence to him, and to the volume he contributed twenty-five hymns, some original and some translated. His hymns have a freshness, simplicity, and rhythmic ease, the best known being "The King of love my Shepherd is" and "Lord, Thy word abideth."

BALDACHINO. The canopy over a throne, couch, pulpit, altar, or other sacred object. It is used to describe also a square umbrella, supported on four poles, borne over a priest who carries the Host. In vaulted stone, it often forms a protective and decorative cover over recumbent figures on medieval tombs, especially in England, originating in the twelfth century.

BALDWIN (d.1190). Archbishop of Canterbury from 1184. He was already archdeacon of Totnes when he decided to enter the Cistercian house at Ford in Dorset. He soon became abbot and then from 1180 was bishop of Worcester. His primacy was concerned with two major issues. First, his dispute with the monks of Christ Church, Canterbury, concerning the grant of revenues to the monks and their privileges in electing the archbishop. Baldwin, who wished to found a college of secular priests, was supported by the king, while the monks were upheld by the pope. Baldwin could count also on a general mood of hostility to the Black Monks, whom not only Cistercians regarded as relaxed. Then, too, Baldwin preached the Crusade following Saladin's capture of Jerusalem in 1187, and he himself went to the Holy Land, where he died. He had been saddened by the conduct of the Christian armies.

JOHN TILLER

BALE, JOHN (1495-1563). Protestant controversialist. Educated in a Carmelite house at Norwich and at Jesus College, Cambridge, he renounced his vows in the early thirties and served the Protestant cause by writing miracle plays and prose works. He enjoyed the patronage of Thomas Cromwell,* but was a refugee in Germany, 1540-47. He subsequently became rector of Bishopstoke, and in 1552 bishop of Ossory. His Protestant zeal created hostility, and during the reign of Mary he was in Holland. After Elizabeth's accession he was canon and prebendary of Canterbury. Of his twenty-one plays, five have survived. King John, the most important, never rises above doggerel and is unashamedly polemical. Prose works include Brief Chronicle concerning Sir John Oldcastle. Illustrium Majoris Britanniae Scriptorum Summarium and Catalogus constitute important catalogues of British writers. His works are marred by the bitter and somewhat coarse invective which gained him the name "Bilious Bale."

HAROLD H. ROWDON

BALFOUR, ARTHUR JAMES (1848-1930). British statesman. His religious views were influential because of his political position. In A Defence of Philosophic Doubt (1879), he attempted to justify faith by arguing that all men's basic convictions rest on the nonrational ground of religious faith. He developed this view in Foundations of Belief (1895), and in two sets of Gifford Lectures—The- ism and Humanism (1915) and Theism and Thought (1923). During his premiership (1902-5) the Education Act (1902) aroused hostility from Nonconformists and secularists, by placing "non-provided" schools on the rates. This relieved such schools of financial pressure, but involved Free Churchmen in supporting Anglican schools. In 1917 he produced the "Balfour Declaration" which committed Great Britain to securing "a national home for the Jewish people" in Palestine. Balfour was a communicant in both the Anglican and Scottish Presbyterian churches. At one time he took an interest in spiritualism, but later abandoned it. JOHN A. SIMPSON

BALL, JOHN (d.1381). A leader of the 1381 Peasants' Revolt. An unbeneficed priest in York and Colchester, Ball evidently began to attack the structures of society. He was forbidden to preach in 1366, but continued to denounce clerical prelates and to proclaim the right not to pay tithes to unworthy clergy and also the equality of bondsmen and gentry. In 1381 he was in prison, but was released by the Kentish rebels and quickly became a widely known leader of the revolt. Basing his notorious Blackheath sermon on the rhyme "When Adam dalf, and Eve span, Who was then the gentilman?" he encouraged the killing of everyone who was harmful to the community. When the rebellion collapsed he was captured and sentenced to be hanged, drawn, and quartered. He cannot be regarded as a disciple of Wycliffe; his views were produced before Wycliffe was well known, they did not include doctrinal grievances—and Wycliffe in any case strongly condemned the rebellion. C. PETER WILLIAMS

BALL, JOHN (1585-1640). Presbyterian divine. Educated at Brasenose College, Oxford, he later became a private tutor. After conversion he was ordained in 1610 but without the usual subscription, and he continued to stand loose to all "Romish" elements within the Anglican Church. Inevitably he came to the attention of the authorities and was "deprived" and imprisoned for periods. As a considerable scholar and divine he enjoyed sanction among Puritan sympathizers when free. Most learned in the field of Roman controversy, especially as represented by Bellarmine,* his writings were particularly admired in New England. His Trial of the New Church Way in New England and Old was, however, an attack on the independent church system developed there, and also accused those who emigrated of being deserters afraid of the difficulties of living in England. This roused some resentment and produced several replies. C. PETER WILLIAMS

BALLARD, GUY (1878-1939). Founder of the I AM Movement.* Born in Kansas, he worked as a mining engineer before claiming in 1930 that the great Ascended Master of the spirit world St. Germain appeared to him on Mount Shasta in California and revealed to him the secret mysteries of the universe, and showed him himself, his wife Edna, and their son Donald in their previous existence. The parents had long been involved in occult activities, and in 1934 they formally launched the I AM Movement. Ballard published Unveiled Mysteries and The Magic Presence, books which told of the revelations from Germain and other Masters. Meetings were at first open to the public, but the Ballards drew criticism and adopted more secretive tactics. Mrs. Ballard gradually became the dominant figure of I AM, though it was believed that Guy would never die but would ascend directly to heaven. When he did die, numerous followers left the movement, but Mrs. Ballard claimed he had ascended and continued to lead the faithful. HARRY SKILTON

BALLOU, HOSEA (1771-1852). American Universalist. Born in New Hampshire, son of a Baptist minister, he at first accepted Calvinist doctrine, but under the influence of Universalist preaching and deistic writings he became a leader of the Universalist Church and was ordained in 1794. On the basis of his own independent study of Scripture he decided that it was impossible to defend the doctrines of the Trinity, the deity of Christ, human depravity, vicarious atonement, or eternal punishment on the basis of either Scripture or human reason. When Ballou arrived on the scene, most Universalists were orthodox in theology except for their belief that all men would be saved. But his extensive preaching, writing, and training of ministerial students influenced them toward Unitarianism. He edited Universalist journals and wrote hymns. Among his books are Treatise on the Atonement (1805) and Examination of the Doctrine of a Future Retribution (1834). HARRY SKILTON

BAMPTON LECTURES. Canon John Bampton of Salisbury died in 1751 and endowed in his will an annual lectureship at St. Mary's Church, Oxford. The lectures were first delivered in 1780, and from 1895 they have been given on alternate years. The will specified that the lectures shall cover the exposition and defense of the Christian faith as set out in the creeds, and on the authority of the Scriptures and the Fathers.

BANCROFT, RICHARD (1544-1610). Archbishop of Canterbury from 1604. Born at Farnworth in Lancashire, he was educated at Cambridge and after ordination became chaplain to Bishop Richard Cox* of Ely and rector of Teversham. He was successively rector of St. Andrew's, Holborn, treasurer of St. Paul's Cathedral, and canon of Westminster. At St. Paul's Cross in 1589 he launched a stern attack on Presbyterian Puritanism, strongly reasserting episcopacy to such an extent that one of the queen's councillors feared he was threatening the royal supremacy. In 1590 he was made a prebendary of St. Paul's, then chaplain to Archbishop Whitgift. Seven years later he became bishop of London, exercising great influence due to Whitgift's age and infirmity. He had to deal with the Marprelate Tracts.* In 1604 he succeeded Whitgift as primate. He attended the Hampton Court Conference* with the Presbyterians and all but wrecked it by his belligerence and intransigence. He was largely responsible for the 1604 Canons which received the royal assent, but which Parliament was soon to set aside. He sought unsuccessfully to make the ecclesiastical courts independent of the law. In his closing months he was involved in the scheme to reestablish episcopacy in Scotland. He was also responsible for overseeing the Authorized Version of the Bible, though he died before its completion.

Bancroft's iron discipline, authoritarianism, and intransigence must be seen in their historical context. They have sometimes been erroneously used to bolster Tractarian innovations on episcopacy as if they were part of earlier Anglicanism, but in historical reality he was dealing with the truculent wing of extreme Puritans epitomized in the Marprelate Tracts. This extreme wing should not be confused with mainstream Puritanism which in England remained for the most part during Bancroft's life loyal to the national church, although pressing for reform and improvement.

BAÑEZ, DOMINGO (1528-1604). Spanish Dominican theologian. Staunch defender of Thomistic doctrine which he sought to follow even in its minutest detail, he held various professorships for ten years, then in 1580 was elected to the chief chair in the University of Salamanca where he remained for twenty years. He was prominently involved in the controversy with the Jesuits concerning the merit of Christ's death, predestination, and justification. He was interested in logic, well-versed in metaphysics, and never hesitated to treat a subject in depth if it was important or useful. He was director and confessor of St. Teresa.

BANGORIAN CONTROVERSY (1717). A dispute in England which brought to a head the conflict between the High Church and Jacobite lower clergy and the Latitudinarian and Erastian bishops, leading to the effective suppression of Convocation for 135 years. Bishop Hoadly of Bangor preached a sermon before George I, supposedly at the king's suggestion, on "The Nature of the Kingdom of Christ," from John 18:36. A committee of the Lower House of Convocation accused Hoadly of denying the visible nature of the true church and of ignoring the working of the Holy Spirit, upon which the whole House requested the Upper House (of bishops) to make a definite censure. A considerable war of pamphlets followed the publication of the sermon, involving such as William Sherlock and William Law,* who attacked Hoadly strongly. To save him, the king prorogued Convocation, which was to transact no more business until 1852. G.S.R. COX

BAPTISM. The Christian rite of initiation whereby Christians confess their faith in Christ and are admitted into membership in the Christian Church. The origin of the rite probably is in the universal practice of sacred lustrations. The rite is variously interpreted as a sacrament essential to salvation; as merely a sign of one's Christian commitment; as a symbol picturing the believer's identification with Christ in his death, burial, and resurrection; or, as in the case of some spiritualist groups, as being entirely spiritual without material form.

Apostolic age. Christian baptism has its specific background in the OT acts of ritual purification as well as the Jewish practice of proselyte baptism and the ritual lustrations of the Qumran community. Although Jewish proselyte baptism has been questioned, the references in Epictetus, the Sibylline Oracles, and the Mishnah confirm a first-century practice. The practice of Qumran differs from the NT practice in that it was frequently observed, and although the mode and specific directions for its administration are lacking, its association with the Holy Spirit, purity of life, messianism, and the judgment of Yahweh has led scholars to find parallels with both the baptism of John the Baptist and early Christian baptism.

The following facts may be noted regarding the baptism of John the Baptist and early Christian baptism: (1) John's baptism was primarily an ethical act whereby one prepared for the coming kingdom of God and associated oneself with the herald of that kingdom (cf. Matt. 3:1-17; 11:2-15; Acts 19:1-7). (2) Jesus began his public ministry by association with John's baptism, probably not as a sign of repentance but as the King of the kingdom (cf. Matt. 3:13-17; cf. John 1:19-34), and according to John 4:2 Jesus Himself probably did not baptize. (3) The apostolic history of the Book of Acts reveals a developing practice and theology for the rite of baptism. In the early chapters beginning with the first Christian Pentecost, baptism is closely associated with repentance as a qualification for salvation and membership in the Christian community (cf. Acts 2:37-41), whereas the later passages place greater emphasis upon repentance and faith (cf. 3:16; 16:31) with baptism following (cf. 9:1-19, 16:31-34). The references to baptism "in the name of Jesus" are probably attempts to distinguish Christian baptism from Jewish proselyte baptism rather than a specific baptismal formula (cf. Acts 2:38; 8:16). Also, the ritual act was closely associated with the Holy Spirit and the confirmatory sign of the glōssai (cf. Acts 2:1-13; 10:44-48; 19:1-7). (4) Paul's baptismal theology is stated in several key passages: Romans 6:1-4; 1 Corinthians 12:12-13; Galatians 3:26-29; Colossians 2:9-13. Baptism is primarily an act of identification with the dead, buried, and resurrected Christ, but it is also a sign of the covenant and is therefore corresponded to the OT rite of circumcision. That Paul did not conceive of baptism as an essential saving sacrament is clearly indicated by 1 Corinthians 1:10-18. For Paul there seems to be one essential baptism, the baptism of the Holy Spirit by which we are incorporated into the body of Christ (cf. 1 Cor. 12:12-13; Eph. 4:4). (5) The rest of the NT corpus does not present a unified picture regarding the meaning and administration of baptism. Hebrews 6:2 speaks of baptisms (RSV "ablutions"); 1 Peter 3:21 distinguishes between a bodily and a psychological cleansing associated with baptism; and Paul speaks of a mysterious "baptism for the dead" in 1 Corinthians 15:29 (cf. Matt. 28:18-20).

Patristic and medieval period. Probably our earliest references to baptism outside the NT are to be found in the Didache.* Here the mode is clearly a tri-immersion in the name of the Father, Son, and Holy Spirit, but the Didache permits baptism by affusion if insufficient water is available. It seems clear that up until about the end of the fifth century, adult believer's baptism was the normal practice of the church. This fact is demonstrated by the emphasis in the Early Fathers on careful preparation for baptism, and the necessity to live a sinless life after baptism. As a result of this latter teaching, many postponed baptism until their deathbed, which came to be known as "Clinical Baptism" (cf. Gr. klinē, "bed"). Doctrinally, baptism very early came to be understood as a means of grace or a sacrament, in the sense of an instrumental means of regeneration. Justin Martyr bases his doctrine of baptismal regeneration on John 3:3,5 and Isaiah 1:16-20. Although Irenaeus says almost nothing about the mode or practice of baptism, he is a strong defender of the Trinitarian formula and baptismal regeneration.

Schism within and heresy without forced the church to raise the question of the validity of the baptismal rite. In the second century, Tertullian denied the validity of baptism administered by heretics. Normally it was done by the bishop; however, on special occasions deacons and presbyters might be permitted to administer the rite. Even women were forbidden to perform it, according to the decrees of the Fourth Council of Carthage (c.255). The issue was raised in a somewhat different way with the Novatian* and Donatist* controversies. From these controversies the idea, if not the term, of ex opere operato developed.

The practice of infant baptism completes the early patristic developments. Infant baptism was practiced in the second century, but only with the aid of an adult sponsor. A full defense of this custom came to expression in the theology of Augustine in the late fourth and early fifth centuries. Only in the fifth century did the Syrian Church make infant baptism obligatory; prior to this time it was the exception rather than the rule. But with the developing conceptions of original sin,* a theological foundation for infant baptism was found. And it was Augustine more than anyone else who lent his theological genius to this issue. Basing his conception of an original act of sin by Adam in which all humanity participated, Augustine drew the conclusion that each child is not only born with an inherited tendency toward sin, concupiscence, but also shares in the guilt of Adam's sin. It is noteworthy that Augustine based this position largely upon the faulty text of Rom. 5:12—a Latin text which translated the Greek phrase "because that" as "in quo" ("in whom"). Prior to the fifth century, the normal practice was to administer baptism at Easter and Pentecost, but from the fifth century the importance of infant baptism placed great stress upon the rite's being administered prior to the eighth day after birth.

During the Middle Ages, the theology and practice of baptism were largely refinements of the earlier developments. The major concern during the period from the fifth to the eleventh centuries was the issue of heretical baptismal practices. At the Fourth Lateran Council,* baptism and the six other sacraments received their basic dogmatic definition. Hugh of St.-Victor modified the sign emphasis of Augustine, and Aquinas* provided the theological framework not only for baptism but for all seven official sacraments. Aquinas is the first to trace all seven back to Christ, and he taught that baptism, confirmation, and ordination stamp an indelible mark upon the soul; consequently, these three sacraments cannot be repeated. Greater stress was also given to the concept of ex opere operato, and the earlier teaching—which appeared prior to Augustine but which Augustine gave greater recognition, regarding a baptism of blood for martyrs and the baptism of desire for those who had not been officially baptized but who gave evidence of intending to do so—was further refined by Aquinas and the Scholastics. In the debate between Nominalism and Realism, both baptism and the Eucharist were involved in the manner in which grace was bestowed. The creedal formulations of the Fourth Lateran Council and the theological foundations of Thomistic theology were restated at the Council of Trent* (1545-63) and have remained to this day the essential position of the Roman Catholic Church.

Reformation and contemporary developments. During the sixteenth century, baptism along with the Eucharist became one of the major divisive issues not only separating reforming groups from Catholicism, but also dividing the rival sects. Nearest the Roman Catholic position was Luther's view, which reduced the number of sacraments finally to two—baptism and the Lord's Supper—but which stressed infant baptism on Augustinian grounds. In his Babylonian Captivity of the Church, Luther recognized the meaning of baptizō as immersion, but qualified this by regarding the mode as a matter of indifference to the sacramental power of the rite; and he further admitted that the normal NT pattern was adult believer's baptism. The absolutely essential element of faith was to be supplied by the sponsoring adult; Luther sometimes stated that God gave the infant faith in the baptismal act. Calvin treats the subject of baptism in his Institutes (IV, 15). For him, baptism is a sacrament, but its efficacy is limited to the elect. Later Calvinism made greater use of covenant theology, the effect of which was to minimize the sacramental nature of baptism and replace sacramentalism with a covenantal sign significance. Luther and Calvin's contemporary Zwingli had already reduced baptism to a mere sign, making it unnecessary to salvation. Zwingli's ideas were also represented by the Anabaptists,* whose major emphasis was upon believer's baptism rather than the mode. Only with the English Baptists about 1633 did the issue of immersion arise among the Particular Baptists. Prior to this, even the Baptists practiced affusion or sprinkling, since the issue was believer's baptism as opposed to paedo-baptism. Among the spiritualists, especially the seventeenth-century Quakers, baptism and the Lord's Supper were rejected as irrelevant to the age of the Spirit. On other grounds, eighteenth-century rationalism also set aside not only sacramentalism but also ecclesiastical institutionalism which included baptism. The Tractarian Movement* and High Church Anglican theologians (cf. E.B. Pusey) sought to restore baptism to its earlier sacramentalism. American theology has tended more and more in the direction of Zwinglianism, largely because of the influence of revivalistic emphases. In the twentieth century there has been a revival of interest in baptism mainly as a result of the influence of Karl Barth* and his rejection of infant baptism, although he stood in a paedobaptist tradition. The ecumenical movement has also stimulated interest in baptismal and sacramental theology as the various branches of Christendom have attempted to work out a rapprochement. More often than not it has been the sacraments that have provided one of the greatest hindrances to achieving ecumenicity in spirit and form.

BAPTISM OF CHRIST. The baptism of Jesus by John the Baptist is recorded in the synoptic gospels (Matt. 3:13-17; Mark 1:9-11; Luke 3:21f.) and is implied in John (1:32-34). John's role was to be a link between the old and new covenants. Where the prophets of the OT had spoken in general terms of the Messiah, it was John who was able to identify him. The baptism of Jesus by John was the beginning point of the ministry, and therefore also of the apostolic witness and the kerygma (Acts 1:22; 10:37; 13:24f.).

Because John's baptism was connected with repentance for the forgiveness of sins, Matthew records John's hesitation to baptize Jesus. John is persuaded to do so when Jesus says, "It is proper for us to do this to fulfil all righteousness." This seems to mean that He accepted the divine plan and was willing to identify Himself with the faithful remnant in Israel. The opening of the heavens shows the direct contact between the Father and Jesus in the descent of the Spirit and is both in line with the coming of the Spirit upon the prophets and a continuation of what He had done as the agent of the Father in the conception of Jesus. The words which refer to Jesus as God's "beloved Son" are often taken to be a combination of Isaiah 42:1 and Psalm 2:7, implying that his Sonship is to be worked out in the role of the Servant of the Lord. The fact that the baptism immediately precedes the temptation in the wilderness suggests that there is typology involved as Jesus recapitulates the experience of Israel in the Red Sea and the desert. The answer Jesus gives to the chief priests about the source of His authority (Mark 11:27-33) suggests that on the historical level the authority for His mission is to be found in His baptism.

BAPTISTERY. A building or part of a building in which baptism is administered. One of the rooms in the third-century house-church at Dura-Europos was furnished as a baptistery with font and canopy. Separate baptisteries appear in the fourth century, sometimes containing a suite of rooms; candidates assembled in one, disrobed in another, were baptized in the next, dressed in white robes in a fourth—and thence entered the church. During the Middle Ages, baptisteries ceased to be built, a font at the back of the church being regarded as sufficient provision for baptism. There have been some modern attempts to give greater prominence to the place of baptism, in architectural terms.

BAPTISTS. So named from their practice of baptizing only those who have made a personal profession of faith in Jesus Christ, Baptists constitute one of the largest Free Church communions, with a world membership in 1971 of over thirty-one million, and a total community strength considerably higher. Twenty-seven million are to be found in the USA, and there are also substantial groups in India (633,000), Russia (550,000), Congo (450,000), Brazil (342,000), the British Isles (269,000), Burma (249,000), Canada (175,000), and Romania (120,000). They are evangelical in outlook, with a strong emphasis on the necessity of personal commitment to Christ and a personal experience of His grace, and an accompanying understanding of the Christian life in terms of personal faith and discipleship. Believer's baptism, they maintain, expresses more clearly than any alternative practice the NT teaching concerning the nature of both the Gospel and the church. It is administered in the name of the Trinity and is normally by immersion.

The soil out of which the modern Baptist movement arose was that of seventeenth-century English Separatism. Whether there were any direct links with the continental Anabaptists* of the sixteenth century is a difficult and much disputed question; some indirect Anabaptist influence, however, was probable. In 1609 John Smyth's* English Separatist congregation in exile in Amsterdam was led by a study of the NT to disband and reorganize itself, with believer's baptism as the basis of church fellowship. Smyth and most of his congregation applied to join the Mennonites, and were accepted by them in 1615, three years after Smyth's death. Meanwhile, in 1612, a small group under Thomas Helwys* returned to England, forming the first Baptist church on English soil, at Spitalfields. They were General (or Arminian) Baptists. The first Particular (or Calvinist) Baptist church came into being between 1633 and 1638, as a secession from the Independent Jacob-Lathrop-Jessey church, so named from its succession of pastors. Both streams made considerable progress, especially during the Commonwealth period, and by 1660 there were between 200 and 300 Baptist churches in England and Wales, most of them in London, the Midlands, and the South.

At first the mode of baptism practiced was affusion, but from the 1640s immersion became general. From earliest times there were Baptists who believed in "mixed" or open communion. John Bunyan* was pastor of a church consisting of Baptists and paedobaptists. From the seventeenth century a few Baptists have observed the seventh day as their sabbath. Seventh Day Baptists are still to be found in America, but have virtually disappeared from England. America's earliest Baptist churches were formed in the seventeenth century, the first probably being Providence, Rhode Island (1639), in the establishment of which Roger Williams* played a leading part.

Concern at the widespread influence of Unitarian views among General Baptists during the eighteenth century led Dan Taylor (1738-1816) to organize those churches remaining orthodox and evangelical in a New Connexion, in 1770. Particular Baptists too were experiencing theological and spiritual renewal at this time. The writings of Andrew Fuller,* particularly The Gospel Worthy of All Acceptation (1785), helped to break down the rigid and extreme Calvinism then common among them, and in 1792, spurred on by William Carey,* the ministers of the Northamptonshire Association formed the Baptist Missionary Society, Carey himself going to India as a missionary the following year. Despite strong resistance from those who came to be known as Strict Baptists,* their evangelical Calvinism gained a wide acceptance on both sides of the Atlantic.

A "General Union" of Particular Baptist ministers and churches (known since 1873 as the Baptist Union of Great Britain and Ireland) was formed in 1813. Gradually Baptists within the Union and those of the New Connexion moved closer together, and in 1891 the two organizations merged. John Clifford (1836-1923), who played a leading part in the merger, was noted for his emphasis on evangelism and the social implications of the Gospel. His contemporary, C.H. Spurgeon,* was widely influential as a preacher, especially in London and the South. The reshaping of the Union to meet the demands of the twentieth century was largely the work of J.H. Shakespeare, its secretary from 1898 till his death in 1928. It was mainly due to his vision that the Federal Council of Evangelical Free Churches was formed in 1919, and in The Churches at the Cross Roads (1918) he pleaded for wider Christian reunion. Under his successors, M.E. Aubrey (secretary, 1928-51), E.A. Payne (1951-67), and D.S. Russell (appointed 1967), the Union has taken a full share in the British and World Councils of Churches. In 1970 there were 2,192 churches with a membership of 106,767 affiliated to the Union. There are separate unions in Scotland and Wales, with which the British Union maintains close fraternal relationships. Ireland too has its own union.

For a century after Roger Williams, progress in America was slow. From 1740, however, under the influence of the Great Awakening,* the Baptist cause made considerable headway. The nineteenth century was a period of outreach in rural and frontier areas and among Indians, Negroes, and various immigrant groups, the number of Baptists increasing from 700,000 to well over four million between 1850 and 1900. By the mid-1960s there were some thirty separate groups of Baptists in the USA, the largest being the eleven-million strong Southern Baptist Convention,* two Negro conventions (see AMERICAN NEGRO CHURCHES) with a combined numerical strength of nearly ten million, and the American Baptist Churches* with approximately 1.5 million members. The Baptist community in the USA has produced such outstanding figures as Walter Rauschenbusch,* theologian of the Social Gospel; Martin Luther King,* Negro advocate of nonviolence and Nobel Prize winner; and Billy Graham,* world-famous evangelist.

The first Baptist church in mainland Europe was established in Hamburg in 1834 by J.G. Oncken (1800-84), whose influence was felt far beyond Germany, especially in Scandinavia and eastern Europe. Work in Australia and New Zealand also began in the nineteenth century, while the twentieth saw striking advance in Africa, Asia, and Latin America.

Baptists acknowledge Christ as the sole and absolute authority in all matters of faith and practice, viewing the Scriptures as the principal means by which He speaks to the church. Not surprisingly, they stress the prophetic rather than the priestly aspects of religion, and are conscious of the dangers of uniformity and invariable "official" forms in matters relating to worship, church government, and theological definition. From their earliest days they have been keen advocates of religious freedom.

Worship is largely nonliturgical, with emphasis on the reading and preaching of the Word. In addition to its minister, a Baptist church is served by deacons, elected from the membership, who share with the minister in leadership and administration, and assist him in the celebration of the Lord's Supper.

Probably few Baptists would be prepared to recognize infant baptism as having theological validity, though in practice most (with the notable exception of those in the Strict Baptist tradition) welcome to the Lord's Table Christians not baptized as believers, and "open membership" churches also admit them to membership. A small number of Union churches, affiliated to more than one denomination, and practicing both forms of baptism, are to be found in several countries, including England. Baptists are divided in their attitude to the ecumenical movement. Some, like British Baptists and those of the American Baptist Churches, are prepared for ecumenical involvement; others, principally those of the Southern Convention, take a more critical attitude. During the present century Baptists in China and Japan have participated in schemes of union or federation, and in 1970 Baptists joined with non-Baptists to form the Church of North India.

Baptists regard the church as a society of believers, the local church having an especially important part in their thinking. Though not committed theologically to one particular type of polity, they generally favor a congregationalist form of church government. Belief in the autonomy of the local church, however, is balanced by a belief in the necessity of fellowship and interdependence. All except the most rigidly independent churches are linked together both in regional groupings known as associations, which have been common since the seventeenth century, and in national unions or conventions. A Baptist World Alliance* was formed in 1905.

BAPTIST WORLD ALLIANCE. A voluntary and fraternal world association of Baptists founded in 1905 to show, according to its constitution, "the essential oneness of Baptist people in the Lord Jesus Christ, to impart inspiration to the brotherhood, and to promote the spirit of fellowship, service and co-operation among its members." The alliance serves as an agent of communication between Baptists (in 1970 it represented just over twenty-three million in twenty-five countries), a forum for study and discussion, a channel for relief and mutual help, a vigilant force for safeguarding religious liberty, and a sponsor of gatherings for the spread of the Gospel. A Baptist World Congress and a World Conference for Baptist Youth are held every five years. The women's department organizes an annual Baptist Women's Day of Prayer. Between meetings the work of the Congress is carried on by an executive meeting annually, with six continents represented in its membership, and by a series of study commissions on such subjects as Christian teaching and training, evangelism and missions, Baptist doctrine, religious liberty, and human rights and cooperative Christianity.

BARCLAY, JOHN (1734-1798). Founder of the Bereans.* He trained for the Presbyterian ministry at St. Andrews, where he came under the influence of Dr. Archibald Campbell. A powerful preacher, Barclay served as assistant minister at Errol (1759-63) and Fettercairn (1763-72). He came under censure for the views expressed in his book Rejoice Evermore, or Christ All in All (1766). An appeal to the General Assembly (which was dismissed) enabled him to air his views in Edinburgh, where he gained a number of adherents who resolved to secede and invited Barclay to become their minister. He went to England for ordination at Newcastle in 1773. His church in Edinburgh became known as the Berean Assembly. From 1776 to 1778 he was in England, where churches of his persuasion were formed in London and Bristol. Returning to Edinburgh, he resumed his ministry there and in other churches which had been formed in Scotland.

Barclay diverted from current Calvinism in a number of particulars. He amplified the assertion of Doctor Campbell that man is unable to reach belief in God by using his rational powers, and he questioned the value of theistic arguments, even that from design. The revealed truth of the Bible can be received only by the illumination of the Holy Spirit. Faith is neither a subjective emotion nor personal appropriation of Christ, but the intellectual acceptance of biblical revelation. Barclay therefore rejected both the moralism of the Moderates* and the "soul-struggles" of the Evangelicals, and asserted that assurance of salvation is the hallmark of Christianity. Unbelief is the sin against the Holy Ghost. Unbelievers cannot even pray for their own conversion. The Lord's Supper requires no special soul preparation.

BARCLAY, ROBERT (1648-1690). Scottish Quaker theologian and apologist. Son of a professional soldier who had fought with Gustavus Adolphus as well as in the Scottish army, Barclay was sent to France at the age of ten. There he spent four years studying with his uncle, who was rector of the Scots College (Roman Catholic) at Paris. Returning to Scotland, he followed his father in accepting Quakerism (1667). In 1670 he married a convert, Christina Mollison, settled at his estate at Ury, and began to write the apologetic treatises which were to bring him fame. Barclay's persecution began in 1672 after he walked through the streets of Aberdeen clothed with sackcloth and with ashes on his head. He was imprisoned the same year and several times thereafter, including his longest sentence during the winter of 1676-77. He also traveled to the Continent in the service of his faith. His first trip in 1676 brought him into contact with his distant relative Princess Elizabeth of the Rhine. She had taken an interest in Quaker ideals, and when Barclay left he carried a letter from her to Prince Rupert, asking him to use his influence on behalf of Quaker prisoners. In 1677 William Penn,* George Fox,* and Barclay went to Germany, and Robert once more interviewed Elizabeth. After his return to Scotland he became a favorite of the duke of York (later James II). This friendship led to the granting of the colony of East New Jersey to a group of Friends,* including Barclay who was made governor of the territory in 1683. Although he never went to the New World, his brother settled there. The province was meant to be a refuge for the persecuted and to provide a practical application of Quaker ideals of toleration. Among his many works the better known are A Catechism and Confession of Faith (1673), The Anarchy of the Ranters (1676), and An Apology for the True Christian Divinity, Being an Explanation and Vindication of the People Called Quakers (1678). Insisting upon divine inward revelation as necessary for true faith, Barclay also formulated the humanitarian and pacifist ideals still followed by the Society of Friends.

ROBERT G. CLOUSE

BARDESANES (Bar-Daisan) (154-222). Edessene Christian. A man of remarkable versatility, he was the most outstanding representative of the early Christian community in Edessa, Syria. A friend of court, and particularly of King Abgar IX, he was a philosopher able to write in Greek and Syriac, and a poet of considerable powers. Prior to his conversion he had been interested in astrology, and this remained with him, contributing to his reputation for unorthodoxy and even heresy. He is famous for The Book of the Laws of the Countries, written by a disciple, Philip. In this he argued, against the astrologers, that there is a free will in the universe. Although he refuted Marcion* and Valentinus,* and was not a Gnostic, he did not eradicate dualism from his system. He was sufficiently faithful to Christianity to be on the point of martyrdom. As a poet he can be considered one of the founders of Syriac literature.

C. PETER WILLIAMS

BAR HEBRAEUS (Grigor Abu-l-Farag Bar-Hebraya) (1225-1286). Bishop of the Syrian Monophysite (Jacobite) Church, and Mafrian (primate) from 1264. Writer of prodigious output, his works include a Bible commentary in scholia ("Storehouse of Secrets"), systematic theology ("Candelabrum of the Sanctuary") and in summary ("Book of Lightning"), canon law or nomocanon ("Book of Guidance"), ethics ("Book of Ethics"), ascetic spirituality ("Book of the Dove"), exposition of Aristotelian philosophy ("The Cream of Wisdom"), a sketch of logic, physics, and metaphysics ("Book of the Conversation of Wisdom"), grammatical exposition ("Book of Splendors"), astronomy ("The Ascent of Reason"), chronography (both secular and church history), prose and poetry, and a number of translations from Arabic. His works are important for their preservation of textual, lexical, and historical information, excerpted with encyclopedic enthusiasm by this widely learned scholar.

J.N. BIRDSALL

BARING-GOULD, SABINE (1834-1924). Hymnwriter and medieval scholar. Born in Exeter and educated at Cambridge, he took holy orders in 1864 and was for three years curate at Horbury Bridge, Yorkshire. In 1865 he wrote his famous hymn "Onward, Christian soldiers" for a Whit Monday Sunday school procession. After incumbencies in Dalton, Yorkshire, and East Mersea, Essex, he appointed himself in 1881 rector of Lew Trenchard, Devon, which had been the family seat for 300 years. He was a versatile author, and his chief work was The Lives of the Saints in fifteen volumes, which had the distinction of being placed in the Roman Index Expurgatorius. Other hymns include "Now the day is over" and the translation "Through the night of doubt and sorrow."

J.G.G. NORMAN

BARKER, FREDERIC (1808-1882). Bishop of Sydney. An English clergyman educated at Cambridge (he was influenced by Charles Simeon*), his evangelicalism was colored by his contacts with Ireland and his incumbency in a Liverpool parish. His service under Archbishop Sumner led to Barker's appointment to the bishopric of Sydney in 1854. He reestablished the evangelical tradition first impressed on the Australian diocese by the early chaplains. His influence spread through the founding of Moore College, the oldest theological college in Australia, in 1856. Barker promoted church extension by means of a church society, which paved the way for the setting up of synodical government by laity and clergy in 1866. With his support a general synod was formed in 1872 for the whole Church of England in Australia. During his twenty-eight-year episcopate he saw the division of his vast diocese and a considerable strengthening of the parish system.

NOEL S. POLLARD

BARLOW, WILLIAM (d.1568). Anglican bishop. A member of the reforming party under Henry VIII, his writings which showed Protestant inclinations were condemned in 1529, but later he was again accepted, and in 1536 became bishop of St. Davids, in 1548 bishop of Bath and Wells. When Mary came to the throne, he fled abroad and probably spent most of her reign in Poland. He returned on her death and became bishop of Chichester. Barlow has been the subject of much ecclesiastical controversy between Roman Catholics and High Anglicans since he was a consecrator of Archbishop Parker, without there being any record of his own earlier consecration. Barlow translated part of the Apocrypha for the Bishops' Bible,* contributed to the Institution of a Christian Man, and was a member of the commission for reforming church law.

G.E. DUFFIELD

BARMEN DECLARATION (1934). A declaration made by the free Synod of Barmen attended by representatives of the Protestant churches in Germany as a response to the German-Christians.* It was the theological rallying point of the Confessing Church.* Largely written by Karl Barth,* its Reformed exclusion of natural theology, though necessary in the circumstances, limited its long-term appeal to Lutherans. The declaration quotes the Nazi-approved church constitution of 1933 which stated that the German Evangelical Church rested on the Gospel of Jesus Christ revealed in Holy Scripture and brought to light again in the Reformation confessions; and that the church was a federal union of equal territorial churches. So it opposed both German-Christian theology and church government, by which, it believed, the church ceased to be the church. In each of six main paragraphs NT texts are given, then positively expounded; and contrasting errors are repudiated. Its thrust is that since Jesus Christ is the one Word of God, the Church is not to recognize other events, powers, or images alongside Him as divine revelation.

HADDON WILLMER

BARNABAS. A man of Cyprus who became a Christian in the earliest period of the Christian Church, Barnabas first came to notice for his liberality in contributing the proceeds of the sale of his property for the common support of the Jerusalem Christians (Acts 4:36). He had relatives in Jerusalem, since the home of his cousin Mark was situated there. He was willing to befriend the recently converted Saul of Tarsus when the other Jerusalem Christians were afraid to do so, having recognized more readily than others the genuineness of Saul's conversion. He was sent by the Jerusalem church to investigate reports of the remarkable growth of the Antioch church. His reaction was encouraging (Acts 11:24ff.). On recognizing the need for a teaching ministry there, he called Saul from Tarsus to join him at Antioch. After a year's ministry, both were comissioned by that church to undertake a missionary journey. In the Acts narrative describing the course of this mission they are both described as apostles (Acts 14:14).

When the problem of Gentile circumcision arose, Barnabas with Paul opposed it and the Jerusalem church vindicated their policy. But when a second missionary journey was proposed, Barnabas clashed with Paul over the position of Mark (Acts 15:34ff.). On a later occasion Paul expressed his regret that even Barnabas was carried away by the hypocrisy of the Judaizers (Gal. 2:13). In his Corinthian correspondence Paul mentions that, like himself, Barnabas supported himself rather than depend on the churches (1 Cor. 9.6).

DONALD GUTHRIE

BARNABAS, GOSPEL OF. A pseudogospel containing portions from the Koran and the four canonical gospels. Its date is in doubt, though internal evidence points to the first half of the fourteenth century. Written in Italian by one who had renounced Christianity for Islam, its essential feature in teaching religious toleration is a belief that God's message of salvation is for all.

BARNABITES. The congregation of "Clerks Regular of St. Paul" (or "Paulines"), founded in Milan in 1533 by Antonio Maria Zaccaria, a doctor of Cremona, with Bartolommeo Ferrari, a lawyer, and Giacomo Antonio Morigia, a mathematician, to preach missions and conduct educational work in the city. They were given the church of St. Barnabas, hence their name. A staunch supporter was Charles Borromeo,* whose confessor, Alessandro Sauli, was general of the order (1565). During the seventeenth century they spread into France and central Europe, and today there are about thirty-five houses.

BARNARDO, THOMAS JOHN (1845-1905). Converted in 1862, he became a member of the Plymouth Brethren and went to London from his Dublin home in 1866, determined to become a missionary doctor. Visiting the Stepney slums, the plight of a homeless waif, Jim Jarvis, inspired him to establish his first home for destitute boys in 1870. Equipped with amazing, if rather autocratic, nervous energy, great organizational flair, and journalistic skill in appealing to the public, he quickly built up a vast system. In 1873 a former public house provided the base for a church and a coffee palace; in 1876 he built a village at Ilford to provide homes for girls in small, less institutional, units; in 1882 he started to send children to Canada because of the better employment prospects, and in 1886 he began to arrange boarding-out for children. The organization so expanded that by the time of his death he had admitted 59,384 children to his homes, helped 20,000 to emigrate, and materially assisted a further 250,000.

C. PETER WILLIAMS

BARNBY, SIR JOSEPH (1838-1896). One of the most influential choral conductors of nineteenth-century England. He did much to introduce the works of Bach and Dvorák into England, wrote over 200 hymn tunes, edited five hymnals, and was for years musical adviser to Novello and Company. He is best known today for his tune Laudes Domini for the hymn "When morning gilds the skies." His numerous anthems and part-songs are in a sweet, romantic idiom that is out of favor today.

J.B. MAC MILLAN

BARNES, ALBERT (1798-1870). Presbyterian minister and commentator. Born in Rome, New York, of Methodist background, he was educated at Hamilton College and Princeton Seminary and became a Presbyterian pastor first at Morristown, New Jersey, then at First Church in Philadelphia. He was a dynamic evangelical preacher who sought to challenge the human will to respond to God's free offer of salvation. He became a leader of the New School revivalist party and was considered a dangerous radical by the strictly Calvinistic Old School party. In 1830 he was charged with doctrinal error by his presbytery, acquitted by the general assembly, but admonished about the objectionable passages in a sermon, "The Way of Salvation." He argued in his book An Inquiry into the Scriptural Views of Slavery (1846) that the Bible and common sense alike condemned slavery. His Notes on the NT, Psalms, and Isaiah were read widely.

HARRY SKILTON

BARNES, ERNEST WILLIAM (1874-1953). Bishop of Birmingham. Educated as a scientist at Trinity College, Cambridge, he was ordained in 1902 and lectured at Trinity in mathematics. He became master of the Temple in 1915, canon of Westminster in 1918, bishop of Birmingham in 1924. He wrote various papers on mathematics, but is chiefly remembered as a prominent modernist with views that included serious questioning of the historic Christian faith on matters such as the virgin birth and the Resurrection, on one occasion provoking criticism from Archbishop Fisher in public. A consistent pacifist with a horror of atomic weapons, Barnes was also a writer; his two main works were Should such a Faith offend? (1928) and Scientific Theory and Religion (1933). G.E. DUFFIELD

BARNES, ROBERT (1495-1540). Reformer and martyr. He graduated D.D. (1523) from Cambridge, where he met with others at the White Horse Tavern for Bible study. After preaching a sermon considered to be unorthodox, he was examined in 1526 by five bishops, Thomas Wolsey among them, and condemned to be burnt or abjure. He abjured and was imprisoned, but escaped to Antwerp. Later he met Luther at Wittenberg and also Stephen Vaughan, who wrote kindly of him to Thomas Cromwell* in England. Returning there, he became an intermediary between Henry VIII's government and the German Protestants. In 1540 the Protestant and Roman Catholic factions fought bitterly in Henry's council. The king had earlier refused to embrace the Protestant faith, and in the end the Catholic party gained dominance. Cromwell was beheaded, and Barnes with two others (William Jerome and Thomas Gerrard) was burnt for heresy.

R.E.D. CLARK

BARNETT, SAMUEL AUGUSTUS (1844-1913). Anglican social reformer. After reading law and modern history at Oxford, he was ordained in 1867. In 1869 he founded the Charity Organization Society, and from 1872 to 1893 was vicar of St. Jude's, Whitechapel, where his unusual methods aroused criticism—evening schools, entertainments, Oxford dons to lecture parishioners, etc. He aimed at improving the East End cultural level, encouraging Christians to study social problems, and promoting Christian social action. In 1884 he helped form the Education Reform League; in 1885 he promoted the Artisans' Dwellings Act; and from 1884 to 1896 he was the first warden of Toynbee Hall. Barnett House at Oxford was founded in his memory, for the study of social problems. JOHN A. SIMPSON

BARNHOUSE, DONALD GREY (1895-1960). Presbyterian minister and radio preacher. Born in Watsonville, California, he studied at various institutions including the universities of Chicago and Princeton, culminating in a Th.D. degree from Aix-en-Provence, France. In 1919 he joined the Belgian Gospel Mission. From 1919 to 1921 he was director of a Bible school in Brussels, and later he worked in several small French Reformed churches. Returning to the USA (1927), he began a thirty-three-year pastorate at Tenth Presbyterian Church, Philadelphia. He became a noted radio preacher and just prior to his death had completed eleven years of weekly broadcasts devoted to the epistle to the Romans. He was editor of Revelation magazine (1931-49), and of Eternity magazine (1950-60). He was the author of numerous books. BRUCE L. SHELLEY

BARO, PETER (1534-1599). French pastor and theologian. Born at Etampes, he studied law at Bourges, where he came under Reformed influences that led him to the study of theology. In Geneva he studied under Calvin, by whom he was ordained in 1560. He returned to France in 1572, but later had to flee from persecution to England and was appointed Lady Margaret professor of divinity at Cambridge in 1574. He became critical of the Reformed doctrine of predestination and entered into controversy with its advocates. He retired in 1596 and lived in London for the rest of his life.

BARONIUS, CESARE (1538-1607). Cardinal and church historian. In 1568, in reply to the Centuries of Magdeburg,* he began his Annales Ecclesiastici, a history of the church, each chapter corresponding to a year. His purpose was to demonstrate that the practices and beliefs claimed by Flacius* to be corruptions of the early faith were in fact found in the church from the beginning. He attempted to reassure those who feared lest historical criticism had shaken the evidence for early legends. Unfortunately the documents used by Baronius, who became librarian of the Vatican in 1597, were not yet recognized as spurious, and his work was marred by inaccuracies. JAMES TAYLOR

BARRIER ACT (1697). Passed by the general assembly of the Church of Scotland, its aim was the prevention of hasty and ill-considered legislation which, although appearing at the time to be of value, might prove in due course to be prejudicial to the church's best interests. Thus it was decreed that before any acts were passed which are "to be binding rules and constitutions to the Church," these after approval of the assembly should be remitted to presbyteries for consideration, and for report to the following year's assembly, "if the more general opinion of the Church thus had agreed thereto." The Barrier Act is relevant only in matters affecting the doctrine, government, worship, and discipline of the church.

J.D. DOUGLAS

BARROW, HENRY (d.1593). Church reformer. Graduate of Cambridge (1570) and member of Gray's Inn (1576), he was converted from a riotous and dissolute life through the chance hearing of a "loud-voiced preacher . . . and made the leap from a vain and libertine youth to preciseness in the highest degree" (Bacon). Giving himself to the study of the Bible, he became friends with John Greenwood,* with whom he shared a great respect for the works of Robert Browne.* He was detained in 1586 on orders of Archbishop Whitgift* while visiting the imprisoned Greenwood, tried in 1590 for circulating seditious books, and three years later was sentenced and hanged. His works, including A True Description of the Visible Congregation of the Saints (1589) and A Brief Discovery of the False Church (1590) were printed, as were most of his other works, including an account of his trials and investigations smuggled from prison, by his friends in Holland. He is sometimes claimed as the father of modern Congregationalism, but authorities differ as to his precise beliefs, and he himself vigorously disavowed the title of a mere "sectary." G.S.R. COX

BARROW, ISAAC (1630-1677). Mathematician and Anglican divine. A royalist in politics, he traveled widely in Europe and the East (1655-59). Successively professor of Greek at Cambridge (1660), professor of geometry at Gresham College, and first Lucasian professor of mathematics at Cambridge (1663), he resigned in favor of his pupil, Isaac Newton,* and gave himself to theology. Charles II made him royal chaplain, D.D. by royal mandate, and master of Trinity (1672). He became vice-chancellor of Cambridge University in 1675. His theological works (ed. A. Napier, 1859) include A Treatise of the Pope's Supremacy, a skillful piece of controversial writing. His mathematical works (ed. W. Whewell, 1860) were highly esteemed in his day.

HAROLD H. ROWDON

BARSUMAS (d.458). Monophysite* leader. An archimandrite, he promoted in Syria the "one nature" heresy of Eutyches,* whose cause he supported at the Council of Constantinople (448) and, with 1,000 of his militant Monophysite monks, at the Robber Synod of Ephesus* (449). There, at the invitation of Emperor Theodosius II, he represented the Eastern monks and voted with the bishops. His promotion of Eutychian views and his subscription to the condemnation of Flavian and Eusebius of Dorylaeum at Ephesus earned for him at Chalcedon (451) the reputation "assassin" who "has upset all Syria." Still loyal to Eutyches, he was exiled.

BARSUMAS (d.493). Bishop of Nisibis. The Monophysite* purge of Nestorians* at the Council of Ephesus (431) caused Barsumas (or Bar Sauma) to flee to Nisibis in Persia, where he became bishop. Under his influence Monophysite priests were massacred, and the Synod of Beth Lapat in 484 passed measures designed to dissociate the Nestorian cause from churches in the Roman Empire. All doctrines other than Nestorian and maintained by these churches were condemned; marriage of priests was legalized. Barsumas himself married a nun. He was assassinated by Persian monks in 493. He founded the Nestorian theological school at Nisibis. Six of his letters survive. G.T.D. ANGEL

BARTH, KARL (1886-1968). Swiss theologian. Born in Basel, he studied in Switzerland and Germany under some of the great liberal scholars of the day. His commentary on the epistle to the Romans, however, written in 1919 while he was a pastor of the Swiss town of Safenwil amid the tumult of World War I, broke with liberalism and established him as the leader of the new Dialectical Theology.* The liberal gospel of the fatherhood of God and the brotherhood of man was too shallow. Barth wanted to get beyond treating Christianity merely as an institution or a phenomenon in the history of religions, and to recover the reality witnessed to by the prophets and apostles. His understanding of Scripture was, however, colored by his reading of Dostoevsky* and Kierkegaard.* He stressed the transcendent hiddenness of God who reveals Himself in Christ. In so doing, God reveals both His grace and His judgment. The revelation of grace illuminates the sin and guilt of man even, or rather especially, in his religion.

Barth subsequently taught at the universities of Göttingen (1921), Münster (1925), and Bonn (1930) until his ejection from Germany when the Nazis came to power. He returned to his native town of Basel, where he taught until his retirement in 1962. Barth wrote over 500 books, papers, and articles, many of which have been translated into English, French, and other languages. They include important studies of Anselm, nineteenth-century theology and several NT commentaries. But his most enduring work is likely to be the monumental, but incomplete, Church Dogmatics, written largely at Basel and embodying his teaching there. The thirteen books are divided into four "volumes" dealing with: I. Prolegomena, the doctrine of the Word of God; II. the doctrine of God; III. Creation; and IV. Reconciliation. A fifth volume dealing with Redemption (eschatology) remained unwritten.

Barth's teaching changed and evolved over the years. But the theme of God's sovereignty in revelation through His Word can be traced from the commentary on Romans to his last works. In the Church Dogmatics it forms the basis for all theology. The knowledge of God occurs in the revelation of the Father, through the Son by the Holy Spirit. The basis of theology is thus the living Trinity Itself. The Word of God is not a thing or an object, but God Himself speaking. The Word of God has a threefold form: the Son as the Word of the Father, Scripture as the commissioned witness to that Word, and Christian proclamation. The three forms are in practice inseparable. The Word of God is known only through Scripture, and consequently all Christian proclamation (whether it be sermons, books, or any other form of testimony) must be tested by Scripture. Since God has chosen to reveal Himself in this way, Barth rejects as pointless, uninteresting, and sinful all forms of natural theology which attempt to find God by other means.

In the later volumes of the Church Dogmatics the thought of God's sovereign grace in His revealing Word is amplified by Barth's understanding of the incarnate Word. Barth came to regard the incarnation as the establishment of a covenant union of God and mankind in view of the union of God and man in Jesus Christ. This idea became the determining factor of Barth's later teaching. It became the key to his understanding of God, who is above all the kind of God who takes man into partnership with Himself. It was basic to his doctrine of Creation. God created the world with this union of God and man in view. Man is not to be understood in the abstract. The deepest truth about him can only be grasped by seeing man as he is in Christ.

Barth thought of sin, not as the transgression of an abstract law, but as man's attempt to break free from the grace in which he already stands. It is the attempt to live as if he were not God's covenant partner in Christ. Barth's teaching on redemption was a form of double predestination in which Christ is both the reprobate and the elect for all. On the cross He suffered rejection for all, so that all might be redeemed in Him. This brought Barth to the brink of universalism, though he refused to identify himself with that position.

Although he enjoyed a worldwide fame, Barth found himself increasingly isolated in later life. Conservative scholars complained that he had not done justice to the Bible's teaching about itself as the Word of God. Others complained that he was too biblicist and narrow in his conception of revelation. To many charges of his critics Barth had adequate answers. He had, moreover, insights which many contemporary theologians lacked. But he cannot be entirely exonerated of the charge of being more christocentric than the Bible, and (despite his own polemic against natural theology) of having erected a theology which was in many ways speculative on the basis of a biblical core. Barth's main contribution to theology was not the system that he constructed but the many profound insights and incentives to further thought that are to be found in his writings.

BARTHOLOMEW. Apostle. The name is a patronymic meaning "son of Tolmai" and may not have been his only name. He is mentioned only in the lists of the twelve apostles and not in connection with any incident in or after the ministry of Jesus. Attempts have often been made to identify him with Nathanael, who is mentioned in John's gospel but not in the synoptics. There are a number of difficulties connected with this view. Eusebius reports that he took the Gospel to India.

BARTHOLOMEW, GOSPEL OF, see APOCRYPHAL NEW TESTAMENT

BARTHOLOMEW OF THE MARTYRS (1514-1590). Archbishop of Braga, in Portugal. He became a Dominican friar in 1528 and later taught philosophy and theology for twenty years before, against his wishes, he was elevated to the archiepiscopate (1558). In the Trent sessions of 1562-63 he introduced clerical reforms, enforcing the conciliar decrees strictly in his provincial council of 1566. He began a seminary in his palace, instituted chairs of moral theology in Braga and Viana do Castelo, composed a catechism, preached vigorously, and visited methodically his nearly 1,300 parishes. Resigning his see in 1582, he retired to the Dominican priory of Viana do Castelo. He was the author of more than thirty works. C.G. THORNE, JR.

BARTHOLOMEW'S DAY, MASSACRE OF ST. (1572). The massacre of Huguenots* in Paris and other French cities took place on the night of 23-24 August, the eve of St. Bartholomew's Day. It was instigated chiefly by Catherine de Medici, queen mother and for thirty years the real ruler of France. Despite papal demands that heretics should be killed, Catherine, who was a member of the Italian nobility and a strong admirer of Machiavelli, at first granted privileges to Protestants and sought to harmonize Protestant and Roman Catholic interests. When, however, Admiral G. de Coligny,* the acknowledged leader of the Huguenots, sought to use the French army in the Protestant cause by declaring war on Spain and later aided William of Orange in his revolt against Spain, Catherine arranged for his murder. The king's killer Maurevert fired at Coligny, but only wounded him. Catherine's complicity in the plot was suspected, but the king, expressing sympathy for Coligny, ordered an enquiry. Catherine, fearing reprisals, ordered the army to kill Coligny and with him all the Huguenots. Estimates of those murdered vary from 5,000 to 100,000, but the lower figures are now favored. The horror of the event was deepened by the circumstances that Protestant leaders had been invited to Paris to celebrate the wedding of Henry of Navarre, a Protestant, to Charles IX's sister Margaret, a Catholic. BARTHOLOMITES. Two groups have borne this name:

(1) A group of Armenian monks who fled to Genoa in 1306 and had a church dedicated to St. Bartholomew built for them. As their numbers were increased by further Armenian refugees, they spread throughout Italy. Initially Clement V authorized them to celebrate divine service according to their own rites, but later Innocent VI (1356) approved their adoption of the Roman liturgy and the Rule of St. Augustine. Boniface IX granted them the privileges of the Dominicans. After a period of decline they were suppressed by Innocent X in 1650.

(2) A German congregation of secular priests founded in 1640 by Bartholomew Holzhauser (1613-58) for the purpose of preaching, teaching, and reviving the morals and discipline of the clergy and laity. Also known as the "United Brethren" and "Communists," they lived in communities under a superior but without vows. They never worked alone, but always two together. Following papal approval in 1680, they spread to many European countries, including England, Poland, and Italy. They became extinct in 1803, though several attempts have been made to revive them. JAMES TAYLOR

BARTOLOMMEO, FRA (1475-1517). Italian painter. A student of Cosimo Rosselli, he was later converted under Savonarola,* took orders in 1501, and joined the Dominican monastery of San Marco. For a time he abandoned the practice of painting, but resumed in 1504. By 1509 he assumed the leading role in the contemporary school of painting in Florence. He became the master of a shop that was the principal source of supply in the city of major church altar pieces. His mature paintings are grave and noble, an effect achieved more from impressiveness of structure than from any exposition of human content. His works include Assumption of the Virgin, St. Catherine of Siena and the Magdalene, and the Marriage of St. Catherine. ROBERT G. CLOUSE

BARTON, ELIZABETH (c.1506-1534). "Maid of Kent." Born at Aldington, Kent, England; she appears to have been neurotic, but her trances attracted attention and local admiration. She claimed to be in touch with the Virgin Mary, but her utterances had a political character. She condemned Henry VIII when he divorced Catherine of Aragon. Her later declaration that he was no longer king in the sight of God was regarded as likely to provoke rebellion. She was tried, confessed imposture (some say under duress), and was condemned and executed.

BASHFORD, JAMES WHITFORD (1849-1919). First resident bishop of the American Methodist Episcopal Church in China. Born in Fayette, Wisconsin, from college days he had aspired to go to China as a missionary. From 1876 to 1889, however, he served pastorates in Massachusetts, Maine, and New York. Then from 1889 to 1904 he was president of Ohio Wesleyan University. When in 1904 he was elected bishop, he asked to be assigned to China. For fourteen years he served in that land, speaking largely through interpreters but making a strong impact on the Christian movement. In 1907 he organized the China Centennial Thank Offering, which raised $600,000 for missionary work. He also assisted in organizing relief measures for famine sufferers. HAROLD R. COOK

BASILICA. The form of building used for Christian worship when Christianity was recognized as the official religion of the Roman Empire. It was a large, rectangular room divided into three sections by two rows of columns parallel with the longer side. The entrance was in one of the shorter sides.

See ARCHAEOLOGY AND THE EARLY CHRISTIAN CHURCH.

BASILIDES. Gnostic* thinker who taught in Alexandria during the reign of Hadrian (117-38). Different accounts of his teaching are given by Irenaeus and Hippolytus, but most scholars agree that Hippolytus more accurately represents Basilides, and Irenaeus the popularized system of his school. Basilides's system, though philosophically expressed, is a characteristic Gnostic myth which he claimed was descended from Peter. A nonexistent God generated out of nonexistence a Triple Sonship from which emerged Archons with authority over the universe and the world. These Archon-gods were ignorant of the nonexistent God, but the Gospel of Light descended to them and thence to Jesus. Through Jesus all "men of the Sonship" return above, but those left behind have no hope of salvation. The school of Basilides adopted a churchlike form and was characterized by practices of magical ritual. It survived in Alexandria at least until the end of the second century. C. PETER WILLIAMS

BASIL OF ANCYRA (fourth century). Arian* bishop of Ancyra. Succeeding Marcellus in the see in 336, Basil was deposed by the Western bishops at Sardica in 342. Reinstated by Constantius about 348, he came to share with George of Laodicea* leadership of the Homoiousion group of bishops. In 358 this group composed at Ancyra a memorandum describing the Son as neither "like" nor "identical with" the Father, but "like according to substance." Basil hoped to unite the episcopate behind the creed and encouraged Constantius to convene a united synod of bishops. At the twin synods of Arminum (Rimini) and Seleucia, the "Dated Creed" retaining the term "like" but excluding "substance" was favored by the Emperor Constantius. Its advocates, led by Acacius,* secured Basil's deposition in 360, and he was exiled to Illyricum, where he died. Coauthor with George of A Memoir on the Doctrine of the Trinity, Basil is credited with a treatise De Virginitate. G.T.D. ANGEL

BASIL OF SELEUCIA. Bishop of Seleucia in Asia Minor (c.448-458). He probably contributed to the Definition of Chalcedon the phrase "known in two natures." Although a correspondent of the pro-Monophysite Dioscorus, he condemned Eutyches* at the Home Synod (Constantinople, 448), but at the Ephesian Robber Synod* (449), where Dioscorus was prominent, he supported Eutyches and withdrew his earlier claim to worship "our one Lord Jesus Christ made known in two natures." Almost deposed at Chalcedon (451) for this, he based his vacillation on intimidation and recalled his orthodoxy in 448, adding that he had already signed the Tome of Leo. His extant writings include forty-one sermons, seven homilies, and a legendary account of St. Thecla. G.T.D. ANGEL

BASIL THE GREAT (c.329-379). Cappadocian Father.* Eldest son of Christian parents, and brother of Gregory of Nyssa* and Macrina, he was educated at home in Caesarea (Cappadocia) and Constantinople before going in 351 to the university of Athens. There friendships were formed with the young prince Julian and Gregory, another student from Cappadocia who was later to become famous as Gregory of Nazianzus.* Following his study at Athens, Basil returned to Caesarea about 356 and taught rhetoric with conspicuous success. He resisted attractive offers to undertake educational work in the city because he had already determined to devote himself to an ascetic and devotional life. About 357 he was baptized and ordained reader. This was followed by visits to monastic settlements in Palestine, Syria, and Egypt, which at a later stage helped him decide the nature of the community he wanted to establish. On his return to Pontus he retired to a small hermitage by the river Iris not far from his home. He left his seclusion in 364 at the request of his bishop, Eusebius, who was facing much opposition from extreme Arians,* was ordained presbyter, and proceeded to write books against Eunomius. After Eusebius's death in 370, Basil was made bishop of Caesarea, a role which was to bring him into controversy not only with the Arians but also with the Pneumatomachi* and the emperor. When Emperor Valens visited the province eager to impose Arianism upon a defiant Catholic Church, he was outclassed by the eloquent, forceful arguments of a dignified Basil.

Basil's contributions to the church and theology are threefold: (1) As an ascetic, he devoted much time to introducing and establishing the monastic system into Pontus, and extensive institutions sprang up under his fostering care. A novel feature of this was the Coenobium (Gr. koinobios, "living in community"), for hitherto ascetics had either lived in solitude or in groups of two or three. (2) As a bishop, he showed a genuine gift of leadership which is seen not only in his able directorship of the ecclesiastical affairs of Cappadocia but also in the application of the Gospel to the social needs of his people. On the outskirts of the city he built an elaborate and complex unit of hostels for the poor, a hospital, bishop's house, and clergy dwellings with an imaginative system of oversight. This was so comprehensive at the time that it was called the Newtown and was afterwards known as the Basilead. (3) As a theologian and teacher, he showed determination to uphold Nicene doctrine. De Spiritu Sancto and Adversus Eunomium attack Arian doctrines, but his chief contribution in this field was in fact his towering personality and popularity which made him an ideal mediator between East and West. Through his conciliatory influence, together with that of Gregory of Nazianzus and Gregory of Nyssa, the confusion over terminology was eventually resolved. Basil's many letters reveal him as a warm pastor who was concerned for the spiritual and physical well-being of his people. He died at fifty, a prematurely old man, worn out by his self-inflicted privations.

BASLE, CONFESSION OF (1534). Published by the city council with a preface by the burgomaster, Adelberg Meyer, and signed by Heinrich Ryhiner, the clerk, it was authored by Oswald Myconius,* but he probably used a draft composed by his predecessor, John Oecolampadius (d.1532). The confession, having not more than 2,500 words, is divided into twelve articles: Concerning God, Man, God's Care for us, Christ, the Church, our Lord's Supper, the use of Excommunication, Government, Faith and Works, the Day of Judgment, Things commanded and not commanded, Against the error of the Anabaptists. The citizens of Basle subscribed to it under oath, and their practice was followed later by the city of Mühlhausen—hence the title Confessio Muhlhusana. From 1534 to 1826 the confession was read each year in Holy Week from the pulpits of the churches of Basle, and until 1872 all ministers had to subscribe to it.

PETER TOON

BASLE, COUNCIL OF (1431-49). Its claim to being the seventeenth ecumenical council is contested by Roman Catholic theologians on the grounds that papal recognition was not given to its decrees and because they consider it did not truly represent the universal church. The council was called by Martin V on the eve of his death and took place during the papacy of Eugenius IV. Presided over by Julian Cesarini,* it was widely representative, including members of the lower and higher clergy. It was well supported by the universities and the European princes. The council inherited the tasks of the previous council at Constance,* i.e., the extirpation of heresy, reform of the church, and the peace of Christendom. There was conflict from the beginning between council and pope. Eugenius IV, apprehensive because of reports on the council, issued a bull (18 December 1431) dissolving the assembly. In reply, the council, supported by Cesarini and influential men including Nicholas of Cusa,* confirmed the decrees of the Council of Constance on the superiority of the general council over the pope. Eugenius, aware that considerable opinion in the church and in Europe was against him, yielded and recognized the legality of the council (15 December 1433). The council then attempted to carry out reforms including the imposition of restrictions on papal legates, decrees on the nominations of cardinals, and other matters affecting the Curia.

Angered by these interferences in what he regarded as his domain, Eugenius denounced the council in 1436 in a memorandum to all Catholic princes. Dissension grew within the council, caused by a revolutionary spirit of defiance and criticism against the papacy. Eugenius was able to utilize this spirit in his efforts to unite the Latin and Greek wings of the church. He called the council to Ferrara to discuss the proposals of Emperor John VII Palaeologus, and the patriarch of Constantinople. The minority of the council, who supported the pope, came to Ferrara, and on 5 July 1439 the union was proclaimed. Those who had remained at Basle deposed Eugenius IV and appointed Amadeus VIII of Savoy as Felix V (the last of the antipopes). The council dragged on for ten more years, moving to Lausanne in 1448; it dissolved on 25 April 1449. Felix V abdicated, and the council recognized Nicholas V. The church had kept its monarchical form. As a result of the council, the individual states became increasingly independent in ecclesiastical affairs. Princes had exploited the quarrels between popes and council and had restricted the intervention of Rome within their states. The church's authority over the temporal domain had been decreased. In dealing with heresy the council had a measure of success. By negotiation and compromise it reached agreement with the moderate wing of the Hussites (Utraquists*). In 1433 the Compactata of Prague was ratified, conceding Communion in both kinds to the laity.

JAMES TAYLOR

BASNAGE, JACQUES (1653-1723). Huguenot scholar. Educated at the Huguenot seminary at Saumur, and at Geneva (under F. Turretin) and Sedan (under P. Jurieu), he was ordained in 1676 but nine years later was forced to flee to the Netherlands when Louis XIV revoked the Edict of Nantes.* He settled in Rotterdam as pastor of the Walloon (French) church there. The Dutch statesman Heinsius (Heyns), impressed with his talents, asked him to become preacher in The Hague, where he could also assist in contacts with the French government; he aided Heinsius in preparing the Peace of Utrecht, and later the Triple Alliance (1717) with France and England. His unceasing attempts to gain toleration for the Huguenots were unsuccessful; despite this, he opposed the last-ditch revolt of the Huguenot Camisards (1702) and counseled obedience to the French monarchy. As a scholar, Basnage wrote several works in church history, especially Histoire de la religion des églises réformées (1690), a skillful rejoinder to Bossuet's derogatory history of the Reformation (1688). DIRK JELLEMA

BASSENDYNE BIBLE. The first edition of the Bible in English published in Scotland. Thomas Bassendyne (d.1577), the king's printer in Edinburgh, was granted a license by the privy council to print it. The NT appeared in 1576, the whole Bible in 1579. The version used was that of the Geneva Bible.*

BATIFFOL, PIERRE (1861-1929). Roman Catholic scholar. Born at Toulouse, he studied at the Seminaire de St. Sulpice under the Abbé Duchesne.* For two years he worked in Rome, collaborating in the publication of Melanges d'Archaeologie et d'Histoire, dealing with papal history. In 1888 he was appointed to teach at the Collège Ste Barbe in Paris, where he worked for the next decade. Afterward he became recteur of L'Institut Catholique de Toulouse. During the time since his residence in Rome he was constantly doing research and writing on Roman Catholic history. He took a strong stand against modernism, but his book on the Eucharist was placed on the Index,* and although he made required corrections he found it necessary to leave Toulouse for Paris. He later took part with Cardinal Mercier at the conversations at Malines,* and in 1928 represented the pope at the International Historical Congress. He died in Paris. W.S. REID

BAUER, BRUNO (1809-1882). German radical scholar. He reacted from his early right-wing Hegelian Christian position to become one of the most negative NT and theological critics of his day. Deprived of his license as a university teacher in 1842 (he had taught at Berlin and Bonn), he retired from the academic theological world, and through engaging in politics became known as the "Hermit of Rixdorf." His bitterness against "the theologians" influenced his criticism. Against D.F. Strauss's view that the gospels came out of the mythopoeic imagination of the community, Bauer argued that they were creations of individual artists, Mark's gospel being the source. He came to believe that there never was a historical Jesus, and that Christianity originated from Greco-Roman civilization in the second century A.D., when all the NT writings were composed. He thought too that Christianity was "the misfortune of the world" standing in the way of free full humanity. Neglected by theologians of his day, Bauer has received more attention recently; Schweitzer* believed the value of his questions for gospel criticism outweighed the inadequacy of his own answers. HADDON WILLMER

BAUER, WALTER (1877-1960). German evangelical theologian and lexicographer. Professor at Göttingen (1916-45), he was the author of Rechtglaubigkeit und Ketzerei im ältesten Christentum (1934; ET 1972), which is still provoking fruitful discussion, though its thesis is not universally accepted. In contrast with the traditional view that heresy was a departure from an already existing orthodoxy, Bauer suggested that what later became known as heresies were at first widely held forms of Christianity, and that orthodoxy was the outcome of the centralizing orderly influence of Rome overcoming various less coordinated but not necessarily less legitimate types of Christianity. Bauer was responsible also for the Griechischdeutsches Wörterbuch zu den Schriften des NT und der übrigen urchristlichen Literatur, a definitive NT lexicon which was the basis of the English Greek-English lexicon ... edited by W.F. Arndt and F.W. Gingrich (1957).

HADDON WILLMER

BAUR, FERDINAND CHRISTIAN (1762-1860). Leader of the "Tübingen School"* of German radical biblical criticism. Almost his entire career was spent at the University of Tübingen. His vast writings centered on NT criticism, church history, and historical theology. Among them was his Paul the Apostle of Jesus Christ (2 vols., 1845; ET 1875), in which he argued that of the epistles attributed to Paul, only Romans, Galatians, and 1 and 2 Corinthians were genuine. He reached this conclusion on the basis of a hypothesis which posited a fundamental conflict in the early church between the Jewish party led by Peter and the Hellenist party led by Paul. The four "authentic" letters are regarded as genuine because of their anti-Judaizing tendencies (their rejection of the law, circumcision, etc.) and their wider conception of God. The remaining letters are regarded as late and inauthentic because they do not reflect these tendencies, but exhibit others which Baur placed in a later period. The gospels were all late, John being placed in the second half of the second century.

It has often been claimed that Baur's biblical criticism was the result of the application of the Hegelian dialectic of thesis, antithesis, and synthesis in history (the thesis being primitive Jewish Christianity, the antithesis Hellenistic Christianity, and the synthesis the catholicism of the early church). Examination of his writings does not bear this out. This dialectic was not even characteristic of Baur's philosophy. The decisive factor in Baur's approach was not a preconceived philosophy, but his tendency criticism which anticipated a good deal of contemporary redaction criticism. It may be faulted, however, for seeing tendencies where there were none, and mistaking others. Baur pioneered an anti-theistic, nonsupernatural approach to history and Christian origins. In common with Hegel he insisted that history could not be understood without philosophical speculation and that the proper way to understand it was to see it as the forward movement of the Spirit in temporal and particular forms. But his interpretation of NT theology had much in common with Schleiermacher* also. It saw Christianity as an expression of human self-consciousness and Jesus as the mediator of a higher religious and moral awareness.

BAVINCK, J.H. (1895-1964). Dutch Calvinist writer. Educated at the Free University and at Erlangen, he was early attracted by the field of religious psychology. In 1921 he went to the Dutch East Indies and, apart from a pastorate in the Netherlands (1926-29), spent the next two decades there, increasingly involved in mission work and writing extensively. In 1939 he became professor of missions at Kampen and at the Free University; worked in the anti-Nazi underground during World War II; and thereafter resumed his teaching and writing career. He founded the Calvinist (Gereformeerde Kerk) center for missions at Baarn. His best-known work is Inleiding in de Zendingswetenschap (1954), translated as An Introduction to the Science of Missions (1960). Other writings deal with religious consciousness, mysticism, and related topics. DIRK JELLEMA

BAXTER, RICHARD (1615-1691). Puritan divine. Born in Rowton, Shropshire, he attended the free school at Wroxeter, but attained his education largely through self-instruction, private study, and introspection. In his late teens he was in London under the tutelage of Sir Henry Herbert, Master of Revels. Baxter left London, displeased with the quality of life. He then came under the influence of two Nonconformists, Joseph Symonde and Walter Craddock. By 1638 he was ordained by the bishop of Worcester, and the following year was nominated to the mastership of the Free Grammar School at Bridgnorth. The Et Cetera Oath (1640) brought about his rejection of episcopal polity. From 1641 to 1660 he served a parish in Kidderminster where his Latitudinarian* views became more evident as he tried to put them in practice in working with his parish and the other clergy in the area.

During the Civil War his sympathies were basically with the Parliamentarians, but he came to oppose the Solemn League and Covenant* and some of Cromwell's aims. He sought also to curb the views of sectarians and republicans. By 1647 he left the army and returned to Rouse Lench, where he wrote The Saints' Everlasting Rest (1650). He welcomed the Restoration and was made chaplain to Charles II and offered the bishopric of Bedford, which he rejected. At the Savoy Conference* (1661) he presented a revision of the Book of Common Prayer for Nonconformists and served as their leader. In 1662 the Act of Uniformity deprived him of an ecclesiastical living, but the wealth, position, and love of the bride he took that year sustained him until her death in 1681. Although excluded from the Church of England, Baxter continued to preach and was imprisoned as a result in 1685 and 1686. He took part in the overthrow of James II and welcomed the Toleration Act of William and Mary. His many other works include The Reformed Pastor (1656) and Reliquiae Baxterianae (1696).

BAYLE, PIERRE (1647-1706). French writer. Son of a Reformed minister, he became an educator, teaching first at the Huguenot Academy of Sedan and then, when that institution was closed (1681), at Rotterdam. In 1682 he published a work on comets that indicated religion and morality were not related. In later books he advocated universal toleration and a conciliatory attitude toward the French government (even after the revocation of the Edict of Nantes*). These ideas antagonized important French Protestant leaders such as Pierre Jurieu,* who supported the school where Bayle taught, and led to his dismissal (1693). Thereafter he devoted himself to his Dictionnaire historique et critique (1695-97; rev. ed., 1702). This encyclopedic work contains many notes informed by Bayle's skeptical philosophy which made the work popular during the eighteenth-century Age of Enlightenment.*

ROBERT G. CLOUSE

BAYLY, LEWIS (1565-1631). Bishop of Bangor. Native of Wales and educated at Oxford, he graduated D.D. in 1613. His series of sermons while vicar of Evesham became the basis of his famous book, The Practice of Piety, a devotional handbook used in many Puritan households. The date of the first edition is unknown, but the third appeared in 1613, and the fifty-ninth in 1735. It was translated into many languages, including an edition for some American Indians. Despite his outspoken Puritan views, Bayly became a chaplain to Prince Henry. A period of disfavor after the latter's death ended in 1616 when he was appointed first chaplain to the king, then bishop of Bangor. He was imprisoned briefly in 1621 for opposition to royal policy. He resided in his see and spoke Welsh, both of which were unusual for Welsh bishops at the time. But his own conduct was not above suspicion, and many charges were brought against him later in life. JOHN TILLER

BAY PSALM BOOK. The earliest book known to have been printed in English in the British North American colonies. Compiled by John Eliot,* Richard Mather, and Thomas Weld, and printed by Stephen Day at Cambridge, Massachusetts in 1640, it was intended to give a more literal translation of the Hebrew Psalms than that of the King James Version, and yet be suitable for congregational singing. The Whole Book of Psalmes Faithfully Translated into English Metre became the approved hymnal of the Massachusetts Bay Colony and was popular in other colonies and in Britain.

BEACH, HARLAN PAGE (1854-1933). Congregational missionary and professor of missions. Born in New Jersey, he graduated from Yale (1878) and Andover Theological Seminary (1883). Sent by the American Board of Foreign Missions to Tung Chou, China in 1883, he returned to the USA in 1890 because of his wife's poor health. During his term in China he developed a system of shorthand for the Mandarin language. He served successively as home representative for the American Board; pastor of Lowrie Hill Congregational Church, Minneapolis; superintendent for the School for Christian Workers, Springfield, Massachusetts; educational secretary of the Student Volunteer Movement*; and finally professor of the theory and practice of missions at Yale (1906-21) and Drew Seminary (1921-28). His most important works concerned missions, such as the World Missionary Atlas (1925).

BEADLE. Sometimes called the church officer, the beadle has been for four centuries one of the most distinctive personalities in the life and lore of the Scottish churches. "Minister's man," custodian of the church buildings, guide, philosopher and friend to old and young alike, he has figured in more anecdotes and been etched by more pens than anyone except the minister himself.

BEARDS. These have been generally characteristic of the Caucasian races. In the Orient in particular it was a sign of male dignity. In the OT the cutting of the corners of the beard was forbidden (Lev. 19:27), and the removal of the beard was a disgrace (2 Sam. 10:4,5). This led in later Judaism to religious prescription for the beard. Since Roman times there have been many arbitrary switches of beard fashions in society in general, from no beards to beards in a multiplicity of styles. For example, rulers such as Louis XIII, Francis I, and Henry VIII were notable trendsetters. These variations in fashion without any other significance were largely reflected in church custom. The painter James Ward (1769-1859), however, gave eighteen scriptural reasons "why man was bound to grow a beard unless he was indifferent as to offending the Creator and good taste," in his Defence of the Beard. In 1860, "Theologos" produced a book entitled Shaving a breach of the Sabbath and a hindrance to the spread of the Gospel. HOWARD SAINSBURY

BEATIFICATION. The papal decree permitting the public ecclesiastical veneration of a faithful Catholic after his death. This veneration is limited to a particular locality and is not binding on the whole church. It is unlawful to pay to the person known as the Blessed (Beatified) public reverence outside of the place for which permission is granted. Up to the seventeenth century the public service of beatification was performed by the bishops in their local churches. Unlike decrees of canonization, those of beatification are not regarded as infallible: they only grant permission and do not give commands. Also, the cultus permitted by beatification is restricted to a determined province, city, or religious order.

S. TOON

BEATIFIC VISION. In heaven the just see God by direct intuition, clearly and distinctly. Knowledge so gained is called a vision because it is immediate and direct in contrast with the knowledge of God, which is attained in this life indirectly in creation. The primary object of the Beatific Vision is God as He is. In beholding God face to face the intelligence finds perfect happiness. To enable it to see God, the intellect of the blessed is supernaturally perfected by the light of glory. According to Roman Catholic theology, the Beatific Vision is the ultimate destiny of the redeemed. It is believed by some theologians that this vision is bestowed in exceptional circumstances for brief periods in this life. For example, Thomas Aquinas held that it was granted to Moses (Exod. 34:28-35) and to Paul (2 Cor. 12:2-4).

S. TOON

BEATON, DAVID (1494-1546). Archbishop of St. Andrews and later cardinal. After attending St. Andrews and Glasgow universities, he probably graduated from the latter before pursuing his studies for some years at Paris and Orléans. By 1525, through the influence of his uncle James Beaton, archbishop of St. Andrews, he sat in Parliament as abbot of Arbroath. Sent as emissary to Francis, king of France, in 1533, he made such an impression that in 1537 Francis had him consecrated bishop of Mirepoix in Languedoc. One month later Beaton was made cardinal. In 1539 he succeeded his uncle at St. Andrews, and became also lord high chancellor in 1540. His French connections contributed to his dislike of the English seen in his political policies. Beaton had the Scottish Reformer George Wishart* burnt at the stake in 1545, but was himself assassinated in St. Andrews the following year.

J.D. DOUGLAS

BEATUS (d.798). Spanish presbyter, abbot of the Benedictine monastery of St. Martin's at Liébana, near Santander, diocese of León, and counselor of Queen Adosinda of León. Expecting the sixth age of the world to end in 800, he compiled, largely from earlier writers from Irenaeus to Isidore, a Commentary on the Apocalypse, in three recensions (776, 784, 786). This catena gathers up the Western tradition of Apocalyptic commentary, and in particular preserves much of Tyconius's* lost work and possibly unknown sections of Apringius's (mid-sixth-century bishop of Beja in S Portugal). The richly illustrated MSS of Beatus's Commentary, ranging from the ninth to the thirteenth centuries, are of major significance for medieval Spanish art. Beatus opposed the Adoptianist* Christology of Elipandus, and with his disciple and fellowmonk Etherius, bishop of Osma, wrote in 785 Against Elipandus. He was also a hymnwriter. D.F. WRIGHT

BEAUFORT, HENRY (c.1375-1447). Bishop of Winchester and cardinal. Born at Beaufort, Anjou, France, the illegitimate son of John of Gaunt and Catherine Swynford, he received rapid ecclesiastical preferment, and became bishop of Lincoln in 1398, and of Winchester in 1404. Under Henry V he became chancellor, and loans from his large fortune financed Henry's military expeditions. At the Council of Constance* in 1417 he was largely responsible for the election of Martin V as pope, but was prevented by the king from accepting the pope's offer of a cardinal's hat. As a guardian of the infant Henry VI and as chancellor, Beaufort virtually ruled the realm, but over the next twenty years he was involved in continual conflict with the duke of Gloucester. He became cardinal in 1426. JOYCE HORN

BEAUFORT, MARGARET (1443-1509). English patroness of learning. Countess of Richmond and Derby, she was born at Bletsoe, daughter of the duke of Somerset, and was married four times. She helped Henry VII gain the throne and arranged his marriage. Guided by her confessor, John Fisher, she founded the Lady Margaret professorships of divinity in Oxford (1502) and Cambridge (1503), a preachership at Cambridge, and Christ's and St. John's Colleges, Cambridge.

BECK, JOHANN TOBIAS (1804-1878). German theologian. Ordained in 1827, he taught systematic theology at Basle (1836-43), then in Tübingen where he gradually won considerable influence in an alien Hegelian atmosphere. He was a great Christian personality, developing the biblicism of J.A. Bengel.* Free from a mechanical view of biblical inspiration, he saw the Bible as the history of the work of the Spirit progressing toward the salvation of man, and the revelation of the kingdom of God as a supernatural reality in history, shared wherever men gave themselves to practical discipleship. He incurred the hostility of confessional Lutherans for his view that in justification man was made as well as reckoned righteous. In many ways he stood in the Pietist tradition, though freely critical of some of its organizations. HADDON WILLMER

BECKET, THOMAS (c.1118-1170). Archbishop of Canterbury from 1162. Born of a well-to-do Norman family in London and educated in England and France, he received in 1141 a position in the court of Archbishop Theobald of Canterbury and was sent to university for legal training. After serving for a time as archdeacon of Canterbury, he became chancellor to Henry II. The king and his minister became good friends and spent their time, not only in government work, but also in drinking and carousing. When Theobald died in 1162, Henry appointed Thomas archbishop of Canterbury. Since at the time Becket was still in minor orders, it was necessary to ordain him priest and consecrate him bishop on the same day. As primate of England, Becket was transformed from a stalwart supporter of royal policy to an ardent champion of the church. He resigned his position with the king's government because he considered it a conflict of interest and adopted a pious lifestyle. Henry was disgusted and angry with this turn of events and so in addition to the conflict between the ecclesiastical and royal interests there was a showdown between two forceful personalities.

Henry wished to recover the royal authority over the church which had been lost during the reign of Stephen, his predecessor. The immediate occasion for conflict was the king's efforts to prosecute in royal courts clergymen already tried and convicted in church courts, in order to sentence them to harsher penalties. Thomas refused to allow this on the grounds that it was double jeopardy. In response, Henry issued the Constitutions of Clarendon* which declared that the king, not the pope, was to have authority over the English Church and that he recognized the pope's authority only in a nominal way. Thomas agreed at first to these ideas, but then recanted and fled to the Continent. There he persuaded the pope to condemn many of the Constitutions of Clarendon as uncanonical and to excommunicate churchmen who followed them.

Becket returned to England, and in 1170 was murdered by four overzealous knights who carried out the king's wish, indiscreetly murmured, that someone would rid him of the archbishop. All Europe was outraged at Becket's martyrdom and Henry was forced to do penance at Avranches, France (1172) for the act. The king also found it necessary to allow the exercise of church powers that Thomas had insisted upon. Although canonized by the Roman Catholic Church in 1173, historians have debated as to whether Becket should be characterized as a saint, traitor, fanatic, or politician.

BECON, THOMAS (c.1512-1567). English Reformer. Born in Norfolk and educated at Cambridge, he became vicar of Brenzet in Kent and of St. Stephen's, Walbrook, and subsequently chaplain to Cranmer* and Protector Somerset. On the death of Edward VI (1553) he was committed to the Tower of London, but was released soon afterward due, according to Foxe, to mistaken identity. He fled with Bishop Ponet to Strasbourg, and later moved on to Frankfurt and Marburg. On the accession of Elizabeth he became a canon of Canterbury and held various benefices. His writings extended to three volumes in the Parker Society series (ed. J. Ayre, 1843-44), and he may have contributed "The Homily against Adultery" to the Book of Homilies. Becon, who had studied under Latimer,* was not perhaps the most original thinker of his time, but he was a vigorous writer, popular, and knew how to express his views. He influenced Cranmer over the Black Rubric.

G.E. DUFFIELD

BEDE (Baeda) (c.673-735). Monk of Jarrow and "the Father of English history." Born at Monkton on Tyne, County Durham, he was taken at the age of seven to the newly founded monastery of Wearmouth a few miles away, moving almost at once to become one of the first members of the community at Jarrow, near his birthplace. He spent the whole of the rest of his life there, never traveling outside Northumbria so far as is known, and yet he became one of the most learned men in Europe. The scholarship and culture of Italy had been brought to England by Theodore of Tarsus,* who was archbishop of Canterbury in the early years of Bede's life, and it was introduced into Wearmouth and Jarrow by Benedict Biscop.* Here it coalesced with the simpler traditions of devotion and evangelism which came from the Celtic Church.* This caused Northumbria to be a beacon of Christian learning while darkness was gathering on the Continent, and Bede was the foremost example and promoter of that learning.

He grew up at Jarrow under Ceolfrith, from whom he learned the love of scholarship and personal devotion and discipline. When an epidemic swept the monastery, only Ceolfrith and Bede were left, and he records how they managed to maintain the regular divine worship. He was made deacon at the age of nineteen and priest at thirty by John of Beverley, bishop of Hexham. He learned Latin, Greek, and Hebrew. He had a good knowledge of classical authors, which often had to be acquired from books of extracts or quotations in other people's writings. He was familiar with the works of Ambrose, Jerome, Augustine, and Gregory the Great, and he knew something of Anglo-Saxon poetry.

Bede's writings cover a wide range, including natural history, chronology, biblical translation, and exposition. Most important was his Historia Ecclesiastica Gentis Anglorum ("Church History of the English People"). He is described as "the Father of English history" partly because he was the first to try to write any kind of history of England at all, for he sets the story of the church in the general history of the nation. But this title is also due to him because of his methodology. His thorough scholarship is known, for example, by his asking friends to search the archives of the Roman Church and bring him copies of documents which he needed to see. He also had copies made of epitaphs. Where there was nothing in writing he tried to consult the best available oral tradition. He was not always critical, but his work is nonetheless invaluable and his stories are told with great charm. The account of his finishing his translation of John's gospel before his death is deservedly famous. His fame continued after his death, when he began to be known as "the Venerable Bede." His bones were removed to Durham to the coffin of Cuthbert, and in 1370 placed in a special tomb in the cathedral.

BEECHER, HENRY WARD (1813-1887). American Congregational minister. Son of Lyman Beecher,* he was born in Litchfield, Connecticut, and graduated from Amherst College and Lane Theological Seminary, Cincinnati, of which his father was president. He was refused ordination by the Old School Miami (Ohio) Presbytery and was ordained by the New School Presbytery of Cincinnati in 1838. After two Indiana Presbyterian frontier charges he was pastor of the Plymouth Church of Brooklyn (Congregational) from 1847 to 1887. He became world famous as a dramatic and witty preacher, and he was also a political activist and reformer. Theologically he departed from Calvinism and radically reinterpreted the Bible in moralistic terms, laying great stress on God's love. His disbelief in a literal hell and his acceptance of the evolutionary hypothesis brought criticism, but none so great as an unproven adultery charge which overshadowed his later years. His works include The Plymouth Pulpit (10 vols.) and Yale Lectures on Preaching (1872-74). He was founder and for over ten years editor of the Christian Union, later The Outlook.
ROBERT C. NEWMAN

BEECHER, LYMAN (1775-1863). American minister and educator. Born in New Haven, he graduated from Yale in 1797, was ordained two years later, and was pastor first of the East Hampton Presbyterian Church, New York (1799-1810), then of Congregational churches at Litchfield, Connecticut (1810-26), and Hanover Street, Boston (1826-32). He then became president and professor of theology at Lane Theological Seminary, which post he combined until 1842 with the pastorate of Cincinnati's Second Presbyterian Church. He retired from Lane in 1852. Liberal in theology, he rejected Unitarianism, rigid Calvinism, and Roman Catholicism, and was an active foe of intemperance, slavery, and dueling. While his moderate Calvinism had made the going hard in New England, it was not strong enough for Ohio, where his allegedly heretical views led to arraignment but acquittal before presbytery and synod. A founder of the American Bible Society, he was an eloquent preacher with revivalistic emphases that brought conversions. He was said to have been "the father of more brains than any other man in America" (among his thirteen children were Henry Ward Beecher* and Harriet Beecher Stowe*). J.D. DOUGLAS

BEETHOVEN, LUDWIG VAN (1770-1827). German composer. His extraordinary gifts were early recognized by Neefe, the cathedral organist in Bonn, who permitted the boy to deputize at the organ, guided his early efforts at composition, and introduced him to some of Bach's* music. In early manhood Beethoven moved to Vienna, where he soon attained fame as a pianist and composer. Before he was thirty he started losing his hearing, but he persevered to become one of the greatest instrumental composers of the nineteenth century. While he cannot be classed as a church composer, he wrote some very outstanding sacred compositions: six sacred songs to texts by the Christian poet Gellert; an oratorio, Christ on the Mount of Olives, from which the "Hallelujah" chorus is often performed; the Mass in C, a fine example of the classical symphonic Mass; and the Missa solemnis, one of the most monumental choral works of all time. J.B. MAC MILLAN

BÉGUINES; BÉGHARDS. Béguines were members of sisterhoods founded in the Netherlands in the twelfth century. Without common rule or hierarchy, free to hold private property, and with leave to marry, they lived austerely without vows, save chastity, and they emphasized manual work. Béghards were their male counterparts—usually weavers, dyers, or fullers—who held no private property and had a common fund. Their names might be derived from Lambert le Bègue ("the Stammerer"; d.1177), a revivalist preacher at Liége. Mainly Netherlandish, there were communities in Germany and France (Louis IX founded a béguinage in Paris in 1264). Called extra-regulars as they were neither lay nor monastic, they served the sick and indigent together with their contemplation. Both groups were long suspected of heresy, chiefly because of their association with the Spiritual Franciscans, and were condemned by the Council of Vienne* (1311). Many Béghards reformed and were permitted to carry on (by John XXII) and survived until the French Revolution. The Béguines were long persecuted, being little more than charitable institutions from the fifteenth century. They became rehabilitated in Belgium, even to establishing closer relations with approved orders and adopting the Austin rule. Some still exist in the Low Countries, notably in Bruges and Ghent. C.G. THORNE, JR.

BEISSEL, JOHN KONRAD (1690-1768). Mystic and founder of the Ephrata Society.* Born in Eberbach (Palatinate), Germany, he was educated at the University of Halle, early adopted the views of the Dunkards, and because of religious persecution emigrated to America in 1720. He settled in Pennsylvania where he came under the influence of the Seventh-Day Baptists. Highly respected for his piety, he soon gathered a following which he rebaptized, constituting the Ephrata Society. Members changed their names, and Beissel was given the name Gottrecht Friedsam ("godly and peaceable"). Several of his hymns were published by Benjamin Franklin. After Beissel's death the Ephrata Society gradually declined. DONALD M. LAKE

BELGIC CONFESSION (Confessio Belgica). A major Calvinist creed, one of the three standards used in the Dutch Reformed Church and its offshoots (the two others are the Heidelberg Catechism and the Canons of Dort). It was written primarily by Guido de Bres* (Guy de Bray) in 1561; at the time, de Bres was a hunted man in his late thirties, preaching illegally as the Lowlands neared revolt against Spanish rule. Modifications in detail were made by Adrian de Saravia, H. Modetus, G. Wingen, and F. Junius. The confession was written by de Bres in French, but was immediately translated into Dutch, and soon into German (1566). Received enthusiastically by the Calvinist churches of the Lowlands, it was adopted by a synod at Antwerp (1566), by synods at Dort (1574) and Middelburg (1581), and finally by the national synod of the Netherlands (northern Lowlands) after independence from Spain had been gained, in 1619. It draws heavily on the 1559 Gallic Confession,* written for the Huguenot churches by Calvin and by Antoine de la Roche Chandieu. DIRK JELLEMA

BELL, GEORGE KENNEDY ALLEN (1883-1958). Prominent ecumenist and Anglican bishop. Ordained in 1907, he became an Oxford don in 1910 and chaplain to Archbishop R.T. Davidson* in 1914. He was at Lambeth during World War I and the reconstruction afterward. In particular he was involved in the early stages of the ecumenical movement and in the 1920 Lambeth Conference.* He was later Davidson's biographer. In 1924 he became dean of Canterbury, and in 1929 bishop of Chichester, where he remained until his retirement only a few months before his death. He was secretary of the 1930 Lambeth Conference and a member of the 1948 and 1958 conferences.

His ecumenical concerns date from his time at Lambeth. He was present at the Oud Wassenaar Conference in Holland in 1919, at which Christians from European and other nations involved in the war consulted about peace and reconciliation. This led by several steps to the Life and Work movement which was inaugurated by the Stockholm Conference* of 1925. Bell was one of those who drafted the conference message. In 1932 he became a president of the movement and chairman of its council, and despite his own concern for peace and disarmament thus became involved in the movement's confrontation with Nazi anti-Semitism and with the "German-Christians."* In the course of this he became deeply sympathetic with Martin Niemöller* and Dietrich Bonhoeffer.* After 1939 his understanding of the anti-Hitlerite elements in the German nation made him advocate a more open approach to concluding the war than was possible with the policy of "unconditional surrender," and also to deplore the saturation bombing of German cities in his speeches in the House of Lords. In these he stood alone. He even met Bonhoeffer in Sweden in 1942 to discuss the possibilities of ending the war from within Germany, and he incurred the strong hostility of Churchill. Rumor has credited the latter with blocking Bell's appointment to Canterbury when Temple died in 1944, but it was by no means probable that he would have been appointed in any case.

Bell's continuing ecumenical work helped to lead Life and Work on from the Oxford Conference of 1937 to the World Council of Churches, which was constituted in Amsterdam in 1948. His interest remained in the church and international order. At Evanston in 1954 he was elected an honorary president of the WCC.

His main publications are the four series of Documents on Christian Unity (1924, 1930, 1948, 1958); Randall Davidson (1935); Christianity and World Order (1940); Christian Unity: The Anglican Position (1948); and The Kingship of Christ (1954). His own life is the subject of the definitive biography George Bell, Bishop of Chichester, by R.C.D. Jasper (1967).

COLIN BUCHANAN

BELLAMY, JOSEPH (1719-1790). Congregational clergyman, theologian, and educator. Born in Connecticut, he graduated from Yale in 1735, but took his theological training personally under Jonathan Edwards.* Ordained as pastor of Bethlehem, Connecticut, church in 1740, he traveled extensively throughout Connecticut, Massachusetts, and New York, and preached almost daily during a two-year span. A Calvinist of the Edwardsean school, he taught a universal atonement based on divine moral government like that set forth by the Arminian Hugo Grotius,* and this despite the fact that his two most frequent opponents were Arminians and Antinomians. He is author of more than a dozen major works, the most important of which is his True Religion Delineated (1750).

DONALD M. LAKE

BELLARMINE, ROBERT (1542-1621). Roman Catholic cardinal and theologian. He entered the Jesuit order in 1560 and studied theology at Padua and Louvain. Ordained in 1570, he taught at Louvain for seven years, then for eleven more he lectured on theological controversies at the New Roman College (later the Gregorian University). Here he produced his famous Disputationes de Controversiis Christianae Fidei, which is generally recognized as one of the best statements of Roman Catholic theology as it was defined by the Council of Trent.* In 1589 the pope sent him on an important diplomatic mission to the French court, and in 1592 he took part in the Sistine revision of the Vulgate. In 1597 he became personal theologian to the pope, and in 1608 was involved in a controversy with James I of England over the authority of the Roman Church. Not until 1930 was he canonized and made a Doctor of the Church.

BELLS. A metallic structure assuming the campaniform shape; to be distinguished in musical history from the gong, cymbal, struck tube, or bar. In the East, the bell appears as early as 2500 B.C. Biblical reference may not always meet the campaniform structure (cf. Exod. 28:33-35; Zech. 14: 20). Josephus writes that King Solomon used large bells on the roofs of his dwellings to keep the birds away. Ecclesiastically, the first Christian writer to speak of bells in any significant way is Gregory of Tours about 585. Paulinus, bishop of Nola in Campania about 420, has traditionally been given credit for introducing the bell; however, the historicity of these accounts is debatable and may be an attempt to justify the two Latin words used to denote bells—campana and nola. The famous bell of St. Patrick in Dublin dating from the sixth century still survives, and since the seventh century there is evidence of widespread use of bells in England and the Continent. About the eighth century, the custom and rite of blessing bells with holy water and chrism came to be known as the "baptism of the bells." There seems to be greater justification for attributing the use of bells to functional rather than symbolic reasons. It could summon the congregation for worship or announce some special occasions such as the death of a church member, a special religious holy day, or set times for prayer. Since late medieval times it has been a custom to inscribe bells with a dedicatory statement of significance. Perhaps as a result of the OT association of bells with the high priest (Exod. 28:33-35), gradually certain small bells began to be associated with the eucharistic celebrations in the liturgy of the church. The bells of the carillon are a seventeenth-century French attempt to make musical instruments from the bell. Most of the largest bells in the world are church bells: Notre Dame (1680), 17 tons; "Great Paul" of St. Paul's Cathedral (1716), 16.25 tons; Cathedral (Duomo) of Milan, 15 tons.

BENDER, CARL JACOB (1869-1935). Pioneer missionary in Africa. Born in Germany, he emigrated to America at age twelve. After studying at the German Baptist Seminary in Rochester, New York, he was appointed to the Cameroons in 1899 under the Berlin-based German Baptist Missionary Society and supported by American churches. He served first in Douala, and in 1909 took charge of the Soppo station on Mount Cameroon. Besides establishing a school and missionary rest center, he engaged in evangelistic work in the area, and founded more than two dozen outstations during the next ten years. Since he held American citizenship, the Benders were the only German missionaries permitted to remain in the Cameroons during World War I. When they left in 1919 the work was left entirely in indigenous hands. After pastoring churches in the United States, he returned in 1929 to supervise reconstruction at Soppo, where he died. RICHARD V. PIERARD

BENEDICT IX (d. c.1055). Pope, 1032-45. Perhaps the most discreditable representative of the papacy before it was reformed in the eleventh century. From the powerful Tusculan faction, he reputedly became pope at the age of twelve, and certainly under him the moral tone of the papal court was very low. The Romans, disliking his spiritual deficiencies and even more his political affiliations, expelled him in 1044 and appointed Sylvester III. Benedict returned in the following year, but then abdicated after a money payment. His successor was the much more creditable Gregory VI. In 1046 the reforming emperor, Henry III, deposed Gregory for simony and also (lest they enter their claims again) both Benedict and the antipope Sylvester. Nine months later the new pope, Clement II, was poisoned, perhaps through the agency of Benedict who again became pope, briefly, in 1047 before being finally deposed by Henry. C. PETER WILLIAMS

BENEDICT XI (1240-1304). Pope from October 1303 until July 1304. Born Nicholas Boccasini, he was a Dominican friar, notable theologian, and former master general of his order. Native of the province of Venetia, he had been papal legate at the court of Emperor Albert of Hapsburg. Successor to Boniface VIII, he inherited the results of a long period of avaricious secular policies. The papacy had lost prestige and power after the struggle between Boniface and Philip the Fair of France, and Benedict tried to rectify matters. He attempted to reconcile factions in wealthy Florence which, with its European revenue, made a profitable ally for the papacy. He absolved the Colonna ex-cardinals and tried to make peace between them and the Gaetani. He acquitted Philip the Fair, but was determined to see justice done for the outrage at Anagni. William de Nogaret (who was Philip's minister), Sciarra Colonna, and others were therefore accused of criminal attack on Boniface VIII, and summoned to appear for judgment and sentence, but Benedict died at Perugia before judgment was made. He was beatified in 1736. JAMES TAYLOR

BENEDICT XII (1285-1342). Pope from 1334. Born Jacques Fournier, he was a distinguished theologian who became master of the University of Paris, and as a young man entered the Cistercian Abbey of Boulbonne. He was eventually created cardinal and, until his election as the third Avignon pope, was cardinal-priest of South Priscia. At this time he played a leading part in the controversy caused by John XXII's teaching on the fate of departed souls. He showed great zeal in the pursuit of heretics. Austere in his public and private life, he continued to wear his habit when he became pope.

A conscientious reformer within the church, Benedict required all diocesan bishops and all clergy who had benefices with the care of souls to be sent back from Avignon to their duties. He abolished the granting of abbeys to nonresident abbots; reorganized the office of penitentiary and the administration of papal correspondence; and attempted to reform the religious orders by a series of constitutions (1330-39) aimed at renewing their fervor and strictness. The constitution which he imposed on the Franciscans was not welcomed and was abolished by his successor. Benedict's efforts were openly resisted by the master general of the Dominicans. The radical reforms introduced into the Benedictine Order included the restoration of common life in monasteries and courses of monastic study. Benedict also had little success in his efforts to improve the political scene. Relations between papacy and emperor were not helped by his tendency to ally himself with the policies of Philip VI of France. The electors eventually declared at Rense that the emperor's rights needed no papal confirmation. Benedict's main theological work was the Benedictus Deus (1336) in which he pronounced that the souls of the just who have no sins to expiate will, on dying, experience immediately the Beatific Vision.* He began the building of the Palace of the Popes at Avignon.

BENEDICT XIII (c.1328-1423). Antipope. Born Pedro de Luna, he taught canon law in France and was created cardinal in 1375. Having sided with antipope Clement VII during the Avignonese papacy, he was the first legate to his native Aragon, Castile, Navarre, and Portugal, then in 1393 to France, Flanders, and Scotland. Succeeding Clement in 1394 because of his canonical knowledge and successful Spanish legations, and having promised to return to Rome, he proved unworthy. As a result Charles VI of France denied him his right of provision to major offices and advowson to minor benefices, and other provinces refused him obedience as did cardinals. Imprisoned in the papal palace at Avignon, then seeking refuge in Provence in 1403, he had his obediences restored but his plans for compromise with Boniface IX, Innocent VII, and Gregory XII at Rome failed. Weary of him, France's support waned, and in 1409 the Council of Pisa* declared Gregory and Benedict to have forfeited their pontifical rank. The Council of Constance* confirmed this deposition in 1417. Backed by Aragon, Benedict contested this and, still confident of his proper claim, named four cardinals in 1422. He died at Peniscola, near Valencia, the following year. C.G. THORNE, JR.

BENEDICT XIII (1649-1730). Pope from 1724. Born Pierfrancesco Orsini into a wealthy ducal family, he renounced title and wealth to join a religious order. His promotion in the church was rapid: he became a cardinal at twenty-three, an archbishop at twenty-six. He accepted the pontificate with great reluctance and tried unsuccessfully to reform clerical morals. At the Vatican he refused to live in pomp, choosing modest rooms and living in simplicity. Despite Jansenist* opposition he allowed Dominicans to preach Augustine's doctrine of grace. Though personally saintly, scholarly, and well-intentioned, he showed no aptitude for practical affairs. Administration of the Papal States* was entrusted to the unscrupulous Nicolo Cardinal Coscia, who did great harm to the papacy. R.E.D. CLARK

BENEDICT XIV (1675-1758). Pope from 1740. From an old Bolognese noble family, Prospero Lorenzo Lambertini was educated at the Collegium Clementinum, Rome. Beginning as an assistant lawyer in Rome, he became Consistoral Advocate (1701), Promoter Fidei (1708), assessor of the Congregation of Rites (1712), and secretary of the Congregation of the Council (1718). He was appointed bishop of Ancona in 1727, cardinal in 1728, and archbishop of Bologna in 1731. He was elected pope following a struggle between the moderates and those resisting the takeover of ecclesiastical privileges by secular authorities.

A man of wide outlook, common sense and integrity, he promoted good understanding between the papacy and European rulers. He conceded to the Spanish and Portuguese crowns the right to nominate most benefices, made concordates with Naples and Sardinia, and recognized Frederick the Great as sovereign of Prussia in return for Frederick's acknowledgment of the bishop of Breslau's jurisdiction over Prussian Catholics. He settled controversies concerning Indian and Chinese rites. He issued an encyclical easing the position of Jansenists* in France (1756). Ruling the Papal States* in an enlightened manner, he established free trade, developed agriculture, and reduced taxation. He patronized the arts and learning, founded four academies for historical study, purchased MSS and books for the Vatican library, inaugurated the catalogue of Vatican MSS, and improved the University of Rome. He promulgated a bill restraining hasty and unnecessary prohibitions of books on the Index,* protecting in particular L.A. Muratori when attacked by the Jesuits (see MURATORIAN CANON). He himself was a brilliant canonist, writer, and controversialist. His writings included an important book on canonization, De servorum Dei beatificatione et beatorum canonizatione (1734-38), and a treatise on the Sacrifice of the Mass (1748). His conciliatory policy was interpreted as weakness by some anticlericals, but he was the outstanding pope in a period when papal authority was in decline. J.G.G. NORMAN

BENEDICT XV (1854-1922). Pope from 1914. Born Giacomo della Chiesa, he became archbishop of Bologna in 1907 and succeeded Pius X shortly after the outbreak of World War I. He consistently urged peace on both the Allies and Central Powers, especially in the encyclical Ad beatissimi (1 November 1914) and in a seven-point peace note to the governments involved (1 August 1917). His policy held the papacy to be above the conflict, the voice of moral authority, and thus frequently condemned what he considered to be violations of morality and right, and he established avenues of Christian charity to locate missing persons, care for the sick and wounded. The Vatican and some agencies were accused, probably falsely, by anticlericals in France and Italy of espionage activities for the Central Powers, while Germans and Austrians called him "the French Pope." Generally his perspective was neo-Thomist, following Leo XIII. He condemned modernism, led a codification of canon law (1917), greatly promoted Catholic missions, worked to establish better relations with the Eastern Orthodox Church. He sought to augment the papal position through establishing diplomatic relations with additional states, increasing the number so represented at the Vatican from fourteen to twenty-six, including Britain. Continuing to resist the Italian-imposed solution of the Roman Question, he maintained the need for clear papal temporal sovereignty, and established secret negotiations between his secretary of state and Benito Mussolini.

BENEDICT BISCOP (c.628-689). Founder of the monasteries of Wearmouth and Jarrow. Of a noble Northumbrian family, he entered the service of King Oswy. He made a number of visits to Rome, the first in 653 with Wilfrid.* In 666 he made his profession as a monk at Lerins. In 669 he was sent from Rome with Theodore of Tarsus* to Canterbury and was for two years abbot of the monastery of St. Peter and St. Paul. On his return from his fourth visit to Rome in 674, he founded the monastery at Wearmouth (Sunderland in County Durham). In 682 he founded the sister monastery at Jarrow. Bede was a novice in his charge at both monasteries. He was responsible for introducing glaziers and other craftsmen to work in the monastic buildings and for bringing the precentor of St. Peter's, Rome, to teach Gregorian chants. The churches in both places still stand with substantial Saxon parts.

BENEDICTINES. Monks living under the Rule of St. Benedict* (of Nursia). The original foundation was at Subiaco, but shortly afterwards Benedict founded twelve monasteries with twelve monks each. It is believed that the third abbot of Monte Cassino began to spread knowledge of the Rule beyond the circle of Benedict's own foundations. The Rule developed by Benedict became the "constitution" for the order. Each monastery was to be economically self-supporting. There is no general or common superior over the whole order other than the pope himself, and the order consists of "congregations," each of which is autonomous, united only by the spiritual bond of allegiance to the same Rule, which may be modified according to the circumstances of each particular congregation. Each monastery was to have an abbot elected for life and other officers elected for limited terms. The vow taken by each monk emphasized perpetuity, poverty, chastity, and especially obedience to the abbot. Those who were admitted were novitiates for one year. Monks were expelled for serious offenses and though a penitent monk might be restored twice, he was permanently expelled for a third offense.

Pope Gregory the Great,* himself a Benedictine, encouraged the movement which gradually spread throughout Western Christendom. Augustine and his forty monks came from the Benedictine monastery of St. Andrew in Rome and established the first English Benedictine monastery at Canterbury soon after their arrival in 597. Various reform movements arose because of the abuses which had crept into the order. The first attempt to confederate the monastic houses of a single kingdom was made in the ninth century by Benedict of Aniane* under the auspices of Charlemagne and Louis the Pious. The most noteworthy reform movements were those of Cluny (910), which by the twelfth century had become a center and head of an order embracing some 314 monasteries in all parts of Europe. The Benedictine Order became noted for its literary achievements, e.g., the works of Bede,* and helped to preserve learning through the Middle Ages. S. TOON

BENEDICTION, see BLESSING

BENEDICT OF ANIANE (c.750-821). Monastic reformer. Born Witiza (Euticius), son of a Visigoth count in Languedoc, he distinguished himself in Charlemagne's wars. A narrow escape from drowning led him to enter the St.-Seine Monastery in Burgundy. He found the Benedictine monasteries in a parlous state. In 779 he established a monastery at Aniane, Languedoc, where he enforced the Benedictine Rule strictly, emphasizing manual labor rather than study, contrary to Charlemagne's wishes. He vigorously opposed the Adoptianism* of Felix of Urgel* (c.795). When Louis the Pious became emperor (814), he made Benedict his ecclesiastical adviser, calling him to found a monastery near Aix-la-Chapelle, the seat of the court. The Council of Aix-la-Chapelle (817), under Benedict's influence, enjoined a rigid uniformity on all monasteries. The reform was, however, short-lived. J.G.G. NORMAN

BENEDICT OF NURSIA (c.480-c.547). Founder of monasteries. Born at Norcia (Nursia) in Umbria, he was early sent to Rome to study. Seemingly, the degenerate life of the city caused him to flee to the country and live in a cave as a hermit at Subiaco. After a brief period in a monastery he returned to Subiaco where he set up twelve small monastic communities. About 529 he was pressured to leave these groups, and so with a small nucleus of men he moved to what is now Monte San Germano (halfway between Rome and Naples) to establish the monastery of Monte Cassino, where he remained until his death. The basis of the monastery was two chapels dedicated to John the Baptist and Martin of Umbria. Making use of previous rules (e.g., those of John Cassian* and Basil of Caesarea*), he composed his own rule. The wide usage of this has ensured his fame and gained for him the title "Patriarch of Western Monasticism." He was buried in the grave of his sister Scholastica in the Chapel of John the Baptist. Our main source of information about him is contained in the Dialogues of Gregory the Great. There are Lives in English by J. McCann (1938) and T.F. Lindsay (1949). PETER TOON

BENEDICTUS. In Luke 1:68-79, Zacharias sings a hymn of praise and thanksgiving at the birth of his son, John the Baptist. In form it is a typical OT Psalm in two parts: the first praises God for the fulfilment of promises which are recounted, the second is addressed to the child in whom these promises will be fulfilled. This psalm is used liturgically in the Roman Catholic Church at Lauds, and in the Church of England in the 1662 Book of Common Prayer in Morning Prayer, where it is known as a Canticle (together with the Te Deum and Benedicite, and the Magnificat and Nunc Dimittis at Evening Prayer).

BENEFICE. The beneficium was the legal term for a grant of land for life as a reward for services rendered. This developed under canon law into an ecclesiastical office under the twofold heading of "spiritualities" (the duties involved) and "temporalities" (the emoluments provided). In the Church of England there are three kinds of parochial benefice: rectories, vicarages, and perpetual curacies. The difference is largely one of who is the recipient of the various tithes between the first two, and of the date of establishment of the benefice between these and the last. In return for his freehold, the holder or incumbent was, before the Pastoral Measure, removable only for grave misconduct or dereliction of duty. G.S.R. COX

BENEFIT OF CLERGY. One sequel to Becket's* politically disastrous murder was Henry II's concession to all English tonsured clergy and nuns of trial for all criminal offenses, except forest offenses, in a church court instead of in a secular court with its heavier punishments (1176). Edward III (1327-77) included certain lay first offenders who could read—usually the "Neck verse" (Ps. 51:1). Many in later medieval England considered benefit of clergy was open to abuse, and the sixteenth-century English Reformation saw its systematic erosion. Major crimes were excepted: guilty clerics could be imprisoned (and under George I [1714-27] transported). In 1827 the privilege was abolished. L. FEEHAN

BENGEL, JOHANN ALBRECHT (1687-1752). Lutheran minister and theologian. Trained at Tübingen, he taught at a seminary in Denkendorf (1713-41), then became superintendent of Herbrechtingen (1741) and Alpirsbach (1749). His chief work was a critical edition of the NT (1734) which became the starting point for modern textual criticism. This work was followed by the Gnomon novi testamenti (1742), a commentary in which he gives a word-by-word explanation of the Greek text in capable fashion. John Wesley* translated most of its notes and incorporated them into Notes Upon the New Testament (1755).

Bengel wrote also several apocalyptic works, among them Erklärte Offenbarung Johannis (1740), in which he tried to fix the number of the beast and set the date of the beginning of the Millennium at 1836. Among evangelical scholars, Bengel's Gnomon is still in use.

ROBERT G. CLOUSE

BENNO (1010-1106). Bishop of Meissen in E Germany. Of noble Saxon birth, he was canon in the imperial collegiate church at Goslar before going to Meissen in 1066. Imprisoned by Henry IV (1075-76) for nonsupport during the Saxon nobles' revolt, and involved in the election of Rudolph of Swabia to replace Henry, he was temporarily removed from his see (1085-88) by imperial prelates. He was called "Apostle of the Wends" for preaching to Slavonic peoples in his diocese. His cult was established in 1285 when his relics were honored in Meissen cathedral. Chronicles record many miracles at his tomb. His canonization (1523) and relics evoked much protest, including Luther's. He is regarded as patron of fishermen and drapers. C.G. THORNE, JR.

BENSON, CLARENCE HERBERT (1879-1954). Presbyterian minister and author. Educated at the University of Minnesota, Macalester College, and Princeton Seminary (1908), he served pastorates in New York, Pennsylvania, and at Union Church, Kobe, Japan (1919-22). In 1922 he became director of the Christian education department of Moody Bible Institute. Between 1925 and 1933 he supervised the development of the All Bible Graded Series of Sunday school lessons, and with Victor Cory founded Scripture Press to publish them (1934). He helped to found what became the Evangelical Teacher Training Association (1930), founded The Church School Promoter, forerunner of Christian Life, and was associate editor of Moody Monthly (1926-41). His most influential books were A Popular History of Christian Education, The Church at Work, and The Sunday School in Action. Benson helped also to found the National Sunday School Association and its Uniform Bible Lesson Series.

HOWARD A. WHALEY

BENSON, EDWARD WHITE (1829-1896). Archbishop of Canterbury from 1882. Born at Birmingham, he studied at King Edward's School and at Trinity, Cambridge. An assistant master at Rugby (1852), he was ordained later and became first headmaster of Wellington College (1859-72). He was consecrated first bishop of Truro (1877), and was appointed to Canterbury partly because of his friendship with W.E. Gladstone.* A zealous churchman, he defended the principle of establishment, vigorously opposing the disestablishment of the Welsh Church (1893). In 1890 he gave an important judgment at the trial of Edward King, bishop of Lincoln, charged with ritual offenses, in which he countenanced High Church usages, e.g., the "eastward position," and use of candles at the Eucharist. J.G.G. NORMAN

BERDYAEV, NIKOLAI (1874-1948). Religious philosopher. Born in Kiev, he was early attracted to Marxism, and although he never repudiated his commitment, he was also a member of the Russian Orthodox Church. He was brought to trial by the church in 1914 for his nonconformist position in religious matters, and was saved from sentencing only by the onset of the Russian Revolution. Like other intellectuals during the early purges, he was expelled from his post as a professor of philosophy at Moscow University, and from the USSR in 1922, He went first to Berlin and then to Paris (1924) where he founded an academy for the study of philosophical problems.

Although not a systematic thinker or philosopher, he was a prolific writer. In more than twenty books and many articles, Berdyaev emphasizes freedom, creativity, and the reality of the transcendent. He is often referred to as a "Christian existentialist" (see EXISTENTIALISM). In his thinking, the truth is a gleam of light which penetrates the objective world from the transcendent realm of the spirit. Man's glory is in his ability to appropriate this order of the spirit and to become creative; man's deterioration comes about through the loss of these capabilities. He was indebted for some of his ideas to Jakob Boehme,* Kant,* Nietzsche,* and Dostoevsky.* Among his books are Freedom and the Spirit (1935), The Destiny of Man (1937), and The Beginning and the End (1952). Though he was not sympathetic to Marxist materialism and denounced Soviet terrorism, he hoped that the true Russian spirit would ultimately emerge in the new state. PAUL M. BECHTEL

BEREANS. Originating in Edinburgh in 1773, they were followers of John Barclay,* who took their name from Acts 17:10,11. When Barclay was inhibited from preaching in Fettercairn, seceders built a chapel to which James Macrea was called as minister. Barclay himself led the Berean assembly in Edinburgh, and another was formed at Crieff, near Barclay's birthplace. During a prolonged visit to England (1776-78) he formed congregations in London and Bristol. He ordained and sent to lead the Bereans in Edinburgh William Nelson, surgeon and Calvinistic Methodist,* who had been trained for the Anglican ministry. On Barclay's return, Nelson was sent to strengthen new Berean churches at Glasgow, Kirkcaldy, Dundee, Arbroath, Montrose, and Brechin. Barclay himself visited his churches extensively and wrote numerous works expounding the distinctive elements in his otherwise Calvinistic theology. After his death the Berean church in Edinburgh flourished for twenty-five years under James Donaldson, originally pastor of the church in London, then in Dundee. When he died, the Berean church in Edinburgh split and, like the other Berean churches, eventually merged with the Congregationalists.

See J. Campbell, The Berean Church—Especially in Edinburgh (1937), offprint from the Proceedings of the Scottish Church History Society.

HAROLD H. ROWDON

BERENGAR OF TOURS (c.1000-1088). French theologian. Student of Fulbert of Chartres, he was canon and director of the cathedral school at Tours (1031) and later archdeacon of Angers (1041). A man of learning and piety, he came (1040-45) to question the eucharistic interpretation of Paschasius* Radbertus (a ninth-century monk who taught transubstantiation). A series of controversies resulted from Berengar's teachings, which prompted the development of the Roman Catholic teaching about the Eucharist. In the course of these arguments Berengar was forced to sign several statements, one even asserting that when a believer partakes of the element he actually masticates the body of Christ. He maintained that one cannot literally eat and drink Christ's body and blood, but that nevertheless by faith the Christian can have real spiritual communion with the flesh, that is, the glorified humanity of Christ in heaven. In his teaching, the elements remain in substance as well as appearance, after the consecration. They are, however, endowed with new value, for whatever is consecrated is lifted to a higher sphere and transformed. Perhaps if Berengar had been willing to die for his convictions he would have won more adherents. As it was, his repeated recantations served to prompt men such as Lanfranc* to articulate in a more detailed manner the teaching of transubstantiation.

See A.J. MacDonald, Berengar and the Reform of Sacramental Doctrine (1930).

ROBERT G. CLOUSE

BERGGRAV, EIVIND (1884-1959). Norwegian Lutheran bishop. Son of a clergyman (who later became a bishop), he studied theology and was ordained in 1908. He was a teacher in various types of schools from 1909, became pastor in a rural parish in 1918, penitentiary chaplain in 1924, bishop of Tromso in 1928, bishop of Oslo 1937-50. Originally influenced by liberal theology, he nevertheless took no part in debates on the subject, and as bishop won the confidence of the majority of active church people. Berggrav was a prolific writer who published about thirty books on various subjects: psychology of religion, philosophy of education, the relation between church and state, devotional works, etc. He wanted to establish a fruitful relationship between the church and contemporary cultural life, and for this purpose he edited from 1909 the magazine Kirke og Kultur. During the German occupation (1940-45) he was the leader of the church in its controversy with the Nazi government. He took a prominent part in the writing of the pastoral letters and declarations which became vital factors in this struggle. From Easter 1942 until the close of the war he was placed in heavily guarded police internment. In 1950 because of poor health he resigned his position as bishop, but remained active. He took a leading part in the ecumenical efforts of this period. From 1950 to 1954 he was one of the presidents of the World Council of Churches.*

CARL FR. WISLOFF

BERKELEY, GEORGE (1685-1753). Irish philosopher. The most brilliant theistic philosopher of his age, he was dean of Derry and later bishop of Cloyne. In an era when the sufficiency of reason, at the expense of revelation, was confidently asserted, he demonstrated that the church could outthink its critics. In his major work, Alciphron (1732), he showed that the problems of the Age of Reason could be solved only through a new understanding of the role of reason. He believed that ideas are the things which really exist. Material things exist only in so far as they are perceived. It is God who is responsible for the existence of ideas; they are not the products of our own minds. Berkeley was also a missionary enthusiast and unsuccessfully proposed a college in Bermuda.

JAMES TAYLOR

BERKHOF, LOUIS (1873-1957). American Calvinist theologian. Born in the Netherlands, he emigrated as a child to the USA, where his family joined the Christian Reformed Church, at that time still small and using the Dutch language. Attracted to the ministry, he attended and graduated from the church's fledgling Calvin Seminary in Grand Rapids, Michigan. He went on to postgraduate work at Princeton and after a brief pastorate was called to teach at Calvin Seminary (1906). There he spent three decades as teacher, and from him almost every Christian Reformed preacher learned systematic theology. During the 1920s he played a leading role in the controversies of the day, including the debates over Herman Hoeksema's "hyper-Calvinism," which led to Hoeksema's formation of the Protestant Reformed Church. Berkhof's main interest was in systematics, and he followed closely the Dutch Calvinist theologians A. Kuyper* and H. Bavinck,* though also influenced by orthodox Calvinist theologians in America such as C. Hodge* and B.B. Warfield.* Berkhof wrote extensively; his major work is his Reformed Dogmatics (3 vols., 1932), which in popularized form (Manual of Reformed Doctrine, 1933) was used extensively in the schools of the Christian Reformed Church. His last book, written at eighty, was The Second Coming of Christ (1953).

DIRK JELLEMA

BERNADETTE (1844-1879). Roman Catholic visionary. Eldest child of a poor miller, surnamed Subirous, of Lourdes, France, she had a series of visions between 11 February and 16 July 1858, in a cave by the river Gave. She believed that the young, beautiful lady who spoke to her in some of the eighteen apparitions was the Virgin Mary, who had the title of "the Immaculate Conception." At first the church authorities disbelieved her, and their distrust was heightened by an epidemic of false visionaries. In 1866 she was admitted to the convent of the Sisters of Charity at Nevers. She suffered from chronic asthma, but her life was seen as holy, and she died at the age of thirty-five. She was beatified by Pius XI in 1925 and canonized in 1933. Lourdes has become one of the greatest centers of pilgrimage in Western Christendom.

PETER TOON

BERNARD, JOHN HENRY (1860-1927). Archbishop of Dublin. Born in India, eldest son of a civil engineer, he was educated at Trinity College, Dublin, proved himself a brilliant scholar, and thereafter lectured at Trinity, where he was provost from 1919 until 1927. An outstanding administrator, he was dean of St. Patrick's Cathedral, Dublin (1902-11), bishop of Ossory, Ferns and Leighlin (1911-15), and archbishop of Dublin from 1915. His scholastic gifts are seen in some twenty books, including a commentary on John's gospel (1928), his popularity as a preacher in his university sermons, and his devotion to the arts in his presidency of the Royal Irish Academy from 1916 to 1921. ADAM LOUGHRIDGE

BERNARD DE MONTFAUCON (1655-1741). French scholar. Born of a noble family in Soulage, he joined the Maurist Benedictines in Toulouse (1676) after a brief period of military service. Having studied Greek, Hebrew, and Syriac at Saint-Germain-des-Prés, Paris, he researched in Italian libraries (1698-1701), and this led to his L'Antiquité expliquée et representée en figures (10 vols., 1719) and Les Monuments de la monarchie francaise (5 vols., 1729-33). He produced excellent editions of Athanasius (3 vols., 1698), Origen's Hexapla (2 vols., 1713) and John Chrysostom (13 vols., 1718-38). His Palaeographia graeca (1708) virtually created the science of paleography. Bibliotheca Bibliothecarum, a manuscripts survey, is perhaps best known. He defended the Benedictine edition of Augustine against Jesuit attacks (1699). The Bernardines, a younger generation of Benedictine students, he influenced heavily. C.G. THORNE, JR.

BERNARDINES, see FEUILLANTS

BERNARDINO OF SIENA (1380-1444). Franciscan friar and reformer. Born of noble parents at Massa di Carrera, where his father was governor, he became a friar in 1402. Thereafter he preached for many years both inside and outside churches throughout Italy. He made use of the monogram IHS* and stressed devotion to the holy name of Jesus. He constantly attacked usury and the party strife of the Italian cities. His attitude toward Jews, however, did not rise above the prejudice of his day. His general example in life and preaching had a beneficial effect on the number of friars and the rigor of their discipline. In 1438 he was elected provincial of the Friars of the Strict Observance. He took part in the Council of Florence* when union with the Greek Church was debated. He died at Aquila in Abruzzi while on a preaching tour; he was canonized by Pope Nicholas in 1450. His works have been printed several times, latterly in 1950, and are composed of sermons and tracts on morals, asceticism, and mysticism.

BERNARD OF CLAIRVAUX (1090-1153). Monastic reformer, mystic, and theologian. Born to a noble family in Fontaines, near Dijon, France, he joined the Cistercian* monastery at Cîteaux about 1111, where he soon was asked to found a new house. In 1115 the young abbot established a monastic community at Clairvaux which shortly became a principal center of the order. A firm believer in strict observance, in 1119 he attacked Cluny for its alleged disciplinary decadence. In 1128 he secured recognition for the order of Knights Templar,* whose rules he drafted himself. In the 1130 papal election controversy he sided with Innocent II; the new pope responded by bestowing privileges upon the Cistercians, and Bernard's influence was further enhanced with the election of Eugenius III, who had been his disciple at Clairvaux, as pope in 1145. He engaged in controversies with Abelard* in 1140 and Gilbert de la Porrée in 1148. He was officially charged with preaching the Second Crusade in 1146-47, and its outcome bitterly disappointed him. He obtained the condemnation of Arnold of Brescia's* reformist doctrines and attacked the heretical teaching of Henry of Lausanne.* He was canonized in 1174 and proclaimed a Doctor of the Church in 1830.

Because of his personality rather than any force of intellect, Bernard was the dominant figure in twelfth-century Latin Christendom, yet he was just as controversial in his day as now. He was both rigidly orthodox and aggressively self-righteous, and deeply pious and ascetic. He was simultaneously a contemplative mystic and an activist man of affairs in the world. In hundreds of sermons and letters and several treatises on theology and liturgy he expressed hostility to rationalism and set forth the value of contemplation and mystical experiences. In his theology he shifted the emphasis from God's judgment to His infinite love and mercy and the hope of redemption for even the worst sinner. As a mystic he stressed a christocentric union, the Word as the spouse of the soul. Because of his deeply felt devotion to the Mother of God, he gave impetus to the heretofore insignificant cult of the Virgin in the West.

A number of hymns are attributed to him, some translated as "Jesus, the very thought of Thee," "O sacred Head now wounded," and "Jesus, Thou joy of loving hearts."

RICHARD V. PIERARD

BERNARD OF CLUNY (fl. 1140). Monk and poet. Little is known of the author of De Contemptu Mundi except that he lived in the famous monastery of Cluny and was possibly of British extraction. His poem of about 3,000 lines, written in dactylic hexameters and beginning Hora novissima, satirizes contemporary monastic corruption and contrasts the transient pleasures of this life with the peace and glory of heaven. He attributed his mastery of the difficult meter to divine inspiration. First found in a thirteenth-century manuscript (now in the Bodleian), extracts from it were translated in ballad metre by Neale* in 1851 and 1858. Stanzas from these form the basis of the hymns "Brief life is here our portion"; "For thee, O dear, dear country"; "Jerusalem the golden"; and "The world is very evil."

BERNE, THESES OF (1528). In November 1527 the Bernese city council resolved to hold a disputation upholding the sole authority of the Word of God in religious affairs. Bishops from Constance, Basle, Lausanne, and Wallis with delegates from all the Swiss cantons were invited. The Zurich council agreed on 7 December, with Zwingli* announcing to Oecolampadius* that all was ready. Delegates from Schaffhausen, St. Gall, and Constance assembled in Zurich on 1 January 1528, setting out with 300 armored men to the borders of Berne. The disputation began on 5 January and lasted until the twenty-sixth. Berthold Haller and Francis Kolb of Berne with Zwingli's aid prepared ten theses for debate, and these were begun with Kolb reading the first thesis: "The Holy Christian Church whose only Head is Christ, is born and nourished out of God's Word and hears not the voice of a stranger."

The daily sessions ended with the Bernese city council abolishing the Mass and church images. Zwingli preached two sermons attacking them; Bullinger recounts that a priest robed for the Mass heard Zwingli and refused to hold it any longer. The Acts were published by Christopher Froschouer on 23 April 1528. The heart of the matter is found in thesis III: "Christ is the one wisdom, justice, redemption and satisfaction for the sins of the entire world: therefore to confess any other ground of salvation or merit for sin is to deny Christ." In spite of Luther's letter to Zwingli of 7 March that nothing had been done, these theses became the vehicle of Bernese entry into Swiss Protestantism. The Reformation came to that Swiss city, as to so many others, in a formal debate. MARVIN W. ANDERSON

BERSIER, EUGENE (1831-1889). Swiss pastor. He was a leader of the schismatic Free Reformed Church between 1855 and 1877, when he persuaded his congregation to rejoin the larger Reformed Church. His theological studies at Geneva, Göttingen, and Halle were followed by a ministry in the Paris churches of Faubourg St. Antoine (1855-61), Taitbout (1861-74), and the Étoile (1874-77). Bersier's published sermons were popular in France and abroad. The Gospel in Paris: Sermons (1884) and a liturgy (1874) used in the Reformed Church both had a wide vogue. He also wrote the authoritative Histoire du synode de 1872 (2 vols., 1872), Coligny, the Earlier Life of the Great Huguenot (1884), and other historical works. ROBERT P. EVANS

BERTHOLD OF REGENSBURG (c.1210-1272). Franciscan preacher. Educated probably at Magdeburg Studienanstalt, he became lector then preacher (1240) in the Franciscan monastery in Regensburg. Thereafter he preached throughout Bavaria, the rest of Germany, Switzerland, Czechoslovakia, and in Hungary (1262-63) where he was later, according to legend, reckoned a saint. In 1263 Urban IV ordered him to preach against heresy. He went through Germany and Switzerland, reaching Paris and meeting Louis IX. Knowing the writings of Augustine, Gregory the Great, and Bernard of Clairvaux, as well as having an interest in natural science, he preached didactic, moral sermons to huge crowds, mostly outdoors. He sought repentance and moral betterment by emphasizing the negative: seven capital sins, violations of the Commandments. Some of his sermons were taken down in Latin by clerics and religious present, and later edited by himself as Sermones de Dominicis, de Sanctis, de Communi, ad Religiosos et quosdam alios, speciales et extravagantes, though not all of these are his. C.G. THORNE, JR.

BÉRULLE, PIERRE DE (1575-1629). French spiritual director and diplomat. Born at Sérilly in the Champagne, educated by Jesuits and at the Sorbonne, he was ordained priest in 1599, and was for a time honorary almoner to Henry IV, becoming well known as a spiritual director. At Paris he founded the French congregation of the Oratorians* (1611). As confidant and counselor of Queen Marie de Médicis and friend of Louis XIII he had profound influence at court. Hoping for the conversion of England, he negotiated with Rome the dispensation required for the marriage of Henrietta Maria with the Anglican Charles I (1625). He was made cardinal in 1627. His spirituality was characterized by devotion to Christ's human personality, so that Urban VIII called him Apostolis Verbi Incarnati. He wrote extensively, his best-known work being Discours de l'état et de la grandeur de Jésus (1623), which was much used by J.B. Bossuet.* J.G.G. NORMAN

BERYLLUS OF BOSTRA (third century). Reputed heretic. Present knowledge of him comes from Eusebius, Jerome, and Origen. Beryllus lived in Bostra of Arabia Petraea (present Sinai, S Jordan and part of NW Arabia). He was considered a heretic because he did not accept the preexistence and independent divinity of Christ; however, he felt that the divinity of the Father was in Christ during His earthly life. Origen, who at the time was also considered heretical by some, was said to have convinced Beryllus that he should change his mind about Christ and recognize His divinity. This took place at a synod meeting in Arabia in 244. GEORGE GIACUMAKIS, JR.

BESANT, ANNIE (1847-1933). British theosophist and educator. Born in London, she was educated by private tutor and at London University. She was married to the vicar of Sibsey, the Rev. Frank Besant, but it ended in divorce after six years. During her spiritual pilgrimage she moved successively from Anglican to atheist to spiritualist and finally to theosophist. Most of her life after 1889 was spent in India, where she established a number of educational institutions, such as the Central Hindu College of Benares (1898) and the University of India (1907), and even rose to the presidency of the National Congress. She proclaimed her adopted son and spiritual mystic Jidder Krishnamurti the new Messiah, a claim which he later repudiated. A prolific writer of major works on Eastern religion, Mrs. Besant became president of the Theosophical Society upon the death of its founder, Mme. Helena P. Blavatsky. Her major works include The Religious Problems of India, The Wisdom of the Upanishads, The Basis of Morality, and India: Bond or Free?

BESSARION, JOHN (Basilius) (1403-1472). Greek theologian. Born in Trebizond and adopted by Metropolitan Dositheus, he studied rhetoric, philosophy, and asceticism at Constantinople. He became a Basilian monk, taking the name Bessarion in 1423, was ordained deacon, and after study with the Neoplatonist George Gemistos Plethos was made abbot of St. Basil's monastery. In preparation for the Council of Ferrara/Florence, he was created archbishop of Nicea (1437) by Emperor John VII Palaeologus, whom he accompanied to the council. He labored for the union of Greek and Latin churches, which gained him unpopularity at Constantinople. Pope Eugenius IV made him cardinal in 1439, and he eventually resided in Italy. He fulfilled important ecclesiastical missions, and in 1463 received the title of Latin patriarch of Constantinople. He presented his library to the senate of Venice, which formed the nucleus of St. Mark's Library. An enthusiastic scholar and patron of learning, he played a crucial part in the development of the Italian Renaissance. J.G.G. NORMAN

BETHEL INSTITUTIONS. From a farmhouse near Bielefeld, Germany, with five epileptic boys, opened in 1867 as the fruit of a revival in Ravensberg, Westphalia, have grown institutions housing over 10,000 people. Besides homes for epileptics, mental patients, tramps, refugees, and youths in need of guidance, there are institutes for deacons and deaconesses, a mission in East Africa, a theological college, and secondary schools. The driving force was Pastor ("Father") Friedrich von Bodelschwingh,* who became director in 1872 and named the institutions "Bethel." The work is part of the Innere Mission.*

BETHLEHEMITES. Obscure hospital and military orders, sometimes under Austin rule. Matthew of Paris attests to such in England in 1257, at Cambridge. There was also the hospital of St. Mary of Bethlehem in London for mental patients (established in 1247), which in 1547 became a royal establishment for the care of lunatics: hence the word "bedlam." Pius II founded a military order, dedicated to the BVM of Bethlehem, for protecting the Aegean after 1453. There were other institutions in Scotland, Italy, and France. Brothers and sisters wore a habit with a red star, much confused with the Bohemian hospital order established in Prague in the thirteenth century. C.G. THORNE, JR.

BEVAN, (EMMA) FRANCES (1827-1909). Hymnwriter. Daughter of P.N. Shuttleworth, the anti-Tractarian bishop of Chichester, Frances was a High Churchwoman until her marriage in 1856 to the Evangelical Anglican, R.C.L. Bevan. He was a banker and came of distinguished Quaker and Low Church stock. Soon afterwards she became associated with Open Brethren. From 1858 onward she published several collections of hymns, mainly paraphrases from the German. Although she ranged widely, she preferred the medieval mystics, the Pietists,* and Tersteegen* (see her Hymns of Ter Steegen, Suso and Others, 2 vols., 1894-97, rep. 1920). Her best-known, but not most characteristic, translation was "Sinners Jesus will receive," from E. Neumeister. She wrote anonymously. JOHN S. ANDREWS

BEYSCHLAG, WILLIBALD (1823-1900). German Evangelical Church leader and publicist. He fought for a broadminded biblical Christianity, much concerned with national questions and living piety. He asked why the return to the traditional confessions had done so little to renew the spiritual life in the church. As a mediating theologian, he rejected both the Chalcedonian Christology and the rationalism of Strauss's* and Renan's* presentations of Jesus. Active as a religious journalist, he also founded the Evangelischen Vereinigung in 1876, an organization for the middle party in the church. He was always concerned about the problem of Roman Catholicism, having met it in aggressive form when in Trier (1850-56); he welcomed the Old Catholics, supported the *Kulturkampf, and in 1886 founded the Evangelischen Bundes zur Wahrung deutsch-protestanten Interessen to counter catholicizing influences within the Evangelical Church. Beyschlag was a strong supporter of the rights of the laity and of the autonomy of the church. In his day he had great power. HADDON WILLMER

BEZA, THEODORE (1519-1605). Calvin's successor in Geneva as the head of Reformed Protestantism. Born at Vezelay, Burgundy, of a lesser noble family, his formal education was made possible by his uncle Nicholas, counselor to the Parlement of Paris. In 1534 he went to Orleans to study law, which licentiateship he received in 1539. He then went to Paris to practice law and there pursued his affinity for the classics. In 1548 he published a book of poems, Poemata Juvenilia, which reflected his interest in classicism and humanism. Later in life he edited these poems, expurgated some, and reissued the volume. While in Paris he was under some pressure from his family to be ordained, but his involvement with Claude Desnoz (whom he had privately married) complicated his situation.

After a severe illness in 1548—a physical as well as a spiritual crisis—he renounced Catholicism, became a Protestant, went to Geneva, and there publicly married Claude. In Lausanne he visited Pierre Viret,* who got him the position of professor of Greek in the academy there. Beza taught and wrote extensively for the next decade. He sided with Calvin against Bolsec* on the doctrine of predestination, and came to Calvin's defense after the death of Servetus* in the pamphlet Haeriticiss a civili Magistratu Puniendus (Concerning Heretics Who Should Be Punished by the Magistrate, 1554). In 1556 he published an annotated Latin translation of the Greek NT. He was to continue this interest in biblical textual problems throughout his life. During 1557 he visited, with Farel,* the Waldensians* and other Protestant groups, hoping to help them gain some security through intercessions of the German princes with the king of France.

Upon the invitation of Calvin, Beza went to Geneva in 1558 as a professor of Greek. In 1559 he was named rector and eventually taught theology in the Genevan Academy.* Earlier Calvin had suggested to Beza that he might complete Marot's translation of the Psalms into French, and in 1561 after translating about a hundred Psalms, they were published. In that same year he represented the French Protestants at the Colloquy of Poissy,* and later supported and advised the Huguenots during the wars of religion in France. He returned to Geneva in 1563, and on the death of Calvin (1564) the full weight of Calvin's responsibility came upon Beza. Beza was the head of the academy, a teacher there, moderator of the Company of Pastors, a powerful influence with the magistrates of Geneva, and the spokesman and defender of the Reformed Protestant position.

Throughout his life he maintained wide interests. In 1565 he published a Greek text of the NT, to which he added the Vulgate and his own translation. This biblical textual interest is further seen in his use of Codex Bezae and Codex Claromantus. He continued to defend the Reformed position as evidenced by his vigorous polemics with Ochino, Castellio, Morel, Ramus, the Zwinglians, Arminius, and others. He continued his activities in the Huguenot movement by serving as an adviser, and in 1571 by presiding over the National Synod of La Rochelle. After the St. Bartholomew's Day massacre* in 1572, he published De Jure Magistratu which argued for the right of the inferior magistrates to revolt against the government. In 1580 he published a history of the Reformed movement in France, and in 1582 he again published a work dealing with textual criticism, his second edition of the Greek NT. His biblical criticism influenced the King James Version of 1611. His works appeared in French, Latin, and English and had a wide and deep impact upon the Reformation movement during the last half of the sixteenth century. His strong defense of double predestination, biblical literalism, church discipline, and other Calvinistic ideas did much to harden the movement, and to begin the period of Reformed Scholasticism.

BIARD, PIERRE (1567?-1622). Jesuit missionary. Born in Grenoble, France, he entered the Jesuit order in 1583. His studies qualified him for a teaching post in theology at Lyons. In 1610 he was commissioned to join the French mission in Acadia, together with Fr. Enemond Masse. Because of difficulties with Huguenot merchants who rigged the ships, Biard did not arrive at the mission post until 1611. His name is intimately connected with Port Royal (Annapolis Royal), Nova Scotia, and with the founding of St. Saveur (Bar Harbour). He was later captured by the English and made a dramatic escape back to France. The famed Jesuit Relations contains his accounts for the year 1616. His writing is of value to students of Indian ethnology. A defense of his somewhat unconventional missionary endeavors, allegedly written around 1620, was apparently never published. He died in Avignon.

BIBLE (ENGLISH VERSIONS). Old English. The oldest surviving Bible versions in English are metrical paraphrases of the history of salvation. It is uncertain if any of these can be ascribed to Caedmon,* the seventh-century poet of Whitby. A ninth-century poem, Cynewulf's Crist, relates the Gospel story; from the following century we have a metrical version of Judith. Aldhelm, first bishop of Sherborne (c.700), is said to have translated the Psalter into English. Bede* of Jarrow was engaged on an English version of the gospels at his death on Ascension Day, 735. Alfred the Great* (d.901) included an English version of the Decalogue and of some other Pentateuchal laws in his national law-code, and is credited with the translation of part of the Psalter. From the tenth century come the English interlinear glosses in the Lindisfarne and Rushworth Gospels; the Wessex Gospels, an independent version, belong to the same period. A little later Aelfric,* abbot of Eynsham, translated parts of the Heptateuch.

Middle English. Versions and paraphrases of the Psalter and most of the NT have come down to us from the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries, but the first complete versions of the English Bible are the two associated with John Wycliffe* and his school. The earlier Wycliffite version—the work of Nicholas of Hereford from Genesis 1:1 to Baruch 3:20 and then of others (possibly including Wycliffe himself)—appeared about 1384. It was a literal rendering of the Latin Bible and may have been conceived as a codification of God's law, replacing traditional canon law. The later Wycliffite version was a thorough revision of the earlier one, couched in idiomatic English. It was produced several years after Wycliffe's death by his secretary John Purvey,* who followed up his revision with a tract commonly called the General Prologue (1395-6), in which he set forth the aims and principles of his work. The Prologue defends the right of the common people to have access to God's law in a form which they can understand, and shows an impressive grasp of the methodology of translation, beginning with the establishment of a sound text (in this case a Latin text) to serve as a basis.

Because of the association of Purvey's version with the proscribed Lollard* movement, it incurred official disapproval. In 1408 the Constitutions of Oxford forbade the production or use of vernacular Scriptures without the permission of the diocesan bishop or a provincial council. But Purvey's work retained its popularity until the beginning of the sixteenth century. About that time a Scottish adaptation of it was produced by Murdoch Nisbet.

Tyndale and his successors. The Bible translation of William Tyndale* (1494/5-1536) was preceded by three crucial events or movements in western Europe—the invention of printing (c.1450), the spread of Greek learning, and the beginning of the Protestant Reformation (1517ff.), one incident in which was the appearance of Luther's German NT (1522), followed by the complete German Bible (1534). Tyndale, who had studied Greek at Cambridge, was ambitious, following Luther's precedent, to give his fellow countrymen the Scriptures in the vernacular, but found it impossible to do so in England. Accordingly, he settled on the Continent, and after an abortive start at Cologne (1525) succeeded in publishing the first printed edition of the English NT at Worms (the "Worms octavo") in February 1526. Not only was it the first printed edition; it was also the first English NT translated directly from Greek. The Greek text used was Erasmus's* third edition (1522). In the following years, while engaging vigorously in theological polemic, Tyndale produced English versions of the Pentateuch, translated from Hebrew (1530; Genesis revised, 1534), Jonah (1531), a second and much improved edition of the NT with an appendix containing translations of the OT "Epistles" (1534), and a third edition (1535). He also appears to have left in manuscript a translation of the OT historical books from Joshua to 2 Chronicles.

Tyndale spent the last seventeen months of his life in captivity, and probably never heard that in October 1535, a year before his death, a complete printed Bible in English, dedicated to Henry VIII, was circulating freely in his native land. This was the edition of Miles Coverdale,* as committed a Lutheran as Tyndale—but the political climate in England had changed radically. This edition was basically Tyndale's, as far as Tyndale's translation had been published; for the rest, Coverdale (who made no claim to scholarship) depended on Latin and German versions. Coverdale's Bible introduced chapter headings and printed the Apocrypha as an appendix to the OT. Two further editions appeared in 1537; the second of these bore on its title page the words "Set forth with the king's most gracious licence," as also in the same year did the version of Thomas Matthew (a pen name concealing the identity of the editor, John Rogers), which included, in addition to Tyndale's published work, his translation of the books from Joshua to 2 Chronicles. "Matthew's Bible"* also contained the first English version of the Prayer of Manasseh.

These versions were superseded by the "Great Bible" of 1539, published by royal authority to be made available in every parish church in England. It was basically Coverdale's revision of Matthew's Bible, and appeared in several successive editions in 1540 and 1541.

Elizabethan versions. The "Geneva Bible"* (1560), produced by the community of Protestant exiles in Geneva during the reign of Mary I (1553-58), was the first English Bible translated throughout from the original text. Preliminary editions of the NT and Psalter were published in 1557, associated with the name of William Whittingham,* one of the team of Geneva translators. In these editions, as in the complete Geneva Bible, verses were printed as separate paragraphs and numbered, and roman type was used, except that words having no direct equivalent in the original text but necessary to give the sense in English were set in italics. The Geneva Bible was dedicated to Elizabeth I, whose accession naturally brought great relief to its sponsors. But the notes and comments with which it was equipped represented a more radical Reformation ideal than the Elizabethan Settlement and were uncongenial to the leaders in church and state. The OT was a thoroughgoing revision of the Great Bible, the language being brought carefully into line with the Hebrew text and even with Hebrew idiom. The NT was a revision of Tyndale's latest edition. The work reflected the best scholarship of the day; not until 1881 did an English version pay such attention in its margins to variant readings.

The Geneva version became the household Bible of English-speaking Protestants. From its inception it was the Bible appointed to be read in churches in Scotland, where the Reformation owed much to the pattern of Geneva. It was the Bible of Shakespeare and of the Pilgrim Fathers; it was the Bible from which excerpts—mainly from the OT!—were made for Cromwell's "Soldier's Pocket Bible" (1643). It was frequently reprinted until the last edition appeared in 1644.

The church leaders in England who found the Geneva Bible unacceptable were compelled to provide an alternative, and in 1568 produced the "Bishops' Bible"—a much better version than the Great Bible which it was designed to replace, but not so good as the Geneva Bible. It did not establish itself in popular esteem and was given no formal recognition by Elizabeth.

In her reign the Bible was translated (from the Latin Vulgate*) into English for the benefit of Roman Catholics. The translator was Gregory Martin, professor in the expatriate English College in Flanders. Although he translated the OT before the New, the NT was published first (at Reims, in 1582); the OT was not published until many years later (at Douai, in 1609-10). This "Douai-Reims"* version in its original form was a highly latinate rendering.

The King James Version. Both the Geneva and Bishops' Bibles were superseded by the "Authorized Version" of 1611, a work which proved so acceptable that it remained for three centuries, without a serious rival, the Bible of English-speaking Protestants. It was the one tangible result of the Hampton Court Conference,* convened by James I of England in 1604 "for the hearing, and for the determining, things pretended to be amiss in the Church." A suggestion by John Rainolds, president of Corpus Christi College, Oxford, that a new translation of the Bible be undertaken, was eagerly seized on by the king, and the work was entrusted to three panels of scholars, some forty-seven translators in all. Formally, it was a revision of the Bishops' Bible (1602 edition); actually the translators drew on the work of all their predecessors and on versions in other languages, with constant reference to the original text. Annotations relating to theological or ecclesiastical controversies were excluded; this greatly facilitated the widespread acceptance of the version. The translators' feeling for prose rhythm made their work admirably suited for reading aloud. When published, it was probably authorized by order in council. Probably—because the Privy Council registers from 1600 to 1613 were destroyed by a fire in January 1618/19, so that no record of the authorization survives.

The Authorized Version set a standard of "Bible English" (going back in essence to Tyndale) which has exercised a profound literary influence. Richard Challoner's* successive revisions of the Douai-Reims Bible (1749-72) brought its style largely into line with the Authorized Version, so that Roman Catholics shared substantially the same "Bible English" as Protestants.

Authorized to Revised. The eighteenth and early nineteenth centuries witnessed a succession of private ventures in Bible translation, especially of the NT. But more important for the history of the English Bible during this period was the progressive study of the NT text, to which substantial contributions were made by Brian Walton* (1654-57), John Mill (1707), Richard Bentley (1717), J.A. Bengel* (1734), J.J. Griesbach* (1774-1806) and J.M.A. Scholz (1830-36). The unsatisfactory character of the text of the early printed editions of the Greek NT (substantially the same as that of the later Byzantine manuscripts), on which the translations of Tyndale and his successors were based, was increasingly appreciated. Karl Lachmann* (1842-50) disregarded the bulk of later manuscripts and concentrated on those of earlier date. The discovery of Codex Aleph (Sinaiticus) in 1844 and the greater accessibility of Codex B (Vaticanus) further stimulated the hope of establishing the primitive NT text (see MANUSCRIPTS OF THE BIBLE). The effects of this stimulus were seen in such private translations as Henry Alford's* NT for English Readers (1869) and J.N. Darby's* (1871), and preeminently in the NT in the "Revised Version" (1881).

The Revised Version was undertaken in consequence of a resolution adopted by the Upper House of the Convocation of the Province of Canterbury in 1870. Two companies of translators, including scholars of various churches, were set up—one for the OT and one for the NT. Despite the cautious rules of procedure, which were weighted in favor of conservatism, the basic text adopted by the NT revisers was largely in line with that of B.F. Westcott* and F.J.A. Hort,* which was published five days before the Revised NT. The Revised OT, on the other hand, was based on the Massoretic text, just as its predecessors had been. The complete Revised Bible appeared in 1885; the Revised Apocrypha followed in 1895. Parallel companies of translators in the USA published their counterpart to the Revised Version, the "American Standard Version," in 1901. (The ASV did not include the Apocrypha.) An updated edition of the ASV, the "New American Standard Bible," was completed in 1971.

While the textual basis of the Revised NT represented a great advance on the Authorized Version, the revision failed to gain wide acceptance. The qualities which made it such an admirable version for the study—its almost pedantic precision, sometimes straining English idiom to the limit in the endeavor to reproduce the minutiae of the original—made it less suitable for liturgical or devotional use.

Twentieth century. From the beginning of the twentieth century a succession of private translations has appeared, many of them aiming at modern, and in some instances colloquial, English. Such were "The Twentieth Century New Testament" (1902); R.F. Weymouth's "New Testament in Modern Speech" (1903); Ferrar Fenton's "Holy Bible in Modern English" (1882-1903), individual to the point of eccentricity; James Moffatt's* "New Translation of the Bible" (1913-28), for many years the most popular of modern versions in Britain; "The Complete Bible: An American Translation," by E.J. Goodspeed* and others (1923-38). Simplified vocabularies were used for "The Bible in Basic English," by S.H. and B.E. Hooke (1940-49), and "The New Testament: A New Translation in Plain English," by C.K. Williams (1952). New versions for Roman Catholics were produced in Britain by R.A. Knox (1945-49), based on the Latin Vulgate, and in America by scholars working under the sponsorship of the Episcopal Confraternity of Christian Doctrine (1941-69). The Jewish Publication Society of America, which produced in "Bible English" in 1917 "The Holy Scriptures according to the Masoretic Text," published in 1963 the first volume ("The Torah") of "A New Translation of the Holy Scriptures according to the Masoretic Text," in contemporary idiom. "The Authentic New Testament" (1955) is the work of an English Jewish scholar, H.J. Schonfield.

The "Revised Standard Version" (NT, 1946; complete Bible, 1952; Apocrypha, 1957) is the latest, and perhaps the last, version of the English Bible in the Tyndale tradition. It is formally a revision of the AV and ASV, carried through by committees of American and Canadian scholars. While it was sponsored by the National Council of Churches in the USA, its intrinsic qualities have won it wide acceptance in other English-speaking countries where it enjoys no such sponsorship, and it would probably be true to say that for the English-speaking world as a whole, the RSV comes nearer than any other version to making the all-purpose provision which the AV made for so many years.

A Catholic edition of the RSV was published in 1965 (NT) and 1966 (complete Bible), but was soon outstripped in popularity by the English edition of the "Jerusalem Bible" (1966). In the USA a thorough revision of the "Confraternity Version" appeared in 1970, with the new title "The New American Bible."

The same year (1970) saw the publication of the complete "New English Bible," the fruit of a project mooted in the general assembly of the Church of Scotland in 1948 and taken up by most of the other non-Roman churches in Great Britain and Ireland. This broke away from the Tyndale tradition and aimed at rendering the original texts into a "timeless" English, "avoiding equally both archaisms and transient modernisms," to quote the general director of the work, C.H. Dodd.* Like the RSV, the NEB is based on an eclectic text in both Testaments, readings being assessed on their merits as they occur.

Other translations which have appeared recently are "The Berkeley Version in Modern English" (1945-59, revised 1969), the work of American evangelicals; J.B. Phillips' "New Testament in Modern English" (1947-58, revised 1972), the best kind of paraphrase; William Barclay's "The New Testament" (1968-69); "Today's English Version" ("The Good News Bible"), translated for the American Bible Society (1966-76); and "The New International Version" (completed 1978), translated by American evangelicals for the New York Bible Society. The "Anchor Bible," an interconfessional translation with commentary, began to appear in 1964 and is to be completed in thirty-eight volumes.

BIBLE CHRISTIANS. A Methodist body stemming from the unauthorized itinerant preaching of William O'Bryan (1778-1868), fervent Methodist preacher in Devon, England. Expelled for his refusal to confine himself to preaching within the circuit, O'Bryan formed a society in Shebbear, N Devon (1815). Aided by men of the caliber of James Thorne (1795-1872) and numerous women preachers, and concentrating on areas devoid of Gospel preaching, the Bible Christians spread not only in the west of England but also in the Isle of Wight, Channel Islands, Kent, and Northumberland. The first conference was held near Launceston (1819), with O'Bryan president and Thorne secretary. O'Bryan's autocracy aroused opposition which led to his withdrawal from the movement (1829-35). The deed enrolled by conference in 1831 made conference, composed of superintendents of districts together with ministerial and lay representatives, the supreme organ of government. Every fifth conference was to be composed of equal numbers of ministers and laymen. District meetings were to be attended by itinerant preachers with one steward, and every fifth year both stewards, from each circuit. Members were to be received by ministers with the approbation of church members.

Bible Christians were sometimes called Quaker Methodists. The influence of Quakerism* is to be seen in the simplicity of style, reliance upon inner illumination, and the importance of the role played by women (in 1823 there were about 100 women preachers in the movement). A missionary society was formed in 1821, but expansion overseas did not begin till 1831 and never reached large proportions. Notable preachers include William Read (1800-1858), the somewhat eccentric William Bailey (1795-1873), and the immortal Billy Bray.* F.W. Bourne (1830-1905), upon whom fell the mantle of James Thorne, became an influential member of the National Free Church Council. He guided the Bible Christians into the United Methodist Church,* formed in 1907 in Great Britain. The Bible Christians then numbered 206 ministers, 1,515 local preachers and 32,202 members, with much smaller numbers overseas. HAROLD H. ROWDON

BIBLE SCHOOLS (AMERICAN). These appeared in the United States after 1880 to restore biblical authority and to fulfill the Great Commission. The Grossner Mission, started by Johannes Grossner in 1842 to train missionary candidates, probably preceded all other institutions. H. Grattan Guinness organized the East London Institute for Home and Foreign Missions in 1872. This work inspired A.B. Simpson to found in New York City the first American Bible school in 1882. The school was moved to Nyack in 1897 as the Missionary Training Institute (now Nyack College). Bible studies and practical training for Christian service were coupled with a disciplined life. Moody Bible Institute began as the Chicago Evangelization Society in 1886 to provide what D.L. Moody* called "gap men," trained to fill the gap between the laity and the ministers. This institute flourished after R.A. Torrey* became superintendent in 1889, and the first building was erected. The school now has about 1,000 day students with night and correspondence schools, radio, science films, and other ministries. Other schools followed these in rapid succession, with the greatest growth coming between 1941 and 1960. There are now over 250 such schools in Canada and the USA. Two-thirds of these are denominational. These schools have a Bible-centered curriculum. They seek to cultivate the spiritual life by developing prayer, faith, and self-denial. All demand some practical work, such as teaching Sunday school, street meetings, or personal witnessing. They, unlike seminaries, accept high school graduates, and, unlike liberal arts colleges, train for lay church vocations and Christian ministries rather than for the professions. Many graduates later attend college, seminary, or graduate school. Large numbers become missionaries. This Bible school movement helped to swell what had been called the "Third Force," those evangelicals loyal to the Scriptures as God's fully inspired Word, and to Christ as Savior and Lord.

BIBLE SOCIETIES. The movement can be traced back to the Pietist movement in Germany with the founding of the Van Canstein Bible Society in 1710. The modern movement began in 1804 with the founding of the British and Foreign Bible Society in London by a group of evangelicals, mostly Anglicans. Its stated aim was "to encourage the wider circulation of the Holy Scriptures, without note or comment." The movement spread quickly to Europe and the British colonies; 1816 saw the origin of the American Bible Society, and by 1819 a Russian Bible Society had produced the NT in a new translation.

A major division occurred in 1825-26 over the question of the Deuterocanonical books (the Apocrypha) which a number of the European societies wished to publish, but which the BFBS felt it should not handle. This led to duplication of organization in a number of European countries. In more recent times this division has been overcome.

By the end of the nineteenth century the BFBS was the center of a worldwide network of agencies and offices. The rapid growth of the American Bible Society resulted in the establishment of rival agencies in many countries, in addition to agencies of the National Bible Society of Scotland and the Netherlands Bible Society.

Then followed the era of constructive reorganization, with the setting up of "joint agencies" primarily responsible to one or other of the major societies. Europe still remained outside the mainstream of development. Following conversations in the late thirties, interrupted by World War II, plans for a closer partnership were discussed; in 1946 at Haywards Heath a conference of the major societies led to the establishment of the United Bible Societies organization. In 1947 Olivier Beguin was appointed general secretary. National societies or offices either are autonomous or are being encouraged to move toward that state; each center aims to draw the widest possible representation of the total Christian community into the Bible cause.

The UBS structure consists of four regional centers (Nairobi, Africa; Mexico City, the Americas; Singapore, Asia; Bassersdorf in Switzerland, Europe). Each of these has a secretariat, including regional consultants on such matters as Bible translation, production, distribution, and office management. Translations consultants serve within each region under a world UBS translations coordinator. Currently over fifty are involved globally in some 800 projects. Similarly, there is a group to coordinate worldwide production of Scriptures. The UBS produced the generally accepted agreed text of the Greek NT and is currently working on OT textual variants.

The UBS Council meets every six years; its general committee meets every three years and takes overall responsibility through an executive committee which meets at least once a year. Financial resources are pooled and shared through a World Service Budget; in 1971 this amounted to almost $7.5 million (of which just over half came from the USA, and close to $1 million from the BFBS). Each society prepares a budget early in the year; it is then considered by the regional secretaries, and finally passed by the executive committee.

Following the launching of the "God's Word for a New Age" campaign in 1963, and the further development, "The Book for New Readers," annual distribution of Scriptures by the Bible societies increased from 54.1 million in 1963 to about 173.4 million (comprised of Bibles, New Testaments, portions—i.e., complete books of the Bible—and selections—short extracts on particular themes). Scriptures are now available in 1,526 languages. Bible society work is conducted on a noncommercial basis, and many Scriptures are heavily subsidized. Normally the selling price of a Bible or NT meets only the bare production cost of a book, leaving nothing for translation, revision, storage, transport, free distribution, and so on.

The UBS publishes The Bible Translator and The Bulletin quarterly, together with a French equivalent to the Bulletin, and a general information document for member societies, with occasional press releases. There is also an annual UBS prayer booklet.

BIBLIANDER, THEODOR (c.1504-1564). Protestant scholar. Born at Bischofzell, he studied at Zurich and then at Basle under C. Pellican, J. Oecolampadius,* and W. Capito.* He taught in Leugnitz (1527-29), then returned to Zurich where he succeeded Zwingli* as professor. An accomplished linguist who called himself homo grammaticus, he was reputed to be master of thirty languages and was one of the most important Swiss biblical exegetes of his day. Many of his works remained in manuscript, but he published a Hebrew grammar (1535), commentaries, and a notorious edition of the Koran (1543) which the magistrates of Basle attempted to ban, until a number of scholars like Luther intervened on Bibliander's behalf. A pioneer advocate of mission to the heathen, he was also a critic of Calvin's doctrine of predestination. His reputation rests on his biblical exegesis and his ministry in Zurich.

BIBLICAL INTERPRETATION. The Bible comes to us from different ages and cultures from our own and in different languages from our own. It is necessary, therefore, that it should be interpreted so each generation of Christians in their own setting may understand its meaning. By the first century A.D. there were a number of different approaches to the interpretation of the OT. Philo* of Alexandria used the method of allegory to bring out of the text of the OT, including what appear to be literal historical narratives, the philosophies of Platonism, Stoicism, and neo-Pythagoreanism.

The Qumran community used the pesher method to suggest that the real meaning of general statements in the OT was to be found in the particular personalities and circumstances of their own sect. The rabbinic school of Shammai was generally literal in its own understanding and harsh in its application, while that of Hillel was more subtle and had a number of rules designed to apply the Law to the contemporary situation. In the postapostolic period similar methods were used in interpreting both Testaments. Origen* in particular emphasized the allegorical approach, believing that all Scripture had a threefold sense, the "body" for the simple, the "soul" for beginners, and the "spirit" for the mature. The school of Antioch was more literal and grammatical in its approach than the Alexandrians*; Jerome and, to some extent, Augustine in the West tended to follow the Antiochene* way.

In the Middle Ages it was fairly generally accepted that there were four senses: literal, allegorical, moral, and anagogical. The approach of Nicholas of Lyra* who laid more stress on a literal and christological interpretation prepared the way for Luther and the Reformers. They denied the supreme authority of the church and believed that by proper grammatical study and comparing Scripture with Scripture the true meaning would be given through the internal testimony of the Holy Spirit. The enormous advance in knowledge of the text, background, and languages of the Bible over the last century or so has helped greatly toward more accurate interpretation, but this has often been nullified by the tendency to read into the Bible modern philosophies which have no place there.

The correct way to understand the Bible involves seeing it as both a collection of human documents and also a unified, divine book. To the first end must be applied all available knowledge about the background, circumstances, intention, and language of the individual writings. It is often of special importance to know what type of literature a biblical book is supposed to be. The meaning of the smaller parts can be discovered by noting the usage of words and phrases. Where there is apparent symbolism, we must ask whether that is in addition to or instead of a literal meaning. It must then be remembered that the biblical canon has been defined because its constituent parts provide a unified witness to the saving purposes of God, particularly as they are centered in his actions in Christ. This means that not only do many OT passages provide a background to the NT, but also the principles which they are setting forth find their fullest meaning in what God was to do later through Christ. This is the way in which the OT is interpreted in the NT, and it should be the pattern for us. There is no one, cast-iron hermeneutical system into which the meaning of the Bible can be forced for all time. Each generation and each culture must seek, using the wisdom of Christians throughout the ages and depending upon the guidance of the Holy Spirit, to find as fully as possible for itself the meaning of the faith once for all delivered to the saints and enshrined in the Holy Scriptures.

BICKERSTETH, EDWARD (1786-1850). English Evangelical divine. Born in Westmoreland, he worked for the post office before moving into the legal field, finally becoming a solicitor in Norwich. In 1805 he had a deep spiritual experience, and was later to write Help to Studying the Scriptures which went through twenty-one editions. Ordained in 1815, he went briefly to Sierra Leone to report on Church Missionary Society work there, and afterward became one of the society's secretaries, during which time he wrote several books. In 1830 he accepted the living of Watton, Hertfordshire, but maintained his CMS connection. Shortly afterwards he compiled his Christian Psalmody, comprising over 700 hymns, to which he subsequently added another 200; this work went through fifty-nine editions in seven years. In 1814 he took part in the formation of the Parker Society (for republishing the work of the English Reformers). He was active also in the formation of both the Evangelical Alliance and Irish Church Missions. His son, Bishop Edward Henry Bickersteth (1825-1906), was prominent as a clergyman and hymnwriter. J.D. DOUGLAS

BIDDLE, JOHN (1615-1662). Unitarian. Son of a Gloucestershire tailor, he showed precocious talent as a youth. He went to Magdalen Hall, Oxford in 1634, where he became a tutor before returning to teach in Gloucester. There his Trinitarian orthodoxy was suspected by the Presbyterian party, and in 1645, his views having been betrayed by a friend, he was imprisoned. In the following year he appeared before a House of Commons committee and in 1647 his Twelve Arguments, clearly refuting accepted teaching about the divinity of the Holy Spirit, was published. In the next five years he was in and out of prison, but when released in 1652 under the act of oblivion, he began to organize a congregation, write catechisms, and publish Socinian books. He came before the authorities again and was sent to the Scilly Isles in 1655, but pleading by powerful friends obtained his release in 1658. In 1662 he was sent once more to prison, where he died.
C. PETER WILLIAMS

BIEDERWOLF, WILLIAM EDWARD (1867-1939). American Presbyterian evangelist and educator. Born in Indiana, he was probably the best educated evangelist of the period, having studied at Wabash (Indiana) College, Princeton University and Seminary, and several schools in Europe. Ordained in 1897, he served for three years in the pastorate at Logansport, Indiana, and one year as a chaplain in the Spanish-American War. The rest of his life was spent in evangelistic work and direction of the famous Winona Lake Bible School of Theology. His leadership saved the Bible Conference from bankruptcy. In 1909 he organized the Family Altar League, which he directed. From 1929 to 1939 he was a pastor in Palm Beach, Florida. His more important works are The Millennium Bible and The New Paganism. DONALD M. LAKE

BIEL, GABRIEL (1420-1495). German philosopher. Born at Speyer and educated at Heidelberg and Erfurt, he became a noted preacher first at Mainz and then at Urach. He was responsible with Count Eberhard of Württemberg for the founding of the University of Tübingen, where he held the chair of theology from 1484. In old age he joined the Brethren of the Common Life.* A follower of William of Ockham and one of the last great Scholastic thinkers, he held to a very high, if mechanical, sacramentalism, betrayed certain semi-Pelagian tendencies, and apologized for developing capitalist ethics of his age. His best known works are his Epitome of Ockham's writings (1495), his Lecture on and Exposition of the Canon of the Mass (1488, 1499), and his Sermons (1499). IAN SELLERS

BIGG, CHARLES (1840-1908). Classical scholar and theologian. He had a varied career as a teacher in Oxford University and public schools, as a minister, and as regius professor of ecclesiastical history at Oxford from 1901. Besides a commentary on Peter and Jude (1901) and editions of several classics of Christian spirituality, he wrote works on early Christian history which, though dated, all still valuable. His Bampton Lectures, The Christian Platonists of Alexandria (1886), reveal much of his own humane piety and critical freedom, as well as his erudition. The Origins of Christianity (1909) is also noteworthy.

BILDERDIJK, WILLEM (1756-1831). Dutch poet. Born into a strong Calvinist and monarchist family, he early developed habits of study as a result of incapacitation following a foot injury. Later he studied law at Leiden and practiced as an advocate at The Hague till his exile in 1795, in which year the French established a republic to which he refused the required oath of allegiance. He moved to Hamburg and then to London, not returning to the Netherlands till 1806. There he prospered for a time, but suffered privation after the accession of William of Orange in 1813. A man of deeply Christian conviction, his quiet testimony led to the conversion to Christianity of Isaak da Costa,* who later edited his works in sixteen volumes (1856-59). R.E.D. CLARK

BILLING, EINAR MAGNUS (1871-1939). Swedish theologian. Born in Lund, he was professor in dogmatic and moral theology in Uppsala (1909-20), then bishop of Vasteras. He was a leading figure in the revival of Luther studies, the so-called "Luther Renaissance," which is generally considered to date from the publication of Billing's book on Luther's teaching on the state (1900). He laid down the lines for what was to become the distinctive Scandinavian method of Luther study—a historical, systematic approach crystallizing in the characteristic Scandinavian "motif research." Other books included one on the Swedish national church.

BILLINGS, WILLIAM (1746-1800). American composer. A musical amateur and a tanner by trade, he gained by his unbounded enthusiasm and innate vein of originality a unique place in the development of American church music. He published six collections during his life, the last being his Continental Harmony (1794), which was very influential in New England. "When Jesus wept" is a piece of both beauty and poignancy, and his tune "Chester" to patriotic words of the revolutionary period has attracted wide attention in recent years.

BILNEY, THOMAS (c.1495-1531). Protestant martyr. Born near Norwich, he went to Trinity Hall, Cambridge to study law. In 1519 he was ordained to St. Bartholomew's Priory, Smithfield, and the next year he became a fellow of Trinity Hall. After a long period of searching for spiritual peace he read Erasmus's* Latin NT and was converted through reading 1 Timothy 1:15. He became a central figure in the group of theologians who started to meet at the White Horse Inn. Most famous of his converts was Hugh Latimer,* to whom he went to make his confession in 1524 and who was brought to a sense of forgiveness through it. He was arrested in 1527 for heresy and was released only after promising to stop preaching Reformed doctrine. He could not keep himself in check for long and was arrested again that year, and after a trial before Bishop Tunstall* and others he was persuaded by some of his friends to recant. Again Bilney could not hold himself to what he had done under pressure, and early in 1531 he set off on a preaching tour of Norfolk. Later that year he was arrested, tried, and sentenced to die at the stake. A shy and retiring man, he was the first of the early Cambridge Protestants to be martyred. R.E. NIXON

BINGHAM, HIRAM, JR. (1831-1908). Congregational missionary to Micronesia. Born of missionary parents in Honolulu, he received most of his education in the USA, in keeping with missionary policy. After serving briefly as principal of Northampton (Massachusetts) High School, the American Board in 1856 sent him out as a missionary. He opened work in the Gilbert Islands, reduced the language to writing, and in 1860 published the first Bible portion in Gilbertese. By 1890 he had finished translating the whole Bible. For two years he commanded the missionary brig Morning Star that maintained contact between the widely scattered islands. For three years he was corresponding secretary of the Hawaiian Evangelical Association, which sponsored Hawaiian missionary activity. From 1880 to 1882 he was Hawaiian government protector of South Sea immigrants. HAROLD R. COOK

BINGHAM, HIRAM, SR. (1789-1869). Pioneer missionary to Hawaii. Born in Bennington, Vermont, he reached Hawaii (then known as the Sandwich Islands) under the American Board in 1820. He helped create a written language for the people and set up schools for their instruction. With other missionaries he completed a translation of the Bible in 1839. He built the first church in Honolulu in 1821. As trusted adviser to the chiefs, he came into conflict with godless Americans and others who flocked to the islands for personal satisfaction and gain. After twenty-one years, his wife's health forced return to the States. Bingham has been much maligned by recent writers unsympathetic to the strict New England morality he sought to inculcate.

HAROLD R. COOK

BINGHAM, JOSEPH (1668-1723). Church historian. Born at Wakefield and educated at University College, Oxford, where he became fellow (1689) and tutor (1691), he was expelled for heresy in 1695 after preaching a sermon on the terms "Person" and "Substance" concerning the Godhead. He became rector of Headbournworthy, near Winchester, where he remained until 1712 when he removed to Havant, near Portsmouth. He lost most of his meager savings in the South Sea Bubble (a speculation hoax) in 1720. He spent much of his life writing Antiquities of the Christian Church (10 vols., 1708-22), a work of lasting value. Later he advocated reunion of the Christian churches on the basis of apostolic episcopacy. His collected works were published in 1855.

R.E.D. CLARK

BINNEY, THOMAS (1798-1874). Minister and writer. Son of a Presbyterian, he was apprenticed to a bookseller before studying for the Congregational ministry. He held pastorates at Bedford and on the Isle of Wight before going to Weigh House Chapel, London (1829-69). His impressive preaching appealed to youth, for whom he wrote the most popular of his more than fifty books: Is it possible to make the best of both worlds? (1853). He attacked the established church, pioneered Nonconformist liturgical services (see his edition of and appendix to C.W. Baird's Chapter on Liturgies: Historical Sketches, 1856), wanted better music in such services (see his Service of Song in the House of the Lord, 1849), and was one of the first Nonconformists to introduce anthems and chants. Of his many poems, only the hymn "Eternal Light!" has survived. JOHN S. ANDREWS

BIRETTA. A hard square cap worn by Roman and some Anglican clergy. In the Middle Ages it was worn only by higher graduates of universities, but in the sixteenth century its use was permitted to all clergy. It is colored black for priests, purple for bishops, and red for cardinals.

BIRTHRIGHT MEMBERSHIP. This was adopted for Quakers by the London yearly meeting of 1737. If the father was a member of a meeting, the wife and all their children were to be enrolled as members of the meeting and eligible for financial aid if needed. No profession of faith was required of such persons, and membership continued after the death of the husband and father. This plan enrolled many members who had no change of heart, and it diminished evangelism as a mode of winning members. Birthright membership was replaced after 1900 by associate membership.

BISCHOP, SIMON, see EPISCOPIUS

BISHOP. From the vulgar Latin biscopus, the word is often given as a translation of episkopos in the NT. An alternative translation is "overseer." Within the NT it seems to have denoted a function of the ministry, and to be an alternative for presbyter (cf. Acts 20:17; Phil. 1:1; 1 Tim. 3; Titus 1:7ff.). Christ himself was regarded as the Bishop (1 Pet. 2:25). The origins of the monarchical bishop and the threefold ministry of bishop, presbyters, and deacons are wrapped in some mystery. Among the Apostolic Fathers* only Ignatius speaks of monarchical episcopacy, and with him the emphasis is on unity around the bishop in perilous times, not on the divine institution of the office. Gradually, with the disappearance of the charismatic ministry, the opposition from Gnosticism, and the imperial recognition of the church in the fourth century, the single bishop in charge of a diocese or group of churches emerged. Normally he was the head of a city or town church. Furthermore, with the adoption by the church of the divisions within the empire, there also evolved bishops among bishops—that is, pope, patriarch, metropolitan, and archbishop. The division of Eastern and Western Christendom, the close association of church and state, and the rise to power in the West of the see of Rome, had an important effect upon the development of episcopacy. During and after medieval times bishops were both spiritual and temporal lords. This tradition is still reflected in England, where a number of bishops have seats in the House of Lords.

At the time of the Reformation, Protestants wished to reform or to abolish the office of bishop, since its medieval accretions alarmed them. The Calvinist churches equated the office of bishop with that of pastor or parish minister. Lutherans saw the continuance of the office of bishop (if understood as a superintendent minister) as among the adiaphora (see ADIAPHORISTS). This resulted in the retention of bishops in Scandinavia and their abolition in Germany. In recent times the office has been revived in Germany, but no apostolic succession is claimed. The Church of England retained a succession of bishops in the transition from Catholicism to Protestantism, and this has continued to the present. In some more recent denominations the title of bishop has been given to superintendent ministers—e.g., in American Methodism.

Within the Orthodox Churches bishops are chosen from the celibate priests in the monasteries by election at a synod on the advice of the patriarch. In the Roman Catholic Church the pope has the last word and he actually does the appointing—and they are responsible to him. Within the Church of England the chapters of cathedrals elect a bishop on the advice of the monarch. (Anglican churches elsewhere have a more democratic system.) In churches which claim the apostolic succession, consecration is normally performed by one archbishop and two bishops, a rule which was first agreed upon at the Council of Arles in 314. In other churches not claiming apostolic succession, choice is usually by a synod and installation into office by representatives of the synod.

Traditionally since early times, the bishop's ministry is seen to involve ruling, sacramental, and pastoral aspects. He rules both clergy and people in his diocese; he alone can confirm and ordain; and he is the chief pastor of the flock. Often a bishop is assisted by an assistant, suffragan, auxiliary, or coadjutor bishop. The insignia of a bishop include miter, pastoral staff, pectoral cross, ring, and caligae. Within ecumenical dialogue in recent times there has been much discussion as to whether episcopacy is of the esse, the bene esse, or the plene esse of the church.

BISHOPS' BOOK. The Institution of a Christen Man or the "Bishops' Book" was a compromise doctrinal statement of the English bishops and divines in 1537. More conservative than the Ten Articles,* it reestablished the seven sacraments though not all on the same level. Luther's influence was still apparent—transubstantiation was not mentioned, the definition of justification was moderately Protestant, images were attacked, and the supremacy of Rome was denied, while the freedom and equality of national churches were upheld. Henry VIII did not give it official authority, and indeed in 1538 began to correct it extensively and conservatively, and was courageously opposed in private by Cranmer.*

BISHOPS' WARS, THE (1639-1640). The two confrontations between Charles I* and the Scottish Covenanters* caused by the king's determination to force a full-fledged episcopacy upon their country. The first phase, which produced little fighting, ended with the disbandment of the army the Scots had raised, on Charles's undertaking to call a general assembly (with the bishops excluded) in August 1639, followed by a parliament that would ratify acts passed by the assembly. Charles was, however, playing for time in the hope that the English Parliament would finance a second attempt to subdue the Scots, and he continually prorogued the Scottish parliament. The exasperated Scots met in defiance of him, abolished episcopacy (June 1640), defeated the king's army at Newburn, and occupied Newcastle and Durham. The English "Long Parliament," called by Charles in desperation (November 1640), was friendly to the Scots and took advantage of the king's dilemma to limit powers he had claimed and exercised in England. This was the beginning of the king's downfall, climaxed by his execution in 1649. J.D. DOUGLAS

BLACK DEATH, THE. The name given to the bubonic and pneumonic infections that swept unchecked across Europe from 1347 to 1351. Its origins were evidently in central Asia, where headstones dating from 1338/39 in Nestorian graveyards in Kirgiz commemorate plague victims. From there the outbreak evidently spread to India, China, and Europe. Reaching Italy in late 1347, it went through the peninsula and into Switzerland, Germany, and parts of eastern Europe, before going on to France, Spain, and England. London was reached by the spring of 1349. During the following year plague had got to Scotland, Scandinavia, and the Baltic countries. In parts of western Europe, fatalities numbered thirty to forty percent of the urban population. Medical knowledge was hopelessly inadequate in the face of this greatest disaster in European history, which had widespread and ruinous effects on economic, political, and social life. Prices increased, incomes shrank, the peasants demanded lower rents, and with lords impoverished and entire manors abandoned, the breakdown of the manorial system was hastened. Popular religion responded with renewed piety and preoccupation with death. In some places Jews were blamed for poisoning the wells, and many of them were murdered. The population of Siena was so reduced that the enlargement of the city's cathedral was abandoned. Many of the best people who had not fled from their posts to uninfected areas (local officials, physicians, priests, scholars) died in the public interest, so that the following generation had a surfeit of the incompetent. The Dominican Order suffered such casualties that it was forced to admit semiliterate postulants who probably made no small contribution to the superstitious and heretical accretions that grew up in communities previously noted for the quality of their scholarship. C.G. THORNE, JR.

BLACK FRIARS, see DOMINICANS

BLACK MASS. A blasphemous, obscene parody of the Roman Catholic Mass based on the belief that the worship of Satan is a complete reversal of the worship of God. It is addressed to hell and the devil. The cross is suspended upside down, and the Lord's Prayer recited backward. It is often celebrated by a renegade priest, using a woman's naked back as an altar and using his left instead of his right hand.

BLACK RUBRIC, see KNEELING

BLACKSTONE, WILLIAM EUGENE (1841-1935). Friend of the Jews and writer on Christ's second coming. Born in Adams, New York, he was converted in boyhood. He served in the Civil War with the U.S. Christian Commission, then started a flourishing business in Oak Park, Illinois. Impressed by the lack of literature on Christ's return, he wrote Jesus Is Coming, a book still in print. In 1887 he helped start the Chicago Hebrew Mission, and in 1890 headed the first conference between Jews and Christians in Chicago. The next year he presented President Harrison with a memorial signed by 413 Christian and Jewish leaders urging an international conference on the Jewish situation. Israel celebrated the seventy-fifth anniversary of this memorial and dedicated a forest in his name. HAROLD R. COOK

BLACKWELL, ANTOINETTE LOUISA BROWN (1825-1921). Reformer and one of the first ordained American women. Born in Henrietta, New York, she graduated from Oberlin in 1847, then completed a theological course (1850). Refused a preaching license due to her sex, she finally became pastor of the Congregational Church of South Butler, New York. She resigned after four years because of theological problems, became a Unitarian, and gained fame as a temperance speaker. She also espoused abolitionism and women's rights.

BLACKWELL, GEORGE (c.1545-1613). Roman Catholic archpriest. Educated at Trinity College, Oxford, where he was made a fellow in 1566, he was attracted to the Roman Catholic Church and entered the English College at Douai in 1574. Ordained in 1575, he was sent back to England in the following year as one of the first missionary priests. After the death of William Cardinal Allen in 1594, he was appointed archpriest in 1598 to provide leadership for the English Roman Catholics. As a friend of the Jesuits in England he lost the support of some of the secular clergy. For a number of years there were serious divisions about the attitude of Roman Catholics to the English crown. In 1606 James I imposed an oath of loyalty, and Blackwell after a period of imprisonment took the oath despite papal opposition. In 1608 he was deprived of his office as archpriest. He died a supporter of Catholic loyalty to the Crown.

NOEL S. POLLARD

BLAIR, JAMES (1655-1743). Episcopalian minister. Scottish-born, he graduated from Edinburgh in 1673 and was subsequently ordained. He ministered in Scotland and later worked in a London library until, at the request of the bishop of London, he went to Virginia. Here he served the Henrico parish from 1685 to 1694. After 1689, as the bishop's commissary, he secured better-trained ministers for the colony. From 1694 to 1710 he was pastor at Jamestown, and then until his death he served the Bruton parish church in Williamsburg. He obtained the charter for, and was the first president of, William and Mary College in 1693. He was also a member of the Virginia Council until his death.

EARLE E. CAIRNS

BLAKE, EUGENE CARSON (1906- ). Ecumenical leader. Born in St. Louis and educated at Princeton and Edinburgh, he taught for a time in India, then in 1932 began a successful career as a pastor until 1951, when he was appointed stated clerk of the general assembly of the Presbyterian Church, USA. In 1966 he became general secretary of the World Council of Churches,* which post he held until his retirement in 1972, after which he engaged in lecturing and preaching. The holder of several outstanding awards, Blake became famous for a sermon delivered in 1960 at Grace Episcopal Cathedral, San Francisco, at the invitation of Bishop James Pike,* in which he suggested a union of the Methodist, United Church of Christ, Protestant Episcopal, and Presbyterian churches. Other denominations have since expressed interest in the venture, and annual meetings are held, but the movement has to date produced no genuine organic union. Blake's writings include The Church in the Next Decade (1966).

ROBERT C. NEWMAN

BLAKE, WILLIAM (1757-1827). English poet. Best known for his Songs of Innocence (1789) and Experience (1794), he published also many other poems elaborating his very private mythology and system of belief, culminating in the final symbolic works Milton (1804-19) and Jerusalem (1804-20). All his works are illustrated by his own engravings. He himself declared the idiosyncrasy of his position:

> The Vision of Christ that thou dost see
> Is my Vision's Greatest Enemy.
>
> ("The Everlasting Gospel")

In Jerusalem he wrote: "I must create a system or be enslav'd by another man's." This extreme Romantic individualism was in part the product of Blake's own rebellious nature, but it was also his reaction against the "single vision," scientific, materialistic, and rationalistic, of Bacon, Newton, and Locke. Against this Blake wished to assert imagination, the "divine vision," by which "God is Man and exists in us and we in him" ("Annotations to Berkeley"). At its best this led him into that absorption with God when "Self is lost in the contemplation of faith / And wonder at the Divine Mercy," but, despite his grasp of paradox, he never attained the fullness of the mystical experience, for he was never able to hold in tension immanence and transcendence, justice and mercy, righteousness and peace.

He saw the narrow moralistic emphasis of much contemporary orthodox religion, and typically he rejected it in extravagant terms. He rightly saw that "If Morality was Christianity, Socrates was the Savior" ("Annotations to Thornton's Lord's Prayer"), and he nobly emphasized the uniqueness of Christianity as lying in its doctrine of the forgiveness of sins; but his rejection of Christ's alleged virtues in "The Everlasting Gospel" is outrageous. Characteristically, he associates forgiveness of sins with an act of love, but rejects any idea of atonement in the death of Christ.

See Poems of Blake (ed. W.H. Stevenson, 1971) and J.G. Davies, The Theology of William Blake (1948).

ARTHUR POLLARD

BLANCHARD, CHARLES ALBERT (1848-1925). President of Wheaton College, Illinois, for forty-three years. Born in Galesburg, Illinois, he graduated from the college during the presidency of his father, Jonathan. When called to succeed him, Charles had already been associated with the school for ten years. In a real sense Wheaton College was his life; he it was who maintained its conservative evangelical character and gave it stature as an educational institution. From 1891 to 1893 he was also pastor of the Chicago Avenue Church in Chicago (now Moody Memorial Church).

BLANDINA (d.177). Christian martyr. Eusebius records a letter to Asian and Phrygian churches from Christians at Lyons and Vienne, describing their martyrs in a local anti-Christian outburst in 177. Emphasis is laid on the tortures, courage, and Christlikeness of a servant girl, Blandina, who inspired a fellow-sufferer and refused allegiance to pagan gods.

BLASPHEMY. For the ancient Greek, to blaspheme was to use "abusive words" by which to destroy another's reputation. In Judaism the object of such blasphemy was finally always God, against whom it was so serious a sin that the penalty was death (Lev. 24:11f.). Used more broadly in the NT, the concept is controlled throughout by the thought of reviling God's name, a discrediting of His Word, or an abuse of His majesty (e.g., 1 Tim. 6:1; Titus 2:5; Rev. 16:11, 21). Jesus was accused of blasphemy by the Jews, and it was on this charge that they called for His death. Stephen and Paul also were so accused. The most heinous sin of all, according to Mark 3:29, is blasphemy against the Holy Spirit.*

In the Middle Ages, to vilify the church, the Virgin Mary, the saints, or the sacraments was blasphemy. The penalty of death for such offenders against God was sanctioned by the Council of Aachen in 818, but this was seldom in fact carried out. In the post-Reformation period enactments against blasphemy continued in force in Protestant countries (e.g., in Britain from the seventeenth to the nineteenth centuries). With the growing secularization of society following the Enlightenment,* blasphemy came to be regarded rather as a crime against the good order of the state. It remains on the statute books in many countries as punishable by law to deny God, ridicule Christ, and profane the Bible, but in practice the law is not easily invoked where God, Christ, and the Bible are no longer highly revered.

H.D. MC DONALD

BLASS, FRIEDRICH WILHELM (1843-1907). German philologist and grammarian. He taught at the universities of Kiel and Halle and wrote extensively in the areas of classical studies and NT criticism. His Grammatik des neutestamentlichen Griechisch (1896; ET 1898) was foundational and is still in use today, though in a radically revised form. Blass argued that the so-called Western and non-Western texts of Acts originated as different editions by Luke himself, a view which has not commended itself to many scholars.

BLAURER, AMBROSE (1492-1564). Zwinglian pastor. Son of a member of the town council in Constance, Germany, where he attended Latin school, he went to Tübingen University (where he met Melanchthon*) and in 1509/10 he took orders at the Benedictine monastery in Alpirsbach, where he remained until, convinced by Luther's writings in 1522, he returned to Constance. In 1525 he began to preach in St. Stephan Church. Back in Württemberg (1534-38), his Zwinglian supper view and original tolerance for Anabaptists brought him into conflict with the duke. He preached in Augsburg in 1539, but his moralizing and adamant Zwinglianism brought disfavor. He returned to Constance, only to flee before the emperor's troops in 1548. The next years, embittered and pessimistic, he spent in Biel and Winterthur.

ROBERT B. IVES

BLAUROCK, GEORG (c.1492-1529). Early Anabaptist* evangelist. Called "the Blue Coat" and "Sturdy George," Blaurock (his real name was Jörg Cajakob) was a priest from Chur, Switzerland, who responded to Zwingli's evangelical preaching sometime before 1523. He eventually embraced Anabaptist views after a period of Bible study. Blaurock apparently initiated the practice of believer's baptism in Zurich, and in January 1525 he founded the first Anabaptist congregation at nearby Zollikon where he won more than 150 converts with his powerful preaching. The local authorities, however, soon intervened and arrested him and other Anabaptist leaders. Exiled from Zurich in 1527, Blaurock became an itinerant evangelist, winning several thousand to Christ and planting the Anabaptist faith over much of central Europe. He became an important link with later Anabaptist work by establishing many congregations in Tyrol which afterward supplied thousands of members for Anabaptist colonies in Moravia. Hapsburg officials finally caught Blaurock and burned him for heresy.

BLEEK, FRIEDRICH (1793-1859). German biblical scholar. Born at Ahrensböck, Holstein, he studied in Berlin under W.M.L. de Wette,* Johann Neander,* and F.D.E. Schleiermacher* (1814-17), and was "Repetent" in theology under de Wette (1818-19). He was professor of theology at Bonn (1829-59), and was raised to the office of consistorial councillor (1843) and rector of the university. He worked wholly in biblical criticism and exegesis, and while he held advanced views on the OT he took a conservative position in NT studies, opposing the Tübingen School* and defending the traditional authorship of the fourth gospel. His magnum opus was a three-part commentary on Hebrews (1828-40).

J.G.G. NORMAN

BLEMMYDES, NICEPHORUS (c. 1197-1272). Greek theologian. The Fourth Crusade ended with the capture and sacking of Constantinople in 1204. The Byzantine Empire disintegrated, and three independent Greek centers were formed while the Latins controlled Constantinople. One of the three was Nicea, which became an important Greek political and cultural center. Blemmydes became an outstanding figure in the cultural life there, founding a monastery, establishing a school, and becoming a teacher of philosophy. He wrote in various areas of church and state, and a number of theological works in the fields of dogmatics, polemics, poetry, sermons, etc. He was known also for his secular works, such as his political writing The Imperial Statue, and for his philosophical and geographical writings. He died in his monastery.

GEORGE GIACUMAKIS, JR.

BLESSING (Benediction). Blessing is God's imparting of divine favor; when a blessing is given by a man it is a human act invoking divine favor. It can mean also to give thanks to God. In the OT, God blesses people directly—see Genesis 1:22; 2 Samuel 6:11—and there are many examples of men blessing others—Genesis 27:27ff. Such blessing is usually of the greater to the less (cf. Heb. 7:7). Things are also blessed in the OT, God blesses the Sabbath Day (Gen. 2:3), and Moses blesses a man's property (Deut. 33:11).

In the Beatitudes, our Lord gives His well-known teaching. There is also the example of our Lord's blessing children who were brought to Him. The blessing of the loaves and fishes, and of the bread and wine at the Last Supper, is almost certainly indicative of thanksgiving.

It has become the custom to end most church services with a blessing, although this is by no means a primitive practice and, for instance, in the new Communion services in the Church of England, is optional. In the Roman Catholic and Greek Orthodox churches there is a wide use of the blessing of objects. In general the Reformed churches have been reluctant to admit the blessing of things, though the blessing of water in the baptismal service has been made plain in the Church of England Series II services. Curiously enough, side by side with this reluctance, there has been no similar hesitation about dedicating various objects.

Benediction is also the name for a service in the Roman Catholic Church where, at the climax, the congregation is "blessed" by the consecrated host. This developed in the Middle Ages with popular devotion to the host as a sign of Christ's presence, but is now falling into disuse through the impact of the Liturgical Movement and the practice of celebrating the Eucharist in the evening.

PETER S. DAWES

BLISS, PHILIPP (1838-1876). Baptist hymnwriter. Born in Pennsylvania where he was converted at twelve, he joined the Elk Run Baptist Church. With little financial resources, he was forced to work at farming and woodcutting until 1860, when he entered the Normal Academy of Music in New York. He soon gained a wide reputation as a bass of great range and beauty. In 1865 he was hired by the Root & Cady Company of Chicago to conduct musical conventions in the northwestern states. During this same period he made the acquaintance of famed evangelist D.L. Moody.* Bliss assisted in the musical ministry of Moody's campaigns as well as those of Major D.W. Whittle. Bliss and his wife met an untimely death in a train accident. He produced more than twenty familiar hymns and songs, such as "Almost persuaded," "Brightly beams our Father's mercy," and "Hallelujah! what a Saviour." His tombstone bears the title of another of his hymns, "Hold the fort."

DONALD M. LAKE

BLONDEL, DAVID (1590-1655). French Protestant church historian. Born at Châlons-sur-Marne, he was educated at Sedan and the Genevan Academy. He was a country pastor at Roucy for most of his life, refusing a chair of theology at Saumur in 1631, though he was created "honorary professor" there in 1645. In 1650 he left Roucy for a professorship at Amsterdam. He wrote Pseudo-Isidorus et Turrianus Vapulans, which finally discredited the historicity of the False Decretals,* and this was probably his most important work. He also wrote De la primauté en l'Église (1641), a defense of Reformed ecclesiastical polity, and Apologia pro Sententia Hieronymi de Presbyteris et Episcopus (1646), an attack on episcopacy. All his works are on the Roman Catholic Index* of Forbidden Books.

J.G.G. NORMAN

BLONDEL, MAURICE (1861-1949). French Roman Catholic philosopher. He taught at Aix-en-Provence (1896-1927), and then though blind wrote much in retirement. His resistance to traditional Scholastic theology made him suspect of Modernism, but though associating with some Modernists, he rejected Loisy's* views on history and dogma, and was never condemned. He reached orthodox conclusions by non-Scholastic routes, and gained considerable influence among Catholics. Often obscure, the essence of his position was stated in his doctoral thesis, L'Action. Essai d'une critique de la vie et d'une science de la pratique (1893). Truth cannot be found by intellect alone, but only by the whole of being, including willing and feeling, totally involved in the movement of life. Faith therefore is not accepting dogmas, but is coming to realize the supernatural within human experience, which Blondel tried to show required a goal beyond the natural order (i.e., God). So he offered a "method of immanence" which led compellingly to transcendence —a position quite different from the immanentism for which Modernism was condemned.

HADDON WILLMER

BLUMHARDT, CHRISTOPH FREDERICK (1842-1919). German evangelical leader. He became assistant to his father, J.C. Blumhardt,* at Bad Boll in 1869 and succeeded him as head of that establishment in 1880. His theology included a strong emphasis on the righteousness of God and His judgment against "the flesh." Because of his sympathy with the workers of Württemberg, Blumhardt was elected to the diet of that province during the years 1900-1906. This step was misunderstood by many of his contemporaries, but he justified it as being in the spirit of Jesus who associated with "publicans and sinners."

BLUMHARDT, JOHANN CHRISTOPH (1805-1880). German evangelical leader. After theological studies at Tübingen he became a tutor in 1830 at the missionary training institution in Basle of which his uncle, Christian Gottlieb Blumhardt, was founder. In 1838 he was installed as pastor at Möttlingen, where a revival occurred which was accompanied by healings of bodily and mental diseases. The most notable exorcism was that of Gottliebin Dittus. So renowned did the Möttlingen revival become that on Good Friday 1845, no fewer than 176 communities were represented in the services. Blumhardt resigned from his pastorate in 1852 to purchase and operate a center for sufferers from all kinds of illnesses and ranks of society at Bad Boll. Gottliebin Dittus assisted in the work, as did Blumhardt's two sons, who joined him in 1869 and 1872 respectively.

WAYNE DETZLER

BOCSKAY, STEPHEN (1557-1606). Hungarian Protestant leader. He led the Protestant opposition to the attempt of Rudolph II of Austria to destroy civil and religious liberty in Hungary. Roused to action by the outrages inflicted on the people of Transylvania by the Austrian general Basta (1602-4), he sought the help of the Turks and drove Basta from Transylvania. He was elected prince in 1605, and in 1606 concluded the Peace of Vienna with the Archduke Matthias, who had succeeded Rudolph. By this all the religious and constitutional rights of the Hungarian people were guaranteed. Bocskay did not live to enjoy his victory for long: he is said to have been poisoned by his chancellor, Mihaly Katay, who was hacked to pieces by Bocskay's supporters.

HUGH J. BLAIR

BODELSCHWINGH, FRIEDRICH (1831-1910). Lutheran pastor. A Westphalian, he was led by Pietist influence into the ministry. In teaching children, the Word of God in the Bible came alive for him and the experience of the death of four of his own children within a few weeks in 1869 deeply moved him. From 1872 he took charge at Bielefeld of an institution for epileptics, later known as Bethel.* Its work, connected with the Innere Mission,* grew to include the training of deaconesses, a workers' colony, etc. Bodelschwingh held a strong view of the church's social responsibility and entered the Prussian Landtag in 1903. But he stood closer to C.F. Blumhardt,* whom he knew, than to Adolf Stöcker, believing that all welfare activities were limited by eschatology: they do not build God's kingdom but prepare for the returning Lord. The epileptics, on the fringes of society and having their future only in God, were thus seen to be teaching concretely the truth about the kingdom. At the same time, hope for all in the Gospel meant that even the most disabled were found useful work, and theological students were expected to learn from paroled convicts.

HADDON WILLMER

BODELSCHWINGH, FRIEDRICH (1877-1946). Reichsbishop of the German Evangelical Landeskirchen, and son of the above. Having succeeded his father at Bethel,* he expanded its work in education and research (the relation of medicine and theology). He took care that its growth did not detract from its central concern with compassion for the unfortunate. His high standing in the German Evangelical Church was shown by his election as reichsbishop in 1933, though he was displaced by Hitler's nominee, L. Müller. Quietly active rather than prominent in the church conflict, he refused to surrender the sick of Bethel to the Nazi euthanasia program and thus was, along with other protesters, influential in ending it.

BOEHLER, PETER (1712-1775). Moravian* missionary. Born at Frankfurt-am-Main, son of an innkeeper, he studied at Frankfurt Gymnasium (1722) and Jena University (1731), where he was influenced by Spangenberg* and Zinzendorf.* Through the latter he became a missionary of the English Society for the Propagation of the Gospel among the slaves of South Carolina, and pastor of some Moravians at Savannah, leading the Moravians in migration to Bethlehem, Pennsylvania. While in England he met and profoundly influenced the Wesleys. After a second stay in America, he spent six years in England as superintendent of the Moravian Church, being consecrated bishop in 1748. He returned to Bethlehem (1753) for eleven years. Later he was a member of the Unity Elders' Conference.

J.G.G. NORMAN

BOEHM, MARTIN (1725-1812). Co-founder of the Church of the United Brethren in Christ.* Born in Lancaster County, Pennsylvania, of Swiss Mennonite ancestry, he was chosen by lot at the age of thirty-one to become pastor of the Mennonite congregation to which he belonged. He prayed for God's help and was granted assurance of salvation and the desire to share his faith with others. He began his itinerant ministry at once among the German-speaking settlers of Pennsylvania and Virginia. His revivalistic activities and his willingness to conduct his work in English when necessary led the Mennonites to denounce and expel him. He continued his work in cooperation with other likeminded preachers, and met Philip Otterbein* at a great preaching meeting near Lancaster by 1768. Upon hearing Boehm preach, Otterbein embraced him saying, "We are brethren." They became co-workers in the growing pietistic movement which was organized in 1800 as the Church of the United Brethren in Christ, with Boehm and Otterbein as bishops.

HARRY SKILTON

BOEHME, JAKOB (1575-1624). German Lutheran mystic and theosophist. He was born at Altseidenberg near Goerlitz, where he lived nearly all his life working as a shoemaker. Among his mystical experiences, the most important occurred in 1600, when he looked at a dish reflecting the sunlight and in an ecstatic state saw "the Being of Beings, the byss and the abyss, the eternal generation of the trinity, the origin and descent of this world, and of all creatures through the divine wisdom." In 1612 he published some of his insights in a work, The Beginning of Dawn, followed by a devotional treatise, The Way to Christ (1623). His other writings were published posthumously.

Although not formally educated, Boehme read widely in the books of Paracelsus* and Valentin Weigel* and shows the influence of their mystical, alchemical, and astrological ideas in his use of obscure and difficult terminology. Mostly, however, he seemed to rely on his own mystical experiences. He believed that God Himself contains both good and evil. The "abyss" is God considered as the Ungrund, from which erupt the "fiery will of love" and the "sinister will of wrath." Despite such statements, at times he wrote as if evil were not necessary. In general he shifts his position, and no single theory fits all his work.

Boehme taught also that there are qualities in nature which he coordinated with his ideas of God in differing ways. The seven qualities divide into two triads, a higher and a lower, between which there is creative energy called "the flash." The lower group consists of contraction (or individualisation), diffusion (or attraction), and rotation (the struggle between the two foregoing). The higher triad is in effect the lower transformed including love, expression, and the kingdom of God which achieves a harmony between the spiritual and material world. Man must make a choice between the world of sensation represented by the oscillation of nature or the "dying" to self and living on a higher plane. This makes the true Christian life a mystical imitation of Christ's suffering and triumph. Boehme was critical of the Protestantism of his day because of its bibliolatry, doctrine of election, and notions of heaven. His influence was very great, not only in Germany where the Pietist, Romantic, and Idealist movements all owed something to his teachings, but also in England where the Cambridge Platonists, William Law,* and the Behmenists accepted his ideas.

ROBERT G. CLOUSE

BOETHIUS, ANICIUS MANLIUS TORQUATUS SEVERINUS (c.480-c.524). Philosopher and statesman. Educated at Athens and Alexandria, he was accused of treason and imprisoned in Italy, where his most famous work De Consolatione Philosophiae, in five books, was written in prison. It concerned philosophy's leading the soul to God and was the ground for debating whether he was a Christian. This was answered affirmatively on the basis of his De Trinitate, studying Augustine and adopting "new and unaccustomed words," and addressing to John the Deacon a shorter tract on the Trinity and a treatise against Eutyches* and Nestorius. It is believed that he wrote De fide catholica, which summarizes central doctrines and rejects tenets of Arius,* Sabellians,* and Manichaeans,* teaching that all corruptible things will perish and men will rise for future judgment. His philosophical writings and translations are numerous: translations of Aristotle's De Interpretatione and Categories with commentary, and his own An Introduction to Categorical Syllogisms as well as two books each on categorical and hypothetical syllogisms, and many others. He planned to translate into Latin all of Plato and Aristotle, and reconcile their thinking, as Cassiodorus had employed Epiphanius to make the Greek fathers available to Latin readers. He wrote on the trivium and quadrivium (On Arithmetic, On Music), and translated and commented on Porphyry. About 520 came the theological Tractates, known as Opuscula sacra, which established his theological authority, even to getting a commentary by Aquinas. His work was taken seriously throughout the Middle Ages, as many commentaries witness, and he was canonized.

BOGOMILES. A group that arose toward the latter part of the eleventh century, especially in Bulgaria, and was considered heretical by the Eastern Orthodox Church. Much that is known about them comes from hostile writers sympathetic to the established church of the day. Their views of the sacraments were in some ways similar to several Protestant groups in later centuries both in western Europe and in America. The Bogomiles opposed the sacramental materialism of the church. They rejected water baptism as well as the material elements used in the sacrament of the Lord's Supper. Instead, they advocated a spiritual baptism which was conferred by the laying of a gospel of John on the head of the recipient and the chanting of the Lord's Prayer. Likewise, the Lord's Supper was to be practiced spiritually, for the bread and the wine could not be transubstantiated into the body and blood of Christ.

The nonacceptance of almost all of the OT by the Bogomiles bears close resemblance to the views of the Paulicians,* another heretical group in Eastern Christianity. The patriarchs in the Pentateuch, the Bogomiles stated, were in reality inspired by Satan. Satan originally was at the right hand of God, but was expelled because of his revolutionary planning. The creation of the earth was given to Satan, so that all of creation becomes basically evil, including the human body. Only things of the Spirit would be considered good. Birth is the imprisonment of the good spirit in evil flesh as punishment for sins in a preexistent state. As a part of this logic, sex would also be considered wrong. The natural result of such an incorrect interpretation of Scripture led to a definite dualism of two world principles, good and evil, in contention throughout creation.

BOHEMIAN BRETHREN. Later known as Unitas Fratrum and Moravian Brethren.* In Prague during 1453-54, the preaching of Archbishop Rokycana (who gave Holy Communion in both kinds) led to the foundation of a community in the city guided by his nephew Gregory. This congregation then associated itself with the followers of Peter Chelcicky* (d. 1460). The members sought to fulfill the law of Christ as given in the gospels, and also rejected military service and many aspects of town life. Yet they still believed in the celibacy of priests, the seven sacraments, and other Catholic doctrine; they nonetheless required that their priests be men of integrity, that they give Communion in both kinds, and that they emphasize the place of faith in God through the sacraments.

In 1457 they settled in the village of Kunwald. In the community were three groups: the beginners or penitents, the advanced, and the perfected (the priests). The latter preached and heard confessions in addition to administering the sacraments. Eventually the priesthood was wholly separated from that of the Roman Catholic and Utraquist* churches. The supreme power in the community was vested legally in the synod, comprising all the clergy, but the "Close Council," made up of ten members of the synod, exercised the real power. As the movement grew there were area synods and dioceses. The latter had a bishop with priests and deacons at the parish level. Discipline and respect for others was instilled at all levels. Schools were regarded as important. A significant holder of the post of presiding bishop in the formative years of the Brethren was Lukas, who dominated the activity from 1496 to 1528, though he was bishop only from 1517. He sought to unify the community and systematically express in writing its doctrines.

Despite persecution, the Brethren increased in numbers and influence in Bohemia. After the death of Lukas the leadership was in the hands of men who were pro-Lutheran; the nobility also assumed greater prominence within the movement —which gave King Ferdinand the excuse he wanted to crush the Brethren in 1547. The seat of government of the Brethren was transferred to Moravia. Many Brethren escaped to Poland, where they helped the cause of reform and eventually joined the new Calvinist church. The leader in Bohemia, John Augusta,* was tortured and kept in prison for sixteen years. By 1609 the Brethren who had returned to their homeland managed to gain state recognition for their religion, but only through a confederation with the Utraquists, who were now Lutheran in theology. The Brethren were thus able to retain their own organization and regulations, and even their own Creed (1564), while the Bohemian Lutherans held to the Augsburg Confession.* Both groups claimed their confession to be in harmony with the Bohemian Confession of 1575.

Definitive form was given to the polity and discipline of the Brethren at the Synod of Zeravic in 1616, but it was never fully implemented: the Battle of the White Mountain (1620) virtually destroyed Protestantism in Bohemia and Moravia for over 150 years. Scattered groups of Brethren managed to survive, and these accepted the invitation of Count Zinzendorf* to join the Herrnhuter in 1721. One famous seventeenth-century bishop was J.A. Comenius.*

BÖHMER, HEINRICH (1869-1927). German church historian. Born at Zwickau, he was successively professor at Bonn (1906), Marburg (1912), and Leipzig (1915) and established himself as a leading authority on Luther and the Reformation period. His meticulous scholarship is shown in his studies of Loyola* and the Jesuits (1914, 1907), while two of his works on Luther, written in 1906 and 1925 respectively, were translated into English as Luther in the Light of Modern Research (1930) and Road to Reformation (1946). His third major Luther study was Luthers erste Vorlesung (1924). He wrote also in German a number of studies in Anglo-Norman church history of the eleventh and twelfth centuries. IAN SELLERS

BOLLANDISTS. An association of ecclesiastical scholars engaged in editing the Acta Sanctorum and named after the editor of the first volume, John van Bolland (1596-1665). The idea, however, did not originate with him but was first conceived by Heribert Rosweyde (1569-1629) who was professor of philosophy in the Jesuit College at Douai during the last years of the sixteenth century, yet devoted his leisure time to exploring the libraries and numerous monasteries scattered throughout Hainault and French Flanders. Bolland went further and made appeal to collaborators, either Jesuits or others, residing in all the different countries of Europe. Their aim was to produce a critical edition of the lives of the saints, based on authentic sources. Their researches led them to combat the Carmelite* tradition that the origin of their order went back to the prophet Elijah, who was regarded as its founder. The undertaking soon attracted others, among whom was Godfrey Henschen (1601-81), an invaluable contributor. The 1773 suppression of the Jesuits severely affected their work, which was not resumed fully until 1837. S. TOON

BOLOGNA, CONCORDAT OF (1516). This pact between Francis I of France and Leo X was the result of a sweeping military victory won by the French king at Marignano over the combined military forces of the Italian states and the papacy. Through it Francis made himself master of the French Church. The concordat allowed Francis to nominate candidates for bishoprics, abbeys, and priories in France, with only a very few exceptions. But the right of canonical investiture remained with the papacy. The concordat thus gave a degree of independence to the French Church and reflected the growing spirit of nationalism in France.

BOLSEC, JEROME HERMES (d.1585). Controversialist. Member of the order of Carmelites* in Paris, he had been driven from the city as a result of a sermon which he had preached favoring Protestant doctrine. He took up medicine, was converted to Protestantism, and went to Geneva only to find himself in dispute with Calvin on the doctrine of predestination.* He had begun to question the doctrine in private at first, but later ventured to express his opposition in the presence of the congregation. He was prosecuted and banished from Geneva in 1551. He returned to Paris, but was compelled to leave again on his refusal to accept a ruling of the Council of Orleans (1563) ordering him to recant. He eventually returned to the Roman Catholic Church, and died at Lyons. He took revenge in the publication of slanderous biographies on Calvin (1577) and Beza (1582).

HUGH J. BLAIR

BOLTON, ROBERT (1572-1631). Puritan preacher. He went to Lincoln College, Oxford, in 1592 and became a fellow of Brasenose in 1602. He took part in a disputation before James I in 1605. Before entering the ministry, Bolton was brought to an experience of conversion. He became rector of Broughton, Northamptonshire, in 1610 and remained there for the rest of his life. He was a typical Jacobean Puritan. Baxter* later named him with others of his contemporaries such as Preston and Sibbes as "an excellent sort of conforming ministers." They were men who accepted the basis of the national church in episcopacy and a liturgy, but preached Puritan theology which they applied in their pastoral work, and desired the reform of some of the ceremonies. Robert's son, Dr. Samuel Bolton, conformed at the Restoration and became a prebend of Westminster and chaplain-in-ordinary to Charles II.

JOHN TILLER

BOMPAS, WILLIAM CARPENTER (1834-1906). Pioneer Anglican bishop in the Canadian North. Educated privately in London, he was ordained deacon in 1859, and in 1865 volunteered for service in the missionary circuit of the Yukon. As an itinerant clergyman he quickly earned the admiration and respect of the Indian and Eskimo and in 1874 became the first bishop of Athabasca. In 1884 he was translated to the see of Mackenzie River, and in 1891 to that of Selkirk (now Yukon). In 1905 he resigned his bishopric, but continued to live in the Yukon until his death. A doughty Evangelical, he translated the NT into a multitude of Indian dialects and founded several schools and hostels for native children. His many travels and his endurance of cold and famine earned him the title "Apostle of the North" (the name of the biography by H.A. Cody, 1908), and left a permanent mark on missionary work in that area.

RICHARD N. MUGFORD

BONAR, ANDREW ALEXANDER (1810-1892). Scottish preacher and author. Seventh son of a solicitor of excise in Edinburgh, he with his brothers John and Horatius* made a famous trio of ministers. His great friend was R.M. McCheyne,* whose memoir he wrote, regarded widely as a Christian classic. They both belonged to the Non-Intrusion movement which led to the Disruption* of 1843, and also to a revival movement which culminated in the Kilsyth Revival of 1838-39. Greatly concerned with the evangelization of the Jews, he and McCheyne were members of a "Mission of Inquiry" to Palestine in 1839. After short ministries in Jedburgh and Edinburgh, he was ordained at Collace, Perthshire, and remained there after the Disruption, preaching in a tent until a Free Church was built. In 1856 he started a new Free Church at Finnieston, Glasgow, exercising a fine ministry till his death. Among his writings, his edition of Rutherford's Letters and his own Diary have become devotional classics.

J.G.G. NORMAN

BONAR, HORATIUS (1808-1889). "The prince of Scottish hymn-writers" (James Moffatt). In Edinburgh University one of his tutors was Thomas Chalmers.* While assistant minister at St. James's, Leith, he wrote hymns to familiar tunes to interest the children in worship. In 1837 he became minister of the North Parish Church, Kelso, after the Disruption* of 1843 remaining in Kelso as minister of the Free Church. In 1866 he was translated to the Chalmers Memorial Church in Edinburgh. He was moderator of the Free Church Assembly in 1883. He was the author of many books, but is now chiefly remembered as a hymnwriter. He wrote over 600, of which nearly 100 are in common use. Probably the best known is "I heard the voice of Jesus say." Ira D. Sankey called him "my ideal hymn-writer." He issued eight collections of hymns. J.G.G. NORMAN

BONAVENTURA (1221-1274). "Prince of Mystics" (according to Leo XIII). Born near Viterbo, Italy, and baptized John ("of Fidanza"), he believed that St. Francis's (of Assisi*) intercession rescued him from a dangerous childhood illness. In 1238 or 1243 he entered the Friars Minor, then read arts and theology at Paris, lecturing on Holy Scripture there (1248-55). After some difficulty with the secular doctors and finally by order of Alexander IV, he was awarded the doctorate there for his commentary on the Sentences of Peter Lombard* and the treatise De Paupertate Christi. Though not yet thirty-six, he was elected minister-general of the Friars Minor and preserved the order from division between the "Spirituals" and Observants. Having declined the archbishopric of York (1265), he was compelled to accept the see of Albano (1273) and a cardinalship; and he was responsible for Gregory X's election in 1271. He attended the Council of Lyons* (1274) and contributed to the short-lived reunion with the Greek schismatics. Alexander of Hales,* his mentor at Paris, noted "Adam did not seem to have sinned in Bonaventure." His works are christocentric, saturated with Scripture, and learned in the Fathers. Itinerarium mentis in Deum emphasizes the folly of human wisdom when compared with the illumination God waits to give the Christian. Bonaventura's mysticism is founded on dogmatic and moral theology, believing contemplative prayer to be no extraordinary grace. Union with God turns on wanting to pay the price. Holding simple sanctity high, he also emphasizes the gift of knowledge, and rejects the doctrine of the immaculate conception.

BONHOEFFER, DIETRICH (1906-1945). German pastor and ecumenist. Son of a famous neurologist, he studied philosophy and theology at Tübingen and Berlin, coming under the influence of such men as Deissmann,* Harnack,* Lietzmann,* Seeberg, and Karl Barth.* Ordained as a Lutheran pastor, he ministered to German congregations in Barcelona and London and became acquainted with G.K.A. Bell,* bishop of Chichester, with whom he shared his concern about the Nazification of the German Church. He took a leading part in drafting the Barmen Declaration* and thus became a leader of the Confessing Church* which refused the notorious Aryan Clauses (1933) imposed by the Nazi ideology. The seminary which he founded for training pastors for the Confessing Church was short-lived; his license to teach was revoked in 1936; Himmler closed the seminary in 1937. Bonhoeffer traveled much to inspire concern for the plight of the German Church. His opposition to Hitlerism involved him in the Resistance movement and led to his arrest by the Gestapo in April 1943. He was executed, on a charge of treason, at Flossenbürg on 9 April 1945; a simple tablet in the village church is inscribed: "Dietrich Bonhoeffer a witness of Jesus Christ among his brethren."

His later works which have been translated into English include The Cost of Discipleship (1948); Letters and Papers from Prison (1953); Life Together (1954); Creation and Fall (1959); No Rusty Swords (1965); Christology (1966: in USA Christ the Center); and Way to Freedom (1966). So varied and opposing are the theories deriving from his writings that a meaningful sketch of his ideas presents difficulty. Among his most fruitful insights were his total rejection of natural theology, and of a "religious apriori" in man; the reality of God's absolute self-disclosure in Christ; the historical and present Christ as God revealed incognito; Christ interpreted in terms of "the-man-for-others"; and particularly, his much discussed and misunderstood concepts of "religionless" and "worldly Christianity," and "man come of age."

BONIFACE (680-754). Missionary bishop and martyr. Born near Crediton, Devon, he was trained in abbeys at Exeter and Nursling in Hampshire, and later himself refused an English abbacy. He went to Frisia to serve under the English missionary Willibrord,* and in 719 received Gregory II's authority for his work. After laboring successfully in Thuringia and Bavaria, and seeing thousands of baptisms among the Hessians, he again went to Rome to be consecrated bishop (722). It is unlikely that his name was changed from Wynfrith to Boniface then, but much earlier. He returned to Hesse as a missionary statesman, having also the authority of Charles Martel,* and from there he went on to Thuringia, being made archbishop in 732 by Gregory III, and papal legate in 739—the first one to be sent beyond the Alps. Now he divided Bavaria, Hesse, and Thuringia into dioceses, and began founding Benedictine monasteries, of which Fulda (c.743) was the most famous. The connection with England remained, even to English monastics joining him, whereupon the English reverence for the papacy was transmitted to the new German Church. With Charles Martel's death (741), he was called to Francia by the new mayors, Carloman and Pepin,* to reform the church; this began under the new pope, Zacharias, in 742, and was accomplished through a series of councils. About 747 he became archbishop of Mainz, but resigned after a few years to return to Frisia, where his career ended in martyrdom. His felling of the pagan Oak of Thor at Geismar to make a chapel of its timber comments profoundly on his ministry; perhaps his devotion exceeded that of the popes he served. He renewed their authority beyond the Alps and extended the boundaries of Latin Christendom which had already begun to shrink in Spain owing to Muslim conquest. With Boniface, unity in the Western Church and the empire took form.

BONIFACE I (d.422). Pope from 418. Unlike his predecessor Zosimus,* he sought to establish and defend respect for Roman authority in the West. He withdrew the unpopular papal vicar from S Gaul. A Council of Carthage in 419, reacting against rash claims by Zosimus, urged upon Boniface that the bishop of Rome should accept appeals from bishops alone, not from clerics. This Boniface did when he restored the pro-Augustinian Anthony to his see in the Donatist* stronghold of Fussala, but he accepted the appeal with caution, on the condition "... if he has truthfully told us the facts." Although Illyricum had been made part of the Eastern Empire, Boniface defended the traditional Roman ecclesiastical control through the bishop of Thessalonica. His nine extant letters, concerned with his rights in the consecration of the bishop of Corinth, introduce papal claims later institutionalized by Leo I.*

G.T.D. ANGEL

BONIFACE V (d.625). Pope from 619. A Neapolitan, he was noted for his organizing ability and for his concern to spread Christianity in England, especially in Northumbria. In Rome he endeavored to conform ecclesiastical usage to civil law in the matter of bequests, established the principle of asylum, and issued laws concerning the liturgical functions of various orders of clerics. He wrote letters to Mellitus and Justin, archbishops of Canterbury, sending Justin the pallium as a symbol of honor and jurisdiction. He also wrote to Edwin, king of Northumbria, and to his Christian queen, Aethelberga, thus supporting the work of Paulinus of York* for the conversion of Northumbria. During the time of Boniface and his successors, the three ancient patriarchates of Jerusalem, Antioch, and Alexandria capitulated to the rule of Islam.

J.G.G. NORMAN

BONIFACE VIII (c.1234-1303). Pope from 1294. During his pontificate relations between the papacy and the Western monarchs reached a crisis. Philip IV* and Edward I claimed the right to tax without papal consent. Unfortunately Boniface had come to the papal throne under circumstances that cast doubt on the legality of his title. His predecessor, Celestine V, was a holy hermit who could not adjust to his papal role and resigned after five months; many argued that abdication from the papacy was impossible and that therefore Boniface's election was invalid. Also, Celestine's experience seemed to prove that no holy man could be pope. Boniface seemed to confirm that view. Against the claim of Philip and Edward he issued the bull Clericis Laicos (1296), stating that the clergy were prohibited from paying taxes without papal approval. Any ruler, moreover, who levied such taxes would be automatically excommunicated. In retaliation, Philip forbade the export of money from his realm, thus halting papal revenue from France, and Edward withdrew royal protection from the clergy, in effect outlawing them. These actions forced Boniface to declare that the bull did not apply to emergencies and that the king could decide when an emergency existed.

Later, Philip and Boniface argued over the trial of a bishop accused of treason. In 1301 the pope issued the bull Ausculta fili which, in addition to asserting the power of the pope over all kings, contained a list of specific charges against Philip's government. By changing some of the bull's statements, Philip made it appear that it was an affront to all Frenchmen. Then he called the Estates of France and secured the support of that assembly in his protest against Boniface's claim. The pope replied with the bull Unam sanctam, which closes with the statement: "Furthermore, we declare, state, define, and proclaim that it is altogether necessary to salvation for every human creature to be subject to the Roman pontiff." Philip's advisers answered this by drawing up an indictment of Boniface, accusing him of murder, heresy, simony, adultery, schism, and keeping a demon as a pet. A Frenchman, William Nogaret, led an armed band into Italy to arrest Boniface and return him to France for trial. The expedition proved to be a failure, but Boniface died soon after and Philip used the charges against Boniface to pressure the papacy into doing his will. Thus the medieval popes were defeated by the national monarchs.

ROBERT G. CLOUSE

BONIFACE IX (c.1355-1404). Pope from 1389. Pietro Tomacelli was born in Naples of a poor but ancient family. Created cardinal-deacon of St. George while still a young man, he was made cardinal-priest of St. Anastasia (1385) by Urban VI. His election to the papacy came in the middle of the Great Schism.* More amiable than his predecessor, he was nevertheless convinced of his papal rights and excommunicated the Avignon pope, Clement VII; declared sinful the proposal to end the Schism through a general council (1391); and successfully resisted Anglo-French and German pressure to abdicate. He regained control of the Papal States* (lost by Urban) and reestablished papal authority in Rome. His authority was tenuous, however, and weakened by the neutrality of much of Europe and the loss of Sicilian and Genoese support. Because they had sided with him against Avignon, Boniface was forced to support Ladislaus as king of Naples, and Rupert of Bavaria as German emperor. To raise funds for these political activities he had to resort to indulgences and simony, and in 1399 transformed the annates* into a permanent tax. In this he was assisted by Baldassare Cossa, later antipope John XXIII, whom he made cardinal. His pontificate was called "the crooked days of Boniface IX."

J.G.G. NORMAN

BONIFACE OF QUERFURT (970?-1009). Hagiographer, missionary, and martyr. Born in Saxony of influential parents, Boniface (otherwise known as Bruno) became canon of Magdeburg at an early age. He was a close friend of Emperor Otto III, whom he accompanied to Rome in 996. There he entered a Benedictine abbey and took for himself the religious name of Boniface. There also, after the martyrdom in 997 of Adalbert,* bishop of Prague, at the hands of the heathen Russians, he planned further missionary activity in Russia. Following much frustration due to war, he visited Kiev and then worked among the pagan tribesmen in the area north of the Black Sea, whom he Christianized at least nominally. Later he visited Poland and attempted unsuccessfully to act as peacemaker in the war between the Poles and Germans. Determined to continue his missionary work he then, with eighteen other missionaries, crossed the border into Russia (Lithuania) where the whole party was killed by the heathens. Boniface wrote several lives of Christian missionaries in eastern Europe, notably that of Adalbert, whose pioneering work he continued.

R.E.D. CLARK

BONIFACE OF SAVOY (d.1270). Archbishop of Canterbury. Son of a count of Savoy, he was nearly related by marriage to Henry III of England. While still a boy he showed ascetic inclinations by entering the Carthusian Order.* He became bishop of Belley in Burgundy in 1234; and in 1241 was elected archbishop by the monks of Canterbury, but papal confirmation was delayed. He was eventually consecrated by Pope Innocent IV at the Council of Lyons* (1245). His enthronement was further delayed until his return to England in 1249. A visitation of his province was strongly resisted by the clergy, and he went to Rome for a time. Boniface spent relatively little time in England, nevertheless his provincial constitutions, presented between 1257 and 1261, were a notable assertion of clerical privileges. He died in Savoy while waiting to join Prince Edward's crusade.

BONN CONFERENCES. Two international conferences on church reunion were held in 1874-75 under the presidency of Ignaz Von Döllinger,* precipitated by the Munich Manifesto (1871) of the first Congress of the Old Catholics.* The Manifesto expressed the hope of reunion with the Greek-Oriental and Russian Churches. In March 1872 Von Döllinger delivered a series of lectures on The Reunion of the Churches, in which the Scriptures and the ecumenical creeds of the early church were proposed as a basis for church unity. The first Bonn Conference was an informal meeting of theologians representing Germany, the Eastern Churches, the Anglican and the Dutch Churches. When the Filioque clause concerning the Holy Spirit was debated, a serious division appeared. One year later, the second and larger Bonn Conference took place. Orthodox representation was considerably larger and included the Ecumenical Patriarch, representatives of the Church of Romania and the Church of Greece, and the metropolitan of Belgrade. The crucial question again emerged as the gap between Eastern and Western doctrines of the Holy Spirit. After a prolonged and rather strained discussion, the view of John of Damascus* was agreed upon as having been the prevailing one at the time of the Ecumenical Councils* of the early church. Furthermore, Orthodox representatives refused to commit themselves on the subject of the validity of Anglican orders.

BONNER, EDMUND (c.1500-1569). Bishop of London. Born in Worcestershire and educated at Oxford, he was ordained priest in 1519 and with his training as a canon lawyer entered the service of Cardinal Wolsey.* As a supporter of Henry VIII's "divorce," he obtained the king's favor after the fall of Wolsey. Bonner's service to Henry on the Continent and his acceptance of the break with Rome led to his appointment to the bishopric of London in 1540. Under Edward VI he opposed the Protestant regime and was deprived of his bishopric in 1549. Under Mary he was restored and became a chief agent of the royal persecution. As London was closest to the court, the persecution was fiercest there, and Bonner was hated intensely by the people of London. When Elizabeth came to the throne, he was again deprived and spent the rest of his life in the Marshalsea prison. NOEL S. POLLARD

BONOSUS (d. c.400). Bishop of Naissus in Yugoslavia. He was deposed after the Council of Capua (391) instructed the bishop of Thessalonica and the Illyrian bishops to examine him, and they found him guilty of teaching that Mary had children by Joseph after the birth of Jesus; he might also have taught Photinian Adoptianism.* The Bonosiani followed him into schism and survived, especially among Goths, in Spain and Gaul down to the seventh century. Controversy arose in Illyricum concerning the validity of his ordinations.

BOOK OF DEER, THE. Ninth-century Gospelbook, so-called because of the Gaelic notes added to it describing the foundation and grants of land made to the monastery of Deer in Aberdeenshire, Scotland. It is notable for its illustrations, its evidence about social status and land-tenure, and for a Celtic liturgical fragment.

BOOK OF KELLS, THE. A copy of the four gospels in Jerome's* Latin Version with prefaces, summaries, and a partial glossary of Hebrew names and their interpretation. The book has 340 leaves, each 13 by 9 1/2 inches of thick glazed parchment. The copy is made with brownish black ink. Many letters are ornamented with an amazing blend of colors, and the first two words, Liber generationis, fill a well-illuminated page. The work was possibly begun at Iona* and finished at Kells at the beginning of the ninth century. Remarkably preserved from loss and damage for seven centuries, it was deposited in the library of Trinity College, Dublin, in 1660. A facsimile was made in 1950.

BOOK OF SPORTS. The name given to a declaration of James I in 1617/8 in which he authorized, but did not command, the continuance of the old English Sunday—e.g., morris dancing, archery, vaulting, etc., following morning worship and midday meal. It was aimed at the "Puritan Sabbath" to which the declaration ascribed two evils—the hindering of the conversion of Roman Catholics because Protestantism seemed to be too austere, and the fact that it did not keep men healthy and ready to fight in war, but rather caused them to become drunken. The declaration was reissued in 1633 by Charles I when a determined Archbishop Laud* forced it upon many unwilling clergy: they had to read it in their churches or else face expulsion. It was burned in 1643 by the Long Parliament. PETER TOON

BOOS, MARTIN (1762-1825). German preacher. After studying at Dillingen under J.M. Sailer,* he came under the influence of Michael Feneberg at Seeg Allgäu. Failing to find forgiveness through extreme asceticism, Boos adopted a doctrine of justification by faith which came very near to Lutheranism. Revival crowned the preaching at Wiggensbach in 1776/7. Put on trial for heterodoxy in 1797, he was acquitted. Accused again in 1798, he was compelled to flee to the diocese of Linz Austria. There he remained until he was forced to leave in 1816, when he became a religion teacher at a school in Düsseldorf. His final years were spent as parish priest at Sayn/Rhineland. The motto of Boos's life was "Christ for us and in us." WAYNE DETZLER

BOOTH, BALLINGTON (1857-1940). Founder of the Volunteers of America.* Born in Brighouse, England, second son of William Booth,* he early began his Salvation Army* work. An outstanding orator, musician, and leader, at twenty-three he was in charge of the first training home for officers. In 1883 he was sent to Australia as joint commander. Four years later he and his bride took over the recently established work in the United States. Strongly evangelistic, he proved a popular and effective leader. As a naturalized American he disagreed with his father about the British and authoritarian character of the Army. When ordered to relinquish his position, he complied, but then withdrew from the Army. In March 1896 he began the Volunteers, with similar objectives but more democratic organization.

HAROLD R. COOK

BOOTH, CATHERINE (1829-1890). "Mother of the Salvation Army"; wife of William Booth.* Born Catherine Mumford in Derbyshire, she was the daughter of a Wesleyan preacher. She was educated at home by her deeply religious mother. Later she lived in London, where she joined the Wesleyan Church at Brixton. She was expelled for her religious zeal, as was also William Booth, who preached there. They married in 1855, and had eight children. Husband and wife traveled widely preaching the Gospel. In 1864 they returned to London, and in 1865 started the Christian Revival Association (variously named) in Whitechapel; this is generally regarded as the start of the Salvation Army.* Catherine commenced the women's work, a prominent feature of the movement. For many years she continued her labors, though never out of pain. In 1890 she died of cancer; 36,000 people attended her funeral at Olympia.

BOOTH, EVANGELINE CORY (1865-1950). Salvation Army* leader. Seventh child of William Booth,* the founder, she was only fifteen when she became a sergeant. Conspicuous for her dedicated activity, she came to be a trouble-shooter in difficult situations, as when her brother Ballington* quit the Army in the USA. She was field commissioner of operations in London for five years and principal of the international training colleges. She was made commander in Canada in 1896, and opened work in the Klondike. In 1904 she became commander-in-chief in the USA; in thirty years she led it to record achievements in social services, including World War I activities. She was elected general of the worldwide organization in 1934 and retired to the USA in 1938.

BOOTH, WILLIAM (1829-1912). Founder and first general of the Salvation Army.* Born in Nottingham, he was converted in 1844 and became first a minister, then an evangelist, in the Methodist New Connexion Church. In 1861, however, he resigned because its leaders wanted to restrict him to a limited circuit. He became a free-lance evangelist and in 1865 began meetings in London's East End, where extreme poverty and hardship were the rule for most people. Gradually the work grew, was named "The Christian Mission," and spread to other centers. He was aided by his wife Catherine,* herself a gifted preacher. Both tackled social evils alongside his direct evangelism; by 1872 he was running five "Food-for-the-Million" shops, selling cheap meals. He and his colleagues were often attacked physically when preaching, but there were remarkable instances of lives transformed by the Gospel.

Military terminology was then the vogue ("Onward, Christian soldiers" was written in 1865), and one of Booth's leading helpers, Elijah Cadman, in 1877 advertised meetings in Whitby of "The Hallelujah Army Fighting for God." They labeled Booth "General," which was fitting because control of the Mission was centralized in Booth's hands. Then in 1878 the process was taken a final stage: the "Salvation Army" was born. In 1879 it had 81 mission stations manned by 127 full-time evangelists; and it had the first Salvation Army band, formed in Salisbury. Very soon the policy of setting sacred words to secular tunes was adopted; as Booth put it, "Why should the Devil have all the best tunes?"

In 1880 came the uniform, preceded in 1878 by the first volume of "Orders and Regulations for the Salvation Army." The military system was rigidly enforced, and Booth was undoubted commander-in-chief. As the Army grew, Booth and his tireless wife (helped by their children) set up training homes for cadets, and initiated overseas advances, to the USA, the Continent, and India. A new headquarters was opened in London in 1881, and by 1884 the Army had 900 corps, more than 266 of them outside Britain.

Booth was totally absorbed in the growth of the Army, which was fiercely and at times brutally opposed. Money was scarce, debts grew, scandals threatened to destroy the cause. In 1886 he toured the USA, pulling together an organization that had fragmented into three parts. In 1887 the sight of homeless men on London Bridge prompted Booth to start the Army's social work; careful inquiries showed desperate need. Cheap-food centers, night shelters, an unemployment exchange—all these he set up as his wife lay dying of cancer. The need was focused in his book In Darkest England—and the Way Out, finished in 1890 just before Catherine died. It was a best seller, a storm center of controversy. Booth planned Farm Colonies, a Missing Persons Bureau, a Poor Man's Bank, Legal Aid for the poor; he even set up a match factory to help expose the evils of a private enterprise firm in that same line of business.

Now virtually alone, Booth traveled the world, a figure of international renown. In 1904, aged seventy-five, he did a twenty-nine-day "automobile evangelistic" tour of Britain—1,224 miles and 164 meetings long. In 1907 he toured the USA. In 1908, nearly blind, he was in Scandinavia. In 1910 he visited Holland, Denmark, Germany, Switzerland, Italy. At last, in August 1912, he died; 150,000 people filed past his coffin; 40,000 attended his funeral. He had traveled five million miles, preached nearly 60,000 sermons, and drawn some 16,000 officers to serve in his Army.

BORBORIANS. A heretical sect with a reputation for licentious living and disbelief in future judgment, they are associated by Epiphanius about 370 with Ophite* Gnostics. Borboriani or Borboritae (i.e., "Mud Men") is commonly thought to be a nickname for Barbelitae, Gnostic worshipers of the female aeon Barbelo. In 428 they were forbidden to assemble or pray; in the sixth-century laws of Justinian against heretics they are described as a subsection of the Manichaeans.*

BORDEAUX PILGRIM. In A.D. 333/4 a man traveled from Bordeaux in Gaul to Jerusalem and back to Milan. He recorded his route and described the memorial sites which were shown to him in the Holy Land. He also described his stopping-places in Northern Italy, in the Balkan peninsula, in Constantinople, in Asia Minor, and in Syria. Most of his itinerary is concerned with the stages on the way, and his descriptions give little information, although he does tell of the buildings which Constantine and his family gave to the holy places. This firsthand source is the earliest record of a Western pilgrimage to the Holy Land.

BORGIA, FRANCIS (1510-1572). Jesuit.* Great-grandson of Pope Alexander VI and son of the duke of Gandia, he married Eleanor de Castro and had eight children. Charles V appointed him, after he had succeeded to his father's title, as viceroy of Catalonia, where he sought to reform the administration from corruption. His wife died in 1546 and a year later he was received privately into the Society of Jesus, being ordained priest in 1551. He was sent as commissary by Ignatius Loyola* to Spain and Portugal in 1554; he also had oversight of Jesuit work in the overseas empires. In 1561 he was summoned to Rome, where four years later he became the third general of the society. He had a deep interest in education and used his wealth to help found and build colleges or to improve what is now the Gregorian University of Rome. He was canonized by Clement X in 1671.

BORIS (d.907). Khan (king) of Bulgaria, 852-889. Christian missionary activity had taken place in Bulgaria as early as the seventh century, and perhaps even earlier. This early work in the Balkans was primarily under the direction of the Byzantine Church. The missionaries were effective, for by the eighth century there were Christians within the society and in the palaces of the princes. Boris became a convert to Orthodox Christianity by receiving baptism by the patriarch of Constantinople about 864. Because Byzantine theology linked church and state in a union, Boris's baptism carried overtones of entrance into the state as well as the church. Boris desired the church in Bulgaria to be independent, but Byzantium rejected this. The king of Bulgaria then encourged Western missionary activity, primarily German, to take place in his land. Pope Nicholas I sent Latin priests, and the Greek clergy were driven out. The Khan's alliance with Rome was short-lived, for Rome also did not approve his desire for Bulgarian church independence. The Byzantines in turn were forced to agree to a Bulgarian archbishopric which was semiautonomous.

BORNHOLMERS; BORNHOLMIANS. A popular designation of the Luthersk Missionsforening i Danmark (the Danish Lutheran Mission), which is an evangelical laymen's home mission movement within the Danish national church and, at the same time a society of foreign missions. It originates from a revival movement on the island of Bornholm in the 1860s and was officially formed in 1868. The influence from the nineteenth-century Swedish spiritual leader C.O. Rosenius has been of decisive importance for the history of the Lutheran Mission. Like that of Rosenius, the preaching of the latter has been characterized by a strong emphasis upon the total depravity of man, reconciliation solely through the vicarious atonement of Christ, justification by pure and free grace and through faith alone, and sanctification, not as a condition, but as a consequence of salvation. In addition, the Lutheran Mission is characterized by a special accentuation of the spiritual gifts and the universal priesthood of all believers, and a consequent craving for full freedom for the development of autonomous and independent lay activities within the framework of the national church. N.O. RASMUSSEN

BORROMEO, CHARLES (1538-1584). Archbishop of Milan. Of noble birth, he received his first benefice at twelve. He studied civil and canon law under Alciati, but when his uncle became Pius IV, Borromeo was called to Rome and appointed archbishop of Milan, cardinal secretary of state, protector of the Low Countries, Portugal, the Swiss Catholic cantons, and several religious orders. His humanist ideals were decisively channeled in the direction of reform by the death of his elder brother (1562) and his ordination to the priesthood (1563), which combined to inspire him to a more austere life. Besides playing an important role in the final session at Trent, he helped reform the College of Cardinals and was a reviser of the Missal and Breviary. His notable achievement was diocesan reform, and he has continued to be regarded as a model bishop, some of whose works were reprinted during Vatican II. Borromeo called his first provincial council in 1565, but was not permitted by the pope to take up residence in his see until 1566.

Skillful use of provincial and diocesan synods created a constitutional framework for reform and discipline. Careful attention was given to education of the clergy, and Borromeo founded six seminaries. Monasteries were reformed and clergy encouraged to join the Oblates of St. Ambrose (1578) in order to raise standards of pastoral care. Corrupt clergy and religious were disciplined, and feeling ran so high that an unsuccessful assassination attempt was made in 1569. Borromeo also had to contend with opposition from the Spanish governors of the city. Nevertheless he pressed on with the work of reform and education, made extensive use of the Jesuits, and founded a Confraternity of Christian Doctrine to help with the instruction of the young. Orphanages, refuges for deserted wives, and montes pietatis were founded through his pastoral zeal; his own work during the plague of 1576, when the civic officials had all fled, showed that he was himself a selfless pastor of the highest order. He continued to play an important role in Rome, advised neighboring dioceses, pursued heretics, consolidated the Catholic reformation in Switzerland, and personally visited neglected and remote Alpine valleys. Canonized in 1610, he was one of the greatest Catholic reformers.

BORROW, GEORGE HENRY (1803-1881). Author, linguist, traveler, and friend of gypsies. From 1818 he was articled to a firm of Norwich solicitors. He learned languages in his spare time, and in 1824 went to London where he carried out translation work for a publisher, for which he was grossly underpaid. Later, in great poverty, he left London as a tramp. From 1827 to 1840, and again in 1844 and 1854, Borrow wandered on foot in Europe and the East, working at various times for a newspaper and, both in Spain and in Russia, for the British and Foreign Bible Society.* In Spain he was arrested several times. He anticipated the dangers; he knew, he said, that "very possibly the fate of St. Stephen might overtake me." In 1840 he married and settled in England to write. Of his colorful books on travel, transcribed by his wife Mary from random jottings, The Bible in Spain (1841) brought him immediate fame. His later studies were much concerned with gypsies: they include a complete Romany dictionary. Over a dozen biographies of him have been written, the most recent those by M.D. Armstrong (George Borrow, 1950) and E. Bigland (In the Steps of George Borrow, 1951). R.E.D. CLARK

BORTHWICK, JANE LAURIE (1813-1897). She and her sister Sarah (Mrs. E.J. Findlater, 1823-1907), staunch supporters of the Free Church of Scotland, published anonymously Hymns from the Land of Luther (4 vols., 1854-62). The title of these translations supplied the initials "H.L.L." over which many of the hymns first appeared. A number were published as Thoughts for Thoughtful Hours (1857). A complete edition of H.L.L. (113 translations) was published in 1862; an 1884 edition added thirty-three "Alpine Lyrics" from the German-Swiss Meta Heusser-Schweizer (issued separately in 1875). The sisters' translations represented relatively more hymns for the Christian life and fewer for the Christian year than those of C. Winkworth.* Miss Borthwick's best-known translations are "Be still, my soul!" (K.A.D. von Schlegel); "How blessed, from the bonds of sin" (Spitta); "Jesus, still lead on" (Zinzendorf); and "Jesus, Sun of Righteousness" (Knorr von Rosenroth). Mrs. Findlater's are "O happy home" (Spitta), which reflects the type of home enjoyed by both author and translator, and "God calling yet!" (Tersteegen). They wrote also some original hymns. JOHN S. ANDREWS

BORTHWICK, SARAH, see previous entry

BOSCH, HIERONYMOUS (Jeroen den Bosch) (c.1450-c.1516). Dutch painter. Born in Brabant at Den Bosch, he did most of his work in that area. He received commissions from the Hapsburg ruler of much of the Low Countries, Philip, duke of Burgundy, grandfather of Philip II of Spain, who also liked Bosch's paintings and collected many of them at Madrid. Bosch is best known for his mature works (The Haywagon, the Garden of Delights, the Ship of Fools, etc.), which contain dreamlike vistas filled with fantastic details—weird hybrid figures, mixtures of human, mechanical, animal, vegetable—done with striking technique and vibrant color. His grotesquerie was imitated by Jan Mandijn and others; his landscape and color techniques were an important influence on Pieter Breughel as well as on lesser figures. Despite suggestions that he was connected with heretical sectarianism, his sometimes strange paintings can more easily be explained in terms of the more general late-Gothic use of fantasy in sculpture, mystery plays, and the like.

See L. Baldass, Hieronymus Bosch (1960).

DIRK JELLEMA

BOSCO, JOHN (Giovanni Melchior Bosco) (1815-1888). Roman Catholic educationist and founder of the Salesian Order. He was born in near poverty at Becchi, Italy, was ordained priest in 1841, and worked in anticlerical Turin where the plight of poor boys in the city led him to pledge his life to them. He especially hoped to prepare some for the priesthood. His persistence overcame many difficulties of finance and accommodation, and his early efforts led to the establishment of night schools and eventually technical schools, workshops, and a church in Turin. In 1859 he founded the Society of St. Francis of Sales (Salesians*), which has now spread all over the world. Reason, kindness, and Christian faith were the basis of his educational philosophy, known as the "preventive" system. "As far as possible avoid punishing," he said. "Try to gain love before inspiring fear." He was canonized in 1934.

HOWARD SAINSBURY

BOSSUET, JACQUES BENIGNE (1627-1704). French Roman Catholic bishop and writer. Born at Dijon, he was educated in Jesuit schools there until sent to the Parisian Collège de Navarre at the age of fifteen. He became a doctor of the Sorbonne in 1652 and was ordained the same year. For seven years he served as archdeacon of the cathedral chapter at Metz, then moved to Paris in 1659 where within two years he had become preacher in the royal chapel. In 1670 Louis XIV appointed him tutor to the dauphin, a task he performed for twelve years with great diligence. In 1681 he became bishop of Meaux, a post he held until his death.

Bossuet had a many-faceted career, but was particularly renowned for his great oratorical skill, his controversialist ability, and his energetic but nonschismatic espousal of Gallicanism.* He also provided a classical statement of the Divine Right of Kings* theory in his Politique tirée de l'Ecriture

Sainte (1679). He apparently, however, regarded his Discours sur l'histoire universelle (1681) as his most important work, and most modern scholars would agree. It is a classic statement of the philosophy of history which sees Providence as the key to historical causation. His latter years saw him more and more entrenched as the guardian of orthodoxy in the face of biblical criticism, rationalism, skepticism, and various sectarian groups.

BRIAN G. ARMSTRONG

BOSTON, THOMAS (1676-1732). Scottish Presbyterian minister and scholar. Born in Duns, Berwickshire, he read arts and divinity at Edinburgh and was a recognized Hebraist. After ordination he held pastorates in his native county and (most notably) at Ettrick, Selkirkshire, where he was installed on the day of the union with England in 1707. An English Puritan work, The Marrow of Modern Divinity, greatly influenced him, and despite its ban because of its Arminianism, his own writings popularized its doctrines. Implicated in the "Marrow case," he emerged without stain, demonstrating his profound theological thought. Leading a life of deep prayer, he performed many exemplary parochial tasks. Illness never prevented his preaching, and even on his last two Sundays, too feeble for the pulpit, he preached from the manse window on self-examination. His books are Human Nature in its Fourfold Estate (1720), Notes to the Marrow of Modern Divinity (1726), A View of the Covenant of Grace (1734), An Illustration of the Doctrines of the Christian Religion (1773), and many other treatises and volumes of sermons.

C.G. THORNE, JR.

BOTTICELLI, SANDRO (1445-1510). Florentine painter. He epitomizes in his masterpieces of painting the changes from the period of scholastic Christendom during the early Renaissance: grace no longer means a realm of God's favor superadded on beyond nature; now grace is simply a human posture of beautiful, leisurely dalliance, a concatenated quality of feminine loveliness, flowers, love apples and embroidered clothes. The whole Medici world of Lorenzo the Magnificent and Marsilio Ficino's ideal of blending pagan culture and biblical truth into one glorious, new feast of human purity and effortless radiance is captured by Botticelli's work. He painted portraits of the Medici family as wise men into his Magi Adoring the Christ Child, immortalizing his patrons as it were with a sanctified splendor. In both the famous Spring painting (c.1478) and Birth of Venus (c.1485) the figures semi-float off the ground in a weightless, nymphlike dance that has a flutter of decorative delicacy to it. Botticelli's Venus may duplicate the ancient, voluptuous Aphrodite sculptures, but his decolorized treatment and the lilting, well-outlined, suspended movement of the bodies chastens to innocence any sensuousness, with an allegorical, ritual character. That is Botticelli's significant achievement: canonizing the pagan kalokagathon ethic in the Renaissance mentality without offending Christian sensibility of the time, spiritualizing the gods and goddesses of pre-Christian mythology to cultural sweetness and light. Late in life, however, while Columbus was discovering the Americas for Spain, Botticelli was converted by Savonarola's* evangelistic crusade in Florence; his latest paintings (cf., e.g., Nativity in National Gallery of London) began to forsake the aura of wispy, nostalgic finery and introduce a more rough-hewn, zigzagged, earthy reality.

CALVIN SEERVELD

BOUNDS, EDWARD McKENDREE (1835-1913). American Methodist minister and devotional writer. Born in Missouri, he studied law and at twenty-one was admitted to the bar. After practicing three years, he was called to preach in the Methodist Episcopal Church South. During the Civil War he served as captain in the Confederate army and was captured. The war over, he again served pastorates in Tennessee, Alabama, and Missouri. For nine years he was editor of the St. Louis Christian Advocate, the official organ of the church. His "Spiritual Life Books" come from the last decades of his life, when he was free from the day-to-day responsibilities of the pastorate. They have had a wide ministry in many denominations.

HAROLD R. COOK

BOURCHIER, THOMAS (1404?-1486). Archbishop of Canterbury from 1455. Educated at Oxford, where he lived in Nevill's Inn, he was ordained and eventually, not of full canonical age, received the see of Worcester in 1434. That same year he became chancellor of Oxford, a post he held three years. In 1444 he moved to the bishopric of Ely, and eleven years later, after the death of John Kempe, he was promoted to Canterbury. For a short time he acted as lord chancellor, with his brother Henry as lord treasurer. In 1457 he took part in the deprivation of Reginald Pecock,* bishop of Chichester, for supposed heresy. Inevitably he was involved in the struggles between the Houses of Lancaster and York, and he became such a decided Yorkist that he crowned Edward IV and his queen. Pope Paul made him a cardinal in 1467, but his red hat did not arrive until 1473. Not long before his death he officiated at the marriage of Henry VII and Elizabeth of York, thus joining the red with the white rose.

PETER TOON

BOURDALOUE, LOUIS (1632-1704). "The king of orators and the orator of kings." Born in Bourges, he became a Jesuit in 1648. After teaching in provincial houses, he began preaching in Amiens in 1666 and speedily made a reputation. In 1669, he went to Paris and made a deep impression on the court with his splendid oratory, skillful exposition of Catholic orthodoxy, and passion to win his hearers' consent by carefully reasoned argument within a traditional rhetorical framework. A skilled pastor and confessor, he gave the same attention to the prisoners and the sick as to the famous and wealthy, and was a living answer to the attacks of B. Pascal* against the Jesuits. In addition to being an opponent of the Jansenists,* he was used successfully to convert Montpellier Protestants after the revocation of the Edict of Nantes.* IAN BREWARD

BOURGEOIS, LOUIS (1510-1561). French Protestant musician. Invited to come to Geneva about the time of Calvin's return in 1541, he four years later took the place of Guillaume LeFrenc as chief musician of the city. In 1551, because of some of the tunes he published, he was imprisoned, but was released on the plea of Calvin. In 1557, apparently unable to withstand the rigorous attitude of the Genevan city fathers, he returned to Paris, where he died. In 1547 he produced a harmonization of Clement Marot's* psalms, using some currently popular tunes, some from the psalter of Strasbourg, and some which he himself composed.

BOURIGNON, ANTOINETTE (1616-1680). Enthusiast and visionary. Born at Lille in the Spanish Netherlands, she was brought up as a Roman Catholic. An unusual child, she withdrew from ordinary social life and became convinced that God spoke to her in visions and chose her to be a new Eva, a new Mary, the "woman clothed with the sun" of Revelation 12, with the mission of reforming Christianity. Attacking all established churches, she taught the inner light, direct contact with God, and the destruction of man's sinful ego. By her late forties she began attracting disciples; after a sojourn on Nordstrand in the North Sea, she moved to Hamburg, where the mystic P. Poiret joined her, and died in Friesland on her way to Amsterdam. Her extreme version of Quietism* was spread by her followers and gained support in Scotland (where Presbyterian assemblies denounced the movement in the early 1700s). The sect gradually faded out in the course of the 1700s. Her extensive and rambling writings were published by Poiret in Amsterdam, 1679-84, in twenty-one volumes.

BOURNE, HUGH (1772-1852). Founder of the Primitive Methodist Church.* Born at Stoke-on-Trent, he joined the Wesleyan Methodists, and in 1802 built a chapel for them at his own expense. By this time a local preacher, he organized with others in 1807 a camp meeting* of the type that had proved so successful in the USA. It was the first of many, despite the disapproval of his denomination, which eventually expelled him. Unwillingly Bourne organized a separate body which held its first conference in 1820, with a name that indicated a desire to restore Methodism to its primitive simplicity. Bourne journeyed to Scotland, Ireland, and the USA, and was everywhere well received, and by the time he died the movement had some 110,000 members. The body was not styled "church" until 1902; in 1932 nearly a quarter of a million Primitive Methodists in Great Britain united with others in the new Methodist Church. Bourne was a man of high principle and a total abstainer; for most of his life he worked as carpenter and builder so he would not be a charge on his church. J.D. DOUGLAS

BOWEN, GEORGE (1816-1888). American missionary called the "White Saint of India." Born in Middlebury, Vermont, his early life was irreligious. In 1844 his dying sweetheart gave him a Bible, which became the means of his conversion and of his decision to become a missionary. After seminary training he was appointed to the Marathi Mission by the American Board.* From 1848 to 1888 he served in the Bombay region, unmarried and without furlough. After a year on the field he determined to live a life of self-denial as a self-supporting missionary on the level of the people. In 1872, influenced by William Taylor,* he joined the Methodist Church in India. By his writings, and particularly through editing the Bombay Guardian, he strongly influenced both missionaries and Indians. HAROLD R. COOK

BOWING. A physical gesture used in Christian worship, performed—like genuflecting, kneeling, and prostration—to express reverence. It may be directed towards a person, e.g., the bishop; an object, e.g., the altar; or it may be a response to an utterance, e.g., the name of Jesus. It may also be used by the minister to express thanks to someone for assistance in the service. The origin of the use of bowing is problematical. Bowing to bishops was part of the court ceremonial introduced into the church in the time of Constantine, who gave bishops the rank of imperial officials. Bowing at the name of Jesus is obviously suggested by Philippians 2:10. In the Church of England it was approved by canon 18 of 1604 (cf. canon B9 of 1969), although its observance has been generally restricted to the creed. The further practice of bowing toward the altar was ordered by Archbishop Laud's ill-fated canons of 1640, which were of disputed legality and never took effect. JOHN TILLER

BOWRING, SIR JOHN (1792-1872). English linguist, writer, traveler, diplomat. He served for some time as a member of Parliament before going to the Far East in the foreign service. After a period as consul in Canton, he eventually became governor of Hong Kong. For his research work he was made a Fellow of the Royal Society. Author of many poems and hymns, he is now chiefly remembered for his "In the cross of Christ I glory," written in 1825 and made famous by Stainer in his oratorio The Crucifixion (1887). Also well known is "Watchman! tell us of the night."

BOY BISHOP. A name given in medieval times to the leader of choirboys' revels, elected on St. Nicholas' Day (6 December), who executed the functions of the bishop until Holy Innocents' Day (28 December). Originating in cathedrals, the custom spread to larger monastic and scholastic establishments. In England it proved more popular and enduring than the Feast of Fools*; it was not finally abolished until the reign of Elizabeth I.

BOYCE, WILLIAM (1710-1779). English composer. Trained as a chorister at St. Paul's Cathedral, and a pupil of the distinguished organist Maurice Greene, Boyce was organist of several London churches, and from 1758 to 1769 of the Chapel Royal. He was forced to retire because of loss of hearing and devoted his last years to his great historic anthology, Cathedral Music in three volumes. This collection did much to keep alive the great music of such men as Byrd and Gibbons. Boyce was a fine and voluminous composer in his own right, producing music of all kinds. He is certainly the best native English composer of the later eighteenth century, and he was known also for his excellent personal qualities.

J.B. MAC MILLAN

BOYLE, ROBERT (1627-1691). Natural philosopher. Fourteenth child of the great earl of Cork, he was educated at Eton till eleven, then traveled with a tutor. A violent storm in Geneva in 1641 led to his conversion; thereafter his life, talents, possessions were dedicated to Christ. As an Anglican he favored a national church to include Nonconformists* (toward whom he was singularly tolerant). Though ordination was often pressed upon him, with tempting preferment, Boyle refused, believing that the taking of vows led men to suppress their doubts. For the same reason he refused the presidency of the Royal Society, of which he was co-founder. In his day Boyle's reputation was comparable with that of his contemporary and friend Isaac Newton.* He wrote voluminously and exerted a profound influence on subsequent thought in science ("The Father of Chemistry"; originator of chemical analysis; "Boyle's Law"), philosophy (through Locke), and theology. His views on science and theology are surprisingly modern; he identified the "nitre" of the Bible with native sodium carbonate, financed much Christian work and Bible translation, and endowed the Boyle Lectures. He loved science passionately as God's "second book," revealing His power and wisdom. To fight science, he supposed, was to fight God. His mission in life was to convince men that God's two "books" were in harmony. His Seraphic Love (1660), a gem of Christian literature, went through many editions.

BOYS' BRIGADE. The pioneer of uniformed, voluntary organizations for boys or girls, it was founded in Scotland by William A. Smith in 1883, for "the advancement of Christ's Kingdom among boys and the promotion of habits of obedience, reverence, discipline, self-respect and all that tends towards a true Christian manliness." In the uniform, in the ordered life of the company, and in the progressive program and award system, it appeals to and meets the needs of a boy's nature. The movement, which provides for boys in the eight-to-nineteen age range, has spread all over the world and currently has more than 3,000 companies (140,000 boys) in the United Kingdom, and nearly 2,000 companies (80,000 boys) in other countries. In 1971 the executive reaffirmed that the Boys' Brigade "must remain a Church-centred organisation, with the purpose of helping boys to achieve a true Christian faith. . . ."

J.D. DOUGLAS

BRABOURNE, THEOPHILUS (1590-c.1661). Controversialist. Frustrated in his plans to enter university and the ministry, he worked for a time in his father's hosiery business in London. After private study he was eventually ordained and preached in Norwich. His idiosyncratic views began to appear with two pamphlets in which he argued that Saturday should be observed as the Christian Sabbath (Discourse upon the Sabbath Day, 1629; and Defence . . . of the Sabbath Day, 2nd ed., 1632). The latter was more dogmatic and brought him eighteen months' imprisonment. One of the judges at the trial desired to burn him as a heretic. After this Brabourne gave up the ministry, but did not attempt to found any sect and wrote against separation from the national church. His last pamphlet (1661) attacked Quaker scruples over the oath of allegiance and supremacy.

JOHN TILLER

BRADBURY, WILLIAM BATCHELDER (1816-1868). American music teacher and hymntune writer. He studied music in Boston under Summer Hill and Lowell Mason* and became a music instructor and organist in New York City. He also edited over fifty Sunday school and choir music books, and he engaged in piano manufacturing. From 1847 he studied for two years in Leipzig. He was criticized because he treated music as a business and was not essentially a performer. He is best remembered for his hymntunes, two of the most famous being used for "Just as I am" and "He leadeth me." Both represent Bradbury at his best, with simple yet reverent expression.

ROBERT C. NEWMAN

BRADFORD, JOHN (1510-1555). Protestant martyr. Educated at grammar school in Manchester, he saw service at Boulogne and the siege of Montreuil in 1544 under Sir John Harrington, paymaster to the English forces. Admitted to the Inner Temple in 1547, he turned to a study of divinity at the instance of a fellow-student, T. Sampson (later dean of Christ Church). Taking his Cambridge M.A. in 1549, Bradford became a fellow of Pembroke Hall, where John Whitgift* was among his pupils and the continental Reformer Martin Bucer* a personal friend. In the following year he was ordained deacon, and for his ability and sympathy to the Reformation licensed to preach by Nicholas Ridley.* In 1551 he became prebendary of St. Paul's and a royal chaplain. Arrested in 1553, he was imprisoned in the Tower, first with Edwin Sandys,* then with Ridley, Hugh Latimer,* and Thomas Cranmer* for a time. After examination he was burnt at Smithfield. "A bold, intrepid yet sweet and earnest preacher," he was of singularly gentle character and "of more soft and mild nature than many of his fellows" (Parsons). His complete works were published in two volumes by the Parker Society (1848, 1853).

G.S.R. COX

BRADFORD, WILLIAM (1589?-1657). Second governor of Plymouth Colony; writer. Baptized in 1590 in Yorkshire, England, he is referred to by Cotton Mather* as the Moses who brought the Pilgrims out from England to the New Canaan. He governed the colony for most of the years between 1621 and 1656. Bradford wrote the History of Plymouth Plantation, a historical masterpiece, describing how God had providentially led the Pilgrims in the creation of their new society between 1620 and 1646. His scholarship and managerial ability were great, but, in Mather's words, "the crown of all was his holy, prayerful, watchful and fruitful walk with God, wherein he was very exemplary." JOHN D. WOODBRIDGE

BRADWARDINE, THOMAS (c.1290-1349). Archbishop of Canterbury in 1349. A native of Chichester, he studied at Merton College, Oxford, achieving great distinction in mathematics and divinity, and earning the nickname "the Profound Doctor." At Oxford he was elected chancellor and professor of divinity. Among other honors he was appointed chaplain and confessor to Edward III, whom he accompanied abroad on his French campaign. He was appointed archbishop of Canterbury in 1349, but died of the Black Death* within forty days of consecration. Through his influence Oxford University was freed from subservience to the bishop of Oxford. In theology, Bradwardine's attack on Pelagianism* in which he stressed God's grace and irresistible will as the ultimate cause of events paved the way for the later development of the doctrine of predestination. He also wrote extensively on mathematical subjects. R.E.D. CLARK

BRADY, NICHOLAS (1659-1726). Irish clergyman. Born in County Cork, he was educated at Westminster School; Christ's College, Oxford; and Trinity College, Dublin. After ordination he became prebendary of Cork in 1688. He was a staunch supporter of the Prince of Orange in 1690, and after James II had ordered the destruction of his hometown of Bandon, Brady was successful on three occasions in preventing its burning. Returning to England, he presented the grievances of the people of Bandon to Parliament. Later he held various livings in London, translated the classics (Virgil, etc.), was chaplain to royalty, and with Nahum Tate* wrote a metrical version of the Psalms which was in constant use until about 1800. Parts of this are still to be found in modern hymnbooks (e.g., "As pants the heart" and "Through all the changing scenes of life"). Many of his sermons were published.
R.E.D. CLARK

BRAHMS, JOHANNES (1833-1897). German composer. Born in Hamburg, he showed extraordinary musical gifts at a very early age. Like Beethoven* before him, he later settled in Vienna where he was active as a choral conductor as well as being the foremost composer of symphonic and chamber music of the late Romantic era. Although he was not a church musician, he was grounded in the historic traditions of Lutheran church music, much of which he edited. He was one of the first to seek to perform the cantatas of Bach* in an authentic manner. He composed a small number of beautiful sacred motets after the example of Schütz* and Bach. His great choral masterpiece is A German Requiem. Using entirely words from the German Bible, it has no relation to the Requiem Mass of the Roman rite. It might justly be regarded as the greatest major sacred choral work of the nineteenth century. J.B. MAC MILLAN

BRAINERD, DAVID (1718-1747). Pioneer missionary to North American Indians. Born at Haddam, Connecticut, he had a profound conversion experience in 1739 and thereafter went to Yale College. Expelled in 1742 through misdemeanors arising out of "intemperate, indiscreet zeal" (Edwards), he studied divinity privately and was licensed to preach. The Scottish Society for the Propagation of Christian Knowledge appointed him missionary to the Indians, and he labored diligently in eastern Pennsylvania amid severe hardships until overcome by disease. By November 1745 he had ridden over 3,000 miles on horseback, and in the years 1745-46 saw, in his own words, "a remarkable work of grace." By March 1746 more than 130 Indians had been converted. Increasing illness forced his retirement, and his work was taken over by his brother John. He died at the New England home of Jonathan Edwards.* His Journal became a devotional classic, influencing hundreds to become missionaries.
J.G.G. NORMAN

BRAMHALL, JOHN (1594-1663). Irish archbishop and primate. Born at Pontefract, Yorkshire, he attended a local school, then entered Sidney Sussex College, Cambridge (1608). He came under the influence of the master, Samuel Ward, who represented the Church of England at the Synod of Dort in 1621 and from whom he derived his Anglo-Catholic leanings. After eight brilliant years at Cambridge he had two brief pastorates in Yorkshire. Marriage to a wealthy lady enabled him to devote his time to reading and study. His leadership in the Church of England seemed assured when he was appointed a high commissioner by Charles I. He was invited to undertake the difficult task of reorganizing the Church in Ireland, and was successively archdeacon of Meath (1633), bishop of Derry (1634), and archbishop of Armagh and Primate of All Ireland (1660). Jeremy Taylor* preached his funeral sermon. He used his great gifts as speaker in the Irish House of Lords, in brilliant controversies with Hobbes, Baxter,* and the Puritans generally, and as one of the outstanding preachers of his day. His bitter opposition to Cromwell led to exile from 1648 to 1660.
ADAM LOUGHRIDGE

BRAMWELL, WILLIAM (1759-1818). Wesleyan preacher and revivalist. Born in Elswick, Lancashire, of well-to-do, devout Anglican parents, he was the tenth of eleven children. He was apprenticed to a currier but, devoting his spare time to Bible study, he came under deep conviction of sin and found Christ as Savior for himself. Lacking Christian companionship among Anglicans, he joined the unpopular "Wesleyan devils" to the consternation of his parents. After entering the ministry he preached in various Wesleyan circuits, often with great power, for the rest of his life. He is remembered for the hundreds he led to God, for his unfailing generosity, for his self-denial, and his remarkable clairvoyant power by which he came to know intimate details about the lives of those he encountered. Preaching to the last, he died suddenly after declaring that the Lord had told him that he had only a little while to live. R.E.D. CLARK

BRANT, JOSEPH (Indian name: Thayendanegea) (1742-1807). Christian Mohawk chief. Born near the Ohio River, he became an Anglican convert to Christianity. The English called his stepfather Brant. When Sir William Johnson was Indian commissioner, he sent Joseph, whose sister he was later to marry, to be educated in Connecticut and afterwards made him his assistant. Chosen chief of the Mohawks, Brant visited England in 1775. There he was lionized and promised to lead 3,000 Indians on the royalist side. Appointed captain in the British army, he was involved in the Cherry Valley Massacre of 1778. In 1785 he was presented at court, and the king gave him an estate at the head of Lake Ontario. He built the first church in Upper Canada. HAROLD R. COOK

BRAY, THOMAS (1656-1730). Anglican divine and missionary promoter. Born at Marton, Shropshire, and educated at Oswestry School and Oxford, he became rector of Sheldon, Warwick, in 1690. Five years later he was appointed commissary for Maryland by H. Compton,* bishop of London, to establish the churches there, but found that he could only enlist poor men unable to buy books. He worked at a scheme to form parochial libraries in the colonies and then at home in every deanery in England and Wales, so that by his death more than eighty existed in the United Kingdom and thirty-nine in North America, some of over 1,000 volumes. Out of other educational projects developed the Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge (1698). In 1699 Bray at last reached Maryland, but found that he could develop his projects better at home. He returned to found the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel (1701). Rector of St. Botolph-Without, Aldgate, in 1706, he continued to develop his libraries, but failed in his attempts to provide a bishop for New England. G.S.R. COX

BRAY, WILLIAM ("Billy") (1794-1868). Methodist preacher. Born near Truro, Cornwall, son of a mining convert from Wesley's visit, he entered a mine after his father's early death, was dismissed, and lived a dissipated life as a publican. He was converted after reading Bunyan* and thereafter spent his life preaching, often ill-clad, hungry, and sleeping outdoors. His wonderful joy in Christ, powers of repartee, and wit made him famous throughout Cornwall. "I am the son of a King," he would say; prayer he called "cutting the devil's ould claws." He saw to it that "his wheels were kept nicely oiled and ready for work."

BRÉBEUF, JEAN DE (1593-1649). Jesuit missionary to Canada. He entered the Jesuit novitiate in Rouen, France, at the age of twenty-four, was ordained in 1622, and in 1625 commissioned to go to New France with Charles Lalemant and E. Massé. On his first visit to the Huron country he traveled some 800 miles by canoe, carefully chronicling the event. After the capture of Quebec by the Kirke brothers, he returned briefly to France. On his second visit to the Huron country he founded a permanent mission under the direction of Paul Le Jeune. His missionary ambitions were thwarted by epidemics, low moral standards, and animosity among Indian nations. Brébeuf's description of the missionary endeavors in the Jesuit Relations is an invaluable sociopolitical commentary of the Huron milieu of the day. He and others were massacred at the hands of the Iroquois in 1649. EDWARD J. FURCHA

BREMOND, HENRI (1865-1933). Roman Catholic scholar. Member of the Society of Jesus from 1882-1904, he left on account of "incompatibility of temperament." Friend of the Catholic Modernists, though not himself one, he was especially influenced by Blondel* and by J.H. Newman,* whom he discovered while in England and discussed in his controversial The Mystery of Newman (ET 1907). Among many works, his greatest was Histoire littéraire du sentiment religieux en France, depuis les guerres de religion jusqu'à nos jours (11 vols., 1915-33). He used literary rather than theological sources to describe the spiritual revival in French Catholicism in France in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, portraying the devout humanism of the saints with psychological penetration. Volumes 7-11 became more of an exposition and defense of their teaching on prayer. Bremond was particularly interested in the close relation between mysticism and poetry. His scholarship, dialectical skill, and human insight were recognized by his election to the Academie Française in 1924.

HADDON WILLMER

BRENT, CHARLES HENRY (1862-1929). Canadian bishop and ecumenist. Born in Ontario, he was educated at Trinity College, Toronto, and ordained in 1887. After serving a parish in Boston, he was elected bishop of the missionary district of the Protestant Episcopal Church in the Philippines, and while serving there was a leader in the fight against the opium traffic. He was elected bishop of Western New York in 1917 and from 1926 to 1928 was in charge of the Episcopal churches in Europe. In his later years he gave much time to conferences promoting Christian unity. On returning from the Edinburgh Conference* of 1910 he induced the general convention of the Protestant Episcopal Church to convene a "World Conference on Faith and Order." He was elected president of the conference, held at Lausanne in 1927 (see LAUSANNE CONFERENCE). He held that all Christian groups belonging to such movements had something to contribute to all the others, and that such a great church would thereby become the repository of the great spiritual, intellectual, and moral wealth of the Christian centuries. His works included The Mind of Christ in the Church of the Living God (1908), Presence (1914), and The Mount of Vision (1918).

KEITH J. HARDMAN

BRENZ, JOHANN (1499-1570). German Reformer. He entered the University of Heidelberg in 1514 and came under the influence of Oecolampadius* and Luther. Ordained priest in 1520, he was appointed to the town of Hall in Swabia (1522), but was so strongly attracted to the Reformed position that he ceased celebrating Mass in 1523 and gave himself to biblical exposition. Among his works, published in an incomplete edition in Tübingen (1576-90), are many expository writings. He took a firm stand against the Peasants' Revolt* in 1525, but was compelled to flee from Hall in 1548, when it was captured by the imperial forces in the Smalcaldic War. He found protection under Duke Ulrich of Württemberg, who appointed him as minister of the collegiate church of Stuttgart, where he gave outstanding service to the Reformed cause. He took a prominent part in theological discussions of his time and was one of the members of the conference on doctrine called by Philip of Hesse at Marburg in 1529. He aligned himself with Luther on the doctrine of the Lord's Supper, and in 1525 published his Syngramma Suevicum, expounding Lutheran teaching on the presence of Christ in the sacrament.

HUGH J. BLAIR

BRES, GUIDO DE (c.1522-1567). Protestant martyr. Little is known about his early life except that he was born in Mons, Hainaut, and fled to England about 1548, where he joined a refugee congregation in London. Returning home to Belgium in 1552, he played a leading part in establishment and nurture of congregations until once again forced to flee in 1561 from the Spanish authorities who were increasingly concerned about the inroads of Protestantism and the growing Huguenot* influence. Deeply disturbed at the anarchic tendencies of many of his co-religionists, de Bres emphasized the importance of obedience to the magistrate and worked closely with William of Orange. When Valenciennes was besieged by the Spaniards, de Bres failed to persuade the radicals to surrender and was himself executed for rebellion when the city fell. His concern for unity, pastoral zeal, and theological leadership (he helped to draft the Belgic Confession*) made him a notable Reformer.

BRETHREN IN CHRIST. This church originated in a society founded between 1775 and 1788 along the Susquehanna River near the present town of Marietta in Lancaster County, Pennsylvania. The initial group name was "Brethren." Jacob and John Engel of Swiss Mennonite* ancestry were two prominent leaders. The Brethren synthesized into a new pattern concepts already present in the religious life of their community. To a personal, conscious experience of the new birth, as stressed by the eighteenth-century Pietistic awakening, they joined concern for discipleship and restitution of the visible church along NT lines, as emphasized by Anabaptist* tradition. Late in the nineteenth century they accepted Wesleyan perfectionism as the third principal element of their eclectic faith. After a century of relative quiescence and slow growth, the group burst into new activity. They began Sunday schools, orphanages, and a home for the aged, supported higher education, founded a church periodical (Evangelical Visitor), and launched into formal evangelism and missions at home and overseas. In 1970 more than one-third of their 17,000 members were in mission churches in India, Japan, Nicaragua, Rhodesia, and Zambia.

Soon after their origin, the Brethren in the USA became "River Brethren," and in Canada, to which their faith was carried in 1788, they became "Tunkers." About 1862 the River Brethren changed their name to "Brethren in Christ"; in 1933 the Canadian branch of the movement also adopted the latter name. Three other living churches—Old Order River Brethren (Yorkers), United Zion Children, and Calvary Holiness—share a common heritage with the Brethren in Christ. The first two emerged from divisions within the River Brethren movement in the mid-nineteenth century; the third separated from the parent stock in 1962.

The Brethren in Christ are affiliated with the Mennonite Central Committee, the National Association of Evangelicals, and the National Holiness Association. Their headquarters are at Evangel Press, Nappanee, Indiana, and their archives at Messiah College, Grantham, Pennsylvania.

CARLTON O. WITTLINGER

BRETHREN OF THE COMMON LIFE. During the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries in Germany and the Netherlands, a rising tide of mystical lay piety grew up outside the official church. Under the leadership of Gerhard Groote* (1340-84), an interest in the inner life of the soul and the necessity of imitating the life of Christ by loving one's neighbor as oneself had become popular in the Low Countries. When the church ordered Groote to stop preaching, he retired to Deventer, his hometown, and gathered a commune around him. It was this group that, led by Florentius* Radewijns after Groote's death, founded the association known as the Brethren of the Common Life. The movement spread from one city to another as houses for men and also for women were founded throughout the Netherlands and Germany. These were to continue until the Reformation era. The Brethren did not constitute regular religious orders, but they took informal vows. They were entirely self-supporting, but pooled their money in a common fund from which each drew expenses, the surplus being used for charity. Groote had urged the copying of books as a method of earning a living and also to make reading materials more available. This work led to the founding of schools in many communities. From these emerged many influential religious leaders and humanists, such as Nicholas of Cusa* and Erasmus.* One pupil, Thomas à Kempis,* wrote The Imitation of Christ, which gives an understanding of the spirit and the teaching of the movement.

See A. Hyma, The Christian Renaissance, a History of the Devotio Moderna (1924); and T.P. Van Zijl, G. Groote, Ascetic and Reformer (1963).

ROBERT G. CLOUSE

BREVIARY. The liturgical book of the Roman Catholic Church which contains the material used in the Daily Office. Prior to the late eleventh century, this material was not collected together, but divided into separate books according to its constituent parts—e.g., Antiphonary, etc. In the Breviary the material is arranged under the "common of time" (called the Psalter, since the recitation of the psalter forms the basis of all the daily offices); the "proper of time" (i.e., seasonal variations); the "common of saints"; and the "proper of saints." This cycle of prayer had developed under monastic influence from its primitive Christian original into a system of seven daytime hours (Lauds to Compline) and a night office (Matins). In the Middle Ages, commemoration of the saints obscured the early scheme of Bible reading and weekly coverage of the Psalter. An attempt was made by Cardinal Quignon to reform the Breviary in 1535, and his work was known to Cranmer.* In medieval England the Breviary was often called the "portiforium" or "portuise."

JOHN TILLER

BREWSTER, WILLIAM (1567-1644). Founding member of Plymouth Colony. Born in Scrooby, England, he attended Cambridge University, where he acquired Separatist* ideas. He served the English ambassador to Holland for several years. Returning to Scrooby in 1589, he became a leading member of the small Puritan congregation which separated from the established church in 1606. Because of persecution the Separatists migrated to Holland in 1608 with their leaders John Robinson* as teacher and Brewster as elder. Brewster supported himself by printing Puritan books. He favored immigration to America, and in 1620 sailed on the Mayflower and helped establish Plymouth Colony. He became one of the most important members, playing a major role in its civil and financial affairs. He was the only church officer until 1629, but though he led the congregation in praise and prayer and in teaching the Bible and Christian doctrine, he did not preach or administer the sacraments because he was not an ordained minister.

HARRY SKILTON

BRIAND, JEAN OLIVER (1715-1794). Roman Catholic bishop. Native of France, he went to Canada in 1741 to follow Bishop Pontbriand. During the siege of Quebec by the British he directed diocesan affairs in the absence of the bishop. He is generally hailed as the second founder of the Catholic Church in Canada because of the reconciling manner with which he hailed the British under General Murray for their humanity toward the conquered in 1763. Though Roman Catholicism was officially outlawed, the British government gave informal consent to his consecration as "superintendent of the Roman Church in Canada" in 1766. He kept the French passively loyal to the British crown. His Catechism (1765) is one of the first books printed in Canada. Due to his efforts, the Quebec Act and the Habeas Corpus Act of 1774 broadened the privileges of Roman Catholics as British subjects. He consecrated his successors before resigning his see.

EDWARD J. FURCHA

BRIDAINE, JACQUES (1701-1767). French Roman Catholic preacher. He conducted missions in towns and villages all across France; these led to many conversions. His style of preaching was extemporaneous in a day when this was extremely rare. Bridaine edited a volume of Cantiques spirituals (Spiritual Songs, 1748) which passed through more than fifty editions. A number of books containing his thoughts and sermons were published, including five volumes of sermons.

BRIDE, see BRIDGET OF IRELAND

BRIDGE, WILLIAM (1600-1670). Nonconformist* preacher. Born in Cambridgeshire and educated at Emmanuel College, Cambridge, where he also became a fellow, he served several churches in Essex and Norfolk as lecturer from 1631 to 1636. Deprived in the latter year by the bishop of Norwich, he migrated to Holland, renounced his episcopal ordination, and became the teacher of a gathered church in Rotterdam. Returning to England, he was town preacher at Yarmouth, Norfolk, and pastor of a Congregational church there. He was nominated to serve in the Westminster Assembly* and became one of its five Dissenting Brethren. He attended also the Savoy Assembly in 1658. Though having a great reputation as a preacher, he was deprived in 1661 of his Yarmouth post. At first thereafter he lived in or near London, but in 1667-68 he returned to Yarmouth to preach in conventicles. He died in East Anglia. Most of his printed works were sermons.

PETER TOON

BRIDGES, ROBERT (SEYMOUR) (1844-1930). Poet. Educated at Eton and Oxford, he practiced medicine until 1882, when he retired to Yattendon, Berkshire, to devote himself to literature. He wrote poems, plays, and essays. His concern for hymn-singing and church music led to his Yattendon Hymnal (1895-99), for which he wrote, translated, and adapted forty-four hymns, including "Ah, holy Jesu, how hast thou offended" (Heermann); "All my hope on God is founded" (Neander); and "The duteous day now closeth" (Gerhardt). Although the collection of 100 hymns had a restricted circulation, its literary and musical merits were such that it was used extensively for the English Hymnal (1906) and the Oxford Hymn Book (1908). In 1913 he became Poet Laureate. His long poem, The Testament of Beauty (1929), sought to reconcile science and Christianity. He was the first to edit the poems of G.M. Hopkins* (1918).

JOHN S. ANDREWS

BRIDGET (Bride). (c.455-c.523). Patron saint of pity and mercy. She largely inspired the convent system that was to make such an impact on life in Ireland. She was born at Fochart, near Dundalk, where her mother was slave to a Druid. Bridget was possibly the Druid's illegitimate child. On obtaining freedom she settled at Kildare where she built for herself and her female friends a house for refuge and devotion. It is difficult to get a true picture of her life and work on account of the excessive legend surrounding her. Her name is commemorated in places like Kilbride or Kirkbride, and as these place names are found in Scotland as well as Ireland it is possible that she exercised a missionary influence there before the days of Columba.* ADAM LOUGHRIDGE

BRIDGET OF SWEDEN (c.1303-1373). Founder of the Brigittines.* Daughter of the governor of Uppland, she had from an early age spiritual influences that directed the course of her life. She married and had eight children, but on her husband's death in 1344 she retired to a life of penance and prayer. To the prior of the nearby Cistercian monastery at Alvastra she dictated her revelations, and he translated them into Latin. One vision commanded her to found a new religious order (of St. Bridget, or of the Most Holy Savior), and for this she secured the necessary papal permission in 1370. The order flourished in Sweden until the Reformation. In 1350 she went to Rome, and she remained there for the rest of her life, apart from several pilgrimages, one of which was to the Holy Land the year before her death. In Rome she ministered widely to rich and poor, homeless and sinners, giving God's messages in a restless and corrupt age. She was canonized in 1391; one of her daughters was Catherine of Sweden.* J.D. DOUGLAS

BRIDGMAN, ELIJAH COLEMAN (1801-1861). First American missionary to China. Born in Belchertown, Massachusetts, on graduation from seminary in 1829 he was appointed to China by the American Board.* For a year he and David Abeel of the Seamen's Friend Society were supported by D.W.C. Olyphant, a China trader. Bridgman learned the Cantonese dialect and prepared a 730-page manual on it. In 1832 he began publishing in English the influential Chinese Repository, which for many years carried general information about China as well as about missionary work there. A faithful preacher of the Gospel, he was also a founder of the Morrison Educational Society and was a member of the North China branch of the Royal Asiatic Society and editor of its journal. After the first Opium War he started work in Shanghai, where he supervised production of the Bible and was pastor of a church.

HAROLD R. COOK

BRIGGS, CHARLES AUGUSTUS (1841-1913). Clergyman and scholar. Born in New York City, he was educated at the University of Virginia and Union Theological Seminary and later studied at the University of Berlin. After Presbyterian ordination (1870) he served a church in New Jersey, and in 1874 was appointed professor of Hebrew and cognate languages at Union Seminary. In 1890 he was appointed to a new chair of biblical theology. In his inaugural address he vigorously condemned "the dogma of verbal inspiration." He was tried for heresy before the Presbytery of New York in 1892 and was acquitted, but after the prosecution appealed to the general assembly he was condemned and suspended from the ministry (1893). Union Seminary ignored the decision, and in 1900 Briggs was ordained in the Episcopal Church. Among his many scholarly works was his Critical and Exegetical Commentary on the Book of Psalms (1906-7).

BRUCE L. SHELLEY

BRIGHT, WILLIAM (1824-1901). Patristics scholar. Educated at Rugby School under Thomas Arnold and at Oxford, he taught at Trinity College, Glenalmond, and in 1868 succeeded H.L. Mansel* as regius professor of ecclesiastical history at Oxford. His main field was patristic history, though he also had a liturgical interest. Of his numerous works, the most important were History of the Church, 313-451 (1860); Early English Church History (1878); and The Age of the Fathers (2 vols., 1903). He was a dynamic lecturer; his religious views were High Church; and he wrote a number of hymns, some of which are still sung.

BRIGITTINES. Order of the Most Holy Savior, founded by Bridget of Sweden* at Vadstema about 1346, following the Augustinian Rule. For some two centuries it was organized in double communities of men and women. Members were allowed to possess books for study. Bridget's daughter Catherine* became abbess of the Vadstema monastery, but the order was banished from Sweden in 1595. A new branch was brought back to Sweden by Elisabeth Hesselblad in 1923. Autonomous houses following the original rule survive in Bavaria, Holland, and England (Syon Abbey). In Spain, the "Brigittines of the Recollection" follow a modified rule introduced by Marina de Escobar in the seventeenth century.

BRITISH COUNCIL OF CHURCHES. An associated national council of the World Council of Churches,* sharing the same doctrinal basis, namely a "fellowship of churches in the British Isles which confess the Lord Jesus Christ as God and Savior according to the Scriptures and therefore seek to fulfill together their common calling to the glory of the one God, Father, Son and Holy Spirit." It was formed in 1942 through an amalgamation of existing ecumenical-type bodies. Currently twenty-five bodies in the British Isles belong to the council. The Roman Catholic Church sends observers to the meetings. There are over 700 local councils of churches in association with the BCC. The council itself consists of 131 members, 90 of whom are elected by the various member churches. They meet twice a year for two days. The council works through a departmental structure of which the best known is Christian Aid, but others deal with education, international affairs, mission and unity, social responsibility, and youth. BRITISH ISRAELITES. Those who hold that the British and American peoples are part of the ten "lost" tribes of Israel. Sometimes known as Anglo-Israelism, the idea probably originated with John Sadler (Rights of the Kingdom, 1649), but in its modern form it dates from John Wilson's book Our Israelitish Origin (1840). The first Anglo-Saxon Association was founded in England in 1879. British Israelites vary in their views, but the following is typical. The kingdom, though promised to David's seed in perpetuity, failed to survive in Israel so that we must look for its continuance elsewhere. The connection with England is through Zedekiah's daughters (Jer. 41:10), who escaped death in Egypt (Jer. 44:12-14) and took root elsewhere (Isa. 37:31f.), that is, in Ireland, one of the "isles of the sea" (Jer. 31:10), to which they sailed in a ship with Jeremiah. From Ireland they or their progeny reached England and became the royal house. The common people reached England after much continental wandering, being "sifted through many nations" (Amos 9:9), but some remained in western Europe.

Many OT prophecies about Israel are said to have been fulfilled in the history of the British Empire, e.g., that Israel would lend and not borrow, would possess the gates (such as Gibraltar, Singapore, and Hong Kong) of her enemies; that Joseph's branches would run over the wall (Gen. 49:22), which means that the Pilgrim Fathers belonged to the tribe of Manasseh, but left their Ephraimitish relatives behind in England. The Great Pyramid is said to enshrine these truths. British Israelites do not form a separate sect, but belong to many churches.

Critics urge that the evidence for British Israelitism is very slender; that if true, British Israelitism is not important (Col. 3:11); that the promises of God are sometimes conditional (Deut. 28:68; 1 Sam. 2:30) while 2 Sam. 7:16 is messianic; that the "lost" tribes were largely absorbed into Judah, and that there are better claimants than the British.

BRITISH NORTH AMERICA ACT (1867). "Foundation charter" of the Dominion of Canada, passed by the British Parliament. The self-governing colonies of Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, Quebec, and Ontario, after a series of conferences, were joined together under a federal government. The Act preserved the monarchy in British North America while providing a bicameral legislature with a House of Commons elected by the people and a Senate appointed from the three basic regions in the nation. The Act also reflected the religious struggle between the two founding peoples, for certain powers were left to the provinces which safeguarded the rights of French Canada. Two key questions left to the provinces were property and education which allowed separate schools to continue and placated the French Canadians. ROBERT WILSON

BROADCASTING, RELIGIOUS. This began in the British Isles 24 December 1922, when the Rev. J.A. Mayo gave a ten-minute talk just forty days after the inauguration of "the wireless." In 1924 the first worship service was broadcast from St. Martin-in-the-Fields, London, and since 1928 there has been a daily service on radio without a break. The scope has widened to include talks, hymn-singing, panel discussions, and magazine-style material as well as services of various kinds.

Little was done by the British Broadcasting Corporation to develop religious television programs until the era of competition with Independent (i.e., commercial) Television began in 1955. One of the ITV companies launched "About Religion" in 1956; another began "Sunday Break" in late 1957. Both set out to popularize Christianity, and they used the so-called closed period (6:15-7:25 P.M.) on Sunday evenings. The BBC responded to the challenge with "Meeting Point" and "Songs of Praise"—the latter a hymn-singing program.

No program regularly succeeded in reaching mass audiences until Yorkshire Television's "Stars on Sunday" in 1969. This long-running series of unashamedly sentimental songs, poems, and readings—largely chosen by viewers—has captured audiences of up to fifteen million, but has been heavily criticized for its saccharine style. Nevertheless successive archbishops of Canterbury have appeared on the program. One reason for its popularity may have been the overintellectual style of most BBC religious programs, which have until recently been heavily weighted in favor of high-level debate or formal church events. With the arrival of BBC's "Anno Domini" program, the balance seems to have been partly restored.

Local radio began in Britain in 1967 and from the start offered much wider access for the Christian layman. In practice, local programs have often allowed experimental ideas to be tested before they reach the larger regional and national audiences.

Training centers for radio and television were set up by the late Lord Rank (at Bushey) and the Roman Catholic Church (at Hatch End). The former is now fully ecumenical, and the latter is open to non-Catholic participants. Both centers are independent of the public broadcasting media.

From the beginning, religion has not been advertised, nor could would-be sponsors purchase time. The main churches generally favor this policy, believing that any change opens the public to those for whom money alone is the means of gaining air-time.

Religious broadcasting has inevitably been dominated by the Christian churches as a result of the BBC and a "mainstream" policy. By 1976, however, this was being interpreted much less rigidly. The end of the "closed period" also is in sight.

Some evangelicals have been dissatisfied with Britain's religious broadcasting and have attempted to beam shortwave programs into Britain from Monte Carlo and elsewhere. These programs are much closer in style to American religious broadcasting and have not won mass audiences. In the 1960s similar programs were transmitted by the now-defunct "pirate" radio stations. More recently, attempts have been made to gain access to BBC and ITV by media-trained evangelicals, and this seems a more fruitful method. MICHAEL SAWARD

Predicated on the Bill of Rights of the Constitution, the doctrines of "Freedom of Speech, Press and Religion" have guaranteed that individuals and organizations in the United States have access to the airwaves for responsible religious instruction and persuasion. The history of American religious broadcasting has had three phases:

The pioneer phase, 1921-31. This began with the endeavors of individual clergymen, usually broadcasting their own church services. The first of these apparently was from Calvary Episcopal Church, Pittsburgh, on 2 January 1921. Within two years, several ministers had regular programs from various cities.

The first religious station license was granted on 22 December 1921 to the National Presbyterian Church of Washington, D.C. Within five years there were more than sixty licensed religious stations, including KJS (Bible Institute of Los Angeles) in 1922, KFUO (Concordia Seminary, St. Louis) in 1924, and WMBI (Moody Bible Institute, Chicago) in 1926. When the first American network (NBC) was organized in 1926, free time was given to S. Parkes Cadman's program from New York City, and it was co-sponsored by the Federal Council of Churches as the "National Radio Pulpit," the first network religious program. In 1928, D.G. Barnhouse* purchased program time on the CBS network; in 1930 came Walter Maier's "The Lutheran Hour." Roman Catholic network broadcasting began at the same time, when Fulton Sheen* preached the first sermon on "The Catholic Hour." Foreign missionary broadcasting started when the World Radio Missionary Fellowship was founded in 1929. Its station, HCJB, went on the air from Quito, Ecuador, on Christmas Day, 1931.

The development phase, 1932-42. The Great Depression forced the sale of most religious stations to commercial interests; WMBI was one of the few to survive. Because the FCC controlled most of the free time, the independent gospel broadcaster had to buy time on commercial stations. This led to development of many types of religious programs. C.E. Fuller* launched his own independent radio ministry, as did other pastors. This period of development was retarded by two events: America's entry into World War II in 1941, and the FCC's persuading networks to discontinue the sale of time to religious broadcasts and channel all free time through the FCC.

The expansion phase, 1943 onward. The exclusion of most independent gospel broadcasters from the networks soon led to the former purchasing time on hundreds of individual stations as well as organizing their own. Metropolitan, denominational, and ecumenical agencies were formed, such as the Southern Baptist Radio Commission (1938). The National Religious Broadcasters, an evangelical association, was established in 1943, partly to counter the FCC's restrictive policies. The Broadcasting and Film Commission of the National Council of Churches now serves the interests of the mainline denominations.

In 1943 Billy Graham began the popular program "Songs in the Night," which has had many imitators; his even more widely heard "Hour of Decision" was launched in 1950. A year earlier, the radio networks resumed the selling of time to independent religious broadcasters.

Postwar broadcasting saw two significant technical achievements: FM broadcasting and television. FM has meant many new religious stations granted frequencies in the noncommercial portion of the band. The current era has seen much creative energy in programing religious television, beginning with Percy Crawford's "Youth on the March" in 1949, the first network gospel program. Others followed, including the Lutheran "This is the Life" and the telecasts of Billy Graham and Oral Roberts. Network television began to sponsor programs such as "Frontiers of Faith" and "Lamp Unto My Feet." Roman Catholics were well represented by Bishop Sheen, Jews by "The Eternal Light." EDWIN A. BROOKS, PHILLIPS (1835-1893). Preacher and bishop. Born in Boston and educated at Harvard College and the Protestant Episcopal Seminary at Alexandria, Virginia, he was made deacon in 1859, ministered in Philadelphia, and in 1862 became rector of Holy Trinity Church, also in that city. His eloquence brought a call to Trinity Church, Boston. At first he refused, but after further urging he began his memorable twenty-two years of ministry there in 1869. Early in 1877 he delivered his Lectures on Preaching before Yale Divinity School; in these he stressed preaching as "the bringing of truth through personality." In 1880 he preached in Westminster Abbey, and before Queen Victoria in the Royal Chapel at Windsor. He wrote the lovely hymn "O little town of Bethlehem." In 1891 he was consecrated bishop of Boston. He died fifteen months later.
BRUCE L. SHELLEY

BROOKS, THOMAS (1608-1680). Nonconformist* preacher. Born into a Puritan family, he was sent to Emmanuel College, Cambridge. He soon became an advocate of the Congregational way and served as a chaplain in the Civil War. In 1648 he accepted the rectory of St. Margaret's, New Fish Street, London, but only after making his Congregational principles clear to the vestry. On several occasions he preached before Parliament. He was ejected in 1660 and remained in London as a Nonconformist preacher. Government spies reported that he preached at Tower Wharf and in Moorfields. During the Great Plague and Great Fire he worked in London, and in 1672 was granted a license to preach in Lime Street. He wrote over a dozen books, most of which are devotional in character. He was buried in Bunhill Fields. PETER TOON

BROTHER LAWRENCE (c.1605-1691). Christian mystic. Born Nicholas Herman of Lorraine and of humble background, he had spent many years as a soldier and then as a footman—"a great awkward fellow who broke everything." At over fifty years of age he entered the Carmelite* Order in Paris as a lay brother and served in the kitchens. He became known as Brother Lawrence. After his death his Conversations and Letters were published and are printed together in The Practice of the Presence of God. They stress the need to do everything, including kitchen work which Brother Lawrence naturally disliked, for the love of God, and thus achieve a condition in which the presence of God is as real in work as in prayer. They influenced current mystical thought (cf. the writings of Fénelon*). C. PETER WILLIAMS

BROTHERS, RICHARD (1757-1824). Naval lieutenant, writer on prophecy, and early British Israelite. Born in Newfoundland, he came to England, and in 1771 joined the navy. He saw action under Rodney in 1781 and retired on half-pay in 1783, at which time he became a Christian pacifist. Refusing to take the oath required of pensioners, he was later left without means. From about 1790 he became increasingly eccentric, suffered from megalomania, and was placed until 1806 in a madhouse in Islington. His book Revealed Knowledge (1794) created a stir. He predicted that by 1794 the ten lost tribes of Israel—that is, the English—would have returned to Jerusalem where he, the Nephew of the Almighty, would be proclaimed their Prince. For a time he had many influential followers, among them Riebaud the publisher, to whom Michael Faraday was apprenticed.

See C. Roth, The Nephew of the Almighty (1933). R.E.D. CLARK

BROTHERS HOSPITALLERS. Mostly a lay order, it was founded by John of God* (d.1550) at Granada, and continued with the support of Philip II with hospitals founded in Madrid, Cordova, and elsewhere in Spain. In 1572 Pius V approved the order, under Austin rule, and it spread through Europe to distant colonies, with other hospitals in Rome, Naples, Milan, then in Paris by 1601. The brothers were expelled from their forty hospitals in France by the Revolution, though others emerged later. The order is governed by a prior general at Rome and divided into provinces, extending to Nazareth, England, and Ireland. Brothers take training and vows, wear habits, and perform duties of the religious life. Beyond personal sanctification, they seek their patients' spiritual and physical well-being.

BROUGHTON, WILLIAM GRANT (1788-1853). Anglican bishop. Educated at Cambridge, he was ordained in 1818 and spent his years as a country curate in scholarly work. In 1828 he was appointed second archdeacon of New South Wales. Although a High Churchman with sympathy for the Tractarians,* he was regarded by the evangelical chaplains of the colony as not hostile to the Gospel. His ecclesiastical opinions led to conflicts with liberal opinion in the colony. In 1836 he was consecrated as first bishop of Australia. He traveled widely and in the 1840s made the first divisions of his vast diocese. He became the first bishop of Sydney. In 1850 he initiated discussions about self-government for the Church of England in Australia at a conference of six bishops in Sydney. His death delayed progress in this direction. NOEL S. POLLARD

BROWN, JOHN (1800-1859). Controversial leader of part of the abolitionist* movement. He was born in Torrington, Connecticut, into a family with a history of mental illness. He engaged in many different business ventures in several states and was a defendant in numerous legal cases resulting from his failure to meet financial obligations. In 1854 he began organizing guerrilla warfare activities to rid Kansas of the evil of slavery. Believing himself divinely appointed to destroy the supporters of slavery, he led a group of six associates in the infamous Pottawatomie Massacre of 1856; five pro-slavery men were seized in their homes at night and hacked to death. From this incident John Brown gained notoriety and provoked fear and hatred, but he was defended by radical abolitionists. In 1859 he tried to set up a revolutionary government by force when he attacked the arsenal at Harpers Ferry, Virginia, with a band of twenty-one followers. This free state could be a refuge for slaves and encourage slave insurrections. The effort was easily crushed by the U.S. Marines, and Brown was convicted of treason and hanged. His violent acts were glorified by the abolitionist extremists and made the extreme pro-slavery faction stronger in the South by the panic they aroused. HARRY SKILTON

BROWN, JOHN (of Edinburgh) (1784-1858). Scottish minister. Son of the manse, and grandson of John Brown of Haddington, he entered the Burgher* ministry. Ordained at Biggar in 1806 and translated to Edinburgh in 1822, he soon became one of the most influential ministers of any denomination in the Scottish capital, with many friends in all religious bodies, many of whom met regularly for prayer and discussion. Appointed Scotland's first professor of exegetical theology, first in the Secession, then later in the United Presbyterian divinity hall, he became involved in prolonged controversy over his liberal views on the Atonement and other important doctrines. Indicted under twelve counts before the UP synod, he was triumphantly vindicated.

D.P. THOMSON

BROWN, JOHN (of Haddington) (1722-1787). Scottish minister. A self-educated boy from the hills above Abernethy in Perthshire who was accused by his own minister of witchcraft because of his prodigious learning, he taught himself

Latin, Greek, and Hebrew, and after serving as soldier and peddler, studied under Ebenezer Erskine, taking the Burgher* side at the "Breach" in the Secession Church in 1747. Ordained in 1751 to his sole charge at Haddington, East Lothian, he fulfilled a ministry of thirty-six years, during the larger part of which he also trained the Burgher divinity students. From his humble manse went out through the years a long series of volumes which earned him worldwide fame, the best known and most popular being his Self-Interpreting Bible, still being reprinted. With an income that never exceeded sixty pounds per annum, he founded a clerical dynasty which has given scores of learned men to all the professions.

D.P. THOMSON

BROWN, JOHN (of Wamphray) (c.1610-1679). Scottish minister. Little is known of him until about his fiftieth year. He was evidently not a member of the famous 1638 Glasgow Assembly (the year of the National Covenant*), nor does he seem to have taken any notable part in church affairs until 1660. Ejected after the Restoration of Charles II, he was one of those charged for opposing prelatical and arbitrary power, was imprisoned in Edinburgh, and then in 1663 banished to Holland, never again to be allowed to enter his native land. In 1665 he published An Apologetical Relation, which deals minutely with every aspect of the dispute between Crown and Covenant, and strongly upholds the righteousness of the principles and actions of the Covenanters, justifying their resistance to unconstitutional rulers by armed rebellion and defensive war. One of John Brown's last acts was to participate in the ordination of Richard Cameron* in Rotterdam.

J.D. DOUGLAS

BROWN, WILLIAM ADAMS (1865-1943). Liberal theologian. Born in New York City and educated at Yale, Union Seminary, and the University of Berlin, he afterward joined the faculty at Union, teaching theology there from 1892 until 1930, when he became research professor in applied theology until 1936. Through his widely used textbook Christian Theology in Outline (1906) Brown exerted considerable influence upon American theology until the 1930s. Himself influenced by his professor, Harnack,* Brown sought to elaborate a theology not of "dogmas to be received on authority" but of "living convictions, born of experience." He declared that Christ must be the center of Christian theology, but for him this meant the centering of faith upon the life and teachings of the historical Jesus rather than upon the orthodox understanding of the incarnation, objective atonement for sin, or the Resurrection.

HARRY SKILTON

BROWNE, GEORGE (d.1556). Archbishop of Dublin. Educated in an Augustinian friary at Oxford, he later became general of the Mendicant* Orders in England. He had attracted notice for his sermons, in which he ignored the invocation of the saints and exhorted his hearers to address their prayers to Christ alone. Thomas Cromwell* saw his potential usefulness to the king's cause and appointed him archbishop of Dublin, with the particular tasks of having the royal ecclesiastical supremacy recognized in Ireland, as it had been in England, and of suppressing the monasteries. Despite clerical opposition, Browne succeeded in having the Supremacy Bill passed. His suppression of the monasteries seems to have had in it more of a desire for spoil than for radical reformation; his destruction of images and relics failed to win the support of the people, who did not understand his sermons attacking idolatry, delivered in English to a largely Irish-speaking population. In the reign of Edward VI (1547-53) Brown was given the title of Primate of Ireland when the primacy was temporarily withdrawn from Armagh, where Archbishop Dowdall had maintained his allegiance to Rome. When Mary came to the throne, the title was restored to Dowdall, and Browne was set aside from his office as archbishop of Dublin.

HUGH J. BLAIR

BROWNE, ROBERT (c.1553-1633). English Separatist leader. Born in Rutland, he went to Cambridge and there came under the Presbyterian influence of Thomas Cartwright.* In 1573 he graduated, and while he was a school teacher his thinking developed in a Puritan separatist direction. In 1579 he began to preach in Cambridgeshire churches, refusing to accept the bishop's permission on the ground that the calling and authority of bishops was unlawful and that true authority lay in the gathered church. He concluded that the parishes were incapable of reform and that this would have to begin among "the worthiest were they never so few." In 1580 he was forbidden to preach by the council. In Norwich, Browne convinced Robert Harrison of his views, and together they organized separatist churches locally. His ideas effectively undermined the church-state relationship achieved by the Elizabethan Settlement,* and he was imprisoned several times—though his relationship to Lord Burghley helped to secure his release.

Persecuted by the authorities, the new church was persuaded that it was better to settle abroad; thus in 1582 it emigrated to Middlebrugh in Zeeland. While there, Browne set forth his views in the Treatise of Reformation without Tarrying for Anie and the Booke which Sheweth the Life and Manners of all True Christians. He argued that the Church of England was beyond reformation and that the true church should be established without tarrying for the magistrate. He quarreled with Harrison, however, and was excommunicated by the church in 1583 and eventually returned to England. By 1585 he had made peace with Archbishop Whitgift* and by 1591 was sufficiently orthodox to be ordained to a Northamptonshire living which he occupied for the next forty-three years. In 1633 he died in prison after a fit of aggression against the local constable. He is often called "the Father of English Congregationalism" and the followers of his ideas were known as Brownists (a term of abuse).

BROWNE, SIR THOMAS (1605-1682). Physician and writer. Graduate of Oxford, he traveled widely before settling in Norwich in 1637. In 1642 he published Religio Medici—a highly original attempt to work out a religious outlook in an increasingly scientific age. He asserts the right to examine nature which has much to reveal about God. With regard to the apparent contradictions between revealed faith and scientific truth he oscillates between acceptance by simple faith and explanation of the scriptural narrative by way of allegory. In his Pseudodoxia Epidemica he tried to separate scientific truth from the myths which had accumulated over the centuries. He wrote with vividness and feeling and did not allow himself to be confined to any one area of knowledge. In 1658 he produced Hydriotaphia, or Urn-Burial, which was a learned and fascinating study of burial in many countries. By now his encyclopedic knowledge had attracted considerable attention in scientific and antiquarian circles, and he was knighted when Charles II visited Norwich in 1671. Published after his death were Certain Miscellany Tracts (1683), A Letter to a Friend upon the Occasion of the Death of an Intimate Friend (1690), and Christian Morals (1716).

BRUCE, ALEXANDER BALMAIN (1831-1899). Scottish theologian. Son of a Perthshire farmer, he graduated at Edinburgh, attended the Free Church divinity hall there, and in 1859 became minister at Cardross. He was translated to Broughty Ferry in 1868, and in 1875 was appointed professor of apologetics and NT exegesis at his church's Glasgow college. His Training of the Twelve (1871) established his reputation as a scholar; then came The Humiliation of Christ (1876) and The Kingdom of God (1889). The latter was criticized by a general assembly suspicious of new principles of biblical criticism (perhaps the memory of his defense of W.R. Smith some years before was still fresh), but no official action was taken against him. Bruce was active also in helping to compile hymnbooks. His other writings include St. Paul's Conception of Christianity (1894) and volumes on the synoptic gospels (1897) and the epistle to the Hebrews (1899).

BRUCE, ROBERT (1554-1631). Scottish minister. Of a family that claimed descent from the royal family of Bruce, he studied law at Paris, but after a deep spiritual experience he took up theology at St. Andrews, was ordained in 1587, and became minister in Edinburgh. A few months later, in striking testimony to the worth of one so young, he was elected moderator of the general assembly. His moderate influence was appreciated at first by James VI, whose queen Bruce anointed in 1590. In 1596, however, having opposed the king's resolve to impose episcopacy on Scotland, he and others were banished from the capital. Though permitted to return, he was ordered away again in 1601 and spent his last thirty years in no settled home. For two periods of four years each he was confined to Inverness by the king's command, but wherever he could preach great crowds attended—and his life was acknowledged by all to be in accord with his preaching. His best-known writing is the Way to True Peace and Rest (1617). J.D. DOUGLAS

BRUCKNER, ANTON (1824-1896). Austrian composer. In his earlier years as the cathedral organist at Linz, Austria, he attained fame for his playing. He also wrote a considerable quantity of church music. His masterpieces are his Te Deum and three great masses for soloists, chorus, and orchestra. The second of these, for double chorus and wind instruments, is closely allied in spirit to the aims of the Cecilian Movement in Catholic music that led up to the Moto Proprio of Pope Pius X in 1903. In his later years he taught composition at the conservatory in Vienna. Known most widely for his gigantic symphonies, he is associated with the last flowering of the symphonic type of church music that goes back to Haydn* and his contemporaries. J.B. MAC MILLAN

BRÜGGLERS. A small sect founded at Brügglen, near Berne, Switzerland, about 1745 by two brothers, Christian (b.1710) and Hieronymus Kohler (1714-53). They proclaimed themselves the Holy Trinity with a convert, Elizabeth Kissling, functioning as the Holy Spirit. Because of this and the prediction of the end of the world at Christmas 1748, they were exiled by the Berne government in 1749. In 1753 Hieronymus was tried for heresy and executed in Berne. The group survived for a time in remote mountain regions, and was eventually absorbed by the Antonian* sect.

BRUNNER, (HEINRICH) EMIL (1889-1966). Swiss theologian. One of the most influential scholars of the interwar years, he enjoyed an international reputation through lecture tours and translations of his writings. After a pastorate at Obstalden (1916-24) he was professor of systematic and practical theology at Zurich (1924-53). In retirement he still traveled, spending two years in Japan as professor of Christian philosophy at the International Christian University of Tokyo (1953-55).

Brunner has long been thought of as a less extreme colleague of Barth* who parted company over natural theology in the 1930s. In fact, despite similarities, Brunner's approach was largely independent. He came from a Christian background. His early thought was influenced by the Christian Socialism of H. Kutter and L. Ragaz. But World War I caused him to reappraise his ideas in the light of the message of Christ. This he did independently of Barth. Among his early publications was a critique of Schleiermacher,* Die Mystik und das Wort (1924), which stressed the priority of divine revelation over human knowledge, reason, and experience.

The Mediator (1927: ET 1934) was the first presentation of the doctrine of Christ in terms of Dialectical Theology.* Brunner saw the Gospel as an exposition of the First Commandment. Without Christ's fulfillment in the Gospel this commandment would be unreal and unintelligible. Christ comes as the one who has fulfilled the law, as mediator, revealer, and reconciler. Faith is essentially obedience. Christ's mediatorship is the basis of the Christian ethic. Only in the Mediator do we know ourselves as we really are. Only in Him is the will of God known as love. Only in Him is it possible to see and love one's neighbor. Only in Him is our arrogant self-will broken and God honored. Only through faith in justification does the good become a reality instead of a mere postulate. Only through faith in Christ, the Mediator, does man gain a really ethical relation to historical reality.

Brunner's thought was deeply influenced by Kierkegaard's* dialectic and Martin Buber's* I-Thou concept. He saw revelation essentially in terms of personal encounter with God who communicates Himself. Brunner opposed both altruistic, theological liberalism and evangelical orthodoxy with its concept of revealed truth. The ground of his objection to the latter—that God Himself is a personal subject who cannot be reduced to an object—draws attention to a truth. But it causes difficulty when it is asked how Brunner's view compares with Scripture and how one can speak meaningfully of God and revelation on Brunner's premises. He regarded Scripture as somehow normative, though not above criticism. Revelation is always indirect. It is even mythical in form, but this is necessary because of the incommensurability of Creator and creature. Brunner felt no tension between his stress on revelation and a positive attitude to culture and philosophy. Unlike Barth, he believed in an already existing point of contact between the Gospel and non-Christian man. He pleaded for a positive reformed attitude to natural theology, though he failed to state convincingly what would be involved in it.

The church is the fellowship in faith and love of those who believe in Christ and is therefore the presupposition of faith. There is, however, the constant danger of institutionalism. In his treatment of eschatology Brunner has sought to get rid of what he regarded as the inadequate temporal conceptions of orthodoxy. Though he rejected the "realized eschatology" of Dodd,* he insisted that the existence of a hell has no place in the Christian hope. Brunner regarded Communism as "an anti-religion without God" in which all the elements of antichrist are present.

His writings include The Divine Imperative (1932; ET 1937); Man in Revolt (1937; ET 1939); Justice and the Social Order (1943; ET 1945); Our Faith (1935; ET 1936); Christianity and Civilization (2 vols., 1948-49); Revelation and Reason (1941; ET 1947); The Divine-Human Encounter (1938; enlarged as Truth as Encounter, ET 1954); Dogmatics (3 vols., 1946-60; ET 1949-62); and with Karl Barth, Natural Theology (1934; ET 1954).

BRUNO (925-965). Archbishop of Cologne. He was educated at the cathedral school in Utrecht, then at the court of his brother Otto I. Abbot of the monasteries of Lorsch near Worms and of Carvei on the Weser from 941, he became archchaplain to Otto in 951. As archbishop from 953 he contributed greatly to every department of Otto's reign. With great personal sanctity and deep concern for clerical and lay education, he was a generous benefactor of churches and monasteries, having established three foundations in Cologne. An exemplary prince-bishop, he demonstrated the successful union of church and state. He participated in the Synod of Verdun (947) and improved relations between France and Germany. He was also a patron of learning. His disciple, Ruotger, wrote his biography shortly after Bruno's death. C.G. THORNE, JR.

BRUNO, GIORDANO (1548-1600). Italian Renaissance philosopher. He joined the Dominican Order* in 1562, but later was accused of heresy and fled, abandoning the Dominican habit in 1576. Thereafter he wandered through Europe, teaching in France and England, and visiting Wittenberg and Prague. In 1592 he returned to Italy and was arrested by the Inquisition.* After eight years' imprisonment at Rome he was sentenced as a heretic and burned. Bruno was a devotee of the Renaissance Hermetic tradition. Based on the writings of Hermes Trismegistus, who was supposed to have been an Egyptian sage who foretold Christianity and inspired Plato, this belief encouraged the use of magic and the worship of the sun (see HERMETIC BOOKS). Although he opposed Aristotle, Bruno did this on Hermetic grounds and not because he cared for Copernicus's mathematical proofs. His two major works are On the Infinite Universe and Worlds and Concerning the Cause, Principle and One.

BRUNO THE CARTHUSIAN (c.1030-1101). Founder of the Order. He was born in Cologne, where he began his studies at St. Cunibert and completed them at Reims. A canon of Reims, he taught arts and theology, becoming master of the schools (1056), then chancellor of the archdiocese (c.1075). Having no secular ambitions, he twice refused a bishopric and sided with Gregory VII against clerical decadence. He left Reims about 1082 for a monastic life, going first to Sèche-Fontaine. He found the cenobitic* vocation not sufficiently solitary and moved on to the Chartreuse where with a few clerics and laymen he lived the eremitic life, without a rule. Unintentionally, the Carthusian Order was founded by 1084 with the aid of the bishop, Hugh of Grenoble. The Chartreuse site, high above sea level with rugged mountains and severe climate, guaranteed silence, poverty, and small numbers. The first Carthusians combined the cenobitic and solitary without reference either to Benedictine or Camaldolese practices. In 1090 Urban II, a former pupil, called him to S Italy for counsel; there he founded the hermitage Santa Maria of La Torre, where he died. His works include two letters, being ascetical treatises, a commentary on the Psalter, and perhaps a commentary on the Pauline epistles. Canonization by Leo X is disputed.

BRYAN, WILLIAM JENNINGS (1860-1925). Populist, editor, Chautauqua lecturer, secretary of state, and opponent of evolution. He was born and educated in Illinois and was admitted to the bar there in 1883. He practiced law in Illinois and Nebraska (1883-91) and was editor of the Omaha World-Herald (1894-96). From 1891 to 1895 he was a congressman from Nebraska. As secretary of state in Wilson's government he negotiated thirty treaties of arbitration with other nations. Three times the unsuccessful candidate of the Democratic Party for the presidency, he was a folk-hero for rural America because of his conservative Protestantism and concern for the agrarian Midwest. Catapulted onto the national political stage by his "Cross of Gold" speech in 1896, Bryan brought the program of the Populists into the Democratic Party. In 1925 he debated with the lawyer Clarence Darrow in the famous "Monkey Trial" at Dayton, Tennessee, when J.T. Scopes was accused of teaching evolution in the classroom (see SCOPES TRIAL). Bryan died five days after the trial finished. JOHN D. WOODBRIDGE

BRYENNIOS, PHILOTHEOS (1833-1914). Greek ecclesiastic and scholar. Born of poor parents in Constantinople, he was educated theologically at Halki and in 1856 went to Germany where he studied at Leipzig, Berlin, and Munich. In 1861 he became professor in Halki, in 1875 metropolitan of Serrae, and in 1877 of Nicomedia (until 1909). His fame springs from his publication in 1883 of the *Didache of the Twelve Apostles, from a manuscript of the Metochion of the Holy Sepulchre in Constantinople (residence for the visiting patriarch of Jerusalem) often called "the Jerusalem manuscript" (written in 1056). It was removed to Jerusalem in 1887. From the same manuscript he previously published (1875) 1 and 2 Clement, both in complete form for the first time. Bryennios was an Orthodox representative at the Bonn Reunion Conference* of 1875 and later wrote a critique of the encyclical Satis Cognitum. J.N. BIRDSALL

BUBER, MARTIN (1878-1965). Jewish religious philosopher. Born in Vienna, he was educated there and at German universities, and from 1916 to 1924 edited Der Jude, a paper for German-speaking Jews. He taught philosophy and religion at Frankfurt University (1923-33) and religion at the University of Jerusalem (1933-51). He was much influenced by the mysticism of the Hasidim and by Kierkegaard's* Christian existentialism. His own contribution was the "I-Thou relationship," for which he saw Judaism uniquely suited. Religion is essentially the act of holding fast to God; religious truths are dynamic, not dogmatic; and Judaism stressed the encounter of God and man. Buber held that three primary terms—It, I, and Thou—cannot be analyzed as separate concepts, but are purely relational words. "It" is a broad term representing the material world, which permits itself to be experienced. "Without It, man cannot live. But he who lives with It alone is not a man." By "Thou," Buber meant a more unlimited concept of deity than the term "God." The Thou is addressed and not expressed, for to express God is to imply that we can know Him as we can know an object in the realm of It. To maintain a deity worthy of the I-Thou realization, Buber called the God of the man-God relationship the "Eternal Thou," contending that this was the living personal God of the OT.

BUCER (Butzer), MARTIN (1491-1551). Strasbourg Reformer. Born of humble parentage at Sélestat, he was schooled in Alsatian humanism and, as a Dominican,* in Aquinas's Scholasticism, but became an enthusiastic Erasmian and then, after moving to Heidelberg, an ardent "Martinian" through Luther's disputation in 1518. Released from his order in 1521, he was one of the first Reformers to marry (1522), was excommunicated while preaching reform at Wissembourg, and took refuge in Strasbourg (1523). He quickly assumed leadership in Strasbourg's reformation, together with Matthew Zell, Capito,* and Caspar Hedio, and retained it for over two decades. His gifts and industry soon established him as the chief statesman among the Reformers, an ecclesiastical diplomat of European stature, rarely absent from colloquies and diets from Marburg* (1529) onward. A prolific compiler of "Church orders" (Kirchenordnungen), he participated in the constitution of several Reformed churches, though unsuccessfully in Cologne with Hermann von Wied* (1542-43). In three formative years at Strasbourg (1538-41), Calvin sat at Bucer's feet, notably in church organization, ecumenism, and perhaps theology (e.g., predestination and Eucharist). Strasbourg's Reformed liturgy likewise shaped Genevan and Scottish patterns. Bucer's ideals attained fullest realization outside Strasbourg, through Geneva and in Hesse (1538-39), whose prince, the Landgrave Philip,* was long his intimate. (Bucer's radical views on divorce and remarriage extended even to justifying Philip's bigamy.) The magistrates restricted his scope in Strasbourg and refused to exercise fully the religious responsibilities he assigned them. Troublesome Anabaptist and spiritualist refugees provoked a tightening of ecclesiastical doctrine and structure (1533 synod), but Bucer also responded positively to the radicals, e.g., in developing discipline and confirmation, with signal success in Hesse.

He assiduously attempted to overcome the Zwinglian-Lutheran divide on the Lord's Supper. Having begun as an unquestioning Lutheran, he adopted the symbolist interpretation of Carlstadt,* Zwingli,* and Oecolampadius* (1542-46), but moderated from 1529 and treated the dispute as largely verbal. The Wittenberg Concord of 1536 climaxed his peace efforts, but it received a limited welcome. Bucer stressed participation in the true or real presence of Christ's body and blood, presented or conveyed (exhibere) by and with the signs in a "sacramental union" of earthly and heavenly realities. Thus Bucer's Strasbourg led a middle group of Reformed S German cities (cf. the Tetrapolitan Confession, 1530).

In the late 1530s and early 1540s he was the leading Protestant negotiator for agreement with the Catholic Church in Germany, especially at the conferences of Leipzig (1539), Hagenau and Worms (1540), and supremely Regensburg (1541), where a remarkable concord on justification was attained. (Bucer's intellectualist view of faith as conviction or persuasion allowed for justifying faith to be "faith active through love.")

Bucer was exiled for resisting the imperial Interim settlement (1548) and went to England as Cranmer's* guest. He was appointed regius professor at Cambridge; influenced the revision of the 1549 Book of Common Prayer and especially the 1550 Ordinal; wrote for Edward VI The Kingdom of Christ, a blueprint for a Christian society; mediated in the vestments controversy; and left his impress on John Bradford,* Matthew Parker,* and later John Whitgift.*

Bucer's distinctive greatness was long eclipsed. He highlighted the importance of love and service in community, an ordered and disciplined church life, and personal holiness. He was a profuse biblical commentator (here too a source for Calvin), a humanist advocate of patristic antiquity, a pastoral theologian, and a zealous, even risqué irenicist.

BUCHANAN, CLAUDIUS (1766-1815). Anglican chaplain in India. Born at Cambuslang, Scotland, he was educated at Glasgow and Cambridge universities, was ordained in the Church of England in 1796, then went to India. He was chaplain at Barrackpur for two years before becoming chaplain in Calcutta and vice-principal of Fort William College which had been established by Lord Wellesley. At Cambridge Buchanan had come under evangelical influence from Charles Simeon* and his circle, and though his official connection with the East India Company prevented his ministering to the natives, he encouraged Scripture translation and native education. He wrote Christian Researches in India (1811), and on his return to England he helped to establish the first Indian bishopric.

BUCHANAN, GEORGE (1506-1582). Scottish humanist. Born at Killearn, he was educated at the universities of Paris and St. Andrews, began to favor Protestantism, and wrote against the Franciscans, which activity led to his arrest in 1539. He escaped to France, taught at Bordeaux and Paris, then was regent at the Portuguese university of Coimbra. There he was imprisoned, charged with heresy before the Inquisition,* and suffered much restriction before final acquittal. All the time he was furthering his classical studies, which were to enhance his reputation as the most distinguished British humanist of his time. He was friend and tutor to Mary Queen of Scots, but later supported the Protestant lords against her. In 1566 he became principal of St. Leonard's College, St. Andrews, and in 1567 moderator of the general assembly of the (now Reformed) Church of Scotland. In 1570 he became tutor to the child James VI. In 1579 he completed his famous treatise De Jure Regni apud Scotos which, though dedicated to James, marked the beginning of that conflict in Scotland that was to end more than a century later with the overthrow of the House of Stuart. Buchanan taught that kings are chosen and continued in office by the people, that they are subject to both human and divine laws, and that Scots had always claimed the right to call wicked rulers to account. Samuel Rutherford* later took up and elaborated these views. In 1683 Buchanan's political works, with those of John Milton,* were publicly burned by the common hangman because they militated against the Stuart belief in the Divine Right of Kings.* Among Buchanan's other writings were Baptistes (1642), a dramatic presentation of the life of John the Baptist, and History of Scotland (ET 1690).

BUCHANAN, JAMES (1804-1870). Scottish theologian. Born in Paisley, he studied at Glasgow University, was briefly minister of Roslin, then in 1828 was inducted to the large and influential parish of North Leith, where his evangelical preaching attracted great crowds. In 1840 he became minister of the High Church (St. Giles'), Edinburgh. At the 1843 Disruption,* in common with most of his fellow Evangelicals, he left the established church and became minister of St. Stephen's Free Church, Edinburgh. In 1845 he was appointed professor of apologetics at New College, and two years later he succeeded Thomas Chalmers* in the chair of systematic theology. Buchanan's works include Faith in God and Modern Atheism Compared (2 vols., 1855) and The Doctrine of Justification (1866).

BUCHANITES. This most bizarre of all Scottish religious sects (1783-1846) originated in Irvine with Elspeth Buchan, a fanatical visionary of doubtful antecedents, and Hugh White, a popular young minister there, who became her devoted disciple. Claiming to be "the third person in the Godhead and the woman clothed with the sun of the Book of Revelation," she led a mixed multitude, including White and the town clerk, on a weird pilgrimage to the south of Scotland, where at successive sites over a period of many years the steadily dwindling band awaited their vainly promised translation to heaven. The dramatic history of this venture, with the last lonely disciple keeping vigil over Mrs. Buchan's remains as he awaited her resurrection, has fascinated many thousands of readers. D.P. THOMSON

BUCHMAN, FRANK NATHAN DANIEL (1878-1961). Founder of Moral Re-Armament, earlier known as the Oxford Group.* Born in Pennsburg, Pennsylvania, and educated at Muhlenberg College and Mt. Airy Seminary, he was ordained as a Lutheran clergyman. After engaging in unsuccessful work with students, he experienced a religious conversion at Keswick, England, in 1908. He soon began a movement to develop new methods of evangelism as a means of fostering world change. In 1921 he founded the First Century Christian Movement, in 1929 the Oxford Group, and finally in 1938 Moral Re-Armament (MRA). His house parties and stress on confession and the four absolutes won many among the upper classes and students. ROBERT C. NEWMAN

BUCK, DUDLEY (1839-1909). American composer. It is customary to depreciate him today and all he stood for, but he did great service to American church music in the era in which he lived. He was the first influential American-born church musician to be trained in Europe. He held important posts in Hartford, Chicago, Boston, and New York. He was a voluminous composer of cantatas, anthems, and also secular music. Although the musical substance of his works is undistinguished and depends much on facile clichés, he provided his generation with material that was readily attractive and encouraged choral activity. He was also a distinguished organist and by his recitals did much to advance the popularity of that instrument. J.B. MAC MILLAN

BUDDHISM. Eastern religion. The founder, Siddhartha Gautama (c.566-486 B.C.), grew up as the son of a petty ruler in NE India. Tradition relates that, surrounded by luxury, he saw four sights—a diseased man, an old man, a dead man, and a wandering ascetic. These convinced him of the inevitability of suffering and death, and he set out, abandoning his wife and son, to seek enlightenment and release from inevitable rebirth. After several fruitless attempts to find enlightenment by means of accepted ascetic techniques, he finally reached full enlightenment under a tree at what is now Bodh Gaya. He became "the Buddha" (the Enlightened One). Conscious that he was living out his last existence on earth, he determined not to enter into Nirvana directly, but to proclaim the dhamma (law) he had rediscovered, and he did so for some forty years. He founded monasteries for both men and women, and the later spread of Buddhism was linked closely with the fortunes of these institutions. After a couple of centuries during which Buddhism was little more than an unorthodox Hindu school, it began to expand as the result of the work of King Ashoka (third century B.C.)—northward into Tibet, China, and ultimately Japan; southward into Ceylon and SE Asia, where it now has its strongest centers. By the Middle Ages, Buddhism had virtually disappeared from India.

Buddhist teaching rests on four "excellent truths": all existence involves suffering; suffering is caused by desire; suffering can be ended if desire can be conquered; and there is an eightfold path to the conquering of desire. This path consists of right views, intentions, speech, action, livelihood, effort, mindfulness, and concentration. To this is added an elaborate monastic discipline. Classical Buddhist scriptures are called the Tripitaka (three baskets) and are written in Pali (a dialect of Sanskrit), though there are important writings also in Sanskrit, Tibetan, Chinese, Japanese, etc.

The great historical division among Buddhists is between the conservative or Theravāda (way of the elders) school, and the comprehensive or Mahāyānā (great vehicle) school. Theravāda—also called Hīnayāna (little vehicle) because its opponents maintained that it offered salvation only to monks—is strongest in the South (Ceylon, etc.), Mahāyānā in the North (formerly Tibet and China, now mainly Japan). Theravāda is atheistic in principle; Mahāyānā has sometimes tended to reckon the Buddha as a savior-god.

Buddhism and Christianity rest on entirely different conceptual foundations. Buddhism acknowledges the reality of neither God nor the soul; all is constant flux, and personality is an illusion. As in Hinduism, the doctrine of rebirth is axiomatic. Perhaps for these reasons, Buddhism in various forms (Zen, etc.) has of late gained ground in the West and is currently regarded by many as an attractive alternative to Christianity.

BUGENHAGEN, JOHANN (1485-1558). German Reformer. Born at Wollin near Stettin in Pomerania, he studied at the University of Greifswald, and through the writings of Erasmus* and the Humanists came to see the need for a reform of the corruptions of the Roman Catholic Church. In 1504 he became rector of the town school of Treptow, where his outstanding organizing ability became apparent in the school's success. In 1509 he was ordained, and in 1517 became a lecturer on the Bible and the Fathers in the monastery school at Belbuck. It was in 1520 that Luther's Concerning the Babylonian Captivity of the Church led him to realize that a much more radical reform of the church was needed and that the root of the corruptions of the Roman Church was its erroneous doctrine. Convinced by Luther's argument, he became an enthusiastic Reformer. In 1521 he went to Wittenberg and became closely associated with Luther and Melanchthon. He became minister of the collegiate church in Wittenberg in 1522 and served as preacher there for the rest of his life. His organizing ability found an outlet in the establishment of Reformed churches in Brunswick, Hamburg, and Lübeck. In 1537 he went to Copenhagen at the invitation of Christian III and remained there in Denmark for five years, reconstituting the Danish Church and reorganizing the country's education. Bugenhagen gave valuable assistance to Luther in his translation of the Bible; his best-known book was a commentary on the Psalms, highly praised by Luther. He also wrote a history of Pomerania, which was not published until 1728. HUGH J. BLAIR

BULGAKOV, SERGEI NIKOLAEVICH (1871-1944). Russian philosopher, theologian, and economist. Son of a priest, he studied at a seminary in Orel, the University of Moscow where he was graduated in 1894, and then at Berlin, Paris, and London, before receiving his doctorate from Moscow in 1912. He taught at the Kiev Polytechnic Institute (1901-6), at Moscow (1906-18), and was elected a Cadet delegate to the second Duma. In 1918 he was ordained priest and because of Soviet disapproval went to teach at the University of Simferopol in the Crimea. He was expelled from Russia in 1922, and went to Prague, then in 1925 to Paris where he was dean and theology professor at the Orthodox Theological Institute which he helped to found. Bulgakov's ideas were strongly influenced by the philosophy of Soloviev* and Pavel Florensky. His thinking developed from Marxism to idealism and then to mysticism. He believed that the world or cosmos was an organic whole, animated by a world soul. God created the world out of nothing and as an emanation of His own nature. Mediating between God and the cosmos and uniting them is a third being, the Sophia or Divine Wisdom. A prolific writer, his many works include The Unfading Light (1917), Jacob's Ladder (1929), Agnus Dei, The God-Manhood (1933), and The Comforter (1936).

BULL, GEORGE STRINGER ("Parson") (1799-1865). An Evangelical and a staunch churchman who resigned from missionary schoolteaching through ill health, he became a clergyman in the industrial West Riding and Birmingham. He worked for temperance, for emancipation of slaves and of factory children (the Ten Hours movement), and opposed the 1834 Poor Law legislation as injurious to workers.

BULL, PAPAL. Derived from the Latin bulla, "seal," a bull originally referred to the seal affixed to papal edicts but later was transferred to the edicts themselves. The term is now restricted to the most important papal mandates, which are stamped with an official wax seal. Bulls have been issued to assert major Roman Catholic doctrines. For example, papal supremacy was declared by Pius II in Execrabilis (1460); in Innefabilis (1854) and Pastor Aeternus (1870), Pius IX proclaimed the doctrine of the Immaculate Conception and papal infallibility. Since 1878 only "consistorial bulls," signed by the pope and cardinals, are sealed in a special way. The originals of these bulls are kept at Rome and copies are sent out.

S. TOON

BULLINGER, JOHANN HEINRICH (1504-1575). Swiss Reformer. Son of the parish priest at Bremgarten, Canton Argau, he received his education first at the School of the Brethren of the Common Life* in Emmerich, duchy of Cleves, and then at the University of Cologne, the citadel of the via antiqua. At Cologne he also became familiar with the works of Erasmus,* Melanchthon,* and Luther whose writings decisively influenced him. After his return to Switzerland in 1523, he joined those who supported Zwingli's* reformation at Zurich and took part in the Berne Disputation of 1528. The disastrous Second Kappel War in 1531 destroyed his fortune and compelled him to flee from Bremgarten, where he had succeeded his father, and to take refuge at Zurich. After the Zurich Council agreed to guarantee the clergy's freedom to preach on all aspects of life in the city, he consented to become Zwingli's successor in December 1531. As the Zurich antistes, Bullinger performed the functions of a "Reformed" bishop presiding over the cantonal synod which he helped to reorganize and mediating between the Zurich Council and the clergy. He was also responsible for the reform of the school system and the creation of a central administration for the income from cloister lands confiscated by the city.

By this time he had already begun his repetitive but massive literary activities which included several important polemical works against the Anabaptists, The Decades (fifty sermons on Christian doctrine), the Diary (Diarium), and the History of the Reformation (Reformationsgeschichte). Bullinger used his literary skills to mediate the quarrels which arose within the Reformed churches, but they were of no avail to him in his repeated attempts to seek a theological agreement with the Lutherans. He played an important part in the writing of the Consensus Tigurinus and the Helvetic Confessions.*

Though he accommodated his own moderate Augustinian doctrine of predestination to the more rigorous one advanced by Calvin, Bullinger remained a lifelong opponent of Calvin's theory of the two polities within the Christian commonwealth and the Genevan ecclesiastical discipline. He was Thomas Erastus's closest ally in the partially successful struggle to prevent the introduction of a presbyterian polity into the Rhineland Palatinate, and he supported the English bishops against Thomas Cartwright's* Presbyterianism because he viewed it as a new form of papal tyranny. Denying that the punishment of Christians should include exclusion from the Lord's Supper, he delegated all coercive power to the secular magistrate whom he assumed was Christian. It was left to the clergy to fulfill their prophetic function by preaching the Word and administering the sacraments to a Christian people whom Bullinger, a covenant theologian, believed were in a covenant relationship with God.

The Zurich Letters (2 vols., 1542, 1545) reveal his interest in English affairs and bear witness to his hospitality to many Marian exiles. Bullinger viewed the leaders of the Church of England as fellow Reformed churchmen and at their behest wrote his refutation of Pius V's Bull of Excommunication against Elizabeth I. Portions of his Decades were dedicated to Edward VI and Lady Jane Grey, and they also provided Whitgift* with an educational tool to protect the clergy against the "prophesyings."

ROBERT C. WALTON

BULTMANN, RUDOLF (1884-1976). German theologian. After studying at the universities of Marburg, Tübingen, and Berlin, he was professor of NT at Marburg (1921-51). One of the major NT scholars of the century, he was during the first twenty years of his professorship known mainly for his pioneering work on the form-criticism of the gospels. Starting at almost the same time as K.L. Schmidt and M. Dibelius, he argued that the gospels could be broken down into smaller units which had grown up in the oral stage of the tradition. He took a largely skeptical view of the authenticity of these units, whether reported sayings or deeds of Jesus. His book Die Geschichte der synoptischen Tradition was first published in Germany in 1921 and made an immediate impact, though there was no English translation until 1963. His next major work was simply called Jesus (1926; ET 1934). In this there is little emphasis on the deeds and teaching of Jesus apart from His call to decision. This is interpreted by Bultmann in terms closely akin to those of existentialist philosophy, and he has been strongly criticized for failing to give enough objective content to the grounds upon which a decision is to be based. Bultmann contributed a number of major articles to Kittel's Theologisches Worterbuch zum Neuen Testament but the next landmark among his publications came in 1941 with publication of his commentary on John's gospel. He suggested in this the dependence of the evangelist upon Gnostic* ideas. In the same year there was published in duplicated form his essay "Neues Testament und Mythologie" (ET in H.W. Bartsch, Kerygma and Myth, 1953). His advocacy here of the need to "demythologize" all the concepts of the NT has had a powerful influence upon theological thought since World War II. Having shown himself skeptical of the historical content of the gospels, and having emphasized the need for decision, here he showed that this decision was to be based upon the kerygma, which was not to be abandoned (as it had been by the liberals) but reinterpreted with its mythological elements expressed in existential terms. His last great work was New Testament Theology (1948-53; ET 1952-55).

BUNSEN, CHRISTIAN KARL JOSIAS VON (Chevalier Bunsen) (1791-1860). Theologian and Prussian diplomat. He founded the German Evangelische Gemeinde and prepared its liturgy. He thus came to be associated with King Frederick William III's ecclesiastical policy, and even more with that of Frederick William IV. The latter appointed him Prussian minister in London (1841-54), where his enthusiasm for Anglicanism increased, and he helped to establish the Anglo-Prussian Jerusalem bishopric (1841). He came to know England well, and his significance may be gauged partly by Rowland Williams's writing in Essays and Reviews (1860) on Bunsen's biblical researches. In the 1850s Bunsen's approach had become less confessional and conservative. He defended freedom of conscience and sought to present the living meaning of the Bible in accord with its historical sense as then understood in critical scholarship. He interpreted dogma morally and psychologically rather than as metaphysical, and placed emphasis on the personal nature of God who reveals Himself in the course of history and through personality. None of his theological or historical work had permanent value.

HADDON WILLMER

BUNTING, JABEZ (1779-1858). English Wesleyan Methodist. Son of a radical Manchester tailor, he was brought up as a Methodist and entered its ministry in 1799. He gradually achieved an unusual ascendancy over conference, which made him its secretary, president (four times), president of the theological institution, and secretary of the missionary society (which his enthusiasm had done much to form). A great organizer, he more than any other single figure determined the shape of Wesleyan Methodism over against the Church of England and the old Dissent; one effect was the loss of Methodists fearing his tendencies to centralism and ministerial dominance. His influence for political conservatism has probably been exaggerated. His opponents paid tribute to his sincerity, eloquence, and gift of prayer.

BUNYAN, JOHN (1628-1688). Puritan writer and preacher. Born at Elstow, near Bedford, into a poor home, he probably acquired his grasp of the English language from reading the Bible. As a youth he was involved in the Civil War on the Roundhead side. In 1649 he married, and his wife brought him Dent's Plain Man's Pathway to Heaven and Bayly's* Practice of Piety. In 1653 he joined Pastor Gifford's Independent church at Bedford. A year or two later he began to preach with no little success, except with the magistrate who remanded him in custody for refusing to undertake not to preach. His imprisonment lasted intermittently from 1660 to 1672, but it enabled him to produce his masterpiece Pilgrim's Progress and other writings, including some verse. After 1672 he spent most of his time in preaching and evangelism in the Bedford area.

The Bedford tinker's fame rests chiefly on three works: Pilgrim's Progress (1678, 1684), The Holy War (1682), and Grace Abounding to the Chief of Sinners (1666). He proved to be a master of simple, homely English style, narrative, and allegory. The first-named book especially was, with Foxe's* Martyrs, read in virtually every Victorian home, and remains a best seller for children and adults alike. Theologically Bunyan was a Puritan in that he held a Calvinist view of grace, but he was a separatist in his views of baptism and the church. He has been much studied by literary experts, and has gathered round his name a number of biographies, chiefly of a devotional nature. The standard biography is still, however, J. Brown's John Bunyan: His Life, Times and Work (1885; rev. F.M. Harrison, 1928).

For a major study of Bunyan's theology, see R. Greaves, John Bunyan (2 vols., 1969). A complete edition of Bunyan's works is currently in preparation.

G.E. DUFFIELD

BURCHARD (c.965-1025). Bishop and canonist. Of a noble Hesse family, he entered the service of Archbishop Willigis of Mainz, and was ordained. Appointed bishop of Worms in 1000, he built new churches, reconstructed the cathedral, and disciplined the clergy. He took a leading part in ecclesiastical reform in Germany. Between 1007 and 1014 he compiled his Decretum, an influential collection of canon law, and between 1023 and 1025 promulgated a celebrated body of laws known as the Leges et statuta familiae S. Peter Wormatiensis.

BURGHERS (also known as the Associate Synod). Scottish Presbyterian secessionist group. In 1733 the first secession from the Church of Scotland took place over the question of patronage.* Despite efforts by the general assemblies of 1732 and 1736 to effect reconciliation, Ebenezer Erskine* and three others constituted themselves into a presbytery and were joined by his brother Ralph and four others in 1737. In 1740 they were formally deposed by the Church of Scotland, and the secession was made definitive. In 1747 they split into Burghers and Antiburghers (also called the General Associate Synod), who respectively regarded it as lawful or sinful for members to take the oath required of burgesses of certain cities by which they acknowledged the true religion publicly preached within Scotland and authorized by law. In 1799 the Burghers split into Auld Lichts* and New Lichts; the Antiburghers similarly split in 1806. The New Lichts of both groups formed the United Secession Church* in 1820. The Auld Licht Antiburghers joined the Free Church of Scotland in 1852, though a remnant continued as the Original Secession Church. The Auld Licht Burghers reunited with the Church of Scotland in 1839.

BURGON, JOHN WILLIAM (1813-1888). Anglican scholar and controversialist. Educated at Worcester College, Oxford, and thereafter fellow of Oriel, he became vicar of St. Mary's, Oxford in 1863, and dean of Chichester in 1876. An old-fashioned High Churchman, he was famous on three counts: as author of the very popular Lives of Twelve Good Men, a series of pungent sketches of High Churchmen of his age (1888); as an unremitting protagonist for the "Textus Receptus" of the NT, both against higher criticism* (cf. The Last Twelve Verses of the Gospel according to St. Mark Vindicated, 1871), and against the then new RV with The Revision Revised (1883); and as the loser in at least three major conflicts in which he violently denounced the disestablishment of the Irish Church in 1869, vigorously opposed the appointment of A.P. Stanley* as a Select Preacher to the university in 1872, and severely criticized the Prayer Book Lectionary of 1872.

G.S.R. COX

BURGOS, JOSE (1837-1872). Philippine-born Spaniard, theologian-curate at Manila Cathedral. From 1863 he led the nationalistic clergy in the Philippines,* and wrote a "Manifesto" for Filipino priests' rights. With Fathers Mariano Gomez and Jacinto Zamora he headed the reform committees.

BURIAL SERVICES. In earliest Christianity, actual burial practices followed the customs of Judaism with the exception that (because of the resurrection of Jesus) a more positive note was introduced in the funeral service. Greater care was taken for the body due to the conception of it as the "temple of the Holy Spirit." With persecution and martyrdom, Christian burial practices gave greater emphasis symbolically, liturgically, and spiritually to those who witness (marturion) to their faith with their lives.

Our earliest distinctively Christian cemeteries are in the area of Rome, "and as martyrs to the faith multiplied, such cemeteries became consecrated ground, and the tombs of the martyrs were ere long places of pious meditation and devotion" (HERE, IV, p. 456). In time, churches were erected either on gravesites or near them, and when the eucharistic celebration became the major focus of Christian worship and liturgy, it was easy to associate this worship with death. Supporting the practice of eucharistic ceremonies (Requiem Mass) were two developments: the Jewish tradition of saying prayers for the dead (2 Macc. 12: 40-46); and the ecclesiological developments which came to distinguish the Church Militant and Church Triumphant from the Church Suffering (said to be Christians in purgatory). Early Christian sources do not forbid cremation as a burial practice; however, the custom of burying in the "earth" was stressed as preferred (cf. Tertullian, De Anima, 51; Origen, Contra Celsus, 5.23, 8.30; Augustine, De Civitate Dei, 1.12-13). Partly because of the Christian doctrine of the Resurrection and Second Coming, as well as the positive emphasis upon martyrdom, funeral services in the centuries prior to the eighth were occasions of joy and celebration; however, from the eighth century black rather than white characterized funeral dress, and the liturgy gave great emphasis to prayers for speedy purification (from purgatory) and even deliverance from hell. The ceremonies themselves came to include Vespers, night before funeral; Matins and Lauds, the dirge during the night; and the Requiem Mass with prayers for absolution in the morning. At the graveside special committal prayers are offered. Protestant practice generally became less liturgical.

BURKITT, FRANCIS CRAWFORD (1864-1935). Biblical and patristic scholar. After taking his degree at Cambridge, he settled there and was Norrisian/Norris Hulse professor of divinity from 1905 until his death. He did important work on the Syriac text of the NT and in 1904 published a two-volume edition of the Old Syriac Gospels, entitled Evangelion da-Mepharreshe. He contributed an important article on the text and versions of the NT in Encyclopaedia Biblica (vol. 4, 1903). His best-known work is The Gospel History and Its Transmission (1906). He followed Johannes Weiss* in rejecting the views of liberal Protestantism and making an eschatological interpretation of the mission and teaching of Jesus. In a small book, The Earliest Sources for the Life of Jesus (2nd ed. 1922), he referred to "the stormy and mysterious Personage portrayed by the second Gospel." He was influential in arranging for the publication in an English edition of Schweitzer's* famous work The Quest of the Historical Jesus (1910). Burkitt was a man of original mind with a gift for clarity and an extraordinary range of academic interests, After his death the Journal of Theological Studies set apart a whole issue as a memorial to him, dealing among other things with his work on Gnosticism, on Manichaeism, and on Franciscan studies.

BURMA. A land strongly Buddhist, but with various animistic hill tribes who number some five or six millions. It is one of the few countries that have recently excluded all foreign missionaries. Yet the Protestant Christian church is stronger there than in any other country of the southern Asiatic mainland in proportion to the population. It has roughly 800,000 adherents, nearly three per cent of the population, though principally among the tribes.

British Baptists, including William Carey's eldest son Felix, entered Burma first from India, but did not long continue. The most important ongoing work was that of the American Baptists, begun in 1814 by Adoniram Judson* and his wife Ann. Judson was one of the first party of missionaries sent out by the American Board.* Shortly after his arrival in India, he changed his affiliation from Congregational to Baptist and severed his connection with the sending society. Unable to remain as a missionary in East India Company territory, he finally made his way across to Burma. There in spite of great suffering and severe opposition he laid the foundation of a flourishing Baptist work.

Judson worked primarily with the Burmese, who have never responded to the Gospel in large numbers. It was seven years before the first converts were baptized. But when George Dana Boardman was sent to Tavoy, he helped begin there a great movement among the Karen tribes that soon spread to other areas. Some groups of Karens became largely Christian and developed a strong, indigenous church. Later other tribes, such as the Chins, Kachins, and Shans, were also effectively reached. Other works, such as that of the Bible Churchmen's Missionary Society (Anglican), have made a significant contribution, but have been overshadowed by the Baptist achievement.

World War II and the independence of Burma in 1948 failed to open up new opportunities. Internal strife forced the Buddhist government to make a few concessions to the Christian minority, but increasing restrictions on foreign missionary activity culminated in the exclusion of all missionaries in 1966. The church has continued to grow, however. In addition, some tribal Christians, such as the Lisu, have fled from Communist China to N Burma, where conditions are still unsettled.

BURNET, GILBERT (1643-1715). Bishop of Salisbury. Born in Edinburgh, he entered Marischal College, Aberdeen, in 1653, studying arts, law, and divinity, and seldom working less than fourteen hours a day. After continental travel he was episcopally ordained and became minister in 1665 of Saltoun, East Lothian. While there he published A Memorial of Diverse Grievances, which attacked both bishops and clergy for the low moral state of the land—and nearly led to his deposition and excommunication. In 1669 he took the chair of divinity at Glasgow, a post to which he gave characteristic zeal. His moderation in an age of extremes, however, was resented by both Presbyterian and Episcopalian parties and (having twice refused bishoprics offered for political reasons) finally he resigned and settled in London, where he became chaplain of the Rolls Chapel and lecturer of St. Clement's (1675-84). Initially a royal chaplain, Burnet rebuked Charles II for his way of life, was subsequently dispossessed by him, was outlawed by James II (1687), and became adviser and staunch supporter in Holland of William of Orange. Appointed bishop of Salisbury in 1689 under William III, he was a faithful counselor to high and low. He preached the sermon at William's coronation, and attended his deathbed. Burnet's other writings include a History of the Reformation in England (3 vols., 1679-1714); Exposition of the Thirty-Nine Articles (1699); and History of His Own Time (1723-34). J.D. DOUGLAS

BURNEY, CHARLES FOX (1868-1925). Anglican Bible scholar. Educated at Merchant Taylors School and Oxford, he was ordained, lectured in Hebrew at Oxford (1893), and was university librarian (1897-1908). He lectured on the Septuagint at Oxford, where in 1914 he became Oriel professor of the interpretation of Holy Scripture. His many publications include Outlines of Old Testament Theology (1899), Notes on the Hebrew Text of the Books of Kings (1903), The Book of Judges (1918), and Poetry of our Lord (1925).

BURNS, WILLIAM CHALMERS (1815-1868). Scottish missionary to China. Son of a Forfarshire minister, he was educated at Aberdeen University and was licensed to preach by the Church of Scotland in 1839. He wished to go to the mission field, but for some years delayed his departure to engage in remarkably fruitful evangelism in Scotland, Ireland, and Canada. Finally in 1846 he went to China as agent of the Presbyterian Church of England. He began the patient study of Chinese, adopted native dress, and endured years that showed little outward response to his labors. Nevertheless he laid the foundations for the main centers of English Presbyterian work in China, both in the south around Amoy and in the north in Manchuria. In the 1850s Burns had been an inspiration and help to the young Hudson Taylor.* He translated into Chinese Pilgrim's Progress and some hymns. He died in a remote spot he had chosen to visit because of its destitution. LESLIE T. LYALL

BURROUGH, EDWARD (1633-1662). Early Quaker. Born near Kendal, England, of godly parents, he heard George Fox* preach in 1652 and after disputing with him soon became one of his followers, even though disowned by his family. He was, with Howgill, Audland, and Camm, one of the pioneer group of Quaker preachers who dispersed in pairs from their native county to spread the light through Commonwealth England. After working in the northeast, he and Howgill went to London in 1654 and also paid short visits to Bristol and the eastern counties. A year later they went to Ireland. Burrough was esteemed by his companions as a controversialist and engaged in a pamphlet war with Bunyan* in 1656-57, although he had little learning or literary polish. At the Restoration he pleaded with Charles II on behalf of persecuted Quakers in New England. He was himself thrown into prison in 1662 for holding an illegal meeting, and he died there. JOHN TILLER

BURROUGHES, JEREMY (1599-1646). English Independent. Educated at Emmanuel, Cambridge, he began his ministry assisting Edmund Calamy* at Bury St. Edmunds, and in 1631 became rector of Tivetshall, Norfolk. He was suspended after Bishop Wren's visitation in 1636, whereupon he went to Rotterdam and became teacher in the English Congregationalist Church there which had William Bridge* for its pastor. Returning in 1641, Burroughes became famous as lecturer at Stepney and Cripplegate. With Bridge he was among the five Dissenting Brethren of the Westminster Assembly,* and presented the Apologeticall Narration to Parliament in 1644. He died of consumption before the Confession of Faith had been completed. JOHN TILLER

BURTON, EDWARD (1794-1836). Patristic scholar and church historian. Educated in Christ Church, Oxford, he studied on the Continent (1818-24) and on his return to England gained a reputation for wide and exact learning. In 1829 he was appointed regius professor of divinity at Oxford. His works include Testimonies of the Ante-Nicene Fathers to the Divinity of Christ (1826); editions of the works of Bishop George Bull, Pearson's* Exposition of the Creed, and Eusebius's Ecclesiastical History; and two volumes of lectures. He is chiefly remembered because his early death resulted in R.D. Hampden's succeeding him as regius professor, and the consequent campaigning by the leaders of the Oxford Movement* against Hampden. JOHN A. SIMPSON

BUSCH, JAN (1399-1480). Member of the Brethren of the Common Life.* He became an Augus-

tinian Canon in 1424. An enthusiastic clerical reformer, he supported Nicholas of Cusa,* who made him visitor of Augustinian houses in Saxony and Thuringia. He ultimately became prior of Windesheim where he had taught in early life. He wrote Windesheim's history (Chronicon Windesheime), an invaluable source for the Brethren's early years and for an account of the Dominican Martin Gabow's attack on the Brethren at the Council of Constance* (1414-18), and how they countered it most successfully.

BUSHNELL, HORACE (1802-1876). Congregational minister and theologian. Born in Connecticut, he graduated from Yale in 1827. After a brief experience in journalism he returned to Yale to study law. He passed his examinations and was ready for admission to the bar when during a revival at the college (1831) he suddenly decided to enter the divinity school. Here he encountered the vigor of N.W. Taylor,* champion of the New Haven Theology.* Bushnell's imaginative mind, however, was uneasy even with Taylor's modified Calvinism. He was attracted instead by Coleridge's Aids to Reflection. In 1833 he was ordained pastor of the North Church of Hartford, Connecticut. There he remained until 1859 when he was forced to resign because of ill health. Through his writings he sponsored three cardinal propositions, each elaborated in a major work. In Christian Nurture (1847) he argued that conversion should be educative rather than spontaneous or sudden. In Nature and Supernatural (1895) he contended that these may be harmonized. In The Vicarious Sacrifice (1866) he declared that Christ's atonement was an illustration of an eternal principle of love rather than a satisfaction by which God was reconciled to man.

BRUCE L. SHELLEY

BUTLER, ALBAN (1711-1773). Hagiographer. Educated at the Roman seminary at Douai from the age of eight (both his parents had died), he became professor first of philosophy and then of divinity, being ordained priest in 1735. For a time chaplain to the duke of Norfolk, he then went with Edward Howard, the duke's nephew, to Paris, where he completed his four-volumed Lives of the Fathers, Martyrs, and other principal Saints . . .—a monumental and wide-ranging collection of material involving some 1,600 lives. Its weakness lies in the lack of clear differentiation between history and legend. After all the travels to collect material and some time as a mission priest in England, he spent the last seven years of his life as president of the English College at St. Omer in France.

G.S.R. COX

BUTLER, JOSEPH (1692-1752). Bishop and scholar. Born at Wantage, Berkshire, son of a Presbyterian draper, he was sent to a dissenting academy where, inspired by Samuel Clarke's Boyle Lectures, he corresponded with the lecturer on philosophy and God's existence. He was intended for the Presbyterian ministry but, deciding not to proceed, he entered Oriel College, Oxford, in 1715, apparently with the aid of borrowed money. Here he read law followed by divinity. Though ordained in 1718, Butler did not become financially independent for eight or ten years. His eventual preferment followed a friendship with Queen Caroline; he became bishop of Bristol in 1738, and of Durham in 1750. He was never politically active, but throughout life maintained his early interest in philosophical questions.

The Analogy of Religion, on which Butler had worked for many years, appeared in 1736 at a time when the Deist controversy was at its height. It proved to be the greatest theological book of its age and did more to discredit Deism than any other book. It influenced many later writers, including Hume* and J.H. Newman.* Butler's argument is empirical, stressing fact in support of religion. The order we find in nature paralleled by the order we find in revelation, suggesting joint authorship by God, is his theme. The difficulties we encounter in Christianity, he held, bear a close analogy with those we encounter in nature, neither presenting more difficulties than the other. What we cannot understand in both spheres is due to lack of knowledge or limitation of intellect. Later in his Sermons he expanded the theme, arguing that man's psychological make-up, on which a rational ethical theory must be built, is consistently interrelated, thus affording an analogy to the constitution of the world at large. In discussing Christian evidences, Butler argues that evidence is based on probability, this being of three kinds: matters of speculation, matters of practice, and matters of great consequence. Religion is placed in the third class.

BUTLER, JOSEPHINE ELIZABETH (1828-1907). Social reformer. She was first concerned with the promotion of educational facilities for women, but after 1866, first in Liverpool and thereafter in other places, notably Winchester, she supported refuges for all kinds of destitute women. Her life soon centered on an attempt to remove all forms of sexual exploitation of women. In general she objected to the hypocrisy of different standards of sexual morality for men and women, and led two major campaigns for reform. The first was for the repeal of the Contagious Diseases Acts of the 1860s which, in attempts to control disease, virtually provided a form of officially recognized prostitution in seaports and garrison towns and subjected many women to ignominious harassment. She formed the Ladies National Association for Appeal in 1869, and while she could not easily be described as an evangelical, her technique of parliamentary and extraparliamentary opposition owed much to the example of some of the earlier evangelical social reformers. Repeal was achieved in the 1880s. Her other great campaign was to promote legislation to raise the age of consent and to stamp out organized prostitution, especially the procurement of young girls. Her campaign received somewhat flamboyant support from W.T. Stead, editor of the Pall Mall Gazette, and Bramwell Booth. In 1885 a famous procurement was carried out and publicized by Stead. Legislation, including the raising of the age of consent to sixteen, which had long been filibustered, was quickly passed. Criminal prosecutions of Stead and Booth followed, and Stead was imprisoned.

BUXTEHUDE, DIETRICH (1637-1707). German composer. For many years organist of St. Mary's Church in Lübeck, he gained wide fame for the Abendmusiken (performance of church music on the five Sundays before Christmas), which he instituted in 1673. His choral and organ music is of outstanding merit. J.S. Bach* journeyed to Lübeck in his youth to hear Buxtehude's performances and was greatly influenced by him. The seventeenth century produced a great many Lutheran composers of merit, many of whom deserve attention; Buxtehude stands out among them for the vigor and imagination displayed in his chorale-preludes for organ, and for the beauty of the melodic line in many of his vocal compositions. His music is less difficult than Bach's for the average church choir today. J.B. MAC MILLAN

BYE PLOT (1603). William Watson, a Roman Catholic secular priest, supported James I's accession, believing that he had promised withdrawal of the recusancy fines. Disillusioned when they continued, he plotted to capture James, in company with another priest, William Clarke, and two dissatisfied Protestants, George Brooke and Lord Grey of Wilton. The Jesuits, anxious to discredit the seculars, revealed the plot to James who gratefully relieved Catholics of payment of fines for a period. Grey died in prison, the others were executed.

BYRD, WILLIAM (1543-1623). British composer. One of the greatest of all British composers, he remained a staunch Catholic in the England of Elizabeth and James I. He composed in practically all the musical forms of the day, sacred and secular. In spite of his religious affiliation, he was active at court and composed important music for the new Anglican rite. Although the chronology is not wholly clear, he has a good claim to be considered the father of the Anglican anthem. His beautiful "Christ rising again," for two sopranos, chorus, and instrumental accompaniment (1589) —although it may not have been intended for church performance—is a prototype of the verse anthem (i.e., with solo parts), which became and remained popular with Anglican composers. His magnificent "Great" Service is a landmark in Anglican music. It includes canticles for Morning Prayer, Evensong, and Holy Communion, set for the traditional English cathedral choir of decani and cantoris (the two groups of singers who face each other across the chancel). In addition to anthems and services, he wrote a very large quantity of excellent Latin music for the Catholic rite, including three complete Masses and two large volumes of Gradualia. A complete edition of his music in twenty volumes has been edited by Canon E.H. Fellowes, who also wrote a biography (1948). J.B. MAC MILLAN

BYROM, JOHN (1692-1763). English poet. Educated at Merchant Taylors School, he became a fellow of Trinity College, Cambridge and subsequently lived in Manchester. He is now known for his hymn "Christians, awake!" but his real claim to fame lies in his devotion to the ideas of the mystical writer, William Law.* Many of Byrom's poems are versifications of Law. Hence it is not surprising to find his exaltation of divine love, especially in the exemplary character of Christ's death, and—what was so uncharacteristic for the eighteenth century—his awareness of the activity of the Holy Spirit; hence also his frequent spiritual application of natural law and his frank avowal of "enthusiasm," the spontaneous response, in preference to the rational. BYZANTINE TEXT. The name given to the form of text of the Greek NT to which the great majority of MSS dating from the Byzantine period and since bear witness. It underlies the "Textus Receptus" and therefore also the earlier English versions of the Bible. It is now thought to be due to a (perhaps lengthy) process of revision by which a generally standard text form arose. It is more closely related to the Syrian family of MSS than to any of the other families. This is marked by a tendency to conflate the shorter readings of earlier MSS, to harmonize differences, and to provide a smoother literary style. Because of this secondary character, the text is a much less reliable witness to the original text of the NT than are some of the other text families. R.E. NIXON

CABLE, MILDRED (1877-1952). Missionary to China. Having been delayed by the Boxer Uprising, she went to China in 1901 and with Eva and Francesca French built up a flourishing work at Hochow in Shansi province, including one of the first girls' schools in China. When principles of self-support began to be applied in 1928, they dealt the work a severe blow. Soon afterward, the indomitable trio of women decided to move to the extreme northwest of China, where they established their base in Suchow, the "City of Criminals." From there they made repeated evangelistic journeys through central Asia, traveling from oasis to oasis, and in the main cities of Turkestan (or Sinkiang), preaching and distributing Scriptures. LESLIE T. LYALL

CABRINI, FRANCES-XAVIER (1850-1917). Founder of the Missionary Sisters of the Sacred Heart. Born at S. Angelo Lodigiano, Italy, she was shy and physically delicate, but possessed of an iron will and implacable spirit. She abandoned her elementary-school teaching career to fulfill her lifelong desire to be a missionary to China. Rejected because of poor health, in 1880 she founded her own women's missionary society. Her vast vision and bold faith give ample proof that she thoroughly believed her society's motto: Philippians 4:13. Ordered to New York by Pope Leo XIII, she began her work among Italian immigrants in 1889. Her boundless energy gave birth to schools, charitable organizations, and hospitals throughout North and South America, Asia, and Europe. Mother Cabrini was especially adept at procuring funds and aid from non-Catholic sources. Regarded as patron of emigrants and all displaced persons, she was canonized in 1946. ROYAL L. PECK

CADBURY, HENRY JOEL (1883- ). American NT scholar. Member of the Society of Friends, he taught at various eastern colleges and seminaries, then from 1934 to 1954 served as Hollis professor of divinity at Harvard. He was a member of the RSV translation committee, secretary for many years of the American Schools of Oriental Research, and president of the Society of Biblical Literature and Exegesis. His primary contribution to biblical scholarship has been in the area of Lucan research. His publications include The Style and Literary Method of Luke (1919-20), The Making of Luke-Acts (1928), The Book of Acts in History (1955), and numerous essays in the same area. With K. Lake* he co-authored the commentary volume of The Beginnings of Christianity: Part I: The Acts of the Apostles (vol. IV, 1933) and also wrote many of the most valuable essays in the appendix volume of the same work. His books are models of careful scholarship. W. WARD GASQUE

CAECILIAN. Bishop of Carthage, A.D. 311/12-c.340. As archdeacon he assisted Bishop Mensurius in checking extravagant devotion to confessors and martyrs during the Great Persecution. His rigorist critics, joined by disaffected clergy when he was elected bishop, called in the Numidian bishops who declared his consecration invalid because an alleged traditor (see DONATISM), Felix of Apthungi, had participated and because Caecilian had neglected the confessors. They proceeded to create a counter bishop. The dissidents protested against Constantine's assigning his relief measures of 312-13 to Caecilian, but at synods at Rome in 313 and, after further (Donatist) appeals, Arles in 314 and in Constantine's own inquiries in 315-16, Caecilian was completely vindicated. He was the only African bishop at the Council of Nicea in 325. D.F. WRIGHT

CAEDMON (d. c.678). English poet. He was a cowherd who suddenly, according to Bede's Ecclesiastical History (IV. 24), was endowed with the gift of poetry and composed the short piece known as Caedmon's Hymn. Taken before Hilda,* abbess of Whitby, he composed other verses, as a result of which she persuaded him to enter the monastic life. He is said to have written on the Genesis story, the Exodus, Incarnation, Passion, Resurrection, and Ascension, as well as other topics. Of surviving Old English poetry, only the Genesis A text of the Junius MS is now thought possibly to have been his, and there are considerable doubts even about this. His hymn is written, in the four-stressed alliterative meter, with any number of unstressed syllables, characteristic of much Old English verse. ARTHUR POLLARD

CAESAREA (Palestine). A city built by Herod the Great on the site of Strato's Tower, about halfway between Joppa and Dor, on the Mediterranean coast. Named in honor of the Roman emperor, Caesar Augustus, it was the Roman metropolis of Judea and the official residence of the Roman procurators and Herodian kings. The city was built between 22 and 10 B.C., on an insignificant site, though an important location. It lay on the coastal route between Egypt and Syria, but the harbor of Strato's Tower was a minor one, unsheltered and never more than an insignificant anchorage. Yet here, unrestrained by earlier constructions or by Jewish sensitivities, a Greco-Roman masterpiece was built, surpassing the engineering feats of Masada. A circular, artificial harbor was created larger than Piraeus and a major seawall built. The city was laid out on a grid, the main streets orientated to the harbor, linking it with a magnificent theater, forum, and amphitheater that overlooked the sea. A major aqueduct was built that brought a copious water supply from springs in the hills several miles away; an intricate drainage system underlay the streets. One hundred fifty years later, Hadrian doubled the size and capacity of the aqueduct, possibly as a result of an earthquake that damaged the city's monuments. Since 1960 air surveys have plotted the outline of the harbor, and excavations of the forum, theater, and aqueduct have been made. But most sections of the city have not yet been excavated, presently preserved beneath an extensive golf course.

The allusions to Caesarea in the Book of Acts are important. Philip the Evangelist brought Christianity to his home city and here later entertained Paul and his companions (21:8). Here also dwelt Cornelius, and this was the locale of his conversion (10:1, 24; 11:11). It was in this cosmopolitan city of Jews and Gentiles that Peter gained his first insight (10:35) of the divine kingdom that has no discrimination of peoples as "clean" or "unclean." Pontius Pilate, the procurator, lived here, and in 1961 Italian archaeologists found a stone inscribed with his name. Paul made Caesarea the port of his landing when he returned from his second and third missionary journeys (18:22; 21:8), and it was to Caesarea he was sent for trial by Felix (23:23-33). He made his defense here before Festus and Agrippa and sailed from here in chains to Rome (25:11). It was difficulties between Jews and Gentiles at Caesarea that led to the Jewish revolt of A.D. 66 which ended in the destruction of Jerusalem in A.D. 70. It subsequently became an important Christian center, and it was the home of the church father Eusebius.

CAESAREAN TEXT. The name given by B.H. Streeter* (The Four Gospels, 1924) to a family of MSS of the Greek NT related to the text which Origen used at Caesarea. Its leading representatives are the Koridethi* MS and the two families of minuscules—fam. 1 and fam. 13. This text seems to have been a sort of compromise between the two previous "Western" and "Alexandrian" texts, and because of its consequent similarity in certain points to the Syrian text, its separate existence long escaped detection. K. Lake,* R.P. Blake, and S. New suggested that it probably first came into being in Egypt and was brought by Origen to Caesarea. From there it seems to have been taken on to Jerusalem, to the Armenians (who had a colony in Jerusalem at an early date), and then to the Georgians (the Koridethi MS was found in Georgia). It has therefore been questioned whether the Caesarean text should be thought of as something as distinct as the Western or Alexandrian texts. It is certainly more mixed and less homogeneous. But the work of Streeter has helped to open up an important new line of investigation into the history of the NT text.

R.E. NIXON

CAESARIUS OF ARLES (470-543). Bishop of Arles. Born at Chalons and educated in the monastery of Lérins, he epitomized the virtuous monk-bishop for forty crucial years, and by his legislation at his frequent church councils reformed the conduct of both secular and monastic clergy, writing rules for monks and nuns. An indefatigable preacher, he ruled that his clergy should preach in town and country frequently, simply, and briefly (his own practice was the fifteen-minute sermon). He fostered daily attendance at worship, congregational singing and memorization of Scripture, and involving laymen in the administration of funds. At the Second Council of Orange in 529 his representative countered the Semi-Pelagians* with his statement concerning prevenient grace and baptismal regeneration, and his denial of predestination to condemnation. MARY E. ROGERS

CAESARIUS OF HEISTERBACH (c.1170-c.1240). Author and prior of the Cistercian House of Heisterbach, near Cologne. He was educated at Cologne, where he received a good grounding in the classics and the Fathers, and acquired a fluent Latin style. Entering the monastery at Heisterbach in 1198 or 1199, he employed his talent in works prepared for the novices under his care, most notably the Dialogus miraculorum (c.1223), a delightful collection combining detail about contemporary life in the monastery and in the empire with credulous tales of witches, incubi, and succubi. One of the most popular writers of the thirteenth century, he wrote also a second compilation of miracles in eight books, of which only three are extant: a Catalogus episcoporum Coloniensium; an admirable biography of Engelbert, bishop of Cologne murdered in 1225; and sermons intended for a monastic audience, with copious scriptural and historical references. With true Cistercian zeal he criticized the ecclesiastical abuses he observed, including those of the confessional system. MARY E. ROGERS

CAESAROPAPISM. A system whereby supreme authority over the church is exercised by a secular ruler, so even doctrine is subject to state control. The term is applied chiefly to the authority exercised by the Byzantine emperors over the Eastern Church during the sixth to tenth centuries. Similar terms are "Byzantism" and "Erastianism."*

CAINITES. A dissolute Ophite* Gnostic sect (c.175-225), the Cainites believed the Creator to be so evil that his laws should be inverted and his recorded enemies (Cain, Esau, Korah) commended. For example, the mastery of Cain over Abel showed the impotence of the Creator. Judas Iscariot was commended, by some for opposing Christ, by others for facilitating His soteriological work. Their writings included a "Gospel of Judas" and an account of the revelations to Paul in the third heaven.

CAIRD, EDWARD (1835-1908). Scottish philosopher. One of the leading representatives of the Neo-Hegelian movement in British philosophy during the latter part of the nineteenth century. Previously professor of moral philosophy at Glasgow, he succeeded Benjamin Jowett* as master of Balliol College, Oxford, in 1893. Caird accepted the then prevailing concept of the progressive evolution of thought, and his own idealistic religious philosophy was expressed in his two important works, The Evolution of Religion (1893) and The Evolution of Theology in the Greek Philosophers (1904). He produced two important works on Kant* and a monograph on Hegel.* JOHN A. SIMPSON

CAIRD, JOHN (1820-1898). Scottish theologian and philosopher, older brother of Edward.* Born in Greenock and educated at Glasgow University, he was ordained and became minister successively at Newton-on-Ayr (1845), Lady Yester's, Edinburgh (1847), Errol (1849), and Park Church, Glasgow (1857). He was appointed to the chair of theology at Glasgow in 1862 and became principal of the university in 1873. Earlier he had preached before Queen Victoria from Romans 12:11 what Dean Stanley called "the greatest single sermon of the century," which was published and translated into several languages. His writings include Introduction to the Philosophy of Religion (1880), which contained, it was said, the essence of Hegelianism (see HEGEL) as applicable to the Christian religion, and The Fundamental Ideas of Christianity (2 vols., 1899).

J.D. DOUGLAS

CAIRNS, JOHN (1818-1892). Scots divine. The outstanding leader of the United Presbyterian Church of Scotland of his time. Brought up among the Seceders, the son of a border shepherd, he was ordained at Berwick-on-Tweed in 1845, where for thirty years he sustained a remarkable ministry. Having refused numerous calls to influential city pulpits and to university and college chairs, he moved to Edinburgh in 1876 to become professor of systematic theology and apologetics, and later also principal, in the U.P. divinity hall. He made his mark on the religious and public life of Scotland, alike by personality and character, and "his death called forth a manifestation of public feeling such as does not occur twice in one generation." D.P. THOMSON

CAIUS, see GAIUS

CAJETAN (Gaetano di Tiene) (1480-1547). Founder of the Theatine Order.* A noble of Vicenza, he was made protonotary apostolic by Julius II in 1505, ordained priest in 1516, and became a member of the Oratory of Divine Love. Concerned about the state of the secular clergy, he conceived the idea of a community of secular priests living together under the three vows while engaging in pastoral work. With Pietro Caraffa (later Paul IV) he began the Theatine Order, aimed at reforming the church from within, which played a part in the Counter-Reformation.

CAJETAN, TOMMASO DE VIO (1464-1534). Dominican cardinal and philosopher. Born of noble stock and studious by nature, he defied his parents' wishes and entered the Dominican Order* before he was sixteen. He studied at Naples, Bologna, and Padua and established a reputation through lectures and writing (he is credited with some 115 works). Appointed to the chair of metaphysics at Bologna, he enhanced his reputation through attacking the prevailing humanism. His celebrated work De Ente et Essentia was directed against Averroism.* He became a recognized exponent of Thomas Aquinas.* His defense of the power and monarchical supremacy of the pope at the Pseudo-Council of Pisa (1511) increased his favor at Rome. Through Ferdinand of Spain he was successful in sending the first Dominican missionary for the conversion of the natives of America. He was created cardinal in 1517. His greatest disappointment was his failure to persuade Luther to recant when they met on three successive days in Augsburg in 1518. Cajetan was one of Luther's most competent opponents.

GORDON A. CATHERALL

CALAMY, EDMUND (1600-1666). Puritan divine. Educated at Pembroke Hall, Cambridge, he entered the church and was successively bishop's chaplain (at Ely), vicar of St. Mary, Swaffham Prior, and then lecturer at Bury St. Edmunds in 1626. At first he regarded "ceremonial" as neutral, but later strongly opposed Laudian policy. In 1639 he was elected to the perpetual curacy of St. Mary Aldermanbury. During the controversy over divine-right episcopacy in 1640/41 Calamy contributed, as one of the authors who wrote under the pseudonym of Smectymnuus, to the Presbyterian reply. Later he was prominent in the Westminster Assembly.* He opposed the execution of Charles I and remained quiet during the Commonwealth and Protectorate. After welcoming back Charles II, he was a member of the Savoy Conference* (1661), and a leader of those who wanted a broadly based national church. He was ejected in 1662 and imprisoned briefly in 1663 for disobeying the Act of Uniformity.* His last years were spent in quiet retirement. His son, Edmund the Younger, was also an ejected minister; his grandson, also Edmund,* was the historian of early Nonconformity.* PETER TOON

CALAMY, EDMUND (1671-1732). Historian of English Nonconformity*; grandson of Edmund Calamy* (d.1666). After preliminary education in several private homes and schools, he went to the University of Utrecht in 1688. On his return in 1691 he was able to read privately in the Bodleian Library, Oxford. On 22 June 1694, with six ejected ministers taking part, seven young men of whom Calamy was one were publicly ordained in London to the nonconformist ministry. He then assisted Daniel Williams at the meeting house in Hand Alley, Bishopsgate, before he succeeded Vincent Alsop as pastor of the congregation that eventually moved to Princes Street, London. Though he did much traveling and preaching, he is best known for his work as a writer of biographic accounts of early Nonconformist ministers with Richard Baxter* as the central figure. In four volumes published between 1702 and 1727 he continued the work begun by Baxter in his Reliquiae (ed. M. Sylvester, 1696). In 1775 Samuel Palmer published an improved edition of Calamy's biographical studies; a further improved edition appeared in 1802-3, and then in 1937 A.G. Matthews published his Calamy Revised. Apart from his historical writings, Calamy defended the orthodox doctrine of the Trinity (1722) and the principle of Nonconformity (1703-4).

PETER TOON

CALCED (Lat. calceus, "shoe"). A term applied to certain religious orders who wear boots or shoes to distinguish them from other branches of the order who go barefoot or in sandals. Thus the Calced Carmelites, the unreformed branch of the order, wear shoes; the Discalced Carmelites of the Teresian reform wear sandals.

CALDERWOOD, DAVID (1575-1650). Scottish minister and historian. Said to have been born in Midlothian and educated at Edinburgh University, he was ordained minister of Crailing in 1604. He soon showed himself a strong opponent of James VI's policy of imposing episcopacy upon the Church of Scotland, for which stance he was confined to his parish and debarred from attendance at church courts. After standing up to the king in a personal confrontation he was deprived, imprisoned, and in 1619 ordered to leave the country. He spent several years in Holland and there produced Altare Damascenum (1623), a superb statement of the church's doctrine, ministry, and worship, which refuted prelacy and greatly encouraged Presbyterians. His name is usually associated, however, with his History of the Kirk of Scotland (1678 in folio; 8 vols., 1842-49), to complete which he was granted an annual pension by the general assembly. J.D. DOUGLAS CALENDAR. Primitive man measured his calendar by the cycle of recurring natural phenomena which he observed, such as the alteration of day and night and the phases of the moon. The calendar in use in NT times was the Julian, based on the Roman republican calendar. By 46 B.C. the republican calendar had grown out of step with the seasons to the extent of three months, and the seasons were no longer in proper relationship with the calendar months. Julius Caesar instituted a four-year cycle, the first three having 365 days and the fourth 366, the additional day being placed in February. The fourth years were known as bissextile years. The modern term "leap year" is derived from the Old Norse hlaupar. In the Julian calendar each year was eleven minutes fifteen seconds too long, a fact which was significant only over a long period. After several delays the new Gregorian calendar was promulgated by Gregory XIII in 1582. The leap year rules were altered to deal with the fault in the Julian calendar, and ten days were omitted from 1582 to balance the accumulated error. The calendar is now correct to within one day in 20,000 years. The Gregorian calendar, now used for civil purposes throughout the world, was not generally adopted immediately. Great Britain did not adopt it until 1752, and the Russians did not do so until the rise of the Soviet government in 1917. The Orthodox Church has not adopted it, with the result that its year is now thirteen days behind the Gregorian year. The Gregorian calendar restored New Year's Day to 1 January. Formerly it was 25 March, the supposed anniversary of the Annunciation. The date of Easter is calculated in reference to the epact (the age of the moon at the beginning of the year), and the rules laid down by the Council of Nicea are largely adopted. Other Christian festivals have fixed dates.

JAMES TAYLOR

CALFHILL, JAMES (1530?-1570). Anglican theologian. Educated at Eton and King's College, Cambridge, he became in 1548 one of the first students of Henry VIII's renewed foundation of Christ Church, Oxford. Although an M.A. by 1552, he preferred to wait for the return of Protestantism under Elizabeth before proceeding to his B.D. and ordination in 1559-60. Calfhill was quickly preferred: canon of Christ Church (1560), prebend of St. Paul's (1562), Lady Margaret professor of divinity at Oxford (1564). He was nominated bishop of Worcester in 1570, but died before consecration. He preached two sermons at Bristol in 1568 against the views of Cheyney, bishop of Gloucester and Bristol. His most important published work was An Answer to the Treatise of the Cross (1565). JOHN TILLER

CALIXTINES. The moderate party of the Hussites, also called the Utraquists. The name is derived from the Latin word for cup (calix), indicating their demand that communicants should also receive the wine in the sacrament. The Calixtine program was formulated in 1420 in the Four Articles of Prague and included as a major tenet Communion for the laity in both kinds. For a time they were united with the Taborites,* the most radical group among the Hussites, but they eventually came to an agreement with Rome in the Compacts of Prague (1433) which conceded their demand for Communion in both kinds. The agreement was later repudiated by the pope, but the Calixtines survived as a semiautonomous Bohemia national church until the Reformation, when they merged with the Protestant movement in Bohemia.

See also UTRAQUISM. RUDOLPH HEINZE

CALIXTUS, GEORGE (1586-1656). Early ecumenist. He suffered the fate of many irenic writers in being suspected and rejected by the factions which he sought to reconcile. Born at Medelby in Schleswig, he studied philology, philosophy, and theology at the University of Helmstedt and elsewhere. He became acquainted with the leading Reformers through his travels in Holland, England, and France. In 1614 he was appointed professor of theology in Helmstedt, and became the most influential representative of the school of Melanchthon.* The great aim of his life was to attempt the reconciliation of divided elements in the church by getting rid of unimportant differences and concentrating on the fundamental articles of belief. His books, including Epitome Theologiae, Theologia Moralis, and De Arte Nova Nihusii, aroused the antagonism of Roman Catholics, who felt they were directed against them; but they were also rejected by orthodox Lutherans, who detected in them leanings towards Romanism. The Conference of Thorn* brought him into further difficulties when he was accused of Calvinist leanings. His dispute with the Lutherans (the "Syncretistic Controversy") lasted for many years. HUGH J. BLAIR

CALLISTUS I (d. c.222). Bishop of Rome from 217. According to his enemy Hippolytus, Callistus had been a slave, deported to Sardinia for fraud and released by Marcia, concubine of Commodus. Zephyrinus, bishop of Rome (198-217), put him in charge of the Roman clergy and the cemetery now called San Callisto. As bishop, Callistus excommunicated Sabellius and maintained a moderate policy on discipline—no sin was unforgivable; married clergy were acceptable; second baptism was permitted. This charitable policy he defended biblically from Romans 14:4 and the parable of the wheat and the tares (Matt. 13:29-30). Further, he allowed women of high rank to live in contubernium with slaves or free men. Roman law forbade marriage between certain social classes. Callistus sought to facilitate partnerships which were unrecognized by state law, but which were confined to one partner. Tertullian as a Montanist* reacted with his De Pudicitia, and Hippolytus withdrew from communion and set up an antipope. G.T.D. ANGEL

CALLISTUS II (Calixtus) (d.1124). Pope from 1119. Gui or Guido, fifth son of Count William of Burgundy, became archbishop of Vienne (1088), papal legate in France, and cardinal. He used his position and personality to make Pope Paschal II repudiate concessions granted to Emperor Henry V. At a council in Vienne (1112), he denounced lay investiture, rejected Paschal's decree (1111) that clergy should surrender their temporalities in return for Henry's relinquishment of investiture, and excommunicated Henry. On becoming pope he had to face an antipope, Gregory VIII (Burdinus), set up by Henry. After negotiation at the Concordat of Worms (1122), Henry abandoned Gregory VIII and the right to invest prelates with ring and staff. Ecclesiastical elections remained under imperial influence. Callistus convoked in the Lateran the first ecumenical council to be held in the West (1123). This confirmed the Concordat of Worms and issued decrees against clerical marriage and simony. Callistus gave judgment for the independence of York in the dispute between the sees of York and Canterbury. J.G.G. NORMAN

CALLISTUS III (Calixtus) (1378-1458). Pope from 1455. Spanish by birth, Alphonso de Borgia studied and taught law at the university of Lérida, where he was cathedral canon before becoming a jurist to King Alphonso V. For reconciling Alphonso with Pope Eugenius IV he was made bishop of Valencia (1429) and cardinal (1444). Chosen pope as a neutral, he maintained the balance of power between the Colonna and the Orsini. His major achievement was to organize a crusade against the Turks to recover Constantinople. In this objective it failed, though it forced the Turks to lift the siege of Belgrade (1456) and defeated their fleet at Metelino (1457). Callistus instituted the Feast of the Transfiguration to commemorate the Belgrade victory. A man of austere life, he was yet a renowned nepotist, making his nephew Rodrigo de Borgia (later Pope Alexander VI) cardinal and generalissimo of the papal forces.

There was also an antipope Callistus III (John of Struma) (1168-78). J.G.G. NORMAN

CALOV(IUS), ABRAHAM (1612-1686). German theologian. Born at Mohrungen, he was largely self-taught in his youth, but graduated from the University of Königsberg. Here he taught for a time, moving later to Rostock and Danzig, and in 1650, at the invitation of the elector, to Wittenberg, where he spent the rest of his life. A strenuous defender of rigid Lutheran orthodoxy, he attacked the Syncretistic School of Helmstedt and his Königsberg followers, and later wrote against Calixtus* and his school. He assailed Roman Catholicism, Arminianism, Socinianism, Pietism, and Calvinism, even intervening in the internal controversies of the Calvinist divines. He drew up the Consensus repetitus fidei verae Lutheranae in an attempt to exclude all Syncretists from the Lutheran Church, but the state authorities were by now tired of controversial divinity and imposed a silence so thorough that Calovius's own account of the Syncretistic Controversy (1682) was published anonymously. He wrote against the liberal critical views of Grotius* in Biblia Illustrata (1672-76) and against Boehme* (1684). Calovius always maintained that he deplored controversy and preferred constructive theology—and indeed his great twelve-volume Systema locorum theologicorum (1655-77) ranks with the work of Gerhard* as the leading expression of seventeenth-century Lutheran scholasticism. IAN SELLERS

CALVARY. The AV (KJV) rendering at Luke 23:33 of the Greek kranion, "skull." The Vulgate has locus calvariae. The other gospels read "Golgotha" from the Aramaic gulgoltâ. The name may have been derived from its being a place of execution, or because it was a skull-shaped hill, though no mention is made of a hill in the text. There is division of opinion whether the place is to be identified with the site of the Church of the Holy Sepulchre or with the "Garden Tomb" also known as "Gordon's Calvary."

CALVERT, JAMES (1813-1892). Wesleyan missionary to the Fiji (Cannibal) Islands. Born in Pickering, England, he was converted at eighteen while apprenticed to a printer. In 1837 he was accepted for missionary service and sent to Hoxton Theological Institution. After six months there, his studies were interrupted by an urgent appeal for help from Fiji. He, John Hunt,* and Thomas Jaggar arrived there just three years after the work began. A quarter-century of labors witnessed a marvelous transformation of the islands. Returning to England in 1865, the Calverts seven years later were asked to help in the South African diamond fields. They spent more than eight years there before retiring again. In 1886-87 Calvert revisited Fiji and was able to appreciate what fifty years of missionary work had accomplished.

HAROLD R. COOK

CALVERT FAMILY, THE. George Calvert (1580?-1632), secretary of state under James I, resigned that post in 1625 when he became a Roman Catholic. Thereafter the king made him a baron and gave him large estates in Ireland. The baron spent most of his remaining years in colonial pursuits, first in trying to establish a colony in Newfoundland and later in seeking a grant farther south. The charter for Maryland was actually issued to his son Cecilius (1605-75) in 1632. He established the colony in 1634 with the double motive of providing a haven for the persecuted Catholics of England and carving out for himself a lucrative estate in the New World. Cecilius was not successful in attracting Catholics to his settlement, and from the beginning Protestants were in the majority. To prevent Catholic persecution he followed a liberal policy of religious freedom and in 1649 proposed the first toleration act in the New World, which quickly passed the Maryland assembly. Calvert's troubles with Puritans and his support by Cromwell do not warrant mention here. In 1692 the Crown set up a royal government in Maryland, and the Church of England was established, but the Calverts retained their territorial rights. When a Protestant Calvert (Benedict Leonard) became heir to the proprietorship in 1715, proprietary government was reestablished and continued until the Revolution, as did the Anglican establishment.

HOWARD F. VOS

CALVIN, JOHN (1509-1564). French Reformer. He was born 10 July 1509, in Noyon, Picardy, sixty miles NE of Paris, to Gerard Cauvin (Calvinus was the Latinized form of his name) and his wife Jeanne la France of Cambrai. John was the second of five sons. His father, a notary public, was primarily employed in the service of the bishop of Noyon, and as a result while John was still young he obtained for him two ecclesiastical benefices. The young Calvin at an early age became friendly with the sons of one of the local gentry, Joachim de Hangest, sire de Montmor, who suggested when his sons were going to Paris for further education that Calvin should accompany them. Gerard agreed. After spending a few months at the Collège de la Marche, John enrolled in the Collège de Montaigu. When Gerard, however, came into conflict with the bishop of Noyon he decided that his son should give up all thought of the priesthood. He therefore ordered him to study law at Orléans where Pierre de l'Estoile was teaching, and while there John also took lectures from Andrea Alciati, the humanist legal scholar, at Bourges. When his father died in 1531, however, he returned to Paris to continue his literary studies, although he did go back to Orléans for a term to complete his law course.

Although we know little about Calvin's conversion, we have information to indicate that he had frequent contacts with men of Protestant tendencies while a student. At the Collège de Montaigu he may have met John Major, the Scottish conciliarist, and at Orléans and Bourges we do know that he studied Greek under Melchior Wolmar, a humanist with strong Protestant leanings. A number of his friends at Orléans and his cousin Francis Olivetan were also moving in this direction. It may have been as a result of these influences, coupled with attendance in Paris at secret Protestant meetings, that Calvin, despite his later acknowledgement of his "obdurate attachment to papistical superstitions," became a Protestant. As a young man with very considerable ability as well as a reputation for learning, he soon became one of the leaders in the Protestant movement in Paris.

In April 1532 Calvin, typical of young humanist scholars of his day, published his first book, a commentary on Seneca's De Clementia. But soon after, he became caught up in the Reformation movement, which led him to concentrate his attention on biblical studies. When his friend Nicholas Cop* was elected rector of the University of Paris, John helped him to prepare his rectoral address delivered on 1 November 1533, which was an attack upon the church and a demand for reform along the lines advocated by Luther. The result was an explosion of anti-Protestant feeling which forced both Cop and Calvin to leave Paris. Although Calvin later returned for a short time, his reputation as one of les Réformes soon obliged him to leave again, and for the next three years he spent his time traveling in France, Switzerland, and Italy. During this period he also resigned his ecclesiastical benefices at Noyon.

Despite the necessity of being continually on the move to avoid arrest or persecution, Calvin had begun to use his pen in behalf of the Protestant faith. In 1534 he published his first religious work, Psychopannychia, an attack upon the doctrine of soul sleep after death. Shortly afterward, Olivetan's French translation of the Bible appeared with a preface by Calvin. Most important of all, however, in March 1536 he published in Basle a slim volume of seven chapters with the title Christianae Religionis Insitututio, prefaced by a letter to Francis I of France defending the Protestants against their calumniators. A short summary of the Christian faith, this work whose author was at the time virtually unknown soon became popular among Protestants as both an able exposition and a forthright apology for the new doctrines.

After spending a few more months wandering, Calvin accompanied by his brother Antoine and his half sister Marie headed for Strasbourg, where Protestantism had been officially accepted and which consequently would provide the peace necessary for his projected literary work. Owing to fighting between France and the empire, however, he had to travel through Switzerland via Geneva, where he planned to stay only one night. That stopover was decisive, for the Protestant preacher Guillaume Farel,* who had brought about a considerable measure of reform in Geneva, heard of the young scholar's presence. Farel thereupon demanded that Calvin stay to assist him in completing the work. Calvin at first refused, but when Farel threatened the curse of God upon him, he consented much against his will. But his residence in the city did not last long. He and Farel sought to introduce into a notoriously profligate society a measure of ecclesiastical discipline which only raised up enemies. When the two reformers refused to obey the civil government's demand that they accept the liturgy of Berne, their opponents used this as an excuse to force them out of the city. Farel moved to Neuchâtel, while Calvin on the invitation of Martin Bucer* set out once again for Strasbourg.

Probably some of Calvin's happiest years were spent in Strasbourg. Although constantly plagued with poverty, he seems to have enjoyed his life. The most important event personally was his marriage to Idelette de Bure, widow of an Anabaptist whom Calvin had converted to the Reformed position. She bore him one son, who lived only a few days. Shortly after his arrival in Strasbourg, Calvin became pastor of the French refugee congregation which he organized along what he believed to be NT lines. Especially important in this was his drawing up of a liturgy and the preparation of a psalm book made up of his own and Clement Marot's French metrical translations. At the same time he was busy preparing his commentary on Romans and taking part as a representative of Strasbourg in colloquies with Lutherans and Roman Catholics at Worms and Regensberg. From these activities his fame as a biblical scholar and theologian gradually spread.

He would probably have spent the rest of his life in Strasbourg had it not been for Cardinal Sadoleto's efforts to bring Geneva back under Roman control. After Calvin and Farel had departed from the city, no one arose to give the needed leadership in the church. The result was confusion and conflict. In this situation the supporters of the old regime felt it was a propitious time to undo the Reformers' work. To this end, in March 1539, Jacopo Cardinal Sadoleto,* a well-known humanist, wrote a letter urging the Genevans to submit to the pope. Since no one in Geneva seemed capable of replying, the letter was sent to Calvin, who dealt with it very effectively. About the same time, a change in Geneva's government put the control of the city in the hands of his friends, who invited him to return. Although he had no desire to do so, under the exhortations once again of Farel he finally agreed to go, reentering the city on 13 September 1541.

Although he realized only too well that Geneva, which long had a Europe-wide reputation for immorality, would be no easy community to reform, Calvin set about his task immediately. One of his first responsibilities was the revision of the city's laws, while at the same time he drew up a form of government for the church and revised his Strasbourg liturgy and psalter. Eventually (in 1559) he even succeeded in persuading the people that an academy, later to become a university, should be founded for training the youth for service in the commonwealth. In all this, his one great aim was to make Geneva a "holy city," conformed to the will of God. This meant a strict and sometimes harsh discipline of which most people, even Calvinists, would not approve today, but it had the effect of changing Geneva's character and of making it a power in the world of the sixteenth century.

Calvin's efforts to reform Geneva and the Genevans naturally led to internal conflict. Not all the inhabitants were Calvinists, and even some of those who agreed with him at times felt he carried his rigorous demands too far. The result was at times riots and disturbances aimed at eliminating him from the city. The final test came when Michael Servetus,* a Spaniard under sentence of death by the Inquisition* for denying the doctrine of the Trinity, came to Geneva, apparently to cause trouble. He was recognized, denounced by Calvin, and with the approval of the other Swiss Protestant cities, as well as the Roman Catholic authorities, burned at the stake (1553). Although during the sixteenth century thousands of Protestants suffered the same fate at the hands of Roman Catholic persecutors, Calvin has been constantly vilified for his part in this single execution.

While he held no government position, nor indeed even became a citizen of the city until invited to in 1559, Calvin undoubtedly dominated the whole community, by moral suasion rather than by any other means. Not only did he play a large part in the devising of a church government with wide powers of oversight over the population and in helping to make the city's laws more humane, but he also exercised a wide influence in other areas. He was largely responsible for establishing a universal system of education for the young, and he took a large part in arranging for the care of the poor and the aged. He sought to make Geneva a Christian commonwealth, in practice as well as in doctrine.

Naturally, from this endeavor Geneva gained a widespread reputation, particularly among persecuted Protestants throughout Europe. Situated at the crossing point of a number of important trade routes between the north and Italy, it had a strategic geographic position. But what was even more important, under Calvin's influence the city authorities threw open the gates to refugees who flocked in from all directions: France, Holland, England, Scotland, Germany, Italy, Spain, Hungary, Poland, and practically every other country of Europe. From Geneva these people often returned home as missionaries to spread the Gospel as they had learned it in Geneva. Out of these contacts, constantly maintained by a voluminous correspondence, Calvin wielded an influence far beyond the borders of the Genevan commune. He became the dominant figure of the Protestant Reformation in the middle of the century.

Equally, if not more, important than his personal contacts and letters were his more formal writings. During his lifetime he wrote commentaries on twenty-three books of the OT, including all the Pentateuch and all of the prophets, and on all of the NT but the Apocalypse. With his background of humanistic studies and his theological knowledge, these works have been influential in the church down to the present time. Besides preparing commentaries, he preached frequently, every day on alternate weeks, many of his sermons being taken down in shorthand notes which he may have revised, and then were published. The notes of others were lost until this century, but are now being published for the first time. Along with these labors he constantly produced pamphlets dealing with current topics affecting both Protestant thought and action.

Most important of all his writings, however, is the Institutes of the Christian Religion. Published originally in 1536, a book of six chapters, as a theological handbook for French Protestants, it was revised by Calvin five times, usually translating the original Latin version into French, by which he greatly influenced the development of the modern French language. By the time the definitive edition appeared in 1559, it had been so changed and enlarged that it was in four books with a total of seventy-nine chapters. This work quickly became disseminated widely in many different translations to form, except in countries where Lutheranism dominated, the systematic theology of the Reformation. And it has endured to the present, as is indicated by the numerous scholarly editions which have appeared recently in English, French, Japanese, and other tongues.

Idelette Calvin died in 1549, leaving her husband a sad and lonely man. He did not apparently ever think of remarrying, although he could well have done with the care of a loving wife, for he was not one who would take great care of himself. The result was that he suffered from stomach ulcers and similar troubles to the end of his life. Such weaknesses of the flesh nevertheless did not restrain him from working intensively almost up to the time of his death on 27 May 1564. At the age of fifty-four Calvin literally burned out in the service of God.

To many since his time, Calvin has been the epitome of rigor and cheerlessness in this life. They feel that he was a legalist who would exclude all joy from Christianity and would make it into an unyielding bondage. Yet if one really studies his works and the life of the man himself, this does not appear to be the case. He was a very human individual, as he reveals so frequently in his letters. True, he was intense in the service of God, to whom he offered his heart fully. Using all his undoubted gifts, he laid the groundwork for much of the Protestantism of the next four centuries. But his influence extended far beyond the borders of the church, as it did beyond the confines of Geneva, for many of his ideas in politics, aesthetics, science, and history became so interwoven in Western thought that we must recognize him as one of the great seminal minds, one of the formative factors in the development of Western culture and civilization.

CALVINISM. This term comes out of the seventeenth century, largely in opposition to the teachings of Arminius* condemned by the Synod of Dort* in 1618. It had been used by Roman Catholics sometimes in the sixteenth century, but always in a pejorative sense. It is therefore a term that has been used in many different ways over the past three centuries, coming to have many different meanings, both good and bad. Consequently, one must understand its true meaning if one is to employ it properly.

The first problem involved in its interpretation is its relation to John Calvin* himself. He would not have accepted it as a good description of his doctrine and on one or two occasions made comments to this effect. He believed the doctrine he set forth was nothing more or less than the teaching of the Scriptures of the OT and NT. In his dedicatory epistle to Francis I of France with which he prefaced the first edition of his Institutes of the Christian Religion (1536), he made this quite clear, insisting he was writing to show that the doctrines espoused by the Protestants were entirely biblical. This thought reappears repeatedly in his commentaries and other writings.

Yet Calvinism is largely derived from Calvin's own interpretation and exposition of Scripture. He was a prolific writer who set forth clearly a system of doctrine which he believed he found in the Bible. Employing the most up-to-date techniques of biblical exegesis developed by the humanists of his day, he wrote commentaries on most of the books of the Bible, summing up his findings in succeeding editions of the Institutes, which grew from a small handbook of six chapters in 1536 to a large volume of seventy-nine chapters in the definitive edition of 1559. This work has been the textbook of Calvinism since that time, having been translated into many languages and expounded and explained by those calling themselves Calvinists.

What is the essence of Calvinism? Many have tried to answer this question in different ways, usually on the basis of their own particular theological or philosophical presuppositions. As Calvinism is a many-faceted structure of thought that seeks to interpret the whole of reality from a Christian perspective, to attempt to sum it up in a few words is extremely difficult. Nevertheless, in order to obtain something of an understanding of it, one must attempt some form of analysis and synthesis in order to reduce it to comprehensible size.

The formal principle of Calvinism is the Bible, the source of Calvin's doctrine. He and most of the other sixteenth-century Reformers held a very high view of the Bible, insisting it is the Word of God, bringing God's revelation to man in documents written under the inspiration of the Holy Spirit. They did not, however, foresee all the controversies that were later to arise over this doctrine and so did not develop all the various theories of revelation and inspiration formulated by Calvinists in the nineteenth and twentieth centuries. Yet they did hold very firmly to the view that the Bible is man's only infallible rule of faith and practice. In this all the leading Protestant Reformers were at one.

Because of this belief, Calvinism insists the Bible is the only source of man's knowledge of God and of His will and works. Although creation and providence do indeed reveal God's power and divinity, both nature and man have been so corrupted by sin that they cannot be an adequate means of God's self-manifestation. Furthermore, they do not reveal anything concerning God's redeeming love or action. Thus they are inadequate for the full knowledge of God which comes only through His direct revelation to man in the words and actions of the prophets, of the apostles, and above all others, of Jesus Christ, the Living Word Himself, as recorded in the Bible.

The Bible by revealing God also gives the true understanding and interpretation of man. It lays down first of all that man is God's creature, who is to fulfil the duties and responsibilities God has laid upon him. Thus the Bible simultaneously tells man what he is to believe concerning himself and what he is to believe concerning God. At the same time, it insists that because there is an absolute discontinuity between the being of God and man, as between Creator and creature, man's knowledge of God and His ways can never be more than partial, ultimately surrounded in mystery that even the Bible does not remove. Man, in seeking to understand the biblical revelation concerning himself and his relationship to God, must in the last analysis accept it in faith.

This, however, does not mean man then lapses into some form of Quietism or Mysticism. The Bible is the charter for Christian action or activism. First of all, in the matter of worship, the Scriptures are the final authority, for in them God tells man how he must approach Him. Furthermore, the Scriptures also inform man how he must live and conduct himself in this world, in relation both to its material resources and to other persons. Finally, the Bible is the inspired statement of man's ultimate purpose and aim in life as the creature of God. Thus in Calvinism the Bible holds an absolutely central position as the source of both Christian thought and action.

From the biblical teaching comes what we might call the material principle of Calvinism: the sovereignty of God. Some believe this is the real core of Calvinistic thinking, and to a certain extent it is. The Calvinist believes that the central thought in the Scriptures is that the Triune God, one God in three persons, is totally independent of all else and absolutely self-sufficient. Within the interrelation of the three persons of the Godhead, God is completely and fully expressed in every way. Man cannot by any means understand what this means, except that with regard to everything outside Himself, God is completely and fully sovereign. God has no correlates, but rather is completely and totally absolute.

Everything in the space-time universe, including space and time, therefore, exists only by the creative decision and providential action of God. He has made all things, which means everything in existence is different from and subordinate to Him. The Calvinist can never accept any idea that the space-time universe is a divine emanation, or part of God. Nor does he believe that once created, the universe (as Deists maintain) runs automatically by innate natural laws. The continued existence and operation of the universe, including the free actions of man, are sustained and determined from moment to moment by the mysterious and all-powerful providence of God. For a proper and ultimately true understanding of both natural science and history, therefore, the sovereign God must always be the ultimate point of reference and of interpretation. As Calvin would put it, all things must be seen "sub specie aeternitatis" (in the perspective of eternity).

In pursuance of His ultimate purpose God allowed man to sin, although man did so according to his own will and desire, alienating himself from God. At the same time, God in His grace purposed to redeem men from their sin and bring them to glory. Therefore, from the beginning of history two opposing principles have existed in conflict: sin and redemption, alienation and reconciliation. These two principles are revealed very clearly in OT history and come to full fruition in the redemptive work of Jesus Christ, the incarnate Son, on Calvary. Since that time the conflict has continued through the ages as God the Holy Spirit has effectually called His people out of the kingdom of this world into the kingdom of God, to be His people upon earth.

These people are those whom God has chosen in Jesus Christ from all eternity, not with any prevision of their faith or righteousness, but solely of His own free grace and love. No man would of himself turn in repentance and faith to God, because of the corruption of his sinful nature, unless God by the Holy Spirit should regenerate him that he might do so. Christ, therefore, died and rose again that His elect should be reconciled to God, who bestows upon them the gift of the Spirit who infallibly brings them to faith in Christ as Savior and Lord. When they have so experienced conversion, He then works constantly within them that they may grow in grace and in the likeness of Jesus Christ, to be more and more conformed to His image in this life. To Calvinism, man's reconciliation to God is all of God and of His eternal and sovereign grace. Thus the elect can never be lost, but shall persevere until the very end.

For those who accept this position, the biblical principle of the sovereignty of God involves also a basic ethical principle. Because God is sovereign, the Lord and Creator of all, all men are responsible to serve Him in this life in all they do. It is God's sovereignty that makes man truly responsible. Moreover, God has from the beginning committed to man the responsibility of acting as the great prophet, priest, and king of creation. He is to interpret creation, as God's possession, to lead it in the praise and worship of God and to govern it for God. To this end God gave him the mandate to rule over, subdue, and replenish the earth. This involves both the development of its physical resources and the organization of man for this purpose and objective.

Because of his alienation from God, however, man has failed to meet his responsibilities, seeking to use the physical and human resources of creation for his own pleasure, ease, and glory. The result has been both the perversion and pollution of God's good creation. While man has compulsively developed creation and its riches, including his own abilities, he has usually tended to misuse them, even for the destruction of his fellowman. The Christian, on the other hand, recognizing his responsibility to God, should and often does see his duty as lying in the development and use of both the material creation and his own gifts for the benefit of society and for the glory of God. This is his vocation in life.

The final end or ultimate principle of Calvinism is, then, the glory of God. Creation and even redemption are not primarily for the satisfaction and pleasure of man. Evangelism, social service, and similar activities should not be thought of ultimately as being for man's benefit, but to glorify the sovereign Triune God. In the service of God upon this earth the Christian seeks to manifest God's majesty, power, and grace that he may glorify him in all things. He does not look upon the things that he is doing as something required of him merely as earthly activities, but as those which will redound to the praise of God through all eternity.

While this system of thought was made explicit by Calvin in his writings, it was further elaborated (often in a controversial setting) in the latter part of the sixteenth century, and partially summarized in the Canons of the Council of Dort (1618) in what are commonly known as the "Five Points of Calvinism": (1) total depravity of man; (2) unconditional election; (3) limited [particular] atonement; (4) irresistible grace; (5) perseverance of the saints. The Reformed Confessions drawn up after 1618 also express these doctrines, although they set them in the much wider context of God's universal sovereignty. Nevertheless, many noted theologians (J. Ussher, J. Davenant, J. Cameron, etc.) taught a doctrine of general redemption.

Originating in Geneva and France, Calvinism gradually spread along the Rhine Valley to Germany and Holland, along the Danube River Valley to Hungary and Transylvania and across the Alps into France, shaping and forming the Reformation as it took place in those various countries. From France and from Holland Calvinism soon spread to England and to Scotland. It largely dominated the thinking of the Church of England into the seventeenth century, forming the core of Puritan thought which was transplanted to New England. In Scotland, Holland, and France it was the basic doctrine of the Reformed churches, who took it not only to America, but to many other parts of the world, with the result that today Calvinistic churches are a worldwide phenomenon. Because of its all-inclusive nature, Calvinism has wielded a powerful influence on every aspect of Western man's life for the past four hundred years, even although its impact may sometimes have been unrecognized.

As we might expect, Calvinism's contribution has been most obvious in the fields of theology and Christian life and action. One could give a long list of theologians, preachers, and reformers over the past four centuries: John Owen, Thomas Boston, George Whitefield, William Wilberforce, the seventh Earl of Shaftesbury, Abraham Kuyper, Charles Hodge, B.B. Warfield, J. Gresham Machen, and many others who have held to a strongly Calvinistic position. Yet none of them have adopted the point of view that their religion was something separate from their life in the world. They saw Calvinism as something that overarched all of life, influencing every sphere of thought and action.

Calvinism has also from the beginning had a very considerable influence upon the development of natural science. Pierre de la Ramée, Ambroise Paré, Bernard Pallissy, Francis Bacon, John Napier of Merchiston, and others in the earliest days of the Scientific Revolution were Calvinists, and many scientists since the seventeenth century have held this theological position, believing that God by His providence upholds all nature according to its created law-structures, so that man may be able both to understand and to use it in this world.

From the time of John Knox in Scotland and Admiral Coligny in France through the Puritan Revolution in England in the seventeenth century, to Abraham Kuyper and Herman Dooyeweerd of the Netherlands and Emile Doumergue of France in the nineteenth and twentieth, Calvinists have also played a major part in seeking to develop and apply a Christian view of politics and the state. Believing that Christ is "Lord of Lords and King of Kings," they have sought to bring both subjects and rulers to recognize Him as the one to whom they are responsible. At the same time, they have insisted, as did Calvin, that despotism or oligarchy, because of man's sinful nature, leads only to oppression, but that democracy under law provides the only true political organization for freedom and liberty. Because of this point of view, Calvinism has provided much of the basis for modern constitutionalism.

In the arts also, Calvinism has had its effect. Not only did Calvin by use of French do much to establish that language on a firm foundation, but also his employment of Clement Marot, Theodore Beza, and others to prepare vernacular psalms for singing in the church service stimulated Protestant poetic interest. Under this influence vernacular psalms soon appeared in Dutch, English, and Magyar, and, significantly, the writing of poetry in general was encouraged. Milton's early works reflect this stimulus, as do the writings of men such as William Cowper, Willem Bilderdijk, and many others. In the visual arts, the so-called Little Calvinistic Masters of Holland in the seventeenth century and many others who followed them in France, England, and America were also strongly influenced by the Calvinistic viewpoint.

Usually Calvinism has been accused of originating modern exploitive capitalism because of its doctrine of vocation and its insistence upon hard work and moderation in all things. Max Weber, the German sociologist, followed by R.H. Tawney and Ernst Troeltsch and many others, has set forth this particular interpretation. Undoubtedly, there is a certain amount of truth in some of the contentions, i.e., that the Calvinist felt it was his duty to work hard and to live moderately to the glory of God. But the insistence that Calvinist acceptance of the propriety of the taking of interest on a business loan and of the rational approach to economic activity eventually led to exploitation of the worker, and so laid the basis for modern soulless capitalism, lacks historical evidence for its verification. So writers have pointed out that the opponents of Calvinism rather than the Calvinists favored and developed capitalism.

Over the past four hundred years Calvinism has known its ups and downs. Although weakened considerably by the influence of Enlightenment* rationalism, it experienced a considerable revival under the aegis of the evangelical revival in England and the Great Awakening in America in the eighteenth century. In the nineteenth century, however, it was attacked on two fronts. Not only did higher criticism* and scientism from one side oppose it most vigorously, but so too did Wesleyan and Quietistic evangelicalism from the other. As a result, Calvinists tended to become ingrown and frequently defensive. In the past two or three decades, however, they have regained some of their former confidence. With the founding of organizations such as the International Association for Reformed Faith and Action, the founding of journals holding a Calvinistic point of view, and the publication of an increasing number of books written from this perspective, it would seem Calvinism is perhaps experiencing a revival in a world that has lost most of its moorings.

CALVINISTIC METHODISM. The title was first given to those who in the eighteenth-century revival adhered to the doctrinal emphases of G. Whitefield.* It developed into a denominational differentiation with reference to the church in Wales which eventually emerged. More than twenty years before the conversion of either Whitefield or the Wesleys, Griffith Jones* of Llandowror had heralded the awakening in the principality with his evangelical preaching. He was soon to be supported by Howel Harris,* Daniel Rowland,* Howell Davies, and the hymnwriter William Williams* of Pant-y-Celyn.

The first Methodist Association in Wales met in 1742, thus anticipating Wesley's earliest Conference (1744). The societies were regarded as belonging to the Church of England, like those of the Wesleyan Methodists. But as opposition grew, separation became virtually inevitable. From 1763 onward Rowland was no longer permitted to exercise his parish ministry at Llangeitho, although there is no evidence his license was actually revoked by the bishop, as has been alleged. He preached in a meeting house erected by his sympathizers. It was largely on account of Harris's unswerving allegiance to the Church of England that steps toward formal secession were deferred until 1795.

The name of Calvinistic Methodists was also attached to other groups which owed their existence to the ministry of Whitefield. Those belonging to the Countess of Huntingdon's Connexion* fall into this category, along with what was known as the Tabernacle Connexion of Whitefield Methodists.

In 1770 the publication of an annotated Welsh Bible by Peter Williams led to a renewal of interest in the Scriptures, and in 1784 the work was extended to N Wales through Thomas Charles of Bala. In 1795 the protection of the Toleration Act (1559) was sought, while in 1811 the body was officially recognized as the Calvinistic Methodist Connexion and regular ordinations began. The Confession of Faith, containing forty-four articles based on the Westminster Confession* as "Calvinistically construed," was published in 1823, and the Connexional Constitutional Deed was ratified in 1826.

A ministerial training college was opened at Bala in 1837, with another for the south at Trevecka in 1842 (transferred to Aberystwyth in 1905). Until 1840 the Calvinistic Methodists supported the London Missionary Society, but in that year they started their own work in France and India. The constitution of the church combines features of both Presbyterianism and Congregationalism. Its membership in 1969 was 110,155.

CAMALDOLESE. The austere order of Camaldoli was founded by Romuald in 1012 near Florence. Previously abbot of several Benedictine monasteries, he had been expelled by the monks unable to meet his rigorous demands. Members of the Camaldolese observed two Lents in the year, abstained from meat, and lived on bread and water for three days in the week. Rudolph, the fourth general, slightly mitigated the original severity of the rule in its first written constitution in 1102. Gregory XVI belonged to the Camaldolese.

CAMBRIDGE PLATFORM (1648). A statement of Congregational polity for the New England churches. American Puritans wanted to distinguish from the Brownists* or Separatists on one hand, Presbyterians on the other. The General Court of Massachusetts Bay Colony authorized a synod to meet at Cambridge in 1646 to develop statements on doctrine and polity. An epidemic postponed the final statement on polity until 1648. The platform sets forth the theory of the "Catholick Church" as "the whole company of the elect and redeemed." The visible church comprises those who have a personal knowledge of salvation and whose lives are upright, as well as the children of such. It provides for regular church offices of pastors, teachers, ruling elders, and deacons in an autonomous congregation.

CAMBRIDGE PLATONISTS. The name given to a group of theologians centered at Emmanuel College, Cambridge, the chief members of which were Benjamin Whichcote,* Ralph Cudworth,* Henry More,* John Smith (1618-52), and Nathanael Culverwell (d. c.1651). In reaction against the dogmatic Calvinism of the Puritans and the materialism of Hobbes,* they sought by a relationship of philosophy and theology to apply the idealism of Plato and particularly of Neoplatonism to religion. In one of his sermons Whichcote declared it "a very profitable work to call upon men to answer the principles of their creation, to fulfil natural light, to answer natural conscience, to be throughout rational in what they do; for these things have a divine foundation. The spirit in man is the candle of the Lord, lighted by God and lighting man to God." This quotation from Proverbs was a favorite with him and gives some idea of his view of man, reason, and conscience.

Reacting against Calvinistic ideas of total human depravity, the Cambridge Platonists saw man as a creature endowed with reason, not as simply a narrow faculty of ratiocination, but as an inner light. Likewise, they regarded right and wrong as part of the eternal nature of things, part of the law of the ideal world, imprinted on the will of man and which even the will of God could not change. "Had there not been a Law written in the Heart of Man, a Law [outside] him could be to no purpose" (Whichcote). It is easy to see how the degeneration of these views of reason and morality could so easily lead to the narrow and complacent views of eighteenth-century Deism.* This is particularly so when, as in this quotation from Whichcote and in another from John Smith to the effect that "God hath provided the truth of divine revelation [as an addition] to the truth of natural inscription" following the decline of reason after man's fall, it appears that the revealed word of God is merely a kind of supplement to existing truth.

The Cambridge Platonists were saved from the arid rationalism of the Deists by their mystical apprehension of God. They recognized the limits of philosophy and realized that some forms of knowledge cannot be apprehended in conceptual forms but are the product of a personal relationship with God. They had the awareness that "nothing can explain the phenomena of religious experience except the sense of the infinite within the heart of man" (G.R. Cragg).

CAMERARIUS, JOACHIM (1500-1574). German Reformer. Born in Bamberg, he studied at Leipzig, Erfurt, and Wittenberg, and later instituted reforms at the universities of Tübingen and Leipzig. Noted as philologist and humanist, he was an outstanding Greek scholar. He participated in religious colloquies and imperial diets —e.g., Speier (1526 and 1529) and Augsburg (1530). In 1525 he journeyed with Melanchthon* to the Palatinate and visited Erasmus* in Basle. His friendship with Melanchthon stemmed from mutual humanistic, theological, and pedagogical concerns. He translated the Augsburg Confession* into Greek. His Greek catechism is Melanchthonian in its theology. He wrote biographies of Melanchthon (his most famous work), George, Prince of Anhalt, and Eoban Hesse. He gathered letters of prominent religious leaders of the Reformation, which though partially scattered proved valuable for historical research. He discussed the possibility of Lutheran reunion with Roman Catholicism with both Francis II (1535) and Maximilian II (1568).

CAMERON, JOHN (1579-1625). Scottish theologian and exegete. Born and educated in Glasgow, where he early taught Greek, he was in 1600 appointed professor of philosophy at Sedan, later becoming collegiate minister of the Reformed church in Bordeaux (1608-17) and professor of divinity at Saumur. In the Reformed Church of France, in which he spent so much of his life, he was greatly esteemed, and to it he was devoted. Returning to Scotland in 1622, he was for one year principal of Glasgow University. Back again in France, he lived out the rest of his life as professor of divinity at Montauban, where he achieved a growing reputation as a linguist. Posthumously published, his theological lectures and treatises continued to be reprinted almost up to our own time. D.P. THOMSON their name. Originally an Episcopalian in Falkland, he was converted and found his spiritual home thereafter among Presbyterians. Unable to obtain ordination in a Scotland on which episcopacy had been imposed, he went to Holland in 1679 and was ordained in Rotterdam at a service in which John Brown of Wamphray* and Robert MacWard (exiled Scots ministers) and James Koelman (a Dutch pastor) participated. He soon returned to Scotland and resumed his field preaching. He was one of the chief authors of the Sanquhar Declaration* that purported to depose Charles II, and he constantly prophesied the extinction of the Stuart line "for their treachery, lechery, but especially their usurping the royal prerogatives of King Christ." Finally, in June 1680 the dragoons who had long sought him, surprised him and his little band at Ayrsmoss, and "the Lion of the Covenant" was killed.

CAMERONIANS. Originally a Covenanting group named after Richard Cameron,* they fought for religious liberty in the last persecuting years of the Stuart dynasty. A majority refused thereafter to join the reestablished (Presbyterian) Church of Scotland, holding that some of the most precious rights of Christ for which the Covenanters* had suffered were not recognized by church and state. Known since 1743 as the Reformed Presbyterian Church,* modern Cameronians maintain substantially their former principles, particularly Christ's claim to national obedience.

CAMILLUS OF LELLIS (1550-1614). Founder of the Ministers of the Sick. A soldier's son, he was born at Bucchiano near Naples. After serving in the Venetian army (1571-74), he was reduced to penury because of inveterate gambling and worked for the Capuchins* until dismissed because of an incurable wound. He nursed at the hospital of San Giacomo and eventually became its superintendent. Deeply influenced by Philip Neri,* he was persuaded to study for the priesthood and in 1584 founded his own order, the Ministers of the Sick, who took a fourth vow to care for the sick. Officially approved in 1586, the order followed the Augustinian Rule, and until 1607 Camillus was its superior. He resigned to devote himself personally again to the sick. Canonized in 1746, he was named patron of the sick (1886) and of nurses (1930). IAN BREWARD

CAMISARDS. French Protestant resistance fighters provoked to revolt by the brutal repression of all public practices of their faith following the revocation of the Edict of Nantes* in 1685. A period of passive resistance (1686-98) was followed by fierce outbreaks of open warfare lasting until 1709. Some 12,000 Protestants were executed in Languedoc alone. The Camisards, inspired by apocalyptic writings of prophets and intellectuals, notably Pierre Jurieu,* rose in revolt in the Cevennes district in 1702. Numbering about 3,000, they organized armed bands, and an army of some 60,000 was needed to put them down. Many suffered unspeakable tortures. In 1704 Camisards were offered pardon and the right to leave the country if they laid down their arms. Of those who accepted, some entered the British army. A few zealots held out, but were finally suppressed. Some Camisards found sanctuary in England and formed a small sect known as the "French Prophets." J.G.G. NORMAN

CAMPBELL, ALEXANDER (1788-1866). One of the founders of the Disciples of Christ and the Churches of Christ.* Son of Thomas Campbell,* he attended Glasgow University, then emigrated to Pennsylvania, joined his father's Christian association, and was ordained to the ministry (1812). Alexander was very interested in unity among Christians, and he spread his theological views in a series of preaching tours in Kentucky, Ohio, Indiana, West Virginia, and Tennessee. Despite his emphasis on Christian unity, several congregations divided from the Baptist church because of his teaching, and these were united into the Disciples of Christ (1832, nicknamed "Campbellites"). While advocating a return to the simpler theology of the early church, he was opposed to both speculative theology and emotional revivalism. Campbell's desire for an educated clergy led to the founding of Bethany College, West Virginia (1840), which he directed until his death. He engaged in numerous debates on religious topics with such leaders as the secularist Robert Owen and John Purcell, Roman Catholic bishop of Cincinnati. Campbell wrote or edited over sixty volumes, the most important of which, in addition to his published debates, are a book, The Christian System (1835), and his periodicals The Christian Baptist and The Millennial Harbinger. He believed that baptism and confession of Jesus Christ as Savior are the only requirements of Christianity.

CAMPBELL, ARCHIBALD (1598?-1661). First marquis of Argyll, and Covenanter.* At first adviser and strong supporter of Charles I (who in 1641 was to promote him from earl to marquis), he signed the National Covenant,* fought strongly against the king, but deplored his execution, and was a principal participant in Charles II's coronation at Scone on New Year's Day 1651. Nevertheless, he acquiesced in Cromwell's Commonwealth, and after the Restoration (1660) was arraigned for high treason. Charles II (who resented Argyll's strictures on his immoral life) determined his fate, and the young advocates who had defended the marquis were bullied and harassed. On receiving the sentence, Argyll said: "I had the honour to set the crown upon the king's head, and now he hastens me away to a better crown than his own." With his beheading in Edinburgh the killing of Covenanters began.

CAMPBELL, JOHN McLEOD (1800-1872). Scottish theologian. Son of an Argyll minister, he studied at Glasgow and Edinburgh universities, and in 1825 became minister of Row (Rhu) in Dunbartonshire, where he applied himself with "almost apostolic zeal." He was not to serve there long, however, for in 1830 he was accused of heresy before Dumbarton presbytery and found guilty of preaching "the doctrine of universal atonement and pardon through the death of Christ, and also the doctrine that assurance is of the essence of faith and necessary to salvation." Despite appeals, the general assembly in 1831 overwhelmingly voted to depose him from the ministry—a decision accepted characteristically without bitterness. His views were later incorporated in The Nature of the Atonement (1856), which is regarded as a substantial contribution to the development of Scottish theology. From 1833 to 1859 Campbell ministered to an independent congregation in Glasgow. J.D. DOUGLAS

CAMPBELL, THOMAS (1763-1854). One of the founders of the Disciples of Christ. A Scots-Irishman, he was a minister in the Secession church that had broken away from the Church of Scotland. The lack of unity in the seceding body led Campbell to become an enemy of Sectarianism. In 1807 he emigrated to Pennsylvania, where he established a Christian association for people from various professions. Since it seemed a new denomination would grow from this experiment, he tried unsuccessfully to merge with the Baptists. Later these Campbellites did join with a similar group organized by B.W. Stone.* Campbell was a popular preacher who moved constantly and usually made his livelihood by teaching school. Becoming blind in later life, he resided with his son Alexander* at Bethany, West Virginia. Alexander wrote The Memoir of Elder Thomas Campbell (1861). ROBERT G. CLOUSE

CAMPEGGIO, LORENZO (c.1472-1539). Archbishop of Bologna. At twenty-six he became a doctor of canon and civil law, and he was ordained in 1510 after the death of his wife. He was a great diplomat and became involved in the political intrigues of his time. In 1512 he was appointed to the bishopric of Feltre and from 1513 to 1517 was nuncio to Maximilian I. Leo X wanted him to bring peace among Christian princes and unite them in a crusade against the Turks, but he failed to gain Henry VIII's support. Campeggio also took a leading part in some of the greatest events of the Reformation. In 1519 he was appointed Segnatura, a post of the highest dignity and honor. When Adrian VI was elected pope in 1522, many plans for reform of abuses in the church were submitted to him, but the pontificate was too short to implement them. In 1523 Campeggio was created archbishop of Bologna and in 1524 was made protector of England in the Roman Curia. Henry VIII made him bishop of Salisbury in 1524; in 1528 he was sent to England to form a court with Thomas Wolsey* to try Henry's divorce case. He was deprived of the see of Salisbury by act of Parliament in 1535. In 1537 he was made cardinal. S. TOON

CAMPION, EDMUND (1540-1581). English Jesuit.* Son of a London bookseller, he was a precocious youth, accomplished at giving addresses of welcome to royalty. He was maintained by the Grocers' Company at Christ's Hospital, and afterward at St. John's, Oxford, where he became a junior fellow in 1557. Despite his doubt, Bishop Cheyney persuaded him to be ordained deacon, but he left Oxford in 1569 and went to Ireland. An attempt to resurrect Dublin University failed, and he returned to England in disguise. At Douai in 1571 he entered the Roman Church. Next year he went on a pilgrimage to Rome, where he became a Jesuit. He was sent to Bohemia and ordained by the archbishop of Prague in 1578. When the Jesuits agreed to take part in the English mission, Parsons and Campion were the first two chosen. They reached England in June 1580, but Campion was arrested just over a year later and executed at Tyburn in December 1581. He had time, however, to print and distribute his Decem Rationes. JOHN TILLER

CAMP MEETINGS. A distinctive feature of religious life on the American frontier in the early decades of the nineteenth century. The open-air auditorium was always located in the center of the surrounding tents, whether in a rectangular, horseshoe, or circular pattern. The meetings promoted vivid conversion experiences, emotional and even physical activities, such as the "jerks," prostration, and dancing. James McGready* developed the technique in Logan County, Kentucky, in the summer of 1800. Soon other preachers, especially Methodists, adopted the camp meeting. The most famous camp meeting was at Cane Ridge in Bourbon County, Kentucky, in August 1801. Estimates of the crowd range from ten to twenty-five thousand. BRUCE L. SHELLEY

CAMPUS CRUSADE FOR CHRIST. An evangelistic organization working primarily with college students in the USA. Over 2,000 staff members (missionaries), most of them in America, seek in a personal conversation to present the Gospel in the form of "four spiritual laws." Headquarters for the organization are in a converted luxury hotel called Arrowhead Springs, near San Bernardino, California. The 1,800-acre site provides administrative offices and training facilities for nearly 5,000 collegians annually. The organization was created in 1951 shortly after William R. Bright, a young businessman, was converted. He attended Princeton and Fuller theological seminaries, but left school in order to contact student leaders at the University of California at Los Angeles. From UCLA the organization spread to many other campuses. Recently other ministries with laymen, athletes, military men, and high school students have been added. BRUCE L. SHELLEY

CANADA. The Christian religion in Canada was established and maintained by Protestants and Roman Catholics in a dual culture. In personnel and financial support they came originally from France, Great Britain, and the Thirteen Colonies. The ideas of Canadian Christianity largely reflected these outside influences, not only in matters of basic belief, but also in controversies over such subjects as church establishment and clergy reserves.* From the period of origins (c.1600-1840) to the present, five religious groups have comprised the greater part of the Christian community in Canada: Roman Catholics, Anglicans, Presbyterians, Methodists, and Baptists.

The Church in New France. From the beginnings of French colonization in Canada in the early seventeenth century, the Roman Catholic Church occupied a position of importance. The church gave cohesion and stability to French Canadian society and was associated with French expansion into the interior as well as with the establishment of the church in the settled part of the colony. Samuel de Champlain* (c.1570-1635), the virtual founder of New France, brought Franciscan *Récollets from France, hoping they would Christianize the Indians. In 1625 the Jesuits joined the Récollets in Quebec and soon became the dominant element in mission work among the Indians, particularly in the Huron country south of Georgian Bay. In 1648-49 several Jesuits were martyred at the hands of the Iroquois, the enemies of the Hurons.

While missions were being developed, the church was also established strongly in the French settlements of Quebec. Organization of the domestic church was largely accomplished by F.-X. de Laval.* The Roman Catholic Church was active also in Acadia (Nova Scotia) from the first expedition, authorized in 1604 and led by the Sieur de Monts.* Expansion into western Canada began between 1731 and 1741, when Jesuits accompanied the explorer Pierre de la Vérendrye on his trips into the west.

The Churches Under British Rule, 1760-1866. After the transfer of Nova Scotia to Great Britain in 1713 and of the rest of Canada in 1763, Protestantism and English-speaking Catholicism became established in the former French territory.

Roman Catholicism held its ground in Lower Canada (Quebec) and secured a hold in Upper Canada, chiefly as a result of the immigration of Glengarry Scots and, subsequently, Irish settlers. Scots, settling in the Maritimes, particularly in Cape Breton, were predominantly Catholic. In general, the French Catholic clergy were loyal to the British civil government after the conquest. Bishops J.O. Briand* and J.O. Plessis* were successful in consolidating the relations of the church with the British authorities.

Protestant churches entered Canada from both Britain and the British American colonies. They were largely supported by British missionary societies. The Anglicans drew support from pre-Loyalist New Englanders, United Empire Loyalists,* British garrisons and administrators, and immigrants from the British Isles. The Methodists consisted chiefly of British Wesleyans and American Episcopal Methodists. Presbyterianism, while derived from Britain and the United States, reflected the traditional breach between the Church of Scotland and the various Secession churches. The Baptist Church was pioneered in the Maritimes, in the Eastern Townships of Quebec, and in the Niagara Peninsula from the United States, but also derived support from the Scottish Highlands. The Lutheran Church in Canada kept pace with the immigration of German and Scandinavian peoples. The Lutherans established their first permanent congregation in Nova Scotia about 1750 and entered Upper Canada some twenty-five years later.

Expansion of the churches into the west soon followed their development in eastern Canada. Early missionaries in the west were J.N. Provencher,* John West,* James Evans,* and John Black.

During the first half of the nineteenth century, the position of the churches in regard to education emerged. By 1840 it was clear that secondary education was to be in the hands of the state, but with some provision for religious instruction on a nondenominational basis. Upper Canada (later Ontario) made provision for separate schools for the Roman Catholics; Lower Canada (later Quebec) developed a system divided into Catholic and Protestant sections. For most of the nineteenth century, higher education was largely controlled by the Catholic and Protestant churches which had founded some two dozen church-related colleges by 1867.

The Churches Since 1867. Expansion of the churches continued in the late ninteenth century and resulted also in ecumenical movements of organized reunion and confederation. The Presbyterians in Canada were united in 1875, most of the Methodists in 1884, and the Anglican General Synod was formed in 1893. In 1925 the Methodist and Congregational churches and a large part of the Presbyterian Church united to form the United Church of Canada.*

Toward the end of the nineteenth century, the Protestant churches in Canada felt the impact of new movements of thought among the scientists and the biblical critics. The challenge gave rise to the development of Christian liberalism, a viewpoint which tended to discard belief in the supernatural aspects of Christianity and to concentrate upon the Christian ethic. Early exponents were clergy such as G.M. Grant and Professors George Paxton Young (1819-89) and John Watson (1847-1939). The growth of Christian liberalism continued into the twentieth century. Many of its exponents, notably J.S. Woodsworth* and other Methodists, laid great emphasis on the social implications of Christianity. After 1930 the Protestant church in Canada was influenced by other trends of thought such as Neoorthodoxy, associated with the name of Karl Barth,* and also Christian existentialism,* but Christian liberalism continued to be the dominant theme.

There has always been, however, a strong conservative reaction to Christian liberalism, based on the idea of an inspired, authoritative Bible and on adherence to early Christian creeds, particularly the Apostles' and Nicene. Although the major denominations became largely liberal, there were many Christians within their membership who were orthodox and resisted the onslaughts of liberal theology. Other denominations, some of them fairly new, did not have this problem, among them Pentecostals, Plymouth Brethren, Christian and Missionary Alliance, Mennonites, and the Fellowship of Evangelical Baptist Churches. The Salvation Army first entered Canada in 1882.

Roman Catholic thought in the middle and late nineteenth century reflected the struggle between Ultramontanism* and liberalism which was raging in Europe. The working out of relations between church and state in regard to secondary education controlled by the provinces involved the Catholics in difficulties with civil authorities in Ontario, New Brunswick, and Manitoba. In large measure such problems continued to plague relations between Catholics and provincial governments in the twentieth century.

The Modern Church. For the most part, the groups which were numerically large in the early nineteenth century remained so in the latter part of the twentieth. In 1961 the Roman Catholic, Anglican, United, Presbyterian, and Baptist churches comprised over fifteen million adherents—more than 87 percent of the total population. The Lutheran Church and the Mennonites numbered over 800,000. Immigration from central Europe after 1890 had brought to Canada several churches representing old Christian traditions, notably the Greek Orthodox Church and the Ukrainian Greek Catholic Church. Other Protestant groups were still increasing, notably the Pentecostals (143,000).

Participation of the Canadian churches in missions continued. Domestic missions among the North American Indians and the Eskimos were chiefly maintained by the Roman Catholic, Anglican, and United churches. Protestant missions in the foreign field were overwhelmingly in the hands of missionaries who were evangelical and conservative in theology.

The struggle between liberalism and conservatism was still apparent in the last third of the twentieth century. In Protestantism the struggle cut across denominational lines, with the liberals stressing social justice, permissive morality, and flexibility in doctrine, and the conservatives emphasizing the importance of personal salvation and of adherence to the historic Christian creeds. Roman Catholics were concerned with such issues as birth control, services in the vernacular, and relations with other Christian groups.

CANADIAN COUNCIL OF CHURCHES. Organized in 1944 "to promote the Church's mission, unity, renewal and obedience." Its formation resulted from interchurch cooperation in Canada and ecumenism abroad. Current members are the Anglican Church of Canada, Armenian Church, Baptist Federation of Canada, Christian Church (Disciples), Greek Orthodox Church, Lutheran Church in America (Canada Section), Presbyterian Church in Canada, Reformed Church, Salvation Army, Society of Friends, and United Church of Canada. The council has a close association with several interdenominational societies, and a working relationship with the Canadian Catholic Conference. The supreme decision-making body is the triennial assembly, with members appointed by the participating churches.

CANDLE; CANDLEMAS. The use of candles as ornaments in the Western Church probably had its origin in the lighted candles which were carried in procession before the bishop of Rome and then placed behind the altar. By 1200 two candles were actually put on the altar of the papal chapel and the custom, using more candles, quickly spread. They are now lit in both the East and West during liturgical services. Smaller candles, votive candles, are lit by worshipers and placed in front of statues of saints, especially before the Virgin Mary. In the Church of England the legality of two candles on the holy table was established by the Lincoln Judgment of 1890; the Lambeth Opinion of 1899 condemned the carrying of candles in procession; both these rulings are now widely disobeyed, and many parish churches follow Roman Catholic practice.

Candlemas is the feast which commemorates the purification of the Virgin Mary and the presentation of Jesus in the Temple (Luke 2:22-38). Originally a festival of the church in Jerusalem which began about 350, it became widespread after Emperor Justinian ordered its observance at Constantinople in 542. In the East the festival is called "The Meeting" (i.e., of Jesus and Simeon in the Temple). The major rite of the day in the West is the blessing and distribution of candles of beeswax to the singing of the Nunc Dimittis and in commemoration of Christ as the "Light of the World." CANDLISH, ROBERT SMITH (1806-1873). Scottish minister. Educated at Glasgow University, he became minister of St. George's, Edinburgh (1834), and was one of the most prominent of those who at the Disruption* of 1843 left the establishment to form the Free Church of Scotland. In 1862 he became principal of his church's New College in Edinburgh, which post he exercised concurrently with his ministry at Free St. George's. In his 1861 Cunningham Lectures, Candlish disagreed with the F.D. Maurice* view of the universal fatherhood of God; he denied that unfallen Adam was the possessor of true sonship and argued that in adoption the sonship received by believers is an entirely new relationship. While contemporaries applauded his attempts to widen the scope of systematic theology, some scholars particularly in his own denomination criticized his reasoning. Candlish was one of the founders of the Evangelical Alliance (1845) and in 1861 was moderator of his church's general assembly.

CANISIUS, PETER (Petrus) (1521-1597). Roman Catholic reformer. Born in Nijmegen, he studied theology at Cologne and Louvain (1535-46). Deeply influenced by followers of the devotio moderna, he became a Jesuit* novice in 1543. In Cologne he helped to defeat Archbishop Hermann von Wied, and rapidly made a deep impression on Catholic leaders by his ability and dedication. More than any other single person, he established the Catholic reformation in S Germany and Austria. His three Catechisms went through hundreds of editions and did for Catholics what Luther's had done for Protestants. Jesuit provincial for upper Germany between 1556 and 1559, he not only attracted many other talented men to the order, but demonstrated singular ability in educational reform, preaching, teaching, apologetics, and pastoral work. Good relations with Catholic rulers were an indispensable part of his achievements. Tending to perfectionism, he was an unsparing critic of abuses, and his letters are an invaluable historical source. He died in Freiburg and was canonized in 1925.

IAN BREWARD

CANO, MELCHIOR (1509-1560). Spanish Roman Catholic theologian. Born at Tarancon, New Castile, he entered the Dominican Order* in 1523. After a professorship in theology at Alcalá, he became professor of theology at Salamanca in 1546, and in 1551 was sent by Charles V to play an active part in the deliberations of the Council of Trent.* In the following year the emperor presented him for the bishopric of the Canary Islands, but a month later he resigned. In 1553 he became rector of St. Gregory's College, Valladolid, and in 1557 he was elected provincial of the Dominican Order. The appointment was contested, and a subsequent reelection was not confirmed by Pope Paul IV because of Cano's support for the Spanish crown against the papacy. His election was subsequently ratified by Pius IV. His reputation rests on the twelve books of his De Locis Theologicis (1563), an elegantly written inquiry into the sources of theological knowledge, which helped to lay the foundations of theological methodology.

HOWARD SAINSBURY

CANON. The Greek word kanōn was the rod of straightness, from which meaning emerged the idea of that which was measured or against which another could be measured; hence, in the derived sense, a rule or order of arrangement, and thereafter the "order of priests" and "clergy" in general. Its English use as a title stems from the early medieval ordered life of cloistered clergy housed within the close of a cathedral or collegiate church, thus secular canons. Those partially reformed in the eleventh century in their common living by the renunciation of private property were distinguished as regular canons (see AUGUSTINIAN CANONS and PREMONSTRATENSIANS). Since the Reformation, all Church of England canons are secular, the system being retained—often only in an honorary sense—for a cathedral chapter under a dean, originally advisory to a bishop with duties in his church.

CLYDE CURRY SMITH

CANONESS. Since titular "canon" involves all clergy, including minor orders, cloistered within a single house, the feminine usage (in English only since the seventeenth century) covers all members of a corresponding community of women living under a rule, although not necessarily under a perpetual vow. For all practical purposes there is little distinction from the designation "nun."*

CANONIZATION. A papal decree commanding public veneration to be paid to an individual by the universal church. It thus creates a cultus which is both universal and obligatory. Urban VII published in 1634 a bull which reserved to the Holy See exclusively its right of canonization. Papal authority is generally given only after a long legal process. In the primitive church, martyrs were the first to be publicly venerated by the faithful. From the fourth century, a cultus was extended also to confessors. The first historically attested canonization is that of Ulrich of Augsburg by John XV in 993. Canonization is said to confer a seven-fold honor: the name is inscribed in the catalogue of saints; his/her name is invoked in the public prayers of the church; churches may be dedicated to God in his/her memory; the Eucharist is celebrated in his/her honor; his/her festival day is observed; pictures of the saint show him/her surrounded by a halo; and his/her relics are enclosed in precious vessels and publicly honored.

S. TOON

CANON LAW. A body of ecclesiastical rules or laws drawn up and imposed by authority in all matters of faith, morals, and discipline. Such laws stem from the early practice of convening councils of church leaders to settle matters of uncertainty and dispute (cf. Acts 15). The importance of the councils determined the degree of authority attached to the canons—those from the Council of Nicea (325), for example, possessed great significance, and the results of other councils appear to be attached to the Nicean. The African churches held frequent plenary sessions that produced a large collection of canonical material, evidenced by reference in the Council of Chalcedon (451) to the Antiochean canons of 341 (or 330).

The councils were not alone in producing canon law. Their work was supplemented by that of individuals, particularly bishops, men such as Gregory Thaumaturgus,* Basil* of Caesarea, and Amphilochius* of Iconium. There was also the work of anonymous and fictitious authors such as the Apostolic Canons.* Papal letters (Decretals) also gained special authority from as early as the letter of Pope Siricius to Himerius of Tarragona in 385. With the Decretal of Gratian about 1140, scholars have drawn the dividing line between ius antiquum and ius novum: all canons after the Council of Trent (1545-63) are called ius novissimum. Gratian's Decretal was eventually extended into the Corpus Iuris Canonici which became the authoritative law for the Roman Church until 1904, when Pius X called for it to be completely overhauled and codified, the standard text now being the Codex Iuris Canonici issued in 1917. Local canons have also been used in conjunction with the authoritative law providing the basic canonical guide.

See A.G. Cicognani, Canon Law (ET 1934), and R. Metz, What Is Canon Law? (1960).

GORDON A. CATHERALL

CANON OF SCRIPTURE. Although the word "canon" came to be used of ecclesiastical pronouncements, it has a wider connotation when applied to Scripture. It was used in the sense of rule of faith and in the sense of a catalogue or list. Both these usages occur before the first decision was made on the subject of Scripture by a church council (at Laodicea in A.D. 363). This at once focuses attention on an important feature in the history of the canon, i.e., the fact that the content of the canon was determined by general usage, not by an authoritarian pronouncement.

The Christian Church took over the OT Scriptures in the Septuagint version, but there is no evidence that the Apocrypha,* which formed part of the Septuagint, was regarded as part of Scripture. Indeed Melito* in the second century thought it necessary to send to Palestine to discover the content of the Hebrew Bible because it was assumed that this and not the Greek canon should be used in the Christian Church. By the time of Jesus there seems to have been general agreement on the contents of the OT canon, despite the fact there was later discussion on a few of the books. The Jewish elders at Jamnia during the period A.D. 70-100 were in general agreement on canonicity, but discussed whether Esther, Proverbs, Ecclesiastes, Canticles, or Ezekiel "soiled the hands" of those who used them. Both Josephus and 2 Esdras assume the same position in their acceptance of all the books. It should be noted that the OT canon of the Roman Church is wider than that of the Protestant churches because of the former's inclusion of the Apocrypha, which is regarded as of equal inspiration to the OT itself.

The acceptance of the Hebrew canon of Scripture as authoritative by the early church exercised an important influence on the formation of the NT canon. Following the regular reading of the OT in Christian worship after a pattern similar to the Jews', there was at once the need to relate also the teaching of Jesus and of the apostles. During the most formative period of the NT there is little evidence of the precise procedure in Christian worship, but it is certain the teaching of Jesus would have commanded equal respect to the OT. Moreover, literature giving authoritatively the teaching of the apostles would soon have been valued, particularly after the decease of the apostles themselves. In spite of the lack of specific information about church life in the later part of the first century, there is enough to show that considerable respect had emerged for the Gospels, Acts, and Pauline epistles by the early part of the second century. This does not mean that there was an official line on the NT canon, but rather a developing agreement on the use of these books. The concerted testimony of Clement of Rome, Ignatius, Polycarp, and the Didache shows the importance attached to these books, although direct citation of them is slight and there is no discussion of their canonicity. It is in fact significant that the earliest canon of the NT was from a heterodox source, Marcion,* who excluded everything except ten Pauline epistles and the gospel of Luke, the latter in a mutilated form. There is no doubt that the emergence of heretical groups claiming secret books to be authoritative promoted vigilance on the part of the orthodox church toward its authorized books.

By the close of the second century there was general acceptance of all the NT books except James, 2 Peter, 2 and 3 John, Jude, Hebrews, and the Apocalypse, which were only partially accepted. It was during the third and fourth centuries that the position of the canon became clarified, although it must not be supposed that lack of use necessarily implied doubt. Nevertheless, Origen mentions the hesitation of some churches over the two Johannine epistles and over 2 Peter, although he himself appears to regard them as Scripture. He questioned the Pauline authorship of Hebrews, although he clearly accepted its canonicity. The same attitude is seen in Dionysius, who rejected the apostolic authorship of the Apocalypse, but accepted the book as Scripture. The church in the East seems to have arrived at the full canon of the NT as it now exists at an earlier date than the Western Church. The canon is set out in detail in Athanasius's Easter Letter (A.D. 367) and contains the twenty-seven books to the exclusion of all others, although certain other books, such as Hermas's Shepherd and the Didache are allowed for private reading. A similar list was confirmed at the Synod of Carthage in A.D. 397.

In the Western Church there was greater tardiness, and it was not until the time of Jerome* and Augustine* that certain of the NT books were accepted, no doubt mainly under their influence. Those books over which there had been hesitation were Hebrews, James, 2 and 3 John, 2 Peter, and Jude. In the case of Hebrews and Jude, there is earlier evidence of acceptance at the close of the second century, after which they appear to have fallen into disuse for a period. Augustine at first considered Hebrews as Pauline, but in his later works he cited it anonymously. All of the NT books except 2 and 3 John, 2 Peter, Jude, and the Apocalypse were included in the Peshitta, the Bible of the Syriac-speaking church, but these omitted books were included within the next century (the Philoxenian version produced in A.D. 508 included them).

During the Reformation, discussion over the NT canon opened again. Erasmus, Luther, and Calvin, among others, discussed the authenticity of certain of the books. Luther* is most notable for creating what was almost a deuterocanon. He placed Hebrews, James, Jude, and the Apocalypse at the end of his Bible to signify that they were of less value than the rest. But the Reformers were subjective and largely uncritical in their comments.

During the era of critical inquiry, many of the books of Scripture have been considered nonauthentic, but the position of these books within the canon has never been seriously discussed. It has been implicitly assumed that even nonauthentic or pseudonymous works can be regarded as canonical, but such a view finds no support from early Christian testimony.

CANONS, BOOK OF. Passed by James I and by Canterbury Convocation in 1604, and by York Convocation in 1606, the book contained 141 canons covering such things as the conduct of services, the duties of church officers, and the discipline of the clergy. They betray at points an anti-Puritan bias, but generally reflect the Elizabethan Settlement.* Down to 1936 there were minor changes, the convocations reforming their own composition (without seeking statutory authority) and thus becoming more representative in order to be joined with the house of laity in the newly empowered church assembly (see GENERAL SYNOD). In 1939 the archbishops appointed a canon law commission which drew up a draft new code (1947). Revision was undertaken by the convocations (consulting the house of laity). Many changes in statute law were required. The new canons were promulgated in 1964 and 1969, but further, continuous reform of the code has gone on, and the new general synod of the Church of England has a standing commission handling such needs. While the present church-state relationship lasts, such amendments themselves sometimes require a parliamentary measure before gaining the royal assent. COLIN BUCHANAN

CANTERBURY. In 597 Pope Gregory the Great sent Augustine to evangelize Britain, with instructions to establish sees at London and York. Augustine was, however, welcomed by Bertha, the Christian wife of Ethelbert, king of Kent, and established his first church in Ethelbert's capital, Canterbury. This became the center of his missionary activity and consequently took the place of London. From the thirteenth century the archbishops were regarded as permanent papal legates, and by the fourteenth century they had established precedence over the archbishops of York as Primate of All England. Many archbishops played significant parts in national history. The diocese of Canterbury consists of most of Kent and part of Surrey, but the province of Canterbury covers England south of Cheshire and Yorkshire, and the archbishop is also regarded as head of the worldwide Anglican Communion.*

Augustine consecrated a Roman-British basilica as his cathedral and founded a Benedictine monastery beside it, which was reorganized by Lanfranc* as the priory of Christ Church. After its destruction by the Danes in 1067, the cathedral was rebuilt in Norman style under archbishops Lanfranc and Anselm* and consecrated in 1130. Archbishop Becket* was murdered in the cathedral in 1170, and after a fire in 1174, the choir was reconstructed in Transitional style, with a magnificent shrine for Becket, dedicated in 1220. Thousands of pilgrims visited it from all over Europe, bringing great wealth to cathedral and city. From 1376 the Norman nave was reconstructed and transepts added. The central tower (Bell Harry Tower) was begun about 1495, also in Perpendicular style. Edward the Black Prince and Henry IV were buried in the cathedral. In 1538 Becket's shrine was destroyed and the priory dissolved, to be replaced by a dean and twelve canons, appointed by the Crown.

CAPISTRANO, JOHN OF (1386-1456). Franciscan* leader and preacher. Having studied civil and canon law in Perugia, he joined the Observant Franciscans there and preached against the Fraticelli.* He did much to win for the Observants their own provincial vicars (1431) and to gain them holy places in Palestine. Later he became vicar general of the Cismontane community and wrote a course of studies, having founded other convents and monasteries. He defended Bernardino of Siena* before Martin V, and (unsuccessfully) the Angevin cause in Naples as papal legate (1435-36). He obtained for Third Order Franciscans the right to live in common (1436) and spent two years in Milan preaching and writing (1440-42). Nicholas V sent him to Austria to preach against the Hussites (1451), extending his responsibility to Styria, Hungary, and Bohemia. In 1454 Pius II had him preach the crusade which brought about the 22 July victory. He was canonized in 1690. C.G. THORNE, JR.

CAPITO, WOLFGANG FABRICIUS (1478-1541). Protestant Reformer. Born Köpfel, son of a Hagenau blacksmith, he studied medicine at Pforzheim, jurisprudence at Ingolstadt, and theology at Freiburg im Breisgau, and became expert in Hebrew. As chapter preacher at Bruchsal (1512) he met Melanchthon, and as professor of theology and cathedral preacher at Basle (1515) encountered Oecolampadius* and corresponded with Luther and Zwingli, associated closely with Erasmus, and published a Hebrew grammar and a translation of the Psalter. From Mainz, where as chancellor and preacher he mediated uncomfortably between the archbishop and Luther (1519-23), he moved to Strasbourg as provost of St. Thomas's. Drawn from scholarship into reform mainly by Matthew Zell, he was dismissed from the chapter but appointed pastor of New St. Peter's, and married in 1524. The tension between study and pulpit produced lectures on the OT and commentaries in humanist Latin on Habakkuk (1526) and Hosea (1528).

Towards Strasbourg's quieter Anabaptists he was markedly benevolent and hospitable, confident in the outcome of irenical discussion. For years he was unhappy with infant baptism, espousing an illuminist or spiritualist piety which inculcated inwardness and distrusted externals. He was influenced by radicals like Schwenckfeld, Michael Sattler, and especially Martin Cellarius, with whom he cooperated in translation and publication. But progressively unsettled by radical excesses, illness (1529), and his wife's death (1531; in 1532 he married Oecolampadius's widow), he inclined towards closer alignment with Bucer* in securing a firmer ecclesiastical system for Strasbourg (1533-34). Together they compiled the *Tetrapolitan Confession (1530) and pursued union negotiations (Wittenberg, 1536; Worms, 1540). Capito also drew up church orders for Berne (synod of 1532) and Frankfurt (1535). His later works (Responsio de Missa . . . , 1537; Hexemeron Dei . . . , 1539) favor even more strongly a magisterial, "Neo-Catholic" ecclesiasticism. Above all a scholar in the Erasmian mould (active in patristic studies and promoting works by Luther and Oecolampadius), he failed to fulfill his early promise even in this sphere.

CAPITULARY. A name applied to legislative decrees issued by the Merovingian or Carolingian kings of France or by the Lombard kings of Italy, covering varied aspects of administration, including ecclesiastical regulations and moral prescriptions along with more general political and economic edicts. The acts, composed in Latin, were often long and discursive, so were divided into capitula, or chapters, and were of various types. Some were confirmed by local assemblies or by church councils, while others took effect without such confirmation. Some were effective for a limited time or in a specific area, others were binding and permanent throughout the entire realm. None survives in its original form, but many are available in collections, beginning with that of the Abbot Ansegisus in 827.

CAPPADOCIAN FATHERS. In the second half of the fourth century, three theologians from the province of Cappadocia had a profound influence upon the character of Christian theology. They were Basil of Caesarea,* his brother Gregory of Nyssa,* and Basil's close friend Gregory of Nazianzus.* They gave final shape to the Greek doctrine of the Trinity, and through their efforts Arianism was finally defeated.

CAPREOLUS. (fifth century). Bishop of Carthage who probably succeeded to the see shortly before the death of Augustine (430). Principally known for his letter to the Council of Ephesus (431) against the views of Nestorius (see NESTORIANS), he also successfully begged the council not to reopen discussion on the Pelagian heresy. He stated the principle in his letter that old questions, once settled, should not be reopened. The judgment of the Fathers, under the Spirit's guidance, should decide new questions.

CAPREOLUS, JOHN (c.1380-1444). "Prince of the Thomists." A Dominican who taught in French universities, he was foremost in the revival of Thomism. His Four Books of Defences of the Theology of St. Aquinas (1409-33) used the sources systematically against critics such as Scotists and Ockhamists.

CAPUCHINS. Reformed branch of the Franciscan* Order. In 1525 Matteo da Bascio (1495-1552), a Friar Observant at Montefalcone, desired to return to the primitive simplicity of the order. He adopted the pointed cowl (capuce) which St. Francis wore, together with sandals and a beard. He and his companions cared for plague victims at Camerino and established themselves there with the approval of Pope Clement VII in 1528. They met much opposition from other Franciscans. Their rule (1529) emphasized the ideals of poverty and austerity, and they devoted themselves to charitable work. The movement was nearly suppressed in 1542 when their third general, Bernardino Ochino,* became a Protestant, but they survived through the influence of Cardinal Sanseverino and Vittoria Colonna, duchess of Amalfi. By dint of their missionary zeal and preaching enthusiasm they became a powerful weapon of the Counter-Reformation. In 1619 they became a fully independent branch of the Franciscan family. J.G.G. NORMAN

CARDINAL (Lat. cardo, "hinge"). One of the ecclesiastical princes who form the Sacred College of Cardinals in Rome and choose the pope. This title was first applied to the priesthood generally, especially to those with permanent church attachments, but eventually it came to denote specific priests and deacons in Rome who formed a council to advise the bishop of Rome. From the eighth century the consistory included neighboring "cardinal" bishops. The action of Leo IX (1002-54) enhanced the position of the Roman cardinals. The cardinalate was formed into a collegiate body, and its members ranked as Roman princes, who when in consistory became the immediate papal advisers and assumed the government of the Roman Catholic Church during the vacancy of the Holy See. The present function of cardinals is chiefly administrative, and they are appointed by papal nomination. In 1568 the number was fixed at seventy—six bishops, fifty priests, fourteen deacons—but modern appointments generally are made from the ranks of the episcopate. Pope John XXIII increased the number, and there are now over one hundred.

Among their duties they are to reside in Rome, unless excused or bishops of foreign dioceses; to act as heads of curial offices and Roman congregations; to preside over ecclesiastical commissions. Their title is "Eminence," and they are afforded rights in all dioceses, such as the use of a portable altar everywhere. Their insignia include the "red hat"—a flat-crowned, broad-brimmed hat with two clusters of fifteen tassels (which is not worn again after a cardinal's first consistory)—a biretta and skullcap, the sacred purple, a sapphire ring, and a pectoral cross. They meet in conclave for the election of a new pontiff, a privilege they have held since the Third Lateran Council (1179).

GORDON A. CATHERALL

CAREY, WILLIAM (1761-1834). Missionary to India. Born near Northampton, England, he worked as a shoemaker from the age of sixteen to twenty-eight. Following his conversion at eighteen, he became a preacher among the Calvinistic Baptists, working by day and ministering in his spare time; while he worked he studied. In 1785 he became preacher to the Baptist church in the village of Moulton and taught also in the village school; in 1786 he was made pastor. During this period a great burden for the unevangelized in heathen lands was given to him. In 1792 his pamphlet An Enquiry into the Obligations of Christians to use Means for the Conversion of the Heathens was published. He proposed the formation of a society to achieve this—the first modern missionary society. In 1789 he became pastor of a run-down Baptist church in Leicester; and in 1792 preached his famous missionary sermon—"Expect Great Things from God; Attempt Great Things for God"—at a ministers' meeting. At Kettering, four months later, the "Particular (Calvinistic) Baptist Society for Propagating the Gospel among the Heathen" (now the Baptist Missionary Society) was founded.

In 1793 Carey, with John Thomas, sailed for Bengal, India. At first destitute in Calcutta, he quickly mastered the language, and in 1794 was made manager of an indigo factory near Madras. Soon he set to work translating the Bible into Bengali, in addition to his business, evangelistic, and pastoral labors. By 1798 he had learned Sanskrit and had translated into Bengali the whole Bible, except Joshua to Job. To print it he set up his own press. He established schools and medical work. In 1800 he moved to the Danish colony of Serampore, which was his base for the remaining thirty-four years of his many-sided missionary labors. During these years he worked untiringly at the comprehensive pattern of missionary service which he had already laid down—Bible translation and production, evangelism, church-planting, education, and medical relief—spreading its influence and activities throughout India and then stimulating missions in other parts of Asia. He himself served as professor of Sanskrit, Bengali, and Marathi at the College of Fort William; he supervised and edited translations of the Scriptures into thirty-six languages; produced a massive Bengali-English dictionary, pioneered social reform, and founded the Agricultural and Horticultural Society of India. Carey has generally been acclaimed as "the Father of Modern Missions."

A. MORGAN DERHAM

CARGILL, DONALD (Daniel) (c.1619-1680). Scottish Covenanter.* Son of a Perthshire notary, he was ordained minister of the Barony Church, Glasgow, in 1655, but was ejected with many other Presbyterian ministers in 1662. He became a field preacher, and generally ascribed to him is the Queensferry Paper, the most advanced of the Covenanting documents which, along with a strong confession of faith, advocated the establishment of a republic, since monarchy was "liable . . . to degenerate into tyranny." In 1680 at a service at Torwood, Cargill excommunicated Charles II and the other chief persecutors of the Covenanters. The sentence on the king was implicitly founded on the same grounds as were afterward used in the British renunciation of the Stuarts as a whole. J.D. DOUGLAS

CARISSIMI, GIACOMO (1603-1674). Italian composer. He is important in the history of sacred music for the role he played in developing oratorio. He worked in Rome, and the objective of his works in this form was didactic under the influence of the Jesuits. What came to be called oratorio was originally sacred opera and began about 1600 with the work of Cavalieri. Carissimi's works presented in dramatic style episodes mainly from the Bible. They were in Latin, with dramatis personae represented by solo voices, but without costumes and scenery. A significant role was given to the chorus, which sang in simple chordal style to give greater audibility to the words. Although living much later, Handel* was indebted to Carissimi. J.B. MAC MILLAN

CARLILE, WILSON (1847-1942). Founder of the Church Army.* His successful business career was virtually ruined by the economic difficulties of 1873, and this led to serious thought and his conversion. Almost immediately he showed great concern for the "roughs" of society and great skill in presenting the Gospel message vividly. After study at the London College of Divinity he was ordained in 1880 to a Kensington parish, where he combined remarkable ability, imagination, and efficiency, with a certain musical talent, in evangelism of the poorest areas, especially through open-air and after-church meetings. He began to train lay preachers, and this led to the foundation of the Church Army in 1882, in which he played a dynamic part until the end of his life.

C. PETER WILLIAMS

CARLSTADT (Karlstadt), ANDREAS BODENSTEIN VON (c.1477-1541). German Protestant Reformer. Born in Bavaria, he was educated at Erfurt, Cologne, and Wittenberg, where he became a member of the theological faculty. In 1511 he traveled to Rome and Siena to receive a doctorate. He was at first a defender of Scholasticism* and an opponent of Luther, but after reading Augustine he became an advocate of grace and divine sovereignty. In 1518 he wrote 380 theses on the supremacy of Scripture and the fallibility of councils in support of Luther's Ninety-Five Theses.* He debated these principles against J. Eck* at Leipzig (1519). Later he gave his interpretation of the debate in a tract, Against the Dumb Ass and Stupid Little Doctor Eck. The bull Exsurge Domine which condemned Luther and other Reformers included Carlstadt.

There were, however, differences between Luther and Carlstadt, and these became clear in 1521. While Luther was hiding in the Wartburg, Carlstadt made many reforms. Luther allowed a good deal of liberty in the Christian life, but Carlstadt considered some changes as necessary, such as Communion in both kinds, the marriage of the clergy, and ridding the liturgy of music. He also believed infant baptism was unnecessary and Communion was a memorial service. When Luther returned to Wittenberg, Carlstadt left for Orlamünde. Here he became a very popular preacher and renounced his academic degrees. He took an anticlerical attitude, began dressing as a peasant, wearing no shoes, and asked that people call him "Brother Andrew." These actions were based upon his conviction that inner religious experience demanded social equality. Luther visited Orlamünde, and in a debate with him Carlstadt claimed he spoke by direct revelation of the Holy Spirit, rather than with the "papistical" talk of Luther. In 1524 the Saxon authorities asked Carlstadt to leave the city. Eventually he settled in Switzerland, associating for a while with Zwingli* in Zurich and later with Bullinger* in Basle.

A brilliant, often petty, man, Carlstadt in his "turgid and long-winded pamphlets," as Gordon Rupp has pointed out, anticipated much of Puritanism.

See K. Müller, Luther und Karlstadt (1907), and E.G. Rupp, "Andrew Karlstadt and Reformation Puritanism," JTS, NS, X (1959).

ROBERT G. CLOUSE

CARLYLE, ALEXANDER ("Jupiter") (1722-1805). Scottish minister. Born in a Dumfriesshire manse, he studied at Edinburgh, Glasgow, and Leyden universities, was ordained as minister of Inveresk in 1746, and held that charge until his death. Having earned his nickname because of his imposing appearance, he walked in high social circles, was a brilliant conversationalist, scandalized many by going openly to the theater, and played cards at home "with unlocked doors." He seems, however, to have carried out his pastoral duties zealously, and he championed many good causes in the general assembly, whose moderator he was in 1770. During his many visits south of the border he attended Church of England services as a matter of course. His Autobiography (1860) is a fascinating commentary on his times.

J.D. DOUGLAS

CARLYLE, THOMAS (1795-1881). Scottish writer. Son of a Scottish peasant farmer, he was early attracted to German literature. His concern with social conditions (Chartism, 1839, and Past and Present, 1843) led to his propounding the need for hero-rulers—strong, just men who emerged to leadership by their own innate powers rather than by election (Heroes and Hero-Worship, 1841). He produced two massive works on Oliver Cromwell (1845) and Frederick the Great (1858-65) respectively, besides the earlier French Revolution (1837). Carlyle believed in order and that order is realized only through power, which evokes a sense of duty from those who obey. There may be something of his own religious background in the stress that he placed on the responsibility of the individual will, as there certainly is in his admiration of the Puritans and Covenanters. In Sartor Resartus (1843-44) and Past and Present he proclaims his gospel of action. It is a sad, but not surprising, reaction to this that expresses itself in the bitter, disillusioned, and mocking tone of Latter-Day Pamphlets (1850). ARTHUR POLLARD

CARMAN, ALBERT (1833-?). General superintendent of Canadian Methodism. After a brief period as a high school teacher, he was appointed in 1858 as principal of Albert College, Belleville, the major educational institution of the Methodist Episcopal Church, and soon secured for it a place within the federated structure of the University of Toronto. Ten years later he became chancellor, and in 1873 he became the bishop of his denomination. Despite his responsibilities in a circuit-riding church, he was also a moving force in the founding of Alma Ladies College in St. Thomas. In 1884, when Canadian Methodism united, Carman was chosen superintendent, and his great gifts of administration and leadership resulted in his being reelected repeatedly and continuing in office until 1915. He was deeply involved in Christian social action and latterly was a doughty opponent of theological liberalism. In 1899 and 1907 his opposition forced G.B. Workman to be relieved of his OT post in two Methodist institutions, and in 1909 he engaged in controversy with George Jackson, whose views he believed were erroneous and would weaken the doctrinal basis of the burgeoning church union movement.

CARMELITES. They emerged in 1593 as the reformed part of the Carmelite Order with its own general and its special emphasis on the contemplative life. This reform was begun in 1562 by Teresa of Avila.* The Carmelite Order was originally founded by Berthold on Mount Carmel in Palestine about 1154. It once claimed to have descended directly from Elijah and the community of prophets who lived there. A new period in the history of the order began with the fall of the Crusader States and migration of the Carmelites to Europe. The sixth general, Simon Stock, obtained from Innocent IV certain modifications of the primitive rule as laid down in 1209 by Albert de Vercelli, Latin patriarch of Jerusalem, who insisted on absolute purity, total abstinence from flesh, and solitude. Although abstinence was not abolished, it became less stringent and silence was restricted to specific times. In 1452 an order of Carmelite nuns was founded.

In the sixteenth century, discipline among monks and nuns deteriorated. Teresa of Avila resolved to revive the primitive rule and follow the contemplative life. This reform movement came to be known as the Discalced.* In the course of fifteen years Teresa founded sixteen more convents of nuns. The ideal of the contemplative life attracted many followers, among whom was John of the Cross.* who extended the reform to the male houses of the order. The Carmelites emphasized special devotion to Mary and the Child Jesus, and not unnaturally Carmelite theologians were among the earliest to defend the Roman Catholic dogma of the Immaculate Conception.

S. TOON

CARMICHAEL, AMY WILSON (1867-1951). Missionary to India. Adopted daughter of Robert Wilson, chairman of the Keswick Convention, she worked in Japan for a time with Barclay Buxton. After a breakdown in health she served with the Church of England Zenana Missionary Society in South India, where she was a colleague of Thomas Walker* of Tinnevelly. In 1903 she wrote Things as They Are, a moving account of stark realism which influenced many towards missionary work. In 1901 the Dohnavur Fellowship began, with the purpose of rescuing children devoted to temple service with all its attendant corruption. It was part of the CEZMS until it became independent in 1926. After a fall in 1931, she was crippled by arthritis, but remained at the center of the life of the Fellowship, writing many devotional books and poems which were marked by an intense, almost mystical, spirituality.

CARNELL, EDWARD JOHN (1919-1967). American evangelical theologian. Born in Antigo, Wisconsin, he received his college and seminary education at Wheaton College and Westminster Theological Seminary. He later won doctorates at Harvard and Boston. From 1945 to 1948 he was professor of philosophy and religion at Gordon College and Divinity School. In 1948 he joined the faculty of the recently founded Fuller Theological Seminary and served in several positions during his nineteen years there. He was president of the seminary (1954-59) and at the time of his death was professor of ethics and philosophy of religion. He was one of the leaders in the intellectual awakening of conservative evangelicalism after World War II. He excelled in giving a contemporary and relevant statement of the historic Christian faith. His books included An Introduction to Christian Apologetics (1948), Christian Commitment (1957), and The Burden of Sören Kierkegaard (1965).

BRUCE L. SHELLEY

CAROL. The word came into English from the medieval French for "round dance." In fifteenth-century England the carol developed into an important type of vocal composition. Although no longer danced, it retained structural evidence of its origin. A refrain called "burden" was sung before the first stanza, repeated between each succeeding one, and at the end. The subject matter was not always religious, but many concerned the Nativity or the Virgin Mary. Music has survived for only about a third of the extant texts. A well-known composition employing authentic medieval texts with modern music is A Ceremony of Carols by Benjamin Britten (cf. for texts, R.L. Green, The Early English Carol, 1935; for music, Musica Britannica, vol. IV, 1952).

In later times, anonymous folk ballads and lyrics dealing with aspects of the Nativity and attendant events, real or mythical, became known as carols. In England these correspond to the noëls of France and the Weihnachtslieder of Germany. From the sixteenth century, such lyrics were frequently circulated in broadsheets. There are carols for seasons other than Christmas. The Romantic era brought an interest in folksong, which led to the preservation of texts and melodies in print that had been transmitted only in oral tradition. Excellent examples from the eighteenth century are "God rest you merry" and "A Virgin unspotted." Today all Christmas hymns are frequently but incorrectly referred to as Christmas carols.

CAROLINE BOOKS (Quattuor Libri Carolini). A four-volume Frankish commentary written about 790-92 on the place of ecclesiastical images, debating the decisions of the iconoclastic council (753-54) and the Second Council of Nicea (787), which advocated extremes, destruction and adoration, respectively. Its position is neither; rather, images are for instruction alone, while the Cross of Christ, Scripture, sacred vessels, and saints' relics are worthy of adoration only. Probably Alcuin* or a Spanish or Irish theologian at Charlemagne's court is the author. The Nicene position did gain increasing Frankish recognition after its more accurate version by Anastasius Bibliothecarius* appeared under John VIII (872-82). C.G. THORNE, JR.

CAROLINE DIVINES. The title used, often loosely, to refer to a group of Anglicans who flourished in the reigns of Charles I and II. Their theology is referred to, in some ways misleadingly, as "Arminian," and they also had distinctive views on spirituality and ceremonial. The father of the movement was Lancelot Andrewes,* and the effective leader William Laud.* The outstanding theologians, however, were younger men. It is important to correct a modern distortion which sees this school as representing "true Anglicanism" in contrast with the contemporary Calvinists and Latitudinarians.*

CAROLINGIAN RENAISSANCE. The revival of learning in Charlemagne's reign (768-814) which lasted until the Norse invasions. Charlemagne's empire was the first attempt at unified government since the Roman Empire's collapse and was represented as its re-creation. Charlemagne wanted a literate clergy so that it would succeed and endure, hence his attempt to revive the ancient learning. Though functional rather than creative, the renaissance checked ignorance and illiteracy and preserved the classics for future generations. Charlemagne's concern to continue the ancient classical culture had a significant difference—it was to be Christian. As Alcuin* put it in a letter to him, "If your intentions are carried out it may be that a new Athens will arise in 'Francia', and an Athens fairer than of old, for our Athens, ennobled by the teachings of Christ, will surpass the wisdom of the Academy."

Charlemagne drew upon contemporary scholarship. From Italy he brought the grammarian Peter of Pisa and the historian Paul the Deacon. From Spain came the Visigoth Theodulf, poet, man of letters, to be bishop of Orléans. Principally he drew upon the flourishing Anglo-Saxon culture resulting from the fusion of Irish and Benedictine monasticism in Northumbria under Bede, bringing Alcuin from York to become head of the palace school at Aix-la-Chapelle and chief organizer of the renaissance. The latter had three aspects: (1) measures to preserve literacy. Alcuin established a standard spelling throughout the empire, and developed a clear script in the beautiful Carolingian miniscule which was responsible for some of the finest medieval manuscripts; (2) schools established at monasteries (e.g., Tours, Fulda, Fleury) and cathedrals to give wider education; (3) content of education. The old Roman system was mainly rhetorical and literary. Alcuin constituted the curriculum from the seven liberal arts of the trivium (grammar, rhetoric, logic) and the quadrivium (arithmetic, astronomy, geometry, music) as laid down by Boethius and Cassiodorus.

Capitularies* issued by Charlemagne from 787 gave effect to these measures. Though the movement ended with the empire's collapse, it rescued culture from extinction and set it upon an educational foundation which survived to form the starting-point of the eleventh-century renaissance.

CARON, JOSEPH LE (1586-1632). Roman Catholic missionary to Canada. One of three members of the Récollet Order, a reformed branch of the Franciscans, who responded in 1615 to an appeal by Samuel de Champlain for missionaries to take the Gospel to the Indians in New France, he moved from Quebec further west to establish the first mission among the Hurons. He was for a year (1617-18) provincial minister of Quebec. In 1618 Caron went to Tadoussac to work among the Montagnais, whom he served intermittently for some years. He compiled dictionaries of the Huron, Algonquin, and Montagnais languages, but these have been lost.

CARPENTER, JOSEPH ESTLIN (1844-1927). Unitarian minister. Educated at University College, London, he served Unitarian churches in Bristol and Leeds (1866-75) before becoming lecturer at Manchester New College. Subsequently he was principal of Manchester College, Oxford (1906-15). Prominent in his denomination, he had also a wide knowledge of Near Eastern studies and translated Ewald's* major work into English. His own books included The First Three Gospels (1890), The Composition of the Hexateuch (1902), and The Johannine Writings (1927).

CARPOCRATES. He taught, about A.D. 135 in Alexandria, a syncretistic Christianity. He believed that God is an unrevealed First Principle; the world was created by subordinate beings; souls transmigrate on the cyclic model of the Phaedrus; Jesus, a mere man, perceived eternal truths and rose above world powers; full exploitation of human experience qualifies the soul for direct experience of God without reincarnation. Carpocratians, renowned for licentiousness, revered images of both Christ and philosophers.

CARROLL, JOHN (1735-1815). First Roman Catholic bishop in America. Educated in Jesuit schools in France, he joined the order, was ordained to the priesthood (1769), and taught philosophy at Liège and Bruges. When the Society of Jesus was dissolved in 1773, he returned to America and became a leader of the Catholics in the colonies. In 1776 he accompanied Benjamin Franklin and his cousin Charles Carroll, a signer of the Declaration of Independence, on an unsuccessful mission to Quebec to gain support for the Revolution. John Carroll was appointed by Pius VI as the first Prefect Apostolic of the United States in 1784, and in 1790 was consecrated as the first American Roman Catholic bishop. He urged Catholic Americans to be patriotic defenders of the new nation, and he defended the rights of Catholics to have religious freedom and justice equal to that enjoyed by Protestants. In 1784 he responded to anti-Catholic attacks by publishing an effective defense of Catholicism, An Address to the Catholics of the United States. He founded Georgetown College for the training of capable native priests and in 1808 became the first archbishop of Baltimore. HARRY SKILTON

CARSTARES, WILLIAM (1649-1715). Scottish churchman and statesman. His influence with William of Orange did much to ensure that the form of church government of the Church of Scotland was settled as Presbyterian rather than Episcopalian at the time of the 1688 Revolution. His influence was decisive also in the consummation of the Union of Scotland and England, for he secured the support of the Church of Scotland for the cause of union. He spent much of the two decades preceding the Revolution in Holland as a refugee from the tyrannical Scottish government of Charles II, but acted from time to time as a link between William of Orange and dissident elements in both Scotland and England. His discretion when captured and tortured earned William's gratitude, and he had a place of weight during William's reign. After the king's death his power declined, and in 1703 he accepted the principalship of Edinburgh University, where he did much to raise academic standards. As one of the ministers of Edinburgh and moderator on four occasions of the general assembly, he was a main architect of the form of church government which survives to the present day.

HENRY R. SEFTON

CARTHAGE. The ecclesiastical metropolis of Roman Africa, in the West second only to Rome. Councils held here, both provincial—for Proconsular Africa alone—and all-African, fall into five periods:

(1) Cyprian* and the Donatists regularly appealed to the decision of seventy African and Numidian bishops under Agrippinus about 220 to rebaptize heretics. The ninety bishops who condemned their heretical colleague, Privatus of Lambaesis, between 236 and 248 in the episcopate of Donatus, possibly convened in Carthage.

(2) Cyprian initiated the holding of annual synods to channel the power of the corporate episcopate. Those in 251 and 252 dealt with the lapsi and the related schismatic disorders at Carthage and Rome. One in 253 reaffirmed baptism for newborn babies, and like that in 254 considered appeals from clerical lapsi against disciplinary sanctions. In 255 and twice in 256 the rebaptism controversy was dominant.

(3) In 312, seventy bishops, mostly Numidian, deposed Caecilian* and elected a counter bishop of Carthage, whence issued Donatism.* A protracted assembly of 270 Donatist bishops under Donatus about 330-35 decided that rebaptism of catholics was not invariably obligatory. Tyconius was condemned at a Donatist council about 380, possibly in Carthage, and in 392/3 Maximian's supporters met in synod against Primian, the "regular" Donatist bishop of Carthage. In 348/9 the catholic bishop Gratus presided at the first African council whose canons survive. Like those of Genethlius's council of 389 and 390 they mostly regulate clerical discipline. In 386 a council under Genethlius received Pope Siricius's letter concerning Donatism at Rome.

(4) Bishop Aurelius presided over at least ten provincial and fourteen general councils at Carthage from 394 (or 397) to 424. Donatism, the Pelagians, and Roman jurisdiction in Africa constituted the major extraordinary business. The council of 419 (resumed in 421-22) is credited with the Code of Canons of the African Church, mainly canons from earlier councils, which was accepted into the universal code of canons (text, Mansi 3, 699-843; translation, NPNF II. 14, 437-510).

(5) As Vandal control of Africa ended, councils met to restore church life, under bishops Boniface in 525 and Reparatus about 534, when the reception of Arian converts was discussed. In the Byzantine era general synods in 549 and 550 adhered to the Three Chapters* and excommunicated Pope Vigilius for complying with Justinian's condemnation, and in 594 and 646 councils ruled against Donatism and Monothelitism respectively.

CARTHUSIANS. Founded by Bruno of Cologne in 1084 at the Grande Chartreuse (from which derives the name Carthusian), the Carthusian Order lays special emphasis on the contemplative life. At the beginning there was no special rule. In time, however, three collections of the customs of the order were made. One of these was by Guigues de Chatel, prior of the Grande Chartreuse, who compiled the Consuetudines Carthusiae in 1127, and this was approved by Innocent II in 1133. The monks lived a rigorous and austere life, eating no meat, drinking only watered wine, fasting frequently, and wearing hair shirts. They vowed to observe silence, lived in individual cells within the monastery, and devoted several hours each day to the discipline of mental prayer. Their physical needs were met by a community of lay brothers, and only on feast days did they meet their brethren for meals. The Carthusians thus combined the solitary life of Egyptian desert ascetics with the discipline of a monastic life.

The abbot of the order was the bishop of Grenoble, and the head was an elected prior. The prior of the Grande Chartreuse was the general who was elected by the monks of his own house and a general chapter consisting of visitors and priors which met annually. The order also has a few houses of nuns who observe a rule similar to the monks'. The rigorous life of the movement prevented it from becoming widespread. In 1104 there were still only thirteen monks at the original foundation. By 1300 there were thirty-nine foundations, most of these being in France. Because of its austere life, however, it was least affected by the monastic decline of the late Middle Ages. The most notable event in the history of the order is the split which occurred between 1378 and 1400, known as the Great Schism, healed only by the resignation of two generals and the election of another to replace them. The order has also been subject to persecution. During the Reformation Henry VIII put a number of English Carthusians to death. Their property was confiscated during the French Revolution (much of it was restored in 1816). They were driven by the anticlerical legislation of 1901 from the Grande Chartreuse and sought refuge in Spain, but returned in 1904. The order has had many mystics and devotional writers, among them Hugh, founder of the first English Charterhouse at Witham in 1175-76.

CARTWRIGHT, PETER (1785-1872). American Methodist pioneer circuit rider. Born in Virginia and reared in Kentucky, he was converted in an 1801 camp meeting in the wake of the Cane Ridge Revival, after intense spiritual struggle over his "delight in horse-racing, card-playing and dancing." Made an exhorter the following year, he was ordained deacon in 1806 by Francis Asbury* and elder in 1808. He served several circuits in Kentucky and adjoining states before he requested transfer in 1824 (because of his distaste for slavery) to Illinois, where he served as presiding elder for forty-five years. He attended twelve general conferences and two Illinois legislatures. He was defeated by Abraham Lincoln in an 1846 race for Congress. Rough, uneducated, and eccentric, he possessed unusual stamina, a quick wit, clear perception of human nature, and profound devotion to the work of God. He wrote Fifty Years a Presiding Elder and his Autobiography (1857).

DONALD W. DAYTON

CARTWRIGHT, THOMAS (1535-1603). Puritan divine. Educated at Clare Hall, Cambridge (1547), he was then scholar at St. John's (1550), but had to leave on Mary's accession (1553). Returning after her death, he eventually became a major fellow of Trinity (1562). The Reformation doctrines and practice of St. John's—no surplice, etc.—spread to Trinity with Cartwright's encouragement, and in 1569 he was appointed Lady Margaret professor of divinity after a two-year absence as chaplain to the archbishop of Armagh. Particularly in his lectures on the first two chapters of Acts he compared the constitution and hierarchy of the Church of England most unfavorably with that of the early Christians. John Whitgift* as vice-chancellor deprived him of his chair (1570), and as master of Trinity deposed him from his fellowship (1571).

After some time in Geneva with Beza,* possibly as a professor of divinity, he returned to England in 1572, but left again the following year owing to the uproar ensuing on John Field's and Thomas Wilcox's Admonition to Parliament—a Presbyterian work with which he was in full agreement. While abroad at Heidelberg and Antwerp (where he ministered to the English congregation) he married the sister of John Stubbs* and produced an answer to the Reims NT (which was suppressed until 1618). On his illicit return in 1585 he was seized by Bishop John Aylmer,* but released and attacked in passing in the Marprelate Tracts.* A somewhat pedantic theorist, Cartwright grew alarmed when his followers tried to put his theories into practice, but showed a contemptuous indifference to John Greenwood and Henry Barrow, and separated himself from the Brownists.* Tried by the Court of High Commission in 1590, he was committed to the Fleet Prison for a time, but released through Burghley's intervention, and spent his last years in Warwick, "a rich and honoured patriarch" helping with the production of the Millenary Petition* (1603), but not surviving until the Hampton Court Conference.

CASAUBON, ISAAC (1559-1614). Classical scholar. Born at Geneva, the son of Huguenot* refugees, when the city was famous as a center of Greek scholarship, he studied under Francis Portus and succeeded him as professor of Greek in 1581. He went to Paris at the turn of the century and received a pension from Henry IV in return for duties in the royal library. On the king's death (1610), he resisted pressure to become a Roman Catholic, crossed to England, received a pension from James I, and was made a prebend of Canterbury (1611). He was employed to answer the historical defense of the papacy by Baronius,* and published various commentaries and critical editions, notably of Suetonius and Polybius.

JOHN TILLER

CASE, SHIRLEY JACKSON (1872-1947). Liberal church historian. Born in New Brunswick, Canada, he was educated at Acadia University, then studied theology at Yale. From 1908 to 1938 he taught NT and early church history at the University of Chicago Divinity School, and became dean there in 1933. He once remarked he was "born a liberal," and he contributed much to the development of the liberal "Chicago School" of theology. He rejected the supernatural element in Christian belief and attempted to explain the development of Christianity solely in terms of natural environmental influences. Among Case's many books are The Evolution of Early Christianity (1914), Jesus —A New Biography (1927), Bibliographical Guide to the History of Christianity (1931), and The Christian Philosophy of History (1943).

HARRY SKILTON

CASHEL, SYNOD OF (1171). A meeting of Irish bishops with a representative of Henry II of England to reform the Irish Church. It dealt with such matters as the collection of tithes, the paying of Peter's Pence* to Rome, the regulation of marriages, and baptisms. The archbishop of Armagh was recognized as primate of Ireland directly responsible to the pope, but in fact English dominance was obvious, for although no mention was made of the superiority of the archbishop of Canterbury, all native liturgies were replaced by that of the Church of England. This was another aspect of Henry II's conquest of Ireland.

CASSANDER, GEORG (1513-1566). Roman Catholic theologian who sought to mediate between Catholics and Protestants (especially Anabaptists). Born at Pitthem, near Bruges, he graduated from the Collège du Chateau, Louvain (1533), and taught literature at Ghent and Bruges. After a tour of Italy he enrolled (1544) in the theological faculty of Cologne, and in 1549 undertook both the teaching of theology and the direction of the newly formed academy of Duisberg. He joined in the programs of emperors Ferdinand I and Maximilian II to promote unity in the church (1561-66). His writings met with strong opposition from both sides, being accused of excessive tolerance and readiness for compromise. His chief work, De Officio Pii ac Publicae Tranquillitatis vere amantis viri in hoc Religionis Dissidio (1561), was submitted to the Colloquy of Poissy.* His writings were placed on the Index in 1617. J.G.G. NORMAN

CASSELS, WILLIAM WHARTON (1858-1925). Missionary bishop. He was one of the four Cambridge undergraduates who formed the nucleus of the "Cambridge Seven," the band of young men who went to China with the China Inland Mission in 1884, causing a sensation in Great Britain and the USA. After gaining experience in Shansi, Cassels went to Szechwan, western province of China (population 68,000,000), where Hudson Taylor* decided to establish a "Church of England" district. Cassels, an ordained Anglican, now took the lead in this new enterprise and in 1895 was consecrated first bishop in Szechwan by Archbishop Benson. The new diocese was under the joint sponsorship of the Church Missionary Society and the China Inland Mission.

LESLIE T. LYALL

CASSIAN, JOHN (d. c.433). Writer on asceticism. Brought up probably at Dobrudja (in modern Romania), he entered a Bethlehem monastery by 392. Leaving there for Egypt, he studied for seven years the aims and practices of ascetics, especially Paphnutius of Scete. On this experience he based the Collectiones Patrum (after 420). Made deacon at Constantinople about 402, he admired Chrysostom,* on whose downfall (405) he went to Rome, where he met Leo, who later invited him to refute Nestorius (De Incarnatione, 430). At Marseilles, Cassian founded a monastery and a nunnery about 415. In reply to a request from Bishop Castor of Apt for advice on Egyptian asceticism, he wrote the Institutes (425-30), which influenced the Benedictine* Rule and was regarded as an ascetic classic for centuries. Following Origen and Evagrius, he made contemplation of God with a pure mind and will his central aim. His methods were Bible study, withdrawal of the soul from ecclesiastical office or sex, striving to defeat the seven temptations and to shun the eight capital sins, and practicing humility and love. Beginners needed the set prayer and routine of a coenobium to stimulate this, but the acme lay with the silent, secluded anchorite.* Fear of idleness arising from omnipresent grace made him stimulate Gallic opposition to some aspects of Augustinianism (Collectio 13). G.T.D. ANGEL

CASSIODORUS, FLAVIUS MAGNUS AURELIUS (c.477-c.570). Roman noble, statesman, scholar, and monk. Under Theodoric the Great and the regency of Amalasuntha he was successively quaestor, consul, magister officiorum, and praetorian prefect. His official Variae (twelve books of imperial edicts and decrees) is an important source for knowledge of late Roman administration and of the Ostrogothic kingdom. After the collapse of Gothic rule he withdrew about 540 from Ravenna to the monastery he had built at Vivarium on his ancestral estate in Calabria on the shores of the Gulf of Squillace. He made his foundation a great center of secular and religious learning; he established the copying of manuscripts and helped to create the monastic tradition of preserving classical culture in the Dark Ages. His own Institutiones Divinarum et Saecularium Litterarum (550-60) was a classic, advocating the Augustinian fusion of secular and sacred learning in Christian education. The first part is an introduction to theological study, and the second a manual of studies on the seven liberal arts. He also wrote historical books and biblical commentaries. PETER TOON

CASSOCK. A long close-fitting black tunic worn by clergy under surplice or gown in church, or as ordinary attire, sometimes in the latter case with topcoat. It originated in the vestis talaris, or ankle-length dress, laid down for clergy by the Council of Braga in 572, and was retained despite the barbarian pressure for shorter garments in secular life. The Roman Catholic Church used to insist on its invariable use by all clergy, although overcoats were permitted, and the Anglican Canons of 1604 similarly insisted on the use of cassocks in public. In both churches a greater freedom is now implicitly allowed.

CASTELLIO, SEBASTIAN (1515-1563). Protestant theologian. Born in Savoy, he went to Geneva as a teacher, having met Calvin in Strasbourg. His disagreements with Calvin concerned several points (for example, the interpretation of Christ's descent into Hades); but Castellio particularly opposed Calvin's doctrine of predestination. Beza suggests there were personal grounds of disagreement also. When plague broke out in Geneva in 1542, Castellio was one of three volunteers—Calvin himself and Peter Blanchett were the two others—who offered to serve as pastor to a hospital treating plague victims. When lots were cast and Castellio was chosen, he refused to go. Calvin wanted to serve, but was prevented by the Senate from doing so. Castellio, piqued because Calvin had not commended his French translation of the NT, attacked some of the Reformed doctrines and insisted that the Song of Songs should be expunged from the canon as impure and obscene. There was, furthermore, ground for suspicion that Castellio had had a hand in some anonymous tracts against Calvin's teaching on predestination and particularly that he was responsible for a treatise published under the name of Martinus Bellius, with the title De non Puniendis Gladio Haereticis, opposing Calvin's view that the state should be responsible for the punishment of heretics. Castellio, who had been forced to leave Geneva and go to Basle, published there elegant French and Latin translations of the Bible.

CASUISTRY. The science of applying the standards of ethics, or moral principles, to bear on particular kinds of cases. The word is generally restricted to an established code, though it can refer to individual judgment. Its true, though difficult, function is to make the larger moral principles clear in the complexities of human situations. In theology and ethics it concerns questions of conduct and conscience. Its history includes the development of "universal private penance," evolving into a system of complete legal digests. The Jesuits of post-Reformation days used casuistry to defend conduct that appeared wrong to the intuition of common sense, developing "Probabilism,"* which held that an action may be justified if supported by the opinion of one Christian doctor.

GORDON A. CATHERALL

CASWALL, EDWARD (1814-1878). Hymnwriter. Son of an Anglican vicar, he was educated at Oxford, and after ordination was incumbent of Stratford-sub-Castle, Salisbury (1840-47). Having become a Roman Catholic, he joined J.H. Newman* at the Oratory, Edgbaston, in 1850. There he wrote most of his poetry. His translations of Latin hymns from the Roman Breviary, etc., are widely used: for example, "Bethlehem! of noblest cities"; "Hark, an awful voice is sounding"; "Jesu, the very thought of Thee"; and "My God, I love Thee—not because." Also much used in Christian worship are "See amid the winter's snow" (an original composition); "Glory be to Jesus" (from Italian); and "When morning gilds the skies" (from German). He published Lyra Catholica (1849); The Masque of Mary (1858); A May Pageant (1865); and Hymns and Other Poems (1863).

CATACOMBS (probably from Gr. kata kumbas, "at the ravine"). A term used for the subterranean Christian cemeteries whose origins go back to the first century A.D. They were labyrinths of underground galleries with connecting passages, often at more than one level. The majority of the excavations were carried out in the third and fourth centuries. Bodies were put into each of the spaces (loculi) hewn out of the rocky sidewalls. The loculi were then sealed by means of large marble slabs or tiles. Though catacombs existed in Paris, Asia Minor, Malta, and North Africa, Rome had the largest number. The latter have been extensively excavated in the nineteenth and twentieth centuries. This period of excavation was inspired by the work of such men as Adami, Raoul-Rochette, and Settele, and the classic work of G.B. de Rossi, Roma sotterranea cristiana (3 vols., 1864-77). About forty catacombs survive in an area of three miles around Rome, and they include those named after such saints as Callistus, Praetextatus, Sebastian, Domitilla, Agnes, Pancras, and Commodilla. Most are situated at the sides of the great Roman roads (e.g., the Via Appia) which led out of the city. Their excavation has brought to light many inscriptions, paintings, and sarcophagi. The earliest inscriptions, written in beautiful characters, are distinguished by their sober wording and the use of ancient symbols (e.g., the anchor and cross). Christian symbolism reached its most lofty expression in the third century, as is seen in the symbols of the dove, palm branch, fish, bread and basket. The fourth century saw the development of Christian epigraphy. Since burial grounds were regarded as sacrosanct in Roman law, Christians were able in times of persecution to worship in the catacombs. They also used them for services held on the anniversaries of martyrs. In order to provide sufficient air and light for the crowds who attended the services, shafts to the surface were constructed. Certain popes (e.g., Damasus, 366-84) encouraged the beautification of the catacombs—hence the first examples of Christian art date from this period. From the fifth century they were no longer used for burials, but services continued to be held. During the Middle Ages they seem to have been virtually forgotten.

CATECHESIS. Derived from Greek, this term described the teaching and instruction given to Christian catechumens who were being prepared for baptism in the early church. Later it was used also of the books containing this teaching—for example, the Catecheses of Cyril of Jerusalem.

CATECHISMS (Gr. katēcheō, "to teach, to instruct"). Probably from the second century onward, there came into use a "catechumenate," or period of instruction preparatory to baptism, and there grew up well-drilled quasi-liturgical procedures, including responsive material. Some of this was proper to the baptismal service itself (i.e., the interrogations and responses), but other features (e.g., the redditio symboli) came at an earlier stage. The universal use of infant baptism after the sixth century meant that basic instruction of this catechetical sort had to be given to young children within the church after their baptism rather than as a preparation for it. Thus, in England popular expositions of the Ten Commandments, the Creed, and the Lord's Prayer are found as far back as Anglo-Saxon times, and these formed the basis for the later, considerably elaborated, medieval manuals of instruction. The term "catechism" itself seems to be without primitive precedent, and evidently not until the Reformation was it used to mean specifically the documents setting out instruction by the responsive method—though it could and did mean simply any manual of instruction. These latter became particularly popular with the rise of printing in the latter half of the fifteenth century.

At the Reformation the term was employed by Luther to describe his Kleiner Katechismus (1529), and this meaning attaches to virtually all Protestant and Reformed use of the word thereafter. Luther's Catechism was based upon the Ten Commandments, the Creed, the Lord's Prayer, and the sacraments, and these became the staple components of Reformed instruction. Catechizing by this responsive method was a great instrument of reformation of the common people throughout Europe.

Three uses of the manuals may be discerned. One was simply instructional, applicable to all ages and classes. A second was preparatory for confirmation. In the pre-Reformation church the idea had grown up that confirmation should not be administered until "years of discretion." The Reformers grasped the concept as affording opportunity to teach every Christian while still in adolescence and as giving expression to their desire for intelligible theology purged of childish superstition. Thus Calvin cites some wholly mythical church history to make the case (Inst. IV.xix.4), and recommends the restoration of the same discipline (xix.13). Catechisms became linked in the Reformers' minds with a Reformed practice of confirmation; the English Reformers ensured that from 1549 to 1662 the catechism was actually included in the Prayer Book confirmation service.

A third use of catechisms is only slowly discernible. As the contents expanded to include detailed discussion of justification and other finer points of theology, the catechetical form tended to conceal a confessional purpose to the documents (cf. the Heidelberg Catechism, 1563, written by Olevianus and Ursinus, and revised by the Synod of Dort*). For this purpose the form was purely a literary convention, but catechisms, however elaborate, never served this purpose solely. With few books available and with widespread illiteracy, passages of great length and complexity were committed to memory by ordinary worshipers. Nevertheless, the catechisms tended to take their place among the formularies of the respective churches and to declare their public stance. The Church of England Catechism to this day is part of the Book of Common Prayer,* its doctrine being cited in detail in the famous heresy hearings of Gorham versus the bishop of Exeter (1846-50), and still included within the doctrine of the Church of England to which all ministers declare assent when they are ordained, instituted, or licensed. This catechism is much less confessional in appearance than other Reformation counterparts on the Continent (e.g., the catechisms of Calvin, Oecolampadius, Bullinger, etc.). The origins of the Prayer Book Catechism of 1549 appear to lie in William Marshall's Goodly Primer in English (1534), itself an approved version of a banned (more Lutheran) predecessor.

At the Hampton Court Conference* (1604), the Puritan impatience with the brevity of the Prayer Book provision led to Dr. Reinolds urging that, as Nowell's Catechism (1563) was too long, a uniform via media should be produced. The idea arose of adding a section on the sacraments to the Prayer Book one, and this was "penned" by Dean Overall. This is usually taken to mean he was the author, but he may have been the amanuensis of a small group working from Nowell's catechism, which obviously lies behind this section. The additions to the Prayer Book were made by royal proclamation (1604). At the 1661 Savoy Conference* this same section was cited by the Puritans as a model for the expansion and augmentation of the rest of the catechism. Their hopes were not fulfilled.

The seventeenth century saw the production of the most famous catechism of history—the Westminster Larger Catechism (1647). Closely related to the Westminster Confession of Faith and Shorter Catechism, this again combines the three uses of catechisms set out above and has become a foundation document of the English-speaking Presbyterian churches. It is obviously largely confessional in purpose, though in fact traditionally learned by heart by some. Less well known, because abortive, is Richard Baxter's own program for instruction and preparation in Confirmation and Restoration (1658). He follows Calvin in urging a laying on of hands, completing the course in catechizing and examination.

The use of the Church of England Catechism was the subject of visitation queries by many bishops in the century or more following 1662. In the nineteenth century the revival of a pastoral concept of confirmation led to increased use of the catechism, which persisted until the second quarter of the twentieth century. The Anglo-Catholics of the nineteenth century wrote their own catechisms, giving expression to the new emphases they had brought into the teaching of the Faith. Gradually, in the twentieth century, other teaching methods replaced learning by rote for confirmation preparation, and the catechism became an auxiliary aid to the teacher, not the verbal substance of the teaching, nor the basic procedure for instruction. The Convocations of the Church of England approved in 1962 A Revised Catechism (which includes questions on the church and ministry, the Anglican Communion, and, along with the sacraments, five other sacramental "ministries of grace"). This, perhaps because of its catechetical form, has not passed into general use or found widespread favor.

The Church of Rome also employed the printing press, this time to rebut the Reformers and confirm the faithful by way of catechisms. The great sixteenth-century work of this type is Canisius's Summa Doctrinae Christianae (1554). This had 211 questions and was in time issued in many different translations. Others have succeeded it to the present day, and catechizing is still used in the Church of Rome. There is, however, no one document in which instruction is mandatory prior to first confession, first Communion, or confirmation. One catechism of historical interest was the Irish Keenan's Catechism. This, in the editions prior to 1870, asked "Is then the Pope infallible?" and gave the answer "No, this is a Protestant calumny." The text was predictably changed after Vatican I.* There has been a tendency in the Church of Rome to call other teaching manuals "catechisms" even when not in catechetical form. Thus the Catechism of the Council of Trent (1566) is not in this sense a catechism at all, nor indeed is the recent Dutch avant-garde manual A New Catechism (1968).

CATECHIST. In the early church the word was used to describe the person who taught the catechesis* to the catechumens. Clement and Origen were famous Alexandrian catechists. In modern times it has been used (by missionaries) of native pastors, teachers, or preachers, and sometimes in the Western world of those who teach children the Christian faith—especially in the Roman Catholic Church.

CATECHUMENS. Converts to Christianity being prepared for baptism. In the early church there was a very thorough preparation before entrance into the privileges of church membership. According to the Apostolic Tradition of Hippolytus, the catechumenate was in two parts: a preliminary (often long) training in doctrine and ethics, followed by an intensive spiritual preparation immediately before baptism at Easter. The latter included fasting, prayer, and exorcism. After the time of Constantine the Great, the number of converts was too great to continue this lengthy preparation. After a brief period of teaching, those approved by the church had special spiritual preparation during Lent; this included prayer, fasting, and exorcism, and learning the Creed. No catechumen could share in the Eucharist until after baptism. The more widespread infant baptism became, the less there was heard of the catechumenate. It was finally compressed into a brief rite to be performed at the church door before the baptism of an infant (see e.g., the Latin Sarum rite and the 1549 English Prayer Book).

CATENA. The Latin word for "chain," it was originally used to describe biblical commentaries, from about A.D. 400 onward, in which portions of Scripture were explained by means of chains of sentences or paragraphs derived from earlier commentaries, without any personal comment by the compiler. Later it was used of collections of writings by different authors, which related to one topic—e.g., a gospel. Thomas Aquinas made a famous collection of the gospels, the Catena Aurea.

CATESBY, ROBERT (1573-1605). Originator of the Gunpowder Plot,* which he devised in 1603-4. Of a recusant* family in Warwickshire, his father having suffered in the second half of Elizabeth's reign for befriending Roman emissaries, Robert was educated at Douai and at Gloucester Hall—later part of Worcester College—Oxford, the recusant parallel to Peterhouse, Cambridge. On the death of his father in 1598 he became very rich, but suffered a heavy fine for his support of Essex's rebellion in 1601. After the failure of the Gunpowder Plot he fled to Holbeche in Staffordshire, where he was killed while allegedly resisting arrest.

CATHARI (Gr. katharoi, "pure ones"). An appellation assumed by third-century Novatianists,* but more usually associated with a widespread ascetic sect of medieval times. The latter probably arose in Armenia or the Balkans, possibly resulting from a fusion of Paulician and Euchite doctrines. In Bulgaria they were called Bogomiles,* in France Albigensians.* They spread to western Europe and were known in Orléans by 1017. Despite persecution they survived until the fourteenth century, when they succumbed to the Inquisition.* Their doctrines were akin to Manichaeism* and Gnosticism,* with elements such as dualism, universalism, Docetism, and metempsychosis. They were divided into two classes: credentes ("Believers") and perfecti. The latter received the baptism of the Spirit by the imposition of hands, called consolamentum, which removed original sin and restored immortality. They rejected marriage and sexual intercourse, practicing a rigid asceticism. From them were chosen bishops and priests. The credentes only had to promise to become perfecti before death, i.e., to receive the consolamentum. The endura, or ritual suicide, was sometimes permitted or recommended when the recipient of the consolamentum was seriously ill. Infant baptism and purgatory were rejected.

CATHARINUS AMBROSIUS (1485-1553). Dominican theologian and archbishop of Conza. Born at Siena with the name of Lancelotto Politi, he studied both canon and civil law before receiving a doctorate. Influenced by Savonarola,* he entered the Dominican House of San Marco at Florence in 1517, taking the name Ambrosius Catharinus (from the two names Ambrosius Sansedoni and St. Catherine). He wrote against Luther in 1520 with Apologia Pro Veritate Catholicae Ac Apostolicae Fidei. Luther responded with Ad Librum A. Catharinii Responsio, to which Catharinus replied with Excusatio Disputationis contra Lutherum. Later he even wrote against a fellow Dominican, Cardinal Cajetan*; this book, Annotationes, defended the doctrine of the Immaculate Conception. Another object of his literary skill was Bernardino Ochino, the friend of Peter Martyr. While living in France he published his Opuscula Magna (1542), which revealed that he was not afraid to deviate from Dominican orthodoxy on matters such as predestination, original sin, the Virgin Mary, etc. After taking a prominent part in the Council of Trent* he was made bishop of Minori in 1546 by Paul III and archbishop of Conza by Julius III in 1552.

PETER TOON

CATHEDRAL. A church which contains the throne or cathedra (Gr. = "chair") of the bishop of the diocese. In the early Christian basilicas the cathedra was placed at the center of the back of the apse behind the altar. From there the bishop presided at the celebration of the Eucharist and preached the sermon. The place where the bishop had his teaching chair assumed a special dignity in the eyes of his people, and gradually the "cathedral church" became the mother-church of the diocese.

At first the cathedral was always in the immediate vicinity of the bishop's residence, and its services were maintained by the bishop and his household of chaplains. But as the bishop came to be responsible for a greater area and his pastoral and administrative duties became more exacting, the care of the cathedral and its services were delegated to a separate body of clergy which developed into an ecclesiastical corporation or "chapter" with its own privileges and rights. Notably the chapter came to have the right of electing a new bishop when the see fell vacant. The bishop's relationship with "his" cathedral tended to become formal and distant, and he visited it only on special occasions.

A cathedral is not necessarily the largest or even the finest church in a diocese, but the term has come to connote a building of outstanding size, grandeur, or beauty. This is largely due to the immense amount of cathedral building undertaken in the Middle Ages, described by Jean Gimpel as "the cathedral crusade." Cathedrals were usually situated in towns, and during the Middle Ages such a town gradually increased in prosperity, size, and independence. It was natural that this should be reflected in the enlargement and enrichment, or rebuilding on a grander scale, of the principal church within its walls. In addition to the bishop's throne and the clergy's choir, the cathedral included a nave for the people. Guild business and even buying and selling took place there. At Chartres the transepts of the cathedral served as a kind of labor exchange, and the crypt was always open for the shelter of pilgrims and the sick. The cathedral of Amiens with an area of over 84,000 square feet could accommodate the town's entire population of over 10,000. The legacy of this era is a large number of buildings of great size and grace, and also a feeling that Gothic is the "natural" style of architecture for churches in general and especially for cathedrals. In the USA, recent cathedrals such as St. John the Divine, New York, are built in this style. In England, the new Roman Catholic Cathedral in Liverpool is an attempt to break free from both the style and the arrangement of the Gothic cathedral.

Cathedral worship is often characterized by the beauty and elaborateness of the music. Many cathedrals maintain schools where choirboys are trained in music besides receiving a general education.

CATHERINE DE' MEDICI (1519-1589). French queen and regent. As a relative of Pope Clement VII she became a pawn of the rivalry between the Hapsburg and Valois monarchs, resulting in her marriage to Francis I's son, Henry. In 1547 she became queen of France. Widowed by 1559, Catherine, first as queen mother and after 1560 as regent of France, was deeply involved in the political intrigues associated with the Wars of Religion. Notable was her calling of the Colloquy of Poissy,* and her move toward toleration for the Huguenots* (whose support she even sought). This made the latter more militant and led to civil war. In 1568 she abandoned her policy of toleration and, partially due to her jealousy over Coligny's growing influence over her son, Charles IX, plotted the infamous St. Bartholomew's Day massacre* (1572), for which she accepted full responsibility. She was a typical woman of the Renaissance courts: desiring power, given to intrigue, ruthless, a great patron of the arts and letters, but with little understanding of religious conviction.

CATHERINE OF ALEXANDRIA. Virgin and martyr. According to Simeon Megaphrastes in the tenth century, she defended the faith at Alexandria before philosophers and courtiers, and was tortured to death by "Maxentius" the emperor. A corpse disinterred by monks on Mt. Sinai in the eighth or ninth century, the legend continues, had been transported there by angels from Alexandria. In 1063 the Order of the Knights of Mt. Sinai was formed to protect her relics and observe the Rule of St. Basil. Their emblem was a broken spiked wheel. Historical detail forbids her identification with the anonymous Christian lady of Alexandria in Eusebius HE 8.15.

CATHERINE OF GENOA (1447-1510). She was born Caterinetta Fieschi, daughter of a distinguished Guelph family. For diplomatic reasons her brother arranged her marriage in 1463 to Giuliano Adorni, the headstrong and pleasure-loving son of an equally distinguished Ghibelline family. In 1474 she was suddenly converted and persuaded her husband to release her from the obligations of their marriage. While Giuliano entered the Third Order of the Franciscans, Catherine worked with the Ladies of Mercy in the care of the hopelessly ill in the hospital of St. Lazarus in Genoa. Her teaching, which grew out of her own remarkable spiritual experiences, was recorded in her Dialogues on the Soul and the Body and her Treatise on Purgatory. She fasted regularly and received Communion every day, a practice unusual for lay Christians in the fifteenth century. In her later life she took Cattaneo Marabotto as her confessor and spiritual director. She remained in Genoa as the rector of the hospital, nursing her own husband in his last illness (1497-98). She was canonized in 1737.

DAVID C. STEINMETZ

CATHERINE OF SIENA (1347-1380). Dominican tertiary.* She had a vision when she was seven, when she vowed her virginity to Christ. She became a Dominican tertiary in 1364/5, and from 1368 to 1374 lived in Siena, gathering a circle, clerical and lay, around her, who gave rise to her well-known letters on many subjects. In 1375 interest in a crusade took her to Pisa, where she also received the stigmata. In 1376, at the request of the Florentines, she journeyed to Avignon to meet with Gregory XI. While unsuccessful in her attempts to help the church's Babylonian Captivity,* she did figure in Gregory's decision to have the Curia removed to Rome that year. After the Great Schism* in 1378 the rest of her life was spent in Rome working toward unity in support of Urban VI. She went about fearlessly, and her political involvements were always for spiritual ends. Bearing the unmistakable marks of her order, and having always its protection in her worldly associations, she and Francis of Assisi* were named the chief patron saints of Italy by Pius XII in 1939. A Dialogue of four treatises was her testament, and Augustine and Bernard were for her as significant sources as Aquinas. She was canonized in 1461. A complete edition of her letters (4 vols., ed. N. Tommasèo), was published in Florence in 1860.

CATHERINE OF SWEDEN (1331-1381). The daughter of Bridget of Sweden,* she succeeded her mother as head of the Brigittine Order, and under Catherine the order was confirmed. Her attempt to secure the canonization of her mother, however, came to nothing. She was an ally of Catherine of Siena* and supported Urban VI and his followers during the Great Schism.

CATHOLIC (Gr. katholikos, "according to the whole," hence "general"). In Ignatius the church was "wherever Jesus Christ is present." Thereafter no definition for the term more completely summarizes both its intent and the inherent problems that emerge therefrom than does the usage of Vincent of Lérins* (fifth century): "that which has been believed everywhere, always, by everyone"—a condition which historically has never been met. By analogy the concept appears also in the Athanasian Creed* applied to the Christian faith itself, but even earlier the church had been referred to as "one, holy, catholic, and apostolic." Subsequent, more limited, understanding of "catholic" has separated the Roman Church from those protesting for its reform, the Western Church from its Eastern counterpart called "ecumenical" or "orthodox," and an assumed orthodoxy from an assumed heterodoxy which, as in Valentinian practice, also dared to use the term.
CLYDE CURRY SMITH

CATHOLIC ACTION. Organized activity by Roman Catholic laity seeking to influence public affairs. It received strong impetus in the pontificate of Pius XI, whose first encyclical Ubi Arcano (23 December 1922) encouraged the new lay organizations like Azione Cattolico in Italy, Jocists in Belgium and France, the Legion of Mary in Ireland, the Grail Movement in Holland. There were notable confrontations between Catholic Action and Fascism in Italy in 1931.

CATHOLIC APOSTOLIC CHURCH. The first decades of the nineteenth century saw an increasing dissatisfaction with the oversimplified Gospel of the earlier evangelical movement. The quest for a more experimental faith and a fuller biblical exegesis led to greater emphasis on the work of the Holy Spirit, ecclesiology, and prophecy. These subjects were of major interest to such orthodox churchmen as Haldane Stewart, Hugh MacNeil, and William Marsh, who together with Edward Irving* and many others attended at Henry Drummond's* invitation the Conferences for Biblical Study at Albury Park, Surrey, in 1826. The Catholic Apostolic Church grew out of the fact that under Irving's influence many attending these meetings came to believe that the special gifts of the apostolic age were a permanent endowment of the church, restrained only by the faithlessness of later Christians.

In 1830 Mary Campbell (later Mrs. Caird), of Fernicarry in J.M. Campbell's* parish of Row, and James and Margaret Macdonald of Port Glasgow spoke in tongues and experienced miraculous healing. Great interest was shown among Drummond's friends, and in 1831 similar gifts appeared in Irving's congregation in Regent Square, London. The church which Irving founded in Newman Street after his repudiation by the London Presbytery became "a rallying point of millennial expectation," though his own influence on the community declined as he had declared the utterances in his congregation to be the authoritative voice of the Holy Spirit.

The conviction that the Day of the Lord was near dictated the new community's structure. In 1832, under prophetic direction, twelve latter-day apostles (including Drummond, but not Irving) were recognized. These, together with the original Twelve, were expected to occupy the twenty-four thrones of Revelation 4. The "Restored Apostolate's" mission was to warn the church of the impending Second Coming and to heal her schisms. In 1836 their testimony was delivered to King William IV and the Anglican hierarchy, and in 1838 the apostles and their assistants delivered similar memoranda in the different regions of Christendom overseas.

In the face of almost complete apathy, the community developed elaborate ritual involving the Real Presence, Perpetual Reservation, Holy Water, etc., together with the distinctive sacrament of Sealing by which members were numbered among the 144,000 of Revelation 7 and would thus escape the Great Tribulation. The movement spread on the Continent as well as in England, but in theory at least did not withdraw from other ecclesiastical bodies. Rather, they regarded themselves as an order within the church universal. Attempts were made on the Continent to come to terms with the death of the Apostles (see NEW APOSTOLIC CHURCH), but the movement is now almost nonexistent, as the 144,000th witness has been sealed.

The striking similarity between the Catholic Apostolics and the Tractarians* must be noted. Not only is there a common abandonment of traditional Protestant austerity in favor of ritualism and a fuller ecclesiology, but also a response to the experimental and intuitive emphases of the Romantic movement (cf. Irving's connections with Coleridge). Likewise, both had very little use for social reform. There are also several personal links between the movements—e.g., Joseph Wolff, Gladstone's* respect for Irving, H.J. Owen's influence on churchmen (see The Guardian, 25 March 1863).

CATHOLICOS. Basically an adjective denoting "general, universal," it naturally became a title, both secular ("supervisor of accounts") and ecclesiastical ("archbishops," "heads of monastic houses"). Today the title has become limited in use to certain patriarchs: among Orthodox, the head of the Georgian Church; among Monophysite churches, the head of the Armenian (Gregorian) Church, and the Armenian patriarch of Sis; among Nestorians (Assyrians), "catholicos of the East"; and among Roman Catholics, the heads of the Uniate Armenians, and of the Uniate Nestorians (Chaldeans).

CATON, WILLIAM (1636-1665). Quaker. He was convinced in 1652, when George Fox* first visited Swarthmore Hall on the edge of the Lake District, where Caton was companion to Margaret Fell's son George. Caton soon became a Publisher of Truth, traveling at first in the company of John Stubbs.* They went to Kent and converted Samuel Fisher, the notable Baptist pastor at Folkestone. They were imprisoned briefly at Maidstone. In 1655 they made the first important visit by Quakers to the Continent. Caton spent much of his remaining life in Holland and also visited Scotland. His autobiography, edited by Fox, was published in 1689. A collection of early Quaker letters put together by Caton has apparently now been lost. JOHN TILLER

CAUSSADE, JEAN PIERRE DE (1675-1751). French mystical writer and preacher. He joined the Jesuit order in 1693 and worked in Lorraine, Perpignan, Albi, and Toulouse. He was the last of the seventeenth-century mystical school, struggling to bring mysticism out from under the cloud induced by the condemnation of Quietism.* In Instructions spirituelles en forme de dialogue sur les divers états d'oraison (1741), he used the authority of J.B. Bossuet,* who had played the leading part in the condemnation of Quietism, in an attempt to rehabilitate the mystical approach. He also wrote L'Abandon à la Providence divine, an influential book concerned with "the sacrament of the present moment," consisting first of his teaching and second of a series of letters of spiritual direction addressed to nuns of The Visitation of Mercy. His manuscript notebooks were passed from hand to hand, and the work was first published in 1867 (ET 1921). His work has a continuing influence. HOWARD SAINSBURY

CAVASILAS, NIKOLAOS (c.1320-1371). Greek theological and mystical writer. He was born in Thessalonica of an aristocratic family, and although his father's name was Chamaetos, he is known by the more famous surname of his mother and his uncle. After an early political career linked with the pretender John VI Cantacuzenus, his public activity waned with the latter's abdication; we know little of his life after 1354, although his friends sought his participation in affairs. It is uncertain whether he was ordained. His best-known works are treatises on Life in Christ and The Exposition of the Divine Liturgy in which he expounds the saving work of Christ mediated through the sacraments, especially the Eucharist, appropriated by the believer steadfast in his adherence. J.N. BIRDSALL

CAVEN, WILLIAM (1830-1904). Canadian Presbyterian leader. He went to Canada from Scotland in 1847, graduated in theology from Knox College, Toronto, was ordained to the Presbyterian ministry (1852), and did parish work before becoming professor of exegetical theology at Knox in 1866. He was principal there, 1873-1904. Strongly ecumenical, president of the Pan-Presbyterian Alliance (1900-1904), leader in the Evangelical Alliance, and active in missions, he was an architect of the future United Church of Canada. When he was moderator of the general assembly in 1875, there came union with the Church of Scotland, forming the Presbyterian Church in Canada. A number of his papers were published posthumously as Christ's Teaching concerning the Last Things (1908).

CAXTON, WILLIAM (c.1422-1491). First English printer. Born in Kent, he was apprenticed to a cloth dealer in the City of London in 1438 and very soon was sent to Bruges for his employer. In 1446 he set up in business on his own in Bruges and became the leader of the English business community there. He began to travel widely in Europe and developed a literary interest which led him to begin translating books into English. In 1471 he finished his first translation and decided to learn the new skill of printing in order to produce his own books. After studying the technique, either in Cologne or Bruges, he set up a printing press in Bruges. In 1476 he returned to Britain and set up his press (probably the same one he had had in Bruges) in the precincts of Westminster. The first book he printed in England was the Sayings of the Philosophers, and this reflected his wide literary interest. From 1477 to 1491 he was continuously busy printing and translating at Westminster. Among the early books he printed were Chaucer's Canterbury Tales and Malory's King Arthur (1485). In fourteen years he printed 18,000 folio pages, making up altogether eighty separate books; he also translated twenty-one volumes, mostly from French and Dutch. During this period he designed and put into use six fonts of type of the Gothic style.

CECILIA. Virgin and martyr. She is mentioned in several Western breviaries and missals. A church of St. Caecilia housed a council at Rome in 498. According to Fortunatus of Poitiers in the sixth century, she died in Sicily between 176 and 180, but her Acta given by Simeon Megaphrastes, the tenth century legendist, sets her death at Rome when Urban was bishop (220-30). Her first clear association with music was in 1584, when Pius V put a new academy of music under her protection.

CEDD (Cedda) (d.664). Bishop of the East Saxons. A Northumbrian, he was with his brother Chad one of the twelve pupils of Aidan* on Lindisfarne. In 653 he was sent by King Oswy of Northumbria to evangelize Mercia by permission of the heathen King Penda. Next year he was sent to Essex and consecrated bishop of the East Saxons. He built a number of churches and founded two monasteries. On a return visit to Northumbria he founded the abbey at Lastingham, Yorkshire, and became its first abbot. He was present as one of the Celtic representatives at the Synod of Whitby in 663/4 and accepted the verdict in favor of Roman customs.

CELESTINE I (d.432). Bishop of Rome from 422. Soon after he succeeded Boniface I, he was in controversy with African bishops. When Apiarius,* a deposed African cleric, requested reinstatement, Celestine complied, sending the unpopular legate Faustinus to execute the decision. A Council of Carthage about 424 dismissed Faustinus, asking Celestine to obey Nicene canons and to support the decisions of local bishops. Celestine opposed heresy and irregularity. In 425 the emperors expelled heretics from Rome. He censured bishops around Marseilles for allowing priests to teach doctrines opposing Augustine. Others, in Vienne and Narbonnensis, he criticized for electing monastic bishops and for ascetic clerical dress (428). He sent Germanus of Auxerre to England (429) to counter Pelagianism,* and he closed Novatianist* churches at Rome. In 430 he empowered Cyril of Alexandria* to execute a ten-day ultimatum on Nestorius. Although his representatives were absent from most of the Council of Ephesus (431), his approval of its decisions later earned Celestine the reputation of having presided with Cyril. G.T.D. ANGEL

CELESTINE III (c.1106-1198). Pope from 1191. A follower in his youth of Abelard,* he had built up a reputation by the time he became pope as a learned theologian, good administrator, and irenic negotiator. He was anxious to avoid a conflict with the empire for political supremacy. Thus he was willing to crown Henry VI as emperor in 1191, and though relations became strained because of Henry's Italian ambitions, they never completely collapsed. He accepted Henry's clever promise to lead a Crusade in 1195, but made sure it had a wide political base by having it preached in other countries. He prevented a marriage of Alfonso IX of Leon within the prohibited degrees, and he refused to agree with the French bishops' nullification of Philip Augustus's marriage. Administratively he improved the Curia, and the Liber censuum—a survey of all property dependent on Rome—was taken. He continued the extension of papal jurisdiction particularly by using delegate-judges to hear disputed cases.
C. PETER WILLIAMS

CELESTINE V (1215-1296). Pope in 1294. A noted hermit, he had founded a community of disciples later called the Celestines.* His election as pope was a conscious attempt to raise the spiritual tone of the papacy, debilitated by political involvement in the War of the Vespers. The inexperienced Celestine, however, soon became the tool of Charles II of Naples, appointing twelve cardinals of Charles's choice, placing his nominees in the papal states, and taking up residence in Naples. Administratively the church slipped into great confusion. Having been made aware of his own failings, Celestine had the spirituality and humility to resign at the end of 1294. He was succeeded by an opposite in every way—Boniface VIII, who, fearing conspiracy around the former pope, had him imprisoned until he died in 1296. Celestine was canonized in 1313.
C. PETER WILLIAMS

CELESTINES (Celestinians). An order of hermits who adopted the Rule of St. Benedict about 1251 (see BENEDICTINES). When their leader Peter of Morrone became Pope Celestine V in 1294, his monks took the name of Celestinians. Their discipline was severe. Celestine V introduced them into Monte Cassino, from which monastery they were removed by Boniface VIII. The order increased rapidly, spreading into France and Germany. At one time there were 150 priories. The German priories perished during the Reformation. In the early eighteenth century there were ninety-six houses in Italy and twenty-one in France, though the French Celestinians were suppressed by a commission in 1766. In 1785 the last surviving house at Calavino, near Trent, was closed. An attempt to revive the order in the nineteenth century met with no success.
JAMES TAYLOR

CELESTIUS (early fifth century). Associate of Pelagius.* Probably an African, he deserted the Roman bar about 400 for Pelagius's reform movement, accompanying him in 409-10 to Sicily and Carthage, where Pelagius left him hoping for ordination. He received instead in 411 the first Catholic condemnation of a "Pelagian," for teaching that Adam's mortality was independent of his sin, which in turn injured only himself, so that the newborn enjoy Adam's condition prior to the Fall. Infants are baptized in order to obtain sanctification or the kingdom, not remission of sins. His denial that transmission of sin was de fide challenged African tradition, which was also sensitive about baptism. Withdrawing to Ephesus, Celestius acquired ordination, but here and at Constantinople African denunciation hounded him, and further condemnation followed in absentia at the Palestinian synod of Diospolis in 415, with Pelagius, unconcerned about infant baptism, partly disavowing his opinions. Back in Rome in 417, Celestius appealed personally to the vacillating Pope Zosimus,* but in 418 Emperor Honorius expelled the Pelagian troublemakers and papal reprobation was reaffirmed. In 428/9 he secured refuge in Nestorius's Constantinople, but Marius Mercator's Memorandum on the Name of Celestius heralded imperial exile and conciliar condemnation at Ephesus in 431, after which he vanished from sight. Augustine preserves much of his Definitions on Sinlessness and Statement of Faith (to Zosimus). Lost works included The Monastic Life and a Book against Original Sin. He was a successful propagandist, tenacious and candid. His theology owed much to Rufinus "the Syrian."*

CELIBACY, CLERICAL. The Roman Catholic practice of requiring its clergy to remain permanently unmarried and devoted to personal purity in thought and deed. The NT seems to be ambivalent on the subject of marriage. On the one hand, some of the apostles were married (Matt. 8:14; 1 Cor. 9:5), and Paul recommended marriage for the leaders of churches (1 Tim. 3:1), but on the other hand, the values of virginity are stressed. Besides the examples of Christ, Mary, and John the Baptist, there are (1) the teaching of our Lord that celibacy is a way of consecrating oneself to God (Matt. 19:12, 19) and (2) the statements of Paul that celibacy is the condition for a more fervent consecration to God because it avoids earthly entanglements and prepares the soul for the coming of Christ (1 Cor. 7:26-35). The idea developed early in the church's history that the unmarried state was preferable. During the fourth century most of the bishops in Greece, Egypt, and western Europe were unmarried or left their wives after consecration. Still, priests and deacons married and no law was passed prohibiting clerical marriage during the first three centuries of the Christian era.

In the East, the sixth and seventh centuries saw laws enacted which forbade the marriage of bishops. (If he were already married before consecration, he had to put his wife away in a distant monastery.) Yet the lower orders of clergy were allowed to marry. Celibacy in the Western Church became a canonical obligation for the clergy through the combined efforts of the popes and regional church councils. The earliest canonical statement, canon 33 of the Council of Elvira (c.305), states: "We decree that all bishops, priests, and deacons, and all clerics engaged in the ministry are forbidden entirely to live with their wives and to beget children: whoever shall do so shall be deposed from the clerical dignity." Later Hosius* of Cordova attempted unsuccessfully to have this decree enacted by the Council of Nicea. If the ecumenical council would not act, the pope would, and the decretals of Damasus I, Siricius, Innocent I, and Leo I enjoin the clergy to celibacy. Other local councils in Africa, France, and Italy issued decrees enforcing this practice.

After the fall of the Carolingian empire there was a movement away from clerical celibacy, but with the Hildebrandine reform of the eleventh century a new ascetic spirit came to the church. Gregory VII, for whom this movement is named, struggled with great zeal to restore sacerdotal celibacy. Even after his time, however, there was a considerable gap between theory and practice with regard to this requirement.

The Protestant Reformers did not value celibacy. Calvin taught that it should not be judged of greater value than the married state, and he protested the despising of marriage by writers such as Jerome. The Council of Trent* (1545-63) reaffirmed the teaching of clerical celibacy, but it stated that this was enjoined on the clergy by the law of the church and not by the law of God. Currently, the Roman Church feels celibacy is useful for ministers as it gives them greater freedom in the service of God, but it also states the church may abrogate this rule if it chooses.

CELL. Since 1945 this word has been increasingly used to describe a small group of Christians in any given locality who meet, usually in private homes, for prayer, Bible study, and fellowship, in order to equip themselves for Christian service in their everyday lives. Traditionally, however, a cell denotes one of three things: first, the private room, usually scantily furnished, of the member (monk or nun) or a religious order; second, the dwelling place of a hermit; third, a small religious house dependent on a larger convent or monastery.

CELSUS (second century). Author of the first known philosophical and religious critique of Christianity, entitled The True Doctrine. Writing during a persecution (177-80?) and perhaps reacting against Justin Martyr,* he debunks Judaism, Christ, and Christians, some of whom he met at Rome or Alexandria. Despite an allusion to conservation of matter, there is not enough internal evidence to identify him with the Epicurean friend of Lucian of Samosata. Only Origen's reply, Contra Celsum, written just before the Decian persecution (249-51) provides evidence of Celsus. Platonic philosophical monotheism combines in Celsus with Greco-Roman ancestral polytheism to produce an unknown and unmoving supreme God, who has set various demons over human experience. True religion is demonstrated both by concentrating the soul on God and by propitiating the traditional cultic demons on whom depend the empire and the everyday functions of life. Worship and service are therefore due to their agent the emperor, by celebrating public feasts, holding public office, and joining the army. On these presuppositions Celsus makes his main criticism of contemporary Christians. Further, his Platonic conception of soul and body, his pantheism, and comparative study of religions make him reject, sometimes through misconception or misrepresentation, the Christian doctrines of Creation, man, the Incarnation, the unique character and ministry of Christ, and the Resurrection.

CELTIC CHURCH. The church which existed in parts of the British Isles before the mission of Augustine (597) and which maintained its independence for some time in competition with the Anglo-Roman Church. Little is known of the introduction of Christianity into Britain, but by the fourth century it was sufficiently organized to send representatives to the Synod of Arles (314) and the Council of Arminum (359). The Pelagian heresy spread to the Celtic Church, and Germanus of Auxerre visited England to try to combat it (429). Monasticism came to the Celts by way of Gaul, illustrating further the contacts the church had with the Continent.

This was changed by the Saxon invasions about 450, which isolated the British Church from continental life and resulted in the extermination of Christianity in England. It survived only in remote areas of the British Isles. When Augustine's mission reestablished contacts with Rome, the Celtic Christians argued with the Romans over such matters as the calculation of the date of Easter and variants of tonsure. These differences were settled at the Synod of Whitby* (663/4) resulting in a victory for the Roman practices.

The Celtic Church under the leadership of missionaries such as Ninian* (c.400) and Patrick* (c.440-61) featured the monastery under the abbot, rather than the bishop's diocese, as the unit of ecclesiastical organization. Each monastery served a single tribe. The abbot was a tribal leader, and the bishop was a subordinate official in the monastery whose duties were wholly spiritual. The leaders and heroes of this movement equaled the ascetic extremes of the early founders of monasticism. A typical act of self-mortification involved standing for long periods of time immersed to the head in an icy stream. Another characteristic of the Celtic monastic life was an emphasis on missionary work. The highest service to Christ was lifelong exile to evangelize foreign lands. Thus the Celts sent out men like Columbanus* (585-615), who preached in France, Switzerland, and N Italy. The Celts also encouraged scholarship and had a rich artistic tradition, particularly in sculpture and the illumination of manuscripts.

CENOBITES (Coenobites). The word is derived through Latin from the Greek meaning "common life." Monks within a community or order are cenobites and thus distinguished from anchorites or hermits.

CERDO. The predecessor of Marcion,* he came to Rome from Syria, according to Epiphanius, about 137-41. Irenaeus continues that he publicly professed orthodoxy, but taught heresy in secret until he separated from the congregation. He taught that the OT God is known and righteous, while the Father of the Lord Jesus Christ is unknown and good. Later writers expand or contradict Irenaeus, making Cerdo a Docetic* believing in the resurrection of the soul and presaging the canon of Marcion.

CERINTHUS (c.100). Heretic who lived in Asia Minor. His theology appears to have been a combination of Ebionite theology with Gnostic speculation. The world, he taught, was not the creation of the Supreme God, but that of an inferior angel who held the world in bondage. According to him, Jesus was a normal man, the son of Joseph and Mary, who differed from ordinary men only in greater wisdom and righteousness. He was chosen by the Supreme God to proclaim Him and release the world from its bondage. For this task the Christ descended upon him at his baptism in the form of a dove, sent from the Father. This Christ departed from Jesus before his crucifixion, and it was only Jesus who suffered and rose again. Cerinthus taught also a carnal doctrine of the Millennium, in that at his coming Jesus would introduce 1,000 years of sensuous pleasure before the consummation. According to the Alogi,* Cerinthus was the author of the gospel of John and the Apocalypse.

CERULARIUS, MICHAEL (d.1059). Patriarch of Constantinople. Under his direction the final severing between the Eastern and Western churches took place, often referred to as the Great Schism of 1054. Differences between Rome and Constantinople did not originate under his regime, but went back over many centuries. The patriarch brought to his office the ability to use political power to his end. Constantine Monachus, who was emperor at the time, was negotiating with Pope Leo IX concerning the defense of S Italy against the Normans. As a part of the deal the emperor of Constantinople agreed to give back the southern Italian churches to the jurisdiction of the papacy. When Patriarch Cerularius found out about these negotiations, he decided to flex his power against the weak emperor. He began by trying to force the Latin churches in Constantinople to use Greek language and practices. When they refused in the year 1052, he closed them down.

The ritual divergences which were used as the excuse for this became the focal points of the dispute. The real issues which had been dividing them and are still dividing them, such as the equation of the papacy and the Holy Spirit, remained beneath the surface at the time of the schism. The papacy apparently got the message that Cerularius was reacting to the capitulation of the Byzantine emperor to Rome. This led to an extreme assertion of papal authority to which, of course, Cerularius reacted. When the legates came from Leo, Cerularius refused to see them—so they excommunicated him. The patriarch in turn excommunicated those who had come representing the pope. Thus the division was complete.

GEORGE GIACUMAKIS, JR.

CESARINI, JULIAN (1398-1444). Cardinal-bishop of Tusculum and papal legate. Born of a distinguished Roman family, he entered the service of the papal court and carried out several important missions. In 1419 he was in Bohemia on a mission against the Hussites; in 1425 he represented the pope in France and in 1426 in England. In that year also he was created cardinal. He was present, as papal legate, at Domazlice in 1431 when the Czechs defeated the German princes. He was appointed by Martin V to be president of the Council of Basle. The rout at Domazlice convinced him of the need for a general council to deal with Hussitism. He tried to persuade Eugenius IV to cooperate with the council, but after the council divided and moved to Ferrara, he played a leading part in the negotiations for union between the Roman and Greek churches. Cesarini went to Hungary in 1442 to preach the crusade against the Turks. In 1444, due to his influence, the Peace of Szegedin was repudiated by King Ladislaus. In the renewed war, Cesarini, along with Vladyslav III, king of Poland and Hungary, was killed at the final, fatal battle of Varna in Bulgaria.

JAMES TAYLOR

CHAD (Ceadda) (d.672). Bishop of Lichfield. A Northumbrian, he was with his brother Cedd* one of the twelve pupils of Aidan* on Lindisfarne. In 664 he succeeded Cedd as abbot of Lastingham, Yorkshire. Because of Wilfrid's* dallying in France when he had gone there to be consecrated as bishop of York, King Oswy of Northumbria had Chad appointed to that see. After Wilfrid's return Theodore of Tarsus, archbishop of Canterbury, ruled the appointment was irregular, and in 669 Chad returned to Lastingham. The same year, King Wulfhere of Mercia asked Theodore for a bishop, and Chad was sent. He made his see at Lichfield. Chad was noted, like many others for whom Lindisfarne was a spiritual home, for his humility, his devotion, his teaching ability, and his missionary journeys. R.E. NIXON

CHADERTON, LAURENCE (1538?-1640). English Puritan leader. Born into a wealthy Catholic family in Lancashire, he studied at Christ's College, Cambridge. When he came under extreme Protestant influences and adopted Puritanism, his father disowned him. He managed, however, to take his degree, in 1567, and to become a fellow of the college. As a tutor he was a success, but his fame rested on his preaching. For nearly fifty years he served as the afternoon lecturer at St. Clement's, and through the influence of his preaching many young men began to study the Bible and practice godliness. When Sir Walter Mildmay decided to found Emmanuel College in 1584, it was Chaderton whom he persuaded to become master. The purpose of the foundation was to train "godly ministers," and this Chaderton did. The college became a center of church Puritanism. Chaderton represented the Puritans at the Hampton Court Conference* and was connected with the translation of the Authorized Version of the Bible (1611). In 1622 he gave up the mastership of Emmanuel, but survived till he was over a hundred. His published works are few, but his influence on Puritanism was great.

PETER TOON

CHAFER, LEWIS SPERRY (1871-1952). American Presbyterian clergyman and educator. Born at Rock Creek, Ohio, he was educated at New Lyme Academy and at Oberlin College and Conservatory, and he entered the ministry as a gospel singer and evangelist. In 1900 he was ordained to the Congregational ministry, but after three years changed his affiliation to Presbyterian when he became professor of music at Mount Hermon School for Boys. When C.I. Scofield* helped to found Philadelphia School of the Bible (1914), Chafer joined the school as professor and remained there until moving to Dallas, Texas, in 1923. He was pastor of Scofield Memorial Church there (1923-27) and in 1924 founded Dallas Theological Seminary, where until his death Chafer served as president and professor of theology. He also edited the journal Bibliotheca Sacra. He is best known today for his eight-volume Systematic Theology (1947)—a most detailed discussion of the dispensational premillennial system of theology. BRUCE L. SHELLEY

CHALCEDON, COUNCIL OF (451). Held in the martyry of Euphemia, it was summoned by Marcian and Valentinian and attended by bishops from the civil dioceses of Oriens, Asia, Pontus, Thrace, Egypt, and Illyricum. Legates represented Leo of Rome, who like most Western bishops feared the Huns too much to travel far. Including two refugee Africans and a Persian, no more than 340 attended at one time, although 450 subscriptions were made. The emperors sought a common declaration between the Eastern bishops in accord with the creeds of Nicea and Constantinople, canonical epistles of Cyril, and the Tome of Leo. Thus the imperial commissioners resisted the scruples of bishops who feared to add to the faith and insisted on a new formulary, the Definitio, drawn up within the biblical and patristic tradition (see CHALCEDON, DEFINITION OF).

The immediate rift had centered on Eutyches, condemned at Constantinople under Flavian and reinstated at the Ephesian synod (449) dominated by Dioscorus of Alexandria. At Chalcedon, Dioscorus was deposed, ostensibly for uncanonical action, although in effect his teaching was ostracized by conciliar support of the Tome. Theodoret and Ibas of Edessa, tending towards Nestorian teaching, were restored, but the earlier condemnation of Nestorius remained. The fall of the Alexandrian patriarch favored the see of Constantinople. Bishop Anatolius in committee steered preparation of the Definitio, and several canons proceeded to boost his authority. Either the bishop of Constantinople or the exarch of a diocese became the final appeal court in disputes involving (Eastern) metropolitans. Canon 28 confirmed Constantinople canon 3 correlating ecclesiastical honor with political importance, to the disgust of Rome and Alexandria. Further, Constantinople received the right to ordain metropolitans in the dioceses of Thrace, Asia, and Pontus as well as bishops among barbarian peoples.

Several canons reflect current affairs. Gang conspiracy, false accusation, and plunder directed against bishops were forbidden. Redundant clergy should not congregate at Constantinople. Clergy should not minister outside their local churches nor bishops outside their sees except as visitors bearing commendatory letters. Monks and clergy should not do state or secular work. Bishops should control the movements of monks and clergy. Other canons simply aim for good order. Clerical appointment is regulated, e.g., by opposing sinecure ordination. Marriage is forbidden after taking vows or orders. Episcopal churches should have short vacancies, a proper sequestration fund, and a financial steward. In new cities parochial division should follow the civil model.

Unity was not achieved. Rome rejected canon 28. Monophysite and Armenian churches still reject the council. But most Christian churches still respect the elusive Definition as the zenith of patristic christological endeavor.

CHALCEDON, DEFINITION OF (451). The majority at the Council of Chalcedon* acknowledged the Nicene Creed, confirmed at Constantinople, together with two Cyrilline letters and the Tome of Leo. Alarmed by reluctant Egyptian bishops and recalcitrant supporters of the condemned Eutyches, the imperial commissioners pressed for a new unifying formula. A committee headed by Anatolius of Constantinople produced a draft containing the Cyrilline "out of two natures." Others preferred the Leonine "in two natures," and the commissioners reconstituted the committee. This produced the extant Definitio. Basically it affirms, first, that the Lord Christ is one, His two natures preserved in one prosopon and hypostasis. This favored the Alexandrine stress on One God. Second, it states that both natures, God and man, are unimpaired, "perfect," consubstantial with God and man, preexistent and born of the Virgin. He is "acknowledged in two natures" (a phrase perhaps taken from Basil of Seleucia) "unconfusedly, unchangeably, indivisibly and inseparably." The commissioners had commended this last Leonine phrase. Third, the Definition affirmed that the distinct natures are fully God and man, thus securing salvation by a saving God and a man identified with men. Confirmed by Emperor Marcian and Pulcheria, the Definition has split the Monophysite* from other Eastern churches.

CHALDEAN CHRISTIANS. This group had its origins in Iraq and is an offshoot of the Nestorian* branch of Christianity. In the last quarter of the seventeenth century the Nestorian patriarch of Diarbekir quarreled with the head of the Nestorian sect of Christianity and then turned to the Roman pope for recognition. The pope promptly established the patriarchy of the Chaldeans, which tended to fix the division between the Nestorian groups. Thus the Chaldeans are the branch of Nestorians who recognize papal authority.

CHALICE (Lat. calix, a regular, small drinking cup). For its domestic background, reference can be made to the Greek particular two-handled kulix, in contrast with the NT's generalized potērion, from which is derived the special liturgical usage for the administration of the liquid portion of the Lord's Supper. Archaeologically interesting, though of doubtful date, is the Chalice of Antioch, discovered in 1910.

CHALLONER, RICHARD (1691-1781). Roman Catholic writer. Born to Protestant parents, he was educated in Roman Catholic households after his father's death and embraced that faith at the age of thirteen. A student at Douai, he became successively professor and vice-president there, returning to England in 1738 when he joined the London Mission. Following a controversy with Conyers Middleton, he returned to Douai in 1738 and was consecrated a bishop (in partibus) at Hammersmith in 1741, becoming vicar apostolic in 1758. He produced a modernized version of the Douai Old and New Testaments (1749, 1750), wrote anti-Protestant tracts, martyrologies, and two popular devotional works, The Garden of the Soul (1740) and Meditations for Every Day of the Year (1753). IAN SELLERS

CHALMERS, JAMES (1841-1901). Scottish missionary. Born at Ardrishaig and brought up at Inverary, Argyllshire, he heard God's call at fifteen and vowed to take the Gospel to cannibals—a vow soon forgotten until his conversion three years later. In 1862 he went to Cheshunt College, Cambridge, to train under the London Missionary Society, and in 1867 he sailed for the Cook Islands of Polynesia. For ten years he continued the work begun at Raratonga by John Williams, but he longed for unevangelized areas, especially New Guinea. The work there was begun in 1872 by six pastors from Raratonga; Chalmers joined them in 1877. During his twenty-four years there, his concern and determination carried the work through despite many setbacks. He opened up a wide area for the Gospel through exploration, and rendered great service to government officials when SE New Guinea was annexed by Great Britain and became a crown colony. He established a training institution at Port Moresby and saw whole areas transformed by the Gospel.

Chalmers was essentially a pioneer. He made up for his imperfect knowledge of native languages by faith, prayer, Christlikeness, and love for the people. His success is attributable to the fact that he never doubted he had a Gospel for them. He was murdered by cannibals during a journey to explore new territory.

See R. Lovett, James Chalmers (1902).

J.W. MEIKLEJOHN

CHALMERS, THOMAS (1780-1847). Scottish minister. Born in Anstruther and educated at St. Andrews University, he was inducted to Kilmany parish in 1803 and lectured part-time in mathematics at his university. In 1811 he experienced evangelical conversion, and his ministerial emphasis and activity were completely changed. He began to write for the Christian Instructor, publication of which marked the turning of the tide in the Moderate-Evangelical encounter. In 1815 he was inducted to the Tron Church, Glasgow, and his theology, kept within the bounds of the Shorter Catechism, was heard by crowded congregations twice every Sunday. The city's social needs were staggering. Chalmers created a new parish, St. John's, out of three existing overgrown parishes, with 10,000 people in its limits, many of them the poorest in Glasgow. He divided the parish into twenty-five areas with about 400 people in each. An elder was appointed to the spiritual oversight, and a deacon to the social welfare, of each area. Day and Sunday schools were provided for all children. Chalmers and his assistants conducted four services each Sunday. This pastoral experiment made evangelicalism a force to be reckoned with.

Glasgow reeled in shock when Chalmers left in 1823 to teach moral philosophy at St. Andrews, but when he moved on to Edinburgh in 1828 to teach divinity, his friends were sure he had found his sphere. He became moderator in 1832 and thereafter the leader and symbol of the Evangelical party. During the next decade he championed the cause of church extension, building in six years 216 churches, and raising £290,000. After the Disruption,* Chalmers became moderator of the Free Church assembly and also professor of theology in New College. His Institutes of Theology was published posthumously in 1849.

See H. Watt, Thomas Chalmers and the Disruption (1943).

ARTHUR CLARKE

CHAMBERLAIN, JACOB (1835-1908). Missionary to India from the (Dutch) Reformed Church in America. Born in Sharon, Connecticut, he studied both theology and medicine and in 1859 joined the Arcot Mission in South India. As a doctor he began two hospitals and conducted several dispensaries. But perhaps his most enduring work was literary. From 1873 to 1894 he chaired a committee to revise the Telugu Bible. He prepared a popular Telugu hymnbook and completed the first volume of a Bible dictionary. Repeated illness obliged him to spend altogether ten years in the USA, where he inspired much missionary interest. Concerned for church union, he became the first moderator of the Synod of South India in 1902. In 1878 he was the first missionary ever chosen to be president of the general synod of his denomination.

HAROLD R. COOK

CHAMBERS, OSWALD (1874-1917). Bible teacher and evangelical mystic. Born in Aberdeen where his father was a Baptist pastor, he was converted on hearing C.H. Spurgeon,* studied art in London and Edinburgh, and entered Dunoon College in 1897 to train for the Baptist ministry. During this time he met William Quarrier, founder of the Orphan Homes, and from him learned a simplicity of faith and prayer. In 1907 he visited America and Japan, afterward becoming traveling missioner for the Pentecostal League of Prayer founded by Reader Harris. He was principal of the Bible Training College at Clapham Common, London (1911-15). His last great ministry was to the troops in the desert camps of Egypt, as superintendent of the YMCA huts in Zeitoun and Ismailia. Many of his Bible studies given to students and troops have been published, and his My Utmost for His Highest is a devotional classic.

J.G.G. NORMAN

CHAMPLAIN, SAMUEL DE (c.1570-1635). Explorer, cartographer, and colonizer. Son of a French sea captain, he made his first trip to Canada in 1603. Next year he returned to the New World, accompanying Monts to Acadia, where they established a settlement on an island in the St. Croix River. After a very hard winter, the settlers moved across the Bay of Fundy to found Port Royal, whence Champlain explored and mapped the Acadian and New England coasts. In 1608 he established a fur-trading colony at Quebec. The rest of his life was dedicated to the success of the colony as he explored the interior, made alliances with the Indians, and pleaded its cause in frequent trips to France. He strongly emphasized Christian missions, for he dreamed of a Christian Canada ruled by the French king and peopled by a race of Indian-French people who had intermarried. In 1612 he became commandant of New France, and in 1615 encouraged the *Récollet missionaries to come to Canada. Made governor of New France in 1633, he earned by his contribution to Canadian development the title "Father of Canada."

ROBERT WILSON

CHANCELLOR. In the Middle Ages, the chancellor acted as secretary to the cathedral chapter. In the Church of England now, he usually has jurisdiction (authorized by a patent under the seal of the bishop) over the consistory court, and is the chief representative of the bishop in the administration of the temporal affairs of his diocese. Not normally ordained, the chancellor must be at least twenty-six years old, "learned in the civil and ecclesiastical laws and at least a Master of Arts, or Bachelor of Law"; he must be "zealously bent to religion," must take the oath of allegiance, and assent to the Articles of Religion. He issues marriage licenses through his surrogates, hears applications for faculties, dispensations, etc., and hears complaints against clerics for immorality.

HOWARD SAINSBURY

CHANNING, WILLIAM ELLERY (1780-1842). Unitarian leader and abolitionist. Born in Newport, Rhode Island, he received his B.A. from Harvard in 1798 and was "regent" there from 1802 until in 1803 he was ordained as pastor of the Federal Street Congregational Church in Boston. His sermon at the ordination of Jared Sparks in Baltimore in 1809 set forth the tenets of Unitarianism, such as denial of the Trinity, the deity of Christ, total depravity, and a substitutionary atonement. In 1820 he organized the Berry Street Conference of liberal ministers out of which the American Unitarian Association developed in 1825. He also supported abolition of slavery, the merits of temperance, and peace instead of war. GEORGE MARSDEN

CHANTRY (Lat. capellania). The aisle of a church, or part of an aisle, set apart for the offering of Mass for the benefit of the founder or some other holy person. The name was used also for the institution and endowment of such a service. All chantries in Britain were dissolved by Acts in 1545 and 1547.

CHAPEL. The word has a variety of uses, not all of them religious. It is widely used in Britain to describe Nonconformist* places of worship, while in Ireland it is often used to refer to Roman Catholic churches. In Europe, since the Middle Ages, a chapel has described the place of worship (which is not a parish church) belonging to a school, college, hospital, palace, etc.; that part of a cathedral or parish church where there is a separate altar/Communion table (often a "Lady Chapel"); and the chancel (hence also sometimes the choir) of a church or cathedral. Specialized usage of the word includes "Chapel Royal" (a church under the direct control of the sovereign), "Chapel of Ease" (a building subordinate to a parish church erected for the ease of parishioners), and "Proprietary Chapel" (primarily an eighteenth or nineteenth century phenomenon, built by subscription and maintained by private individuals but without parochial rights).
PETER TOON

CHAPLAIN. The term derives from the place ("chapel") wherein the duty is performed. The feudal structure of medieval Christian society had enabled private places of worship for the ranking personages of the society to be established on their land holdings, or in relation to those institutions of military, political, penal, welfare, or educational proportion which they supported. It was the duty of the chaplain to conduct religious services therein, his living being provided thereby; in middle English history he was specifically a chantry-priest, capable of singing those services. From the range of institutional possibilities, already in the eighteenth-century England of Jonathan Swift the specialized chaplain of a regiment was recognized, from which the modern sense of the military chaplaincy is derived.
CLYDE CURRY SMITH

CHAPMAN, JOHN WILBUR (1859-1918). Presbyterian evangelist. Born in Richmond, Indiana, and educated at Oberlin College, Lake Forest University, and Lane Seminary in Cincinnati, he was ordained in 1882 and held pastorates in Ohio, Indiana, New York, and Pennsylvania, but devoted more than half of his ministry to evangelism. Once associated with D.L. Moody,* he worked during his last ten years with C.M. Alexander.* Evangelistic tours took him to a number of foreign countries as well as many large cities in the USA. He was the first director of the Winona Lake Bible Conference and contributed to the progress of other conference centers. In 1917 he was appointed moderator of the Presbyterian general assembly. BRUCE L. SHELLEY

CHAPTER. Members of a religious house used to assemble regularly to hear a chapter (Lat. capitulum) of the Rule of St. Benedict or of Scripture read publicly, and the name "chapter" became attached to their assembly and later to the people who met. Meetings of a whole province or order of monks became known as "provincial chapters" or "general chapters."* In particular, the term became used of monks or canons in a cathedral or collegiate church, presided over by the dean and responsible for its administration, fabric, and worship. Chapter-houses were built from the ninth century, almost exclusively in England, often polygonal externally and vaulted within. In some cathedrals, the lesser chapter consists of residentiary canons, and the greater chapter comprises these and the honorary canons. JOYCE HORN

CHARDON, LOUIS (1595-1651). French Dominican mystic and theologian. Born at Clermont (Oise) of a wealthy family, he studied in Paris and entered the Dominican* Order in 1618 at the Annunciation Priory. He became ordinary preacher in 1632 and spent most of his life as spiritual director and novice master. All his works were written during the last four years of his life. His principal work, The Cross of Jesus, was written in 1647 and is a speculative and practical theology of Christian suffering, emphasizing the Christian's progress in suffering through grace. He produced French translations of Dialogue of St. Catherine of Siena (1648) and Institutiones divinae of John Tauler (1650). He wrote Meditation on the Passion of our Lord Jesus Christ (1650), La Vie de St. Samson d'Yore (1647), Raccourci de l'art de méditer (1649), and other minor works. HOWARD SAINSBURY

CHARISMATA. Plural of the Greek word charisma which is almost exclusively a NT word and, excepting 1 Peter 4:10, is peculiar to Paul. It means essentially a free, graciously conferred gift. In the NT it is used sometimes in a broad general sense, but more often it refers specifically to the gracious gifts derived from the Holy Spirit (1 Cor. 12:4), manifested by Christians (12:7) according to His will (12:11), in proportion to faith (Rom. 12:6), for the profit of the whole fellowship (1 Cor. 12:7), and for the work of the ministry. Their purpose is edification, not revelation. Two lists of "gifts" occur (Rom. 12:6-8; 1 Cor. 12:8-10); also, 1 Corinthians 7:7 refers to an additional gift of self-control making possible the celibate state, and 1 Peter 4:10 describes generosity in hospitality as a charisma. 1 Timothy 4:14 and 2 Timothy 1:6 use charisma with reference to the evangelistic gift. The term charismata is being used increasingly of religious movements claiming a restoration to the church of the more spectacular

"gifts," such as healing, prophecy, and "tongues-speaking." Max Weber has popularized the term "charismatic leadership" to contrast with institutionalized, formal leadership.

CHARLEMAGNE (Charles the Great) (742-814). King of the Franks and first medieval Roman emperor. Son of Pepin the Short, he became sole ruler of the Frankish kingdom in 771 and spent the next three decades in warfare. His greatest military achievement was the conquest of the Saxons in a protracted war that drained his resources. Victory was gained through massacres, forced conversions, mass deportations, and the organization of Saxony into counties and dioceses under Franks loyal to Charles. In 774 he defeated the Lombards and annexed N Italy. He conducted several campaigns along the southwestern frontier and founded the Spanish March. In the east he crushed Bavaria, organized the Ostmark as a defense against the Slavs, and later destroyed the Avars, an Asiatic people who had penetrated to the middle Danube. These campaigns brought the heathen Slavic tribes under Charles's influence and opened the way for German colonization of eastern Europe. On 25 December 800, in Rome, Leo III crowned him emperor, an event that has been the object of intense historical controversy. The motives of both Leo and Charles are extremely unclear, and the significance of the action itself is disputed. As this challenged the Byzantine emperor's position, Charles worked to improve relations with the East.

The Carolingian administrative structure contained few innovations, but Charles was more effective in securing respect for his authority and instituting better government than his predecessors. He utilized permanent professional judges and royal envoys (missi dominici) to extend his authority in the realm, while promulgating ordinances (capitularies*) to correct abuses. Charles possessed power over both church and state, and practiced a kind of religious paternalism in his church reforms. He intervened in questions of clerical appointments, discipline, and even doctrine. Convinced a better-educated clergy was needed, he fostered a revival of learning by bringing to his palace the intellectual elite of Latin Christendom (e.g., Alcuin of York,* Paul the Deacon, Peter of Pisa, Theodulf, and Einhard) to form the Palace School at Aachen. The Carolingian Renaissance* spread throughout the empire, and by uniting pagan and Christian classical knowledge it reestablished the common culture of the West.

CHARLES I (1600-1649). King of Great Britain and Ireland from 1625. In that year his marriage to Henrietta Maria, daughter of Henry IV of France, and his inheritance of Buckingham as political adviser, proved serious encumbrances from the start. The queen was a fervent Roman Catholic and headstrong in seeking to obtain special concessions for Catholic worship. Buckingham embarked on rash military expeditions abroad that ended disastrously, incurring serious financial loss. When Parliament refused the king the money he requested, Charles dissolved the body and resorted to forced loans. For eleven years from 1629 he ruled without Parliament. His unpopularity increased as he exemplified the principle of the Divine Right of Kings.* When Buckingham was replaced as royal adviser by Strafford and Laud* with their policy of "thorough," the king's will was enforced through the Courts of High Commission (for clerical offenders) and of the Star Chamber (for laymen). Laud became archbishop in 1633, and began to press forward High Church reforms and to crush Puritan opposition. The Puritans Burton, Bastwick, and Prynne were savagely sentenced by the Star Chamber in 1637. Laudian divines were intruded into high office; one such was Juxon, bishop of London, who became lord treasurer. The High Church party, with its Arminian theology and seemingly Romanist tendency, thus became identified with this policy of acquiring a firm hold over church and state under king and bishops. By his inept handling of Scottish affairs Charles assured his downfall. The attempt in 1637, approved by Laud, to force the Scottish Prayer Book on Calvinistic Scots led to the signing of the Scottish national Covenant* and the abolition of episcopacy. Charles invaded Scotland, but shortage of funds compelled him to withdraw and summon Parliament to vote him the necessary capital. The Long Parliament of 1640 abolished the special courts and severely curtailed the independent power of the monarchy. Charles had to submit, but his attempt to arrest five members for high treason in 1642 played into the extremists' hands and issued in civil war. Presbyterianism ousted a religious establishment that had become so offensive. Even as a prisoner in 1647, however, Charles negotiated a secret treaty with the Scots, which led to a second civil war. It was this perfidy that prompted the army and Independents to bring him to trial and execution. In family life Charles was an exemplary character, but in public affairs he displayed a grave lack of trustworthiness and judgment. After the Restoration he was acclaimed a martyr and officially celebrated as such by royal mandate until 1859.

J.W. CHARLEY

CHARLES II (1630-1685). Second son and successor of Charles I* (d.1649); king in exile until his restoration in 1660. Since the High Church party had identified the Anglican and Royalist causes, his religious flexibility for political ends was a source of constant concern. In 1650 he became Presbyterian to enlist Scottish support for the recovery of his throne, but soon reverted after defeat by Cromwell at Worcester (1651). It was a largely Presbyterian Parliament that invited him to return, and in the Declaration of Breda (1660) he promised a "liberty to tender consciences." But the Savoy Conference* and 1662 Act of Uniformity soon showed that the High Church party had no desire for toleration. Subsequent legislation treated Dissenters as a political danger. There followed the Clarendon Code,* the Act Against Conventicles,* and the Five Mile Act.* Charles's court soon became "the center of corruption and good taste." Shortage of finance for his extravagant living led him into secret intrigues with his cousin Louis XIV. In the secret treaty of Dover (1670) he promised in return for money to make war on the Protestant Dutch and to promote Roman Catholicism in England. Such was the real background behind the trumped-up "Popish Plot"* of Titus Oates (1678). For similar reasons he had been compelled by Parliament to retract his Declaration of Indulgence* (1672). He quashed, however, the Whig attempt to exclude the Roman Catholic duke of York from the throne. As final token of his political discretion, not till his deathbed did the king make an open avowal of conversion to the Roman Catholic faith which he had long espoused secretly.

J.W. CHARLEY

CHARLES V (1500-1558). Holy Roman Emperor, king of Spain. The grandson of Maximilian of Habsburg, Mary of Burgundy, Ferdinand of Aragon, and Isabella of Castile, he fell heir to an empire greater than Charlemagne's. Born and reared in Flanders, he inherited the Netherlands and Franche-Comté (1506), and Spain, Naples, Sicily, and the American possessions (1516). Although initially resented by his Spanish subjects, he earned their loyalty by identifying with their national traits, by his religious zeal, and by marriage to a Portuguese princess. Maximilian's death in 1519 brought him the Habsburg duchies in Austria and Germany, together with rights over Bohemia and Hungary. He also obtained the imperial throne through bribery and granting significant concessions to the estates. The medieval ideal of unifying all Christendom under one scepter, however, was a hopeless anachronism. He was a man of perseverance, patience, and intelligence, but the obstacles facing him were insuperable. His empire had no common ties, while three great problems plagued his reign—the religious revolt in Germany, the Turkish threat, and the continuing struggle with France for European hegemony.

Although strongly opposed to Lutheranism, Charles was absent from the empire during the crucial 1520s. His brother Ferdinand, appointed regent over the German lands in 1521-22, was preoccupied with the Turkish menace. Charles gained the upper hand over Francis I of France in two Italian wars (his army sacked Rome in 1527) and was the last emperor to be crowned by the pope (1530). Unable to crush Lutheranism at the Diet of Augsburg (1530), faced by a defensive coalition (Smalcald League*), and needing help against the Turks, Charles made a truce with Protestant princes (Nuremberg Standstill, 1532). While he campaigned in North Africa against Barbary pirates and vassals of the Sultan (1535, 1541) and fought with Francis (1536-38, 1542-44), Protestantism spread rapidly in Germany. But when divisions appeared in the movement, Charles attacked and defeated the Smalcald League in 1546-47. The defeat, along with his unpopular theological settlement (Augsburg Interim, 1548), forced the Protestants into an alliance with Henry II of France in 1552, and into a new round of conflict. Finally recognizing that Lutheranism could not be destroyed, Charles authorized Ferdinand to conclude a religious peace at Augsburg in 1555. Tired and discouraged, Charles divided his possessions between his son Philip (Spain, the Netherlands, and Sicily) and Ferdinand (Habsburg hereditary lands), while retaining the imperial title. His last two years were spent in retirement at the monastery San Yuste in Estremadura, Spain.

CHARLES, ROBERT HENRY (1855-1931). Archdeacon of Westminster and biblical scholar. Born in Cookstown, County Tyrone, and educated at Belfast Academy; Queen's College, Belfast; and Trinity College, Dublin, he was ordained and held curacies in London, 1883-89. He subsequently held several teaching posts, notably in Dublin and Oxford. His primary academic interests lay in the field of intertestamental Judaism. He mastered all the requisite languages for the study of the apocryphal and intertestamental literature, and produced basic critical texts for several of them. This activity culminated in the Oxford edition of The Apocrypha and Pseudepigrapha of the Old Testament in English (1913), of which Charles was general editor and which incorporates much of his own work. These two volumes remain the standard work. It was inevitable that he should take a special interest in apocalyptic, and he produced exhaustive commentaries on the two apocalyptic books of the Bible: Daniel (1929) and Revelation (2 vols., 1920).

D.F. PAYNE

CHARLES, THOMAS (1755-1814). Welsh Methodist leader. Born at Longmoor in Carmarthenshire, and educated at Carmarthen Academy and Jesus College, Oxford, he underwent an evangelical conversion at Carmarthen under the ministry of Daniel Rowland.* He was ordained deacon at Oxford and served as a curate in Somerset and in Merioneth before casting his lot with the Methodist Society at Bala, Merioneth, in 1784. For the remainder of his life, Bala was to be his home. Charles's influence on Welsh religious and cultural life was immense. In the field of education he set up a system of circulating schools to replace the now defunct system initiated by Griffith Jones.* His pioneering work as organizer of Sunday schools was originally an extension of his day schools. The need to provide guidance for a new generation of readers made him into a writer. His little catechism (Yr Hyfforddwr, 1807) ran to some eighty-five editions before the end of the century, and his Bible dictionary which he began in 1805 was at the same time a popular and a scholarly work which became part of the furniture of every Welsh home.

It was the crying need for Welsh Bibles that compelled Charles to draw the attention of the Religious Tract Society to the matter in 1802, and from this initiative sprang the British and Foreign Bible Society (see BIBLE SOCIETIES). He himself was responsible for editing the version of the Welsh Bible for the society, and his work was based on an unsurpassed knowledge of the text of the numerous Welsh versions that had appeared since 1567. But above all he was the greatest leader of the Calvinistic Methodists* of Wales after the deaths of Williams Pantycelyn and Daniel Rowland, and it was he—albeit with the greatest reluctance—who finally led the Methodist Societies to break with the Church of England by ordaining ministers of their own in 1811 and so forming the Calvinistic Methodist Church of Wales. Through his work as educationist, writer, and religious leader, he was the foremost link between the first generation of Welsh Methodists and the men of the nineteenth century.

CHARLES MARTEL (689-741). As a member of the Frankish aristocratic family, the Arnulfings, he succeeded to the office of Mayor of the Palace, the real power overshadowing the weak Merovingian kings. As military leader of the Frankish forces, in 732 his prestige grew both by his victory over the invading Saracens near Poitiers, which ended the threat of serious invasion of western Europe by Muslims from Spain, and by his ceaseless campaigns against the Frisians and Saxons in the northeast. Possibly Charles and his military advisers began the shift away from relying on the infantry to emphasizing heavy cavalry in the Frankish army, due to realizing the potential of the stirrup. This change contributed significantly to the development of medieval feudalism. Charles also encouraged and helped finance two great missionary monks, Willibrord* and Boniface,* in their work of Christianizing and pacifying the Germanic peoples north and east of the kingdom. But within the Frankish kingdom itself, he kept close control of both the ecclesiastical and lay magnates alike, confiscating at will church lands for military purposes or endowing churches and monasteries as the situation required. Such lay control may account partially for the spiritual degeneration and clerical indiscipline of the Frankish church.

KENNETH R. DAVIS

CHARNOCK, STEPHEN (1628-1680). Puritan minister. Son of a London solicitor, he was educated at Emmanuel College, Cambridge, and later became a fellow of New College, Oxford. In 1655 he was appointed chaplain to Henry Cromwell, governor of Ireland, and won a reputation for preaching in Dublin. From 1675 he ministered in a London Presbyterian church. His sermons were published mostly after his death; they reflect the characteristic Puritan divine's concern for central Gospel themes; the most important work was entitled Existence and Attributes of God.

CHARRON, PIERRE (1541-1603). French Roman Catholic philosopher and theologian. Born in Paris, he studied at the Sorbonne, Orléans, and Bourges, and was called to the Paris bar. He became a priest and won a great reputation for pulpit oratory, serving as preacher in ordinary to the queen of Navarre. He was also theological adviser to several dioceses, and canon of Bordeaux. He wrote Les Discours Chrêtiens in 1589. Les Trois Vérités followed in 1593, an apologetic work attacking Calvinism. His most important work, however, was De la Sagesse (1601), which was strongly influenced by his close friend Montaigne. In the context of a generally skeptical view of religion, it declares that outside of revelation man cannot be sufficiently certain of religious and moral truth and, as a skeptic, should live as conveniently as he can on the basis of what society allows. The book contributed to the separation of ethics from religion and the growth of free-thought and Deism. He was bitterly attacked and vigorously defended within the church. His ultimate intentions remain equally puzzling today.

HOWARD SAINSBURY

CHARTERIS, ARCHIBALD HAMILTON (1835-1908). Scottish minister. Chaplain successively to Queen Victoria and King Edward VII, and moderator of the Church of Scotland general assembly in 1892, he ranks with Norman Macleod as one of the two outstanding leaders of his church in the post-Disruption era. Highly successful in three widely different charges, he was appointed in 1868 to the chair of biblical criticism at Edinburgh University, and one year later became first convenor of the church's new Christian Life and Work Committee. He was the founder of both the Woman's Guild of the church, and the Young Men's Guild, revived the Order of Deaconesses, and launched both the Deaconess Hospital and the church's influential magazine, Life and Work.

D.P. THOMSON

CHASUBLE. A sleeveless outer vestment worn by the celebrant at Mass or Eucharist. Originally shaped like a tent or poncho with a hole for the head, and in the course of time reduced in size, it is said to be derived from the paenula or planeta, the outdoor cloak of Greek and Roman times. At the English Reformation the chasuble was retained by the first Prayer Book of 1549 as an alternative to the cope,* which was, however, regarded as having no doctrinal significance, but was abolished in 1552. It does not seem to have been used again in the Church of England until the nineteenth-century Oxford Movement,* despite one widely publicized interpretation of the Ornaments Rubric. G.S.R. COX

CHATEAUBRIAND, FRANÇOIS RENÉ, VICOMTE DE (1768-1848). An aristocrat who initially supported the French Revolution but emigrated to London in the Terror (1793). Returning in 1800, he gave occasional service to both Napoleon and the restored Bourbons, but he was primarily a Romantic writer, exercising immense influence on the literature of the time. An essay on revolution (1797) showed him to be versed in the skeptical philosophy of the eighteenth century, but also conscious of religious needs. While still in London he was converted. The Génie du christianisme (1802), apology for Christianity, made him famous. Its argument went beyond the eighteenth-century appeal to reason, justifying Christianity to the imagination and aesthetic sense, as more poetic and favorable to the arts and letters than any other religion. He dwelt upon the impressiveness of its ritual and interpreted dogmas poetically. Classical paganism was by such methods shown to have anima naturaliter christiana, and so to bear witness to the profound humanity of Christianity. HADDON WILLMER

CHAUNCY, CHARLES (1705-1787). American Congregational clergyman and leader of the "Old Light" (those opposed to the Great Awakening*). Born in Boston, he received his education at Harvard and was pastor of the First Church in Boston (1727-87). When revivalism broke out in New England in the early 1740s, Chauncy at first spoke sympathetically of the movement; however, by 1742 he had become one of the most outspoken critics and leaders in the antirevivalist camp. He charged the revivalists with excessive enthusiasm and antinomianism. His Seasonable Thoughts on the State of Religion in New England (1743) contains his serious and satirical criticism of revivalism. He also opposed the appointment of any Episcopal bishop in the colonies.

DONALD M. LAKE

CHAUTAUQUA MOVEMENT. Aimed at promoting popular education, this American movement began at Lake Chautauqua, New York, in 1874, when John H. Vincent,* first chairman of the International Sunday School Lesson Committee and later Methodist Episcopal bishop, began a brief summer course for Sunday school teachers. In 1878, as the Chautauqua Literary and Scientific Circle, it began to provide popular education through home reading in literature, science, etc. It holds an annual assembly at Chautauqua during July and August, marked by outstanding lectures and artistic presentations. Home study courses are accredited by New York University. Readers meet each week in local areas for discussion. Four years of work are available, but most complete no more than two. The movement has been so successful that the word "chautauqua" has come to mean any educational assembly on this pattern.

HAROLD R. COOK

CHELCICKY, PETER (c.1390-1460). Founder of the Chelcic Brethren. A layman of earnest piety, he came under the influence of the writings of John Wycliffe* and made known his ideas in Prague from about 1420. He condemned or rejected the worldly power of the church and the use of secular force in spiritual matters. He did not believe the monastic life was valid as a service to God, and he worked for a reconstruction of society based on a mystical doctrine of the Body of Christ. With his followers, known as the Chelcic Brethren, and other likeminded people influenced by Archbishop Rokycana, he helped to sow the seeds from which the later Bohemian Brethren* movement was to grow. Among his books are Netz des wahren Glaubens (1455) and Postilla (1434-36). He died in Chicice, S Bohemia. PETER TOON

CHEMNITZ, MARTIN (1522-1586). Lutheran theologian. Born of a poor family in Treuenbrietzen, he studied at the Trivialschule, Wittenberg, Magdeburg, the University of Frankfurt on the Oder, and at the University of Wittenberg (1545) where he formed a lasting friendship with Melanchthon.* At this time he was interested chiefly in mathematics and astrology. After he was driven out of Wittenberg because of the Smalcaldic War, he came to Königsberg in Prussia, where he was made rector of the Kneiphof School, and received his master's degree from the new university. In 1550 he became librarian at the ducal castle library in Königsberg, primarily because of his reputation as an astrologer. Influenced by Sabinus, Melanchthon's son-in-law, he seriously applied himself to the study of theology. In 1553 he came again to Wittenberg, where he was made a member of the philosophical faculty. After a year and a half he went to Brunswick, where he was made coadjutor of Joachim Mörlin and later (1567) superintendent. He was one of the founders of the University of Helmstedt and was active as a practical churchman in Brunswick, both in city and province, highly regarded by the city council and Duke Julius. He set up a church order and a corpus or forma doctrinae, consisting of the Scriptures, the Apostolic, Nicene, and Athanasian creeds, the Augsburg Confession, the Apology, the catechisms of Luther, the Smalcald Articles,* and other writings of Luther. Duke William of Lüneburg asked him to draw up the Corpus Wilhelminum.

One of the most important theological treatises written by Chemnitz is his Examen Concilii Tridentini in four volumes. It has been called "a detailed study of the Council of Trent, illuminated by the Author's penetrating Biblical theology and a profound knowledge of the history of the Christian church and its teachings." His De Duabus Naturis in Christo is an extensive analysis of Christology. His Loci Theologici was published after his death. He worked successfully with James Andreae* to mitigate the doctrinal controversies among German Lutherans between about 1550 and 1575. He was one of the co-authors of the Formula of Concord* in 1577. Theologically he took a position between the Gnesio-Lutherans and the Philipists. Biblical, temperate, scholarly, it has been said of him, "If Martin had not come, Martin would hardly have stood," i.e., referring to Chemnitz and Luther respectively.

CARL S. MEYER

CHENEY, CHARLES EDWARD (1836-1916). First bishop of the Reformed Episcopal Church.* Graduate of Hobart College and the Episcopal seminary in Virginia, he was ordained in 1860 and became rector of Christ Church, Chicago, a position he held until his death. As a low church Episcopalian and pronounced evangelical, he favored "the great fundamental principles held by all evangelical Christians" and opposed both "Romanism" and "radicalism involved in the destructive criticism of God's word." His practice of omitting the words "regeneration" and "regenerate" from the baptismal service led to his deposition from the ministry, an action which was overruled by the civil court. In 1873, while retaining his rectorship, he with Bishop G.D. Cummins* and others organized the Reformed Episcopal Church.

CHESTER BEATTY PAPYRI. Portions of three NT manuscripts, designated P45, P46, and P47, which comprise 126 leaves, partially mutilated, and afford valuable additional early textual evidence utilized in more recent critical editions of the Greek NT. Said to have been found near Memphis, on the banks of the Nile, these papyri were acquired by Mr. Chester Beatty from a dealer in Egypt about 1930. Most of the material is now housed in Dublin, but one page of P45 is in Vienna, part of P46 is in Michigan. P45 (third century) contains gospel fragments and Acts; P46 (about 200) has most of the Pauline epistles. P47 (late third century) gives the earliest extant text of the Apocalypse, chapters 6-17. These documents, part of a considerable stream of newer textual evidence, must be evaluated in the exegesis of particular passages.

ROY A. STEWART

CHEYNE, THOMAS KELLY (1841-1915). OT scholar. Educated at Oxford and at Göttingen, where he was greatly influenced by H.G.A. Ewald,* he returned to Oxford for the rest of his life, apart from a brief period as rector in Essex, and from 1885 until his death was Oriel professor of the interpretation of Scripture. A pioneer in England of the critical approach to the OT, he participated in the preparation of the Revised Version of the Bible, and was co-editor of the Encyclopaedia Biblica (4 vols., 1899-1903). In latter years some of his views were condemned by scholars as wild and unbalanced. Cheyne's writings include The Origin and Religious Contents of the Psalter (1891), Founders of Old Testament Criticism (1893), Introduction to the Book of Isaiah (1895), and Jewish Religious Life after the Exile (1898).

CHICAGO LAMBETH ARTICLES. In 1870 William Reed Huntington, a member of the Protestant Episcopal Church, proposed four principles upon which Christian churches might agree in order to bring about unity. In 1886 these principles were adopted by the American Episcopalian bishops meeting in Chicago. Known ever since as the Articles, or the Chicago Quadrilateral, they consist of these commitments: (1) adherence to the Holy Scriptures as the ultimate standard of faith; (2) adherence to the Apostles' Creed and the Nicene Creed; (3) adherence to the two sacraments of baptism and the Lord's Supper; (4) adherence to a belief in the historic episcopate. The fourth article has created a difficulty for other Christian churches whose leaders fear that unity with the Episcopalians might force them to reordain their own clergy. Nonetheless, the influence of the Chicago Lambeth Articles in ecumenism is great. In 1888 the Lambeth Conference also adopted these articles in a revised form (the Lambeth Quadrilateral) as the basis for its own discussion of Christian unity with other churches.

JOHN D. WOODBRIDGE

CHICHELE, HENRY (c.1362-1443). Archbishop of Canterbury from 1414. One of the able lawyer-bishops of the Middle Ages upon whom so much of the administration in church and state depended, he was the son of a Northamptonshire merchant, and furthered his career through the patronage of the house of Lancaster and of William of Wykeham. The latter had him educated at Winchester and his foundation at Oxford. After diplomatic missions abroad, Chichele became bishop of St. David's (1408) and went as a delegate to the Council of Pisa* (1409). He enjoyed the special favor of Henry V and became archbishop of Canterbury in 1414. After Henry's death, however, Pope Martin V and the powerful Bishop Beaufort attacked him for failing to extend papal authority in England against the Statute of Provisors, and his legatine authority was briefly suspended (1427-29). He supported education by promoting graduate clergy and founding All Souls College, Oxford (1438).

JOHN TILLER

CHILDREN'S CRUSADE (1212). This was a mass migration of tens of thousands of children in an effort to reach the Holy Land. A French boy named Stephen told of receiving a visitation of Christ, who gave him a letter for King Philip Augustus. The boy began preaching and attracted large crowds. He excited children from the age of six upward, and they formed bands to go to Jerusalem. They believed God would deliver the city to their innocence, whereas the nobles had been unable to conquer it. Some of them reached Genoa, where they could not get passage to the Holy Land. Part of this group returned home, others went to Rome where they were urged by the pope to go home as their friends had done. One group went to Marseilles, whence they were shipped to North Africa and sold into slavery. The lay participation and social discontent exhibited in this crusade is regarded as a forerunner to the heresies and revolts of the fourteenth century.

CHILLINGWORTH, WILLIAM (1602-1644). Anglican apologist. Godson of William Laud,* scholar and fellow of Trinity College, Oxford, and friend of Gilbert Sheldon and John Hales, Chillingworth had a reputation of "an impartial and well-balanced mind, a large store of learning and a keen power of dialectics." He was converted to Rome by (John) Fisher the Jesuit* (d.1641), through the weakness of the logical basis of Laudian theology. At Douai in 1630 he was set to write against the Church of England, but reweighing the arguments he returned to England, where in 1634 he again declared himself Protestant, though not yet Anglican. Hotly attacked by the Romans, he wrote at Laud's request The Religion of Protestants a Safe Way to Salvation (1638). On the basis that "the Bible only is the religion of Protestants," he maintained the rights of reason and free inquiry, and the necessity of personal conviction. At last persuaded into the Anglican ministry by Laud, he became chancellor of Salisbury in 1638 and incurred the wrath of Parliament in 1640. Serving as chaplain or soldier in the Civil War, he was captured at Arundel in December 1643 and died in captivity a month later.

CHINA. The first appearance of Christianity in China was the arrival in 635 of the Nestorian missionary Alopen,* who entered Sian, the T'ang dynasty capital. The Nestorians met with imperial favor and some success, but provided no Bible and condoned Buddhist-Christian syncretism. By the end of the tenth century Christianity had disappeared. Nestorian missionaries returned to China in the thirteenth century with the Mongol conquerors, but their adherents were few.

John of Monte Corvino,* a Franciscan, followed Marco Polo to Peking in 1294. He claimed 6,000 converts, but the Franciscans also failed in acculturizing Christianity; their converts were merely alien enclaves amid a hostile population, and with the end of the Yuan (Mongol) dynasty in 1368 Christianity had again disappeared in face of persecution.

In the sixteenth century Christian missionaries spurred by the religious awakening in Europe, pressed eastward with European traders into the Pacific Ocean. Francis Xavier,* the great Jesuit, reached Japan in 1549 and hoped to enter "Cathay," but died near Canton in 1552. The Italian, Alexander Valignano, landed in Macao in 1574; he recognized the importance of knowing the Chinese language and of cultural adaptation. But it was Matteo Ricci* who reached Peking in 1601 who commended Christianity to the Chinese court and intelligentsia by his learning and complete adoption of Chinese culture. He even sought to graft Christianity onto the Confucian system and consequently won over some high officials, but also started the Chinese Rites controversy.* Ricci died in 1610, having made a profound impression on the Chinese, but severe persecutions followed and lasted until the end of the Ming dynasty (1644).

The early Ch'ing (Manchu) emperors proved sympathetic toward Christianity, and missions were opened in most of the provinces. The Jesuits sincerely aimed at a Christian Church composed of Chinese believers. They were joined later by Dominican and Franciscan missionaries, and the number of believers rose to 250,000. In 1717, however, Emperor Kang Hsi ordered the banishment of all missionaries, and persecution continued for a century afterward. The West was not yet ready for a genuine encounter with Chinese culture. In 1840 the Jesuits established their famous base at Zikawei in Shanghai.

China was virtually closed to foreign trade and Protestant missionaries until 1841, but Robert Morrison,* living in Macao from 1807, had by 1819 completed a translation of the Bible into Chinese. The iniquitous "Opium War" (1841) compelled a conservative China to cede Hong Kong to Britain and pay an indemnity; later China was required to open five ports to foreign trade and residents, free from Chinese jurisdiction. What are regarded in Chinese minds as aggressive and humiliating actions of this sort by Western Christian powers have rankled ever since and have implicated Western missions. The Taiping Rebellion (1850-56) was a pseudo-Christian peasant movement ending in a disastrous orgy of death and destruction.

The "opening of China" through the "unequal treaties" was seen by missionary societies as their long-awaited opportunity. Their representatives first moved into the Treaty Ports and then after 1866, led by J. Hudson Taylor* and the China Inland Mission, into all the inland provinces. Protestant Christianity now began to make an impact on Chinese life, through its schools, hospitals, and churches. By the end of the century there were 500,000 Roman Catholics and 75,000 Protestants.

As Western aggression increased, however, so did feeling against foreigners. In 1900 the conservative empress dowager seized power, and nationalist feeling exploded into the Boxer Uprising; 181 missionaries, Catholic and Protestant, and more than 49,000 Chinese Christians were killed. China now entered on twenty-five years of rapid social, political, and economic change for which Christianity had helped prepare the way. A modern educational system introduced in 1905 produced a new student class. The decay of the Manchu dynasty hastened the Nationalist Revolution (1911), the leaders of which, including Dr. Sun Yat-sen, the first president, were mostly the product of Christian schools. 1901-14 were years of unprecedented prosperity for missions, but warlordism rendered the revolution futile and plunged China into chaos. The Versailles Peace Treaty (1919) cold-shouldered China and favored her enemy Japan. China's only friend seemed to be Russia, and in 1921 the Communist Party of China was formed.

Meanwhile, the Protestant Church was striving to achieve its own identity. Education received prominence as a means to influence the whole country through its future leaders. Excellent universities, medical schools, and high schools multiplied—often at the expense of direct evangelism. But phenomenal growth followed, and Protestant church membership in 1915 was 331,000. New life was stirring, and a national conference in Shanghai (1921) brought into prominence able leadership concerned with the future development and unity of the church. The years 1920-27 were the heyday of missionary expansion; in 1927 there were 8,518 Protestant missionaries in China and three million baptized Christians, of whom one-fifth were Protestants. This period also saw the rise of independent church movements which were expressions of a nationalistic desire to shake off missionary domination.

The rapid growth of the Communist movement was now a serious threat. In 1926 Communist-inspired agitation brought about a general evacuation of missionaries from inland China and slashed Protestant missionaries to 3,000. Between 1924 and 1934, twenty-nine Protestant missionaries were killed and a number kidnaped. To survive, the church had clearly to achieve genuine autonomy. A nationwide spiritual awakening in the 1930s facilitated this development, but continuing civil war boded ill for the future.

The war with Japan (1937-45) severely tested the Chinese Church and left China at the mercy of Communism. Though 3,000 missionaries again dispersed throughout the country, their time was short. In 1949 Chairman Mao inaugurated the Peoples' Republic of China. During 1950-51 all Protestant missionaries withdrew from the China mainland, and the church was left to face the future alone—a church strengthened, however, by a remarkable postwar revival among university students. Roman Catholic missionaries were largely expelled one by one over a period of years.

Church membership, Protestant and Catholic combined, had never exceeded one percent of the population, and the modern missionary movement had again failed to penetrate deeply into Chinese cultural structures. Christianity to the intellectuals of China was Western and alien. To the Communists, the church was too closely associated with Western imperialism to escape opprobrium. The Protestant "Manifesto" of 1950 committed the church to shaking off imperialist shackles and pledged total subservience to the Communist party. Christians were in a dilemma as to their loyalties. Mass trials of clergy were held all over China. Among the millions who died at Communist hands were hundreds of Christians. There were numerous acts of heroism both by Roman Catholics and Protestants. By 1958 the church was immobilized. Finally, in 1966 the visible church was destroyed by the Red Guards in the "great proletarian cultural revolution." Thereafter silence fell like a shroud over the church in China, though Christians continued to meet secretly. The church endures, though many leaders remain in prison. The underground church forms a nucleus for future expansion when a new day comes.

CHINESE RITES CONTROVERSY. A debate about missionary methods in China during the late sixteenth and early seventeenth centuries, associated with the Roman Catholic priest Matteo Ricci.* He arrived at Macao in 1582, established a work at Nanking in 1599, and did so at Peking two years later, where he remained until his death. Ricci made a point of explaining Christianity to the Chinese in their own terms. In this connection he tolerated the practice of indigenous rites in honor of ancestors and deceased relatives, and also (for the more educated) in honor of Confucius, since he believed that the Chinese worshiped the true God in their own way. This action, the forerunner of much modern missionary strategy, provoked a long and heated controversy, chiefly because Ricci forgot the part played by superstition in such rites as generally practiced. Long after Ricci's death, Clement XI issued decrees (1704, 1715) which condemned the rites.

CHOIR. The church choir can be traced back to the establishment of schola cantorum in Rome, probably in the fourth century. It served to train singers in liturgical chant, and from it sprang the papal choir. In time, similar scholae functioned elsewhere, notably in Paris. Until the Renaissance, most adult singers were clerics, and choirs were found normally only in cathedral churches, monastic institutions, and the chapels of the aristocracy.

Luther promoted the continuance of choral foundations. Such institutions as the Thomasschule in Leipzig, under a succession of distinguished musicians—among whom in the eighteenth century was J.S. Bach*—continued to train choristers, and to establish the fame of the Lutheran choral tradition. Calvin restricted music in worship to unison, congregational singing of metrical psalms. Anglican parish churches adopted this custom, but the English Chapel Royal and the cathedrals retained choirs to chant prose psalms and perform anthems, until abolished during the Commonwealth (1649-60). After the Restoration, volunteer parish choirs also sprang up to aid in singing the metrical psalmody. Such groups increasingly added simple anthems to their musical fare, their example being followed in an increasing number of Nonconformist chapels in the eighteenth century.

In America, a parallel development took place, especially in the wake of the singing school movement. Volunteer choirs in both America and Britain proved a social and recreational attraction while contributing to public worship, and sometimes to church controversy. In larger cities, professional quartets were employed in the nineteenth century, adding an element of entertainment rather than devotion. Some Episcopal churches emulated the English cathedral tradition.

Most of the historic choral traditions are represented in America: that of the Moravians continuously from about 1740, and more recently the distinctive a cappella choralism of the Russian Orthodox Church. Important also is the colorful and improvisatory tradition of the Afro-American churches, which increasingly influences many segments of the current choral practice.

CHOREPISCOPUS. Traditionally a bishop of the countryside. The Arabic version of the Nicene canons sets them "in the place of a bishop over villages, monasteries and village-priests." The chorepiscopus exercised limited episcopal functions in the East before 314. Fifteen Asian and Syrian chorepiscopi signed the Nicene decrees (325). The Dedication Council of Antioch (341) confined their responsibilities to issuing letters dimissory; superintending the church in their areas; appointing readers, subdeacons, and exorcists; and ordaining, only by permission of the city-bishop, deacons and presbyters. The Synodal Letter of Antioch refers to "bishops of the adjacent countryside and cities." The mid-fourth-century Canons of Laodicea forbade further appointment of bishops "in villages and country districts," but chorepiscopi appeared in Caesarea about 375, at the Council of Ephesus in 431, at Rome in 449, and at the Council of Chalcedon in 451. Second Nicea (787) allowed them to appoint readers, but with the permission of the bishop. By the late twelfth century they were extinct.

Western chorepiscopi, first mentioned at Riez (439), met opposition in the ninth century. Nicholas I (858-67) confirmed their episcopal acts, but ninth-century councils canceled them and forbade further appointments. By 1048 they were thought to be equivalent to archdeacons.

CHRISM (Gr. chrisma, "anointing"). A mixture of oil and balsam is used by the Roman and Byzantine churches in certain liturgical ceremonies—in the conferment of the three sacraments which claim to put a special mark on the soul and strengthen it spiritually (baptism, confirmation, ordination) and in the consecration of churches, chalices, patens, and the blessing of church bells and baptismal water. There is a very detailed and formal procedure for the consecration of chrism, which in the Roman Church is done by a bishop on Maundy Thursday. Christ Himself was supposed to have used chrism, but the evidence is not authentic—although it was used by the early Christians. Allegorically, the olive oil symbolizes strength, and the balsam the fragrance of virtue.

CHRIST. From the Greek equivalent of the Aramaic "Messiah," "Anointed One." Most first-century Jews anticipated the advent of a great King through whom the kingdom of God would come. This eschatological use of the term is rare in the OT (probably in Dan. 9:24-26 only), although the idea is much more frequent. Jesus used the term sparingly, probably because of its political and militarist associations for His contemporaries. He welcomed it from Peter (Matt. 16:13-17), however, and accepted it from the high priest when He was, humanly speaking, a helpless prisoner without any possible political future (Mark 14:61f.). As a distinctively Jewish term its use as a title receded somewhat, once the Gentile mission was under way, and it tended to become a name. The view that Jesus did not see Himself in any sense as the Messiah cannot be substantiated unless the gospels are subjected to historical skepticism.

CHRISTADELPHIANS. A sect founded by a physician, John Thomas (b.1805), who emigrated to America in 1832, and at first associated with the Campbellites and Millerites. He revisited England three times, and founded ecclesias, of which the dominant one has always been in Birmingham, although there have been several splinter groups. The most influential British leader was Robert Roberts, founder of the journal The Christadelphian and expounder of Christadelphian doctrines in his standard textbook Christendom Astray from the Bible.

Adherents accept the Bible as their sole authority. They reject the immortality of the soul. They are anti-Trinitarian and believe in one personal God the Father. They hold that Jesus Christ had no existence, except in the mind of the Father, before he was born of the Virgin Mary. Although his body was necessarily "unclean," he was personally free from sin, and received the resident divinity from the Father through the Holy Spirit at his baptism. The Holy Spirit is the name for the power of God in action. There is no personal devil, but Satan is a personification of sin in the flesh. The death of Christ on the cross was not expiatory, but in order "to express the love of the Father in a necessary sacrifice for sin." Salvation is through perseverance in good works and through acceptance of Christadelphian doctrines and baptism. Christadelphians reject any teaching of "heaven beyond the skies," but emphasize the promises to Abraham and Israel, and look for the return of Jesus to reign permanently in Jerusalem. The saved will be raised to live in the renewed earth, while the wicked will be annihilated.

They are democratic in organization, and as brethren they have no separate ministry. Each ecclesia is independent, although a member of the wider Christadelphian fellowship. It is estimated there are some 20,000 Christadelphians in Britain and perhaps a similar number in the USA. They spread their views largely by public lectures and Bible exhibitions.

CHRISTIAN. According to Acts 11:26, "the disciples were first called Christians at Antioch." It was apparently Gentiles outside the church who coined the word as a nickname, i.e., "Christ's ones." While it is little used in the NT (thrice only), it soon became established as the obvious title (Acts 26:28). In the NT, it is used only once of themselves by Christians (1 Pet. 4:16), and some scholars feel Peter is here employing it as a term of accusation on the lips of the church's enemies, as the context might indicate. Other titles were used concurrently during the apostolic age (as expressed in KJV): Christianity was "the way" (Acts 9:2; 19:9, etc.), and Christians were "followers" (Eph. 5:1; 1 Thess. 1:6, etc.) and "believers" (Acts 5:14; 1 Tim. 4:10, etc.). The favored designations in the NT are "saints" (Acts 9:13; Rom. 12:13), "the elect" (Rom. 8:33; Col. 3:12), "the brethren" (Acts 9:30; Rom. 16:14), and "the disciples" (Acts 11:26, 29). Until the appellation "Christian" became common, doubtless several others were used, such as "Nazarenes" (Acts 24:5), which would bring little comprehension outside Palestine, but could be used there as a pejorative term (cf. John 1:46) for believers in Jesus of Nazareth.

When the name "Christian" was coined in Antioch, it gained usage quickly and was used widely within the course of a single generation. Outside the NT, the Roman historian Tacitus declares that this name (or "Chrestian") was popularly used in Rome at the time of Nero (c. A.D. 64). By the middle of the second century it had been taken up as one of jubilant testimony by those who might have expected martyrdom if they admitted to being a follower of Jesus Christ. As the church adopted the name, deeper meanings began to be seen in it. The Greek word christos ("anointed") suggested the more familiar term chrēstos ("gracious, good"). Such terms witnessed to the dignity of the church's Founder and Lord, "the Anointed One," and Peter (1 Pet. 2:3) may be making a play on the word "Christ" when he writes, "Now that you have tasted that the Lord is good." KEITH J. HARDMAN

CHRISTIAN AND MISSIONARY ALLIANCE. The name given in 1887 to a group organized in the USA and Canada, part of a worldwide movement begun six years earlier by A.B. Simpson (1844-1919). Some 1,400 of more than 4,000 fully organized congregations are in North America; the others are separately organized under various names in some thirty-eight other countries on six continents. The movement has over 5,000 indigenous ministers and nearly 1,000 missionaries serving outside their home countries. More than 900 of the latter are from North America. The movement's leadership denies that over the years the emphasis on sanctification as a crisis-experience and on miraculous healing has been modified, but inevitably the transdenominational character has been replaced by a self-conscious, broadly evangelical denomination not classifiable with the Calvinistic, Wesleyan, Baptist, and premillennial streams which flowed into it.

CHRISTIAN ENDEAVOR SOCIETY. The Young People's Society of Christian Endeavor was the first widespread nondenominational youth organization in the American churches. Begun by pastor Francis E. Clark* to conserve the results of special meetings in connection with the Week of Prayer, January 1881, it soon spread to other churches and ultimately around the world. Though later many denominations withdrew to form their own youth societies, on its seventy-fifth anniversary CE could still claim about three million members. Basically it is a church-connected society conducted exclusively by and for young people. Through its pledge, its weekly devotional meeting which once a month becomes a consecration meeting, and its various committees, it encourages young people to confess Christ and to serve him in fellowship with other young people in the Church. HAROLD R. COOK

CHRISTIAN ETHICS. A wide variety of views on the relation between the Christian faith and moral decision has been held by Christians, and this is reflected in important differences over concrete issues such as war, race, and social morality, and on its relationship to other major religions and philosophical views. These differences emerge early in the history of the church with the Augustinian emphasis on the need for renewal of the human will and the search for God as man's chief good, rather than on detailed duties (e.g., Didache). Perfect moral freedom is to be found in obedience to God. Similarly in Reformation theology and again in Neoorthodox theology, moral obligations arise out of a direct encounter with God and depend on His sovereign will. Moral problems are a matter of the will, not the intellect; hence the need for the regenerative power of God to enable one to do what is right. Luther sees God as giving the believer freedom—to serve so that the Christian is both "subject to none and subject to all." Calvin stressed the subjection of the Christian to the law and the Gospel, though for the unbeliever the law is a reminder of his inability to fulfill God's commands and may therefore lead him to repentance.

Puritanism is indebted to Calvin for its sense of divine sovereignty and, with the teaching on the civil magistrate, attempted to place the whole of society under God's law, though there were differences, e.g., about the degree of religious toleration. Greater emphasis was placed on the Bible as defining specific unchangeable duties to God and the neighbor, and to these many Puritans added further detailed instructions. Examples of this Reformed tradition are found today in the work of John Murray and Carl F.H. Henry.

Neoorthodox theology shares with the Augustinian tradition the view that of ourselves we cannot know the good, the will of God. This is known only through revelation, not to be identified with the Bible. The command to love God and one's neighbor does not vary in intention, but in content according to the conditions with which it deals. Ethics is essentially a matter of free decision, and it is not possible to know beforehand what the requirements of God are for any situation. This is the interpretation of the Christian ethic to be found in the work of H.E. Brunner*; the same motif appears in Bonhoeffer's* call for discipleship, and in Bultmann's* call to "radical obedience." This view has led to the development and popularization of "situation ethics" and koinonia ethics.

The Roman Catholic approach to ethics depends on the notion of natural law. Morality is "natural" in the sense that it has its source in rational reflection on the true "end" of human life. The pluralism of modern Western civilization makes this implausible. The extent to which the church is thought necessary to enable people to discern their duty has varied. Theologians such as Karl Rahner have tried to modify the rigidities (as they see it) of the classic natural law position by stressing (in Neoorthodox fashion) the importance of the individual and the concrete. Debates on birth control and abortion show the extent to which the traditional position has been eroded by secular utilitarian morality, or by truly biblical insights, or "situationalism."

CHRISTIAN REFORMED CHURCH. An American denomination with its background in Dutch Calvinism. In the Netherlands, conservative dissatisfaction with modernism and doctrinal laxness led to the secession (Afscheiding) of 1834. A group of seceders emigrated in 1846, settling in western Michigan under H. Van Raalte. They joined the Dutch Reformed Church; for the ultraconservatives among them, this was an uneasy union from the start, and in 1857 four congregations separated and formed the Christian Reformed Church. For some decades its growth was gradual. In 1886 a second and much larger secession (the Doleantie) took place in the Netherlands. Conservative Calvinist emigrants to the United States tended to join the Christian Reformed Church, which now grew rapidly. A seminary was established in the 1890s, a system of Calvinistic day schools started, and by World War I a college established (Calvin College). Membership, including children, was around 100,000. During the 1920s, controversy over "liberalism" and "ultra-Calvinism" erupted; H. Hoeksema, denying God's common grace (gratia generalis) to the nonelect, formed the Protestant Reformed Church. After World War II a wave of emigration from the Netherlands to Canada produced additional members for the Christian Reformed Church, which now includes over 275,000 souls. Growth has been primarily through immigration from the Netherlands and through internal growth. The church has associated with it three colleges and a large system of private elementary and high schools. It has been notable for adherence to Calvinistic orthodoxy. Its headquarters are in Grand Rapids, Michigan.

CHRISTIAN SCIENCE. The religion which had its origin in Mary Baker Eddy.* She claimed it came to her by direct revelation, and that Christian Science's definitive book, Science and Health, With a Key to the Scriptures, was written by her under divine dictation, though she conceded that a clergyman edited its poor grammar. Mrs. Eddy affirmed the inspiration of the Scriptures, but made the same affirmation for her own book which takes priority over Scripture with its not-to-be-changed-or-doubted key to the Scriptures. There are more than 2,000 Church of Christ, Scientist groups in the USA, and fewer than 1,000 in the rest of the world. The Mother Church is in Boston.

A distinctive feature of Christian Science is that it is never preached. The church has no preachers, no sermons. Instead, each church has a First and Second Reader who are obligated to read a selection of Scripture and a selection from Science and Health. No comments, explanations, or interpretive remarks are permitted, decreed the founder. Thus Christian Science received and maintains its final meaning, and protects the special status of Mary Baker Eddy by excluding the possibility that a greater than she should arise. She is the first and the last word about the truth of Christian Science.

Christian Science's one truth is that God as Spirit is All in All. Everything is Mind or Spirit—or, rather, there is no reality except Mind or Spirit. Mind, or Spirit, is Truth, Love, Power, Life, Goodness. Materiality is evil, sin, sickness, death, unreality. Since God is All, man is coexistent with God and his being, therefore, resides eternally in, and is not to be differentiated from, God's being.

Since Jesus of Nazareth is a physical man, he is not to be identified with God; only Christ, as the Principle of Mind, is identified with God. Jesus neither died on the cross nor arose from the grave. Jesus left the grave knowing that he had not died, that no man can die. Each of us must come to that knowledge; from discernment of the illusory character of death, our salvation comes. In the name of this same metaphysical idealism, Christian Science tolerates marriage (Mary was thrice married) and such things as food and money (Mary had great interest in the sale of her book and in the acquisition of money) since in the imperfection of their faith men do not wholly accept the fact that God, or Mind, is All. Everything Christianity posits in terms of the biblical teaching about creation, fall, and redemption, Christian Science declares to be unreality.

It is a mistake to think of Christian Science as a faith-healing religion. It does not claim to heal sickness, for it claims sickness is an illusion. Nor does Christian Science claim to save men, for it teaches that all which men could be saved from is unreal. It takes neither sickness nor sin seriously. One might add that if Christian Science took itself seriously, it could dispense not only with Readers as well as preachers, but also with its key to the Scriptures as well as with Scripture, and no less with Mary Baker Eddy herself. The latter's claim to fame rests on her use of both these writings to overcome what by Christian Science's own claim is really nothing at all. For God is All.

CHRISTIAN SOCIALISM. By definition the term applies to the activities of a group of Anglicans between 1848 and 1854, but their ideas inspired subsequent generations. The group, which formed as a response to the Chartist fiasco of 1848, consisted of F.D. Maurice,* J.M.F. Ludlow,* and Charles Kingsley,* though later they were joined by Tom Hughes, Archie Campbell, Vansittart Neale, and others. They reacted against the dominant utilitarianism of the age, laissez-faire economics, and the indifference of the Anglican Church to social issues. Though not united politically, they were united in believing that Christianity stood for a structure of society which would enable men to live and work as brethren, and that competition is not a universal law. Ludlow was the founder of the movement, but Maurice was its prophet and thinker. Maurice had a dread of societies and hated the prospect of Christian Socialism's becoming a party. He aimed to "Christianise Socialism and to Socialise Christendom, not to Christian-Socialise the universe."

The day following the failure of the Charter, the group brought out a poster introducing the Christian element into socialism. This was followed by the short-lived, much-criticized journal Politics for the People. Workers suspected this journal as a middle-class trap, but in 1849 the group began regular meetings with workingmen, which improved relations. Kingsley, meanwhile, wrote his novels Yeast and Alton Locke in defense of working-class aspirations, and Ludlow produced a program of founding workers' cooperatives. In 1850 associations of tailors, bakers, needlewomen, builders, bootmakers, and printers were formed, together with a Society for the Promotion of Working Men's Associations. Through lack of money, some of the associations foundered, but the group did make a direct contribution to the Industrial and Providential Societies Act (1852), which gave cooperatives their charter. In 1850 a new journal Christian Socialist appeared and met with much hostility. The driving force of the group was its Monday evening Bible study, though on Fridays it met to discuss social problems and the action to be taken. There were, however, clashes in the group, and from associations Maurice began to turn his attention to education, founding in 1854 the first workingmen's college, soon to be followed by others throughout the country.

The failure of several associations, the rising prosperity of England, and the indifference of the church at large ended the Christian Socialists, but the movement marked the beginning of modern social concern in the Anglican Church, inspired the later Guild of St. Matthew, the Christian Social Union, and the twentieth-century protests, as well as influenced trades unions, cooperative legislation, and working-class education.

CHRISTIAN YEAR, THE. The early Christians who were mainly Jews were used not only to keeping one day in the week as separate but also to marking the year with certain religious festivals, notably Passover, Tabernacles, and Pentecost. From early times Christians kept a commemoration of Christ's resurrection. This was held at Passover time and was finally fixed on the Sunday following Passover. Pentecost was then celebrated at the appropriate time; the fifty days between the two were days of joy and rejoicing. The choice of 25 December (in the East, 6 January) for the birth of Christ is almost certainly because that day was the great pagan day of honor to the sun, and in Rome in the fourth century it was transformed into a Christian festival.

From the fourth century the Christian calendar became more historical in character, and Holy Week and Ascension Day appeared. Pentecost became the day of the giving of the Holy Spirit. Lent arose out of the custom of preparing catechumens for baptism at Easter. Saints' days came into the calendar either through the commemoration of a martyrdom or through the date of a dedication of a church in honor of a particular saint. The advantage of the Christian Year is that through the church services, and in particular the choice of Scripture passages to be read, worshipers are regularly reminded of the great events of the Christian faith and a balance is kept between them. In recent years there have been various suggestions for modification of the calendar, particularly in relation to Advent and Lent, and some demand, supported by secular sources, for a fixed date for Easter.

CHRISTLIEB, THEODOR (1833-1889). German preacher and professor of pastoral theology. Born in Württemberg and educated at Stuttgart and Tübingen, he held a tutorship in Montpellier followed by two German curacies, then worked in Islington, London (1858-65) as minister to the local German population. In 1865 he became pastor at Friedrichaften where he influenced members of the German royal family. From 1868 to the end of his life he held the chair of pastoral theology at Bonn, where he taught many generations of theological students, upheld conservative views against German biblical critics despite much opposition, and organized missionary work. At Bonn he influenced Prince William (later the emperor) in the latter's student days (1877-80). Christlieb's fine and often original sermons still make stimulating reading. His wife wrote his biography (1892).

CHRISTMAS. The English name for the Feast of the Nativity of Christ kept on 25 December by the Western Church. There is no evidence of a Feast of the Nativity before the fourth century, except possibly among the Basilidians. The earliest mention of 25 December is in the Philocalian Calendar, compiled in 354, which cites its observance in Rome in 336. It would not appear to have been celebrated in Antioch until approximately 375. By 380 it was being observed in Constantinople, and by 430 in Alexandria. It was still unknown in Jerusalem early in the fifth century—it was not until the sixth century that the Nativity was finally detached from 6 January and celebrated on 25 December. By the middle of the fifth century it was being gradually observed throughout East and West. The Armenians still observe 6 January, the closely related Feast of the Epiphany, as Christmas Day.

There is no authoritative historical evidence as to the day or month of Christ's birth in Jerusalem. 25 December was the date of a Roman pagan festival inaugurated in 274 as the birthday of the unconquered sun which at the winter solstice begins again to show an increase in light. Sometime before 336 the Church in Rome, unable to stamp out this pagan festival, spiritualized it as the Feast of the Nativity of the Sun of Righteousness. Christmas in the Eastern Church celebrates the birth of Christ together with the visit of the shepherds and the adoration of the wise men. In the Western Church the adoration of the Magi is attached to Epiphany on 6 January. In the Roman Catholic Church three masses are usually said to symbolize the birth of Christ eternally in the bosom of the Father, from the womb of Mary and mystically in the soul of the faithful. The traditional customs associated with Christmas have been derived from several sources. The merrymaking and the exchange of presents find their origin in the Roman Saturnalia festival (17-24 December), and the greenery and lights come from the Kalends of January (1 January, the Roman New Year) with its solar associations. The Germano-Celtic Yule rites introduced the tradition of feasting and fellowship. In the USA (and in England during the Commonwealth) Christian celebrations were at first suppressed by the Puritans, who objected to their pagan origins. Since the nineteenth century the celebration of Christmas has become increasingly popular.

CHRISTOLOGY. The study of the person of Christ. Our Lord is unambiguously called God by the NT writers (John 1:1,18; 20:28; Col. 2:9; Titus 2:13; Heb. 1:8,10). The truth of His divinity pervades all strata of NT witness and teaching. He is called the Son of God, and while this does refer to His sonship by incarnation (Luke 1:35; John 1:34; Rom. 1:4; Heb. 1:2), it is not limited to the Incarnation because the terms relate Him to the Father as His "own" Son in a special way (Matt. 11:27; John 5:18). In John the terms "Father" and "Son" are not used only temporally but on the footing of eternity (John 3:13; 17:5; 1 John 4:10). "Son of God" is certainly a title of and claim to deity (Matt. 16:16; 26:63-65; Luke 22:70,71; John 19:7). "Only begotten Son" is to be understood in relation to Christ's preincarnate dignity and privilege (Rom. 8:29; Col. 1:15-18; Heb. 1:6) and in the special sense of "begotten from everlasting," begotten from the being not the will of the Father. The begetting is an eternal fact of the divine nature.

Christ is the Word of God. "Logos" in John 1:1-18 is not explained, but is simply used to declare Christ's deity. Omission of the definite article in "the Word was God" means the Word is identified with the essential nature of God (cf. Rom. 9:5). OT titles ascribed to Him are inexplicable unless Christ is being identified with the nature of Yahweh (cf. Matt. 3:3 with Isa. 40:3; Acts 13:33 with Ps. 2:7, etc.). He is honored and worshiped as God (John 20:28; Phil. 2:10,11; Rev. 5:12-14, etc.). His name is associated with the Father and the Spirit on equal terms in the baptismal formula (Matt. 28:19), in the benediction (2 Cor. 13:14), and in the bestowal of eternal life (John 5:23,24). Finally, the whole biblical structure rests on the claim that redemption belongs to God alone (2 Cor. 5:19; 1 Tim. 2:5). The heart of Athanasius's great argument against Arius was that only God could redeem and reconcile.

The pressure of NT witness to the truth of Christ's humanity is intense, including His birth at Bethlehem (Luke 1:35), boyhood and growth at Nazareth (Luke 2:39-52), fasting and temptation (Matt. 4:1-11), weariness (John 4:6), and death (John 19:28-30; Acts 2:23,36). His true humanity is in part the condition of the work of redemption (Acts 2:22; Rom. 5:15; Phil. 2:7; 1 Tim. 2:5). NT Christology is concerned to show the ideal and normative character of Christ's humanity. His uniqueness is variously shown and emphasized including His birth from the Virgin Mary (Luke 1:34,35), His knowledge and foreknowledge (Matt. 11:27), His moral perfection (Luke 1:35; 2 Cor. 5:21), His teaching (Matt. 5—7), and His transfiguration and exaltation (2 Pet. 1:16-18).

In the patristic period Christology developed chiefly under pressure of the fourth-century Arian heresy. The creeds of Nicea (325) and Constantinople (381) reaffirmed Christ's full deity and full humanity. They insisted on the faith that Christ is truly God, not an intermediate being (which safeguarded the biblical doctrine of creation against Greek forms of thought), and that Christology must be adequate to the facts of redemptive experience, i.e., only God can redeem.

At the Council of Chalcedon* (451) the unity of Christ's person was affirmed, influenced by the differing traditions of the Alexandrian* and Antiochene* schools. Chalcedon does not purport to define the mystery, but to set limits outside which believing Christians cannot go: our Lord took on human nature, not an adult personality, the Godhood and Manhood are each whole and perfect, the two natures are united in one person, and we confess the one Christ.

Classical controversies in the early church reflect divergent viewpoints on the divinity and humanity of Christ. Those who started from the Manhood but failed to do justice to the Godhood of Christ included: Ebionites and Cerinthians who said Jesus was a man specially endowed by God for his mission (cf. 1 John 5:6-12); Adoptianist and Dynamic Monarchians who taught the Incarnation as the inspiration of Jesus by the Spirit at His baptism; and Nestorians who kept Christ's natures apart in the union, i.e., they advocated a prosopic rather than real union of the two natures in the one person. Others started from the Godhood but failed to do justice to the Manhood of Christ. They included: Docetists who made of our Lord's humanity merely appearance; Modalistic Monarchians who made of Christ a revelatory mode of the Father; Apollinarians who substituted the divine nature for the human nature; and Eutychians who said the human nature was swallowed up by the divine nature.

Modern christological controversy follows upon the quest for the historical Jesus. While the quest has been largely abandoned, recent NT scholarship nevertheless concludes that the inner witness of faith came to the disciples who knew Jesus of Nazareth in the flesh as a historical personality. It is not possible ultimately to bifurcate Jesus of Nazareth and the Christ of faith. Kenotic Christology has attempted to probe the meaning of Christ's self-emptying (Phil. 2:7). It has been fiercely attacked (W. Temple,* D.M. Baillie*), but most christological formulations attempt to take account of Christ's self-limitation in some way.

Modern Adoptianist Christology (the American theologian John Knox) is widespread. Through Jesus' goodness, the divine broke through into human life historically, which should be paralleled in our lives. This, however, is not the coming of the eternal Second Person of the Trinity into actual human existence. Others deny that revelation implies factual assertions (Paul Tillich*), which means for Christology that it is irrelevant to our faith if Jesus Christ had never actually lived on earth. The Incarnation becomes the projection of the Christ-Spirit into the world within man through the Christ-event. This sets up metaphysical and existential categories of interpretation rather than those of historical fall, incarnation, and redemption.

Christians confess the true and full Godhood and Manhood of Jesus Christ and the indivisible unity of His person. No theological formula is adequate to this greatest of all Christian mysteries. The Incarnation means the Son of God experienced fully the conditions of personal and individual manhood in such a way that as man He was yet one person with the Son of God. Christians confess they do not know the intensity of unity of the two natures necessary to achieve this, but they accept the apostolic witness. In Jesus Christ is revealed the perfection of God for man (Rom. 5:8-21; Heb. 2:14-18) in virtue of whose response to the Father's will men can respond in faith to become like Him by His Spirit.

CHRISTOPHERS. A movement established in 1945 among American Roman Catholics to promote the common good of society. Under the leadership of its founder, James Keller, it has sought to enlist individuals from all walks of life to become "Christophers"—a title derived from the Greek word meaning "Christ-bearers." They attempt to "overcome evil with good" (Rom. 12:21), and seek to penetrate and transform every social institution by expressing love for all men through concrete constructive actions in the varied spheres of government, labor, and industry, the family, education, entertainment, and the arts. With headquarters in New York City, the Christophers distribute a newsletter and numerous books, and broadcast their message through radio and television. HARRY SKILTON

CHRODEGANG (d.766). Bishop of Metz from 742, he was also appointed chancellor by Charles Martel and exercised an influence almost unique at that time in both church and state. He played a part in the severing of ties which bound Italy and Rome to the Byzantine Empire, and in the various conquests and acts of legislation which prepared for the unity of Christendom under the joint sovereignty of emperor and pope. His "rule" for his clergy was intended to revive discipline and abolish laxity, though they were not bound by vows of poverty or of unquestioning obedience. His canonical clergy lived together under his supervision. He founded monasteries at Gorze, Lorsch, and St. Arda. JAMES TAYLOR

CHROMATIUS (d.407). Bishop of his native Aquileia in N Italy from about 388. He encouraged others to advance biblical knowledge. Ambrose wrote an exposition of the prophecy of Balaam on his behalf, and his efforts helped to stimulate and finance the translation of the OT by Jerome, who dedicated to Chromatius a commentary on Habakkuk. He tried in vain to reconcile Jerome to Rufinus, whom he had baptized, in their dispute over the translation of the De Principiis of Origen. He persuaded the latter to translate Eusebius's church history and the Homilies on Joshua by Origen. When Chrysostom shared with him, together with Innocent of Rome and Venerius of Milan, his complaints about deposition, Chromatius wrote on his behalf to the emperor

Honorius. His extant writings are eighteen homilies on Matthew 3:15-17; 5; 6. G.T.D. ANGEL

CHRONICON EDESSENUM. An anonymous Syriac chronicle of events in Edessa from the time of its first king in 133/2 B.C. until A.D. 540. Its notices are derived from contemporary records in the city's archives and from works such as the Chronicle of Joshua the Stylite. There are only a few entries for the period prior to the Flood of Edessa in A.D. 201/2. The account of the flood, and of King Abgar's measures to prevent a repetition of the disaster, is given a disproportionate amount of attention, but supplies incidental information about the city's early history. Written from a basically orthodox standpoint, the majority of the entries concern the bishops of Edessa and their activities, though ecclesiastical matters of wider significance are noted. The chronicle was compiled about A.D. 550. ROBERT P. GORDON

CHRONICON PASCHALE. A chronicle composed shortly after 628, the point at which its record ended. The Vatican MS from which it is known is mutilated, ending in 627. The work takes its usual name from treatises about chronology and the calculation of Easter in its introduction. The birth of Christ is dated in the "year of the world" 5507, and His crucifixion in 5540. The chronicler expands the framework by excerpts from many sources, e.g., the Chronographies of Sextus Julius Africanus, the Bible, works of Eusebius and Epiphanius, the Fasti consulares, acts of the martyrs. For Byzantine history he follows John Malalas to the year 532, and after 600 records events contemporary with his own life. His name is unknown. His work was much read and used in the Byzantine period. It is of great value, especially for the later history, and for the history of chronological techniques and theories in the ancient Christian world. J.N. BIRDSALL

CHRONOGRAPHER OF A.D. 354, THE. A modern title given to a state directory compiled from fragments of MSS. Its chronicled entries cease at 354, when it might have been compiled by Dionysius Philocalus, the later calligrapher of Damasus I, for the use of Christians at Rome. It contains an illustrated state calendar (Roman holidays); a register of the consuls from A.U.C. 245 to A.D. 354; a list of city prefects from 254 to 354; a description of the fourteen districts of Rome; Easter tables from 312 to 354 (with an extension to 410); a chronicle of the world, called Chronica Horosii, which is a Latin version and extension to A.D. 334 of the chronicle of Hippolytus; a chronicle of the city to the death of Licinius (324/5); anniversaries of Roman bishops from 255 to 352 (= Depositio Episcoporum); the oldest existing list of martyrs (= Depositio Martyrum); a list of bishops of Rome from Peter to Liberius (352-66), defining the length of their episcopates (= Liberian Catalogue). This differs significantly from the early list in Irenaeus, which distinguishes the apostles Peter and Paul from the first bishop, Linus. G.T.D. ANGEL

CHRYSIPPUS (d.479). Religious writer. He left his home in Cappadocia in search of advice on the religious life at the monastery of Euthymius in Jerusalem. According to Cyril of Scythopolis, Juvenal of Jerusalem made him superior of the monastery and then of the Church of the Resurrection. He was ordained presbyter and later, about 469, appointed "guardian of the Holy Cross" at the Church of the Holy Sepulchre. Although he wrote copiously, his extant works are four panegyrics, on St. Theodor Teron, the Archangel Michael, the Mother of God, and John the Baptist. This last work is written in the rhetorical style of panegyrists, crammed with metaphors and similes and heavily illustrated with allusions to classical mythology. G.T.D. ANGEL

CHRYSOLOGUS, PETER (d. 449/450). Archbishop of Ravenna. Renowned preacher and conscientious administrator, he sought to eradicate pagan customs, to regulate the Lenten fast, and to correct delay of baptism by catechumens. When Eutyches was deposed by Flavian (448) and asked for support, Chrysologus replied sympathetically but referred him to Leo, writing, "We cannot listen to matters of faith without the consent of the Bishop of Rome." Apart from his extant sermons, no evidence of him survives until the ninth-century Liber Pontificalis of Agnellus. According to this legendary account, he was born at Imola and consecrated archbishop by Sixtus III (432-40). Recent examination of his works by Alejandro Olivar endorses the authenticity of all but eight of the 176 sermons traditionally attributed to him by Felix of Ravenna. Olivar adds fifteen sermons from other sources. G.T.D. ANGEL

CHRYSOSTOM, JOHN (c.344/354-407). Bishop of Constantinople. Born at Antioch of exalted Christian parents, he studied philosophy and rhetoric (under the celebrated pagan professor Libanius) before adopting the religious life under the direction of Melitius* and Diodore of Tarsus. Responsibility for his widowed mother curbed his monastic aspirations until about 373, when he became a hermit in the nearby mountains. Harsh austerities impaired his health, and he returned to Antioch to be made deacon by Melitius (381) and priest by Flavian (386), entrusted with preaching in the cathedral. Here in the next decade he delivered most of the series of sermons, chiefly on biblical books, which merited him the sixth-century name chrysostomos, "golden-mouthed." This most distinguished of Greek patristic preachers excelled in spiritual and moral application in the Antiochene tradition of literal exegesis, largely disinterested, even untutored in speculative and controversial theology. The Homilies on the Statues (387) mastered a congregation terrified of imperial retribution for wrecking statues in a tax riot.

In 398 John was unwillingly appointed patriarch of Constantinople, where his uncompromising reforming zeal and political innocence antagonized Empress Eudoxia and sundry clergy, including Theophilus, bishop of rival Alexandria, who contrived to have him condemned on twenty-nine charges, including Origenist heresy, at the Synod of the Oak* near Chalcedon (403). Deposed and exiled but rapidly recalled, he again infuriated Eudoxia, and after disobeying an imperial fiat to relinquish episcopal duties, which led to bloodshed at the Easter baptisms, he was again exiled (404) to Cucusus in Armenia Secunda; there he proved so accessible and influential that he was ordered to migrate to Pityus on the E Black Sea. He died of the rigors of this forced journey at Comana in Pontus (407). Pope Innocent I broke communion with Constantinople, Alexandria, and Antioch over John's deposition and resumed it only after his posthumous vindication. John's remains were honorably interred in Constantinople in 438.

John's writings, in an attractive Attic style, have nearly all survived. Besides hundreds of sermons (among them a set of recently discovered baptismal homilies and eight against the Jews), they comprise 236 letters concerning his second exile, and several practical treatises, including The Priesthood discussions on the monastic life, a pamphlet on the nurture of children (ed. A.M. Malingrey in Sources Chrétiennes, 1972; ET in M.L.W. Laistner, Christianity and Pagan Culture in the Later Roman Empire, 1951), and a polemical anti-Jewish apologia.

For his straightforward, if artless, integrity and his lively and earnest inculcation of Christian mores, John has enjoyed a wider esteem than any other Father. After Augustine, none was so popular with the Reformers.

CHURCH (Anglo-Saxon circe; from Gr. kuriakon, meaning "the Lord's," i.e., house or body). The English word renders the NT ekklēsia, used in the free city states of Greece to denote the assembly of citizens, called out from their homes to vote on legislation and transact other public business. As taken up into redemptive history, in the Septuagint ekklēsia refers to Israel as assembled for religious and cultic purposes (Deut. 31; 1 Kings 8). As such, Israel is the people of God, called by the divine initiative into holy convocation. Because of the essential continuity with Israel of the new people of God (Gal. 6:16), it is not surprising that the NT writers follow the usage of the Septuagint and speak of those who are united by a common confession of Jesus as Lord, as the church (ekklēsia), reserving the word synagogue (sunagōgē) for the assembly of the Jewish people. James 2:2 is the only exception to the usage.

The NT church was created out of the band of disciples associated with Jesus during His earthly ministry, who on the day of Pentecost received His Spirit poured out upon them, empowering them to witness to Him as the risen Christ (Acts 1:8). This "new humanity" (Eph. 2:15) takes the outward form of congregations of believers meeting in various places regularly for worship (Acts 20:7; Heb. 10:25) and governed by elders, after the analogy of the synagogue, who are chosen from their own numbers (Acts 14:23). With the rise of the office of monarchical bishop early in the second century, the institutional form of the church rapidly became episcopal, the unity of the churches being found in the bishops. Eventually (in the West) the bishop of Rome was recognized as supreme head of the church. Concomitantly with this development in the institutional form of the church, the original NT emphasis on fellowship and brotherhood (koinōnia) as the essence of the church recedes into the background. Although the churches emerging from the Reformation have rejected all claims to papal absolutism, yet they have also had to struggle, if to a lesser degree, to keep the church from becoming a mere institution.

In its spiritual essence the church has often been called (following Augustine and especially Luther) the "church invisible" in that its members enjoy the invisible grace of the indwelling Spirit (1 Cor. 12:4f.) who animates them as a body and unites them to Christ the head (Eph. 4:15,16). United thus in Christ and to one another, the church is the "communion of saints" and though sin yet clings to them, its members are sanctified by the Word and sacraments. This one, holy church (Eph. 4:4; 5:27) is apostolic, being built upon the foundation which the apostles laid in their teaching (Eph. 2:20), and embraces all men (Acts 10:13f.) in a catholic fellowship of faith working by love. The fellowship is visibly present wherever the Word is truly preached and the sacraments rightly administered. In the Reformed tradition (following Calvin), discipline, by which the integrity of Word and sacrament is ensured, has also been made a mark of the church as visible.

In recent times the question of the true nature and task of the church has been much discussed in the ecumenical movement. The fundamental article of the World Council of Churches* defines the council as a fellowship of churches which "confess our Lord Jesus Christ as God and Saviour." The churches which make up the council have understood themselves in terms of the following affirmation: the church, established through the will of the living God, is the fellowship of those who believe in Jesus Christ and is the chosen instrument for the mediation of salvation. The marks of the church on earth are the recognition of the word of God in Holy Scripture, the confession of God in Christ, the proclamation of the Word, the use of the sacraments, the existence of the office of the ministry, and the reality of communion in the exercise of faith and love. This statement was first drafted at the Lausanne Conference in 1927 and has been used as a kind of foundation document in subsequent assemblies of the WCC.

CHURCH, RICHARD WILLIAM (1815-1890). Dean of St. Paul's. Born in Portugal, he spent early years in Italy (1818-28) and in 1833 went to Oxford where he became fellow of Oriel (1838-52). From early evangelicalism he was moved through the influence and friendship of J.H. Newman* and others to High Churchmanship, in which cause he helped to found the Guardian in 1846. In 1851 he was appointed to the rectory of Whatley in Somerset, and in 1871 was appointed on Prime Minister Gladstone's recommendation as dean of St. Paul, a post he held until his death. Church's writings include Anselm (1870) and a much acclaimed work on The Oxford Movement, Twelve Years, 1833-1845 (1891). J.D. DOUGLAS

CHURCH ARMY. The conviction on the part of Wilson Carlile* that laymen should be trained to reach others for Christ led to the formation of the Church Army in 1882. While aggressively evangelistic in his outlook, Carlile, led by study of the Franciscan and Wesleyan movements, insisted from the start that the organization of the Church Army should represent a broad spectrum of the Church of England and that the officers should be dependent, not only on their own headquarters, but on the bishops and clergy in whose dioceses and parishes they worked. Despite considerable early opposition from clergy who objected to laymen ministering in consecrated buildings, it soon was playing a vigorous and invaluable part in evangelism through its caravans and missions, and these were allied to a social concern seen especially in its homes and its ministry to prisons. The Church Army also developed a role in the Anglican Church in other countries.

CHURCHES OF CHRIST (Great Britain). Also called Disciples. They began in sporadic reform movements in the eighteenth century, with Glasites, Baptists, Haldaneites, and Sandemanians all contributing to their formation. The first known church was at Dungannon, Ireland (1804), the second at Auchtermuchty, Scotland (1807). They have been organized since 1842, when there were fifty congregations and 1,300 members. They practice weekly breaking of bread and believers' baptism. Church government is congregational. They have an ordained ministry trained since 1920 at Overdale College, Birmingham. Both sexes can be locally ordained as deacons and elders. They have been responsible for missions in India and Africa. The church is a member of the World Council of Churches. Latest figures available show 119 congregations and 7,000 members. Since 1825 they have maintained contact with the Churches of Christ in the USA,* receiving ministerial and financial help from them in recent years. J.W. MEIKLEJOHN

CHURCHES OF CHRIST (USA). These churches share many doctrinal beliefs and a common heritage with the Disciples of Christ. They follow a congregational pattern of church polity which they regard as being in accordance with NT teaching. Indeed, to align all church practice and belief with the Scriptures is a major goal of the Churches of Christ. Nothing is to be accepted as an article of faith or as a condition of communion but "what is expressly taught and enjoined ... in the Word of God," which is "the perfect constitution for the worship, discipline, and government of the New Testament Church." The Bible is the best source of information about God, far better than creeds or statements of dogma. The Churches of Christ affirm their belief in the Trinity, the Virgin Birth, the vicarious atonement, the necessity of spiritual rebirth, and the need for believer's baptism by immersion.

The histories of the Churches of Christ and the Disciples of Christ were for all practical purposes the same between 1832 and 1906. Earlier, in 1824, Alexander Campbell,* who in 1811 organized the Disciples, and Presbyterian minister Barton Stone* met each other and found they shared many beliefs. In 1832 at Lexington, Kentucky, the two men led their respective groups into a union to form the "Christian Church (Disciples of Christ)," a church designed to imitate as closely as possible the church life described in the Book of Acts. The creation in 1849 of a missionary society and the use of organ music in church services began to bring division within the ranks. Moreover, the Federal Religious Census of 1906 listed the Churches of Christ and the Disciples of Christ separately. The division was based more on differences of practice than on differences in doctrine.

JOHN D. WOODBRIDGE

CHURCHES OF GOD. A name designating about 200 various religious bodies in the USA. Adherents feel the term avoids a doctrinal connotation while stressing a scriptural church designation. Historically the name was first adopted by a revival group within the German Reformed Church (American) in 1825. Later they used the title "Churches of God in North America." At present the name serves also to identify several bodies produced by post-Civil War revivals.

Church of God movements divide into five groups, the first being those of Pentecostal persuasion. Emphasis is placed upon the gifts of prophecy, divine healing, and speaking in tongues as evidence of entire sanctification. Two early leaders were R.G. Spurling and A.J. Tomlinson.* The (Original) Church of God, Inc., with headquarters in Chattanooga, Tennessee, was organized in 1856 from a split in Spurling's followers. In 1970 it reported fifty churches and 6,000 members. The first Spurling group (1886), now known as the Church of God (Cleveland, Tenn.), listed 272,276 members in 4,024 churches in 1972. Tomlinson withdrew from this body in 1923, forming what is now the Church of God of Prophecy. His death in 1943 divided the church into two bodies, one following each of his two sons. The Tennessee organization retained the 1923 name, while the other group, moving to New York, chose "Church of God" for a title. In 1971 it listed a membership of 75,290 in 1,933 churches. The Tennessee faction claimed 48,708 in 1,531 churches. A small splinter group left the Church of God of Prophecy under G.R. Kent in 1957, forming the Church of God of All Nations. In 1923 the Church of God by Faith, Inc., was chartered in Florida. Its headquarters in Jacksonville reported 5,300 members in 105 churches in 1970. C.H. Mason and C.P. Jones of Arkansas founded the Church of God in Christ in 1895. Mason and Jones were rejected by Baptist bodies due to Pentecostalism. In 1970 the church listed 419,466 members in 4,150 churches. The Church of God and Saints in Christ came into being in 1896 under W.S. Crowdy, a Negro deacon. Sometimes called "Black Jews," the movement stresses Jewish ritual.

A second group, in the Wesleyan pattern, is essentially "holiness" in its teaching and emphasizes a conversion experience, followed by Holy Spirit baptism which brings entire sanctification. The principal churches in this category are the Church of God (Anderson, Indiana) and the Church of God (Apostolic).

A third division arose from the Second Advent Movement. The Church of God (Seventh Day), which keeps the Sabbath, is headquartered in Denver and listed 5,000 members in seventy-six churches in 1970. A sister body in Salem, West Virginia, claimed seven churches and 2,000 members. The Church of God General Conference (Abrahamic Faith) was organized in Oregon, Illinois, in 1888 and listed 124 churches with 6,700 members in 1971. Like their Seventh-day Adventist counterparts, these churches hold a strong premillennial eschatology.

A fourth division cannot be catalogued, since there are literally thousands of small "storefront" churches which use the title "Church of God" but belong to no specific denomination.

Finally, the organization founded by H.W. Armstrong in 1947 has used the title "Worldwide Church of God." This American version of British Israelitism* has major defects in several doctrines and is classed by most scholars as a cult rather than church or sect.

CHURCH OF THE BRETHREN. One of the three major "peace churches" of the USA, the Brethren originated in 1708 at Schwarzenau, Germany, as part of the Pietist protest against the state church. They emphasized a warm enthusiasm as well as a study of the Bible and holy living. Their leader, Alexander Mack, Sr.* and seven companions were baptized by trine immersion and began to live by the Brethren practices. These included—in addition to believer's baptism by immersion three times forward—the love feast (including a meal, the Eucharist, and the washing of the saints' feet), anointing of the sick with oil, laying on of hands for Christian service; congregational church government; and opposition to war, oaths, secret societies, and "worldly" clothes and habits. Because of persecution many Brethren fled in 1719 to America, after a short period in Holland, and by 1729 Mack himself had come to the New World. During the American Revolution they refused to fight, but aided some of the German mercenaries who fought on the British side. Again they were persecuted and forced from the eastern urban centers to follow the frontier westward. At present the Church of the Brethren, with headquarters in Elgin, Illinois, and a membership of about 200,000, is the largest Brethren body, but because of a division in 1882 there are also Brethren churches with centers at Ashland, Ohio, and Winona Lake, Indiana (the Brethren Church and the National Fellowship of Brethren Churches respectively). In addition there is a group called the Old German Baptist Brethren or Old Order Brethren.

CHURCHWARDENS. In the Church of England this office, dating from about the fourteenth century, concerns the lay guardians of a parish church. The churchwardens are responsible for the business and financial side of parochial activity, especially the care of church furnishings and fabric, the seating arrangements, the collection and distribution of alms, and the keeping of order during worship. There are usually two wardens who should be chosen jointly each year in Easter week, by the congregation and the incumbent; but in practice the incumbent has frequently chosen one (the vicar's warden) and the congregation the other (the people's warden). They are officers of the parish, but their report to the bishop (or archdeacon) at his annual visitation illustrates their role as officers of the bishop also.

HOWARD SAINSBURY

CIMABUE (fl. c.1240-c.1300). Florentine painter. Little is known of his life, but his fame is attested by Dante in Divine Comedy (Purgatory 11: 94). His style is heavily influenced by the Palaeologan painters of Byzantium. He used also the methods of the Western painters of the Florentine Duecento such as Coppo di Marcovaldo and the Florence Baptistry mosaicists. The works of Cimabue include "The Madonna Enthroned With Angels," and frescoes in the lower and upper churches of San Francisco in Assisi. His painting of the Crucifixion is very impressive with its huge sagging body of Christ, weeping angels, and despairing mourners. Because of his creativity and expressiveness, Cimabue has been considered the first outstanding Western painter.

ROBERT G. CLOUSE

CIRCUIT RIDER. Early Methodist preacher who visited regularly on horseback a number of appointments. Typically poor, single, young, and uneducated, he lived with the people he served. Developed by Wesley, the itineracy was perfected on the American frontier, where it greatly contributed to the advance of Methodism under the leadership of Francis Asbury.*

CIRCUMCELLIONS. Fanatical Donatist* fringe. Their origins are obscure, perhaps antedating Donatism, and their name of uncertain meaning, though interpreting the cellae around (circum) which they assembled as martyrs' shrines (rather than barns, storehouses) harmonizes with their enthusiastic martyr-dominated ethos. They are most convincingly understood in religious terms, as pilgrim "warriors (agonistici) of Christ" marked by apocalyptic defiance of worldly powers, and not as a social or economic grouping only accidentally connected with Donatism. Neither their passion for righting injustice nor their support for local anti-Roman revolts justifies casting them in a revolutionary role. Their asceticism and undisciplined wanderings led to their being confused with Eastern monks (cf. the suggested derivation of their name from monastic cellae), and their violence, randomly exerted for egalitarian ends, found frequent outlet in intimidating Donatists against joining the Catholic Church.

CIRCUMCISION. Practiced in ancient times in many parts of the world, it was especially important for Israel, for whom it was a sign of God's covenant with Abraham. It is still practiced by Jews, Muslims, and other peoples. It was abandoned early by the Christian Church, notably when the Jerusalem Council (Acts 15) decided it was not obligatory on Gentiles. From a remote date it has been in use in the Church of Ethiopia, where it is performed before baptism, between the third and eighth day after birth.

CISTERCIANS. A Benedictine order founded at Cîteaux in 1098 by Robert of Molesme,* it emphasized poverty, simplicity, and eremitical solitude. Approved by Paschal II in 1100, they were unlike other reformed Benedictine monasteries, rejecting all feudal incomes and basing their economy on the monks' labor assisted by lay brothers. Liturgy was simplified together with church vestments and furnishings; their habit was white or gray under a black scapular. Expansion was early and rapid, due mostly to Bernard,* founder and abbot of Clairvaux (1115), who was responsible for organizing sixty-five new houses in France and abroad, making more than 300 by his death (1153); by 1200 there were over 500 throughout Europe. With Bernard, concerns were widened much beyond contemplation to crusades, missionaries, and pastoral concern for surrounding population.

General decline came in the fifteenth century, assisted by the Reformation and civil wars. Reform followed in the sixteenth century, not from Cîteaux but within congregations, notably the Feuillants* and Common and Strict Observance communities which were, however, dissolved entirely by the French Revolution. After the Bourbon restoration, the Strict Observance was revived by former members of La Trappe (Trappists*), insisting on contemplation, while the Common Observance took to teaching and pastoral duties. In 1892 both became completely separate, though fully Cistercian, and each continues widely established.

CLANDESTINITY. Celebration of marriage in secret without proper authority. Because of its prevalence in the later Middle Ages, both Protestants and Catholics were anxious for reform: Luther, e.g., regarded as invalid marriages contracted without parental knowledge and consent. Melanchthon, Brenz, Calvin, and Beza followed his views. Clandestinity posed a problem for Roman Catholic canonists with their concept of marriage as a sacrament. The Council of Trent decreed that though clandestine marriages were true and proper, in future all such marriages in places where the decree obtained would be reckoned as null. All marriages were to be before the parish priest. In Britain, publicity is secured by the publication of banns or issue of a license; clandestinity is commonly held not to invalidate marriage. In 1754 civil legislation was introduced to prevent clandestine marriages (Lord Hardwicke's Act). The Marriage Act (1823) required as a minimum of publicity two or more credible witnesses besides the minister.

CLAPHAM SECT. The name given, probably for the first time, by Sir James Stephen in an article in the Edinburgh Review (1844) to the group of wealthy Anglican Evangelicals who lived mainly in Clapham. Its characteristics were those of a large intimate family. Its most famous figure was William Wilberforce,* but around him was a very remarkable galaxy of talent including Henry Thornton, the banker whose home at Battersea Rise was in many ways the center of the "family"; John Venn, rector of Clapham; Charles Grant, a director of the East India Company; Lord Teignmouth, a governor-general of India; James Stephen, a leading barrister; Zachary Macaulay;* and William Smith, the dissenting member of Parliament who can be counted as a member though he was a Unitarian. Other intimates of the circle included some who did not live in Clapham, such as Hannah More,* Grenville Sharp, Isaac Milner,* and Charles Simeon.*

The establishment and support of a colony in Sierra Leone for ex-slaves, the abolition of the slave trade in 1807 and of slavery in the British colonies in 1833 are their most famous achievements, owing much to a skillful ability to mobilize public opinion and thus to bring pressure to bear on Parliament. There were also significant attempts to widen the basis of education, to make the evangelical message known in carefully timed and presented works for the upper classes, as in Wilberforce's Practical View, and for the lower classes, as in Hannah More's Cheap Repository Tracts. There was a formidable commitment to a great variety of societies and pressure groups for social improvement. Aristocratic, conservative, and upholders of the status quo they were, yet there was a liberalism in their conservatism not common to men of their background. They were also closely connected with the foundation of the Church Missionary Society (1799), the British and Foreign Bible Society (1804), and the successful parliamentary battle of 1813 to legalize the sending of missionaries to India.

CLARE (c.1193-1253). First abbess of the Poor Clares.* Born at Assisi into a wealthy family, she was attracted by the rule and lives of St. Francis and his friars. At the age of sixteen she ran away from home. At Portiuncala in 1212 Francis usurped the bishop's privilege and received her profession as a nun. At first he placed her in a Benedictine convent, but when her sister Agnes and other women came to join her, he established a community at St. Damian, based on Franciscan lines, with Clare as abbess (1215). This community, the Poor Clares (Clarisses), practiced a strict discipline. Clare governed the convent till her death, though she would have preferred to wander like the friars and to look after the poor and ill. She was canonized by Alexander IV in 1255.

CLARENDON CODE. The Cavalier or Pensioner Parliament first met on 8 May 1661. It passed a series of severe statutes known as the Clarendon Code. These were the Corporation Act (1661), the Act of Uniformity* (1662), Conventicle Act* (1664), and Five Mile Act* (1665). Their aim was to remove from the ministry of the church as well as from national and local government those who did not subscribe to the liturgy and doctrines of the Church of England. They are named after Sir Edward Hyde, earl of Clarendon (1609-74), who was the Lord Chancellor under Charles II, but he was not wholly responsible for them.

CLARK, FRANCIS EDWARD (1851-1927). Father of the Christian Endeavor* movement. Born Francis E. Symmes in Aylmer, Quebec, he was orphaned of both parents before he was eight and was adopted by an uncle, the Rev. E.W. Clark. He prepared for the Congregational ministry; his first pastorate was Williston Church, Portland, Maine, where he increased the membership in two years from fifty to 400. In February 1881 he started the first Christian Endeavor Society. In 1883 he went to Phillips Church, South Boston. By 1887 rapid expansion of Christian Endeavor led him to give it full time as president of the United Society and editor of The Christian Endeavor World. During the next forty years he made five trips around the world for this youth work. HAROLD R. COOK

CLARK, WILLIAM SMITH (1826-1886). American agriculturalist. President of Massachusetts Agricultural College, he came to the notice of Japanese government emissaries who invited him to establish a similar institution in their country. In July 1876 the dynamic Clark reached Sapporo, capital of Japan's newly colonized northern island, and within eight months set up a college, preparatory school, and experimental farm, introduced crops and trees, agricultural buildings and methods, and converted all sixteen students to Christianity. The young believers, exemplifying his parting words, "Boys, be ambitious," won all the second class who also signed Clark's "Covenant of Believers in Jesus." The zealous group became known as the Sapporo Band, whose most notable member was Kanzo Uchimura.*

CLARKE, ADAM (1762?-1832). Methodist theologian. Born in County Londonderry, he received a local education, supplemented through John Wesley's influence in England at Kingswood School, Bristol. Having become a Methodist in 1778, he was appointed circuit preacher in Wiltshire in 1782, later traveling all over the British Isles as his fame grew. From 1805 he lived chiefly in London, and was three times president of the Methodist conference. Awarded an Aberdeen LL.D., his scholarship was impressive, encompassing classics, patristics, oriental languages and literature, history, geology and natural science, and even the occult. Theologically orthodox in most things, Clarke nevertheless denied Christ's eternal sonship while maintaining His divinity; held that Judas repented and was saved; and rejected Calvin's view of predestination. His great achievement was an eight-volume Bible commentary (1810-26). Selected to edit Rymer's Foedera, he was forced by ill-health to relinquish the task at volume 2. Clarke's miscellaneous works in thirteen volumes were printed in 1836.

J.D. DOUGLAS

CLARKE, JOHN (1609-1676). One of the founders of Rhode Island. Born near London and trained as a physician, he left England in 1637 for Boston. Following a dispute there with the Puritans when he supported the banished Anne Hutchinson,* Clarke and other colonists were driven out and bought from the Indians an island they called Rhodes. In April 1639 he was one of those who settled Newport, where he practiced medicine, participated in local government, and became also pastor of the Baptist church. Having collaborated with Roger Williams,* Clarke's unifying zeal was further seen in his accompanying Williams to England in 1651 to seek a new charter. Williams went home three years later, but Clarke remained as sole agent for the colony until 1663, when he secured from Charles II the royal charter that determined Rhode Island law until 1842. He resumed his pastorate at Newport and was three times elected deputy governor of the colony.

J.D. DOUGLAS

CLARKE, SAMUEL (1675-1729). Philosophical theologian. Son of a British member of Parliament, he was educated at the Norwich Free School and at Caius College, Cambridge. There Rohault's System of Natural Philosophy (in indifferent Latin), a Cartesian work, was in use. While still a student Clarke retranslated this (published 1697) and in footnotes explained how much better Newton's physics explained the facts. As a result, the views of Newton, who became his friend, were quickly accepted in the university. After ordination Clarke wrote several theological texts, including paraphrases of the gospels, and later threw himself, on the Christian side, into the controversies of the day—the immortality of the soul, ethics, the Trinity, natural theology, Locke's empiricism, the materialism of Hobbes, Spinoza's pantheism, etc. He is best known for his Boyle Lectures of 1704 (Being and Attributes of God) and 1705 (Discourse on Natural and Revealed Religion), in which he argued for belief in God and in the Christian religion, in the form of propositions in mathematical style. Learning that Newtonianism was being blamed for the decline of natural theology, Clarke corresponded with Leibnitz,* defending Newtonianism and arguing that it supported rather than endangered the principles of religion. Clarke is said to have had a happy, playful disposition. The level of his thinking was above that of his contemporaries, who occasionally suspected him of heresy; but for this, it is said, he might have become archbishop of Canterbury. His Works (4 vols.) were published in 1738-42.

R.E.D. CLARK

CLARKE, WILLIAM NEWTON (1841-1912). Baptist minister and theologian. Born in Cazenovia, New York, he was educated at Madison (now Colgate) University and Theological Seminary. Particularly influential was his pastorate at Newton, Massachusetts (1869-80), where he was drawn to the liberalism of Andover and Newton theologians. From 1890 to 1908 he taught Christian theology at Colgate. Sensitive and cosmopolitan, he stressed the evolution of divine revelation and human goodness. His combination of Christian theology and evolutionary thinking is best expressed in his major work, An Outline of Christian Theology (1898), the first systematic theology of liberalism in America. By 1914 this work, described by Lyman Abbott as the most religious theology ever written, was in its twentieth printing.

DARREL BIGHAM

CLARKSON, THOMAS (1760-1846). Abolitionist. While at St. John's College, Cambridge, he wrote in 1785 a prize-winning essay on slavery, which influenced him to devote his life to the cause of abolition. Leaving Cambridge, he was ordained deacon in the Church of England, though he rarely exercised a ministry. In 1787 he joined with William Wilberforce* and others to campaign in the country and in the House of Commons for abolition, and thenceforth his life is the history of the antislavery struggle, in which he spent most of his fortune. His main work was collecting information for the campaign, which achieved success with the ending of the slave trade in 1807 and emancipation in the British dominions in 1833. After the outbreak of the French Revolution he propagated ideas of abolition in France, and after 1815 he presented his views at the European Congresses. Among his written works are an account of the abolition of the African slave trade and books on Quakerism, religious origins, war, and baptism.

JOHN A. SIMPSON

CLASS MEETING. Dating from the early organization of Methodism, this was part of John Wesley's policy to increase understanding of the faith and to ensure growth in holy living. Members of each local society are divided into groups that meet weekly under a lay leader for "fellowship in Christian experience."

CLAUDE, JEAN (1619-1687). French Huguenot* preacher. After studying theology at Montauban, he began his work as a pastor at La Treisse. Next he moved to St. Affrique before settling at Nîmes in 1654; here he also lectured in the Protestant Academy. In 1661, the year when a synod over which he presided refused the idea of reunion with Rome, he was prohibited from preaching. He moved to a professorship at Montauban (1662-66), but again fell foul of the government. Between 1666 and the revocation of the Edict of Nantes* (1685) he was in Charenton, Paris, where as a respected Huguenot leader he engaged in controversy with leading Roman Catholics, the Jansenist Arnauld* and the celebrated J.B. Bossuet,* among others. About 1686 he went to live at The Hague, where he died. He wrote many books; two of them were widely read in English translations: An Account of the Persecutions of the Protestants in France and On the Composition of a Sermon.

PETER TOON

CLAUDIANUS MAMERTUS (d. c.474). Priest and poet. Friend of Sidonius Apollinaris* and brother of Mamertus, archbishop of Vienne, he was trained for monastic life and educated in Greek, Roman, and Christian literature. As assistant to his brother he trained clergy, organized services, and arranged the local psalter and lectionary. When Faustus of Riez published anonymously a treatise affirming that the soul is corporeal, Claudianus was urged by his friends to reply, and produced De Statu Animae in three books, which alone among his extant writings has theological value. Written between 467 and 472, it argues that a soul is incorporeal because it is made in the image of God and does not conform to the categories of place and quantity.

G.T.D. ANGEL

CLAUDIUS, MATTHIAS (1740-1815). German poet. Descended from Lutheran pastors, he studied at Jena and later moved to Wandsbeck, near Hamburg, where in 1771 he became literary editor of Der Wandsbecker Bote. For this he wrote, under the pseudonym Asmus, prose and poems in a popular "calendar" style. In 1776 he moved to Darmstadt, where he was influenced by freethinkers, but in 1777 after an illness he regained his faith. He returned to Wandsbeck to redirect the Bote on Christian lines and provide ammunition for a revolt against rationalism. While many of his poems were Christian in spirit, he wrote nothing for church use. Miss J.M. Campbell's translation "We plough the fields and scatter" (1861), reportedly a paraphrase of part of a village sketch, met a then new demand for harvest festival hymns. JOHN S. ANDREWS

CLAUDIUS APOLLINARIUS, see APOLLINARIUS, CLAUDIUS

CLAUDIUS OF TURIN (d.827). Bishop of Turin. Of Spanish birth, he was trained in theology at the school of Leidradus at Lyons, and also under Felix,* bishop of Urgel, an Adoptianist. He was a priest in the court of Louis the Pious in Aquitaine and followed him to Aachen when Louis became emperor. Made bishop of Turin (817/8), Claudius attacked the cult of images in his Liber de imaginibus, wrongly attributed to Agobard* of Lyons, on which Dungal and Jonas of Orléans based their attacks on him. He wrote commentaries on some of the OT books and the gospels, and probably all the Pauline epistles, using the catenae form which obtained in the Carolingian and later medieval period. C.G. THORNE, JR.

CLAVER, PETER (1580-1654). Jesuit missionary. Born in Verdu, Spain, he entered the order in 1602. Three years later at Mallorca, Alphonso Rodriquez encouraged him to become a missioner. Until 1610 Claver studied at Barcelona, whence he went to Cartagena, Colombia. There Alonso de Sandoval deeply impressed on him the misery of African slaves. In 1616 Claver went to Bogota, where he was ordained, and on his return to Cartagena did much to alleviate the misery of those in the disease-ridden slave ships. He befriended them as a doctor and teacher. Valtierra considers that by 1651 more than 300,000 had been converted. Pope Urban VIII condemned slavery in a bull of 1639.

Claver died at Cartagena. He was part of a small band like Sandoval and Bartolome de Las Casas who protested the inhumanity of European expansion in the New World. Claver was canonized in 1888, and in 1896 became the patron of all Catholic missionary activity among Negroes.

CLEMENS, JAKOB (d.1558?). Flemish musical composer. He was called "Clemens non Papa" to distinguish him from a priest of that name in Flanders or from Pope Clement VII (1523-34). He may have been imperial choirmaster under the Holy Roman Emperor Charles V (1519-21). His sacred compositions, many published posthumously, include metrical psalms, Masses, motets, and chansons, and there are indications works were interrupted by an untimely death.

CLEMENT V (1264-1314). Pope from 1305. Born Bertrand de Got (or Gouth) into an influential French family, he studied at Toulouse, Orléans, and Bologna. He was appointed bishop of Cominges in 1295, and archbishop of Bordeaux in 1299. A Roman conclave met in 1304 after the short reign of Benedict XI (1303-4) to select a new pope; after eleven months (during which envoys from France attended) Bertrand was proclaimed Pope Clement V. Being under the influence of Philip the Fair of France, who seemed able to exploit the weaknesses of the new pope, Clement was crowned at Lyons and in 1309 finally installed himself and his Curia at Avignon. Thus began the seventy years of the "Babylonian Captivity" of the papacy.

To serve his own personal interests, Philip IV made two major demands of Clement. The first was to have Boniface VIII condemned as a heretic. Clement obliged insofar as he annulled Boniface's excommunications and interdicts, especially the bull Unam Sanctam (bull of 27 April 1311). The second was to dissolve the Order of Knights Templar.* Again Clement obliged, since the Council of Vienne (1311) did suppress the order. It is not unfair to say that Clement was in a state of servility to Philip. However, he did attempt to salvage what he could for the Knights Templar in 1311.

Despite his political problems, which related to England and Scotland as well as France and the Holy Roman Empire, he was a competent scholar and is remembered as the founder of two universities, Orléans and Perugia, and for his collection of decretals in Liber Septimus (usually known as Clementina). PETER TOON

CLEMENT VI (1291-1352). Second Avignon* pope from 1347. Born Pierre Roger, he entered the Benedictine monastery at La Chaise-Dieu, later moving to Paris where he became a student, then a teacher. Ecclesiastical promotion came quickly: abbot of Fécamp in 1326, then after two bishoprics, archbishop of Rouen in 1330. He was made cardinal by Benedict XII in 1338, and pope at Avignon nine years later.

Clement was a brilliant orator and a great and ostentatious nobleman; thus he has been described as the first of the Renaissance popes. Like Clement V, his attachment to France was strong, and he was an ardent admirer of Philip the Fair, which prejudiced his attempts to bring peace between France and England. Also, following French policy, he carried on the struggle with Louis the Bavarian until 1347. He received the submission of William of Ockham who had advocated the separation of church and state together with the denial of temporal authority to the pope. The Franciscans also came under his displeasure as schismatics. That same year (1347), Cola di Rienzo* was imprisoned for similar reasons as Ockham—the encroachment of the pope's temporal power.

Clement seemed more concerned with Avignon than Italy. The sovereignty of Avignon he bought from Joanna I of Naples in 1348 for 80,000 golden florins, and surrounding himself with French cardinals, he turned Avignon into one of the most resplendent courts in Europe, from where also he directed the political campaigning in Italy. All this was paid for by extending taxation to ecclesiastical benefices, claiming for himself the overall right of church property and the right to intervene in the presentation of benefices, which brought opposition from many quarters, especially from Edward III of England (who in 1351 claimed monarchial right of presentation in all papal appointments to benefices). In spite of his tendency to nepotism, Clement did aid the poor. He helped those who were caught in the Black Death* at Avignon (1348-49). He defended the Mendicant against the secular orders. He was kindly disposed toward the Jews, who generally were safer in papal states than elsewhere in Europe. In 1351 he established a bishopric for the Canary Islands. His contribution to theology is best seen in his jubilee bull of 1350 concerning indulgences,* a practice which had received his approval in 1343.

CLEMENT VII (1478-1534). Pope from 1523. Giulio de' Medici, illegitimate son of Giuliano de' Medici and cousin of Pope Leo X,* became archbishop of Florence, being granted a special dispensation on account of his birth. Made cardinal in 1513, he practically controlled papal policy in Leo's pontificate and succeeded Hadrian VI as pope. Indecisive and timid, he failed to deal with the problems raised by the Reformation, preferring to live as a prince and to forward Medici interests.

He patronized the arts, encouraging Cellini, Raphael,* and Michelangelo.* He vacillated between support of Francis I of France and emperor Charles V, siding with Francis at the League of Cognac (1526), then, after his capture by imperial troops at the sack of Rome (1527), with Charles at the treaty of Barcelona (1529). He was equally irresolute over the divorce of Henry VIII of England. Eventually yielding to imperial pressure (1529), he resisted Henry's subsequent break with Rome.

There was also an antipope Clement VII (d.1394): Robert, son of Count Amadeus III of Geneva, who became archbishop of Cambrai in 1368 and was elected pope when the French cardinals seceded in 1378, so beginning the Great Schism.* J.G.G. NORMAN

CLEMENT VIII (1536-1605). Pope from 1592. Born Ippolito Aldobrandini, son of an Italian lawyer, he was the first of the series of "restorer" popes, though in 1594 his confessor Philip Neri* refused him absolution unless he recognized the coronation of Henry IV (who was received back into the church in 1595). In 1598 Clement helped to prepare the Treaty of Vervins between France and Spain, and three years later he negotiated the Treaty of Lyons between France and Savoy. In 1599 he created a preliminary sketch, as it were, of the future Congregation of Propaganda, under the presidency of Cardinal Santonio; its main function was to vitalize and control the Apostolate in every part of the world. In 1600 Clement refused the request of a number of orders to break the monopoly of the Jesuits to work in Japan, which had been granted them in 1585 by Gregory XIII. His attempts at restoring the Roman Empire failed, particularly in the case of James I (of England) and VI (of Scotland), whom he attempted to woo back to Roman Catholicism.

In ecclesiastical matters Clement made his presence felt soon after his accession. He ordered a revision of the Vulgate,* which had been done previously in haste, known as the Sixtus Vulgate; the new edition, generally known as Clement's edition, appeared in 1592 and contained some 3,000 corrections. Later research reveals that the Clementine edition departs from the text of Jerome at many points. His interest in the revision of the service books of the church extended to the Missal, Breviary, Caeremoniale episcoporum, and Pontifical. He also built a monumental altar within St. Peter's, over the site believed to contain the apostle's body, at which only the pope can celebrate Mass. His popularity is indicated by the fact that in 1600 he was acclaimed by three million pilgrims to Rome. GORDON A. CATHERALL

CLEMENT XI (1649-1721). Pope from 1700. Born Giovanni Francesco Albani, native of Urbino, he was educated at Rome, gaining a doctorate in civil and canon law. He entered the papal administration, success at which brought him the appointment of secretary of papal briefs in 1687. Three years later he was made cardinal, and ten years later he reluctantly accepted election as pope. His reign occurred during the period of the War of Spanish Succession, and he was set between the interests of the Hapsburgs and the Bourbons. Not surprisingly his political actions were unsuccessful. In 1701 he vainly protested at the elector of Brandenburg's use of the title "king of Prussia." In the same year he was forced to recognize Philip of Anjou, but in 1709 he had to abandon him in favor of the Archduke Charles.

The result was the Treaty of Utrecht (1713), with Clement's rights in Sicily, Sardinia, Parma, and Piacenza being ignored. Also in 1709 Clement quarreled with the duke of Savoy over his rights of investiture in Sicily. The unhappy outcome was that Clement issued an interdict, from which his clergy suffered most, because all who accepted it were banned from Sicily until it was conquered by Philip V of Spain in 1718. He further failed to gain the support of the princes when the Turks declared war on Venice in 1714. On the pastoral side, Clement had to deal with Jansenism,* which he condemned in a bull entitled Vineam Domini Sabaoth (1705). In 1708 he condemned the work of P. Quesnel* usually called Réflexions morales. In 1713 he issued the famous bull Unigenitus Dei Filius, in which he attacked Quesnel's thesis that grace is irresistible and without it man is incapable of spiritual good. This produced a pessimistic theology and subsequent harshness and moral rigidity. Clement had also to judge between Franciscans and Jesuits concerning Chinese Rites,* and he upheld the Dominican position. He took a similarly conservative decision about the Malabar* Rite in India. In 1708 he made obligatory the Feast of the Immaculate Conception.* He secured for the Vatican Library one of its most valuable collections of manuscripts from the East, made by J.S. Assemani. When he died, his reign had lasted longer than any other pope for five centuries. GORDON A. CATHERALL

CLEMENT XII (1652-1740). Pope from 1730. Lorenzo Corsini, born at Florence, studied at the Roman College and Pisa University. On his father's death he entered the church, and became titular bishop of Nicomedia and nuncio to Vienna (1691), governor of Castel Sant' Angelo (1696), and cardinal (1706). He became blind in 1732, but despite ill health tried to halt the decline of papal power. He defended church rights threatened by encroachments of the Catholic powers, and though forced to allow the papacy to lose its feudal rights in Parma and Piacenza, he made significant agreements with Spain and Portugal. He took action against the Jansenists. In 1738 he condemned Freemasonry,* forbidding Catholics to belong to Masonic lodges under pain of excommunication. He vigorously supported missionary activity, founding a seminary for training priests of the Greek rite at Ullano, S Italy, helping the Lebanese Maronites, and sending Franciscans to Ethiopia. J.G.G. NORMAN

CLEMENT XIII (1693-1769). Pope from 1758. Carlo della Torre Rezzonico, born in Venice, studied at the Jesuit college at Bologna, and became doctor of theology and canon law at Padua. He was ordained and appointed governor of Rieti (1716) and of Fano (1721). Benedict XIII called him to Rome (1725) and made him auditor of the Rota for Venice (1729). Created cardinal by Clement XII (1737), he became bishop of Padua (1743). He was elected pope at a time when the papacy's prestige was declining and the Jesuits were under attack. He took up the cause of the Jesuits, to whom he owed his election. Portugal expelled them and severed relations with Rome (1760), while France demanded drastic alterations in the Jesuit constitution (1761). Clement refused this demand in the famous words "Let them be as they are or not be." Louis XV abolished the order in France (1764), and Clement responded by the bull Apostolicum pascendi munus (1765). The Jesuits were expelled from Spain, Naples, and Malta; Parma ordered a commission to investigate monastic charters. As traditional suzerain of the duchy of Parma, Clement attempted to reassert temporal power there (1768), but found himself faced with the seizure of Avignon, Benevento, and Ponte Corvo, and an almost universal call for the suppression of the Jesuits. He consented to call a consistory, but died almost immediately of apoplexy. The suppression was effected by his successor, Clement XIV,* in 1773. J.G.G. NORMAN

CLEMENT XIV (1705-1774). Pope from 1769. Born Giovanni Vincenzo Antonio Ganganelli near Rimini, he joined the Franciscan Order in 1723, at which time he took the name Lorenzo. He was named cardinal in 1759. His election to the papacy came at a time when Catholic powers were pressing for the suppression of the Jesuits. It was thought that his coming to a secret understanding with the former (though this has never been proved) led to his choice as pope after many of the other cardinals had been rejected. Whatever the truth of the accusation, Clement did in fact suppress the Jesuits in 1773; he may have thought it a price worth paying in order to appease potential allies in an age when the papacy had to cope with anticlericalism and growing secularism. CLEMENT OF ALEXANDRIA (c.155-c.220). The first known Christian scholar. Titus Flavius Clement, probably an Athenian, succeeded his teacher Pantaenus as head of the Catechetical School at Alexandria in 190. Clement's greatest literary activity was displayed while he held that post (190-202). His principal works extant are the Protrepticos (Exhortation to Conversion), the Paidagogos (The Tutor), and Stromateis (Miscellanies). The three works constitute a trilogy. The Logos,* Clement says, first of all "converts" us, then "disciplines" us, and finally "instructs" us.

Clement engaged in a perpetual debate with the Gnostics who disparaged faith as an inferior possession of ordinary Christians while they rejoiced in their possession of esoteric gnosis. He maintained that faith, instead of being the "prop of the ignorant," was the means by which mankind arrived at true gnosis ("knowledge"). The doctrine of the Logos is the mainspring of Clement's whole system of theology. The Logos is conceived of as eternally with the Father and the principal cause of all things that are. Some of Clement's statements concerning the person of Christ have a docetic echo, but he defended vigorously the reality of the Incarnation, even though the humanity of Jesus has little importance in his theology. The work of the Logos, or Christ, is considered as the redemption from the bondage of sin and error which has left mankind blind and helpless. Clement's most characteristic thought is that Christ is the true "teacher" who gives men the true gnosis which leads to freedom from sin, to immortality, and to righteousness. By contemplation of the Logos man is deified. Thus Clement's soteriology is a Christ-mysticism in which the Lord's passion and death have little or no redemptive part to play.

Clement's other surviving works include the Hypotyposes, a commentary on the Scriptures, and Quis Dives Salvetur? (Who is the Rich Man that shall be Saved?), the theme of which is the stewardship of wealth. This last attractive homily concludes with the well-known story of the aged Apostle John rescuing and restoring a young Christian who had become a bandit.

CLEMENT OF ROME (fl. c.90-100). Prominent early Roman presbyter-bishop. Perhaps already mentioned in Philippians 4:3 (if from Rome) and often identified or connected (as slave or freedman?) with the Titus Flavius Clemens executed by Domitian, he is most probably the Clement in Hermas's Shepherd whose duty was to write to other churches, which accords with the traditional authorship of 1 Clement, a letter in the name of the Roman to the Corinthian Church. (The ascription to Clement is first attested about 170 by Dionysius of Corinth, but is absent from Irenaeus.)

The letter was almost certainly written soon after the supposed persecution under Domitian, i.e., about 96. It attempts to heal a division which had led, perhaps through the ascendancy of a Gnostic party, to the deposition of senior Corinthian presbyters (also called bishops). The letter betrays no knowledge of monepiscopacy, but appeals to a simple form of apostolic succession. It argues incessantly for the preservation of divine order, by cataloguing moralistically the entail of jealousy or strife in the OT and in the Christian times, by rehearsing the virtues of humility, and by natural and military analogies. It adheres to traditions of Hellenistic rhetoric and Stoic political philosophy, but also follows Jewish precedents. As probably the oldest extra-NT Christian writing, it is invaluable for plotting the development of "early catholicism" (Frühkatholizismus). Though it appeals to the authority of works like 1 Corinthians and Hebrews, it reveals a marked change of outlook from Paul's epistles. In the later second century it enjoyed almost scriptural status in several churches.

For editions, etc., see APOSTOLIC FATHERS, and J. Quasten, Patrology 1 (1950), pp. 42-53; also ed. A. Jaubert (Sources Chrétiennes 167, 1971); ET by W.K.L. Clarke (1937). See also L. Sanders, L'Hellenisme de S. Clément de Rome et le Paulinisme (1943); K. Beyschlag, Clemens Romanus und der Frühkatholizismus: Untersuchungen zu I Clemens 1-7 (1966).

Later tradition promoted Clement to a monarchical bishop, the third pope after Peter or even his successor, and spawned legends about his travels and death. The following writings were wrongly ascribed to him (see also APOSTOLIC CONSTITUTIONS):

(1) 2 Clement: this Second Epistle to the Corinthians, read as Scripture in Syria but recognized as spurious by Eusebius, is actually a sermon, probably the oldest in postapostolic literature. It appears to have been delivered about 140-50, in Rome (by Bishop Hyginus, c.138-42?) or Corinth (hence its MS connections with 1 Clement), or perhaps Alexandria. It touches on several aspects of Christian doctrine, especially the church and repentance, revealing Pauline and gnosticizing influences, but is mainly a moral exhortation.

For literature see APOSTOLIC FATHERS and J. Quasten, op.cit. 1, pp. 53-58; also K.P. Donfried, The Setting of Second Clement in Early Christianity (1974).

(2) Two Letters to Virgins: an important source for early Christian asceticism, from the first half of the third century, probably Palestine or Syria. It extols the angelic and Christlike quality of ascetic life, and deplores the irregularities of the syneisaktoi (see AGAPETAE).

ET in Ante-Nicene Christian Library 14 (The Writings of Methodius), pp. 365-95; bibliography in Quasten, op.cit. 1, pp. 58-59.

(3) Clementine Homilies and Recognitions: didactic novels built around Clement's career mostly as Peter's companion. After a religious-philosophical pilgrimage, Clement is converted by Peter at Caesarea. The twenty Greek Homilies (before 380) are Clement's account of Peter's missionary preaching and contest with Simon Magus, preceded by letters to Jesus' brother, James of Jerusalem, from Clement and Peter, and Clement's instructions for the use of the work. Two Greek epitomes preserve mostly narrative sections, with additions, e.g., regarding Clement's martyrdom. The Recognitions (before c.360-80) get their title from Clement's successive reunions, through Peter's intervention, with long-lost members of his family. The ten books survive only in Rufinus's Latin abridgment.

The two collections possess a common narrative core (more developed in the Recognitions), which results from common dependence on a Jewish-Christian Grundschrift from early third-century Syria. Scholars still debate whether the Recognitions are independent of the earlier Homilies, whether they have suffered interpolation (e.g., the Recognitions by a Eunomian), how extensive were the Grundschrift and its presumed sources, the Sermons (Kerygmata) of Peter and the Acts (or Travels, Periodoi) of Peter, and how deviantly Jewish-Christian their theology. The Homilies display marked Ebionite or Elkesaite features (Christianity as reformed Judaism; Christ as merely the true prophet; Paul as hostile to Peter's message), and reflect a Jewish-Christian Gnosticism, but in the Recognitions Judaistic elements are largely obscured by orthodoxy, presumably partly through Rufinus. For all their difficulty, the Clementines are an invaluable source for the fortunes of Jewish Christianity.

CLERICALISM. A term denoting that which relates to clerics and the clergy. During the nineteenth century in Italy and France it was used to attack the efforts of the Roman Catholic Church to influence secular affairs unduly. Thus in 1877 Léon Gambetta coined the phrase Le cléricalisme, voilà l'ennemi! The term has also been used opprobriously to denigrate an excessive professionalism on the part of clergymen or their imitators.

CLERICUS, see LECLERC, JEAN

CLERGY RESERVES. The term applied to that portion (one-seventh) of the land which was set apart in the Canadas by the Canada Act of 1791 for the "support and maintenance of a Protestant clergy." Because the proceeds were used in the interests of the Church of England, the other denominations soon began to urge that the funds be used for the support of all denominations. The Durham Report cited the Clergy Reserves as one of the major causes of unrest preceding the Upper Canada rebellion in 1837. A compromise was therefore included in the Imperial Act of 1840 by which the monies realized from the sale of the reserves were divided among the denominations. The reserves remained a political sore spot until they were secularized in 1854, with payments being made to the various denominations, and with the Presbyterians and Anglicans retaining their former grants of land.

CLERKS REGULAR. Roman Catholic clergy who have taken solemn vows for the purpose of more effective pastoral work. The term applies particularly to orders like the Theatines* (1524) and Jesuits* (1534) founded in the sixteenth century. Their numbers have not increased since then, but their example has had a striking influence on later religious communities which have lived under rule, whether strictly monastic or not, though the great majority of these communities take simple vows.

CLERMONT, COUNCIL OF (1095). Called at the instigation of Urban II, it was well attended by both clergy and laity. As a result of an embassy received from Emperor Alexius Comnenus at the Council of Piacenza (earlier that year), Urban called a crusade, urging the assembly to gain paradise fighting in God's cause, instead of losing their souls in fratricidal wars. There was an enthusiastic reception for Urban's proclamation. Influential support was given the council by the presence of Raymond of Toulouse, whose vassal Bishop Adhemar Le Puy was chosen to be papal representative during the crusade. Thirty-two canons were issued. It was decreed, inter alia, that no king or prince should grant investiture; no bishop or priest should pay homage to a layman; no flesh should be eaten between Ash Wednesday and Easter; and communicants should receive in both kinds separately whenever possible. The council also excommunicated Philip I for adultery, and confirmed the primacy of the see of Lyons.

CLOISTER (Lat. claustrum, "clergy-house, closed-off place"). The verbal concept "to cloister" referred originally to any enclosure, but it came in practice to apply to monasticism in fourteenth-century England, when "cloister" and "convent" had become parallel terms, one stressing the seclusion from other life, the other the communal character of those secluded. In the derived sense, meaning is transferred from the religious process to the space in which provision is made for that process to take place. By the fifteenth century the concept identified the covered walkway connecting the buildings of the institution, often forming a quadrangular perimeter with an open colonnade toward the inner court. CLYDE CURRY SMITH

CLOSE, FRANCIS (1797-1882). Dean of Carlisle. Son of an Anglican rector, he was born at Frome, graduated from Cambridge, and became curate (1824), then incumbent (1826) at Cheltenham. For the next thirty years, while the population of this fashionable watering-place doubled, he exercised a powerful Evangelical ministry, basing his sermons on those of Charles Simeon,* denouncing sundry vices, promoting five new parish churches with schools attached, and assisting in the founding of Cheltenham College. Now one of the best-known Evangelical ministers, he was in 1856 appointed dean of Carlisle. There his ministry was especially directed to the poor, whose moral and physical condition he strove to improve. He was a stern critic of Roman Catholicism, Tractarianism,* and the English Church Union, and saw the revival of Gothic architecture as a tool of papal aggression. He resigned in 1881. Among voluminous works, his sermons were popular in the Evangelical world of his day.

IAN SELLERS

CLOUD OF UNKNOWING, THE. An English mystical treatise from the latter fourteenth century, of East Midland origin. The anonymous author was probably a solitary, possibly a Dominican. The sources of The Cloud of Unknowing may be identifiable as Dionysius the Areopagite's Theologia Mystica and the Rhineland mystics, especially Tauler, who were known in England through the Dominicans. Having written up to six other pieces, two being translations, the author addresses that specific person who seeks the solitary, contemplative life, but finally includes the Marthas as well as the Marys. The instructions remind of those given by St. John of the Cross,* and the Thomist position is apparent throughout; grace is central, bodily travail discounted. The aim is to put all created things under a cloud of forgetting, and in love press on to the cloud of unknowing, Dionysius's caligo ignorantiae, which lies forever between the prayerful soul and God.

CLOUGH, JOHN EVERETT (1836-1910). Baptist missionary to India and supervisor of a mass movement to Christianity among the Telugus. Born in W New York, frontier life in Illinois and Iowa prepared him for strenuous labors in India. As a converted skeptic he joined the Baptist church and offered himself for missionary service. In 1864 he and his wife sailed for India to a mission that three times the Baptists had been about to give up in discouragement. At Ongole he saw the beginning of a movement among the outcaste Madigas that he wisely let continue along Indian lines. The flow of converts became a flood after the famine of 1876-78, in the relief of which he played a significant role. In six weeks 8,691 were baptized. When he left India in 1910 the Baptist Telugu Mission had reached 60,000 members.

HAROLD R. COOK

CLOVIS (d.511). Son of Childeric I, he became king of the Salian Franks in 481. Almost at once he extended his territories from the Somme to the Seine and the Loire at the expense of Roman power. About 492 he married the Christian Clotilda, but he became a Christian only after being convinced of intervention by Christ in a battle. His baptism on Christmas Day 496 led to the support of the Catholic bishops and Roman officials in governing the country. Subsequent conquests laid the foundations of the modern French nation. In waging war against the Visigoths he invoked God's help and killed their king, Alaric II, with his own hands at the battle of Vouille in 507. He made Paris the capital of his kingdom.

CLOWES, WILLIAM (1780-1851). Co-founder of the Primitive Methodist Connexion.* Son of a drunken potter in Staffordshire, he early followed his father's trade and habits. Converted after a Methodist "love feast" (where he received the bread and water "under the idea of a sacrament") in 1805, he became an active Methodist, participating in the first Mow Cop camp meeting. Like Hugh Bourne* earlier, but independently, he was expelled in 1810 through Methodist alarm at such developments. Many local Methodists supported him, calling him (to his own sacrifice) as a fulltime preacher paid from their meager wages. Primitive Methodism emerges from the coalescence of this movement with Bourne's, though the relations of the founders were often strained. Clowes became a hard-living traveling evangelist, especially in the industrial Midlands and North, with Hull as his center later. Many record the remarkable power of his preaching.

A.F. WALLS

CLUNIACS. Those forces which were part of the monastic foundation at Cluny, established in 909 as a reform movement based on the Benedictine Rule. Although Cluny came to an end legally in 1790, after a long decline (despite reforms in the seventeenth century), it was the center of monastic reform and experiment for two centuries, having a vast network of communities (more than 1,100 at its height) attached to the central hierarchy. Their reforms extended to older monasteries, and their adaptability to numerous situations brought great success, extending also into political life, for Cluniacs were much involved over the investiture struggle. Many of its monks became popes, cardinals, and bishops, and among its notable abbots were Odo, Odilo, Hugh, and Peter the Venerable.

Combating ecclesiastical decadence and withstanding the empire were not its chief concerns. Even though it grew weak because of its vastness, its mission was admirably accomplished. Cluny renewed the ideals of its predecessors as Cîteaux (see CISTERCIANS) was to do for Cluny (though without the same cultural achievement). The order had centers in Germany, Italy, Spain, and England, in addition to France. It emphasized biblical scholarship and liturgical renewal, and at its height manifested the fruits of simplicity.

See J. Wollasch et al., Neue Forschungen über Cluny und die Cluniacenser (ed. G. Tellenbach, 1959); and J. Evans, Monastic Life at Cluny, 910-1157 (1931).

COADJUTOR BISHOP (Lat. adjutare, "to help"). Ecclesiastically, the bishop appointed as assistant, usually with right of succession. Such appointment is found most frequently in the Roman Catholic Church, particularly where a bishop is old or infirm. Modern usage distinguishes coadjutor from suffragan,* but seventeenth-century English treated the terms interchangeably.

COCCEIUS, JOHANNES (1603-1669). German theologian. Educated at Hamburg and Franeker, he taught at Bremen, Franeker, and Leyden. He studied under Maccovius and William Ames.* In his works, based upon considerable knowledge of oriental languages, he tried to present theology on a purely biblical basis, and although a Calvinist, he objected to the Calvinist orthodoxy of his day. His major work, Summa doctrinae de Foedere et Testamento Dei (1648), presents an outline of the scriptural teaching of salvation. He pictures the relationship between God and man, both before and after the Fall, in the form of a covenant. In Eden there was a covenant of works which promised salvation for obedience, but when man sinned it was no longer valid. Then the covenant of works was replaced by a covenant of grace which offered salvation as a gift of God. This covenant originated in an agreement between the Father and Son and is realized in a succession of historical steps culminating in the kingdom of God. In this way Cocceius was able to introduce the ideas of the history of salvation and of millennialism into scholastic Reformed theology.

ROBERT G. CLOUSE

COCHLAEUS, JOHANNES (1479-1552). Roman Catholic controversialist. Born near Nuremberg of peasant origin, he studied there and at Cologne (1504), where he developed a distaste for Scholasticism and a sympathy for Platonism and Renaissance humanism. He became rector of the Latin school of St. Lawrence, Nuremberg. He studied law at Bologna, graduated in scholastic theology at Ferrara (1517), and was ordained at Rome. From 1521 he engaged in bitter controversy with Luther, and in 1525 endeavored to prevent the printing of Tyndale's English NT at Cologne. He was canon at Mainz (1526), Meissen (about 1534), and Breslau (1539), and attended many conferences between Catholics and Protestants. His best-known works were Historiae Hussitarum Libri XII and Commentaria de Actis et Scriptis M. Lutheri, 1517-1546. J.G.G. NORMAN

COFFIN, HENRY SLOAN (1877-1954). Theological educator. Born in New York City and educated at Yale, Edinburgh, and Union Theological Seminary, New York, he was ordained in 1900 and established a Presbyterian mission congregation in the Bronx. From 1905 to 1926 he was pastor of the Madison Avenue Presbyterian Church, where he became known as one of the most eloquent preachers in the USA. During that period he also taught practical theology at Union Theological Seminary, and in 1926 he became Brown professor of homiletics and president of the seminary, continuing in that capacity until 1945.

Coffin was influential in American Protestantism as a preacher, a theological educator, a proponent of the Social Gospel,* a liturgist and hymnologist, and a participant in the ecumenical movement. He was a leader of the liberal faction in the Presbyterian Church in the USA, who worked hard to promote theological inclusivism in that denomination. He called himself an "evangelical liberal" and sought to moderate the antagonism between conservatives and extreme liberals. Among his many books are In a Day of Social Rebuilding (1918) and The Meaning of the Cross (1933). HARRY SKILTON

COILLARD, FRANÇOIS (1834-1904). Missionary to South Africa. Born at Asnières, France, he was sent to Lesotho in 1857 by the Paris Evangelical Mission and stationed at Leribe. In 1877 he led a party of Basuto to the Banyai, but their Matabele overlord, Lobengula, refused to allow a mission. Coillard then pressed on to Barotseland (1878-79). In 1880-82 he visited Europe to enlist support for a Barotse mission, which was launched in 1886. Coillard's difficulties were immense. At first political conditions were unsettled. Chief Lewanika was friendly, but stubbornly refused conversion. Many colleagues died, and critics suggested withdrawal. Toward the end, Ethiopianism threatened his work, but developments after his death proved he had not labored in vain. D.G.L. CRAGG

COKE, THOMAS (1747-1814). Methodist preacher, superintendent, and missionary enthusiast. Born at Brecon and educated at Oxford, Coke was made deacon in 1770 and served as curate at South Petherton, Somerset (1772-76). In 1775 he became doctor of civil law. Associated with Wesley from 1777, he was indefatigable as an itinerant preacher and increasingly served as Wesley's right-hand man. He was set apart by Wesley as superintendent for America (1784) and presided at the Christmas Conference which constituted the Methodist Episcopal Church of America. He maintained links with both sides of the Atlantic (which he crossed eighteen times). Relationships with Asbury, whom he had set apart as fellow superintendent in 1784, were not always easy.

In England, Coke presided over conference several times and served the connection assiduously. He had a strong link with Ireland, where he repeatedly presided over conference. He was a staunch opponent of slavery and a vigorous promoter of overseas mission. Tirelessly he raised funds, sent out missionaries, and opened up new areas. He organized the Negro Mission in the West Indies, developed missionary activity in Gibraltar, Sierra Leone, and Cape of Good Hope, and was recognized by conference as general superintendent of the missions (home as well as foreign). He died at sea, on his way to Ceylon with a party of missionaries.

HAROLD H. ROWDON

COLENSO, JOHN WILLIAM (1814-1883). First Anglican bishop of Natal. Born at St. Austell, Cornwall, he read mathematics at Cambridge, held a living in Norfolk, and was consecrated in 1853. His theology wedded the conclusions of F.D. Maurice* to liberal Protestant presuppositions and aroused much controversy. Unlike most missionaries, he favored the baptism of polygamists and respected African beliefs and customs. His missionary theology was expounded in a commentary on Romans (1861): the Atonement is entirely objective; men are redeemed from birth, and baptism merely proclaims this fact; the heathen must be shown the pattern of Christ. Colenso had already quarreled with James Green, Tractarian* dean of Pietermaritzburg, about church government and the Eucharist. Green now reported the commentary to Bishop Gray of Cape Town, who referred it to the archbishop of Canterbury.

Before Colenso's orthodoxy could be tested, he caused a further storm by publishing the first part of a work which questioned the historicity and authorship of the Pentateuch and Joshua. Although Colenso's critical views were moderate by German standards, they scandalized most Englishmen and dominated the controversy which culminated in his deposition by Gray in December 1863. Colenso denied Gray's jurisdiction and was supported by the judicial committee of the Privy Council, which confirmed his position as bishop. Further legal action secured his stipend and the control of church property. Many laymen supported him, but with insufficient clergy and finance he could do little.

In his closing years, Colenso championed the African people against injustice. This cost the friendship of his principal supporter, Theophilus Shepstone, but earned undying African affection. Colenso was a tragic figure whose positive contributions to missionary policy and biblical scholarship were vitiated by an inadequate theology, an impetuous manner, a difficult personality, and the intense conservatism of his contemporaries.

COLET, JOHN (c.1466-1519). Dean of St. Paul's. Born in London where his father was lord mayor, he was educated at Oxford, and in Paris and Italy. Returning to Oxford, he delivered in 1497 a series of lectures on Paul's epistles marking the spirit of the S European Renaissance which was increasingly to prepare the way for the Reformation as it moved northward. The lectures are marked by critical comment and a concern to get back to the early sources behind all the medieval glosses and allegorizings.

Colet also shared the Renaissance humanist concern for reforming the clergy and church institutions, and also for furthering enlightened education. He attacked many clerical abuses, and though he did not advocate doctrinal reform, the suspicion of heresy was never far from him. Yet he was listened to by a wide circle; among the contemporaries whose thinking he influenced were Erasmus* and Sir Thomas More.* Colet founded St. Paul's School, London (still in existence), where he laid stress on the teaching of the classics. He was appointed dean of St. Paul's in 1505 and held the post until his death.

COLIGNY, GASPARD DE (1519-1572). Huguenot* leader and French statesman. Scion of one of the most powerful families in sixteenth-century France, he became the great hero of the first generation of French Protestants and a formidable Calvinist political chieftain. As a member of the noble Châtillon family and nephew of the powerful Constable Anne de Montmorency, he spent most of his early life in military and public service and eventually was named an admiral of France. Sometime between 1555 and 1560 he was converted and joined the Reformed Church. Historians have debated whether this was basically a religious or a political decision, but he became a leading Calvinist in the wars of religion which began in 1562. After most of the other Huguenot captains were killed, he became the unchallenged political head of the movement. Gaining the favor of Charles IX, he arranged an acceptable peace between Calvinists and Catholics in France in 1570, but the chance of a permanent settlement vanished when he was murdered in Paris with several thousand other Huguenots in the infamous St. Bartholomew's Day massacre.*
ROBERT D. LINDER

COLIGNY, ODET DE (c.1517-1571). French cardinal, later a Protestant leader. Created cardinal in 1533 and bishop-count of Beauvais shortly afterward, he became the national grand inquisitor in 1560, but did little in that capacity. In 1561 he created a sensation by embracing the Reformed faith. Endeavoring with his brother Gaspard de Coligny* to alleviate the persecution of the Huguenots,* he was excommunicated, and in 1568 fled to London, where Queen Elizabeth welcomed him warmly. Poisoned—it is said, by his valet—at the instigation of Catherine de' Medici, he is buried in Canterbury Cathedral.

COLLECT. A short form of prayer peculiar to Western church liturgies. It consists of an invocation of God, a petition, a pleading of Christ's merits, and an ascription of praise to God. The term itself (collecta) is found originally in the Gallican Rite,* and there it appears to mean the "collecting" of the individuals' silent petitions into a public and corporate form. Another possibility is to connect the term with the assembly (collecta) of people which gathered at each of the churches in Rome and said a prayer (oratio ad collectam) before proceeding to the stational church for the papal Mass. Most of the Sunday collects in the Church of England's Book of Common Prayer* are freely translated from the Latin (largely from the Sarum service books and the Gelasian Sacramentary); the remainder were composed by Thomas Cranmer* and others, or were added later in 1662. HOWARD SAINSBURY

COLLEGIALISM. A theory of church-state relationship associated with H. Grotius* and S. Pufendorf.* Church and state are both purely voluntary associations (collegia) in which supreme authority rests with the body of the members. A civil magistrate has no relations with the church other than those which he enjoys with every other voluntary association within the territory. C.M. Pfaff (1686-1760), chancellor of Württemberg, defending collegialism against territorialism, claimed that the rights which princes possess in ecclesiastical matters are conferred on them by the church.

COLLEGIANTS. Dutch religious group, originating in the controversies surrounding the Synod of Dort* (1619). The triumph of the orthodox Calvinists there, and the ousting of the Remonstrant ministers from the Reformed Church, left many congregations without pastors. At Warmond, near Leyden, Gijsbert VanderKodde and his brothers began leading such a congregation in informal services, stressing baptism by immersion, withdrawal from the world, and a minimal creed. The style was closer to Mennonite* than to Remonstrant; and the group refused to join the Remonstrant Brotherhood. Meeting as collegia rather than regularly organized churches, the group moved to the neighboring village of Rhynsberg (hence the names "Collegiants" and "Rhynsbergers"). The movement spread, with the "congregations" joining once a year at Rhynsberg. Spinoza* lived in Rhynsberg for some years (1661-64) and found the group impressive, though his advanced ideas (denial of miracles, etc.) caused a split which took some time to heal. During the 1700s, membership dwindled, with many turning to Socinianism* or Deism*; the last meeting was held in 1787. DIRK JELLEMA

COLLIER, JEREMY (1650-1726). English nonjuring divine. Born at Stow-by-Quy, Cambridgeshire, he was educated at Ipswich and Caius College, Cambridge, and in 1679 became rector of Ampton, near Bury St. Edmunds, and lecturer of Gray's Inn in 1685. He was imprisoned for provocative political writing supporting James II. Released without trial, he was again imprisoned briefly in 1692 on suspicion of treasonable correspondence with James. In 1696 he publicly absolved on the scaffold two would-be assassins of William III. He was outlawed, but returned to London later. He wrote a controversial pamphlet, A Short View of the Immorality and Profaneness of the English Stage (1698), which led to a furious literary debate. In 1713 he was consecrated as a "bishop of the Nonjurors"* and became primus in 1716. He was in favor of union with the Eastern Church. He preferred the 1549 Book of Common Prayer, and his romanizing views on certain "usages" in the Communion service led to the fatal split in the nonjuring community. Collier wrote voluminously. His most important work is An Ecclesiastical History of Great Britain (2 vols., 1708-14). HOWARD SAINSBURY

COLLUTHUS (fourth century). Presbyter of Alexandria. The first to sign the deposition of Arius in an encyclical of Alexander* of Alexandria about 321, Colluthus was accused by the latter of indiscretion by 324. A synod of Alexandria in the same year under Hosius deposed Ischyras, a presbyter ordained by Colluthus, and received him back into communion as a layman. By 339 an Egyptian synod affirmed that Colluthus had died as a presbyter and that his ordinations were invalid. No reason is apparent for his unauthorized ordinations. Later Philastrius (d. c.397), followed by Augustine, charged Colluthus with the heresy of denying that God made evil.

COLLYRIDIANS. The collyris was a small cake, distributed by King David at a sacrifice (2 Sam. 6:19 LXX). According to Epiphanius (fourth century), women had imported from Thrace to Arabia a cult-sacrifice to the Virgin Mary, at which a collyris was offered and then eaten by the devotees. Epiphanius objected to women offering sacrifice, holding that while honor is due to Mary, God alone is to be worshiped. The term *Theotokos might have stimulated the cult.

COLMAN (d.676). Bishop of Lindisfarne. An Irishman, he was sent from Iona, where he was a monk, to succeed Finan, Aidan's* successor, as third bishop of Lindisfarne. He supported King Oswy in maintaining Celtic customs, particularly over the date of Easter. At the Synod of Whitby* in 663/4 he argued for the retention of this practice, and when the decision went in favor of the Roman customs he resigned his see. He took some of the monks of Lindisfarne with him to a monastery at Innisboffin, County Mayo, Ireland, where he remained until his death.

COLOMBINI, GIOVANNI (c.1300-1367). A wealthy Sienese merchant and magistrate converted to a life of service after reading a life of St. Mary of Egypt,* he cared for the poor and sick in his own house for almost a decade. When his son died and his daughter became a nun, he settled an annuity on his wife, disposed of his remaining property, and formed an association dedicated to poverty and service about 1360. Alarmed at their following, the magistrates banished the group, until an outbreak of plague led to their recall. Urban V constituted the group as Clerici apostolici S. Hieronymi (or Gesuati*) in 1367, and Gregory XIII beatified Colombini.

COLOSSAE. A city in the Roman province of Asia, in the valley of the Lycus, a tributary of the Maeander. The Lycus was the ancient thoroughfare eastward from the west coast of Asia Minor through Phrygia. Of the three cities of the valley, including Hierapolis and Laodicea, it was the oldest, mentioned by Herodotus and Xenophon in the fifth century B.C. At Colossae the Lycus valley narrows, to be dominated by Mt. Cadmus at 8,013 feet, and the site itself is 1,150 feet above sea level. Here the road to Sardis and Pergamum branched off. It was a wool center, known for its sheep-raising. But the rise of Hierapolis and especially Laodicea brought crippling competition, and Colossae was eventually abandoned between 600 and 700.

The site has never been excavated, though it was first identified by W.J. Hamilton in 1835. Epaphras, a member of Paul's missionary team and native of Colossae, seems to have been largely responsible for its evangelization (Col. 1:7; 4:-12,13). Paul had apparently not visited it when he wrote his epistle, though he may have gone subsequently (Col. 1:4; 2:1; Philem. 22). It is clear from the Colossian epistle that Christianity had severe contests there with various aspects of paganism and heresies.

COLOSSEUM (Coliseum). Bede's eighth-century name for the Flavian Amphitheater in Rome. Built from A.D. 72 to 82 under the Flavian emperors, its axes are 188 meters and 156 meters. It is 48.5 meters high. Seated in three tiers, about 50,000 spectators viewed animal hunts (venationes), combats of hundreds of animals at once, gladiatorial fights, and seafights (naumachiae), with the arena flooded. The tradition that Christians were martyred there remains a possibility but has no ancient basis, dating from Benedict XIV's consecration of the structure to the martyrs in 1750. His dedicatory cross was removed in 1874, replaced in 1927. It was frequently damaged by lightning and otherwise; restorations and additions spanned the period from Nerva to Theodoric the Ostrogoth (d.526). It served as a fortress in medieval times, and its Renaissance use as a travertine quarry—Palazzo Farnese was built from its stones—ceased under Benedict XIV. Its efficient passageways, protective canopy for spectators, aromatic refreshment of the air, and subterranean elevators to the arena are remarkable.

COLUMBA (Columkille) (521-597). The most illustrious Irish churchman of the sixth century, he was born at Gartan, County Donegal; his parents were both of royal lineage. He came to Derry about 546 and built a church, and some years later founded a notable monastery at Durrow. A keen student, his passion for books caused him trouble when his claim to a copy that he had made from a psalter borrowed from Finnian of Movilla was overruled by King Diarmid. His hasty Irish temper led to frequent involvement in quarrels, and his departure from Ireland in 563 is shrouded in mystery. It may have followed excommunication from the Irish Church for his part in civil war, or he may have been seeking both release from a sense of frustration and freedom to propagate the Gospel.

After a perilous journey to Iona Columba found scope for his great talents in establishing a college for the training of young men for the evangelization of the N Picts. He visited Ireland in 574 to attend a convention at Drumceatt, near Limavady in County Derry. He survived for a further twenty-three years and was buried with the kings in his beloved Iona, off the Scottish coast. A man of outstanding gifts as scholar and preacher, Columba commanded attention for courageous leadership. Though his temper was hot, his indignation was often righteous and his spirit just and generous. He set a noble example in prayerfulness, self-discipline, and pastoral concern.
ADAM LOUGHRIDGE

COLUMBANUS (c.543-615). Irish saint and scholar. A disciple of Comgall of Bangor, he was a native of Leinster. He had a passion for learning, and had the distinction, unusual in his day, of being able to study the Scriptures in both Hebrew and Greek. When almost fifty he felt the call to evangelism on a wider scale, and after an abortive attempt to found a monastery in the south of England, he went to France where he established a noted school of learning at Luxorum in Burgundy. The discipline of his school was extremely severe, and while his movement was approved by the people, it was bitterly opposed by the clergy. He showed great courage in denouncing the vices of the Burgundian court, and of King Thierry in particular. Expelled from France, he worked for a time at Lake Constance in Switzerland before forming a notable monastery at Bobbio in N Italy, where he died.

Probably the sharpest and ablest controversialist of his time, Columbanus revived an interest in the findings of the General Council of Constantinople in 553, and pleaded with Pope Boniface IV not to condone Eutychianism or encourage those who believed there was only one nature in Christ. His correspondence with Boniface and later with Gregory the Great makes striking claims for the purity and independence of the Celtic Church, and challenges their claim to papal supremacy. He was a poet of singular gifts, and an able expositor of Scripture; his commentary is in the Ambrosian library in Milan.

COMBA, EMILIO (1839-1904). Waldensian* historian and theologian. Born at San Germano Chisone, he graduated at the theological school in Geneva, where he had some of the most distinguished professors of the time, including Merle d'Aubigné.* A man of great intelligence, strong personality, and deep spirituality, he was ordained pastor in 1863, and after a short period of evangelical work in Brescia was sent (1867) to Venice (then just freed and annexed to the kingdom), where with his warm eloquence he attracted great numbers, thus founding a prosperous Waldensian church. In 1872 he was called to Florence to succeed G.P. Revel, one of the founders of the theological faculty; there he taught for thirty-two years, devoting all his time to his students, his academic studies, and for some time caring for the Waldensian community in that city as well as editing a journal, La Rivista Cristiana. His works include two short volumes in English, Who are the Waldenses? (1879) and Waldo and the Waldenses before the Reformation (1880). Later came a more substantial history of the Waldensians in French (1887) and Italian (1893), and two volumes on the Reformation in Italy (1881-95).
DAISY RONCO

COMBER, THOMAS JAMES (1852-1887). Baptist pioneer missionary. Born at Camberwell, London, he was baptized in 1868 and studied at Spurgeon's College evening classes and Regent's Park College. Accepted by the Baptist Missionary Society, he sailed for the Cameroons (1876), meeting Alfred Saker* en route. With George Grenfell* he was appointed to the proposed Congo Mission which followed H.M. Stanley's explorations. They established a base at San Salvador (1878). His wife died one month after arriving in Africa. After several attempts, Stanley Pool was reached, and mission stations established at Wathen and, on Stanley's advice, at Leopoldville. Comber and Grenfell explored the Congo River as far as Liboko on the mission steamer Peace. Many missionaries died, including Comber's brother and sister, and eventually he himself succumbed to fever in his thirty-fifth year.

J.G.G. NORMAN

COMENIUS (Komensky), JAN AMOS (1592-1670). Bohemian educational reformer. Born in E Moravia, Comenius was educated at the Latin school in Prerov and at the Herborn Academy in Nassau, and later studied theology at Heidelberg. On his return he was ordained priest of the Unity of Brethren (Unitas Fratrum), and in 1618 became pastor at Fulnek. On the outbreak of the Thirty Years' War, Fulnek was invaded (1621) and Comenius sought refuge with his coreligionist Lord Charles the Elder of Zerotín in E Bohemia. The wife and two children of Comenius died in a plague.

When imperial laws proscribed all non-Catholic clergy from Bohemia-Moravia, he left the country, never to return. He settled at Leszno in Poland, where he became rector of the gymnasium. His Janua linguarum reserata (1631), written to make the study of Latin easier, was translated into eleven European and four Asiatic languages. When soon after he produced his Didactica magna, he was acclaimed as the outstanding educational reformer, and is so considered to this day.

Comenius was invited to England, and while in London during the winter of 1641-42 he outlined in his Via lucis a plan of cultural reform calling for the establishment of a "pansophic college." Education was defined as aiming at learning all that was necessary for this and the future life. It included not only scientific study of nature with deductive reasoning, but also the Bible as integrated into universal education of both sexes and as securing universal peace and religious harmony. In 1645 Comenius began the monumental work De rerum humanarum emendatione Consultatio. Only two of the seven volumes were published in his lifetime; the rest were unfinished. Lost early in the eighteenth century, the text was found in 1935 and 1940, and all seven volumes were published in 1966 by the Czechoslovak Academy in Prague.

The first volume asserts that all men are capable of being educated. The second (Panaugia) says God has provided men with three sources of knowledge: nature, reason, and revelation (Scripture). All three are necessary for good life, for the whole truth consists in the synthesis of all three. In the fourth volume (Pampaedia) Comenius presents his final reworking of educational theories, extending the training of all men literally from the cradle to the grave. Volume 6 (Panorthosia), the most important of the whole series, advocates reform of culture, politics and religion. To achieve this, the Council of Light is to deal with worldwide educational reforms; the Court of Justice is to govern political reorganization and to serve as the supreme judicial tribunal; the Ecumenical Consistory is to supervise and regulate the universal spread of Christianity.

Since his hopes for establishing the pansophic college in London were disappointed, he accepted an invitation to reform the Swedish educational system, and in 1650 undertook a similar reform in Hungary. When in 1656 Leszno was burned by the Poles, Comenius lost all his property including many valuable manuscripts. He was then invited to Amsterdam, which became his home for the rest of his life and where he published many of his books (which total more than 150).

Though known primarily as an educational reformer, he was equally prominent as a religious leader (he was the last bishop of the Czech branch of the Unity of Brethren), and as an ecumenical pioneer who strove throughout his life for the unification of Christendom..

COMGALL (517-c.601). Irish monk. Son of Setna, a Pictish warrior, he was born at Magheramorne, County Amtrim, and was educated under Fintan at Clonehagh, Clairenach at Glasnevin, and Finnian at Clonard. Bishop Lugidius ordained him, possibly at Connor. In 558 he founded at Bangor, County Down, a monastery which became an outstanding seat of learning with at one period a reputed enrollment of 3,000 students. He and Columba* were close friends, and Columba had his support when he went to Inverness to seek permission from King Brude to settle at Iona.

COMMANDMENTS, THE TEN. These are said to have been written by the finger of God (Deut. 9:10) and spoken directly by God to the people. They are thus distinguished from other collections of laws. They form in themselves a significant unity. They had a special place in the continuing life of Israel (cf. Deut. 6; Jer. 7:9). There are slight differences between the two biblical statements of the Decalogue (Exod. 20:1-17; Deut. 5:1-21). In Exodus, Sabbath observance is based on God's rest in His creative activity, whereas in Deuteronomy it is based on the rest required by a servant as a sign that God has redeemed him. In Deuteronomy, moreover, a man's wife is clearly distinguished from his servants and is accorded special status and protection.

The commandments were intended to be divided into two tables, the first teaching duty to God, the second teaching duty to the neighbor. Christ Himself referred to the commandments in His teaching, and summed up their meaning by combining the texts Deuteronomy 6:4 and Leviticus 19:18, each of which sums up one of the two tables (Matt. 22:34-40). In the NT the commandments are sometimes directly quoted (Matt. 5:17, 19; Mark 10:19; Luke 18:20; Rom. 7:7,8; 13:9; 1 Tim. 1:9,10). It has sometimes been supposed that the number ten had some religious significance, since it occurs in the description of the details of the Temple and in other similar connections. Goethe found ten commandments in Exodus 34:-14-26, and it was later suggested that this formed a cultic decalogue corresponding to, and possibly rivaling, the ten moral commandments. It has recently been pointed out that in passages such as Psalm 15:2-5 commandments are grouped in tens.

The dividing and numbering of the commandments has created controversy. Philo divided the two tables equally, the first pental ending with the commandment to honor parents. Subsequent scholars felt the first table should end with the Sabbath commandment. The Talmudic tradition held that the commandments against idolatry and the forbidding of images formed one long, indivisible unit. Augustine, who was followed by the Roman and Lutheran traditions, accepted this suggestion and found two commandments under the rubric "thou shalt not covet." A further tradition, following the lead of Origen, separated the commandment against images from that against idolatry; this is the view of Calvin and the Reformed tradition.

The more the Decalogue is listened to with faith, the more clearly will it impress itself upon us as a Word through which the commandment and grace of the living God reach us today. The more it is studied, the more it will be recognized that in spite of its brevity—and indeed perhaps because of its brevity—it says what is sufficient to establish the claim of God upon every aspect of our lives, each in its due place and proportion. Its significance has been recognized throughout church history. Irenaeus recognized it as a universal law common to Jews and Gentiles, and receiving new sanction rather than abrogation from Jesus Himself. It came to be commonly used in the instruction of catechumens and was identified by the Schoolmen with natural law. Luther gave fresh prominence to it through his use and exposition of it in his catechisms, and along with the Lord's Prayer it was used as the basis of instruction in the Christian life in all the Reformed tradition. Our interpretation of the commandments must take account of the fact that the law was fulfilled in Christ, and that its true meaning is found in His words and life.

COMMON ORDER, BOOK OF. Frequently referred to as "John Knox's Liturgy," this was The Form of Prayers and Ministration of the Sacraments, etc. used in the English Congregation at Geneva, with the addition of Calvin's second catechism and a collection of metrical psalms. Although some have tried to show that the original form of worship employed by Scottish Protestants was the second Edwardian Book of Common Prayer, it is doubtful that it was ever in common use. In the First Book of Discipline, the Genevan book is referred to as "our Book of Common Ordour," and in 1562 the general assembly of the church ordained that it should be used for the administration of the sacraments and the solemnization of marriages and burials. It was not, however, a prayer book, but a guide to the conduct of services. As David Calderwood pointed out in the next century, no minister was tied to a specific form of prayer or even of service. It quickly became the standard directory of worship for the Scottish Reformed church, republished numerous times. The attempt by Charles I and Laud* to do away with it led to the signing of the National Covenant* in 1638 and the subsequent "Bishops' Wars."* It was replaced in 1645 by the Westminster Assembly's Directory of Public Worship, but has continued to influence Presbyterian worship down to the present. W.S. REID

COMMON PRAYER, BOOK OF. The official servicebook of the Church of England. Services in English replaced those in Latin somewhat gradually at the Reformation. An English Litany was introduced in 1544; and in 1548, after the accession of Edward VI, an Order of the Communion was issued with which the people were to prepare for and receive Communion in both kinds (i.e., bread and wine). This order was inserted into the Latin Mass immediately after the priest's own Communion. A commission, meeting at Chertsey and Windsor in 1548, considered Archbishop Cranmer's* drafts for a complete English liturgy and submitted a book to Parliament at the end of the year. The Book of Common Prayer and Administration of the Sacraments, and other Rites and Ceremonies of the Church, after the Use of the Church of England came into use on Whitsunday 1549. The title indicates that it replaced three of the five main Latin servicebooks: the breviary, the missal, and the manual. The processional had been abolished in 1547; and the Church of England never produced an equivalent of the pontifical. An ordinal was added to the Book of Common Prayer in 1550, but common forms for the induction of incumbents, consecration of churches, etc., have not been fixed.

The new services were conservative in form and ceremonial, keeping close to the structure of the medieval Sarum Rite. Priestly vestments were retained and most liturgical gestures permitted except "any elevation, or shewing of the Sacrament to the people." This book already contained, however, most of Cranmer's creative liturgical writing, which gave the services a revolutionary content. In the Holy Communion, a propitiatory sacrifice of Christ was replaced by a self-offering of the worshipers who here received the benefits of Christ's "full, perfect, and sufficient sacrifice" once offered upon the cross. Other major changes included a systematic scheme of Bible-reading, a drastic reduction of saints' days, and increased vocal participation by the congregation.

In the light of criticisms made by continental Reformers then living in England, especially Martin Bucer* and Peter Martyr,* prayer for the dead, reservation of the sacrament, vestments, and various ceremonial features were eliminated from a revised book which appeared in 1552. New material included the form of confession and absolution at the start of Morning and Evening Prayer. But the most revolutionary changes affected the structure of the Communion service. Intercessions were removed from the canon, administration followed immediately the words of institution, and the oblation of the worshipers became a response to Communion.

A few months later this revised Book of Common Prayer was abolished by Queen Mary, but Elizabeth I restored it in 1559 with a very few changes which did not prove controversial. A rubric did enjoin the vestments, but it remained a dead letter; indeed there was a struggle to retain even the surplice of the 1552 book. The Puritans opposed it and other ceremonial features; and there was a deeper opposition from some who had been at Geneva and disliked a "stinted, prescript liturgy" which did not leave scope for the minister's gift of extempore prayer. The book survived, with further small alterations in 1604, until it was again abolished in 1645. At the Restoration a new Act of Uniformity (1662) enforced what was essentially the same book, to the exclusion of dissenters. At the same time many detailed changes were made, and forms provided for adult baptism and prayers at sea. Since then the lectionary has been revised; and an Act of 1872 allowed certain abbreviations in the services. There was an abortive attempt at revision in 1927-28. After ten years of limited experiment with alternative services, the Worship and Doctrine Measure of September 1975 finally replaced the 1662 Act and gave general synod the right to approve new forms without recourse to Parliament. The 1662 Book is safeguarded where still in use, and it remains a standard of doctrine in the Church of England.

COMMUNION, HOLY. After Pentecost the disciples "devoted themselves to the apostles' teaching and to the fellowship, to the breaking of bread and to prayer" (Acts 2:42). The "breaking of bread" has since then been called the Eucharist, Lord's Supper, or Holy Communion, has been celebrated in a wide variety of ways and with widely differing interpretations, but has never been neglected.

At first there may have been a full fellowship meal at which the action of Jesus with the bread at the Last Supper was repeated at the beginning, and that with the cup at the end. When abuses crept into the meal (sometimes called a "love feast"), or when the church came to a better understanding of the mind of Christ (cf. 1 Cor. 11:20-34), the separated actions were brought together, and the meal as a replenishment was gradually stopped. In Christian worship in the second century, according to Justin Martyr, the Word of God was first expounded, in a manner corresponding to that of the Jewish synagogue, then the bread and wine were brought, blessed and thus consecrated, distributed, and partaken of by the Church in an action corresponding as closely as possible to that of Jesus at the Last Supper.

In interpreting the meaning of the rite, the church has always tried to understand what Jesus intended at His last supper. Recently it has been suggested that the breaking of bread in the earliest church life was dominated by the belief that Jesus willed the continuation of His fellowship and resurrection meals with His disciples on a similar pattern so that the church could continue after the Ascension to realize His presence and have joyful communion with Him. However accurate this may be, the words "this is my body" and "this is my blood" may indicate the wish of Jesus that these elements should be regarded as such signs of His own real presence in the midst as He would never fail to honor. He established the Lord's Supper in the continuity of a well-known tradition that when the messianic age came, the Messiah would feast with those who had expected and waited for Him (cf. Isa. 25:6). The vow by which Jesus pledged His own abstinence from participation in the feast, while making His disciples partake, is a vivid reminder that the freedom and joy which the Cross brings involve Him in the inevitable, in a shame and agony from which we are spared.

From the earliest time the church felt the celebration of the Supper was much more than a mere act enabling it to recall mentally the significance of the life and death of Jesus. Just as the celebration of the Passover as a "memorial" involved the Jews not only in memory but in a real participation in the continuing power of the past redemptive events of their history, so in the Lord's Supper "remembrance" was held to involve becoming vitally affected today in the whole of existence, through the re-presentation of a unique event in the past which already had in it more significance than that of an ordinary historical occurrence. The Supper, therefore, was a means through which the efficacy and power of the death and resurrection of Jesus (the unique eschatological event) is applied to successive generations throughout the course of history. Jesus no doubt had this in mind in identifying Himself with the paschal lamb, and His death with the sacrifice of the lamb for deliverance from bondage. He had found foreshadowed in the redemptive history of Israel His own work of delivering man from sin and death. Moreover, since He had come to establish the New Covenant in which sin would be fully forgiven, and the law would be written on the hearts of men through the Spirit, He also referred to this at the Last Supper, and desired that the Supper should be understood in this light.

The church has always found significance in the fact that Jesus, with words which identified the bread and wine with Himself, actually gave them to be eaten and drunk rather than to be merely looked at and adored. This deliberately planned giving and receiving implies some kind of real participation in Christ Himself—that Christ in the Supper is seeking to impart to men in some real ways the actual life which dwelt in His own flesh and blood, and this imparting of life is in some way connected with the giving and receiving at the Lord's Table. The Early Fathers interpreted Jesus' teaching in John 6 about eating the flesh and drinking the blood of the Son of Man to refer not only to a participation in Jesus' humanity by faith through His Word, but also to a participation in Jesus' humanity through the Eucharist. Paul's interpretation of the communion given in the Supper (e.g., in 1 Cor. 10:14-22) can be interpreted in the same light.

Indeed, so realistically did Paul interpret this communion with Christ that he uttered a warning about the damnation which might occur to those who ate and drank "unworthily, ... not discerning the Lord's body" (1 Cor. 11:29 KJV). It does not seem adequate to interpret the presence of the Lord's body in the Supper as simply the presence of the church. There is no doubt, however, that the Supper is a meal in which, through communion with Christ, the members of the church understand and experience—in a way not otherwise so possible—the reality and depth of their unity in Christ, and find strength in each other through a mutual sharing of gifts and burdens.

The Fathers of the ancient Catholic Church tried to give expression in their theology of the Eucharist to their belief that the union with Christ given and confirmed in the Supper was as real as that which took place in the incarnation of the Word in human flesh. Origen and others insisted this fellowship with Christ was spiritual and indeed nothing more than that which comes by believing in the Word. Yet there arose the belief that somehow or other, through consecration in the prayer of thanksgiving, the elements themselves became a sacramental food enabling men to assimilate the essence of deity. This also led to the belief that in the sacrament a sacrifice was made, placating God and repeating the sacrifice of Calvary. This development was encouraged by the doctrine of transubstantiation, made official in 1215, which supposed that the whole substance of the bread and wine was changed into the substance of the body and blood of Christ. The church controlled the grace given through the rite, and the laity were allowed to partake only of the bread, since it was believed that the whole Christ was given under one species.

The Reformers returned to a more biblical view of God's presence among men in word and sign, and were greatly influenced by the best elements in Augustine's teaching. They carefully distinguished between the sign and the thing signified, and insisted that faith alone could receive, for salvation, the reality present in the Supper. They condemned transubstantiation. Luther vigorously denied any sacrificial implications in the rite. He believed the humanity of Christ at the Ascension took on the attributes of deity, including that of omnipresence, and could be given "in, with, and under" (to use a later Lutheran phrase) the elements. The bread remained bread, and the wine remained wine. He insisted the body and blood of Christ are partaken of orally by all, by believers to their blessing, by unbelievers to their judgment. In some Reformed circles it was taught that the elements were simply bare signs encouraging mental remembrance and stimulating faith and brotherly love. This view is sometimes attributed to Zwingli. Calvin insisted on a much more realistic, indeed a more substantial, reception of the humanity of Christ than this latter doctrine would allow. He believed that, though the body of Christ had ascended to heaven retaining its true human properties, nevertheless the Holy Spirit could unite things in heaven and things on earth and could by divine mystery raise the soul to heaven there to feed by divine mystery on Christ Himself. Calvin, following Augustine, noted that at the heart of the Supper there takes place a sacrifice of thanksgiving, a true offering of Christ in His body, the Church, to the Father.

COMMUNION OF SAINTS, THE. This clause was one of the last to find a place within the Apostles' Creed,* first appearing in the Creed of Nicetа* about 375. The clause may, however, have originated in the third century. Because in Latin the genitive in the phrase communionem sanctorum may be either masculine or neuter, it has sometimes been thought that the reference is to a communion in holy things, in which case it would be a reference to the sacraments. Despite the fact that this would then provide a parallel with the Nicene Creed—where a reference to the sacraments follows a reference to the church—and despite the fact that in some medieval explanations the reference is taken to be the sacraments, this is unlikely. The clause more probably refers to people: to the fellowship, first, which we enjoy with the saints, saints here being synonymous with Christians. This fellowship was one of the marks of the early church as we see in Acts 2:42f. It would then be an expansion of one aspect of the church of God referred to immediately preceding.

Nor is fellowship to be limited simply to the living. This clause emphasizes we are one with those who have died in Christ. We are in His keeping, and so are they. The clause has sometimes been pressed beyond its proper scriptural meaning by suggesting that we may pray for the dead or even that prayer is warranted to the saints and that the saints in turn remember us. Both the present and future aspects of its true meaning are well summarized in an early English service for the Visitation of the Sick, where the clergyman says to the sick man, "Dearest brother, dost thou believe in . . . the communion of saints, that is that all men who live in charity are partakers of all the gifts of grace which are dispensed in the church and that all who have fellowship with the just here in the life of grace have fellowship with them in glory?" COMMUNION TOKENS. Vouchers of fitness to receive Communion, usually stamped pieces of metal, but also written tickets. "Houselling" tokens, given after confession to admit penitents to Communion, are noted in England in 1534, and from about 1561 mereaux (or marreaux) were used in the French Reformed Church. From the Reformation in Scotland the distribution of Communion tokens after catechizing of the recipients was strictly controlled by the kirk session. French tokens were round, but various shapes were used in Scotland. Early Scottish tokens bear only the initial of the parish and "K" (for "Kirk"), but later ones bear also the date and the minister's initials. The Communion card now used is more a check on attendance than a token.

COMMUNISM. A name given to any economic scheme which advocates common ownership of property to the exclusion of private ownership of property. Obviously, in actual life situations neither course can be pursued absolutely, but any structure of communal living which accents the sharing of goods by all alike may be considered a manifestation of communism. Communism is not merely an economic theory; it has significant philosophical and even religious implications. The myth of a "golden age" when men had all things in common is found in many religions, and the thought that all men should be treated as equals has inspired some of the noblest philosophical ideals; and it is with such myths and ideals that communistic schemes have been associated throughout the ages of human history. Even the Marxist-Leninist form of Russian communism, though political in character, rests on assumptions which have religious overtones.

As for Christianity, in its earliest manifestations of fellowship and devotion, provision for the poor, not as an economic program but as an expression of worship, was a central concern. The report of a free-will sharing of goods in the mother church at Jerusalem (Acts 2:42f.; 4:32f.) is understood by the sacred historian as a manifestation of the work of the Holy Spirit (Acts 5:3), though scholars have suggested that such imprudent enthusiasm contributed to the indigence of the Jerusalem community which Paul later sought to alleviate with an offering from the Gentile churches (1 Cor. 16).

Many times this example in the early church of "having all things common" has been appealed to, especially when the church has been tempted by temporal wealth and material possessions to identify with the world. This appeal has been variously united in the different ages of Christian history with a Greek depreciation of matter, a Stoic emphasis on natural law, and an apocalyptic enthusiasm which sits lightly by all worldly possessions. While the church as a whole has condemned luxury and protested social inequality, it is only in the inner circle of the ascetic elite, beginning with the ancient anchorites* and later in the monastic orders, that the common possession of goods and the renunciation of private property have been carried through with consistency. The monastic lifestyle has always been for the Roman Catholic Church the ideal; held in a kind of critical balance with the so-called compromise ethic by which the devout layman is allowed to live.

In the late Middle Ages, the heirs of the Franciscan spiritualists within the church, and the heretical sectarians outside the church, formed protest groups against the wealthy institutional church. These parachurch groups often embraced laymen (e.g., the Brethren of the Common Life*) who practiced a mutual sharing of goods, not from commitment to any economic theory, but by a common devotion to the ideal of apostolic poverty. Alongside such essentially religious developments, Christian history also reflects sociological movements of a more revolutionary nature. In the late Middle Ages and at the time of the Reformation there were protests by the peasants against feudal class distinctions and the rigorous exactions of ecclesiastical law, especially the law of the double tithe.

Negotiating Peter's Pence* and other matters of papal finance on behalf of the British crown, John Wycliffe became convinced of the scriptural warrant for a communistic society. Such a society could be achieved only by grace, according to Wycliffe; but in Bohemia, where his thought was influential, the more radical Hussites (Taborites) advocated revolutionary change of the economic order (early 1400s). No permanent new structures were attained, however, because of the military reverses which they suffered.

At the time of the Reformation the communism practiced by the radical Anabaptists* of Münster (1534/35) proved short-lived, but that of the Hutter Brethren (Jacob Hutter was burned in 1536) has endured even to the present in the Hutterite* colonies of the New World, making them the oldest communistic societies in history.

The best-known romantic apology for a communistic state is Thomas More's* Utopia (1516), comparable in many ways to Plato's Republic, though More rejected Plato's community of wives. The government of Utopia is democratic in form; a community of goods prevails, the magistrates distribute the instruments of production among the inhabitants, and dispense the wealth resulting from their labors to all citizens equally. All wealth and ostentation is proscribed in this ideal Christian state. More expresses a keen sympathy for the poor in their helpless misery (though, anomalously, slaves are found in Utopia to perform the toilsome, dangerous, and offensive forms of labor). "The rich," complains More, "desire every means by which they may, in the first place, secure to themselves what they have amassed by wrong; and then take to their own use and profit, at the lowest possible price, the work and labor of the poor; and as soon as the rich decide on adopting these devices in the name of the public, then they become law." In this stricture More strikes a note found in virtually all subsequent forms of communistic social agitation.

Of the various communistic experiments in the English-speaking world, arising out of some form of the Christian vision (e.g., Diggers* of Cromwellian England), the most numerous and enduring have been those that moved to America from the end of the eighteenth century (Shakers,* Harmony Society,* the Amana* community, the Owenite communities, the Fourierist communities, the Icarian communities). There have also been indigenous societies in the United States such as the Perfectionists of Oneida, New York. In the 1970s there is a recrudescence of interest in communal living throughout the free world, especially among the youth. While traditional Christian values of fellowship and equality inform the ideals of many who participate in these youthful communes, there is the new element of disenchantment with the depersonalized world of technology and a renunciation of the materialism which the profit motive in Western capitalism has tended to encourage.

In conclusion, it should be observed that the vision of a society where the needs of all are met by the sharing of goods held in common has been too persistent to be rejected as incompatible with Christian teaching. On the other hand, because of the moral flaw in human nature, the communistic espousal of communal property can never have more than marginal significance in ordering human society; and this is true even for the church insofar as the church is a social organism. Failure to take into account the doctrine of original sin accounts for much of the romantic and even irrelevant character of religious schemes for the sharing of wealth.

In contemporary usage the word "communism" generally refers, not to the religiously motivated renunciation of private property, but rather to the political policy and program of the party which has controlled the USSR since the days of the Bolshevik revolution in Russia (October 1917) and has since gained the ascendancy in other nations of the world as well, notably mainland China. This manifestation of communism, unlike Christian types, has achieved its ends, not by a voluntary devotion to common ideals of brotherhood (though many of the party members have evidenced a commitment that shames the followers of Christ), but by overthrowing the established order through violent revolution employing military means. Its master theoreticians—Marx, Engels, and Lenin—were avowed atheists, denouncing all religion as the "opiate of the masses." In Russia, where the Orthodox Church had aligned itself with the tsarist regime, there has been an intense effort by the "militantly godless" to banish religion from the life of the people.

Russian communism has represented itself as the movement of the proletariat, i.e., the wage-earning laboring class, and has openly espoused a world view known as dialectical materialism. By the process of revolutionary change the dialectic of history is to be achieved, and in the place of the antithesis of rich and poor will emerge the synthesis of a classless society. Material reality is the only reality, and the laborer who has been defrauded of his rightful share in material riches is summoned to shake off his chains and join in the struggle to establish the "dictatorship of the Proletariat." This program has not as yet been realized. Contrariwise, the Communist Party, wherever it has achieved the ascendancy, has spawned dictatorships, depriving the masses of their freedom. It has used its political powers (especially under Stalin) in such a way as to give the state the demonic form of a "total state"—i.e., a state from whose decision there is no recourse or appeal. This tyranny over the minds of men has more than offset the advantages of economic reform which have been introduced. It also explains why the traditional affinity between Christian idealism and communism has changed into a radical antinomy, so much so that today communism and Christianity are regarded by many as the two major world views competing for the allegiance of mankind.

COMMUNITY OF THE RESURRECTION. In 1868 B.F. Westcott, then a master at Harrow, preached a sermon that planted in the mind of the future Bishop Gore the idea of a religious order suited to the age. In 1886 the first stage in the creation of such an order was the founding of the Society of the Resurrection in England by Gore and the Brotherhood of the Epiphany in Calcutta. After lengthy study of various orders, in 1892 six men in Pusey House Chapel made their profession. The distinctive feature of the rule was to be a communal life lived in simplicity. At first each member of the community followed the line of work in which he had been engaged before his profession, but the members soon found themselves in request as missioners, as conductors of retreats, and as wardens to communities of women. After a period in Radley, the community moved in 1898 to Mirfield, and after four years there it began the training of ordinands, a work it has carried on ever since. The community consists of lay as well as ordained brethren, undertakes mission work in South Africa and the West Indies, and has been active in ecumenical affairs, while continuing to serve the church in missions and retreats. COMPARATIVE RELIGION. Otherwise known as "the history of religions," Religionswissenschaft, etc., the term originated in the last quarter of the nineteenth century to denote one of the sciences based on the evolutionary theories of Darwin and Spencer. In its first phase it attempted to compare religions with a view to assigning each a place on an evolutionary ladder, and was especially concerned with the problem of the origins of religion, usually independent of any doctrine of revelation. Early representatives included Max Müller, C.P. Tiele, J.G. Frazer, W.R. Smith, and A. Lang, who were as a rule liberal Christians, though some were agnostics, and comparative religion tended as a result to be classified by evangelicals as a species of "modernism." After World War I, as the idea of unilinear evolution began to lose ground, and as material accumulated, comparative religion split into specialist fields—the history of religion, the psychology of religion, the sociology of religion, and the phenomenology of religion among them—and the synthetic approach was less and less cultivated. The present situation is that scholars in comparative religion agree that all religions are worthy of dispassionate study as phenomena in their own right, but there is otherwise little agreement concerning precise methods. A broad division may, however, be observed between "pure historians," who study phenomena in sequence within given traditions, and "phenomenologists," who prefer to take a cross section of religious phenomena from a variety of traditions. Strictly speaking, it is an axiom with comparative religion that no value judgments may be imposed on the material; the student's first duty is to describe and (hopefully) to understand. To pass beyond this to theological or philosophical evaluation, however legitimate, is not comparative religion.

COMPLINE (Lat. completorium). The last hour of prayer in the Daily Office. It was established in the West by Benedict in his monastic rule, providing a retiring office for religious communities later than Vespers (Evensong), the public evening service of the church. It included various psalms appropriate to the time of day, and a later addition outside the monasteries was the canticle Nunc dimittis, or Song of Simeon (Luke 2:29-32), which had been used at Vespers (Hesperinon) in the East since the fourth century. In compiling his evening office for the Book of Common Prayer, Cranmer made use of this, and other parts of Compline from the Sarum breviary, including the collect, "Lighten our darkness." The Eastern Compline is the Apodeipnon. JOHN TILLER

COMPLUTENSIAN POLYGLOT. The first complete Bible printed in the original languages, published in 1521 or (more probably) 1522. It was printed between 1514 and 1517, in six folio-size volumes. The OT volumes (1-4) incorporate the Septuagint, Vulgate, and Hebrew texts among other things; volume 5 (the first volume printed) contains the NT in Greek, and was the first Greek NT printed, though that of Erasmus was published before it (1516); volume 6 offers lexical and other aids to Bible study. The Polyglot was produced at the newly founded University of Alcalá de Henares (near Madrid), which was called in Latin Complutum, under the direction of Cardinal Jiménes (Ximénez) de Cisneros (1436-1517), and dedicated to Pope Leo X. Some 600 copies were printed. D.F. PAYNE

COMPTON, HENRY (1632-1713). Bishop of London. Son of the earl of Northampton, he was educated at Queen's College, Oxford, served in the army, and then was ordained and became rector of Cottenham, near Cambridge. He was consecrated as bishop of Oxford in 1674 and was transferred to the see of London the following year. He was appointed tutor to the princesses Mary and Anne. Compton was a leading advocate of tolerance and comprehension toward Protestant nonconformists, but his hostility to Rome led James II to find an excuse to suspend him. He signed the invitation to William of Orange and officiated at his coronation (his old position having been restored to him). He was selected to help revise the liturgy, was one of the commissioners to arrange the union between England and Scotland, was a privy councillor under Queen Anne, but was twice passed over for the primacy. He wrote several theological works and supported the newly founded Society for the Propagation of the Gospel. G.E. DUFFIELD

CONCELEBRATION. In the Roman Catholic Church the joint recitation of the Canon of the Mass by a number of priests simultaneously with the principal celebrant. It is claimed this was the practice in the primitive church, and is still the regular practice of the Orthodox communion. It only survived in the Roman Catholic Church at ordinations where the newly ordained priests concelebrated with the bishop, but has revived in recent years in that church and in occasional ecumenical celebrations.

CONCLAVE. Used to describe either the closed rooms in which the cardinals of the Roman Catholic Church are shut as they choose a new pope, or the actual meeting of the cardinals themselves. The origin of the enclosure of the cardinals goes back to 1271 when, after three years of indecision, they were locked in a room until they finally came to an agreement over who should be the next pope.

CONCOMITANCE. The doctrine held in the Roman Catholic Church that the body and blood of Christ are received even when the communicant receives only one of the elements. Although it is a logical extension of the theory of transubstantiation, the practical pressure for this doctrine of concomitance was provided by the withdrawal of the cup from the laity within the Roman Church.

CONCORD, BOOK OF (1580). Also known as the Concordia, this contains the confessions or symbols of the Lutheran Church: the three ecumenical creeds—the Apostolic, Nicene, and Athanasian; the Augsburg Confession (1530) and its Apology (1531); the Smalcald Articles and the "Tract concerning the Power and Primacy of the Pope" (1537); Martin Luther's Small and Large Catechisms (1529); and the Epitome and Thorough Declaration of the Formula of Concord (1577). It supplanted the various corpora doctrinae among German Lutherans. Subscription to these confessions among Lutherans varies. Among some it is made quia (because) they are believed to be in conformity with Scripture; among others, quatenus insofar as they are.

Although Luther's Small Catechism (in 1548) and the Augsburg Confession and its Apology (in 1536 by Richard Taverner) were translated into English already in the sixteenth century, no English translation of the entire Book of Concord appeared before 1851, when one was issued in Virginia. H.E. Jacob's translation appeared in 1882. In 1921 the translation by F. Bente and W.H.T. Daw, known as the Triglot Concordia, was published in St. Louis, Missouri. In 1959 T.G. Tappert, with the assistance of A.C. Piepkorn, J.J. Pelikan, and R.H. Fischer, produced the Book of Concord (printed in Philadelphia). The texts in the original languages can best be found in Die Bekenntnisschriften der evangelisch-lutherischen Kirche (1952 ff.). CARL S. MEYER

CONCORD, FORMULA OF (1577). A Lutheran confession which settled the doctrinal controversies within German Lutheranism after Luther's death, primarily those between Flacians and Philippists. The controversies dealt mainly with: Adiaphorism, which arose because of the subscription on the part of some Lutherans to the Leipzig Interim (1548); Majorism, the place of good works in salvation; synergism, free will, and conversion; original sin; Antinomianism, the distinction between Law and Gospel; the Lord's Supper; Christ's descent into hell; and predestination. Martin Chemnitz* and James Andreae* were the chief architects of the Formula, which grew out of six sermons by the latter, the Swabian-Saxon Concordia, the Torgau Book, and the Bergen Book. It is made up of an Epitome and a Thorough Declaration, each with twelve articles. The Epitome states briefly the status controversiae, the affirmative theses, and the antitheses; the second part has the title: "Thorough, Pure, Correct, and Final [Solid, Plain, and Clear] Repetition and Declaration of Some Articles of the Augsburg Confession concerning which, for Some Time, there has been Controversy among Some Theologians who Subscribe Thereto, Decided and Settled according to the Analogy of God's Word and the Summary Contents of Our Christian Doctrine." CARL S. MEYER

CONCORDANCE. A reference book to the Bible (or other sacred books and standard texts), especially an alphabetically arranged word list. The term (originally a Latin plural, concordantiae) dates from the thirteenth century, as do the first examples of concordances. Ideally each language in which the Bible is to be found requires its own concordance, and so does each individual Bible version. The earliest concordance to the Hebrew OT dates from 1523, by Rabbi Isaac Nathan. The Buxtorfs produced one in 1632. Available today are those by S. Mandelkern and G. Lisowsky, and for English readers, The Englishman's Hebrew and Chaldee Concordance. The earliest concordance for the Greek NT was that of Betulius (1546); those by W.F. Moulton and A.S. Geden, and J.B. Smith, are today current. For the Septuagint there is the work of E. Hatch and H.A. Redpath. For the Latin Bible, the concordance of R. Estienne (1555) is famous; the most used is that of F.F. Dutripon (1838, with many reprints).

The sixteenth century saw the first concordance to the English Bible, by T. Gybson (1535) for the NT and by J. Merbecke (1550) for the whole Bible. The most famous is that of A. Cruden* (1737) on the Authorized Version; it has been revised more than once (most recently, 1954) and remains in print. R. Young's* concordance (1873) has the additional advantage of offering the reader the Hebrew and Greek equivalents of English words. Nelson's published their Complete Concordance of the Revised Standard Version in 1957. In 1968 Zondervan published their Expanded Concordance, which covers several English versions, including the New English Bible NT. D.F. PAYNE

CONCORDAT OF 1801. An agreement made between Napoleon Bonaparte and Pius VII in 1801 by which the Roman Catholic Church was formally restored in France. By its terms the French government recognized the Roman Catholic religion as the national faith. The pope, in concert with the government, was to make a new division of dioceses, requiring if necessary the resignation of existing bishops. The state was given the right of nominating new bishops. Bishops were required to swear allegiance to the government and to offer ritual prayers for the consuls. Alienated church property was to remain with those who had acquired it, but the government agreed to provide fittingly for prelates and clergy. These provisions were considerably modified by Napoleon's "Organic Articles" (1802). At the same time, Protestants were accorded full religious rights. The Concordat was to govern the relations between France and the papacy until the separation of church and state in 1905.

CONDITIONAL IMMORTALITY. This doctrine is an attempt to steer a middle course between what is felt to be the harshness of the doctrine of eternal punishment and the sentimental tendencies of restorationism. It is held to be realistic without being repugnant. It is the view that the soul is immortal by grace and not by nature, and is a form of annihilationism, for the soul that persists in sin is ultimately destroyed. It is defended partly on philosophical and partly on biblical grounds. Philosophically it would seem to owe something to privative ideas of evil, with their ultimate origin in Plato or even in oriental religious philosophy. The biblical evidence cited is largely lexical and involves a discussion of the sense in which the Bible uses such terms as "death," "destruction," and "perdition." In fact none of these terms is properly the equivalent of "annihilation," but refer to a condition of great loss and of continued existence. Conditional Immortality is maintained by some of the sects (e.g., Jehovah's Witnesses, Christadelphians), but also by some who, in other doctrines, stand within historic evangelicalism. G.W. GROGAN

CONDREN, CHARLES DE (1588-1641). French preacher and theologian. Born in Vaubuin, he entered the priesthood in 1614, instead of following the expected military career, and became an Oratorian* in 1617. Already noted as a preacher and spiritual director, he was called to Paris in 1624 after founding houses at Nevers, Langres, and Poitiers. As second superior-general from 1629, he gave the order clearer aims and better constitution, and especially channeled its efforts into seminary education. Of great humility, he unsuccessfully tried to resign his office, concealed his strict asceticism, and refused to publish any writings. His teaching on sacrificial Christian life is of considerable interest, and some Tractarians* were influenced by posthumously edited works. IAN BREWARD

CONFESSING CHURCH. The Confessing Church in Germany grew from such movements as Martin Niemöller's* Pastors' Emergency League and the free confessing synods, which sought to oppose the theology of the German-Christians* and the Nazi-supported church government of Ludwig Müller, elected Reichsbischof, 27 September 1933. Its theological basis was set out in the Declaration of the Barmen* Synod, 29-30 May 1934, which with the Synod of Dahlem (October 1934) provided for the direction of the Confessing Church through Councils of Brethren and a Provisional Church Administration.

The existence and tenacity of the Confessing Church helped to discredit Müller's regime, since despite coercive measures it was unable to secure the docile unity which Hitler looked for in the churches. But from the beginning the Confessing Church suffered near-crippling internal differences. Its member churches had varying legal positions. In "destroyed" churches (i.e., where the church government had been taken over by German-Christians, in, for example, the Old Prussian Union, Hesse, Nassau, Saxony), the Councils of Brethren sought to exercise totally independent emergency government; in "intact" churches (e.g., Bavaria, Württemberg, Hanover, Baden), they worked with the existing leadership. There as elsewhere, however, serious tensions developed between Lutheran and Reformed wings of the Confessing Church. Much support for the Confessing Church came from the tradition of the nineteenth-century confessional revival which had been concerned about the preservation of pure doctrine as defined by the historic confessional statements of the churches. But among Confessing Church theologians, in the line of Barth and Bonhoeffer, a new concept of confession stressed the act of confessing Christ in which the church is realized ever anew as the church of Christ.

In December 1935 the Provisional Administration under Bishop Marahrens of Hanover decided to cooperate with the Minister for Church Affairs, H. Kerrl, and with his National Commission under W. Zöllner. This decision implied that the Confessing Church had been unable to establish its legal claim to be the true Evangelical Church. The decision was opposed by Niemöller, who held to the Barmen-Dahlem line that the Confessing Church was not a movement within the church, but the true church itself. The split became obvious in the Synod of Bad Oeynhausen, February 1936; the Confessing Church lost the episcopally led, intact churches, and a new provisional leadership was appointed; many men drifted into cooperation with Zöllner's church committees as apparently the only way of exercising effective ministry. Harassed by the Gestapo, dependent on hard-pressed congregations for finance, the Confessing Church lived precariously in the years before and during the war, unable to play a large part on the public stage.

The Confessing Church was never a political protest movement against Nazism, though its mere existence embarrassed the regime; its witness to Christ's lordship over the world challenged Hitler's totalitarianism in principle. The wing led by Niemöller, to which D. Bonhoeffer* belonged, was especially aware of political responsibility, though often inhibited by its conservatism and nationalism from explicit opposition. On only a few occasions did the Confessing Church try to criticize the government for its general policies, rather than for attacks on the rights of the church; and then their political ineptness and the power of the police state prevented their orations from having significant effect. After World War II the Confessing Church structures were merged into the re-formed Evangelical Church in Germany. Its traditions have been kept alive by both radical and conservative movements in the church. HADDON WILLMER

CONFESSION. In the NT, the noun homologia can be related in the sense of "confession" to the Gospel or the Faith; the verb homologeō already has as object both faith and sin. Under the impact of Roman persecution, patristic needs created the "confessor." While the oldest examples of the Apostles' Creed, still in interrogative form, had "confessional" usage at baptisms in the second century, the insertion of a declarative creed into the liturgy seems first to have occurred in 473 when Peter the Fuller* brought in the Creed of Nicea to confound the requirements of the Council of Chalcedon. Confession in this declarative sense includes also the orthodox Protestant formulations, of which that of Augsburg (1530) is the first example (see AUGSBURG CONFESSION).

The verb exomologeō came to be adapted to signify the confession of sins to the congregation (cf. Didache 4.14: 1 Clement 51.3). By the late fourth century Chrysostom indicated the need for confession before baptism or Communion, and others specified it regularly, though the form still seems to be communal rather than private.

Confession of sin, especially in the sense ad auriculam ("into the ear" of the priest), was a medieval development which also came to play a role in worship. After the passing of frequent lay communion, and under the transformed character of penance, at the Fourth Lateran Council* in 1215 confession was made minimally an annual obligation, as was receipt of the host for which it was prerequisite. As aid to the accomplishment of this requirement, the confessional stall dates from the sixteenth century. Litanies of ancient usage also serve as vehicles for communal or private confession in the several senses.

CONFESSION OF 1967. As part of the merger of the United Presbyterian Church of North America and the Presbyterian Church in the USA, in May 1958 a special committee was appointed with Edward A. Dowey, Jr. of Princeton Seminary as chairman. Though the proposed confession with its Book of Confessions, including eight historic creeds and confessions, aroused some opposition after being published in 1965, it was approved in May 1967 with only 19 of 133 presbyteries against.

The Confession starts with the biblical idea of 2 Corinthians 5, God's reconciling work in Jesus Christ. It places a heavy stress on the true humanity of Jesus, "a Palestinian Jew." On the doctrine of Scripture "the confession carefully avoids saying either that Scripture 'is' God's word or that Scripture 'is' unique and authoritative as such in its own right" (Dowey). Its statement on reconciliation in society includes exhortations for the church to act in international conflicts, pleading for a search for peace "even at risk to national security;" about sex; about racial discrimination and poverty. The original committee included Arnold Come, Addison Leitch, David H.C. Read, John MacKay, John Wick Bowman, Leonard Trinterud, G. Ernest Wright, and Samuel Thompson.

CONFESSOR. In the early church the term was applied to one who had suffered in times of persecution for confessing the faith, but without actually being martyred. Later the word was loosely applied to those who had not suffered so, but were markedly holy men, and still later to those pronounced so by the pope. Edward the Confessor was so named by Pope Alexander III ninety-five years after his death. "Confessor" denotes also the priest who hears confessions (usually private) in the Roman Catholic Church.

CONFIRMATION. This rite is often traced back in the NT to Acts 8:14-17; 19:1-7. On both occasions, in Samaria and in Ephesus, the action of manual imposition is associated with baptism and the gift of the Holy Spirit; but in neither case is a second stage of Christian experience, separate from commitment to Christ in baptism, implied. And even if it were, this would not add up to confirmation as we now know it. It is impossible, in fact, to deduce from the laying on of hands in Acts 8 or 19, or anywhere else in the NT, a clear precedent for the later rite of confirmation.

This first appears distinguished from baptism in the third century. From the third to the fifth centuries a complex initiation rite was practised by the church, which included baptism followed by the laying on of hands, or anointing with oil, or both. Gradually, by the twelfth century, confirmation was separated from baptism as a "sacrament" in its own right. It is still such in the Roman Catholic Church. At the Reformation the practice of confirmation continued, but it was associated less directly than in the patristic and medieval periods with the gift of the Spirit.

Confirmation, as Anglican prayer book reformers now insist, has greatest meaning when it is associated with (infant) baptism.* Then it can be regarded as primarily an opportunity to assume personal responsibility for baptismal vows; and this may have been the view taken of it in the early church. In any case, as in current Baptist teaching, such a rite (whether or not it is called "confirmation") denotes reception into full church membership, with or without the imposition of episcopal hands. The theology of confirmation, however, and the nature of the gift (if any) it confers, is disputed. Those who associate the rite with the reception of the Spirit see it as in this sense the completion of baptism.

CONGREGATION, THE. A name adopted by leaders of the Protestant party in Scotland who in December 1557 entered into a "Band" which bound the signatories to strive for "the most blessed Word of God and his congregation ... unto which holy word and congregation we do join us." Cautious though they were initially, this covenanting together of the "Congregation (of the Lord)" was a major factor in that build-up that gained momentum with John Knox's return in 1559, and was climaxed when in 1560 the Scottish Reformation became a reality.

CONGREGATIONALISM. This may be traced back to the reign of Queen Elizabeth I, whose objective for the church in England was an enforced uniformity. There were those, however, who thought otherwise. Puritans* wanted to see the national church reorganized on presbyterian rather than episcopal lines. A few others repudiated the whole concept of a state church and favored the "gathered church" principle. These became known as "Separatists"* and were the forerunners of those who later were termed "Congregationalists." They contended that the church should consist only of those who had responded to the call of Christ and who had covenanted with Him and with each other to live together as His disciples.

A leading figure among the Separatists was Robert Browne,* who in 1582 published in Holland his famous treatise, "Reformation without tarrying for any," in which he set forth his congregationalist principles. He asserted that "the Church planted or gathered is a company or number of Christians or believers, which, by a willing covenant made with their God, are under the government of God and Christ and keep His laws in one holy communion." Such churches, he claimed, are subject neither to bishops nor magistrates. Ordination is not vested in elders, but is in the hands of the whole church. In East Anglia and in London, around Gainsborough and in the West country, companies of men and women put Browne's teaching into practice. Rather than submit to ecclesiastical regimentation, many sought religious freedom in Holland, and some of these later crossed the Atlantic where churches of the congregational pattern became one of the formative influences in the New World.

It was from John Robinson's church at Leyden that the Pilgrim Fathers set off in 1620 in the Mayflower. Congregationalism became the established order in Connecticut and Massachusetts until 1818 and 1824. Meanwhile, in England the pattern of church life taught by Robert Browne spread with the growth of Congregational and Baptist churches throughout the country.

Following the civil wars of 1642-46 and 1647-48, Oliver Cromwell* assumed power, and the direction of the religious life of the country was shared between Congregationalists, Presbyterians, and Baptists. Insistence upon the independence of the local Christian community was never regarded as precluding a loose fellowship of independent local churches for purposes of mutual consultation and edification, and in 1832 the Congregational Union of England and Wales was formed. The local church is entitled to manage its own affairs, determine its own forms of worship, and call its own minister.

The officers of a Congregational church are usually a minister, a diaconate, and a church secretary and treasurer. Membership of a Congregational church is on profession of personal faith in Christ as Savior and Lord, and new members are normally welcomed by the giving of the right hand of fellowship at a Communion service. The church meeting is the assembly of the members of the church, gathered under the guidance of the Holy Spirit to discuss and decide matters affecting the life of the church. The call to a minister to assume the pastorate of a local church is issued by the church meeting. Deacons are elected by the membership to assist the minister in the administration of the church and also to share with him pastoral responsibilities. The concept of the "gathered church" as set forth by Robert Browne has had a profound effect upon the British and American ways of life. The spiritual principles upon which this doctrine of the church rests have been a source of great strength and inspiration, particularly in times of persecution.

In Britain, Congregationalism took a decisive step in 1966 when local Congregational churches were invited to covenant together to form the Congregational Church. This step has since been followed by the union with the Presbyterian Church of England to form the United Reformed Church.* With this new development, Congregationalism, as traditionally understood, disappears from the scene in Britain, although it is still the basis of church order in Baptist churches, in a growing number of independent evangelical churches, in those Congregational churches which voted not to enter into the scheme of union, and in a number of smaller denominations.

Missionary interest in Congregational churches has historically found expression through the London Missionary Society founded in 1795, which in 1966 became the Congregational Council for World Mission. Former LMS missionaries have included such illustrious names as James Chalmers,* David Livingstone, and John Williams.*

At the world level, Congregationalism has been closely involved with the ecumenical movement, and this fact no doubt explains to some extent the underlying reasons for the several mergers which have taken place in various countries between Congregational, Presbyterian and, in some cases, Methodist churches. The general trend in Congregationalism worldwide has been away from independency.

In 1949 the International Congregational Council* came into being following a conference in Boston in the USA. At that time it was reckoned that Congregational Church members throughout the world numbered just under 2.5 million, of whom well over half were in the USA. Both Scotland and Ireland have had separate Congregational unions, and in Wales the Union of Welsh Independents has existed as a distinct body. Most of the Commonwealth countries have had their own Congregational unions. On the continent of Europe, Congregationalism has had close links with the Mission Covenant churches of Scandinavia, the Dutch Remonstrant Church, and the United Protestant Church of the Palatinate. At Nairobi in 1970 the International Congregational Council was dissolved to make way for the World Alliance of Reformed Churches* (Presbyterian and Congregational).

In 1919 moderators were introduced into Congregationalism—men charged with the spiritual oversight of churches in different geographical areas, with no legal authority over the churches, but available to give advice. Each year Congregationalists have met together in an annual assembly to which each church has sent its representatives. A chairman, either minister or lay, has been elected annually. Inevitably the newly formed United Reformed Church involves a number of modifications in these procedures.

Congregationalists have, generally speaking, set themselves against credal tests for church membership. They have prided themselves on their breadth of understanding and tolerant spirit. While from some points of view this has been their strength, it has also been a weakness in that as a denomination Congregationalism has been particularly open to liberal and modernistic teaching; so much so that some Congregationalists have at times approximated to a Unitarian position theologically.

Erik Routley in his book, The Story of Congregationalism, makes this observation: "When Higher Criticism came, Congregationalists drank more deeply of it than did any of the others. Congregationalism freed by its new federation from the bondage of parochialism, and freed traditionally by its intellectual ethos from any risk of becoming mentally stagnant, offered enthusiastic hospitality to the new critical teachings. . . ." In spite of these tendencies, there has always remained a small but closely knit group of evangelical Christians. Since 1947 the Congregational Evangelical Revival Fellowship has served as a rallying point for most of the more evangelically inclined ministers and members of Congregational churches.

The Congregationalist system has often wrongly been described as democratic, whereas a more correct, even if somewhat idealistic, description would be Christocentric. It is not surprising that, for the most part, Congregational churches have tended to be relatively small in membership—a large congregation finds it less practicable to work out the principle of Christocracy as expressed through the medium of the church meeting. There have, however, been a number of outstanding Congregational churches which have been served by such eminent preachers as R.W. Dale,* J.H. Jowett,* G. Campbell Morgan,* and Joseph Parker.* Among distinguished British theologians one could mention Sydney Cave, A.E. Garvie, P.T. Forsyth,* J.S. Whale, and Nathaniel Micklem.

Undoubtedly the greatest contribution which Congregationalism has made to the church generally is its whole concept of the local church as a Christ-ruled fellowship. Many would feel that the decline of Congregationalism in modern times is largely due to the fact that a humanistic liberalism affected the denomination to such a large extent.

CONGREGATIONS, RELIGIOUS. The term applied to communities which have taken simple vows. They are regulated by the Roman Congregation for Religious, and governed by their own superiors and chapters. Pontifical communities are exempt from episcopal jurisdiction, but superiors of diocesan communities are responsible to their diocesan bishop. Papal permission is required for their establishment, but the rule requiring episcopal permission for their establishment within particular dioceses is now generally suspended.

CONRAD OF GELNHAUSEN (c.1320-1390). Theologian. He studied and taught at the University of Paris, and became a canon of Mainz (1539), procurator of the German nation at Bologna University (1369), and provost of Worms (c.1380). One of the earliest advocates of the conciliar movement, he urged on Charles V of France that the circumstances of the Great Schism* provided sufficient reason for calling a general council without papal convocation. Since the position of the papacy was doubtful, authority to convoke a council lay in the universal church, as in apostolic times. He expounded this in his principal work Epistola Concordiae (1380). Charles VI's adherence to the antipope Clement VII caused Conrad to leave France in 1386 to lecture at Heidelberg University, where he became the first chancellor.

CONRAD OF MARBURG (c.1180-1233). Inquisitor-general of Germany. Learned and ascetic, and either a Dominican or Franciscan, Conrad gained initial fame by his enthusiastic support for and preaching of the crusade of Pope Innocent III. This led to his being used as a reformer and visitor of religious houses in Germany. Subsequently Ludwig IV of Thuringia, impressed by his zeal and competence, entrusted him with great ecclesiastical powers. In 1225 he became the confessor and spiritual director of Elizabeth, daughter of King Andrew II of Hungary. Conrad is reputed to have treated her with excessive severity. After showing himself a devoted opponent of every kind of heresy, he was nominated by Pope Gregory IX as the first papal inquisitor of Germany. During 1232-33 he used his absolute authority ruthlessly, handing over people on debatable evidence to the secular power for punishment. After accusing Count Von Sayn of heresy, he was condemned by a court of bishops and princes at Mainz in 1233, and then murdered by certain Hessian knights on his way home to Marburg.

CONSALVI, ERCOLE (1757-1824). Italian statesman. Born in Rome of a noble family, he entered papal service early. After the French invasion of the Papal States (1798) following General Duphot's murder, he was imprisoned and later exiled. Gaining his freedom, he worked for the election of Cardinal Chiarmonti as Pope Pius VII, who made him secretary of state. He was chiefly responsible for the Concordat of 1801* with Napoleon. When Napoleon seized Rome in 1809, Consalvi was compelled to go to Paris, becoming leader of the "black cardinals" until forcibly retired to Rheims. Following Napoleon's abdication, he was reappointed secretary and represented the pope at the Congress of Vienna (1815), where he secured the restoration of the Papal States. He spent his remaining years reorganizing them. J.G.G. NORMAN

CONSCIENCE. It has come to be recognized that there is in man some faculty by which he can form a habit of asking what he ought to do, and of making judgments about the moral quality and value of his actions and thoughts. This faculty is regarded as seated in the depths of his personality. The habit of making such judgments is called "conscience." It seems to be innate in man, but it appears to be more developed in certain historical circumstances than in others. The Greek word for it (syneidesis) appears prominently in use for the first time in late Hellenistic and Stoic philosophy. Especially with Seneca it was regarded as a holy spirit within us, an observer of the good and evil.

In the OT there is no special word for "conscience," but the phenomena that gave rise to the word are described and attributed to the heart (1 Sam. 24:5; 2 Sam. 24:10; Job 27:6). In the NT, however, the word syneidesis is adopted from the Stoics and used in many different contexts, especially in Pauline theology. Christ describes what is meant by conscience by the phrase "the light within you" (Matt. 6:23). In Paul's thought, the voice of conscience can anticipate the last judgment, can become a true answer to the Gospel. Though conscience can become bad and weak, it can nevertheless become pure and strong if it is properly bound to God.

In the Middle Ages, conscience was regarded as a volitional ability of the soul (synteresis), unimpaired after the Fall and related to natural law, to which the immediate voice of God could speak. Luther and Calvin stressed that conscience was the sphere of battle between God and evil, that it had no autonomy or independent justification, and that it required to be liberated by faith before God. Kant exalted the role of conscience in life. More recently it has been increasingly pointed out that conscience has been a fallible guide in the development of morals, that it could be the product of instinctive habit, as in animals, of the gulf between the ego and the superego (Freud), or of society's attempt to kill vital instincts (Nietzsche). In spite of such analyses, it still remains an aspect of man which requires sanctification and education, and on which God's Word can take hold with compelling authority. The problems relating to conscience arise mainly within the problem of giving it a proper direction.

CONSECRATION. An act by which a person or a thing is separated from a secular or profane use to the service and worship of God by prayer, rites, and ceremonies. Common in the OT and existing analogously in paganism, in Christian usage the term usually refers to the setting apart of the euchristic elements, the ordination of bishops, the dedication of churches, and the consecration of various sacred objects such as eucharistic vessels and altars. There are wide divergencies in the rites themselves, in their scope and in the significance attached to them by Roman Catholic, Orthodox, and Protestant churches.

CONSERVATIVE BAPTIST ASSOCIATION OF AMERICA. An association of about 1,150 Baptist churches chiefly in the N United States, organized at Atlantic City, New Jersey, in 1947. It is closely allied with the Conservative Baptist Foreign Mission Society, the Conservative Baptist Home Mission Society, and four educational institutions. These seven organizations constitute the Conservative Baptist "movement." Churches within the association cooperate with other denominations through the National Association of Evangelicals. The association arose from the fundamentalist-modernist struggle in the Northern (now American) Baptist Convention. In 1943 several hundred conservative churches, impatient with the Northern Baptist Convention's refusal to adopt doctrinal standards for its missionary program, formed the Conservative Baptist Foreign Mission Society. The association of churches was organized when it became apparent that the Northern Convention would not tolerate a competing missionary agency within its organization. BRUCE L. SHELLEY

CONSISTORY (Lat. consistorium). Originally that part of the imperial palace in Rome where the emperor and his council administered justice. In the Western Church it came to refer to the assembly of the clergy of the city of Rome under the presidency of the bishop; later it achieved its current meaning of the college of cardinals. There are three types of consistory today: the public one (e.g., when a cardinal is given his red had); a semipublic one (when Italian bishops attend); and a private one (wherein the normal work of the college is conducted). In the Church of England each diocesan bishop still has a consistory court to administer ecclesiastical law under the judge (chancellor). Its work has been much reduced in modern times. In Presbyterian churches the term has been applied to the meeting of the parish minister and lay elders (kirk session*), which is the lowest court. Calvin's consistorial court in Geneva was the forerunner of a wider usage: that of a court of presbyters. In Lutheranism the term has been used to describe a board of clerical officers (provincial or national) set up to oversee ecclesiastical affairs (e.g., those in Germany in 1587). PETER TOON

CONSTANCE, COUNCIL OF (1414-1418). The medieval papacy suffered a series of reverses during the fourteenth century, including the removal of the popes from Rome to Avignon and the Great Schism,* when for a time there were two and even three claimants to the office. There had been other instances of antipopes, but they were not nearly so serious as the fourteenth century schism, because in the latter instance the nations of Europe lined up behind their rival popes. There were many suggestions for ending the schism, and it is a high tribute to the office of pope that few people thought of abolishing the institution. The solution finally accepted by leaders such as Jean Gerson* and Pierre d'Ailly* was that of calling a council representing the entire church to settle the matter.

One of the popes, John XXIII, who was in military trouble, agreed to call the Council of Constance to secure the help of the Holy Roman Emperor, Sigismund. The emperor wished to call a council to enhance his prestige, reform the church, and suppress heresy. The council was attended by representatives of the lay rulers, bishops, and abbots or their representatives, and representatives of other ecclesiastical corporations and the universities. Several months passed before the council reached its full strength, and instead of voting by head, the group was organized into five nations after the pattern of medieval universities. Each nation—Italian, German, English, French, and Spanish—had one vote in the formal casting of ballots. This minimized the importance of the numerous Italian clergy present.

Among its achievements, the council ended the papal schism by deposing all three popes and electing Martin V. The problem of heresy was dealt with in the case of John Hus.* Hus came to Constance under safe conduct, firmly believing he could convince the council that his views were not heretical. The safe conduct was not honored, and he was imprisoned, tried, and burnt for heresy. The execution of Hus did not extinguish his teaching, but rather led to the Hussite wars. In the matter of reform, the council won two impressive victories, but lost on most of the practical issues. It passed the decrees Sacrosancta, affirming the authority of councils over the church, and Frequens, which set the intervals at which councils should meet. On specific matters, however, not much progress was made. Various committees of the council worked on reform of the abuses connected with papal revenues and provisions. Each party was ready to reform whatever did not affect its own selfish interests. The result was that Martin V was presented with a bill of particulars which he accepted in principle, but did not bother to enforce. ROBERT G. CLOUSE

CONSTANTINE, DONATION OF, see DONATION OF CONSTANTINE

CONSTANTINE THE GREAT (c.274/280-337). First Christian emperor of Rome. Son of Constantius Chlorus, the future Western emperor, Constantine spent the years 293-305 as an apprentice-cum-hostage under the Eastern emperors Diocletian and Galerius, the instigators of the Great Persecution, but at York in 306 was proclaimed emperor (Augustus) by his father's troops on his death. From the contest for supremacy in the West he emerged triumphant by defeating Maxentius in 312 at the Milvian Bridge, north of Rome. According to Eusebius and Lactantius,* before the battle he adopted the emblem of the labarum in obedience to a vision and dream assuring him of victory from the Christians' God, whose worship he may have confused with his family's monotheistic reverence for the Unconquered Sun or Apollo.

In 313 he and Licinius, soon to control the Eastern empire, decreed full legal toleration for Christianity (Edict of Milan*), and the church enjoyed increasing favor—restitution of confiscated property, financial aid for Catholics, clerical exemption from hereditary offices, civil jurisdiction for bishops. The Donatists* protested against exclusion from his benefactions, and his determination to let churchmen resolve the dispute foundered on repeated Donatist appeals until in frustration he adjudicated personally in 316. His abortive coercion of the schismatics in 321 set another precedent. As sole emperor after conquering Licinius in 324, Constantine tackled the Arian* conflict. After a fruitless mission by Ossius, bishop of Cordoba, his adviser since about 312, he summoned the Council of Nicea (325), presided, at least at first, and influenced the inclusion of homoousios in its creed. The unity thus achieved soon disintegrated. Constantine, pursuing harmony without theological insight, and guided increasingly by the Arianizing Eusebiuses of Caesarea and Nicomedia, exiled obstructionist orthodox bishops like Athanasius.* Civil sanctions now regularly enforced ecclesiastical censures.

Constantine in 330 inaugurated his new foundation of Constantinople, located for strategic and Christian reasons far from old Rome, symbol of the pagan past and citadel of paganism's continuing vigor. Constantine spurned Rome, but his career magnified the Western Church's appreciation of its bishop's function as arbiter. He was baptized shortly before he died, and was buried amid the apostles in the basilica he founded in their honor in Constantinople. Constantine and his mother Helena* were keen patrons of church building, especially in the Holy Land, thus promoting the revived importance of Jerusalem.

The genuineness of Constantine's adoption of Christianity has been hotly debated, especially since Jacob Burckhardt's portrayal of the megalomaniac motivated solely by political expediency (The Age of Constantine the Great, 1853; ET 1949). The authenticity of Eusebius's panegyric Life of Constantine is now almost universally accepted. If Constantine often appears to stand outside the church, it is because he bore a heavenly commission to ensure its welfare and unity in the interests of imperial peace and prosperity which are divine blessings. He conceived of himself as "the servant of God," alongside or above the bishops, the pontifex maximus in Christianized dress. His religious ideas were dominated by an almighty Supreme Divinity who assigns responsibilities and distributes temporal and eternal rewards and punishments. Worship, the observance of the religious law, must be correct and united. Lactantian influence here is discernible.

The ambiguity of much of Constantine's public life hinges on the circumstance that, though a Christian, he was an absolutist monarch ruling an empire still largely pagan. His elevation of Christianity into virtually the imperial religion, though fraught with baleful consequences in the short and long term, was inevitable once an emperor became Christian, for the secular or religiously neutral state was unknown in antiquity.

CONSTANTINOPLE. Many centuries before Constantine established the city of Constantinople, the Megarians had founded a colony at the same place on the European side of the Bosporus. When they established the colony in the seventh century B.C. they were fully aware of the strategic and commercial advantage in locating the community on the border of two continents and at the entrance to two seas, the Black and the Mediterranean. Even the Greek historian Polybius saw the importance of this location, and wrote in the second century B.C. that the inhabitants of Byzantium controlled all commercial vessels entering or leaving the Black Sea, thus placing them in a very powerful position.

When Constantine became emperor at the beginning of the fourth century A.D., he immediately recognized that Rome was too far away to deal with the eastern problems of the Roman Empire. At first he had planned to locate his eastern capital at the site of ancient Troy, but he soon changed his mind for the site at Byzantium. On 11 May 330, Constantine dedicated the "New Rome" and called his new capital "Constantinople." Historians mark this event as the beginning of the Byzantine Empire, even though this officially took place under the Roman Empire.

Constantine was responsible for an added dimension to the imperial throne. He considered himself the representative of God on earth and so brought a sacred character to his sovereign power. When he made Christianity the state religion of the Roman Empire, it was only natural he should take his role among the bishops of the church as if he were one of them. The emperor fixed this into the physical structure of the city by making the church building the center of the city, which is still to be found in many eastern towns and cities. Thus church and state began to operate in a more uniform way in Constantinople.

The fourth and fifth centuries A.D. were the period of the great heresies in the Christian Church. As these theological battles were fought, Constantinople began to emerge as the second most important religious center of power in Christianity, next to Rome. The bishop of Constantinople began to compete with the bishop of Rome for the primacy of the Christian Church. The new power which came with the New Rome provided the basis for the Greek East to consider itself equal to the Latin West. As more Germanic influence penetrated Rome and since paganism still dominated much of Roman life, the Eastern church leaders felt less and less loyal to the authority of the Roman papacy. Constantinople, on the other hand, was a capital with all the power and prestige that went with this role. The eastern city was, moreover, Greek and tended therefore to separate from Latin Rome so far as ecclesiastical authority was concerned.

After the Turks captured the city in 1453, the patriarch of Constantinople continued to keep his office in the city. The Turks tended to treat their Christian subjects with generosity. In fact, with the establishment of the Ottoman Turkish millet system (religious nations within an empire), it made possible the survival of the Greek Orthodox Church during the four centuries of Turkish rule. To this day the patriarch of Constantinople is the head of the Greek Orthodox Church, though the Greek Orthodox Church does not include the other branches of Eastern Orthodoxy.

CONSTANTINOPLE, FIRST COUNCIL OF (381). Summoned by Theodosius I, it was attended by bishops from the civil dioceses of Oriens, Asia, Pontus, and Thrace at first, and later by Timothy of Alexandria and Ascholius of Thessalonica. Mainly it confirmed earlier decisions: the appointment of Melitius* to Antioch and Gregory Nazianzus* to Constantinople; acceptance of the Creed of Nicea and the homoousia of the Holy Spirit by Damasus of Rome (372), by the Council of Antioch under Melitius (379), and by Theodosius (380), whose condemnation of heretics is reflected in canon 1. The authority of this local Eastern council, entitled "ecumenical" in 382, was recognized at Chalcedon.

When Melitius died and Gregory retired, attacked for his appointment to a second see (Constantinople), the council appointed Flavian to Antioch and Nectarius, a government official, to Constantinople. The council presented six canons (the seventh is spurious) to Theodosius for ratification. Canon 1 confirms the Nicene faith and anathematizes all heretics, mentioning Anomoeans, Eudoxians ("Homoeans"), Pneumatomachi, Sabellians, Photinians, and Apollinarians. Canon 2 forbids bishops functioning outside the civil diocese of their see, although founding churches may still regulate mission churches among barbarians. The controversial third canon gives Constantinople primacy of honor next to Rome "because Constantinople is new Rome." Alexandria resented this relegation, and Rome rejected political prominence as a ground of her ecclesiastical supremacy. Canon 4 cancels the Acta of Maximus, while 5 and 6 (probably promulgated in 382) accepted Roman and Antiochene "tomes" and regulated accusations against bishops. The Acta of Chalcedon (451) attribute the "Nicene" creed to this council. Possibly known to Epiphanius of Salamis in 374, it was based probably on a local creed used at the baptism of Nectarius.

CONSTANTINOPLE, SECOND COUNCIL OF (553). The fifth ecumenical council. In order to understand its decisions and decrees it is necessary to investigate some of the previous events. The Council of Chalcedon* (451), which attempted to present both sides of the incarnation question about the nature of Christ, did not produce the unity hoped for by its leaders. Instead, the decisions at Chalcedon began the Monophysite controversy which plagued the church for centuries. Egypt and other centers in the Middle East were the main centers of Monophysitism* and were in constant conflict with Constantinople and Rome. The emperors Justin and Justinian tried to use force to impose orthodoxy by appointing orthodox bishops to seats in Monophysite areas. These bishops could, however, only occupy their seats with the aid of the police, for the masses were clearly on the side of the Monophysites.

Justinian in 531 decided to change his policy and follow one of compromise. This was probably due to the influence of his wife Theodora, who was a secret Monophysite believer. She was able to mellow her husband's orthodoxy. Thus the emperor began to enforce a somewhat double policy. On the one hand he opposed Monophysitism, as is evidenced in an edict against them in 536; on the other, he wanted to please his wife, so he allowed the Monophysites to reestablish their church in Constantinople in 543. When the Second Council of Constantinople took place, he wanted to please the Monophysites by having the council and the papacy condemn the Three Chapters,* involving Theodore of Mopsuestia, Theodoret of Cyrrhus, and Ibas of Edessa, who were all linked with Nestorianism,* the direct opposite of Monophysitism. The earlier council had cleared these men of heresy charges. Justinian, prior to 553, condemned these three leaders, and the Eastern bishops for the most part submitted to his edict. The Western bishops, however, including the Africans and Pope Vigilius, refused to sign it.

The council in 553, attended by 165 bishops, met and condemned the Three Chapters and thus moved closer to the Monophysite position. At the same time it condemned also the other extreme—that of Origenism.* Another decision of the council was to add a title to Mary, the mother of Jesus. Besides the already existent Theotokos (Mother of God), the council bestowed also the title Aeiparthenos (Ever-Virgin). They thus fixed in church dogma the perpetual virginity of Mary and considered the brothers of Jesus mentioned in Mark 3:31,32 as half brothers, cousins, or near relatives.

From the time of the Second Council one can begin speaking about the distinctiveness of Byzantine Orthodoxy in contrast with the Western Church. One of the distinctives is this particular interest to synthesize the two extremes of Christianity concerning the nature of Christ.

GEORGE GIACUMAKIS, JR.

CONSTANTINOPLE, THIRD COUNCIL OF (680). The sixth ecumenical council. With the rise of Islam in the middle of the seventh century, there was a marked attempt by the Eastern emperor to bring about unity and to induce the Monophysites back into the Orthodox Church. One of the ways by which this was attempted was through the emphasis called Monothelitism.* This was put forth by Emperor Heraclius in 638 along with the support of Patriarch Sergius. It stated simply that in Christ there were two natures, but not two wills. Christ was a single person and therefore acted with one will.

A few of the leaders in Egypt favored this new interpretation, but most of the Eastern Christians rejected the compromise. This council wanted to bring religious unity between Rome and Constantinople. Thus it rejected Monothelitism and restated the Chalcedonian definition, adding the interpretation that Christ had two wills as well as two natures. The council went on to anathematize the leaders of Monothelitism and reestablish the Orthodox faith. It also condemned the then dead Pope Honorius because he had sanctioned Monothelitism. Because of these decisions and the fact that Islam had taken over much of the Middle East, the Nestorian* and Monophysite* wings of the church became permanently separated from the Orthodox Church.

GEORGE GIACUMAKIS, JR.

CONSTANTINOPLE, FOURTH COUNCIL OF. It is uncertain which fourth Council of Constantinople was in fact the eighth ecumenical council. The Eastern Church recognizes only seven ecumenical councils, but they do sometimes recognize an eighth council as that which took place in 879 under the leadership of Patriarch Photius* of Constantinople. The Latin West, however, recognizes the eighth ecumenical council as being the one which took place in 869 under Patriarch Ignatius. The latter had decided to rebuke the immorality of Emperor Caesar Bardas. Ignatius was arrested and the layman Photius was promptly nominated in his place. Ignatius was exiled, then voluntarily resigned. The supporters of Ignatius, however, who considered Photius to be illegitimate, were able to convince Pope Nicholas I that he should intervene. He convoked a synod at Rome which at once voted to excommunicate Photius and to reinstate Ignatius. Photius in turn held a counter synod and deposed the Roman pope.

Photius's greatest support came from Emperor Michael III. But the emperor was murdered in 867, and his successor, Basil, decided to restore Ignatius as patriarch. Basil convened the 869 council which voted against Photius and in favor of Ignatius. Another action of the council was to condemn the Monothelites and the Iconoclasts as had been done in past councils. Photius, however, was reappointed to the patriarchal see shortly after the death of Ignatius in 877. He then convened his own Council of Constantinople in 879.

It annulled the council of 869, branding it as fraudulent, and it readopted the Nicene Creed. The council specifically spoke against the Filioque, the phrase "and from the Son" which was added to the Nicene Creed by the Western Church to show that the Holy Spirit came from the Father and from the Son. The council ended by praising the virtues of Photius.

CONSTANTIUS II (337-361). Eastern emperor from 337; sole emperor from 350. Acceding after defeating Magnentius in the West, he continued the benevolent policy of Constantine I toward the church, which freed clergy from taxation and public service, although his laws in 360/1 made such privileges conditional. Some of his pro-Christian legislation was directed against Jews. Doctrinal disputes threatened the cohesion of the empire. To alleviate Western discontent with Eastern bishops, Constans induced Constantius to recall Athanasius* to Alexandria (346). In 350 he reassured the latter of his support, but gradually, influenced by the Arian Valens* of Mursa, he sought to unite the church with a vague creed which excluded the unscriptural term "substance" and stressed "likeness." At Milan in 355 he exiled bishops who refused to depose Athanasius, and, despite a brief period of favor towards Homoiousions, imposed the "Dated Creed" on the Councils of Rimini and Seleucia (359). CONSTITUTIONAL ACT. The commonly accepted name for the Canada Act of 1791, which divided the old province of Quebec into Upper and Lower Canada, with the French of Lower Canada maintaining their own religion, customs, and laws. The people received representative but not responsible government. The legislatures consisted of an appointed legislative council and an elected legislative assembly. The executive powers remained in the hands of the governor, who acted in conjunction with the Crown-appointed executive council. While the assembly voted funds for roads, bridges, and other public projects it was the executive council that administered both the collection and the spending of tax and custom monies. A ruling élite emerged that in Upper Canada was called the "Family Compact" and in Lower Canada was dubbed the Château Clique. ROBERT WILSON

CONSTITUTIONAL CHURCH. This was established in France at the Revolution by the "Civil Constitution of the Clergy" (1790). It was organized in 1791 under the protection of the National Assembly, which had passed a law requiring all bishops, pastors, and functionary priests to take an oath of fidelity to the Civil Constitution under pain of deposition. About one-third of the clergy obeyed. Those refusing to take the Constitutional Oath became the "Refractory Church" siding with the papacy, to which most loyal Roman Catholics adhered, especially when the old discipline was abandoned, priests and bishops married, and divorce was permitted. The church established itself for three years, but after the royalist and Catholic uprising in La Vendée (1793) and the triumph of Jacobinism, it was itself persecuted and many of its priests apostatized, though Constitutional bishops like Henri Baptiste Grégoire showed dauntless courage and integrity. After Robespierre's fall (1794), a measure of toleration was granted, but the Thermidorian Convention adopted a regime (1795) separating the state from the churches, thereby abandoning the Civil Constitution and refusing to pay Constitutional priests. When Napoleon concluded the Concordat of 1801,* Pope Pius VII had little difficulty in obtaining the church's abolition.

CONSTITUTIONS OF CLARENDON. Articles laid down by Henry II of England at a council called to the royal hunting lodge at Clarendon, near Salisbury, in 1164. They purported to record established customs in relations between church and state, but in fact incorporated some new regulations designed to reduce the power of the church over against the Crown. For example, guilty "criminous clerks" were to be handed over to the king's officers for punishment, and royal permission was required for the imposition of excommunication and interdict on the king's tenants-in-chief and his officers, for clergy to leave the realm, and for appeals to Rome. After initial opposition, the bishops led by Thomas Becket* gave way, but Becket later withdrew his consent and fled to France. HOWARD SAINSBURY

CONSUBSTANTIAL. A term occasionally used in connection with the fourth-century Arian* controversy. The orthodox party, led by Athanasius,* defined the Son as homoousios—the same identical essence or substance as the Father. Arian groups taught that He was homoiousios (like essence) or homois (like) or anomoios (unlike). The Greek ousia (essence) had an imprecise Latin equivalent in substantia, and consubstantialis therefore became the equivalent of the orthodox homoousios.

CONSUBSTANTIATION. A term used to describe Luther's view of how Christ is present in the Eucharist, although the term does not appear in his writings. Luther's belief was that Christ is present "under (or with) the species of bread and wine"—a position William of Ockham* had earlier held. Luther nevertheless insisted that we know Christ is present only through the Word, whose pledge guarantees it. A union of the earthly and the heavenly occurs in the sacrament, but the bread and wine are not changed in substance, an explanation Luther found too reasonable. The question that intrigued him, rather, was why Christ was really present. His answer: for our salvation. "Of course," he held, "it is a miracle that Christ's body and blood should be in the sacrament and not be visible; yet we are content to know through the Word and by faith that they are there." ROBERT B. IVES

CONTARINI, GASPAR (1483-1542). Venetian ambassador and cardinal. After an education at Padua appropriate to his noble birth, he became in 1521 ambassador of the republic of Venice to Charles V. Later he also served in Spain, England, and Rome. A fruit of this activity was his De Magistratibus et Republica Venetorum. His general integrity (in part the result of his adoption of the New Learning) led to Pope Paul III's making him a cardinal in 1535, even though he was a layman. He had previously, however, shown himself to be a competent theologian in his defense of the immortality of the soul (1516) and in his treatise against Luther (1530). He favored reform within the church and for this reason was put on the commission set up by Paul III to suggest reforms. His proposals made in 1537, entitled Consilium de emendanda ecclesia, were too radical for many, and the book was put on the Index* in 1539. Prior to this he became bishop of Belluno. In 1541 he attended the Diet and Conference of Ratisbon where he made a valiant attempt to bring back the Lutheran movement into the church. Also he composed a treatise on Justification which, in the opinion of other Roman Catholics, went too far towards the Protestant doctrine. He died while serving as a legate at Bologna, at a time when the Inquisition* was beginning to make life difficult for reforming Catholics.

PETER TOON

CONTRA-REMONSTRANTS. A name given to the defenders of Calvinist orthodoxy in the Dutch controversies of the early 1600s aroused by the teachings of Arminius and his followers. A theologian at Leyden, Arminius tried to soften the doctrine of predestination so as to preserve something of human free will. His colleague Francis Gomar* (Gomarus) attacked his views as dangerous innovations, and the controversy spread rapidly. After Arminius's death in 1609, his followers issued the Remonstrance* of 1610, stating the Arminian* position. In 1611 the Counter-Remonstrance appeared, reiterating the orthodox position as understood by scholastic Calvinism. In general it stressed that predestination did not depend in any way on man's actions and thus salvation was assured for the elect. More particularly, it held that predestination is not based on God's foreknowledge of man's choice; children, though unable to make a mature choice, may be among the elect; election is due to grace alone, and man does not cooperate; Christ died for the elect, whom He willed to save; the elect are assured of salvation; and these doctrines lead to a virtuous life, not carelessness.

During the next few years, the controversy aroused heated debate among the people as well as among theologians; for those who favored the Contra-Remonstrant position, the Remonstrants appeared to take away the assurance of salvation and make it dependent on man's will rather than divine grace. Political issues also became involved. The Remonstrants were strongest in the province of Holland and were supported by its leader, Jan van Oldenbarneveldt, who favored provincial autonomy rather than centralization, and peace with Spain; the Contra-Remonstrants thus turned to the stadhouder Maurice of Orange, who favored continuation of the war by a centralized government. The political struggle between Maurice and Oldenbarneveldt resulted in the latter's imprisonment (and later execution on charges of treason). Thus, at the Synod of Dort* which followed (1618), the Contra-Remonstrants were in control. The Remonstrant positions were condemned, Remonstrant ministers ousted from their pulpits, and Remonstrant leaders exiled as disturbers of the public peace. The Canons of Dort became one of the official standards of the Dutch Reformed Church.

CONVENT (Lat. con and venire, "to come together"). To convent is to assemble persons for some common purpose; thus the noun can designate any general or specific gathering or company. Already in thirteenth-century English, "convent" designated particularly men or women living under a disciplined religious order with a single superior. From the institutional phenomenon the term was applied by the sixteenth century to the set of buildings thus occupied, and since the late eighteenth century, without historical warrant, popularly restricted to that of women only.

See also CLOISTER.

CONVENTICLES, ACT AGAINST (1670). Legislation passed by the Scottish Parliament against field preaching* and illegal house services conducted generally by Presbyterian ministers who had been ejected for nonconformity after the Restoration of Charles II. The punishment for infringing the act was death and confiscation of goods. It was required of everyone on oath to give information regarding conventicles, and those who had had their children baptized by the nonconforming ministers could be punished with exile. Gilbert Burnet* claims Charles himself said that bloody laws did no good and that he would not have sanctioned the act if he had known of it beforehand, but despite this disclaimer the repressive policy was maintained.

CONVERSION. A radical change, a transformation, a turning around. The term applies to nonreligious responses to stimuli, or to reorientation of mental attitudes and behavior, but usually religious conversion is intended. The term does not have a prominent place in the NT, but the idea of conversion is abundantly present in both testaments, particularly with regard to the apostolic preaching of the Gospel through which men are converted to Jesus Christ. Repentance (turning from) and faith (turning to) are usually seen as the two sides of conversion; they figure more prominently in the biblical language.

Conversion is a conscious act on the part of the subject, not an event passively experienced. For the Christian, the changed life of the converted man is the outward expression of a changed heart. Biblical examples are Paul's conversion (Acts 9), the Ethiopian eunuch (Acts 8:26-40), the Prodigal Son (Luke 15:11-32), and Zaccheus (Luke 19:2-10). While conversion is usually thought of in relation to individuals, societies and nations also have been profoundly affected by religious awakenings. These include Israel under Moses' leadership and during Hezekiah's reign, Nineveh as a result of Jonah's preaching, and more recent events like the English revival under John Wesley, and the Welsh revival.

The need of sinful men to be converted is declared by Jesus (Matt. 18:3) and the apostles (Acts 3:19; 15:3). In Acts, conversion is also presented under the figure of the two ways and choosing the Way of the Lord (9:2; 19:9,23; 22:4; cf. James 5:19,20). The new Way involves a new kind of life (Eph. 5:2; Col. 1:10; 2:10-12). Bunyan's Pilgrim's Progress is a classic which presents conversion as entrance upon the pilgrimage from the City of Destruction to the Celestial City.

Conversion entails intellectual, emotional, and volitional elements, including a doctrinal relationship to or affirmation of Jesus Christ's lordship, acceptance of His redemptive work, devotion to Him personally, commitment of fellowship to the community of Christians, and the ethical transformation of life.

Many psychological explanations of religious conversion have been attempted. Most of these, following William James,* see conversion as a conscious unification or reunification of a hitherto divided self, with a sense of wholeness, being right and happy, resulting. Conversion is thus seen as a profound step in the creation of a self. The biblical language concerning the Prodigal ("he came to himself" KJV) is distinctly parallel. Other explanations include such terms as these: integration of personality, new being, freedom, reorientation, and brainwashing. William Sargant's thesis, while interpreted as a critique of brainwashing techniques in religious conversions, usually draws attention to the dangers of religious manipulation.

In its biblical sense, conversion is the soul's turning to Christ and union with Him in His death and resurrection, which baptism signifies as entering by faith upon a new life (Rom. 6:1-14).

CONVOCATION. The name given to each of the two provincial gatherings of clergy in the Church of England: those of Canterbury and York. The origins of these two provincial convocations are lost in the mists of medieval antiquity, but they certainly antedate Parliament. Until 1665 they taxed the clergy instead of Parliament, but in 1717 the two convocations were suspended until 1852 (Canterbury) and 1861 (York). The suspension largely arose out of clashes between Whig Upper Houses (bishops) and Tory Lower Houses (other clergy). It is sometimes alleged that the Church of England was paralyzed by this suspension, but being a church established by the law of the land, church government took place through Parliament, which in England was a Christian body. More recently, powers over the Church of England's doctrine and liturgy were claimed by the convocations, but this was largely a myth since changes in basic church law had to come through Parliament. In 1920 the national assembly of the Church of England (usually called the Church Assembly) began to function alongside the convocations. In 1969 the Synodical Government Measure more or less coalesced Church Assembly and convocations into a new General Synod,* though formally the convocations still remain.

CONVULSIONARIES. The tomb of a young Jansenist,* François de Paris, was the scene of a series of supposed miracles after 1727. Jansenists regarded them as a vindication of their cause, and thousands visited the cemetery of St. Medard. Ecstatic behavior led to the nickname "Convulsionaries," and even after the cemetery was closed by the authorities, portions of earth from the graveyard induced the same results. The movement ended in discredit.

CONYBEARE, FREDERICK CORNWALLIS (1856-1924). Armenian scholar. Elected fellow of University College, Oxford, in 1880, he resigned in 1887 to devote himself to research, particularly in Armenian, in order to obtain material for the textual criticism of the Greek classics. Because of the religious nature of the MSS he became interested in church history and in the textual criticism of the Septuagint and the NT. His discoveries included a MS with the ascription of the Last twelve verses (16:9-20) of Mark's gospel to the "Presbyter Aristion." He was generally skeptical toward Christianity as is shown in his Myth, Magic and Morals, a Study of Christian Origins (1909), though he refuted those who denied the historicity of Christ in The Historical Christ (1914). He also entered into controversy on a number of political issues of his day.

CONYBEARE, WILLIAM JOHN (1815-1857). Biblical scholar. He was ordained in 1841 and the following year became the first principal of the Liverpool Collegiate Institution. In 1845 he was joined there by J.S. Howson,* later dean of Chester. Three years later he had to resign on account of his health, and became vicar of Axminster, Devon, until 1854. While he was there he combined with Howson to write The Life and Epistles of St. Paul (2 vols., 1852). This was an important book for introducing to the English-speaking world new ways of understanding the apostle's writings in the context of their time. He also wrote Essays Ecclesiastical and Social (1856) and several articles for the Edinburgh Review.

COOK, DAVID CALEB (1850-1927). American Sunday school leader and publisher. Born in East Worcester, New York, he gained a lasting impression from his first contact with a Sunday school teacher in Wheaton, Illinois. He entered business in Chicago as a sewing-machine salesman and later developed a thriving mail-order business. Involvement in several Sunday schools led him to give up business and dedicate himself to the Sunday school, particularly in the field of publications. In 1882 rapid expansion obliged his publishing house to move to nearby Elgin, where it still is. While recuperating from a nervous breakdown, Cook built up a flourishing estate in California, but sold out to return to Illinois and his beloved Sunday school work, to which he made valuable contributions. HAROLD R. COOK

COOK, STANLEY ARTHUR (1873-1949). Biblical and Semitic scholar. His wide interests within the Semitic field included epigraphy, archaeology, and religion. In 1925 he gave the Schweich Lectures at the British Academy under the title The Religion of Ancient Palestine in the Light of Archaeology (published in 1930). He admired the work of W.R. Smith, and especially his use of anthropological evidence in the study of the early religion of the Semites. In his own work he explored the close cultural links between Israel and her neighbors. From 1902 to 1932 he served as editor of the Quarterly Statement of the Palestine Exploration Fund, and was a co-editor of the Cambridge Ancient History, to which he contributed several chapters. He was regius professor of Hebrew at Cambridge (1932-38). Apart from numerous articles in journals, Cook's writings include The Study of Religions (1914); The Old Testament: A Reinterpretation (1936); and The Rebirth of Christianity (1942).

COONEN CROSS. The cross outside the church at Mattancherry in Cochin—coonen meaning "crooked" or "bent"—at which a crowd of Syrian Christians took an oath not to be subject to the Jesuit Archbishop Francis Garcia on 3 January 1653 and thereby initiated a revolt which affected almost all the Syrians in the Roman Catholic Church in Kerala, India. Discontent with the rule of the Jesuit archbishops of Cranganore was nothing new, and led the Syrians to look again to Mesopotamia for a bishop of the old church, although the Synod of Diamper* had apparently terminated that connection and bound them to Rome.

In 1652 a Bishop Ahatalla did in fact come to India, but was detained by the Portuguese at Mylapore (Madras). He managed to get a letter to the Syrians in Kerala, and a great agitation was stirred when the Syrians learned that he was being taken to ship and that the ship was now at Cochin. The Portuguese shut the fort and manned the walls until the ship sailed. A rumor was that the bishop had been thrown overboard and drowned; in fact he probably reached Goa and may have been shipped to Europe after trial as a heretic. The fury of the Syrians left hardly any of them under Roman authority, but it is evident that the revolt was not against Romanism as such, for efforts led by the Carmelites to win back the lost Syrians were very successful. The Coonen Cross incident, however, marked the renewed independence of a considerable section of the Syrians, and tempered Roman policy in Kerala.

COORNHEERT, DIRCK VOLKERTSZOON (1522-1590). Dutch humanist and evangelical. Born in Amsterdam, he settled in Haarlem as a skilled engraver. In his twenties he read widely on religious matters, in Erasmus, Luther, Calvin, Menno, Franck, and others, and settled on a sort of humanistic evangelicalism, stressing the role of the Bible as ethical teacher. Expert in Latin, he became town secretary, and during his forties became involved with William of Orange and the growing opposition to Spanish rule. In 1566 he helped draw up William's manifesto against Spanish misrule, and in 1568, as the revolt broke out, he went over the border to Cleves; there he worked as Orange's agent. A brief return to Haarlem (1572) brought controversy with militant Calvinists there, and he went back to his work in Cleves; a second return (1577) brought more of the same, and in his sixties he moved to Emden (1585) and finally to Gouda.

Coornheert wrote extensively on religious matters, and his views led him into controversies with Catholics, Mennonites, with Calvin (on original sin; Calvin replied briefly in 1562) and Beza, and many others. For Coornheert, man has free will and can choose for Christ, who is divine but whose role is to lead men to moral worthiness. Neither church nor state should interfere with the exercise of this free will. His views influenced Arminius (who, appointed to refute Coornheert, instead came to agreement with many of his positions). His main religious work (1568) is Zedekunst: dat is Wellevenskunst. Coornheert was also a figure of some importance in literature; he translated from Latin (Seneca and Boethius and part of a Latin version of the Odyssey) and French (a French version of the Decameron) and wrote a series of allegorical "comedies" on biblical themes.

COP, NICHOLAS (sixteenth century). German-French scholar. Son of Guillaume Cop, former royal physician, he was professor of medicine in the College Sante-Barbe and one of a circle of humanists in Paris with Roussel and Calvin. In 1533 he was elected rector of the University of Paris. This involved a university sermon on All Saints' Day. Choosing as his text Matthew 5:3, he contrasted the slavery of the law which man cannot fulfil with the saving merits of Christ. He minimized the value of good works and reviled the "Sophists" of the Sorbonne for their intolerance. The address was largely made up of citations from Erasmus and Luther. The theologians proceeded against him for heresy, and he fled to Basle. Nothing more is known of him. J.G.G. NORMAN

COPE. A full semicircular cloak used as an alternative to the chasuble* in the 1549 Prayer Book, but retained when the latter was forbidden in 1552, and prescribed for use at the Holy Communion in cathedral and collegiate churches in the 1604 canons of the Church of England. While there is little doubt that its origin was either the Roman paenula or pluviale, scholars disagree as to the date of its use as a specifically clerical vestment, from as late as the mid-ninth century to as early as Gregory of Tours in the sixth. Revived with other ceremonial robes by the Oxford Movement* in the nineteenth century, it is highly embroidered with a vestigial hood as a triangular or semicircular ornament on the back. G.S.R. COX

COPERNICUS, NICOLAS (1473-1543). Polish doctor and astronomer. Copernicus's interest in astronomy was aroused in his early years at Cracow (1491-94); thereafter he maintained his interest, but was better known as a compassionate physician in his lifetime rather than as an astronomer. His great work, De Revolutionibus, which marks the beginning of the modern scientific era, did not appear until the year of his death. In this work he set forth the modern heliocentric theory: "In the middle of all sits the sun on his throne, as upon a royal dais ruling his children the planets which circle about him."

Prior to Copernicus it was known that the idea of a heliocentric planetary system was simpler than a geocentric one, but as heavenly bodies were then supposed to move in circles (rather than ellipses) this resulted in no great simplification. With lack of observational evidence either way, the geocentric scheme was favored, admittedly on slender biblical grounds. Copernicus urged that planetary movements were best explained by the heliocentric theory. His researches, though not proscribed by the church, were not encouraged. He lectured in Rome in 1533, but Clement VII feared reaction. In 1541 Copernican views were ridiculed in a comedy. De Revolutionibus was on the papal Index,* 1616-1758.

After publication of his book, Copernicus's views spread slowly, undermining not religion but astrology. The effect on religion was mainly indirect: in geocentric astronomy the fixed stars lie just outside Saturn's orbit; in heliocentric astronomy they are very far away, and an infinite universe is possible. Theologians argued that God could not create infinity, therefore an infinite universe was an atheistic conception.

COPTIC. The latest form of the ancient Egyptian language; the language of the important Nag Hammadi* Gnostic texts. Its alphabet comprises the twenty-four letters of the Greek alphabet, in uncial form, and seven Demotic characters expressing consonantal sounds not represented in Greek. The transcription of Egyptian into Greek letters first appears in pagan texts of the first or second century A.D.; translation of biblical books began in the third century. Coptic remained a spoken and literary language until the seventh century, thereafter being gradually replaced by Arabic. It is still the ecclesiastical language of the Coptic Church.* Greek influence upon vocabulary and syntax is considerable, while many characteristics of Egyptian proper (e.g., the suffix conjugations) had disappeared, or had all but disappeared, by the time of the Copts. Several dialects of Coptic existed in the early Christian period; the Bible translations in Sahidic (Upper Egypt) and Bohairic (Lower Egypt) are of particular value. The earliest Bible translation was probably into Sahidic. Coptic was instrumental (with Demotic and Greek) in the decipherment of hieroglyphic Egyptian; the only form of Egyptian with a regular system of vocalization, it has also thrown light on the pronunciation of the ancient language.

COPTIC CHURCH. The Christian Church in Egypt traces its birth to St. Mark, and counts as theological ancestors Dionysius, Clement, Origen, and Athanasius. Spearheading the struggle which culminated at the Council of Chalcedon (451) was Cyril of Alexandria* (d.444). At stake in the debate over Nestorianism* were the unity of the incarnate Christ and the eternal preexistence of the Logos,* both of which Cyril deemed threatened by Nestorius's emphasis on two natures. To Cyril this implied two persons. At the council, Dioscorus* (d.454) led the Monophysite cause in an effort that was defeated by Roman Pope Leo's doctrine of two natures in one person and Byzantine Emperor Marcian's political ambitions. Dioscorus died in exile, a hero-martyr to most Egyptians, who rejected the Chalcedonian symbols and the puppet patriarch, Proterius.

Egyptian opposition to Chalcedon was more than theological. Politically Dioscorus's defeat meant the triumph of the younger see of Constantinople over the ancient throne of Mark. Culturally Chalcedon seemed the triumph of Greek language over the indigenous culture of Egypt. The very name "Coptic" Church and the persistent use of the Coptic language in liturgy and literature show the vigor of the Egyptian fight for national identity.

In Egypt, the century after Chalcedon was scarred by religious civil war. Possession of the throne of St. Mark became a game of musical chairs, alternately occupied by Melchites* (Chalcedonian Christians still loyal to the Byzantine emperor) and Monophysites,* depending on the emperor's ability to support his man against the hostile Copts. Emperor Zeno's attempts at compromise to bring unity to the Christians of the East were a failure (482). So were the efforts of Justin II to recognize two patriarchs of Alexandria —one Melchite, one Monophysite. Virtually the whole population was Monophysite by this time (567).

The Muslim invasion of 642 nearly broke the battered church, sorely weakened by decades of religious strife. Though the Copts found temporary relief in freedom from Byzantine pressures, the cure proved worse than the disease. The Arab conquerors used heavy taxations and other threats to persuade Copts to become Muslims—tactics that induced mass conversions.

Under the Caliphs, especially El-Haken biamr Allah (c.1000), the destruction of churches and monasteries and the massacre of Christians helped to spark the Crusades. By about 1100 Arabic had replaced Coptic as the common language. To maintain identity, the Copts instructed the faithful in their traditional canon and civil law (cf. the major compilation of Patriarch Cyril III, c.1236).

The coming of the Turks in 1517 expanded the history of persecution. By 1700 Monophysites had been reduced to five per cent of the population. Of the once influential monastic community, only a handful of monasteries survived. Even before Chalcedon, Egyptian Christianity exhibited a strong ascetic side which has persisted to the present. The reforms of Muhammad Ali (c. 1840) and additional concessions from the Turks in 1911 allowed some Coptic participation in government and permitted the establishment of schools and printing presses. During the recent decades of independence, Egypt has been officially free from religious intolerance. Yet Copts tend to feel that opportunities for political and economic progress are denied them by the Muslim majority.

Copts still worship and observe sacraments according to the Alexandrian Rite, with some monastic and Syrian modification. The Eucharist is usually offered in one kind, and baptism is combined with confirmation as a prominent sacrament. Masses are frequently two hours in length, scented with lavish use of incense and punctuated by triangles and cymbals which set the rhythm for the chanting.

Current figures estimate a Coptic population of about four million in twenty-four dioceses and a Roman Catholic population of 85,000 including over 100 priests. The Coptic patriarch, called Pope of Alexandria, Pentapolis, and Ethiopia, is elected by the people through a religious tribunal, subject to confirmation by the government. His dominion over Ethiopia has been sine cura since 1959 when the Ethiopian Church declared its autonomy by consecrating its own bishop or abuna.

CORINTH. One of the great seaports of ancient Greece, it was situated at the western end of the isthmus linking central Greece and the Peloponnesus. It was sited some five miles southwest of the modern canal that cuts the isthmus. Its important location thus enabled Corinth to control the trade between N Greece and the Peloponnesus and across the isthmus. It had two harbors: its eastern harbor, Cenchreae, was on the Saronic Gulf, an arm of the Aegean Sea; its western harbor, Lechaeum, was on the Gulf of Corinth, an arm of the Ionian Sea. The Corinthian canal conceived by Nero to cut through the isthmus, and so avoid a lengthy and dangerous sea voyage around the Peloponnesus, was completed only in 1893. So the two harbors of Corinth, with ox cart transference of goods between the two, had to suffice in classical times.

Corinth had a checkered history, being twice destroyed by earthquakes; this old city was about two miles inland on an elevated plateau at the foot of the Acro Corinth (about 1,886 feet above sea level). Depopulated and destroyed after a cruel siege in 146 B.C., it was rebuilt by Julius Caesar in 46 B.C., and settled with freedmen from Italy, Orientals, and Jews. The mixed population, scorned by the proud Athenians, was licentious and tumultuous, as Paul learned to his sorrow. His two epistles to the Corinthians are vivid evidence of this unruly church. Paul stayed eighteen months in Corinth during his second missionary journey (Acts 18:1-18). This has been dated by an inscription from Delphi which shows that Gallio came to Corinth as proconsul in A.D. 51 or 52 (Acts 18:12-17). His bēma, judgment seat, has been excavated (Acts 18:12), as also the meat market (1 Cor. 10:25). An aedile Erastus is mentioned on an inscription near the theater, who has been identified with the treasurer of Roman 16:23. It was from Cenchreae, seven miles from Corinth, that Paul sailed to Ephesus, after he had written 1 Thessalonians, the oldest preserved Pauline letter.

CORNELIUS (d.253). Pope from 251. His election, which came after the persecution initiated by Decius had died down, ironically stirred up trouble within the church itself. A minority declared in favor of Novatian, a fierce rigorist in church discipline who refused to admit the lapsi to the sacrament of penance. Cornelius convened a synod which, attended by some sixty bishops, excommunicated Novatian and his adherents. In this Cornelius had the weighty support of Cyprian of Carthage who, although taking a serious view of the lapsed, held more strongly that the unity of the visible church should be maintained and was prepared to see them restored on evidence of true sorrow and penance. Among letters from the hand of Cornelius that have survived are several addressed to Cyprian. With the renewal of persecution in 253, Cornelius was exiled to Centumcellae (Civitavecchia) by Emperor Gallus, and died that same year.

CORNELIUS À LAPIDE (1567-1637). Flemish biblical exegete. Born Cornelis Cornelissen van den Steen at Bolcholt, near Liège, he was educated at the Jesuit colleges of Maastricht and Cologne, and at the age of twenty-five entered the Jesuit order. Four years later he became professor of exegesis at Louvain, and in 1616 was translated to Rome, to lecture in the same subject. There also he completed his commentary on all the canonical books except for Job and Psalms. His works had an enduring quality and were especially attractive to preachers because of their clarity and deep spirituality, backed by an erudition enabling the writer to draw on the works of the Fathers and the medieval theologians. The list of his writings is impressive, including a number of posthumously published works. GORDON A. CATHERALL

CORPUS CATHOLICORUM. Leonhard von Eck as Bavarian chancellor shrewdly opposed the national council at Speyer. In the presence of papal legate Compeggio, Eck saw that the Regensberg Union was organized in June 1524 to enforce the Edict of Worms. Archduke Ferdinand, the two dukes of Bavaria, the cardinal-archbishop of Salzburg, and eleven bishops of S Germany endorsed the Union to stamp out heresy. N Germany formed a similar league in 1524 with Duke George of Saxony and Archbishop Albert of Mainz. This League of Dessau led to a similar 1525 Protestant League of Torgau under Elector John of Saxony and the Landgrave Philip of Hesse. MARVIN W. ANDERSON

CORPUS CHRISTI, FEAST OF. One of the greatest festivals of the Roman Catholic Church, honoring the presence of Christ in the sacrament of Communion, celebrated on the Thursday after Trinity Sunday by carrying the host in procession, accompanied by hymns. In the wake of the enunciation of the dogma of transubstantiation at the Fourth Lateran Council in 1215, Juliana of Mont-Cornillon, the Belgian mystic, persuaded Bishop Robert of Liège to establish a special celebration in honor of the Eucharist in 1246, and the practice was made universal by Pope Urban IV in his bull Transiturus in 1264, which provided indulgences for those observing it. The rejection of transubstantiation as well as the theory of indulgences* by the Reformers led them to suppress this festival, which was the first prohibited by Luther. MARY E. ROGERS

CORPUS EVANGELICORUM. The delegates from the Protestant states in the Holy Roman Empire charged with the protection of Protestant interests in the imperial diet. The organization of these delegates into a structured party was the product of a slow evolution, and it was not until the Diet of Ratisbon (1653) following the Thirty Years' War that a clear structure emerged. Saxony was chosen to serve as the permanent president of the Corpus, which now consisted of the thirty-nine Protestant states represented in the diet. The Corpus Evangelicorum was opposed by the Corpus Catholicorum,* and both existed until the dissolution of the Holy Roman Empire in 1806.

CORTESE, GREGORIO (1483-1548). Benedictine prior and cardinal. Baptized Joannes Andrea, he shared in many important Catholic reforming attempts. Having been secretary to the future Leo X and then canon of the Modenese cathedral after 1503, he entered the monastery of Polirone near Mantua in 1507. His vast patristic learning was used for personal reform. In 1513 he urged Leo X to restore Christian morality. At the island monastery of Lérins (1516-24) he also studied Protestant writings, since Sadoleto* mentions on a visit in 1518 and again in 1523 the Lutheran works in Cortese's possession. In 1522 he used all this to refute the Bohemian writer Ulrich Velenus, who in 1519 published a treatise denying that Peter was ever in Rome. Cortese's response, dedicated to Adrian VI, defended papal authority by answering Velenus's eighteen "persuasions." In so doing he cited Epiphanius's Against Heresies long before the manuscript in Melanchthon's possession became the editio princeps. Conrad Gesner listed Cortese's treatise as a manuscript in a Roman library before its first printing in 1573.

As abbot of Lérins and then at Modena and Perugia (1529), Cortese became a monastic examiner for the Cassinese congregations. In 1532 as abbot of San Giorgio Maggiore, Venice, he took part in a brilliant study circle with Pole,* Contarini, and other scholars. In 1537 he joined these and six others on Paul III's reform commission. After drafting the famous Consilium de Emendanda Ecclesia he returned to Polirone as abbot. In 1542 Paul III made him a cardinal, partly to help stem heresy in Modena. As an intimate of Catholic reforming cardinals, staunch defender of the papacy, and learned scholar, he looked for "a beautiful and new form of the holy Church." He died before his monastic simplicity could be corrupted by the Baroque papacy.

COSIN, JOHN (1594-1672). Bishop of Durham. Born at Norwich, he studied at Caius College, Cambridge, took holy orders, and became prebendary of Durham (1625) and rector of Elwick and Brancepeth (1626). At the request of Charles I he compiled his Collection of Private Devotions (1627), which included his fine translation of Veni Creator Spiritus ("Come, Holy Ghost"). He became master of Peterhouse (1635) and dean of Peterborough (1640), but was deprived of all his benefices by the Long Parliament. He became chaplain of the Anglican royalists in Paris (1642), and befriended Huguenots and disputed with Roman Catholics, writing against transubstantiation. He became bishop of Durham (1660) and attended the Savoy Conference* (1661).

COSMOLOGICAL ARGUMENT. Broadly, any argument for the existence of God that proceeds from some feature or features of the world to God. More narrowly, the term "cosmological" is reserved for a group of arguments postulating the existence of God as the explanation of an otherwise inexplicable universe, of "why there should be any world rather than none, and why it should be such as it is" (Leibnitz). The first three of Thomas Aquinas's* Five Ways are versions of the cosmological argument. God is thought of as the Unconditioned, the Unmoved Mover, the Sufficient Reason for all that is. Apart from general theological or philosophical objections to proofs for God's existence, the cosmological argument requires a number of doubtful premises—e.g., that for something to change it must be changed, and that there cannot be an infinite regress of such changes.

COTTON, JOHN (1584-1652). Puritan minister and author. Graduate of Cambridge University, he was ordained in 1610, and from 1612 to 1633 he was vicar of Boston, Lincolnshire, before migrating to the Massachusetts Bay Colony where he assumed the pastorate of a church in Boston. A gifted theologian, he quickly became a dominant figure in the colony, where theological prowess often brought political influence. One of his opponents noted that some people in Massachusetts "could hardly believe that God would suffer Mr. Cotton to err." He engaged in stormy controversies with Roger Williams* and Anne Hutchinson,* both of whom were driven out of the colony. Moreover, although personally not democratic, he helped create the pattern of church government for New England by his book, The Way of the Churches of Christ in New England (1645).

JOHN D. WOODBRIDGE

COUGHLAN, LAWRENCE ( ? - ? ). Pioneer preacher in Newfoundland. An itinerant Wesleyan preacher in Ireland (1755-65), he went to Newfoundland in 1765 under the auspices of the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel. Arriving in Harbour Grace, he proceeded to establish a congregation. On the recommendation of John Wesley and the Countess of Huntingdon, Coughlan was ordained by the bishop of London in 1767. A revival broke out after his return to Newfoundland, but he was soon in trouble with the more influential people of the area because of his preaching against conditions in the colony. Incessant opposition, long difficult journeys, and an aversion to sea travel broke Coughlan's health. He returned to England in 1773, leaving the work in the hands of two merchant converts.

ROBERT WILSON

COUNTER-REFORMATION. The movement for reform and missionary expansion within the Roman Catholic Church in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, that was quickened, if not caused, by the Protestant Reformation.* It found expression in a variety of forms. One time-honored way to reform the church was to renew or reform monastic orders. Recognized by the pope in 1528, the Capuchins,* who sought to recover the ideals of Francis of Assisi, devoted themselves to charitable work and evangelism. Entirely new creations, indicative of the changing times, were the Theatines* (1524), Somaschi (1532), Barnabites* (1533), Ursulines* (1535), and Oratorians* founded by Philip Neri (1575). They sought to show that the old ideals of celibacy, chastity, self-sacrifice, and compassionate service were still practicable in the sixteenth century. The most important order to be founded, however, was the Jesuits,* established by a papal bull in 1540 but formed in Rome eighteen months earlier by Ignatius Loyola,* Francis Xavier,* and others. The "Company of Jesus" was intended to be a society of priests who ministered to the poor, educated boys, and evangelized the heathen. It certainly did these things, but it also proved to be a most powerful anti-Protestant force, counting among its theologians Robert Bellarmine* and Peter Canisius.*

Another traditional approach to reform was through a general council. Emperor Charles V wanted such a council in Germany, but the Vatican opposed this. Some Catholics, led by such men as Cardinal Contarini, wished to conciliate and win Protestants through dialogue (cf. Colloquy of Ratisbon,* 1541) and an ecumenical council, but it was the conservative element in the church that triumphed. This bore fruit in the Roman Inquisition from July 1542 and the Council of Trent* (1545-63). The latter was indirectly under the control of the papacy and had no intention of making concessions to Protestantism in its doctrinal declarations. Its disciplinary decrees were intended to reform the structure of the church, and included the establishment of seminaries in every diocese in order to improve the standard of the clergy.

With Pius V (1565-72), a period of internal reform began within the Roman Curia and Vatican. Militantly anti-Protestant, Pius also issued edicts against simony, blasphemy, sodomy, and concubinage in his own church. In 1568 he reformed the breviary, restoring the reading of Scripture to a dominant place. The devotional power of the Reformation was, however, reflected more in personal religion than in liturgical reform. Apart from the general increase in personal confessions and communions, this was the age not only of the mystics—Teresa of Avila,* the Carmelite, and Juan de Yepes known as John of the Cross,* but also of Francis of Sales,* author of Introduction to the Devout Life (1609), which related piety to real life situations outside the monastery.

The term "counter-reformation" is applied also in a political sense to the revival of the Catholic powers of Europe. This lasted from about 1562 to 1629, at a time when France was internally weak and the Hapsburg powers had a free hand for their foreign policies. Encouraged by Pius V, a league of Catholic princes which included Philip II of Spain existed to defend the church and destroy Protestantism. Though the Spanish Armada failed to capture England, success was registered in Europe—in Poland, for example. The Thirty Years' War* was from 1618 to 1635 a religious war, with Calvinists fighting Protestants. It was in this war that the Catholics achieved a great success in driving Hussitism and Protestantism from Bohemia and forcibly making that land adopt the old religion.

Some scholars would see the Counter-Reformation as beginning with such men as Jiménes* and Savonarola,* gaining impetus in the sixteenth century and continuing, with different degrees of success, through the centuries until today. Vatican II* is thus seen as a part of the whole movement for renewal.

COUNTESS OF HUNTINGDON'S CONNEXION. A body founded by Selina Hastings, countess of Huntingdon (1707-91). After her conversion she was briefly a Moravian before joining the Methodists in 1739. An early supporter of itinerant lay preaching, she became on her husband's death (1746) a prominent figure in the Evangelical Revival. More Calvinist than John Wesley, she retained her Anglican links and appointed Evangelical Anglicans as her chaplains (among them was George Whitefield*). Aiming to reach the upper classes particularly, she opened chapels at Brighton, Tunbridge Wells, Bath, and London, where Evangelicalism was combined with a liturgical form of service. In 1768 she established at her own expense a college in South Wales for the training of Evangelical clergy. Her ecumenical tendencies received a setback when a legal decision in 1779 forced her to register her chapels as dissenting meetinghouses and led to the resignation of her Anglican chaplains.

The countess helped to sponsor Whitefield's orphanage in Georgia, took an interest in the American Indians (about whom she corresponded with George Washington, a distant relative), and encouraged the beginnings of Dartmouth College and Princeton University in the USA. Her college was moved to Hertfordshire in 1792 and to Cambridge in 1904. Her chapels, which organize an annual conference, hold membership in the British Council of Churches. There are some thirty-six chapels at present, but it is doubtful if membership exceeds one thousand.

COURT, ANTOINE (1696-1760). Minister of the French Reformed Church. He succeeded in reorganizing his fellow Protestants after their church had been broken and scattered by the revocation of the Edict of Nantes* (1685). Fanaticism, disorder, and apostasy were strong, and Court began to preach and organize, insisting on order and restraint. In 1715 he called together at Monobet the first provincial synod of the Reformed Church of France since 1685, whose wise and responsible decisions did much to stabilize Protestant attitudes. In 1718 he was ordained. Other synods were arranged and attracted increased persecution. Court continued to counsel restraint and withdrew several times to Switzerland where, in Lausanne, he founded and directed a seminary for the training of ministers. He wrote Histoire des troubles des Cevennes ou de la guerredes Camisards (1760) and left considerable material in manuscript now in the public library in Geneva.

HOWARD SAINSBURY

COURTENAY, WILLIAM (c.1342-1396). Archbishop of Canterbury from 1381. Son of the earl of Devon, he studied law at Oxford and in 1367 became university chancellor. In 1370 he became bishop of Hereford, in 1375 bishop of London, before becoming primate. He consistently opposed John of Gaunt's policies, proceeded against John Wycliffe* for heresy (1377), held a synod in 1382 to condemn Lollardy, and urged bishops to imprison heretics. During 1381 he was briefly chancellor of England, and one of the commissioners appointed to reform the kingdom and the royal household in 1386. He opposed the Statute of Provisors* (1390), and succeeded in slightly modifying the Statute of Praemunire* (1393).

COUSTANT, PIERRE (1654-1721). Roman Catholic scholar. Educated by the Jesuits at Compiègne, his birthplace, he studied at Maurist* houses in Reims and Soissons before going to Paris. After assisting with the great Maurist edition of Augustine, he was entrusted with an edition of Hilary of Poitiers* in 1687, after which he became prior at Nogent-sous-Courcy in 1693. Returning to Paris in 1696, he did his main work, an edition of papal letters, of which only those up to 440 had appeared by his death.

COVEL, JOHN (1638-1722). Also, "John Colvill." Anglican scholar. Educated at the grammar school at Bury St. Edmunds and graduated from Cambridge in 1658, he was for the next decade chaplain at the British Embassy in Constantinople. At the request of some of his colleagues he investigated the Greek Church, especially to see whether it held the doctrine of transubstantiation. In 1681 he was appointed chaplain to the Princess of Orange, but the discovery of a letter criticizing the prince led to his dismissal. In 1687 he was elected master of Christ's College, Cambridge. Though William III was friendly when he came to Cambridge and Covel was vice-chancellor, saying that he could distinguish "between Dr. Covel and the Vice-Chancellor," nevertheless the earlier incident probably prevented further preferment. His account of the Greek Church was not published until 1722, and by that time interest in the subject had waned.

COVENANT, NATIONAL, see NATIONAL COVENANT

COVENANTERS. A name applied particularly to Scottish Presbyterians who signed the National Covenant* of 1638 and the Solemn League and Covenant* of 1643, and to their successors who during the reigns of Charles II and James VII resisted the episcopal system forced upon Scotland. Initially resistance came when Charles I* and William Laud* tried to impose a new liturgy on the Scots (1637), continued with a Scots Covenanter/English parliamentary alliance, and ended with the defeat and subsequent execution of the king. This outcome horrified the Covenanters, who had a high view of the kingship, but did not prevent their compelling the young Charles II to assent to both covenants in order to obtain the Scottish crown. George Gillespie* and Samuel Rutherford* were contemporary Scottish writers who opposed the theory of the Divine Right of Kings,* holding that limitless sovereignty pertains to God alone.

Such Covenanting views brought trouble when, after the eight-year interlude of Commonwealth and Protectorate, the Stuart dynasty was restored to the united kingdom. Presbyterianism was outlawed and replaced by Episcopacy, the Covenants were denounced as illegal, and with the execution of James Guthrie* and Archibald Campbell,* marquis of Argyle, began a savage repression of the dissentients. Seeing the issue as obedience to God or to king, Covenanters became rebels. Many resorted to field preaching,* and were hunted, jailed, killed (sometimes without trial), or banished to Holland or America. Even moderate Covenanters like Robert Baillie* were eventually driven to admit that their more extreme colleagues had been right in their distrust of Charles II. In desperation at the merciless persecution, some of the Covenanters were led from justifying rebellion to justifying assassination, and this was the fate of Archbishop James Sharp* (1679), one of their chief adversaries. Others grew weary of strife and accepted the governmental Declarations of Indulgence.* Perhaps nothing justifies the Covenanters more than that their Sanquhar Declaration* (1680) included reasoning remarkably similar to that used a decade later when the country as a whole rejected the royal House of Stuart. Presbyterianism was restored to Scotland by William III in 1690, but a remnant, the Cameronians,* objected to him as an uncovenanted king and refused to rejoin the national church of Scotland. Their successors are still to be found not only in Scotland, but in Northern Ireland and in North America.

COVENANT THEOLOGY. Sometimes called "Federal Theology," this system describes the relationship between God and man in the form of covenants. One of the features in the development of Calvinism, it was especially popular with Puritans and the Reformed theologians of Germany and Holland in the latter sixteenth and during the seventeenth century. It holds that God entered into an agreement with Adam at creation, promising him eternal life if he would obey the divine commands. Adam failed by eating the forbidden fruit and thus plunged himself and his descendants into eternal death. To remedy this, God (eternally) entered into a second agreement with Christ on behalf of the elect, promising them forgiveness and eternal life on the basis of Christ's sacrifice. The elect may have assurance of salvation with all its attendant blessing because of their faith in Christ.

This teaching helped Calvinists reconcile the sovereignty of God with man's desire for assurance. The covenant, or federal, theologians believed that man as a sinner has no right before a holy, sovereign, omnipotent God. Man ought to be perfectly obedient to the will of God, but even then there is no reward to be earned. Fellowship with God must come through a voluntary divine agreement establishing a relationship which is not necessarily according to nature. This was done by the covenant, which caused God to act in a kindly way, thus removing the uncertainty from dealing with the Almighty.

Covenant theology in a strict sense began in Germany when a number of Calvinists such as Kaspar Olevianus* and Zacharias Ursinus* emphasized the idea of the covenant of God with man and the believer's mystic union with Christ. Parallel with this German movement was the British development of covenant theology which was sometimes related to political thought (see NATIONAL COVENANT and SOLEMN LEAGUE AND COVENANT). William Ames* became the leading British exponent of federal theology, which in a moderate form appears in both the Westminster Confession* and the Savoy Declaration.* Debtor to both British and German schools, John Cocceius* published a book, Summa Doctrinae de Foedere et Testamento Dei (1648), which has the most elaborate explanation of the covenant principle produced to that time.

Interest in covenant theology continued into the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries, but in a much diminished form. The Princeton theologians Charles and A.A. Hodge* gave it much attention, and federal theology still occupies a central position in reformed doctrine.

ROBERT G. CLOUSE

COVERDALE, MILES (1488-1569). Bible translator. A native of York and graduate of Cambridge, he was ordained in 1514 and became an Augustinian Friar. Under the influence of his prior, Robert Barnes, he embraced Lutheran teaching. Abandoning his order (1528), he preached against the Mass, images, and confession until forced to flee the country. As a translator, Coverdale served his apprenticeship helping William Tyndale* revise his translation of the Pentateuch. In 1535 Coverdale's version of the Bible appeared, the first printed English Bible, for which he utilized Tyndale's work, supplemented by Latin and German versions (including Luther's). He enjoyed the patronage of Thomas Cromwell who commissioned him to revise Matthew's Bible,* a task which was completed in 1539 with the publication of the Great Bible. From 1540 he was again in exile, engaged in literary work in Strasbourg, taking a doctorate in divinity at Tübingen, and serving as pastor and schoolmaster in Bergzaben. Once more in England under Edward VI, he excelled as a preacher, and became bishop of Exeter (1551). Though at first imprisoned under Mary, he was allowed to go into exile, during which he spent a year in Geneva, where he probably worked on the Geneva Bible.* He returned to England in 1559, but played little part in public life.

COWL. A garment with a hood, vestis caputiata, traditionally worn by monks (whence the title "Capuchins"* of one of the orders of Franciscan Friars). While two orders of monks wear only a cowl unattached, the others from the time of Benedict take the cowl to include the cloak and mantle together with the hood.

COWPER, WILLIAM (1731-1800). English poet. Educated at Westminster School and thereafter articled to a solicitor, he suffered throughout his life from fits of depression which more than once developed into mania. From 1765 he was cared for by Mary Unwin, who until her death in 1796 did much to keep Cowper serene and happy. At her suggestion he wrote his generally mild satiric poems ("Table Talk," "The Progress of Error," "Truth," "Expostulation," "Hope," "Charity," "Conversation," and "Retirement"), published in 1782. This work was followed by the discursive poem, The Task (1784), and Cowper later translated Homer (1791). His earliest publication, however, was the collection of hymns written in collaboration with John Newton,* under the title Olney Hymns (1779). Cowper's contributions were written mainly around 1771-72 and included "O for a closer walk with God," "God moves in a mysterious way," and "Hark, my soul! it is the Lord," as well as the controversial but at the same time deeply moving "There is a fountain fill'd with blood."

The 1782 poems are more didactic than satiric and, allowing for a certain narrowness, they provide a good poetical survey of Evangelical doctrines. Lines 258-278 of "Truth," for instance, give a masterly summary of the experience of conviction. The narrowness expresses itself in a negative asceticism, what Norman Nicholson has called an "instinctive distrust of certain types of pleasure" and an occasional but also virulent anti-intellectualism. The most moving expressions of his faith, however, are those which relate to his intense feeling of his own predetermined damnation, whether it be in the passage in The Task (III. 108ff.), describing himself as "a stricken deer," or in his last terrible poem "The Castaway."

COX, FRANCES ELIZABETH (1812-1897). Translator of German hymns. Little is known about her life. Daughter of George V. Cox, she apparently spent all her days in Oxford. She ranks next to John Wesley* and Catherine Winkworth* in the quality of her translations of German hymns and in the extent to which they are still sung. They first appeared in her Sacred Hymns from the German (1841), a collection of about fifty items. In her second edition, entitled Hymns from the German (1864), she dropped twenty-two, modified others, and added twenty-nine new items. Her most popular translations are "Jesus lives! no longer now" (Gellert); "Sing praise to God who reigns above" (Schütz); and "Who are these like stars appearing" (Schenck).

JOHN S. ANDREWS

COX, RICHARD (c.1500-1581). Bishop of Ely. Becoming convinced of Reformed views while at Cambridge, he was appointed in 1540 to the commission which composed The Necessary Doctrine and Erudition of a Christian Man, and from 1544 was tutor to Prince Edward. He became the first dean of Christ Church, Oxford (1547), and dean of Westminster (1549). He helped to compile the "Order of the Communion" of 1548 and the Prayer Books of 1549 and 1552. As chancellor of Oxford University (1547-52) he was responsible for introducing Peter Martyr, Stumphius, and John ab Ulmis to the university. On Mary's accession he was imprisoned and deprived, going into exile at Frankfurt in 1555. In the English congregation there, Cox wanted to maintain Edward VI's Prayer Book, while John Knox* wanted a more thorough reformation. The disputes between them gave rise to the names Coxians and Knoxians. Under Elizabeth, Cox was appointed bishop of Ely (1559-80), and translated Acts and Romans for the Bishops' Bible.* He was severe toward both Roman Catholics and Puritans, but refused to minister in the queen's chapel because of its candles and crucifix, and becoming disgusted with the court he asked to resign his see. He died a year later.

See various letters in The Zurich Letters (ed. H. Robinson, 1842); and J. Strype, Annals of the Reformation (1824). JOYCE HORN

CRABBE, GEORGE (1754-1832). English poet. Born at Aldeburgh in Suffolk, much of his poetry (e.g., The Borough) is set in this area. He was successively rector of Muston (Leicestershire) and Trowbridge (Wiltshire). His first major poem, The Village (1783), is an exposure of social conditions in a small seaside community. The Parish Register (1807) is a series of character sketches based on his experience at Muston and elsewhere. The Borough (1810), Tales (1812), and Tales of the Hall (1819) are virtually short stories in verse. There is a strong underlying moral comment in his skillful analyses of character and action, and this is found also in his sermons (1850).

See Life by his son (1834), and L. Haddakin, The Poetry of Crabbe (1955).

ARTHUR POLLARD

CRAIG, JOHN (1512-1600). Scottish Reformer. He was a Dominican Friar who became one of the outstanding personalities of the Reformation in Scotland, doing much to shape the future policy of the national church. Imprisoned for heresy in 1536, he escaped to become rector of the Dominican convent in Bologne, where his conversion to Protestantism had taken place. Condemned to death by the Inquisition in Rome, he reached Vienna after a series of dramatic escapes to become the favorite preacher of Emperor Maximilian II. Returning to Scotland in 1560, he joined John Knox* as collegiate minister of St. Giles', Edinburgh, two years later. In 1570 he became chaplain to James VI, drafting the first Scots Catechism and being largely responsible for the King's Confession, or National Covenant,* of 1581. D.P. THOMSON

CRAKANTHORPE, RICHARD (1567-1624). Anglican scholar. Born in Westmoreland, he was educated at Queen's College, Oxford, where he also became a fellow. Coming under the influence of John Reynolds (Rainolds*), he became a zealous Puritan. He was, however, known as a learned man and was chosen to accompany, as chaplain, Lord Evers, the ambassador of James I to the court of Emperor Rudolph II. Later he served as a chaplain both to the bishop of London and to the king. In 1605 he became rector of Black Notley, Essex, and in 1617 rector of Paglesham, Essex. He engaged in controversy with Mark Antonio de Dominis, archbishop of Spalato, who claimed to be a convert to the Protestant Church of England. Crakanthorpe's most famous book, Defensio Ecclesiae Anglicanae (1625), was an answer to the defense of the retraction (Consilium Reditus) of de Dominis after he had returned to Roman Catholicism. PETER TOON

CRAMP, JOHN MOCKETT (1791-1881). Baptist pastor and scholar. Educated at Stepney College, London, he was in 1818 ordained pastor of Dean Street Baptist Chapel, Southwark. From 1827 to 1842 he assisted his father at the Baptist Church in St. Peter's, Isle of Thanet, and then served in Hastings. In 1844 he went to Canada to become president of Montreal Baptist College. In 1851 he became president of Acadia College, Nova Scotia. He resigned in 1869 to devote himself to literary work, which included writing theological and historical books, and editing magazines and a newspaper. Among his many books the most noteworthy was his Baptist History from the Foundation of the Christian Church to the Present Time (1868). J.G.G. NORMAN

CRANACH, LUCAS (1472-1553). German painter. For more than forty years he was the prosperous, leading official painter at the court of Saxony. Several times mayor of Wittenberg, patronized by the powerful, worldly Cardinal Albrecht von Hohenzollern, simultaneously a friend of Luther and godfather of Luther's first son—Cranach set up a workshop of a dozen or so journeymen artists who could paint in the wavy, serpentine Cranach manner to keep up with commissions to decorate with "scenes from antiquity" the town hall ceiling, a duke's hunting lodge, new wedding quarters in some castle, or, later on, mass-produce portraits of Luther and Melanchthon. Before he became painterly spokesman for courtly love taste, Lucas Cranach the Elder's style showed a late Gothic, precious, curlicue landscape fascination, alive with the innovation of a virtuoso—Christ's cross is not center but on the right side in a Crucifixion of 1503. As established pacesetter at the court, however, especially after Dürer's death, he painted the nudes which became his trademark. So close to the Reformation, Cranach's art did not become captivated by its reforming spirit. CALVIN SEERVELD

CRANMER, THOMAS (1489-1556). Archbishop of Canterbury from 1533. Born in Nottinghamshire, he was educated at Jesus College, Cambridge and became a fellow there. He was influenced by humanist and Lutheran opinions, and became strongly antipapalist. In 1529 Henry VIII heard Cranmer had suggested consulting the theologians at the universities on his "divorce," and employed him for this purpose as an ambassador in Europe. While in Germany in 1532 Cranmer married Margaret, niece of the Lutheran Reformer Osiander.* On the death of Warham he was consecrated archbishop of Canterbury with papal approval. He pronounced Katherine of Aragon's marriage null and void in the same year. In the years that followed Cranmer was able to bring about a moderate doctrinal reform, mirrored in the Ten Articles* and the Bishops' Book.* He supported Thomas Cromwell in securing an official English translation of the Bible, for which he wrote a preface. While not directly involved in the dissolution of the monasteries, he approved of it, but protested against the financial abuse involved.

A Catholic reaction which led to the fall of Cromwell was opposed by Cranmer with great courage. In the last years of Henry's reign and under his protection, Cranmer began the task of liturgical revision. In 1544 he produced the first of his vernacular services, the English litany. From 1547 onward under Edward VI he had a greater freedom to reform the liturgy.

In 1549 the Communion service of his first Book of Common Prayer* embodied his recently adopted receptionist view in the framework of the Latin Mass. The reactions of English Catholics like Gardiner and of continental Protestants such as Bucer* and Martyr were the occasion for producing a second Book of Common Prayer in 1552. The Communion service in this broke away from the Latin Mass entirely. The climax of the service was now the receiving of the bread and wine, while kneeling around a table. Cranmer defended his new understanding of the Eucharist in his major theological work, The True and Catholic Doctrine of the Lord's Supper. He published a book of Homilies, a confession of faith in forty-two articles, and a revision of canon law, Refor- matio Legum Ecclesiasticarum. He fought a losing battle against the increasing inroads on the finances of the church made in the name of reform. He was involved in the plot to make Lady Jane Grey queen only after strong persuasion from the dying Edward VI.

When Mary came to the throne in 1553, Cranmer was condemned to death for treason, but the sentence was not carried out. Under the renewed heresy laws of 1555 he was tried at Oxford and was convicted and degraded. He was forced to watch the burning of Latimer* and Ridley.* After much pressure he signed a number of recantations through fear of suffering and through loyalty to the royal supremacy. On the eve of his execution his courage returned, and he went to the stake on 21 March 1556, denying his recantations and suffering for his faith.

CRASHAW, RICHARD (1612-1649). English poet. After some years as fellow of the then High Church college, Peterhouse, Cambridge, he entered the Roman Catholic Church and spent his last years at the court of Charles I's queen, Henrietta Maria, in Paris and then as subcanon of Loretto where he died. His Steps to the Temple (1646) links him with the group known as the Metaphysical poets (see DONNE and HERBERT), but his work differs from theirs in its more exotic and emotional coloring. Crashaw was influenced by the Italian Marino in poetry and the cult of St. Teresa in religion. His work is expressive of intense devotion, but it is often marred by extravagance of language and imagery.

ARTHUR POLLARD

CRAWAR, PAUL (c.1390-1433). Hussite martyr. Probably born in Kravare in Moravia, he studied medicine at Montpellier, then entered the University of Paris (M.A., 1415). He then returned to Prague where he taught medicine, becoming about 1421 physician to Wladislaw Jagiello, king of Poland. By this time he had become a radical Hussite, writing two books against the papacy: Sermones de Antichristi and De Anatomia Antichristi. After ten years in the service of the Polish king, he returned to Prague, perhaps as a result of persecution for his religious beliefs. He then left, possibly having met Scots traders in Poland, to work with the Lollards* in Scotland. He was arrested, however, and burned at the stake in St. Andrews.

W.S. REID

CRAWFORD, DANIEL (1870-1926). Missionary to central Africa. Born in the Scottish town of Gourock, he joined the Plymouth Brethren in 1887 and two years later accompanied F.S. Arnot* to central Africa. Traveling alone, he reached Katanga in 1890. After the murder of Chief Msiri a year later, he itinerated widely, settling in 1895 at Luanza on Lake Mweru. Apart from a visit overseas (1911-15) he remained there until his death. Crawford was a strong individualist who relied for support upon unsolicited gifts and preferred to work alone. In his view, preaching and individual conversion were all-important. He itinerated frequently with little regard for health and safety, and was averse from institutionalized mission stations. Education in his village Bible schools concentrated upon the Scriptures, which he himself translated into Luba (NT in 1904; OT in 1926). His converts were encouraged to participate in teaching, preaching, and church affairs.

CREATIONISM. Theologically the term has been variously interpreted:

(1) The doctrine that the universe was created by God out of nothing, or (in recent years) that the world was created a few thousand years ago, in opposition to the view that it is several thousand million years old.

(2) The doctrine that species were created, in opposition to the evolutionary view.

(3) In Catholic theology, the doctrine (held by Jerome, Hilary, Aquinas, and others, as well as Calvin), that God creates from nothing each new soul that comes into the world, in contrast with the Traducian view (held by Tertullian, Luther, and others) that souls are formed naturally as the body develops, or that they are reincarnated after previous existences on earth (metempsychosis). Augustine suspected that Creationism and original sin were incompatible, for a new creation by God cannot be tainted with sin. Nevertheless, orthodox Catholicism holds to Creationism, Aquinas insisting that its denial is heretical. In medieval theology the soul's creation occurred on the fortieth day after conception for a male, on the eightieth for a female.

R.E.D. CLARK

CREED. "A concise formal and authorized statement of important points of basic Christian doctrine." The word comes from the Latin Credo ("I believe"), since the statement of faith involves not merely acceptance of truth, but personal commitment—Credo in Deum, "I believe in God." The creed was also termed the regula fidei as equivalent of the Eastern kanōn tēs alētheias, the standard of faith, kanōn being a builder's square. Symbolum, the military "pass," or tessara was also used, whereby the faithful would be known to each other throughout the world as against the heretics. Creeds were both the earliest development of the formal faith of the church, and the first and most authentic form of oral tradition, and are likely to have grown out of the rudimentary forms of confession we find in the NT—e.g., Rom. 10:9; 1 Cor. 12:3—not only at baptism but also in worship and instruction. (Both Trinitarian and purely christological forms are in use in the NT.) By the fourth century these confessions had become uniform, and the Apostles' Creed* in the West and the Nicene Creed* in the East became the only baptismal confessions in use.

G.S.R. COX

CREIGHTON, MANDELL (1843-1901). Bishop of London, and historian. Born at Carlisle, and educated at the universities of Durham and Oxford, he taught history at Oxford, was ordained in 1873, and in 1875 became vicar of Embleton in Northumberland. Nine years later he was appointed Dixie professor of ecclesiastical history at Cambridge, and in 1891 was consecrated bishop of Peterborough. In 1897 he was translated to the see of London, where the popular lecturer and erudite scholar exercised a valuable moderating influence in controversies of the day, particularly in connection with the vexed question of ritualism. His many writings include a biography of Cardinal Wolsey (1888), but he is best known for his (unfinished) History of the Papacy (5 vols., 1882-94). J.D. DOUGLAS

CREMATION. The reduction of human remains to ash. It was widely practiced in the ancient world, except in Egypt and China. Cremation among the ancient Israelites was exceptional (e.g., 1 Sam 31:12). The Etruscans and the Greeks passed on the practice to the Romans, with whom it became the fashionable means of disposal among the aristocracy. Though the early Christians did not fear cremation, they preferred to follow the burial customs of the Jews. The growth of the Christian doctrine of the resurrection of the physical body was largely responsible for its lack of popularity in Europe. Its modern development in Britain can be traced to 1874 (the founding of the Cremation Society), and in the USA to 1876. Since then it has grown in popularity. Statistics for 1960 reveal that one-third of those who died in the United Kingdom were cremated, and the proportion is increasing. The Roman Catholic Church still bans it as a regular means of disposal.
JAMES TAYLOR

CREMER, HERMANN (1834-1903). German Protestant theologian. He became professor of theology at the University of Greifswald (1870), combining this with a city pastorate which he held until his death, refusing further preferment. He strongly resisted the liberalizing movement in theology. In his Die paulinische Rechtfertigungslehre im Zusammenhange ihrer geschichtlichen Voraussetzungen (1899), he reaffirmed a traditional interpretation of Paul's soteriology. In this work also, with what W. Eichrodt called "the insight of genius," he described "righteousness" as a "term of relation," being apparently among the earliest to do so. His best-known work was Biblisch-theologisches Wörterbuch (ET Biblico-Theological Lexicon of New Testament Greek, 1878), in which he theologically defined Greek words and terms used in the NT. CROMWELL, OLIVER (1599-1658). Lord Protector. Born near Huntingdon of a lesser English landowning family, he was educated at the local Free School and at Sidney Sussex College, Cambridge. Elected to represent Huntingdon in the 1628 parliament, he spent the following eleven years (when Charles I* ruled without Parliament) occupied with East Anglian concerns and came to a strong personal Christian faith. He championed the rights of commoners against enclosures and Fen drainage, supported Puritan lecturers, and may have contemplated emigrating to New England. As member for Cambridge in the 1640 Parliament, he moved the second reading of the bill for annual parliaments, spoke for the abolition of episcopacy, and served on numerous committees.

On the outbreak of war between Parliament and king, he raised a cavalry troop of "godly, honest men" to fight under Essex at Edgehill (1642). Though aged forty-three at his first battle, he became one of the great cavalry leaders of history. In 1643 he enlarged his troop to a regiment and secured the Eastern counties for Parliament. He commanded the left wing in the victory at Marston Moor (1644). With Fairfax, he remodeled the parliamentary forces into the New Model Army, a disciplined, professional force of men "who know what they fight for and love what they know," which won at Naseby (1645). Cromwell supported the soldiers in their grievances against Parliament over arrears of pay.

He tried to make terms with Charles, who endeavored to play off army, Parliament, and Scots against each other. After defeating the Scots at Preston (1648), Cromwell supported the execution of Charles I as a "cruel necessity." He subdued the Royalist rebellion in Ireland, 1649-50, justifying his ruthlessness on the grounds that it would "prevent the effusion of blood" in the future, but he was clement to noncombatants. Made commander-in-chief of the army, he defeated the Scots at Dunbar (1650) and Worcester (1651)—his "crowning mercy." Anxious for Parliament to rule, he nevertheless dissolved the "Rump" of the Long Parliament in 1652, when members tried corruptly to perpetuate their own tenure of office. A new Parliament also proved incompetent.

Cromwell was made Lord Protector in 1653 and ruled by ordinances confirmed later by Parliament. He reorganized the Church of England, trying to provide faithful preachers in every church. He protected Quakers and Jews. His foreign policy raised England's standing in Europe, he acquired Dunkirk, and he championed the persecuted Vaudois Protestants. He refused the title of king, was buried in Westminster Abbey, but was disinterred in 1661. Without personal ambition, and motivated by Christian belief, he ensured that England would be ruled by Parliament and not absolute kings, though much of his work seemed overthrown at the Restoration.*

CROMWELL, THOMAS (c.1485-1540). English statesman. In early life he traveled widely, and his varied adventures produced a mind essentially functional and secular, and with considerable business and legal acumen. From 1520 he served under Wolsey* and survived his master's disgrace to enter Parliament in 1529. There he quickly made his mark and, though debate surrounds his precise contribution to Henry VIII's policies, it is clear that from 1532, when first he held high office, there is an ordered, creative intelligence not previously evident. The Henrician Statutes bear his stamp and especially the Act in Restraint of Appeals (1533), which is a concise statement of Erastian* principles held by Cromwell and culled from Marsiglio of Padua. By 1535 Cromwell was vicar-general and thus the effective controller of the church. The Valor Ecclesiasticus, which attempts to estimate the income of every cleric, is a typical example of his administrative genius. He maneuvered the Dissolution of the Monasteries. He was created earl of Essex in 1540.

Cromwell's religious policies demonstrate a sympathy for Lutheran ideas. In particular he encouraged the translation of the Bible leading to the publishing of the Great Bible in 1539. His Injunctions of 1536 and 1538 reveal his dislike of superstitious practices and the importance of providing a Bible in every church. He stirred up conservative opposition, especially because of his Protestant leanings. His attempt to establish an alliance with Lutheran princes, by way of marriage, was unsatisfactory to the king in terms of foreign policy—the more so because of the unattractiveness of Anne of Cleves. The result was Cromwell's condemnation in June 1540 under the Act of Attainder for heresy and treason. He was beheaded the following month.

CROSBY, FANNY (Mrs. F.J. Van Alstyne) (1823-1915). American hymnwriter. Born in Putnam County, New York, she lost her sight when six weeks old. At the age of eleven she entered the New York City Institution for the Blind, remaining there for twenty-three years as pupil and teacher. While at school she began writing poetry (published first in 1831). She married in 1858 a blind musician, Alexander Van Alstyne, and together they produced a number of hymns. From 1864 she published more than 2,000, of which sixty are still commonly used. Her association with Ira D. Sankey* and W.H. Doane yielded many of her most popular compositions, notably "Safe in the arms of Jesus," and "To God be the glory." J.G.G. NORMAN

CROSBY, HOWARD (1826-1891). Presbyterian scholar. Graduating from New York University, he held the chair of Greek there from 1851, and in Rutgers University (named for his great-uncle) from 1859. He then read theology, was ordained, and later became minister of Fourth Avenue Presbyterian Church, New York. He was a member of the New Testament Committee for the American edition of the Revised Version (1872-81), was moderator of the general assembly (1873) and its delegate to the Pan-Presbyterian council, Edinburgh (1877), and founded a society for crime prevention (1877). His writings include commentaries on Joshua, Nehemiah, and the entire NT; Yale lectures; other books and numerous pamphlets. C.G. THORNE, JR.

CROSIER; CROZIER. The history of the use of these words is complicated. In current usage they refer to the crook-shaped staff carried primarily by bishops. The origin of the staff is not clear. Some think it derives from the rod of Roman augurs, but its symbolism is derived from the shepherd's crook. In the Eastern churches, the staff is surmounted by a cross between two serpents. Popular nineteenth-century uses of the words included "one who bears the cross or staff of a bishop or abbot" and "the cross of an archbishop."

CROSS, FRANK LESLIE (1900-1968). Anglican scholar and editor. Born in Devon and educated at Bournemouth School, he was elected to a scholarship at Balliol College, Oxford. After serving in World War I, he studied at Oxford and London and in Germany, part of the time under Rudolf Otto. He was appointed to the staff of Ripon Hall, Oxford, and was ordained (1925-26), his affiliations being modernist and Anglo-Catholic. By 1934-35 he was an established university lecturer in the philosophy of religion and in comparative religion. His overriding interests were the relations of science to religion, and the history of Christian thought, especially patristics. He was elected to the Lady Margaret professorship of divinity at Oxford in 1944. Cross is remembered for the breadth and accuracy of his scholarship. He was editor from 1941 of the Lexicon of Patristic Greek, and in later years conceived and edited the monumental Oxford Dictionary of the Christian Church (1957). R.E.D. CLARK

CROWTHER, SAMUEL AJAYI (c.1806-1891). Anglican bishop. Born at Oshogun in Yorubaland, he was enslaved in 1821 and taken to Sierra Leone after liberation by the British navy. He was baptized in 1825 and entered the African Institution (later Fourah Bay College) in 1827. In 1841 he was a Church Missionary Society representative on the Niger expedition. His report so impressed the society that he was summoned to London for further training and ordained in 1843. For some ten years after 1846 he worked at Abeokuta, giving special attention to the Yoruba language. His most significant work was in the Niger Mission which he initiated in 1857 and led for thirty years.

In 1864 he was consecrated bishop of Western Africa beyond colonial limits, but as the European missionaries in Yorubaland would not accept his jurisdiction, he was virtually bishop of the Niger. The mission depended upon local financial support and could not attract well-qualified staff. Furthermore, poor communications made supervision difficult. Crowther's achievement nevertheless led his former European opponents to recommend an African bishop for Yorubaland in 1875. This confidence was not shared by younger European missionaries, who attacked the policy of African leadership. Crowther's personal integrity was never questioned, but many charges were brought against his subordinates, and financial administration was taken out of his hands. His position was progressively undermined, and by 1889 he was ready to resign. His discipline was probably too gentle and his administration faulty, but this did not justify the arrogant behavior of his critics. The conflict led to the secession of the Niger Delta Pastorate in 1891, the formation of the United Native African Church in Lagos in 1892, and the appointment of a white successor after Crowther's death. It helped to discredit Henry Venn's* "three-self" policy in pursuance of which Crowther had been appointed.

CRUCIFIX (Lat. crux, "cross"; figo, "I fix"). A figure of Christ attached to a cross. The earliest known crucifixes appear to date from the sixth century, not in the form of a suffering Christ, but as a victorious Christ, reigning from the tree. He is shown alive, standing, head erect, clothed, and crowned. The Lamb may be taken to be the earliest visual representation of Christ's humanity and sufferings. Realism in Christian art began to replace symbolism from about the tenth century, culminating in a stress on the realistic aspects of Christ's suffering and death from the thirteenth century. In the Eastern Church, the Iconoclastic Controversy represented the aversion from sculptural portrayals in the round and restricted itself to the icon.* In the pre-Reformation West, the crucifix became an object of personal and public devotion, sometimes idolatrous. It was the central feature of the rood (alternate English name for crucifix) screen. Protestants in general, with the exception of Lutherans, make little use of it, but now tend to view it with greater tolerance.

CRUCIFIXION. A form of execution practiced in the ancient world which involved fixing the victim to a wooden cross and leaving him to die. It seems to have been invented by the Phoenicians and to have been taken up by a number of other peoples. The Romans made considerable use of it for the execution of slaves, foreigners, or the lowest criminal classes. It was used in Palestine by Antiochus Epiphanes and by Alexander Jannaeus, as well as by the Romans. Josephus describes the crucifixion of 2,000 Jews by the Roman general Varus in 4 B.C.

Three shapes of cross were used: T-shaped and X-shaped as well as in the shape familiar to us through representations of the crucifixion of Christ. The victim was normally brutally flogged and then made to carry the cross-beam (patibulum) to the place of execution outside the city. The titulus (tablet of execution) would usually be hung round his neck. His clothes would be removed, and his hands were fastened by nails or cords to the cross-beam. That was then raised and fixed to the upright which would have been already erected. There was a peg on which the victim had to sit so that the weight of his body did not pull him down. His feet were attached to the upright, and he was left to die in intense suffering and often in the face of jeers and insults. On occasion, the process of dying took several days. Sometimes a drugged drink was given to relieve pain, and a victim's legs might be broken to hasten his death.

Jesus was put to death by crucifixion, as all the gospels narrate, and what was accounted as the most degrading form of punishment became a symbol for Christians of forgiveness and dedication (Gal. 3:13; 6:14; Phil. 2:8). R.E. NIXON

CRUCIGER, KASPAR (1504-1548). Reformed scholar. Born at Leipzig, he served as secretary at many of the theological discussions of his time, notably at Worms and Ratisbon in 1541. One of his outstanding services was to preserve in shorthand many of the lectures and sermons of Luther, with whom also he collaborated in Bible translation. In his youth Cruciger studied theology under Luther and Melanchthon and became proficient also in Hebrew, natural history, and medicine. For a few years he served as a teacher in Magdeburg, but went to Wittenberg in 1528 as preacher and professor, remaining there until his death. Beza records that after a private conference with Calvin on the doctrine of the Lord's Supper, Cruciger became attached to the Calvinist position on that question. HUGH J. BLAIR

CRUDEN, ALEXANDER (1699-1770). Scottish author of the famous Concordance which is still the standard reference guide to the King James Version. Shortly after graduating from Aberdeen he suffered a mental breakdown and was confined to an asylum (1721-22). Upon his release he went to London, where at first he was a tutor, but later opened a bookstore and did proofreading. The first edition of his concordance appeared in 1737. It was not a financial success, and the pressure of the work caused him to suffer another attack of insanity (1738). Confined again, he escaped after a few weeks and issued an indignant account of his experience entitled The London Citizen Exceedingly Injured, or a British Inquisition Displayed. He then sued for damages, but lost the case. Confined a third time in 1753, he was released by the following year and once more set to work on his concordance.

The appearance of the second and third editions won Cruden considerable recognition and profit. Influenced by the preaching of Wesley, he came to think of himself as the public guardian of the nation's morals. Calling himself "Alexander the Corrector," he was especially concerned with swearing and Sabbath-keeping. He ran for Parliament in 1754, and unsuccessfully sought to marry the daughter of the lord mayor of London. He published also a Scripture Dictionary and an index to the works of John Milton. A great deal of autobiographical information is in his three pamphlets, The Adventures of Alexander, the Corrector (1754-55).

CRUSADES, THE. A series of seven major and numerous minor campaigns into the Levant by West Europeans between 1095 and 1291. Christians had gone on pilgrimages to the Holy Land during much of the medieval period, but with the arrival of the Seljuk Turks their travels were hampered. After wresting Jerusalem from their fellow Muslims, the Seljuks pushed north and defeated the Byzantine forces at the Battle of Manzikert (1071). Within the next few years, Asia Minor, the chief recruiting ground for Byzantine soldiers, was lost, and the emperor was writing to Western princes and to the pope, seeking mercenaries with which to regain the lost territories. Pope Urban II responded to this appeal by proclaiming the First Crusade in a sermon at Clermont (1095). At the conclusion of this address, the crowd shouted, "God wills it!" and this became the battle cry of the movement. The primary reason for the Crusades was religious, for they constituted a holy war, and following Urban's appeal there was an outpouring of religious enthusiasm. In addition, the pope saw in the Crusades an outlet for the energies of the warring nobles of Europe.

The First Crusade, consisting of about 5,000 fighting men, proceeded overland to Constantinople. Alexius Comnenus, the eastern emperor, was frightened by the group, but he provisioned them well, surrounded them with guards, and got them into Asia Minor. Antioch and Jerusalem were among the places that fell to the Crusaders; victory in the Holy City was followed by frightful slaughter of their enemies.

The Crusaders did not free all the Middle East from Muslim control, but by the establishment of several states in the Levant they maintained a balance of power between Byzantines and Muslims. The fortunes of these states varied, and when Jerusalem was endangered, Bernard of Clairvaux* organized the Second Crusade in 1147, which ended in defeat at Damascus. By 1187 Saladin had united the Muslims and conquered Jerusalem. This provoked the Third Crusade, called the Crusade of Kings because its leaders were Frederick I, Richard I, and Philip II. Frederick was drowned; Philip and Richard quarreled until Philip returned to France, leaving Richard in command against Saladin. This campaign resulted in a three-year truce and the granting of free access to Jerusalem for Christian pilgrims.

The crusader states were protected by the semi-monastic orders of Templars* and Hospitallers.* Combining monasticism and militarism, they were to protect pilgrims and wage perpetual war against Muslims. They were unable, however, to stop the more numerous onslaughts of their enemies, hence further crusades were necessary. The few knights who answered Innocent III's call to the Fourth Crusade were unable to pay the passage charges demanded by the Venetians. This led the two groups to strike a bargain and agree to attack Constantinople. After conquering and sacking the city, the Crusaders set up the Latin Empire of Constantinople and forgot about recovering the Holy Land.

During the thirteenth century there were more crusades such as the Children's Crusade* (1212), the Fifth Crusade against Egypt (1219), the Sixth Crusade led by the excommunicated Frederick II, and the Seventh Crusade of Louis IX. Each of these failed in its efforts to shore up the Latin crusading kingdom, and in 1291 Acre, the last stronghold of the Christians in the Holy Land, fell to the Muslims, thus ending the eras of the crusades. Despite this failure to achieve their main objective, the Crusaders led Europe to have more contacts with the East. This experience stimulated Western trade and thought, thus bringing to an end Western isolation.

CRUSIUS, CHRISTIAN AUGUST (1715-1775). German theologian. Born at Leuna and educated at Leipzig University where he became successively professor of philosophy (1744) and of theology (1750), he attacked in a series of important works the determinism of Leibnitz, the perfectionism of Wolff, and the biblical criticism of his colleague Ernesti as dangerously anti-Christian. Founding all spiritual knowledge on divine revelation which he tried to prove harmonizes completely with reason, Crusius constructed in his three-volume Hypomnemata ad theologiam propheticam (1764-78) a theological system heavily dependent on typology and special theories of prophetic interpretation. For a number of years the University of Leipzig was divided into Ernestians and Crusians. His "prophetic theology" was rediscovered and popularized in the nineteenth century by Hengstenberg* and Delitzsch.*

IAN SELLERS

CRUTCHED FRIARS, An order of Mendicants said to have been founded by Gerrard, prior of St. Mary of Morello at Bologna, and confirmed by Alexander III in 1169, being brought by him into the Augustinian Rule. Initially they carried a cross fixed to a staff and were therefore called fratres cruciferi (sometimes translated as "Crossed Friars"). Later they wore a cross of red on their backs or chests. They appeared in England in 1244, and similar orders existed in France and the Low Countries from the thirteenth century. They were suppressed by Alexander VII in 1656.

CRYPT. An underground cell, chamber or vault, especially one beneath the main floor of a church, used as a burial place, chapel, or oratory. Some crypts containing the remains of saints are designed as the focus of pilgrimages. Modern uses of crypts, in addition to the traditional ones, include museums, refuges for the "down and out," and youth clubs.

CUDWORTH, RALPH (1617-1688). English divine. Son of an Anglican rector, he became regius professor of Hebrew at Cambridge (1645), to which was later (1654) added the mastership of Christ's College. He was perhaps the most distinguished exponent of the Cambridge Platonists.* Cudworth formulated the theory of a "plastic nature" and declared, "Things are what they are, not by Will but by Nature." He asserted the need for revealed religion, was a staunch advocate of the reality of moral freedom and responsibility, and was convinced that the "impossibility" of atheism was demonstrable. He was imperfectly understood, however, partly because of his habit of introducing much extraneous lore into his arguments, partly because of his scrupulously fair delineation of his adversaries' views (a policy to which his controversial age was not notably drawn). An excellent if somewhat diffuse scholar, he was consulted in 1657 by a parliamentary committee exploring the need for a new translation of the Bible. His own works included The True Intellectual System of the Universe (1678); and a Treatise concerning Eternal and Immutable Morality (published posthumously in 1731), directed in part against Calvinism. J.D. DOUGLAS

CULDEES. The word is of doubtful origin and may be derived from keledei, "friends of God," or cultores Dei, "worshipers of God." The name appeared first in the tenth century, and continued in use, particularly at St. Andrews, until the middle of the fourteenth century. It was given to a somewhat enigmatic but highly influential group in the Scottish Church who have sometimes been referred to as the "evangelicals" in the pre-Reformation church. They were in the first instance monks with high ideals and a sense of spiritual values who maintained a good degree of spiritual life in the Scottish Church when it was at a low ebb elsewhere. Their influence enabled the church to survive the troubled period of the Norse invasions. They never owed allegiance to Rome, and maintained a separate and independent existence until the Reformation. About 1100 they abandoned their regular monastic habits and became a college of secular priests. Their resistance of King David's attempts to have them incorporated in the new Augustinian priory that he had founded at St. Andrews in 1144 was an evidence of their strength and independence. At Brechin they fulfilled the function of a cathedral chapter, but their status then was largely secular, and their contribution to the work of the church came from their material wealth as landowners and their capacity for administration.
ADAM LOUGHRIDGE

CUMBERLAND PRESBYTERIANS. The Cumberland Presbyterian Church emerged as a new denomination in 1810 during the Second Great Awakening.* Three ministers—Finis Ewing, Samuel King, and Samuel McAdow—organized the independent Cumberland Presbytery which formed the nucleus of the Cumberland Presbyterian Church. Refusing to adhere to the licensing requirements for the education of the clergy as set forth by the Presbyterian Church, these men maintained that ministers in the frontier regions of Kentucky and Tennessee did not necessarily need a formal education as a prerequisite for their religious vocations. Moreover, they modified Calvinistic doctrines to suit the revivalistic preaching on the frontier, and this move set them at odds with the mother denomination. In 1906 an attempted union with the Presbyterian Church met with only partial success. The continuing Cumberland Presbyterian Church has some 90,000 members. JOHN D. WOODBRIDGE

CUMMINS, GEORGE DAVID (1822-1875). Founder of the Reformed Episcopal Church.* Born in Delaware, he was educated at Dickinson College and ordained in the Protestant Episcopal Church after a time as a Methodist preacher. He served parishes in Norfolk, Richmond, Washington, Baltimore and Chicago, and in 1866 became assistant bishop of Kentucky. As a low churchman, however, he noticed that even his colleagues were using the Book of Common Prayer to provide for a growing "ritualism and sacerdotalism." He tried to have the Prayer Book of 1785 approved to change this, but failed. As he could no longer obey the church's mandates—its increasing "popishness," and strictures against celebrating Holy Communion with non-Anglicans (for which Cummins got into trouble with the church)—he resigned his orders (1873), and a few weeks later he and others of like mind, clerical and lay, founded the Reformed Episcopal Church, using the 1785 Prayer Book and with himself as presiding bishop. C.G. THORNE, JR.

CUNNINGHAM, WILLIAM (1805-1861). Scottish theologian. One of the leaders of the Disruption* in 1843, and later Thomas Chalmers's successor as principal of New College, Edinburgh, he was a man of massive theological learning and an able controversialist both in theology and in the ecclesiastical affairs of his day. Judged by Historical Theology, a posthumously published set of lectures (2 vols., 1862), Cunningham's gifts as a teacher lay in his judicious summings-up of the chief features of theological systems, from one who had an unswerving commitment to the Westminster Standards. He was a theological heir both of the Westminster Divines and of the continental Reformed theologians of the seventeenth century, in whom he was widely read. Cunningham was a close friend of Charles Hodge* of Princeton. PAUL HELM

CURATE. One who has the care of souls in a particular area, hence, properly, a vicar or rector is a curate. But a curate in the Church of England is popularly understood to be an assistant or unbeneficed clergyman—although strictly speaking he is an assistant curate. He is nominated by the incumbent or the bishop, and licensed by the bishop. His license may be summarily revoked by the bishop, although he may appeal to the archbishop of the province. The employing incumbent may dismiss him on six months' notice.

CURÉ D'ARS, THE (1786-1859). French priest. Born Jean-Baptiste Marie Vianney at Dardilly, near Lyons, he had little formal education because of the unsettled times of the Revolution in France. His desire for the priesthood was long frustrated by an inability to study Latin, and also hindered by conscription to the army (1809) and subsequent desertion. Dismissed from seminaries in Varrieres (1811) and Lyons (1814), he eventually with the persistent private tuition of Abbé Balley, pastor of Écully, was ordained at Grenoble in 1815. He became Balley's assistant, and in 1818 began his famous ministry at Ars-en-Dombes, a village of 230 inhabitants. In eight years its religious tone was transformed. His fame as confessor spread, and from 1827 penitents in thousands came to him. During his last years he spent sixteen to eighteen hours daily in the confessional. He was created the patron of parish priests in 1929. J.G.G. NORMAN

CURIA, THE. Used in English since the first half of the nineteenth century as a description of the papal court, including all its authorities and functionaries. In medieval Latin the word was used to signify "court" generally, but the original meaning of the word denoted an ancient Roman political division.

CUTHBERT (c.634-687). Bishop of Lindisfarne. After a vision connected with the death of Aidan* he entered the monastery at Melrose in 651. Some years later he went as guestmaster to the monastery at Ripon founded by Eata. In 661 he returned with Eata to Melrose and soon became prior. In 664 he moved to Lindisfarne as prior, and introduced Roman customs there, at first against opposition. He continued with missionary journeys in the tradition of Aidan. In 676 he withdrew for greater solitude and closeness to God through nature to one of the neighboring Farne islands. In 684 he declined the see of Hexham, but the next year he consented to become bishop of Lindisfarne. After his death on Farne in 687 his body was buried at Lindisfarne. Due to the Danish raids, it was moved in 875 by monks, who wandered with it all over Northumbria. In 883 it came to rest at Chester-le-Street in County Durham. Because of further danger it was moved again in 995 to Ripon, and on its return north in 999 was finally buried at Durham, where a church was built as a shrine. R.E. NIXON

CYNEWULF (d.783). Bishop of Lindisfarne. He was the tenth bishop (Aidan being the first), and his episcopate from 740 to 780 was easily the longest of that see. He incurred the displeasure of King Eadfrid because of the murder of a member of the royal family who had taken sanctuary on the island. He was imprisoned for two years, but was later reconciled to the king. He is probably to be identified with the Anglo-Saxon poet Cynewulf (see following entry), who flourished in the second half of the eighth century.

CYNEWULF (fl. 750-780). Old English poet. Little is known of him, but a runic signature enables us to identify four poems—the Juliana, Ascension, Elene, and Fates of the Apostles—as his. He may also have written other poems surviving from the Old English period such as The Dream of the Cross and The Last Judgment, while The Phoenix and The Mission of St. Andrew (or Andreas) are probably the work of his followers. His work shows Northumbrian characteristics, and it has been conjectured that he may have been Bishop Cynewulf* of Lindisfarne (d.783). The Juliana and Ascension stress Trinitarian doctrine and support an ecclesiastical authorship. Modern versions of the poems are found in C.W. Kennedy, Early English Christian Poetry, 1952. See also K. Sisam, Cynewulf and His Poetry, 1933.
ARTHUR POLLARD

CYPRIAN (c. 476-549). Bishop of Toulon. He was a disciple of Caesarius of Arles,* whose life he wrote in 530. As bishop he took part in the various councils of the bishops of Provence held by Caesarius: Arles in 524, Carpentras in 527, Orange and Vaison in 529, Marseille in 533. When after the Council of Orange the bishops of the neighboring province of Vienne met to criticize the decisions of the council concerning grace, Cyprian was sent to plead the cause of orthodoxy.

CYPRIAN (Thascius Caecilius Cyprianus) (c.200/10-258). Bishop of Carthage. Son of wealthy and cultured pagan parents, Cyprian was a prominent Carthaginian master of rhetoric (and perhaps advocate) before his total conversion to Christianity about 246. His dedication (to celibacy, poverty, and the Scriptures—he repudiated pagan literature) and native ability led quickly to the presbyterate and episcopate (c.248), to the displeasure of some senior presbyters.

During the Decian persecution (250-51), he went into hiding, a move that predictably incurred suspicion in Rome and criticism in Carthage. In his absence some presbyters and confessors assumed the initiative in reconciling those who had "lapsed" in the persecution. Cyprian resisted what he viewed as innovation and usurpation, and reserved the issue for an episcopal synod. On his return he delivered an address on The Lapsed and presided over a council which stipulated that the gravity of the lapse should determine the duration of penance (251). The *libellatici were readmitted forthwith. The disaffected clergy, led by the deacon Felicissimus and the presbyter Novatus, though demanding milder terms for the lapsi,* aligned themselves against Cyprian with the rigorist Roman schism of Novatian, and soon both parties appointed rival bishops of Carthage, undeterred by Cyprian's strictures on schism. In 252 a serious plague (which evoked widespread anti-Christian animus, despite Christian relief measures) and fears of renewed persecution dictated the prompt readmission of all penitents.

Cyprian was next in conflict with Bishop Stephen of Rome over schismatic baptism, and probably revised The Unity of the Catholic Church to prevent misappropriation by his opponents. African (and Asian) tradition, confirmed by three councils at Carthage in 255-56, repudiated sacraments outside the Catholic Church, and so practiced "rebaptism." The point of divergence was not the nature of the church (as in the Novatianist protest) but the relation of the gift of the Spirit to water baptism and the laying-on of hands and chrism. Stephen's threat of excommunication was averted in 257 by his death and Valerian's resumption of persecution. Cyprian was banished to Curubis and beheaded a year later outside Carthage.

Cyprian's letters and treatises reveal a pastor and administrator rather than a theologian. His rigid correlation of Church and episcopate and his application of OT sacrificial and priestly categories to Christian ministers and sacraments constituted an unhappy legacy. Crisp in thought and action, one of the first great magisterial bishops, strongly but never slavishly indebted to Tertullian, he has subsequently suffered at the hands of ecclesiastical controversy.

CYPRUS. The Christian Church in Cyprus claims as its founders Paul and Barnabas, who ministered there during missionary journeys. Because of its island geography and its apostolic founder, the early church on Cyprus strove to proclaim its independence from any patriarchal see. The Third Ecumenical Council which met in Ephesus in 431 decided in favor of the independence of the Cypriot Church. This decision went against the wishes of the patriarch of Antioch, who desired to dominate the island church. The council declared the Cypriot Orthodox Church to be autocephalous, or self-governing—and this is its present status.

The island came under the control of Islam when it was captured in 647 by the Arabs. The Cypriot Christians struggled and maintained their identity. Cyprus freed itself from the control of Islam from the middle of the eighth century to the early part of the ninth, but it was then recaptured by the Arabs under the Abbasid dynasty, and remained under Islamic rule until the middle of the tenth century. During the Crusader period the island passed from one controlling power to another. Richard I of England who had taken the island sold it to the Knights Templars*; they did not remain long; they were soon replaced by the Knights of St. John. Once Constantinople was captured by the participants of the Fourth Crusade (1204), Latin ecclesiastical superiors attempted to dominate the Cypriot scene. The Greek Christians of Cyprus found it difficult to determine where they should direct their loyalty.

When the Ottoman Turks took over in the last part of the sixteenth century, Cypriot Christianity came under the millet system of the Turks. Millets were religious nations under the Ottoman Turkish Empire. Each organized branch of Christianity which won a millet status was given power to exercise legal authority over its followers. This involved collection of certain taxes, marriage, and divorce courts, and certain aspects of local laws. Thus the head of the church became legal authority with close connections to the state. This tradition of the closeness of church and state was familiar from the days of the Byzantine Empire.

In light of the millet structure, it is not surprising that the Cypriot people elected the head of the church to become their first president on gaining independence from the British in 1960. During the eighty-eight year rule by the British the Greek Orthodox Church was entirely free to carry on its activities. Protestant missionary societies are found on the island, but their numbers and their effect on Cypriot life tend to be negligible.

CYRIL (d.444). Patriarch of Alexandria. He was probably destined early for an ecclesiastical career and perhaps learned theology among desert monks. He assisted his uncle, Patriarch Theophilus, at the Synod of the Oak* (403) and contrived to succeed him in 412. With familial bellicosity he assailed Novatianists, Jews, Origenists, and pagans, and most strenuously Nestorius of Constantinople, who heeded complaints of refugee Egyptian monks against Cyril and disapproved of designating Mary Theotokos, "God-bearer" (428-29). Cyril's vehemence against Nestorius (see NESTORIANISM) vented traditional Alexandrian jealousy of Constantinople as well as horror of his typically Antiochene Christology. Armed with synodal condemnations from Rome (Celestine I) and Alexandria, Cyril sent Nestorius twelve anathematisms and demanded his prompt recantation (430), and at Ephesus in 431 secured his deposition (and the canonizing of his second letter to Nestorius, but not formally his third, with the anathematisms) by initiating proceedings before the Antiochenes arrived. The emperor recognized Cyril's assembly, not the Antiochenes' (which deposed Cyril), as the general council, and exiled Nestorius.

Such extremism demanded redress. With imperial prompting and after tortuous negotiations, Cyril approved an Antiochene "Formula of Union," John of Antioch* accepted Nestorius's excommunication, and Cyril's anathematisms quietly lapsed (433), although he campaigned still against unbudging defenders of Nestorius, especially Theodoret of Cyrrhus* (the compiler of the "Formula of Union"), and even Nestorius's old teacher, Theodore of Mopsuestia.*

Cyril's writings voluminously reveal the man—the ruthless theologian, forceful, acute, profuse, but inelegant, pompous, and myopic. Extensive exegetical works survive (allegorical commentaries on Isaiah, the Minor Prophets, and parts of the Pentateuch, more literal ones on John and Luke), plus a third of his massive reply to Julian's Against the Galileans, about twenty sermons, and many letters of dogmatic interest. Of his anti-Nestorian treatises, That Christ is One is a mature example. The early anti-Arian Treasury and Dialogues on the Holy and Consubstantial Trinity present an undeveloped Christology. Their heavy dependence on Athanasius* highlights Cyril's influential practice of arguing from "the holy Fathers."

Against Nestorius he vindicated the "Hypostatic Union"* of divine and human in Christ which guaranteed the eucharistic reception in His divinized flesh and blood, but gave the impression, by his mistaken appeal to Apollinarian phrases (especially "the one incarnate nature of the Word") as Athanasian, by his analogies, and by his use of physis to mean both "nature" and "person" of teaching Apollinarianism* and Monophysitism.* A major forerunner of Chalcedon (which also canonized his 433 letters to John of Antioch), Cyril nevertheless failed to develop a fully fledged appreciation of the role of Christ's humanity.

CYRIL (826-869) and METHODIUS (c.815-885). Two brothers from Thessalonica known as "the Apostles of the Southern Slavs." After ordination they went to Constantinople where Cyril (whose real name until 868 was Constantine) was librarian at the famous church of St. Sophia. In 860 they appear to have participated in a mission to the Khazars. Two years later Emperor Michael III and Patriarch Photius sent them to Moravia to evangelize and organize the Slav church. The legendary Life of Cyril credits him with the invention of an alphabet known as Glagolitic.* The brothers certainly used the vernacular in the liturgy, and eventually gained the pope's approval for this when they visited Rome after encountering opposition from German clergy.

Cyril entered a monastery in Rome in 868, but soon died and was buried in the church of San Clemente. Methodius was consecrated bishop by Adrian II in order to return to the Slavs. In Moravia he was opposed by the German bishops and imprisoned for a period by Prince Sviatopolk. John VIII procured his release and later consecrated him archbishop of Pannonia. He died probably at Velehrad in modern Czechoslovakia; his followers took refuge in Bulgaria. The memory of Cyril and Methodius is still treasured by Czechs, Croats, Serbs, and Bulgars. The details of their lives are, however, shrouded in some mystery. PETER TOON

CYRILLIC. Under the impact of missionary expansion from Byzantium into regions dominated by Slavic language groups, there were devised modifications of Greek uncials by which those languages, and hence texts useful for missionary enterprise both biblical and liturgical, could be rendered into written form. Tradition ascribes the creation to ninth-century activities of SS. Cyril and Methodius, from the former of whom this particular script (still used for Slavonic languages) receives its name.

CYRIL OF JERUSALEM (c.310-386). Bishop of Jerusalem. According to the Synaxary he was born "of pious parents professing the orthodox faith and was bred up in the same in the reign of Constantine." For Cyril's early clerical career in Jerusalem we depend upon Jerome's Chronicle, which is unfair to Cyril by representing his activities as part of the squabbles within Arianism. It seems he was made deacon about 330 by Macarius and priest by Maximus about 343. He renounced his orders received through the latter for canonical reasons (not because Maximus supported Athanasian doctrine) and thereby gained the temporary favor of Acacius* of Caesarea. About 350 he became bishop, but soon was in conflict with Acacius because, during a famine, he sold church property (donated by the emperor) to feed the poor.

After being deposed by a provincial synod in 357, he appealed to the emperor. Though cleared by the synod of Seleucia in 357, he was exiled by Constantius but was able to return in 361 when Julian the Apostate began to reign. From his fifteenth catechetical lecture we gather that Cyril opposed the move of Julian to help the Jews rebuild their Temple. After Acacius's death in 366, Cyril consecrated his nephew Gelasius as the new bishop of Caesarea. When Valens adopted the ecclesiastical policy of Constantius in 367, Cyril was again banished. In the eleven years of exile he cooperated with the body of bishops of northern Syria and eastern Asia Minor, which ranged itself around Melitius of Antioch, to restore the Nicene faith. In 378 he was able to return to his see; the synod of Jerusalem (381-82) referred to Cyril as rightful bishop of "the mother of all the churches" and one who had striven to preserve the true faith against Arianism. Ten years after his death, Aetheria, the famous pilgrim, visited Jerusalem and wrote in her journal of the beautiful liturgy, especially for Eastertide.

Cyril's twenty-four Catecheses are his chief surviving work. See English edition by W. Telfer (1955). PETER TOON

CZECHOSLOVAK CHURCH. National church of Czechoslovakia, founded in 1920. Against the background of Hapsburg central government repression, which sought to curb Czech nationalism by appointing bishops favoring centralization and Germanization, an association of Catholic priests called "Jednota" was formed in 1890. They sought the introduction of the Czech language into the liturgy, the abolition of priestly celibacy, and lay participation in church government. Their demands were rejected by Rome in 1919, whereupon they formed an independent religious body, forty priests meeting in the national house in Prague-Smichov in January 1920. They won many adherents and were soon recognized by the secular government. Constituted on Presbyterian lines, the church elected but did not consecrate four bishops, there being no doctrine of apostolic succession. Since 1946 bishops are appointed for seven years only. A strongly rationalistic church—largely because of the influence of the first patriarch, Karl Farsky—it rejected the doctrines of original sin, purgatory, and veneration of saints; christological and eucharistic doctrines were liberally interpreted.

A more conservative group under Matthias Pavlik, who was ordained an Orthodox bishop under the name Gorazd (1921), entered into relations with the Serbian Orthodox Church. The majority followed Farsky, but after his death (1927) they too became more conservative. Patriarchs succeeding Farsky were Gustav Prochazka (1928-42), Francis Kovar (1946-61), Miroslav Novak (from 1961). In 1963 there were some 750,000 members in 345 parishes and five dioceses. Candidates for the ministry are trained in the Hus Czechoslovak theological faculty in Prague.

DABNEY, ROBERT (1820-1898). Young contemporary of J.H. Thornwell,* he is generally regarded as the second great theologian of the Southern Presbyterian Church. He graduated from the University of Virginia in 1842, and in 1844 entered Union Seminary, was licensed to preach in 1846, and became minister of the Tinkling Spring Presbyterian Church (1847-53). Thereafter he was appointed to the chair of ecclesiastical history and polity at Union Seminary, transferring in 1859 to the chair of systematic theology. In 1881 he took a prominent part in the formation of the Southern Presbyterian Church. From 1861 he served as a chaplain, then as chief of staff to Stonewall Jackson. In 1866 he returned to Union, remaining there until 1883 when for health reasons he moved to Austin where until 1884 he was professor of mental and moral philosophy at the recently established University of Texas, and played a prominent role in the founding of Austin Theological Seminary. In 1870 he published his Syllabus and Notes of the Course of Systematic and Polemic Theology Taught in the Union Seminary in Virginia which, revised and reissued in 1878, went through six editions until 1927. C. GREGG SINGER

DA COSTA, ISAAK (1798-1860). Dutch poet and theologian. Born into a wealthy Jewish family in Amsterdam, he was through the persistent witness of Willem Bilderdijk* converted from admiration of Voltaire to fervent Christianity. Thereafter his life was devoted to the Christian cause; his lectures and writings had a profound influence on the subsequent religious history of the Netherlands. He edited the poems of Bilderdijk in sixteen volumes. His own collected works were published in Holland (1861-63). Of those translated into English, Israel and the Gentiles appeared in 1850 and The Four Witnesses in 1851. The last named, compiled over many years, was first published after Strauss's Life of Jesus had begun to make an impact in Holland. R.E.D. CLARK

DAILLÉ (Dallaeus), JEAN (1594-1670). French Protestant theologian. Born at Châtellerault and educated at Poitiers and Saumur, he was tutor to two grandsons of Philippe de Mornay* from 1612 to 1621. Ordained in 1623, he became private chaplain to Du Plessis-Mornay, whose memoirs he subsequently wrote. Appointed pastor at Saumur in 1625 and at Charenton (1626-70), he gained a reputation for oratory and theological controversy. In Traité de l'employ des saints pères (1632) he rejected the authority of the Fathers, for which he was assailed by Roman Catholic and Anglican scholars. In La Foi fondée sur les saintes écritures (1634) he held that all Christian doctrines are either explicitly stated in Scripture or directly deducible from it. He attacked the genuineness of the Ignatian literature in De Scriptis Quae sub Dionysii Areopagitae et Ignatii Antiochenii Nominibus circumferuntur (1666), adducing no fewer than sixty-six objections. His Sermons on Philippians and Colossians vindicate his claim to rank as a great preacher as well as an able controversialist. He was president of the last national synod held in France before the revocation of the Edict of Nantes, held at Loudun (1659), when he defended the universalism of Moise Amyraut. He also wrote Apologie pour les Églises Reformées. J.G.G. NORMAN

D'AILLY, PIERRE (1350-1420). French cardinal and theologian. Born in Compiègne, he entered the College of Navarre, Paris, in 1363, graduating in arts in 1368 and becoming doctor of theology in 1381. He had many interests and wrote on scientific, philosophical, geographical, and astronomical, as well as theological, subjects. His work shows the influence of Bacon and William of Ockham.* He was made canon at Noyon in 1318, rector of his college in 1384, and chancellor of the University of Paris in 1389. He had close contact with the French court, as confessor and almoner to Charles VI. Among the many benefices he held in plurality was the archdeaconry of Cambrai, and on the accession of Benedict XIII (1395) he was appointed bishop of Puy, which office he never fulfilled, for in 1397 he was translated to the see of Cambrai. Deeply concerned to end the Western Schism which had divided Western Christendom since 1378, he supported the Council of Pisa* which had been convoked by the cardinals in 1409. This ended in the existence of three popes, with d'Ailly supporting the third, Alexander V. On the accession of John XXIII, d'Ailly was created cardinal in the hope that his support would be given to Rome. At the Council of Constance* (1414) he supported the theory of the supremacy of the general council over the pope. In 1416 he published his Tractatus super Reformatione Ecclesia, which was the third part of a much larger work, De Materia Concilii Generalis. Some of his suggested reforms were adopted by the Council of Trent,* and the Tractatus was well received in England and Germany. His theology was greatly influenced by that of Ockham, as seen in his belief that God could not be proved by reason, only faith; he argued also that the pope was not essential to the church. It is not surprising that these views found acceptance with Luther and other Reformers.

DALE, ROBERT WILLIAM (1829-1895). Congregational preacher. Of Nonconformist background, he was graduated at London with a first class degree in philosophy (1853). Dale started his career as a schoolmaster, but soon turned to the ministry, becoming in 1853 pastor at Carr's Lane Chapel, Birmingham, where for several decades he exerted a powerful influence upon the religious, educational, and social life of the city. In politics a Liberal of forthright views, he pioneered social work, especially among the young, opposed the imposition of oaths upon members of Parliament, fought religious education in state schools, and joined effectively in every controversy of the day. Dale published many theological books and tracts, and is remembered particularly for his fine work on The Atonement (1875) in which, though critical of the legalistic views of some theologians, he saw in the death of our Lord the sole ground of man's reconciliation with God. Though he upheld conditional immortality, Dale never minimized the seriousness of sin and so the need for God's forgiveness. He strenuously opposed extreme Calvinism and the High Church movement, but cooperated in revival meetings with D.L. Moody.* His books remained in wide use long after his death.

DALMAN, GUSTAF HERMANN (1855-1941). Biblical scholar. Of Moravian background, he served as professor of the Institutum Delitzschianum in Leipzig (1895-1902), director of the German Protestant Institute for Archaeology in Palestine (1902-17), professor at Greifswald (1917-25), and again in Jerusalem as director of his own Institute for the Study of Antiquity in the Holy Land (1925-41). His many writings are a mine of information for the student of the NT, though some of his conclusions are in need of revision in the light of more recent research. His works include a Grammar of Jewish-Palestinian Aramaic (in German, 1894); The Words of Jesus (1898; ET 1902); Sacred Sites and Ways (3rd ed., 1924; ET 1935); Jesus-Jeschua (1922; ET 1929); and Arbeit und Sitte in Palastina (7 vols., 1928-42).

W. WARD GASQUE

DAMASUS I (c.304-384). Pope from 366. Born in Rome of Spanish parentage, he succeeded Liberius in the papacy, but was established only after Emperor Valentinian I came to his support and forcibly suppressed supporters of Ursinus, set up as a rival pope. Under the pontificate of Damasus, Apollinarianism and Macedonianism were condemned (368, 369), the famous Tome of Damasus* was issued (382), an imperial decree against clerical worldliness was enforced, and Jerome (then his private secretary) was commissioned by Damasus to revise the Latin translations of the Bible, the outcome of which was the Vulgate.

DAMIAN, PETER (1007-1072). Roman Catholic reformer. Born in Ravenna and raised amid hardship, he entered the Benedictine hermitage at Fonte Avellana in 1035, and was made prior eight years later. Having founded new monasteries and reformed old ones, gaining notice from Henry III's court and the papal Curia, he was made cardinal bishop of Ostia against his will. He attacked clerical decadence including marriage (Liber gomorrhianus), viewed church reform as a joint effort by papacy and empire, and gave himself to synodal work, diplomatic missions to France and Germany, and matters of highest ecclesiastical policy and principle. He defended the validity of orders conferred gratis by simonists (Liber gratissimus), upheld Alexander II during the schism of antipope Honorius II (Disceptatio synodalis), and benefited Cluny by supporting Abbot Hugh against Bishop Drogo of Macon (Iter Gallicum). Yet church and state beyond Italy did not concern him; he showed no interest in the open struggle between the Greek and Latin churches. His writings, inspired by antiquity as well as by the Carolingian Renaissance, ordered severe mortification and reveal his tension between the active and contemplative life, whether letters, sermons, treatises, or minor works of prose and verse. Though he was never canonized, Leo XII in 1828 made him "Doctor of the Church."

DAMIEN, FATHER (Joseph de Veuster) (1840-1889). Roman Catholic missionary priest. Born in Tremelo, Belgium, he was trained for the priesthood by the Fathers of the Sacred Heart (Picpus Fathers) at Louvain and Paris, and took the religious name of Damien. He was sent in 1864 to Honolulu to be ordained as a missionary in the Sandwich Islands. He served at Puna and Kohala on the island of Hawaii. In the 1860s the government decided to use the island of Molokai as an isolation settlement for lepers, but made no provision for permanent medical staff. In 1873 Damien heard of the lepers' plight and was allowed to join them. The colony thereafter increased to over 1,000. He undertook the duties of nurse, builder, superintendent, as well as priest. By his own labors and by pressure on the authorities he created a well-ordered community. By 1885 he knew that he had leprosy, yet continued to serve the lepers right up to his death. His growing fame in the outside world made him many admirers, but also created hostility among local officials and the Catholic hierarchy on the islands. The most famous defense of his character came from Robert Louis Stevenson in 1905.

NOEL S. POLLARD

DAMNATION. The King James Version renders three Greek words as "damnation": krisis (Matt. 23:33), krima (Matt. 23:14), and apōleia (2 Pet. 2:3). Newer translations have usually preferred "condemnation," "judgment," or "destruction" to

"damnation." In Luke 16:19-26 Jesus spoke of a division between saved and lost, and the NT always declares that the saved go immediately into the Lord's presence (Luke 23:43; 2 Cor. 5:8; Phil. 1:23), while the lost will remain in Hades until the judgment, after which they will pass into the lake of fire (Rev. 20:11-15), "the second death" (Rev. 2:11; 21:8). During the nineteenth century particularly, theological liberals attempted to teach that Christ's gospel of love was perverted and oriented toward punishment, especially by Paul but precisely the opposite is apparent. While Paul does indicate that Christ-opposing powers will come to final ruin (1 Cor. 15:24-26; 2 Thess. 2:8-10), the NT emphasis is rather on the Lord's infinite love which prompts repeated warnings of impending damnation for those who defiantly resist the truth (Matt. 5:22, 29-30; 10:28; 18:9, etc.).

DANIEL THE STYLITE (409-493). Syrian ascetic. Born near Samosata, he began his religious life as a monk not far from his home. Twice he visited Simeon the Stylite* on his pillar at Telanissus. When Simeon died, Daniel decided to emulate him. Upon two conjoined pillars he built a small platform on which he lived for the rest of his life. Only once in thirty-three years did he descend, and that was to reprimand an emperor. He was consulted by the patriarch of Constantinople and the emperors Leo I and Zeno; thousands flocked to see and hear him, and he prayed for many sick people. He died at the age of eighty-four and was buried at the foot of his pillars.

DANIEL-ROPS, HENRI (1901-1965). French Roman Catholic historian, essayist, and novelist. Graduate in history of the University of Grenoble (1922) and high school teacher until 1946, he changed from the family name of Petiot to Daniel-Rops (a character in one of his short stories) as a pseudonym so as to avoid the difficulty of obtaining permission from the ministry of education to publish. His literary output was enormous, including numerous short stories, essays, and nearly seventy books (twenty of them novels). For a time he was a leader among a group of young intellectuals called "The New Order" (1932ff.). At first merely a nominal Roman Catholic, from 1934 he began to assert himself as a man of faith and zeal. His novel Death, Where is thy Victory? (1934; ET 1946) had a widespread impact in France and was made into a film. His twelve-volume biblical and ecclesiastical history (1943-56) has been translated into English. In 1955 he was elected to the French Academy. W. WARD GASQUE

DANTE ALIGHIERI (1265-1321). Italian poet. Born in Florence of a family that had a slight claim to nobility, Dante (a contraction of Durante) began early to write poetry and to take part in the political life of the city. While on an embassy to Rome as one of the priors of Florence, one of the opposing factions that supported Boniface VIII (whose secular ambitions Dante opposed) took control of the city. Several charges were lodged against Dante, and he was fined and exiled from the city. He never saw his wife or Florence again, though later he was given permission to return. He died at the court of Guido da Polenta in Ravenna, where he is buried.

Dante's literary achievement is universally acclaimed. His works include La Vita Nuova; La Divina Commedia (Commedia originally; Divina was added later); Convivio, an allegorical poem and numerous treatises. He wrote also several epistles and eclogues. A Latin treatise, De Monarchia, sets forth his political views on the conflict between the church and the Holy Roman Empire.

The poet's idealized love for Beatrice Portinari was first told in The New Life, but Dante is remembered best for The Divine Comedy. Composed of 100 cantos divided into The Inferno, The Purgatory and The Paradise, written in terza rima, this "cathedral in words" represents the poet astray in a dark wood (sin) at Eastertide. Virgil (Philosophy) appears and offers to act as guide through Hell and up to Mount Purgatory. Then Beatrice (Theology, Revealed Religion) conducts him to the heights of Paradise, where he contemplates the glory ineffable. The account is an elaborate Christian allegory of the soul's vision of sin, its purging from guilt and stain, and its rising in newness of life. This profound vision is imaginatively expressed in simple but vigorous style.

ERWIN RUDOLPH

DARBOY, GEORGES (1813-1871). Archbishop of Paris. From humble origins in Fays-Billot, he was curate at St. Dizier, taught at Langres (1839-45), then became chaplain at the Lycée Henri IV where he occupied increasingly important diocesan posts. As bishop of Nancy, his writings showed a deep interest in education. Archbishop from 1863, he was a strong defender of episcopal rights and a determined Gallican. So strongly did he oppose the definition of papal infallibility that he tried to persuade Napoleon III to intervene at Vatican Council I.* He eventually submitted and exemplified important pastoral instructions by his distinguished care for the needy during the siege of Paris (1870-71). He was executed by the Commune while blessing his executioners.

IAN BREWARD

DARBY, J(OHN) N(ELSON) (1800-1882). Plymouth Brethren* leader. Born into a distinguished Anglo-Irish family (his middle name came from the famous admiral), Darby had a distinguished career at Trinity College, Dublin, and after graduation (1819) was called to the Irish Chancery Bar (1822). Ordained three years later, he served with tireless devotion a Church of Ireland parish in County Wicklow. Uneasy about church establishment, however, he startled the country in 1827 with his tract On the Nature and Unity of the Church of Christ. Resigning his curacy that same year, he associated with a group meeting in Dublin for breaking of bread and prayer, and quickly assumed leadership because of his teaching gifts and his powerful and attractive personality. From 1830 he made frequent preaching journeys to the Continent. In 1845 Darby broke with B.W. Newton* in Plymouth through disagreement on prophecy and ecclesiology, and later led the attack on Newton on heresy charges that forced the 1848 division of the Brethren into Open and Exclusive groups. Darby's later travels included North America, the West Indies and New Zealand. His literary style was often obscure, but his hymns breathe a strain of mystical devotion. He translated the Bible into German, French, and English. Passionate in controversy and at times blinded by prejudice, he was kind and generous to children and poor people. Though not the founder of the so-called Plymouth Brethren, he was undoubtedly their most gifted teacher at the beginning.

DARK AGES, THE. Originally an alternative description of the Middle Ages,* the term was later restricted to the six centuries ending about 1100. The "Dark" has been taken to signify depreciation of morality, scholarship, and achievements, but modern research has increasingly tended to interpret the adjective as denoting rather the paucity of our knowledge of the period.

DARWIN, CHARLES ROBERT (1809-1882). English naturalist. Graduate of Christ College, Cambridge (1831), his theory of evolution* was formulated during a five-year voyage around South America. In 1837 he "opened his first notebook on the Transmutation of Species," but he hesitated until 1859 before publishing his Origin of Species by Means of Natural Selection. Lifelong vacillation between agnosticism and faith was accompanied by psychosomatic pains. Originally intending to become a clergyman, by 1850 he declared himself agnostic. Hesitation continued until A.R. Wallace's MS of a similar theory expedited Darwin's Origins.

In 1857 at the Oxford meeting of the British Association, T.H. Huxley as "Darwin's Bulldog" attacked Bishop Samuel Wilberforce,* whose ridicule and lack of science was an open target for Huxley. Thus evolution and religion were set at variance, counteracting the accepted Bridgewater Treatises, by renowned scientists on The Power, Wisdom and Goodness of God as Manifested in the Creation. Fears that the new theory would brutalize humanity were not unfounded. Herbert Spencer opposed the betterment of the unfortunate because it might hinder selection by survival of the fittest. Marx, Nietzsche, and Hitler justified war on the same grounds. Darwin's inner conflict continued into old age, according to the Duke of Argyle unrelieved by his wife's prayers and Bible reading. Some credence is given to his nurse's record, however, that the epistle to the Hebrews brought him final consolation. He was buried in 1882 in Westminster Abbey, a few feet from Isaac Newton. Darwin's other works included Descent of Man (1871), Different Forms of Flowers (1877), and a theory of reef formation (1842).

E.K. VICTOR PEARCE

D'AUBIGNÉ, JEAN HENRI MERLE (1794-1872). Protestant historian. Born at Eaux-Vives near Geneva, son of French Protestant refugees, his initial studies were in Geneva, where he was influenced by Robert Haldane and the current evangelical awakening. Later he studied in Berlin and became a friend of J.A.W. Neander.* In 1817 he was ordained, and a year later took the pastorate of the French congregation at Hamburg. Then in 1823 he was appointed court preacher at Brussels, but after the Revolution of 1830, he declined the post of tutor to the Prince of Orange and returned to Geneva. Here he deeply involved himself in the work of the Evangelical Society of Geneva and was appointed to a professorship in its theological school. His primary interest was church history, and his most popular work, a mixture of rhetoric, apologetics, and history, was Histoire de la Reformation du XVI^e siècle (5 vols., 1835-53; ET 1846-53). A more scholarly production was Histoire de la Reformation en Europe au temps de Calvin (8 vols., 1863-78). He was also a founder of the Evangelical Church of Switzerland.

PETER TOON

DAVENANT, JOHN (1576-1641). Bishop of Salisbury. Graduate of Cambridge, by the age of thirty-three he had become D.D. and divinity professor there. In 1618, at the height of the Calvinist controversy, King James I (himself not without scholarly pretensions) sent him and three other churchmen to represent the Church of England at the Synod of Dort. Despite his colleagues' uneasiness, Davenant on their behalf read to the synod a paper advocating the doctrine of universal redemption. His king evidently approved, for Davenant was appointed bishop of Salisbury in 1621. Even his very moderate Calvinism was, however, unacceptable under the new king, Charles I, and the growing power of William Laud.* In 1631 Davenant was summoned before the council after preaching at court a sermon on predestination and election which provoked Charles's displeasure. Thereafter Davenant in his west country diocese meekly carried out Archbishop Laud's High Church commands in ecclesiastical matters. Among his works was a much-praised commentary on Colossians.

J.D. DOUGLAS

DAVENPORT, JOHN (1597-1670). New England pastor. Born at Coventry and educated at Oxford, he became vicar of St. Stephen's in Coleman Street, London. He was of Puritan sympathies and helped to procure the charter of the Massachusetts Company in 1629. He was also one of the twelve London feoffees who formed a committee to buy up lay impropriations and use the income to finance a Puritan preaching program. In 1632 he entertained John Cotton who was on his way to America. Becoming a Nonconformist, Davenport fled to Holland in 1633, and after a brief return to England, sailed with Theophilus Eaton to New England in 1637, where finally he became pastor to an independent colony at what is now New Haven, where Eaton was governor. In 1661 they sheltered the English regicides Edmund Whalley and William Goffe. Davenport opposed the Half-Way Covenant* and the absorption of the New Haven colony by Connecticut. In 1667, against the wishes of his church, he accepted a call to become minister of the First Church of Boston, which could not get the services of John Owen. PETER TOON

DAVID (c.520-589). Ascetic monk and patron saint of Wales. Of a southern Welsh princely family, he was a great founder of monasteries, including one at Mynyw in Pembrokeshire at which he lived and built up a fine library destroyed later by Scandinavian raiders. The Council of Brefi chose him as primate of Wales, but he accepted only on condition that the seat was moved from Caerleon to St. Davids. In order to strengthen his argument that the see of St. Davids was independent of Canterbury's authority, an eleventh century biographer, Rhygyfarch, fabricated the story that David then went to Jerusalem to receive episcopal consecration from the patriarch. In religious art David is depicted standing on a mound with a dove on his shoulder, a reference to the tradition that when he was speaking at the Council of Brefi a white dove rested on his shoulder and the ground below his feet rose to form a hill so that everyone could hear him speak. His connection with the leek is unknown. He was a popular saint in South Wales, Devon, Cornwall, and Brittany. L. FEEHAN

DAVID, CHRISTIAN (1691-1751). Moravian Brethren leader. Born in Moravia and by trade a carpenter, he was converted in 1717 and became a lay evangelist. In 1722 he met Count Zinzendorf,* helped him to found the Christian community of Herrnhut on his estate, and recruited settlers from the exiled Brethren (Unitas Fratrum) in Moravia. In 1733 David led a group of missionaries to Greenland to assist the Norwegian pioneer Hans Egede,* but sharp differences developed between them. David, strongly self-willed and at times intolerant, criticized Egede's Lutheran orthodoxy, while the latter resented the sentimental nature of the Moravian message. When Egede departed in 1736 they had been reconciled, and the work in Greenland prospered. David traveled extensively in Europe, returned to Greenland in 1747 with more missionaries, and built a church and mission residence. He journeyed to Pennsylvania, then returned to Greenland to construct a storehouse before dying in Herrnhut. RICHARD V. PIERARD

DAVID OF AUGSBURG (c.1200-1272). Mystic. Joining the Franciscans at Regensburg (Ratisbon) where he became novice master, he moved in 1243 to the order's new foundation at Augsburg. An Official Visitor of the Franciscan friaries, and missionary and inquisitor of Waldensian* heretics, he also wrote works on mysticism and contemplation in Latin and German which influenced the Devotio Moderna. The main ones were Die Sieben Vorregeln der Tugend, Der Spiegel der Tugend, Formula Novitiorum, Expositio Regulae. His authorship of Christi Leben unser Vorbild, Von der Anschauung Gottes and De Inqisitione Haereticorum is doubtful.

DAVIDSON, ANDREW BRUCE (1831-1902). Scottish OT scholar. Born into a poor Aberdeenshire family which made considerable sacrifices for his education, he graduated in Arts (1849) at Aberdeen. After three years' schoolteaching, during which time he mastered Hebrew and some modern languages, he entered New College, Edinburgh, the theological training school of the Free Church of Scotland (then only nine years old). Licensed as a preacher in 1856, he was subsequently assistant (1858) and then (1863) successor to the famous "Rabbi" Duncan as professor of Hebrew and oriental languages. A bachelor of diffident disposition, Davidson was a superb teacher of whom it was said, "Easy mastery of his subject, lucid and attractive discourse, the faculty of training men in scientific method, the power of making them think out things for themselves, were united in him with the capacity of holding their minds, quickening their ideas, and commanding their imagination." For his listeners the OT prophets came alive. He was also an influential member of the OT revision committee (1870-84). A pioneer in introducing historical methods of OT study in Scotland, who taught his students to read the Bible with grammar and dictionary in hand, he was the author of a number of Bible commentaries and theological works, but is now best remembered for his Introductory Hebrew Grammar (1874), known as a textbook to many generations of students. He also contributed extensively to publications such as the Encyclopaedia Britannica and Hastings's Bible Dictionary. Although his own orthodoxy was never called into question and he disliked controversy, Davidson's methods as furthered by W. Robertson Smith provoked the latter's trial for heresy.

DAVIDSON, RANDALL THOMAS (1848-1930). Archbishop of Canterbury, 1903-28. The son of Scottish Presbyterians, Davidson was educated at Harrow and Oxford, was ordained priest in the Church of England, and rose rapidly to become dean of Windsor (1883), bishop of Rochester (1891), and bishop of Winchester (1895) before going to Canterbury. In the primacy Davidson presided over his church at a particularly difficult time. An administrator rather than a spiritual leader, he strove for compromise, though on some issues—especially the Balfour Education Bill and Welsh Disestablishment—his Anglicanism was unbending. In social matters his attempts to mitigate the horrors of war and of the ensuing industrial depression were widely approved, as were his ecumenical endeavors, the Lambeth Quadrilateral and the Malines Conversations, gestures respectively to the Free Churches and the Roman Catholics, and both fruitless. Evangelicals were not happy under his archiepiscopate, convinced that his concern for moderation and comprehension was a cloak for the advancement of ritualists or advanced liberals like Hensley Henson. Davidson promoted no evangelicals, on the grounds that they had no outstanding men, and confirmed their worst fears when he lent his weight to the new Prayer Book, rejected by Parliament to his disgust in 1928. He retired the same year. His writings include a biography of Archbishop Tait (2 vols., 1891).

DAVIES, RICHARD (1501?-1581). Bishop and translator. Born a curate's son at Gyffin, Conway, he was educated at New Inn Hall, Oxford, and after serving two Buckinghamshire livings, was deprived on the accession of Mary Tudor and withdrew to Frankfurt to join other Protestant exiles. He was consecrated bishop of St. Asaph in 1560 and translated to St. David's the following year. As an administrator he was the foremost protagonist of the Elizabethan settlement in Wales, and profoundly concerned about the sorry condition of his diocese and the low spiritual condition of both clergy and people.

He participated in the production of the Bishops' Bible* (1568) and was responsible for the section Joshua to 2 Samuel. He applied his scholarly gifts to the task of translating Scripture into Welsh. An act of 1563 (which owed much to him) had put the responsibility for preparing a Welsh version of the Bible upon the four bishops of Wales together with the bishop of Hereford. In order to comply with this command, he invited William Salesbury* to join him at Abergwili, the episcopal residence, to cooperate in the venture. In 1567 their joint efforts saw the light of day in a Welsh translation of both the Book of Common Prayer and the NT. Davies's contribution to the NT consisted of an interesting preface, Epistol at y Cembru, together with 1 Timothy and Hebrews-2 Peter. Although the Book of Common Prayer has traditionally been attributed to Davies, this is doubtful. He combined with his excellent knowledge of the classical languages a solid familiarity with the classical Welsh literary tradition and was capable of producing poetry in the strict meters.

DAVIES, SAMUEL (1723-1761). Founder of Southern Presbyterianism. After theological training in Samuel Blair's school at Foggs Manor, Pennsylvania, he was ordained as an evangelist in 1747 and sent to Hanover County in Virginia to preach to Presbyterian converts of the Great Awakening.* He preached in licensed meeting houses in Hanover, and evangelized in other counties of Virginia and North Carolina. He went to England with Gilbert Tennent in 1753, and raised £3,000, mostly in Scotland, for the College of New Jersey (now Princeton University), preached with great acceptance, and won by personal argument before the king in council legal status for dissenters in Virginia. He became president of the College of New Jersey in 1759 and improved its standards. He led in organizing Hanover Presbytery (the first in the South) in 1775. His always feeble health gave way in 1761 after he contracted pneumonia and blood poisoning from being bled. EARLE E. CAIRNS

DEACON. The Greek work diakonos means "servant," with an emphasis on usefulness rather than inferiority. Such service was expected of all members of the early church, but there soon evolved a special auxiliary ministry with this title. Deacons were apparently assistants to the bishops or overseers (Phil. 1:1). Their origin was early attributed to the appointment of the Seven in Acts 6:3,4, though they are not actually called deacons. They were, however, to "deacon" tables, and certainly such administrative service characterized the later work of deacons (note the qualification "not greedy for gain" in 1 Tim. 3:8 RSV).

By the time of Ignatius in the early second century, their flexible beginnings had evolved into a specific office in the threefold ministry of bishops, presbyters, and deacons. The office soon gained in significance, with a combination of administrative, pastoral, and liturgical functions. The Apostolic Tradition of Hippolytus in the beginning of the third century regards the deacon as the bishop's link with the church. Collecting and distributing alms was a major responsibility and liable to create an undue sense of their importance. From the Council of Arles in 314 onward, their temptation to arrogance is alluded to and their subordinate position to that of presbyters stressed. In the Eastern Church a man often remained a deacon for life while continuing in a secular occupation; his diaconal role was almost entirely liturgical. In the West the diaconate steadily declined in importance during the Middle Ages until it became simply a stepping-stone to the priesthood.

In many of the Reformation churches the liturgical function of deacons was discarded. Among the Lutherans pastoral care and witness are their special responsibility. Consequently they are not ordained, but on the European continent are consecrated as members of a community (Bruderhaus). Calvin traced two kinds of deacon in the NT, one to dispense alms and the other to care for the poor and sick (Institutes IV 3.9), a dual role still exercised by this "lay" ministry in the Reformed churches. Among Baptists, deacons approximate to the executive committee of the church, being normally elected by the church meeting for a limited period.

Experiments in permanent diaconate and the advocacy of fresh study of the subject by both Vatican II and the Lambeth Conference of 1968 indicate widespread uncertainty concerning their role.

DEACONESS. In the early church, a woman involved in the pastoral ministry of the church. Exactly what her function or official status may have been is a matter of dispute. Paul mentions Phoebe, "deaconess" (ousan diakonon) of the church at Cenchreae (Rom. 16:1) and there is also an ambiguous reference in 1 Timothy 3:11. The "widows" mentioned in 1 Timothy 5:3-10 may also be connected with the role. Not until the end of the fourth century is much known about the office of deaconess (Gr. diakonissa). The "Didascalia" and the "Apostolic Constitutions" describe their functions as assistants to the clergy in the baptizing of women, ministers to the poor and sick among women, instructors of women catechumens, and in general intermediaries between the clergy and women of the congregation. Fears of the usurping of priestly functions and other considerations led to the extinction of the office in the church at large by the eleventh century.

The modern deaconess movement began clearly in 1836 when the Lutheran pastor T. Fliedner* founded a Protestant community at Kaiserswerth,* near Dusseldorf, devoted chiefly to nursing. The movement spread rapidly through the Protestant world. In the second half of the nineteenth century, deaconesses were established in the Church of England, the Methodist Church, and the Church of Scotland. They act as pastoral assistants to the minister.

DEAD SEA SCROLLS. Discovered in 1947 and subsequently in caves near the northwestern end of the Dead Sea, the scrolls are the outstanding find of the century. They have posed and continue to pose many problems, particularly in regard to date and connection with the Essenes* already known from the writings of Philo, Josephus, and the elder Pliny. But intensive work on the scrolls and on the site of their discovery has made certain conclusions reasonably assured.

The scrolls are the work of a community of Jews who after a violent quarrel with the priesthood of Jerusalem made a home for themselves in the torrid region adjoining the Dead Sea. The settlement began probably at the time Jonathan, brother and successor to Judas Maccabaeus, became high priest in 153 B.C., and continued (save for a break of about thirty or forty years in the time of Herod the Great) until the war with Rome of A.D. 66-73. The scrolls are probably from between 20 B.C. and A.D. 70.

All the scrolls have suffered damage to some extent, and many are reduced to small fragments. The story of how the copper scroll was unrolled illustrates the drama which surrounds the scrolls generally. Those scrolls so far discovered and deciphered can be classified thus:

(1) Interpretation. There is a whole series of commentaries on the books of the OT. They interpret the text as fulfilled in the events surrounding the founding of the community. One of the two Isaiah scrolls found in cave 1 contains the complete Hebrew text of Isaiah. It indicates that the Massoretic text was substantially fixed by Christian times, which few scholars would previously have dared to assert with any confidence. The work on Habakkuk, useful for its information on the history of the sect, follows a phrase-by-phrase type of commentary (pesher) peculiar to Qumran. The fact that this scroll has nothing on the third chapter of Habakkuk is taken to support the long-held view of some scholars that this chapter was part of the original Habakkuk. Fragments of other pesherim on Nahum and Psalm 37 have been found. A looser sort of commentary is the midrashim. The best example is the Genesis Apocryphon. It eulogizes the patriarchs as examples to be followed, emphasizing the beauty of Noah and Sarah. A new literary genre found only in Qumran is the florilegia, or collections of biblical texts. Some of these are interesting for their Messianic allusions.

(2) Discipline. Very influential in the life of the community was the so-called Manual of Discipline. Fragments of no less than eleven MSS have been found. This scroll contains very valuable information on rules for membership of the community, beliefs held, directions on admission, discipline, the holy life, and the praise of God.

(3) Praise. The scrolls known as the Psalms of Thanksgiving are moving compositions. Written on the lines of the OT Psalms, they are intended as individual prayers more than for community worship. Some of these compositions appear to reflect the experiences of the teacher of the sect and may in fact have been written by him. Fragments of hymns, prayers, and blessings for public worship have also been discovered.

(4) Hope. In all the scrolls there is a strong eschatological hope. These Jews believed they would one day resume the worship of God at Jerusalem. This explains the "New Jerusalem" texts which are based on the vision of Ezekiel 40—48. A dramatic description of the battle whereby the Children of Light will overcome their enemies and establish themselves at Jerusalem is found in the War Scroll.

The scrolls are invaluable for the study of the text of the OT and its transmission. The fragments of the Pseudepigrapha and Apocrypha provide specimens of what these texts were like in the original, and thus enable scholars for the first time to assess the fidelity of our translated versions. Most important of all is the invaluable information which the scrolls have to give on Jewish life and thought at the time of Jesus Christ and the beginning of the Christian Church. Compared with the rigidity and ultraconservatism of Qumran, Orthodox Judaism is seen to be flexible and progressive, and compared with both, Christianity is unique and inspired.

DEAN. The Latin title decanus (from decem, "ten") probably entered ecclesiastical usage as the title of a monk supervising ten novices. Its principal use is to describe the head of a cathedral or collegiate church, who is responsible with the chapter for the services, fabric, and property. Rural deans assist the bishop's administration by superintending and representing the clergy of a subdivision of a diocese. Other usages include "the Dean of the Province of Canterbury," who is the bishop of London; "the Dean of the Arches," who is a lay judge in the archbishop of Canterbury's Court of Arches; "the Dean of the Sacred College," who is the cardinal bishop of Ostia. University or college deans are usually lay officials. JOYCE HORN

DEARMER, PERCY (1867-1936). Anglican scholar. Educated at Oxford, he was influenced by Charles Gore* in the direction of Christian Socialism.* He was vicar of St. Mary's, Primrose Hill, London (1901-15), where he adapted medieval English liturgy to the Prayer Book, as advocated in his Parson's Handbook (1899; rev. 1965). He was professor of ecclesiastical art at King's College, London (1919-36), and from 1931 canon of Westminster. His books treated such topics as ecclesiology, topography, and English church history. He edited the Anglo-Catholic English Hymnal (1906, with R. Vaughan Williams* as musical editor; new musical ed. 1933); the modernist Songs of Praise (1925, with Martin Shaw and Vaughan Williams as musical editors; enlarged ed. 1931); Songs of Praise Discussed (1933); and The Oxford Book of Carols (1928). He wrote original hymns and translations, and he bowdlerized older hymns. JOHN S. ANDREWS

DEATH. The Bible implies that man was made to enjoy the present life, not as a final end in itself, but as a transitory stage leading to another life. Man was therefore meant to experience at some stage a transition to a higher life. As a consequence of the Fall, this transition has taken the form of death, and the hope of life beyond has become faint and obscured. Christ came to reverse this sentence, to restore death to its true meaning, and to be the first to ascend to the glory man was originally meant to inherit by his nature. The Bible therefore seeks to understand death both as a natural aspect of man's created life and as a curse laid on man. Thus, though two men are "taken up" (Gen. 5:24; 2 Kings 2:11) and though several references are made to death as if it were a satisfactory climax to life, a "gathering to the fathers," and as a merciful and natural end to life, death is nevertheless more often regarded as a sign of God's wrath and judgment on man as the result of sin, and as a realm of unhappiness to which all men are given over at the end.

Yet there is also in the OT an obvious movement toward a more cheerful and positive view. Death and Sheol are at times regarded as if only limited duration. The earth is not able to cover her slain for ever, and God will raise them. Death cannot separate from the love and fellowship of God.

In the NT there are passages that imply death is part of the original order of creation and of the intrinsic nature of man (John 12:24; 1 Cor. 15:36; 1 Tim. 6:16), and passages that recognize that death can be used positively in the service of God (John 15:13; Phil. 2:17; 2 Tim. 4:6), and as something which brings gain and liberation (Rom. 6:3ff.; 2 Cor. 5:6ff.; Phil. 1:21ff.). Yet it is by the grace of God alone that death can play such a role. As men know it, death is the "last enemy" (1 Cor. 15:26,55). Its intrusion into life is the effect of sin (Rom. 5:12; James 1:15). Its shadow tends to blight all human life (Matt. 4:16), and it needs to be destroyed by Christ (Heb. 2:14f.). The destruction of death by Christ is linked with His conflict and destruction of the powers of evil (Rev. 20:14). He breaks the connection between death and sin, tastes its pangs (Acts 2:24; Heb. 2:9), becomes the firstborn from the dead (Rev. 1:5,18), in order that men might be saved from even experiencing its sting (John 6:49; 8:52; 1 Cor. 15:55f.). The final destruction of death at His second coming is now certain. (See also BURIAL SERVICES.)

The apostles believed that in some cases they had the authority to seek signs of Christ's power in raising the dead. The early church in both East and West proclaimed that Christ had come to give deliverance from death and corruption as well as from sin. Therefore it stressed the saving effect of the union of the incorruptible Word with our mortal flesh in the Incarnation—a theological emphasis Calvin sought to revive.

DEATH OF GOD SCHOOL. The thought of the death of God dates from before the nineteenth century. The German poet, Jean Paul, wrote a "Discourse of the dead Christ from atop the cosmos: there is no God" (Siebenkäs, 1796-97). Hegel's Phenomenology of Mind (1806) spoke of the death of God in Christ, signifying his belief that through him God ceased to be pure, abstract spirit by becoming immanent in the profane. Whereas Hegel* retained the thought of divine immanence, Nietzsche rejected God altogether. For him the death of God meant cessation of belief in God, and hence meant that man is free to be master of his own destiny (The Joyful Wisdom, 1882). In Existentialism and Humanism (1946), Jean-Paul Sartre took as the starting point for existentialism* the remark of Dostoevsky: "If God did not exist, everything would be permitted." Since God does not exist, man is the author of his own existence, creating his own values and making his own decisions unaided. He may not, like some humanists, abandon belief in God and yet try to retain Christian values and morals.

In the 1960s, the thought of the death of God became a rallying cry for certain radical theologians, especially in the USA. It is doubtful, however, whether they could be called a school in view of their sharp differences. In The Death of God (1961) and Wait without Idols (1964), Gabriel Vahanian has attempted to analyze why belief in God has become culturally irrelevant. God dies as soon as He becomes a cultural accessory or a human ideal. Vahanian himself believes in a God who is wholly other, the transcendent God who can never be objectified. In The Secular City (1965), Harvey Cox argued that, in the light of biblical faith, secularization and urbanization are not curses to be escaped but opportunities to be embraced. Through art, social change, and teamwork relationships, the transcendent may eventually reveal a new name, for the word "God" has perhaps outlived its usefulness. We must come to terms with the hiddenness of God, even in Jesus. Nevertheless, Cox believes in a transcendent God.

T.J.J. Altizer's The Gospel of Christian Atheism (1967) rejected divine transcendence in favor of an immanent dialectic based on Hegel, but influenced also by Nietzsche and William Blake. William Hamilton and Paul van Buren both changed from a more orthodox position comparatively late in their careers. At the age of forty, Hamilton began to feel that his grounds for belief in God were giving way, though he still retained a belief in Jesus as the one to whom he may repair. Van Buren, on the other hand, abandoned his Barthian position under the influence of linguistic analysis, feeling the word "God" is no longer meaningful. His Secular Meaning of the Gospel (1963) urged a purely secular restatement of Christianity in which the doctrine of creation expresses an affirmative view of the world, and the mission of the church the practice of the liberty for which it has been set free.

Such views make it difficult to see what advantages they have to offer over atheism and agnosticism. They also raise the question whether the God who is allegedly dead was not a figment of the scholar's imagination all along. Nevertheless, the views of these writers pose the valid question of the basis and content of Christian belief in God and the form in which it is presented.

DECIUS (d.251). Roman emperor from 249. A native of Pannonia, he was proclaimed emperor by the troops after restoring discipline in the Danubian armies. After Emperor Philip had been killed near Verone, Decius was accepted by the Senate in 249 only to be killed two years later in an attempt to defeat the Goths. He was a staunch advocate of the old Roman traditions, and his persecution of Christians proceeded from his belief that the restoration of state cults was essential to the preservation of the empire. The persecution of the church began with the execution of Fabian, bishop of Rome, in January 250, and it led to thousands of deaths. These resulted from Christian disobedience of the imperial order that all citizens should offer sacrifice to the name of the emperor. Those Christians who did sacrifice and later repented caused many problems for the church. PETER TOON

DECLARATIONS OF INDULGENCE. Five English and four Scottish royal declarations may be so called.

England. (1) In 1660 Charles II issued a Declaration on Ecclesiastical Affairs, wherein it was announced that differences of opinion in regard to ceremonies were to be left to the determination of a national synod. Its provisions lasted only briefly, and its principles were not made law by the Convention Parliament.

(2) In 1662 Charles issued what is usually called "the first Declaration of Indulgence," announcing that he intended to ask the Cavalier Parliament to pass a measure to "enable him to exercise with a more universal satisfaction that power of dispensing which he conceived to be inherent in him." No such measure, however, was passed.

(3) In 1672 Charles issued a Declaration of Indulgence for those with tender consciences and suspended the penal laws in ecclesiastical matters against Nonconformists. Both Protestants and Catholics made good use of this indulgence, which remained in force until March 1673.

(4) In 1687 James II issued a Declaration of Indulgence more thoroughgoing than his brother's of 1672. It suspended the Test Act* and all penal laws against Protestant and Catholic Nonconformists.

(5) In 1688 James issued his second Declaration of Indulgence. This repeated the substance of that of 1687 and promised that Parliament should meet by November that year. An order in council required it to be read on two successive Sundays in all parish churches. Seven bishops were imprisoned because of their opposition to it.

Scotland. (1) In 1669 Charles II offered reinstatement to ejected ministers where their parish was still vacant, or alternatively institution to another charge, if they would undertake to be orderly, receive collation, and attend church courts. Lesser inducements were held out to those with reservations but of orderly behavior.

(2) In 1672 opportunity was given Nonconformist ministers to be appointed to parishes in pairs; each was to receive half the stipend; pastoral duty was to be confined to parishioners; preaching was to be in churches only; and ministers could not leave their parishes without the bishop's sanction.

(3) In 1679 "A Proclamation suspending laws against Conventicles" authorized the remission of fines and other disabilities on condition of good behavior; hitherto dissident ministers were offered appointment to parishes, with authority to dispense the sacraments, provided they had had no part in the last rebellion.

(4) In 1687 James VII announced toleration of moderate Presbyterians, with permission to worship in private houses and to hear indulged ministers; to Quakers with licensed meeting houses; and to Roman Catholics, against whom penal laws were abrogated and who were given political equality. DECLARATORY ACTS. Ecclesiastical legislation passed in order to allow two Scottish Presbyterian bodies to modify their attitudes toward the Westminster Confession of Faith.* The United Presbyterian Church* took this course in 1879; the Free Church of Scotland* followed in 1892. In the latter it caused a secession leading to the formation of the Free Presbyterian Church.* In the Church of Scotland,* this form of legislation was considered to be beyond the powers of the general assembly, but in 1910 the same end was achieved with authorization of a new formula by which ministers and office-bearers subscribed the Westminster Confession. While the modifications differed in all three cases, a common motive was the softening of that rigorous Calvinism acceptable to an earlier age. J.D. DOUGLAS

DECRETALS. Papal letters, themselves having the force of law and specifically written to an individual or to a group in answer to a question on some point of canon law. The first such definitely established decretal was from Pope Siricus to Bishop Himerius of Tarragona (A.D. 385), though Damasus (d.384) might have issued one. From the start, popes insisted that decretals had the force of law. Dionysius Exiguus* compiled the earliest influential decretal collection. Various collections were made in the following centuries, but Gratian's Decretum (c.1140) set a new standard in the grouping of the decretals according to the different points of law they dealt with. Though his collection (which included some forgeries) ranged over many centuries, it concentrated on more recent pontificates and this became the accepted trend of subsequent decretal collections. The definitive medieval collections were the Decretals of Gregory IX (1234), Boniface VIII's Liber Sextus (1298), and Clement V's Constitutiones Clementiae. Later John XXII's Extravagantes (1325) and the Extravagantes Communes (c.1500) were added unofficially. DECRETUM GELASIANUM (Decretum de libris recipiendis et non recipiendis). A document purportedly from the pontificate of Gelasius (492-96), although copies exist claiming provenance from the reigns of Damasus (366-84) and Hormisdas (514-23). The five divisions of the text as it stands are: Christ and the Holy Spirit; the books of the biblical canon, including those now placed in the Apocrypha; a statement of the bases of the claims to supremacy of the Roman see; a list of writings from the Fathers and the Councils approved by the Roman Church; and a list of noncanonical biblical and patristic books (from which the Decretum takes its customary title), the first appearance of any Index of Forbidden Books. Many copies of the text omit one or more parts. On the bases of both internal and external evidence compiled by E. von Dobschütz, who edited the published text, the Gelasian origin of the document is generally rejected, as is its claim to be an official document of the Roman see. The opening section and the list of the books of the Bible are attributed to a Roman synod of 382 under Damasus, and the rest of the text to an unknown private person, a native of Italy or Gaul, writing in the sixth century. MARY E. ROGERS

DE DOMINIS, MARCANTONIO (1566-1624). Scholar and controversialist. Born in what is now Rab, Yugoslavia, he became a Jesuit but left in 1596 on appointment as bishop of Segni. He was subsequently archbishop of Spalato (1602) and primate of Dalmatia until 1616. He had also been a professor of mathematics at Padua (propounding a scientific explanation of the rainbow which anticipated Newton) and of rhetoric and logic at Brescia. Involved in the quarrel between the papacy and Venice, he went to England (1616) and was appointed dean of Windsor and master of the Savoy by James I (1617). There, having written De Republica Ecclesiastica, attacking Rome and defending national churches, he attacked the English Church just as violently (Sui reditus ex Anglia consilium). He died in the Castel Sant' Angelo as a relapsed heretic, having been seized by the Inquisition. DE FOUCAULD, CHARLES EUGÈNE (1858-1916). Roman Catholic missionary and ascetic. Born in Strasbourg of a distinguished and devout family, he had a somewhat dissolute army career, but was honored by the Paris Geographical Society for his expeditionary work in North Africa. Impressed by Muslim religiosity, he sought faith under the direction of Abbé Henri Huvelin and gave himself to prayer and asceticism, followed by residence in Trappist* monasteries, in search of increased poverty and self-sacrifice (1890-96). He read theology in Rome (1897), lived thereafter until 1900 with the Poor Clares* at Nazareth, and in 1901 returned to France for ordination. Thereafter he went to the Sahara, established a hermitage at Beni-Abbès, and in 1905 went on to the Ahaggar mountains near Tamanrasset in Algeria. He learned the language and engaged in dictionary and translation work, but gave himself chiefly to prayer and charitable works, winning much native affection. He was murdered in circumstances that remain obscure. Publication of his personal papers led to the founding of Little Brothers of Jesus (1933) and Little Sisters of Jesus (1936). C.G. THORNE, JR.

DEISM. This designates a rationalistic mode of explaining God's relationship to the world which evolved in the late seventeenth and early eighteenth centuries. Following the classical illustration of God as a clock-maker, used by Nicolaus of Oresmes in the fourteenth century, the Deists stated that God gave the world its initial impetus and then left it to run its course. Consequently divine providence, revelation, and a supernatural scheme of salvation were called in question. Samuel Clarke* in his Demonstration of the Being and Attributes of God (1704-6) could distinguish four separate classes of Deists, for there was no single school of thought.

The religious wars and the beginnings of modern science in the seventeenth century created an atmosphere where reasonableness would replace intolerance and authoritarianism. Isaac Newton* had begun to unlock the secrets of the universe and John Locke* those of the human mind. Locke's Reasonableness of Christianity (1695) was a spur to the rationalization of the Christian faith, though he disavowed claims of Deists to be following his lead. As early as 1624 Lord Herbert of Cherbury had taught that all religions had five basic ideas in common and denied the need for revelation. One strand of Deism was not hostile to Christianity, but the tendency was toward a natural religion. In 1696 John Toland* published Christianity not Mysterious, and Matthew Tindal* produced the most competent exposition of this natural religion in Christianity as old as the Creation (1730).

Opposition by the orthodox provoked hostile attacks on Christian "evidences" cited in defense, especially fulfilled prophecy and miracles. Anthony Collins disputed the authority of the Bible; Thomas Woolston* questioned Christ's miracles and resurrection. Several ended in pantheism or atheism. Such attacks called forth a multitude of replies, the most famous being Joseph Butler's* Analogy of Religion (1736). While Deism never won a substantial following in England, it was widely acclaimed on the Continent in Germany and France, where Voltaire* and J.-J. Rousseau* became its chief advocates.

The Deists lacked any historical sense in assessing the biblical revelation. Faith was dethroned and man's rationality viewed with a false optimism. The initial revelation in nature was sufficient.

DEISSMANN, ADOLF (1866-1937). German NT scholar. He taught in Heidelberg (1895-1908) and Berlin (1908-34). In the light of secular Greek inscriptions and papyri, first intensively studied in the late nineteenth century, he showed NT language to be popular rather than classical, and held that the writings, especially the epistles, were unliterary. He gave a picture of primitive Christianity as a "popular cult," growing from mystical personal reaction to Jesus; it was not therefore to be explained in terms of the coherence of the development of "doctrine." For him, Paul was not a theologian but a man of the people responding to the impact of the Damascus road encounter. Deissmann focused scholarly attention on the Pauline concept "in Christ" (1892), by suggesting that Christ and Spirit were interchangeable and by using the analogy of man's being in air, as the air also was in man. Deissmann was both scholar and popularizer. He was deeply concerned for the relation between the church and contemporary culture, and was active in the early ecumenical movement.

DE LA CRUZ, APOLINARIO (Hermano Pule) (1815-1841). Filipino religious leader. Born in Quezon Province, he went to Manila to join a monastic order, but was rejected because he was a native. He worked instead in a religious hospital and studied theology in his free time. In 1840 he returned to Quezon and founded a religious brotherhood for Filipinos called La Confradia de San Jose. The movement grew widely among the masses, but was refused recognition by both ecclesiastical and colonial authorities. Although the movement was banned, meetings continued in secret. De la Cruz went into hiding after government troops were used to break up his meetings. In 1841 he proclaimed war in the name of religious freedom, and took the title "King of the Tagalogs." During a skirmish, a provincial government official was killed. De la Cruz was later captured, executed, and quartered—and the brotherhood was disbanded. He is now honored as "the first martyr to the cause of religious liberty and Filipino priestly equality." RICHARD DOWSETT

DE LAGARDE, PAUL ANTON (1827-1891). German oriental and OT scholar. He studied theology and philology at Berlin and Halle, but rejected the Pietistic faith of his father and teachers and became a lifelong foe of organized religion. He entered into a productive scholarly career in ancient oriental literature, especially the Septuagint, but his unpleasant personality made it difficult to secure a university chair. Even after receiving an appointment at Göttingen in 1869 he remained an unrestrained polemicist. Although his published works were fragmentary, he was regarded by contemporaries as an outstanding orientalist. A fervent nationalist, Lagarde was a leading critic of German society, and he saw a national religion, a Germanic-Christian faith, as the means to effect a spiritual regeneration.

RICHARD V. PIERARD

DELITZSCH, F.J. (1813-1890). Lutheran OT scholar. Born and educated at Leipzig where he taught for some years, he later held chairs at Rostock (1846-50), Erlangen (1850-67), and Leipzig (1867-90). From a pietistic background and of Jewish descent, he sought to combat both the extremes of anti-Semitism and of Zionism, and to aid in the conversion of the Jews to Christianity. To this end he edited a periodical, Saat aut Hoffnung, from 1863; founded a Jewish missionary college; translated the NT into Hebrew (1877); and established at Leipzig an Institutum Judaicum (1886). He published a number of OT commentaries of a conservative character. He examined carefully the critical theories of Wellhausen* and cautiously and without abandoning his concern for evangelical truth came to uphold the different literary strands in the Pentateuch and the dual authorship of Isaiah. During his lifetime his moderately critical views were probably more widely accepted in the English-speaking world than those of Wellhausen himself. He wrote extensively on rabbinical subjects, published with S. Baer an edition of the Hebrew text of most books of the OT, and wrote a few essays on dogmatic theology. But these do not impress, and it is as an exegete that he is chiefly remembered.

DELLA ROBBIA, ANDREA (1435-1528). Nephew and adopted son of Luca della Robbia.* His works are principally in terracotta, and progressively demonstrate a departure from the refined simplicity of his uncle. Although greatly impressed by Luca's training, Andrea yielded to many outside influences, chiefly Verrochio's. His Madonna and Child is in the National Museum of Florence, and his series of medallions with infants (i Puttini), done for the Foundling Hospital in Florence, is one of his best works.

See M. Cruttwell, Luca and Andrea Della Robbia and Their Successors (1902).

DELLA ROBBIA, LUCA (c.1399-1482). Master of sculpture and terracotta (majolica). His works reveal a profound spirit of religiosity. His masterpiece, la Cantoria di S. Maria del Fiore (the singing and dancing boys), is presently in Museo del Duomo in Florence; it took seven years to complete (1831-38). Few Florentine churches of this period are lacking the touch of his deft hand and Gothic flair. The bronze doors of the sacristy of the Florence cathedral took him thirty years to finish and not only illustrate his serene vision of life, but attest that it is not without merit he is called the "most classic" of the 1400s.

ROYAL L. PECK

DE LUGO, JUAN (1583-1660). A founder of modern Scholasticism. Born in Madrid, he studied law at Salamanca until he entered the Jesuits in 1603. After teaching philosophy at Medina del Campo (1611) and theology at Valladolid (1616), he was called to Rome in 1621, where he further enhanced his reputation by important dogmatic and moral works, in addition to becoming a cardinal in 1643. A profound and independent thinker, he was inclined to over-subtlety, but was an important influence on Alphonsus Liguori,* and combined dogmatic and moral theology more satisfactorily than many of his contemporaries.

DE MAISTRE, JOSEPH MARIE (1754-1821). Catholic philosopher, and one of the initial proponents of Ultramontanism.* He experienced the French Revolution as terror and anarchy when the revolutionary armies invaded Savoy (1792). He linked such action to the rationalism of the philosophes, many of whom he knew well. His Lettres d'un royaliste savoisien (1793) first stated the argument which he elaborated in Essai sur le principe générateur des constitutions politiques (1814) and his foremost work Du pape (2 vols., 1819). Society, he affirmed, is dependent on authority to cohere. It is God who establishes authority by divine sovereignty which is then reflected in the sovereignty of the popes, who are infallible in spiritual things, and of monarchs, infallible in temporal things. Divine Providence in history creates the traditions of society which are a revelation of the order necessary to men's existence (cf. TRADITIONALISM). De Maistre's emphasis on faith, rather than rationalism, and on an organic, rather than mechanistic, view of history, found wide acceptance among Catholics in France. He formulated most of his ideas while serving as Savoy's ambassador to Russia (1802-16). After an education in law at Turin, he entered the Savoy civil service (1774), the senate (1788), and was appointed twice as regent (1799, 1817).

DEMETRIUS (d. c.231). Bishop of Alexandria. He is said to have sent Pantaenus, head of the catechetical school at Alexandria, to preach to the Indians, but this is conjectural. He did, however, have a lively interest in the catechetical school, and about 203 appointed Origen as its head. The breach that occurred between Demetrius and Origen, when Origen preached to the congregations of Theoctitus of Caesarea and of Alexander of Aelia Capitolina (Jerusalem) in 216 was reopened in 228 when Alexander and Theoctitus ordained Origen a presbyter. Demetrius brought Origen to trial and deposed him. His attitude toward Origen's ordination may have been prompted by Alexandrian usage, which later explicitly prohibited the ordination of a eunuch, but Eusebius suggests that it was prompted rather by jealousy. There is some evidence that Demetrius changed the system of appointing bishops in Egypt, and that he wrote letters on the keeping of Easter, maintaining the view adopted at Nicea.

DAVID JOHN WILLIAMS

DEMIURGE. from a Greek word denoting a skilled worker, it was in the Platonic system the name for the maker of the world, and so used by Greek Christian writers to refer to God's creative activity. It was, however, taken by the Gnostics to refer to a god who, as creator of the material world, thinks himself to be the Supreme God, but who in reality is incapable of knowing spiritual things. He deceives men by declaring in the Bible that he is the true God.

DEMYTHOLOGIZATION. The English translation of the German entmythologisierung, used originally by R. Bultmann* to describe a particular aspect of his hermeneutic. In 1941 he circulated an essay in duplicated form called Neues Testament und Mythologie. In this he argues that the whole thought-world of the NT is mythological. Previous critics had argued for the presence of myth in the NT, as in the OT. "Myth" was taken to mean the pictorial expression in narrative form of some great philosophical or theological truth. Bultmann's argument was that the "three-decker universe," together with the preexistence, virgin birth, deity, resurrection and ascension, and parousia of Jesus, and also the doctrines of the Trinity, sin, and the atonement, needed to be translated out of the mythical form in which they were cast. He believed that modern man found the kerygma incredible because he was convinced the mythical view of the world was obsolete.

Bultmann also stated that the mythology of the NT contained contradictions. His direct onslaught upon the historicity of the gospel narratives, while having skeptical features similar to those of the older liberalism, was distinct from it in trying still to see a meaning for everything. This meaning was found in terms of existentialist philosophy. Bultmann laid great stress on the kerygma as a proclamation calling men to authentic decision, but this could only be meaningful when it had been demythologized. Many other leading scholars, including K. Barth* and E. Brunner,* have worked in a more moderate way on the same lines.

Bultmann's essay is included in H.W. Bartsch, Kerygma and Myth (ET 1953). R.E. NIXON

DENCK, HANS (c.1495-1527). Anabaptist leader. Born in Heybach, Bavaria, he studied in Ingolstadt. His training was along humanistic lines, and he became acquainted with humanists in Augsburg. He went to Basle, where he became the friend and student of Oecolampadius.* In 1523 he went to Nuremberg to teach at St. Sebald's. There he became involved in the judicial trial of the "three impious painters," Sebald, Barthel Behaim, and George Peng. Here Spiritualism together with the ideas of Thomas Münzer and Andreas Karlstadt influenced him greatly. About October 1525 he was forced to leave Nuremberg, and he became a wanderer throughout S Germany. He spent about a year in Augsburg, where he was rebaptized by Hubmaier; there he also attended the "martyr synod," and there established himself as a leader of the Anabaptists.* In his writings he opposed the doctrines of predestination, the bound will, justification by faith, the sufficiency of Christ's atonement, the authority of the Scriptures, the necessity of baptism and the Lord's Supper, and the ministry. He returned to Basle in 1527, where he succumbed to the plague. CARL S. MEYER

DENMARK. Christianity developed in Denmark from about 735 to 1060, partly through influences from the Anglo-Saxon world, partly through direct Christian mission from the south (see ANSKAR). The baptism of King Harold Blue Tooth about 960 gave impetus to the movement and gave the Christian Church an officially recognized status in the kingdom. The mission period was followed by a great church-building era. Before the end of the twelfth century, about 1,800 parish churches were built throughout the country. In 1104 a Scandinavian archbishopric was established in Lund. Generally, the subsequent history of the medieval church in Denmark advanced along the same lines as in other European countries. Archbishop Eskil of Lund (1137-71), who was inspired by Gregorianism, succeeded in realizing several of his ideas of church policy. At the same time he laid the foundation of a durable and harmonious cooperation of church and crown. There were indeed quarrels between 1231 and 1340, and during the late Middle Ages the church frequently had to endure the interference of king and councils, but in many respects the cooperation between church and state was continued for the good of both.

The Reformation in Denmark (1500-1560), as in other countries, was a complicated process, closely bound up with social and political conditions. The way was prepared by a biblical humanism of the Erasmian type. During the period 1523-36, the preaching of some Lutheran ministers brought about a spiritual revival that finally led to the official accomplishment of the Reformation in 1536 (see ODENSE, DIET OF; TAUSEN, H.; PALLADIUS, P.). During the "Age of Orthodoxy" (1560-1700) nothing but pure Lutheranism was tolerated in the kingdom. About 1660 Denmark became a hereditary and absolute monarchy. In fact the church had no kind of independence, but was simply the institution through which the absolute monarch ruled the religious affairs of his country. Nevertheless, throughout this age of political and religious absolutism, true spiritual life was upheld and nourished by the prevalence of serious biblical preaching and through the reading of devotional works such as J. Brochmand's book of family sermons. This period fostered also Thomas Kingo, one of the Danish Church's greatest hymnwriters.

About 1700 the influence from German Pietism was felt in Denmark; soon the revival developed into two different main streams: a church-pietism, adopted and supported by the clerical authorities and the king; and a conventicle-revivalism, which was decidedly critical of the church and developed separatistic tendencies. The church-pietism was victorious, but died out shortly after the middle of the century. The conventicles were put under the strict control of the clergy by a special decree (Konventikelplakaten) in 1741. After this, only a few small groups survived here and there. More lasting effects of the Pietist revival were achieved through the beginning of a foreign mission in 1705, a number of philanthropic and educational initiatives, and through the hymns of H.A. Brorson, the greatest hymnwriter of the Pietist movement. For some years after 1750 supranaturalism was predominant, but soon it was superseded by various shades of rationalism. During the "Age of Enlightenment and Rationalism" (1750-1800), much energy was spent on useful social reforms. Otherwise it was a period characterized by widespread religious indifferentism and serious spiritual decline.

The first half of the nineteenth century was a period of transition. Gradually the old rationalism was overcome through the influence of men such as N.F.S. Grundtvig,* J.P. Mynster,* and H.L. Martensen,* and through the rising tide of revivalism, originating in the conventicles of pietistically minded laymen. In 1849 the common people's fight for freedom and independence, religiously as well as politically, finally led to the overthrow of the absolute monarchy and the spiritual coercion of the state-church system. The principle of religious liberty and freedom of conscience was legally established in the basic law of the new constitution. From about the middle of the century, many from "the awakened circles" joined the Grundtvigian movement. Others founded the more pietistic Indre Mission.* Smaller groups joined the Lutheran Mission (Bornholmians*) or various free churches. Although he never became the founder of a movement, S. Kierkegaard* exerted a deep and lasting influence.

Twentieth-century church life in Denmark has developed mostly as a continuation along the lines established in the nineteenth century. None of the old movements, however, has escaped the influence of modern trends: liberal theology, Neoorthodoxy, existential and secular theology. The most important influence has been exerted by the Tidehverv (i.e., epochal turning point) movement, started in the late 1920s by a group of theologians inspired by Kierkegaard, the early Karl Barth, Luther, and afterward more profoundly by Bultmann. The post-World War II years have been characterized by religious indifferentism and by moral and spiritual decline, but there have also been some signs of an approaching evangelical renewal and awakening.

So far the great majority of the population maintain membership of the Evangelical Lutheran Church, recognized and supported by the state as the national church. The free churches have not gained much following in Denmark: Roman Catholics number 26,000; Baptists no more than 8,000; Salvation Army 5,500; Methodists 3,500; Pentecostals 4,000; Seventh-Day Adventists 4,000; and Mission Covenanters 2,500.

DENNEY, JAMES (1856-1917). Scottish theologian. Born in Paisley, he graduated in arts with great distinction at Glasgow University, was trained in theology at the Free Church College in that city, and in 1886 became minister of the East Church, Broughty Ferry. During his eleven years there he published commentaries on Thessalonians and Second Corinthians, and Studies in Theology. In 1897 he took the chair of systematic theology at his former college, transferring to the NT department in 1900. He was college principal for the last two years of his life. In 1900 appeared his monumental work on Romans, followed in 1903 by The Death of Christ. He once declared that the only theology he was interested in was the theology that could be preached. He became a leader in his church's courts after his church united with the United Presbyterians in 1900 to form the United Free Church,* and contributed to the distant (1929) union with the national church of Scotland. His other writings include Jesus and the Gospel (1908), his book of sermons The Way Everlasting (1911), and the posthumous Christian Doctrine of Reconciliation. Denney was also a strong protagonist of temperance and civic righteousness.

DE NOBILI, ROBERT (1577-1656). Jesuit missionary to India. Born into a wealthy family at Montepulciano, he became a Jesuit in 1596 despite family opposition. Arriving in India in 1605, he served on the Fisher Coast before going to Madura for thirty-six years. His senior companion aimed to turn converts into Portuguese. De Nobili rejected this and met bitter criticism because he dressed as a sannyasi and lived in the Brahmin quarter, so that he could be met without defilement. He became the first European to have firsthand knowledge of Sanskrit, the Vedas, and Vedanta. His first convert, Sivadarma, was baptized in 1609 and permitted to retain Brahmin insignia. Fellow priests regarded this as a betrayal of Christianity, and he was inhibited from ecclesiastical functions by the local authorities. After a long delay, which de Nobili used to write a number of books in the local vernaculars, Gregory XV upheld de Nobili's appeal in Romanae sedis antistes. Resuming missionary activity, he traveled widely in new areas till 1654, when he was retired to Myalpore and spent his two remaining years revising his books, despite increasing blindness. By the time of his death there were several thousand converts, including some from high castes. His attempt to distinguish between Christianity and its cultural trappings has proved to be of permanent importance in Christian missions.

DE RANCÉ, ARMAND JEAN LE BOUTHILLIER (1626-1700). Founder of the Trappists.* He was presented with lucrative benefices (including the abbacy of Cistercian La Trappe) at an early age, and for over thirty years lived the life of a noble. Ordination in 1651 made little difference, but the death of his close friends the duchess of Montbazon and the duke of Orléans made him much more seriously religious. Renouncing his possessions, he became a Cistercian at Perseigne in 1663 and regular abbot of La Trappe. An unsuccessful series of attempts to gain autonomy for Cistercians of Strict Observance from Cîteaux was followed by a life devoted to the reform of La Trappe, which soon became both admired and criticized for its austerity. In De la sainteté et des devoirs de la vie monastique (1683), de Rancé argued for the strictly penitential nature of monastic life, excluding even study. Taken vigorously to task by Jean Mabillon, he engaged in lively controversy. He resigned in 1695, his health broken by austerity. IAN BREWARD

DESANCTIS, LUIGI (1808-1869). Parish priest in Rome, Protestant pastor, and theologian. Perturbed by the moral and doctrinal corruption of the church, he went through a long spiritual crisis and finally left the Roman Catholic Church, taking refuge in Malta (1847). There he revived the Chiesa evangelica italiana, collaborated in the first Protestant journal, and published Il cattolico cristiano, another of deeper theological content. After a stay in Geneva (1850-52) as evangelist to the Italian exiles, he was ordained pastor in the Waldensian* Church and sent to Turin, where his presence gave a great impulse to the community. Disagreements with the Waldensians caused him to leave them and work for ten years among the free Italian churches, mainly in Liguria and Piedmont. He joined A. Gavazzi,* attracted by his dream of founding a national Italian church, but finally returned to the Waldensians, moving to Florence as pastor and lecturing in their faculty of theology. He was a prolific author, and his Roma papale remains a document of great value for its detailed account of the religious life in Rome at the time of Pope Gregory XVI.

DES BRISAY, THEOPHILUS (1755-1825). First Anglican clergyman on St. John's (Prince Edward) Island, he went there in 1775, and although the only Protestant clergyman there, he received no stipend and so became the chaplain for an army regiment stationed there. After he provided intermittent services for some time, the government set apart £150 for his support, and so he began to provide regular services, although he visited his parish of Charlottetown only on Sundays. A tolerant churchman, he even welcomed the Methodist evangelist William Black during the latter's preaching tour of 1783.

DESCARTES, RENÉ (1596-1650.). French philosopher. Born at La Haye in Touraine, he studied at the Jesuit College of La Flèche (which he came later to regard as a waste of time). After studying law and attempting a military career in Holland, he became absorbed in the idea of extending the "geometrical method" to all branches of learning, thus freeing them from doubt and disorder. After some years in France and Italy, he lived in Holland until 1649. He visited Sweden at the invitation of Queen Christiana, and he died there.

His philosophy must be understood as an attempt to establish absolute certainty by means of an appeal to the "clear and distinct ideas" of human thought. By a process of methodical doubt (made famous by the Discourse of Method and the Meditations), Descartes arrives at an indubitable first principle, cogito ergo sum. By means of a priori arguments, he establishes the existence of God who "secures" the reality of the external world despite the uncertainty of sense perception. Implicit in the methodical doubt is Descartes's dualism—man is essentially a "thinking thing," a spiritual substance, having free will, inhabiting a body, a material substance. Between the two there is a mysterious interaction.

The sort of impact that his views had may be seen in the controversy in the University of Utrecht between the distinguished Reformed theologian Voetius and Leroy of the medical faculty. Descartes was accused by Voetius of atheism and defended himself in a long letter in 1643. But Descartes's influence has been pervasive, in the development of continental rationalism (Spinoza, Leibnitz) and through Locke on the kinds of questions that empiricism has been concerned with. OONAGH MC DONALD

DESCENT INTO HELL. This should more properly be called "the descent into Hades," for the Greek word Hades renders the Hebrew Sheol and means "the place of the departed." This is to be distinguished from the word Gehenna, which refers to "the place of punishment." Peter on the day of Pentecost quotes Psalm 16 and then refers it to Jesus, saying that "he was not abandoned to Hades" (Acts 2:31 RSV), and Paul tells his readers not to ask who will go into the abyss to bring up Christ from the dead (Rom. 10:7). These references are reinforcing NT statements about the reality of the death of Christ and therefore the reality of His resurrection. He shared to the full the human experience of death.

The descent was asserted in some early Arian creeds. It was not in the Old Roman Creed, but reached the Apostles' Creed via the Aquileian Creed of Rufinus about 400. It is not mentioned in the Nicene Creed. As to what Christ did in descending to Hades, beyond sharing human experience, we have the two very difficult passages in 1 Peter 3:18-20; 4:6. The proclamation of Christ's triumph seems to be involved, but there is no clear agreement about the nature of the message or the type of people who heard it.

DES PREZ, JOSQUIN (c.1440-1521). Musical composer. Born in what is now southern Belgium in the twilight of the Middle Ages, Josquin lived to exemplify in his own works almost every aspect of the fully developed musical style of the Renaissance. He served the Sforzas in Milan, worked at Ferrara at two periods of his life, sang for a time in the papal choir, graced the court of Louis XII, and returned a revered artist to end his days at Condé near his birthplace. He was greatly admired by Luther, who mentions him several times. His works were known and performed from Seville to Warsaw. His greatest music is in his motets, of which almost one hundred are preserved, as well as twenty Masses. In his music, the customary four-part texture of soprano, alto, tenor, and bass becomes standard. He also used consistently the imitative contrapuntal texture that became the norm in choral music throughout the sixteenth century and beyond. His music continued to be admired long after his time, and an Italian writer in 1567 places him on an artistic plane with Michelangelo. J.B. MAC MILLAN

DETERMINISM (Lat. de + terminus, "end"). The general philosophical thesis which states that all events are subject to a rigid law of cause and effect. Given any set of conditions, only one outcome is possible. This rules out any concept of free will. There are five basic approaches to determinism:

(1) Ethical: knowledge determines choices. Therefore, if one knows the good, he automatically follows it (cf. Socrates, Plato, Descartes, Aquinas, Leibnitz).

(2) Logical: men's minds are fettered and that nothing can be altered by them. This is equal to fatalism (cf. Stoics).

(3) Theological: the universe and everything in it are absolutely dependent upon God. The absolute goodness of God predisposes some to say that this means all things are good. The omniscience and omnipotence of God leads others to the ideas of foreordination and predestination. God foreknows, purposes, and does everything according to His eternal, changeless, and infallible will. Man without God is determined to sin, and with God he is determined to salvation. The latter statements are indicative of the theology of Luther and Calvin.

(4) Physical: all things in nature (men included) behave according to inviolable and unchanging natural laws. Thomas Hobbes expressed this philosophy.

(5) Psychological: all human behavior is precipitated by causal factors. B.F. Skinner is the best modern exponent of this view.

JOHN P. DEVER

DEVIL. The devil is referred to in the OT sometimes by the name Satan, which originally means "an opponent" (cf. Num. 22:22ff.; 1 Sam. 29:4; 1 Kings 11:25). In Genesis 3, while there is no direct identification made of the serpent and the devil, it is at least implied that what has gone wrong with human life cannot be explained except on the presupposition of the invasion and infection of human life by some malignant power whose hatred of God goes beyond anything of which man is capable on his own initiative (cf. Matt. 13:28). At the climax of the Bible story we see Christ struggling, not simply to reform and repair the evil wills of men and call them back to God, but against some force of titanic proportions whose challenge to what is good demands an agonizing and total response from God Himself (1 John 3:8). Jesus' life is a struggle against one who is mighty (Mark 3:27); the hour of his agony is the climax of this struggle (Luke 22:53). Yet there is no question about his triumph (Luke 10:18). The devil must therefore be regarded as an alien personal force in the universe, which seeks to annihilate what God has created, to bring chaos where there is order, darkness where there is light; which defies God with superb hatred and pride; which manifests itself in human sin, especially in the opposition which Jesus met and overcame in the cross. The intrusion of this power into human life does not absolve man from responsibility. Man's consent to its work rather increases his guilt, yet the powers of evil, even in the temptation of man, are under the control of God.

In the OT the figure of Satan is seldom depicted in such a sinister and powerful role as in the NT, but a development toward such a view can be traced (1 Chron. 21:1; Isa. 14:12-21; Zech. 3:1,2). The NT repeats the doctrine of fallen angels (Jude 6-8), and Christ's words in John 8:44 have to be interpreted in this light. There are OT references to various kinds of demons (Isa. 34:14; Lev. 17:7), who under the decree of God can incite men to folly and sin (Judg. 9:23; 1 Sam. 16:14; 1 Kings 22:22ff.), and it is recognized that those who practice communion with departed spirits are in danger of becoming allied with, and possessed by, a whole world of evil (Lev. 19:31; Deut. 18:10; Exod. 22:18). In apocalyptic literature (e.g., Daniel) there are suggestions of a kingdom of evil, a continuing war in heavenly places, and of satanic powers involved in earthly political movements and conflicts.

The NT recognizes the unity of this kingdom (Mark 3:22-27) under one head (Rev. 12:7,8). Because the devil is doomed and his time is short, he is the more full of anger. Therefore Christians are warned to watch and resist (1 Pet. 5:6-9; 2 Pet. 2:4; Jude 6), recognizing the greatness of his power to possess and trouble men (Luke 22:31f.; Eph. 6:11,12). The NT suggests a connection between idols, witchcraft,* and demons (1 Cor. 10:20; Gal. 5:20; Rev. 9:21).

Theology has tried to do justice to the fact that all creation is basically good. It has stressed the absurd, accidental, and voluntary nature of the fall of the angels. It has been careful to avoid any idea that the devil could be a dualistic counterpart of God—an eternal being involved in an eternal struggle between good and evil. "The devil," said Luther, "is God's devil." Christian piety has always sought to do justice to the fact that all evil is made infinitely serious in its guilt and consequences in the light of the cross of Christ, and that nevertheless all evil has been overcome and exposed in its meaninglessness and futility.

DEVIL'S ADVOCATE (advocatus diaboli). The person appointed by the Roman Catholic Congregation of Rites to contest the claims of a candidate proposed for beatification or canonization before a papal court. Officially called promotor fidei ("promoter of the faith"), he is opposed by God's advocate (advocatus Dei), who supports the proposal.

DE WETTE, WILHELM MARTIN LEBRECHT (1780-1849). German biblical scholar; one of the most influential theologians of the nineteenth century. After studying with J.G. von Herder at Weimar and J.J. Griesbach, J.P. Gabler, and H.E.G. Paulus at Jena, he taught at the universities of Heidelberg (1807-10), Berlin (1810-19), and Basle (1822-49). He wrote many books, including OT and NT introductions (1817, 1826), a monumental work on Christian ethics (1819-23), numerous commentaries and historical works, and a translation of the Bible (with J.C.W. Augusti, 1809-13; reworked and published under his own name in 1831-32). Although he was himself a thoroughgoing nonsupernaturalist, he was a continual critic of the theories of F.C. Baur* and his disciples.

W. WARD GASQUE

DIADOCHUS. Bishop of Photike about the middle of the fifth century. He belonged to the generation immediately after the great Greek fathers Basil and Gregory of Nazianzus, and wrote against the Arians and on the Ascension. But he is best known for his work on Christian perfection, peri gnōseōs pneumatikēs. This comprises a foreword with ten definitions of virtue and one hundred Capita Gnostika, under which he attempts to analyze what it means to be Christlike and how to live such a life. He finds its basis in the three theological virtues, especially love. Diadochus was evidently a man of considerable culture which he combined with a deep faith in Christ. His work on Christian perfection enjoyed great popularity in succeeding generations and is quoted by Maximus the Confessor, in the Doctrina Patrum, and by Photius. It is still of practical value and deserves to be better known than it is.

DAVID JOHN WILLIAMS

DIALECTICAL THEOLOGY. The title used to characterize the theological methodology of Karl Barth,* to distinguish his dogmatic principles from those of the liberal traditions which had reached their climax in F.D.E. Schleiermacher.* The first phase of the Barthian movement was termed the "theology of crisis." It appeared superficially as a "desperation-theology" born out of disillusionment with World War I, and expressing theologically the historical and cultural pessimism given vogue in Spengler's Decline of the West.

The Dialectical Theology was not, however, just an echo of a tragic historical situation. It was concerned rather with the judgment of God, not in a particular concrete situation, but with the Divine "No" to all human efforts, and especially to the religious search for righteousness. Yet the "No" is not God's only and final word, for it is the very occasion for His "Yes." This is the true dialectic: God's "No" finding an answer in His "Yes." God's judgment is, so to speak, the darker side of His grace: the "No" is overcome by the "Yes." The dialectic finds its resolution in God alone, for the "No" of God's judgment cannot be met by a balancing "Yes," having its origin and impetus on man's side. "There is no way from us to God, no via negativa, no via dialectica, no via paradoxa" (Barth). Thus almost paradoxically the dialectical apprehension of God transcends every dialectical method.

Dialectical Theology sought its method and principles in the theology of the Reformation, and especially in John Calvin.* Its general thesis was expounded by, among others, H.E. Brunner* and F. Gogarten.* The influence of Dialectical Theology has been extensive, especially in the Reformed Churches in Europe and in the Church of Scotland. The Church of England and the Free Churches of Britain have also been affected.

DIAMPER, SYNOD OF (1599). An unofficial synod held on the Malabar coast of SW India, uniting the so-called Thomas Christians with the Church of Rome. Allegedly dating back to the missionary work of Thomas the Apostle, these native Christians followed the Syriac liturgy of Addai and Mari.* The Portuguese discovered them in 1498, and for a time they lived in harmony with the Portuguese-sponsored churches. By the end of the sixteenth century, however, their Nestorianism* and their refusal to conform to a Latin liturgy led the Portuguese archbishop of Goa, Alexis de Menezes, to convoke the synod. It rooted out the Nestorian heresy and began the Westernization of the church.

BRIAN G. ARMSTRONG

DIASPORA. A technical term for Jewish communities outside Palestine from about 100 B.C. to A.D. 100; the Greek word thus transliterated means "dispersion." Settlements of Hebrews outside the Holy Land began with the deportations to Assyria and Babylonia in the eighth-to-sixth centuries B.C., and later migrations to Egypt from about 525 B.C. The Jewish communities in Babylon and Alexandria became large and prosperous, and further migration led to the establishment of settlements in major cities throughout the Roman Empire as well as the East. During NT times, it is estimated, Jews represented eight to ten percent of the population of the Roman Empire. Synagogues of the Dispersion served as centers of the early Christian mission. The word occurs three times in the NT: once in the technical sense (John 7:35) and twice as a symbolic description of Christians (James 1:1; 1 Pet. 1:1).

W. WARD GASQUE

DIATESSARON. A Greek musical term, meaning "a harmony of four parts," which was the title given to a harmony of the four gospels composed by the Assyrian Christian Tatian* soon after A.D. 150. This was, so far as is known, the first time such a task was attempted. Tatian spent some time in Rome as a disciple of Justin Martyr before returning to Assyria about 172. He founded a sect called the "Encratites"* who had certain ascetic practices including vegetarianism, so that in the Diatessaron John the Baptist is made to feed not upon locusts but upon milk and honey. The Diatessaron was very popular among Syriac-speaking Christians, but it is not clear whether it was first composed in Syriac. The title is Greek, and F.C. Burkitt even suggested that it might have been composed originally in Latin.

There are no extant MSS of the whole of the Diatessaron, though a fragment in Greek of Joseph of Arimathaea's request for the body of Jesus was discovered in 1933 at a Roman fort at Dura-Europos on the Euphrates. In the fourth century, Ephraem Syrus wrote a commentary on the Diatessaron and an Armenian translation of this was discovered in 1836. A considerable portion of the Syriac original of this came to light in 1957. There are extant in addition two late Arabic MSS of the Diatessaron, a medieval Dutch harmony of the gospels which is dependent upon it, and the Latin Codex Fuldensis which has the order of the Diatessaron, though the text has been assimilated to the Vulgate. The Diatessaron was very popular among Syriac-speaking Christians, and steps had to be taken in the fifth century to abolish its use.

DIBELIUS, MARTIN (1883-1947). German NT scholar and theologian. He taught in Berlin (1910-15) and Heidelberg (1915-47), where he succeeded J. Weiss. When his early interest in Semitic languages and comparative religion gave way to NT studies, he soon made the important transition from problems of literary criticism to concern with oral tradition in the gospels. Thus, along with K.L. Schmidt, H. Gunkel, and R. Bultmann,* he helped to found Form-Criticism.* Die Formgeschichte des Evangeliums (1919; ET, From Tradition to Gospel, 1934) presented his view that the church's preaching was the medium of the transmission of the words of Jesus. The gospels are thus to be regarded as popular rather than "high" literature, and the Evangelists as compilers of traditional material rather than independent authors. Dibelius tended to be more restrained in his judgments than others in the Form-Critical school. Dibelius also did important work on the origin and history of ethical instruction in the NT and the relation of eschatology and ethics. As a leader of the Faith and Order* movement he worked for an adequate theological basis for the ecumenical movement as a whole. HADDON WILLMER

DIBELIUS, OTTO (1880-1967). Bishop of the Berlin-Brandenburg Church. Son of a civil servant, he studied theology at Wittenberg, became a pastor of the Reformed Church, and for some years ministered to what he called "quite unpretentious congregations." He came to prominence in 1933 when he was removed from his post as Lutheran superintendent in Berlin on refusal to recognize the church overseer appointed by Adolf Hitler. In 1934 he was a strong supporter of the Barmen Declaration* that asserted the primacy of Christ and opposed nationalization of the churches. Three times he was arrested by the National Socialist authorities, and though acquitted was forbidden to speak or publish. At the close of World War II he became bishop of a Berlin divided between East and West, a division later symbolized by the notorious Wall, and was instrumental in uniting several Protestant bodies into the German Evangelical Church. He was as fearless in resisting Communist demands as he had been under the Nazis; nevertheless, his resignation in 1961 was not accepted because East and West could not agree on a successor. A staunch supporter of the ecumenical movement, he had attended the 1910 Edinburgh Conference* and later became a president of the World Council of Churches (1954-61). Shortly before his death he participated in the 1966 Berlin World Congress on Evangelism. J.D. DOUGLAS

DICKINSON, JONATHAN (1688-1747). Presbyterian theologian, educator, and revivalist. Born in Hatfield, Massachusetts, he graduated from Yale (1706-7) and became pastor of Elizabethtown Presbyterian Church, New Jersey (1708-47). Said to have been "the most powerful mind in his generation of American divines," he was a reconciling influence in the controversy over subscription to the Westminster Confession,* and authored the 1729 Adopting Act which brought about a compromise. With Francis Makemie, Dickinson led the opposition to Anglican establishment attempts in the middle and southern colonies, stressing in numerous pamphlets "the unalienable rights of mankind" and preparing an increasing revolutionary mood, although his intent was not political but strictly theological. In 1739 the Great Awakening* divided Dissenters; the Presbyterians split in 1741. At first Dickinson kept a mediating position, but seeing that the "Old Side" (antirevivalists) were bent on schism, he abandoned reconciliation efforts in 1741 and joined George Whitefield and Gilbert Tennent's* "New Side," providing theological works to curb excesses and align revivalism with moderate Calvinism. One of the institutional embodiments of the Great Awakening was Dickinson's leadership in founding the College of New Jersey (1746), for men preparing for the New Side ministry. Dickinson served as first president until his death. A prolific and profound theologian, he was regarded as the most efficient champion of Calvinism in the colonies, with the exception of Jonathan Edwards.* KEITH J. HARDMAN

DIDACHE, THE. A Greek handbook of instruction in morals and church order, of which the full title is "The Teaching of the Lord to the Gentiles through the Twelve Apostles." It was first discovered in modern times by Philotheos Bryennios,* Greek metropolitan of Nicomedia, who found it in a library at Constantinople in a manuscript dated 1056 which contained also the epistles of Barnabas and Clement. Its discovery immediately provoked a flood of literature about it, but it has not been possible to give it a precise setting with any confidence. It was probably known to Clement of Alexandria and was considered by Eusebius to be almost a canonical NT book. It was used as a basis for part of the fourth-century *Apostolic Constitutions as well as other "Church Orders." There is a close relationship between the Didache and the Epistle of Barnabas, normally now accounted for by their use of a common source.

Various views about its dating have been put forward, ranging from the idea that it is a first-century document to the suggestion that the author was writing in the third century and consciously archaizing. On the whole, a date in the earlier part of that range seems likely, but it is impossible to pin down either its date or place of origin with certainty.

The first six chapters present a Christian moral code under the headings "The Way of Life" and "The Way of Death." While there are references to the Sermon on the Mount, this section may be dependent upon a Jewish source. Chapters 7-10 deal with baptism, fasting, and the Eucharist.

They specify immersion in the threefold name in running water, but other water and affusion are allowed if this is not possible. Fasting was not to be done "with the hypocrites; for they fast on the second and fifth days of the week, but you must fast on the fourth and on the Preparation." The Eucharistic prayer is strongly eschatological, using the phrase "Let grace come, and let this world pass away" and the Aramaic Marana tha. Chapters 11-15 are largely concerned with the ministry, special emphasis being placed upon prophets as well as bishops and deacons. Tests are given to discover who are false prophets. The final chapter deals with the Second Coming and the end of the world.

DIDASCALIA APOSTOLORUM. A book of church order probably of Syrian origin. Apart from fragments of the original Greek, it has survived complete only in Syriac, partially in Latin. Various oriental adaptations are known, and it was included in the later *Apostolic Constitutions in a revised form. It is to be dated in the third century. It deals with six main topics: (a) standards of the Christian life: the Decalogue binds the Christian, but the ritual commands are a second law (deuterosis) imposed as punishment; (b) the bishop, who is supreme leader and teacher of his church: usually he should be over fifty, husband of one wife, generous and merciful to his flock; presbyters are mentioned only incidentally; (c) widows, evidently numerous and troublesome, who ought to attend to duties of mercy; (d) orphans, who should if possible be adopted by other childless Christians; (e) martyrs and confessors, who should be cared for by the church, and who are upheld by the resurrection hope and the example of Christ; (f) heresy and schism, both Judaizing and Gnostic interpretations. The book is significant for the history of penitential discipline. Apart from canonical Scriptures, widely used, the unknown author uses some apocryphal Christian writings and works of the Apostolic Fathers.

DIDEROT, DENIS (1713-1784). French encyclopedist and key figure of the Enlightenment* philosophy. Born in Langres, son of a master-cutler, he studied in local Jesuit schools and at the College of Louis le Grand, Paris, receiving his master's degree (1732). He married his secretary in 1743. After translating English works, he published a defense of natural religion, Pensées philosophiques (1746). He became editor-in-chief of the Encyclopédie, which monumental enterprise was his chief occupation until its completion in 1772. In 1749 he was imprisoned briefly because of his Lettre sur les aveugles which questioned the existence of purpose in the universe. The encyclopedia was officially suspended in 1759 because of its advanced ideas, but was published clandestinely. He traveled in Russia (1773-74), meeting Catherine the Great, who purchased his library, paying him in advance to provide his daughter's dowry. His closing years were spent in semiretirement in France. Many of his writings were published posthumously.

J.G.G. NORMAN

DIDYMUS THE BLIND (309/314 to 398). Alexandrian theologian. Although blinded at the age of four, he acquired a considerable learning and was appointed by Athanasius head of the catechetical school at Alexandria. His ability was widely acknowledged, and he numbered Antony, Rufinus, Palladius, and Jerome* among his pupils. Jerome was greatly indebted to him, and it is from Jerome we learn most about him. He translated into Latin Didymus's On the Holy Spirit, to which he prefixed a preface referring to the author as having "eyes like the spouse in the Song of Songs," and as "unskilled in speech but not in knowledge, exhibiting in his very speech the character of an apostolic man, as well by luminous thought as by simplicity of words." His extant works are On the Holy Spirit, On the Trinity, and Against the Manichaeans. Some of his comments on the Catholic Epistles survive, and the work Against Arius and Sabellius, usually ascribed to Gregory of Nyssa, may also be his. His extant works show little evidence of Origenism,* nor was he charged with this by Epiphanius or Theophilus. But he was charged with Origenism by Jerome, and may have been also by the Council of Constantinople in 553 which condemned Origen.

DAVID JOHN WILLIAMS

DIETRICH OF NIEHEIM (Niem) (c.1340-1418). Historian and papal lawyer. Papal notary in Avignon, he served in the chancery office of several popes. In 1395 he was appointed bishop of Verden by Boniface IX, but was deprived of the office four years later, having never taken possession of his see. Dietrich wrote tracts to help end the Great Schism* and declared his allegiance to Alexander V and John XXIII, whom he later attacked in tracts and in his history of the Council of Constance. Among his works also are an attack on John Wycliffe, guides for curial administration, a history of the papal chancery from 1380, and a work in which he asserted the plenary power of a general council, including its right to depose a pope.

JAMES TAYLOR

DIGAMY. One of the early manifestations of asceticism in the church was the objection to second marriage as a lower state for the laity (although it was widely conceded, even by Tertullian, to be lawful) and as a forbidden state for the clergy. 1 Timothy 3:2 was often deemed to disqualify a digamist from ordination. Athenagoras opposed digamy on the grounds that the relationship between husband and wife was an eternal one which not even death could annul. Second marriage after the death of a husband or wife was therefore "a specious adultery." Second marriage in Tertullian's view was a concession to "fleshly concupiscence," but his arguments against it tell equally as well against first marriage.

Marriage is permitted, but "what is permitted is not absolutely good." It is better not to marry and not to have the care of children. Tertullian's attitude hardened even more against digamy once he became a Montanist. This attitude was most characteristic of groups such as the Montanists* and Novatianists.* But the imposition of a small penance on digamists is presupposed in the seventh canon of the orthodox council of Neocaesarea in 314, although the Council of Nicea in 325, in providing for the reconciliation of Novatianists, insisted in its eighth canon that those who had married twice should not be excluded from Christian fellowship. The Eastern Church has always been more severe on digamists than the Western Church. But even in the West second marriage was held to be a disqualification for ordination, and this remains so in Roman Catholic canon law to this day. DAVID JOHN WILLIAMS

DIGGERS. English communistic movement. Led by Gerrard Winstanley and William Everard, a group of about twenty men began in 1649-50 to cultivate common land in Surrey, and to plant vegetables to feed the needy. Local gentry and other conservatives incited mobs to harass them; later the government dispersed the group. The Diggers would have been forgotten but for Winstanley's writings which made new followers. Winstanley held that the Civil War had destroyed the claims of landholders and caused the land to revert to a "common treasury" which presumably had existed before the Norman Conquest. Holding land in common would be accompanied by complete social equality, abolition of trade, universal suffrage, education for all, and the arrival of the Millennium. Some have tried to find in the Digger movement an agreement with modern materialistic communists; others have stressed their basic adherence to a millennial interpretation. The weight of evidence suggests that the digging was not the beginning of a worldly revolution, but the outward manifestation of an inner confidence that the time had come for God's intervention in history. ROBERT G. CLOUSE

DILLMANN, CHRISTIAN FRIEDRICH AUGUST (1823-1894). Lutheran biblical scholar and orientalist. Born at Illingen, he studied at Schönthal and Tübingen under Ewald* and Baur.* He became interested in the neglected field of Ethiopic studies, and worked on Ethiopic manuscripts in Paris, London, and Oxford, producing catalogues of the collections at the British Museum and the Bodleian. In 1848 he returned to Tübingen, where he became a professor in 1853. He later held chairs at Kiel (1854), Giessen (1864), and Berlin (1869). He produced a grammar and lexicon of Ethiopic, and editions of Ethiopic texts of the OT. In later life he wrote commentaries on some OT books, one of which (Genesis) was translated into English in 1897. More critical than Delitzsch,* he did not lose the friendship and admiration of that great commentator. Dillmann's Handbook of Old Testament Theology was published posthumously in 1895. IAN SELLERS

DINSMORE, CHARLES ALLEN (1860-1941). Congregational clergyman and scholar. Born in New York City and educated at Dartmouth and Yale Divinity School, he served Congregational pastorates in Connecticut and Massachusetts (1888-1920), then was appointed lecturer on the Bible as literature at Yale Divinity School. He became an authority on Dante and was widely known in the USA and abroad for his scholarly work on the Italian poet. Five of his major works are on Dante. Dinsmore reflects the changing mode regarding biblical studies during the first quarter of the twentieth century, by which the Bible became primarily a piece of religious literature. His major works are The Teachings of Dante (1901); Atonement in Literature and Life (1906); Religious Certitude in an Age of Science (1924); and The English Bible as Literature (1931).
DONALD M. LAKE

DIOCESE. In ecclesiastical usage, the sphere of jurisdiction of a bishop. The word is of secular origin, having been employed to describe an administrative division in the Roman Empire. The pattern was adapted by the Christian Church, with province and dioceses controlled by metropolitan and bishops. In the Western Church, nevertheless, there was a certain flexibility: up to the Middle Ages it was not unknown for a metropolitan to refer to the province as his diocese, and to his own bishopric as his parish. The Eastern Orthodox Church still retains a similar practice, using "diocese" to denote the patriarch's territorial sphere, and "parish" to indicate the area for which a bishop is responsible.
J.D. DOUGLAS

DIOCLETIAN (245-313). Roman emperor 284-305. A Dalmatian of low birth, originally named Diocles, he rose to be commander of Emperor Numerian's bodyguard, and later the Augustus after defeating Numerian's brother, Carinus. In 293 he established his famous tetrarchy. Galerius was his Caesar in the East, while Maximian and Constantius Cholorus were in the West. His genius was as an organizer, and many of his administrative measures lasted for centuries. He believed that the old Roman religion, tradition, and discipline would help to reinforce imperial unity. This policy formed the background to the persecution of Christians undertaken in 303, possibly at the insistence of Galerius. Four edicts were issued before Diocletian's abdication in 305, and they were enforced with varying degrees of severity, most harshly in Palestine and Egypt. The first edict required the destruction of churches and books, the next two were aimed at the clergy, and the fourth included both laity and clergy.
PETER TOON

DIODATI, GIOVANNI (1576-1649). Calvinist theologian. Born in Geneva of an Italian Protestant family, he became professor of Hebrew (1597) and pastor (1608) there before succeeding Beza* as professor of theology (1609), a post he retained until his death. He was Genevese representative at the Synod of Dort.* His Italian translation of the Bible appeared in 1607, a revised edition with notes in 1641. This version, which established his reputation, is still commonly used by Italian Protestants. Highly acclaimed for accuracy and lucidity, it shows his theological interests and tendencies, leading some to suggest that he was more theologian than critic. He produced also a French translation of the Bible in 1644.

J.D. DOUGLAS

DIODORE OF TARSUS (d. before 394). Bishop of Tarsus. After a thorough secular and religious education in his native Antioch and in Athens, he became a Christian monk and a persuasive, influential teacher in Antioch. His two most distinguished disciples were Theodore of Mopsuestia* and John Chrysostom.* In 372 he was banished from Antioch to Armenia by Emperor Valens, but in 378 he became bishop of Tarsus. An opponent of paganism and generally regarded as orthodox, he was nevertheless condemned by a synod at Antioch in 499 as the author of Nestorianism.* This condemnation meant that copies of his writings were doomed to destruction. Some scholars have assigned various extant treatises to him, but only De fato seems sure. Large fragments are also extant in catenae on the Octateuch (Genesis to Ruth) and on Romans. His original writings, however, covered a wide range of topics. He expounded cosmology, defended the Faith against heresies of many kinds, and wrote many commentaries on Scripture. In the latter he followed the historical-grammatical method of exegesis in opposition to the allegorical method of Alexandria.

PETER TOON

DIOGNETUS, EPISTLE TO. An anonymous work, sometimes attributed to Quadratus or Pantaenus. Though written in the late second century, it is never mentioned in antiquity or in the Middle Ages; it was preserved with the works of Justin Martyr in a single manuscript which was burned at Strasbourg in 1870 in the Franco-Prussian War. The epistle invites a certain Diognetus to consider the superiority of Christianity to paganism and Judaism. It seeks to answer three questions: What is the nature of Christian worship and how does it differ from other forms of worship? What is the nature of Christian charity? Why has Christianity appeared so late in human history? While the style is good, the argumentation and apologetic are not very profound. The last two chapters (11 and 12) almost certainly come from a later hand—perhaps that of Hippolytus.

PETER TOON

DIONYSIUS (of Corinth) (c.180). Bishop of Corinth. A man of considerable influence, he was credited by Eusebius with seven epistles to various churches. These are of encouragement and admonition, and include an attack on Marcion, the information that Clement's epistle was read in the Corinthian church, and that Dionysius the Areopagite was the first bishop of Athens.

DIONYSIUS (of Rome) (d. 269). Bishop of Rome from 259. A Greek by birth, he succeeded Xystus. His only surviving doctrinal work is directed against Dionysius of Alexandria, who was under suspicion of Sabellianism.* In a letter to Alexandria he refuted the Sabellian doctrines, emphasizing instead the divine "monarchy." In a separate letter he invited his namesake to explain himself, which he did to Dionysius's satisfaction. Dionysius sent help to the church of Caesarea when that city was invaded by barbarians (perhaps in 264), and in 268 joined with Dionysius of Alexandria and the Council of Antioch in condemning Paul of Samosata.

DIONYSIUS EXIGUUS (d. between 525-544). Writer and chronologer. Called "Exiguus" (the less) because of his humility, he is best known for his early-sixth-century edition of the first influential decretal* collection. It comprised forty-one decretals from Siricius (384-98) to Anastatius II (496-98), and certain conciliar and synodal canons which he translated from the Greek because previous translations were not readily available to the clergy. Only his Apostolic Canons were apocryphal, and he had reservations about them. He also translated into Latin the works of early Greek Fathers, especially those concerning the Nestorian heresy. Dionysius helped to establish the accepted Roman method of dating Easter. Christians dated Easter according to the Jewish Passover (calculated on a lunar calendar, which was shorter than the Julian calendar, which did not always fall on a Sunday). The Council of Nicea established how the date was to be calculated, and Cyril of Alexandria produced a series of tables which Dionysius continued up to 626—with two differences. He worked on a nineteen-year cycle, unlike the existing eighty-four-year cycle, and he took as his base year not 284 when Diocletian became emperor, but the year of Christ's incarnation—in his estimate 755 years after Rome's foundation. Though a few years off, it was the basis of the present Anno Domini system.

DIONYSIUS OF PARIS (d. c.250?). Also known as Denys, patron saint of Paris. Traditionally it has been held that he was one of seven bishops sent to convert Gaul and that later he became bishop of Paris before becoming a martyr at Montmartre (Martyrs' Hill). In 626 his remains were translated to King Dagobert's foundation of St.-Denis, near Paris (the famous Benedictine abbey). Often he has been confused with other men of the same name (e.g., Dionysius the Areopagite).

DIONYSIUS THE AREOPAGITE. A member of the council of the Areopagus, he came to believe during Paul's visit to Athens (Acts 17:34). One early source states he became bishop of Athens, and later writers claim his martyrdom. The tradition that he became bishop of Paris has been rejected.

DIONYSIUS THE CARTHUSIAN (1402/3-1471). Mystic and writer. Born in Ryckel, Belgium, he was educated at Cologne University and joined the Carthusians at Roermond in 1423. From 1465 to 1469 he was in charge of the order at Bois-le-Duc. He wrote commentaries on Scripture, Pseudo-Dionysius (who influenced him greatly), Peter Lombard, Boethius, and John Climacus; produced also twenty-one treatises on the reformation of the church and Christian society, and letters for a crusade against the Turks. He had premonitions of calamities threatening the Christian world. Keen to lead souls to contemplation, he wrote De contemplatione. In the Opuscula he dealt with devout recitation of the Psalms, mortification, inconstancy of heart, and reformation of the inner man. He assisted Nicholas of Cusa* in his reform visitations in the Rhineland (1451-52). Though an eclectic, he was no mere compiler in his writings; Ignatius of Loyola and Francis de Sales read him. Dionysius published also a compendium of Aquinas's Summa. His mystical experiences made him known as "Doctor Ecstaticus." C.G.THORNE, JR.

DIONYSIUS THE GREAT (d. c.264). Bishop of Alexandria. After having been a pupil of Origen, he became head of the famous Alexandrian Catechetical School for about fourteen years. In 247 he was elected bishop of Alexandria. During the Decian persecution he was arrested but managed to escape to the Libyan desert, where he remained until the death of Decius. On his return he was faced with the problem of how to treat those church members who had apostatized. He advocated lenient treatment of them. He also sought to mediate in the heated dispute over heretical baptism between Cyprian and Pope Stephen. In the persecution under Valerian (257-58) he was again banished, but returned to his church in 260. During his last years he was much involved in combating Sabellianism.* Though he wrote much, his writings exist only in fragments, mainly in the extracts preserved by Eusebius, Athanasius, and others. Some of his writings date from his period in the Catechetical School, while others—e.g., his Easter Letters (the earliest Paschal Letters)—come from his period as bishop. Of his theological writings the most important is his letter to Pope Dionysius of Rome on the doctrine of the Godhead, prompted by the Sabellian controversy. In some aspects his theology anticipated that of Arius, but much later Athanasius expressed the opinion that Dionysius had an orthodox doctrine of God. PETER TOON

DIONYSIUS THE PSEUDO-AREOPAGITE. The name identifies an author who probably lived in Syria in the fifth or early sixth century A.D. His writings were originally held in high honor, being initially attributed to Dionysius of Athens. His works made a significant impact on medieval theology. Gregory the Great, Martin I, and the Lateran Council of 649 all approved his writings, and in the Western Church they exerted considerable influence toward mysticism. Hugh of St.-Victor, Albertus Magnus, Thomas Aquinas, and Dionysius the Carthusian all drew inspiration from him. So too did Platonists of the Italian Renaissance, John Colet, Dante, and John Milton, among others.

His extant writings include The Celestial Hierarchy (describing the mediation by angels of God to man), The Divine Names (on the attributes of God), The Ecclesiastical Hierarchy (which describes the sacraments and the three "ways" of spiritual life), and a work on mystical theology which describes the ascent of the soul toward union with God. He wrote also ten letters to monks, priests, and deacons on the points raised in his treatises. His works reveal a knowledge of Plotinus, Proclus, and other Neoplatonists, and considerable familiarity with Scripture and the Apocrypha. His writings attempt a synthesis between Christian truth and Neoplatonist thought. His central emphases are the union between man and God, and the progressive deification of man in which the soul abandons both the perceptions of the senses and the reasoning of the mind. The soul is consequently illuminated and carried ultimately to a knowledge of the ineffable Being. The Pseudo-Areopagite also taught that God is related to the world by a graded series of beings or angels corresponding to the hierarchy of the church (bishops, priests, and deacons). These hierarchies are intended to lead man to deification, a goal which is reached through the purgative, illuminative, and unitive stages.

In the sixteenth century the Reformers and Roman Catholic scholars doubted the authenticity of these writings, a doubt intensified by the development of literary criticism. Comparison of the writings of the Pseudo-Areopagite with those of the Neoplatonists is now held to establish their genuineness and a single, actual author.

DIOSCORUS (d. 454). Patriarch of Alexandria from 444 to 451. The successor of Cyril, he became a leading figure in the Monophysite controversy. In 444 he had accused Theodoret* of Nestorianism, and when Eutyches was accused by Theodoret and others of the opposite error, he came to his aid. With the help of Chrysaphius, Dioscorus persuaded Theodosius II to call a council at Ephesus in 449 which, with Dioscorus presiding, declared Eutyches orthodox and deposed Theodoret and others, including Flavian of Constantinople. Following the death of Theodosius, the new rulers, Pulcheria and Marcian, leaned to the other side. Another synod was held at Constantinople (450) under Flavian's successor, Anatolius. Leo's Tome was read and received with acclamation and many of Dioscorus's victims were rehabilitated. But when a new council was called for Nicea, Dioscorus, supported by ten Egyptian bishops, excommunicated Leo. The site for this council was subsequently changed by Marcian to Chalcedon, where it assembled in 451. Presided over by the four papal legates and with imperial officers acting as secretaries, it deposed Dioscorus and exiled him. Many of the charges brought against him at Chalcedon were prompted by vindictiveness, but probably not all of them. His great ability was perverted by his great power. There is little of what remains of his writings that cannot be interpreted as orthodox. His deposition permanently divided Egyptian Christians. The majority continued to venerate Dioscorus and to repudiate Chalcedon. This remains the position of the Coptic Church* today.
DAVID JOHN WILLIAMS

DIPPEL, JOHANN KONRAD (1673-1734). German Pietist. Born at Frankenstein and educated at Giessen University, he at first sought academic preferment by professing orthodoxy, but was disappointed and removed to Strasbourg where he taught astrology and palmistry and professed Pietism. He then fled from his creditors to the court of Darmstadt, where his Pietism received a better hearing and was deepened into intense conviction under the influence of G. Arnold. There followed the satirical Orthodoxia Orthodoxorum (1697) and the vigorously apologetical Papismus Protestantium Vapulans (1698). For the rest of his life Dippel upheld his controversial form of Pietism, repeatedly enraged the Lutheran authorities, and interfered, usually to his loss, in political affairs. Forbidden to publish in 1702, he fled to Berlin where he dabbled in alchemy and accidentally discovered the Prussian blue. In 1707 he removed to Köstritz and then to Holland, where he took a medical degree (1711). Later he appeared in Denmark and was sentenced to exile on the isle of Bornholm. Freed and expelled in 1726, he went to Sweden and became physician to King Frederick I, but was again expelled and returned to Germany, finding refuge first at Liebenberg and then at Berleberg, where he died, and where his Works (3 vols.) were published in 1747. DISCIPLES OF CHRIST, see CHURCHES OF CHRIST

DISCIPLINE. In the context of church life, this term is used to describe the practical methods and rules by which Christ, through the influence of the whole community, seeks to help each member to be healthy in his own Christian growth and discipleship, and to make his best contribution to the life and witness of the whole body. From the beginning some form of discipline was accepted as an aspect of the Gospel. Christ was regarded as the Master whose teaching and example contained patterns for such discipline (cf. Matt. 11: 29; 28:19).

The most acute problem relating to discipline was ensuring that members whose conduct brought offense to the community were challenged about their behavior and convicted so that they could be restored. Repentance had to be ensured. This problem takes up some space in the NT because the church felt it had definite guidance from Jesus on the matter. The offending brother was to be approached privately, and only if he refused to respond was the matter to be brought before the church. If he then remained impenitent, he was to be excluded from the fellowship in the hope of his ultimate return and repentance (Matt. 18:15-17). The church claimed that Christ had given it the power to exercise such "binding and loosing" of sin in his name (Matt. 18:18-20; John 20:23).

We have some indication in the NT of how moral advice was given and discipline was effected, in early church life. The case of Ananias and Sapphira was exceptional (Acts 5:1-11). Paul gives various instructions (e.g., 1 Cor. 4:21; 5:1-12; 2 Cor. 2:1-11; Titus 3:10ff., etc.). Von Campenhausen points out that discipline in the first and second centuries seems to have had the forgiveness and winning back of the erring, rather than their punishment, as its aim. It was directed toward the individual. It was not regarded as annulling baptism, and was exercised only with purely spiritual authority.

From the fourth century, discipline began to show undesirable features. More concern came to be shown for the sanctity of the congregation as a whole than for the expelled individual. The authority to exercise discipline was taken from the congregation and was regarded as residing in the clergy, and often the monarchical bishop alone. The system of penitence began to be concerned too much with trivial offenses. There was partiality in its exercise. Private confession was made compulsory for all. The church began to enforce its discipline by use of civil power.

The Reformation saw sincere attempts by Luther to deliver men from priestly ecclesiastical tyranny in discipline, and by Calvin to restore in its integrity the discipline of the NT church. Unhappily, in the seventeenth century the pursuit of discipline became in some quarters more important than the pastoral care of the individual. Severity in certain areas of life was exercised at the expense of slackness in other areas. Discipline tended to stifle growth. Today, in reaction, it is asserted that it is impossible and undesirable within pluralistic society to set standards to which church members should conform. Our attitude to such an assertion will be determined by our understanding of the Gospel. Christ, in fulfilling the New Covenant on our behalf, presented to God a definite pattern of response into which He seeks to conform up by the Spirit. The church cannot decide to ignore this pattern. Moreover, while repentance is not a prior condition of forgiveness, it is inseparable from forgiveness, and it produces signs and fruits that man must look for and encourage. RONALD S. WALLACE

DISCIPLINE, BOOKS OF. The doctrine, worship, and government of the Reformed Church of Scotland in 1560 are clearly set out in the Scots Confession, the Book of Common Order, and the First Book of Discipline. They were the work of a committee of six members appointed by Parliament, and John Knox was their acknowledged leader.

The First Book of Discipline aimed at "a total Reformation of Religion in the whole Realm." It provided for the government of the church by kirk sessions, synods, and assemblies. It recognized the office-bearers in the church to be ministers, teachers, elders, deacons, superintendents, and readers. The outlined form of government clearly followed the pattern at Geneva and was influenced by the Ecclesiastical Ordinances of the Reformed Church in France. The most revolutionary of the recommendations were the offices of superintendent and reader. The duties of a superintendent were the supervision of the work of the church in defined areas, and the submission of reports to the general assembly. The appointment of readers was due to the scarcity of trained ministers and the lack of funds to support a pastor in every parish.

The sixteen chapters in the Book of Discipline require the Word to be preached and the sacraments administered in every parish, the abolishing of idolatry, the provision of suitable stipends in money and in kind, the recommendation of a school for every parish, the enforcement of scriptural discipline, and regulations for marriages, funerals, and the repairing of church buildings. Though approved by the general assembly, the Book never received the legal sanction given to the Confession, but it helped considerably in consolidating the work of Reformation in Scotland.

In 1581 the Second Book of Discipline was published. It was virtually a demand for the reversal of the Erastian policies of the Regent Morton. It defined the relationship between church and state, outlined more precisely the functions of office-bearers in the church and the constitution of her courts, and strengthened the position of the ruling elder. Despite a remarkable omission of any reference to the function of the presbytery as a court, even though the importance of this court was recognized by the assembly of 1580, the Second Book of Discipline became the charter of Presbyterianism in the Church of Scotland.

DISPENSATIONALISM. The term "dispensation" occurs in the KJV in 1 Corinthians 9:17; Ephesians 1:10; 3:2; Colossians 1:25. In each case it translates the Greek oikonomia, from which the English "economy" is derived, and so is concerned with administration. Dispensationalism is the view that there is much variety in the divine economy in the Bible, that God has dealt differently with men during different eras of biblical history. A dispensation is "a period of time during which man is tested in respect of obedience to some specific revelation of the will of God," according to C.I. Scofield.*

Some variety exists among dispensationalists, but Scofield's scheme of seven dispensations is widely accepted. These are Innocence (before the Fall), Conscience (from the Fall to Noah), Human Government (from Noah to Abraham), Promise (from Abraham to Moses), Law (from Moses to Christ), Grace (the Church age), the Kingdom (the Millennium). The close of the Millennium ushers in the Eternal State. J.N. Darby* is usually regarded as the founder of Dispensationalism, although some of its elements are found in Augustine. All dispensationalists are necessarily premillenialists, but the reverse is not always the case. Dispensationalism was greatly popularized through the Scofield Bible, and its fullest theological expression is in the works of L.S. Chafer.* An extreme version of it ("Ultra-Dispensationalism") was due to the work of E.W. Bullinger. The term "dispensation" (as the virtual equivalent of "covenant") is often used by those who do not accept Dispensationalism as defined above.

DISRUPTION, THE (1843). The withdrawal of 474 ministers from the Church of Scotland, which brought the Free Church of Scotland* into existence. The Church of Scotland had been debilitated spiritually for about a century by various secessions. The seceders were usually earnest men, deeply concerned about what they felt to be the wrongs of patronage, and the national church could ill afford to lose them. The growth of Moderatism further weakened the spiritual quality of its ministry. The French Revolution, however, seemed to many to be a direct challenge to the complacent rationalism of the Moderates,* and the Calvinism they so much despised seemed much more in touch with reality. Rationalism had never really affected the pew as it had the pulpit. People flocked to the Secession churches, but at the same time the tides of evangelical life and power began to flow more strongly in the state church itself.

The Evangelical party found an outstanding leader in Thomas Chalmers,* and from 1815 (the year of his settlement in Glasgow) it grew rapidly both in numbers and influence. There was a breath of genuine revival in the air. Chalmers had once been a Moderate himself, but now the fire of the gospel of Christ burned in his heart, and he became increasingly aware of the social and ecclesiastical implications of the new faith to which God had brought him. The twin enemies of the Evangelical were Moderatism and patronage, and the matter of state interference in the affairs of the church came more and more to the fore.

The general assembly of 1842, by a large majority, declared that the Church of Scotland must be free to govern itself, and it protested against any attempt by Parliament or the courts to interfere in matters spiritual and ecclesiastical. Parliament rejected this claim of right; thus, as the general assembly of 1843 opened, Chalmers and some two hundred other ministers, mostly Evangelicals, walked out. They and nearly three hundred others founded the Free Church of Scotland, with Chalmers as its first moderator. They claimed to stand for "the confession of faith and standards of the Church of Scotland as heretofore understood." It was one of the most dramatic moments in the history of the Scottish Church. The movement which led to the Disruption was undoubtedly spiritual at its heart, but it was also an expression of the nineteenth-century swing toward greater democracy.

DISSENTING ACADEMIES. After the 1662 Act of Uniformity* some English Nonconformist ministers opened small academies to prepare young men for the ministry. The first to do so was probably Jarvis Bryan of Coventry sometime after 1663. By 1690 some twenty-three academies existed, the most famous being that at Newington Green run by Charles Morton (later of Harvard College). Daniel Defoe was a student at Newington. After the 1689 Toleration Act,* academies grew in number and importance. In the eighteenth century there were large ones in many cities and towns. Their teaching methods and curricula—especially in the new science subjects—were often superior to those of the ancient universities. The campaign against them early in the eighteenth century was led by Henry Sacheverell, who believed they were hotbeds of fanaticism, and reached its climax in the 1714 Schism Act (later repealed by the House of Hanover). Philip Doddridge and Joseph Priestley were among those educated in academies. In the nineteenth century most academies ceased to exist or became theological colleges as the sons of Nonconformists were now able to attend the universities. PETER TOON

DISSOLUTION OF THE MONASTERIES. In the early sixteenth century, one in every 375 people in England was in a religious order. Monasteries were great landowners, and thirty abbots were lords in Parliament. The widespread view that they were wholly corrupt is probably exaggerated. However, the supposed corruption allowed the official case against the monasteries to rest on moral grounds, even though the motive was to gain finance for the Crown. Henry VIII needed money, and Thomas Cromwell* saw in the dissolution a good way to enrich the royal purse. A subsidiary motive of Cromwell was possibly the desire to stamp out the veneration of relics.

The dissolution began when Parliament gave its approval in early 1536 to an Act for the suppression of smaller monasteries. This meant in practice that 243 were actually closed, which was three of every ten religious houses. Many of the dispossessed monks and nuns transferred to larger houses. Despite the violent language of its preamble, this Act of 1536 should not be regarded as the first stage of a carefully planned attack upon English monasticism, but rather as a moderate measure of reorganization to release surplus property for secular use. In the north of England the dissolution provided rebels with a popular cause and rallying cry. The Pilgrimage of Grace* was, however, soon put down. The fact that monks from the larger abbeys had taken part in the rebellion resulted in the establishment of important precedents for surrender and forfeiture when once the government decided later to suppress all the religious orders.

Between 1537 and 1540 the larger abbeys and houses of the friars were gradually taken over through a process of surrender. By March 1540 the religious orders in England were no more. The Act of 1539, sometimes called "the Second Dissolution Act," did not transfer to the Crown the property of any abbeys. Rather, its purpose was to set at rest the doubts concerning the validity of deeds of surrender and to legalize all surrenders that had occurred and would occur.

DISTLER, HUGO (1908-1942). German composer, perhaps the most influential composer of church music in Germany between the two world wars. In 1931 he began a series of musical vespers in Lübeck reminiscent of those of Buxtehude* in the seventeenth century. In Stuttgart he came under the influence of Orff and Hindemith. He strove in his compositions to create functional church music in a contemporary idiom that would carry on the great musical tradition of the Lutheran past. He was honored with professorial rank and made the conductor of the Staats und Domchor in Berlin. He took his own life rather than be conscripted into the Nazi army.

DIVINE, MAJOR J. ("Father Divine") (1865?-1965). Founder of the Peace Mission Movement. Born George Baker into a poor Negro family on Hutchinson's Island, Georgia, he—a former Baptist—was by 1907 claiming to be "God in the sonship degree." He traveled awhile, then settled in New York City. About 1919, as Major J. Divine, he moved to Sayville, Long Island, and later to Harlem. His socioreligious movement grew rapidly in the 1930s and 1940s as he spoke across the country and published his magazine The New Day. As Father Divine, he ran a massive cooperative agency and employment service, providing low-cost meals and lodgings in his "heavens." After a court judgment against him, headquarters were moved to Philadelphia. He equated Americanism, Christianity, and democracy, and imposed an exceedingly strict moral code. The interracial movement regards him as God, has over a million members in several states and foreign countries, and is continued by his white widow and heir, Mother Divine.

ALBERT H. FREUNDT, JR.

DIVINE RIGHT OF KINGS. In the Middle Ages it was widely held that royal authority was divinely ordained, but not the person of the king. The Puritans of both England and New England held that all government was of divine origin and received its just powers from God alone. On the other hand, the divine right theory, as practiced by the Stuarts in seventeenth-century England and by Louis XIV and his successors in France, was founded on the belief that the king possessed an absolute grant of authority from God Himself. The king was, therefore, above the law of the land, but at the same time he was directly responsible to God for the welfare of his people, as a father to his family. Thus disobedience to the king was disobedience to God, and therefore sin. This theory of government virtually disappeared in England after the Revolution of 1688-89.

DIX, DOM GREGORY (1901-1952). Anglican scholar. Born George Eglinton Alston, son of a clergyman, he graduated from Oxford and held a lectureship in modern history there, 1923-26, afterward entering monastic life among the Anglican Benedictines at Nashdom Abbey. He received his final vows in 1940 and became prior in 1948. While well known for his religious broadcasts, his most important contribution lay in his comprehensive study of Christian worship, The Shape of the Liturgy (1945). Earlier, his edition of the Apostolic Tradition of Hippolytus had provided pointers about how in the Roman Church theological thinking is moved to confirm what the worshiping Christian already espouses. Several posthumous publications reflect his thinking even in the midst of terminal illness. The two cautions expressed in Jew and Greek (1953) bear out the essence of his theological thought: "religions pray" and "history happens through men and women, not through abstractions."

DIXON, A(MZI) C(LARENCE) (1854-1925). Baptist pastor and author. Born in North Carolina, he studied at Wake Forest College and Southern Baptist Theological Seminary. Among his many pastorates the most important were at Moody Memorial Church, Chicago (1906-11), and the Metropolitan Tabernacle, London (1911-19). He was active in the conservative Bible conference, prophetic movement and in evangelistic crusades from about 1875. He joined R.A. Torrey* in the publication, beginning in 1909, of *The Fundamentals, a twelve-volume paperback series dedicated to the defense of the fundamental doctrines of the Christian faith. His more important publications include Evangelism Old and New (1905): Destructive Criticism Vs. Christianity (1912); The Birth of Christ: The Incarnation of God (1919); and Higher Critic Myths and Moths (1921).

DOBER, JOHANN LEONHARD (1706-1766). Moravian Brethren* leader. Born in Swabia and a potter by trade, he came to Herrnhut in 1725 where he soon became one of the most significant spiritual figures. In 1732 Dober and David Nitschmann* volunteered to go to St. Thomas, Virgin Islands, as the first Moravian missionaries. Unable to practice his trade there, Dober supported himself by working as a plantation watchman. He tried to evangelize Negro slaves on the island, but his black congregation numbered only four when he left in 1734. Summoned to Herrnhut to become superintending elder, he was replaced by a new group of fourteen missionaries. After 1738 he served for three years as a missionary to Jews in Amsterdam. Dober spent his remaining years in constant travel, visiting the various Moravian congregations in Europe, for which purpose he was consecrated bishop in 1747.

RICHARD V. PIERARD

DOCETISM (Gr. dokein, "to seem," "appear to be"). In the history of Christian theology this is the view that Jesus Christ was not a real man, but simply appeared so. This undermines not only the Incarnation, but also the Atonement and Resurrection. Through Eusebius we know about Cerinthus,* the Docetist opponent of the Apostle John at Ephesus. The presence of such a heresy there probably accounts for the strong emphasis upon the "flesh" of Christ and His "blood" (although this word has sacrificial overtones also) in the Johannine group of writings (e.g., 1 John 4:2; 5:6-8). There was a docetic element in the Gnostic group of heresies, and this accounts for the exceptional emphasis upon the reality of our Lord's humanity in some early Christian writers, beginning with Ignatius.

The origins of Docetism are not biblical, but Hellenistic and oriental, and are due to the idea that matter is essentially evil and to a particular construction of the doctrine of divine impassibility. Alexandria was a melting-pot of Hellenistic and oriental ideas, and the home of some of the greatest Gnostic teachers. It is therefore not surprising to find that there are docetic tendencies even in some of the more "orthodox" Alexandrian Christian writers, such as Clement and Origen. Later christological heresies emanating from the Alexandrian school (such as Apollinarianism, Eutychianism, and Monophysitism) all have something of a docetic flavor. Although modern theology normally takes the humanity of Jesus very seriously (sometimes to the neglect of His deity), those theologians who tend to drive a wedge between faith and history are confronted with the charge of opening the door to a new Docetism.

DOCTORS OF THE CHURCH. A term that came to be applied to eight Early Fathers conspicuous for learning, sound doctrine, and saintliness. These comprised Ambrose, Augustine of Hippo, Gregory the Great, Jerome, John Chrysostom, Basil the Great, Gregory of Nazianzus, and Athanasius. During the past four centuries the Roman Catholic Church has proclaimed twenty-four more "Doctors," beginning with Thomas Aquinas (1567). The most recently proclaimed were Teresa of Avila and Catherine of Siena (both 1970).

DODD, CHARLES HAROLD (1884-1973). British Congregational minister and NT scholar. Educated at Oxford, he taught NT at Mansfield College (1915-30) and lectured also in the university (1927-31). In 1930 he succeeded A.S. Peake as Rylands professor of biblical criticism and exegesis at Manchester, and from there went to Cambridge as Norris-Hulse professor of divinity—the first non-Anglican to hold a chair of divinity there since 1660.

Dodd was the most influential figure in British NT scholarship during the middle decades of the twentieth century. His emphasis on "realized eschatology" in the teaching of Jesus (The Parables of the Kingdom, 1934) and his isolation of an outline of early Christian preaching (kerygma) common to all apostolic writings (The Apostolic Preaching and Its Development, 1935) have proved to be important in the development of contemporary NT theology. In According to the Scriptures (1952) Dodd stressed the unity of approach in the use of the OT in the New, and suggested that the key was Jesus' interpretation of the Old. In his commentary on Romans (1932) and elsewhere he argued that the biblical concept of God's wrath should be understood as an impersonal process of retribution in human history rather than as the divine reaction to the sin of man; similarly, he argued against the concept of "propitiation" as a biblical idea.

After retirement from formal academic teaching in 1940 Dodd wrote more than a dozen books, including two important works on John (1953, 1963), served as the general director of the New English Bible translation, and lectured extensively in various parts of the world.

DODDRIDGE, PHILIP (1702-1751). Nonconformist* divine. Born in London in 1702, Doddridge was educated at Kibworth Academy, was minister of Kibworth (1723-29), began his academy at Market Harborough (1729), and then moved to Northampton (1729-51). Here he accomplished his life-work, training generations of students for the ministry, letting each one decide controverted theological points for himself, encouraging village preaching, and promoting unity among the Nonconformist bodies. Theologically he occupies a curious position. He adhered to the modified Calvinism of Richard Baxter* and was the leader of the "Middle Way" men after the death of Edmund Calamy,* but he also inclined to Sabellianism, though his alleged heresies are probably due to lack of necessary mental equipment to articulate his thoughts clearly. At the same time he was deeply influenced by the warmth of the Methodist revival, and he regarded Dissent as the religion of the common people, not as a political prop for the Hanoverian dynasty. The Rise and Progress of Religion in the Soul may be the last great Puritan spiritual autobiography, but it is shot through with evangelical fervor; so too are his hymns, particularly "Hark the glad sound." To Arians and thoroughgoing Calvinists alike he appeared a trimmer. Most of his students became liberal Presbyterians, though a few embraced an earnest evangelicalism. Doddridge died at Lisbon. DODS, MARCUS (1834-1909). Scottish biblical scholar. Born at Belford, Northumberland, where the elder Marcus Dods was Presbyterian minister, he graduated at Edinburgh and in 1864 became minister of Renfield Free Church, Glasgow, a charge he held until 1889. In that year he was called to the chair of NT criticism in New College, Edinburgh. In 1890 a complaint was brought against him in the general assembly that he had denied the inerrancy of Scripture, but it was dismissed, and a more liberal view in his church was consolidated with the passing of the 1892 Declaratory Act.* In 1907 Dods was appointed principal of his college. His works include commentaries on Genesis (1888) and 1 Corinthians (1889), and The Bible, Its Nature and Origin (1905). J.D. DOUGLAS

DOGMA (Gr. dokein, "to seem"). The word ranged in meaning from "thinking" or "having an opinion" to "appearing best" or "being determined." The noun formation dogma is first found in early fourth-century B.C. writings of Xenophon and Plato, with an application comprehending legal or military decrees or commands, and philosophical or religious tenets or understandings. Patristic citation shows the process over three or four centuries of Christian confrontation with Judaism and with its own deviations, by which the legal weight of commandment was carried into the philosophical dimension, so that dogma came to identify fixed doctrines or the total system of creedal religion. That which had expressed opinion became the determined or right opinion (orthodoxia). Collectively dogma is the intellectual side of the Christian faith. The Nicene church reviewed it historically; the nineteenth century subjected it to critical analysis (cf. F.C. Baur and Adolf Harnack). CLYDE CURRY SMITH

DÖLLINGER, JOHANN JOSEPH IGNAZ VON (1799-1890). Roman Catholic church historian and theologian. Ordained in 1822, he was professor of church history in Munich from 1826. Influenced by both romantic Catholicism's feeling for the past and by developing scientific history, he practiced and encouraged church history as a discipline based on critical study of sources, which involved setting the subject within world history and interpreting it in the light of Catholic truths. Lord Acton studied under Döllinger. A friend of Gladstone* and of Lamennais,* he like the latter blended liberalism in theology and politics (he represented his university in the Frankfurt national assembly, 1848) with an Ultramontanist loyalty to the papacy, expressed clearly as late as 1860 in The First Age of the Church (ET 1866). Nevertheless, from the 1850s his liberalism was eroding his Ultramontanism. He had a growing distaste for the modern institutions of the papacy and Curia, for the Papal States and the influence of the Jesuits. He disliked the decree on Immaculate Conception (1854), wanted the scholastic method replaced by the historical, and saw the Syllabus of Errors as an outright attack on the modern world and some of his own positions.

When Vatican I was announced and it was thought that papal infallibility would be defined, Döllinger immediately wrote adverse newspaper articles, later published as The Pope and the Council (1869-70). He distinguished between the primacy which the papacy had always had by divine appointment, and the papacy which had developed since the ninth century. The evils of the political papal monarchy were devastatingly exposed, but he was probably wrong to fear that the definition of papal infallibility presaged its revival. He was excommunicated when he refused to accept the decree (1871), and shared in the founding of the Old Catholic Church,* taking part in its discussions with Anglicans and Orthodox (1874-75) out of concern for Christian reunion. He defended Anglican ordinations, but became estranged from the Old Catholics when they discarded some traditions (clerical celibacy, auricular confession). There is some doubt whether he died an Old Catholic or an isolated, excommunicate Roman Catholic.

DOM; DON. This shortened form of the Latin dominus, which itself conveyed a range of titular meanings from "Lord" in the abstract to "owner, possessor" in the common—all based on etymological derivation from Indo-European words—was a result of linguistic process among the Romance family of languages. Within general usage it identifies a nobleman; within the church it entitles ordered monks or canons regular.

DOMINIC (1170-1221). Founder of the Order of Preachers, generally known as Dominicans* or Black Friars. Born at Calaruegan in Old Castile, he was educated at the University of Palencia which was later moved to Salamanca. In 1199 he was appointed a canon by the bishop of Osma, who strenuously enforced the Rule of St. Augustine on his canons. Dominic rose quickly to a position of subprior. In 1203 he accompanied his bishop, as chaplain, on a royal embassy to the south of France which had been greatly infected by the Albigensian heresy. Challenged by the need to combat heresy, they obtained papal permission to stay in Languedoc to preach. They went barefoot, practicing great abstinence. In 1206, with the support of Fulk, bishop of Toulouse, Dominic opened a house at Prouille where girls and women might be taught under strict supervision. This was the first Dominican convent.

During the seven years' crusade against the Albigensians,* launched by Innocent III in 1208, Dominic worked with great zeal to bring the heretics back into the church. He felt he must bind his helpers to him to give stability and unity of purpose to his work. At the Fourth Lateran Council in 1215, therefore, Dominic laid before Innocent his scheme for an order of well-educated preaching friars, directly subject to the papacy. Innocent approved, but the council refused. Dominic then placed his sixteen brethren under the Rule of St. Augustine. Their first monastery was built at Toulouse.

In 1216 Honorius III granted a bull legalizing the order. It was to be a mendicant order, devoted to preaching and the conversion of heretics. Dominic met Francis of Assisi* in Rome in 1218. Adept at organization, Dominic traveled tirelessly in Italy, France, and Spain for the rest of his life, establishing and consolidating. The first general chapter of the order was held in Bologna in 1220. In the same year he became ill on his way to preach in Hungary and, returning to Bologna, died there, after encouraging his brethren "to show charity, maintain humility, and accept poverty." He was canonized in 1234. Dominic was a determined leader of men, devout in life, of firm faith, and with a passion for winning souls. His refusal three times to accept a bishopric was typical of his humility and austere self-negation.

DOMINICANS. A preaching order founded in 1216 by Dominic,* a Castilian who became a canon in the diocese of Osma, where the bishop had adopted the Augustinian Rule for his canons. Dominic became head of this community and remained there until 1203. Having spent several unsuccessful years trying to convert the Albigenses, he applied for papal authority to found a new monastic order devoted to defense of the Faith. It was granted on condition that he choose an established Rule. Dominic chose the Augustinian, and the order was officially established by Honorius III in 1216. In order to devote itself to study and preaching, the order abolished manual labor and had its divine office shortened. Easy movement of the preachers was ensured by requiring members to swear allegiance to the order and not to a particular house. At the two chapter meetings at Bologna in 1220-21, the order decided to live by voluntary alms and relinquished ownership of property and fixed incomes. The general chapter assigned authority to a master general chosen for life, and members were required to vow obedience directly to him.

Each house was ruled by a prior chosen by its members and sent its prior together with one elected member to an annual provincial chapter which in turn elected a provincial prior for four years. The provinces sent representatives to the general chapter—the supreme legislative authority—which chose the master general. There is a second and third order attached to the Dominican order. The second order consists of nuns who observe a similar rule to that of the men but who live an enclosed and contemplative life somewhat mitigated later by their undertaking to educate girls. The third order is not enclosed, and a majority of its members live active lives in the world.

Well-organized and having preaching at the center of their activities, the Dominicans were particularly useful to the pope for preaching crusades, collecting monetary levies, and the execution of various diplomatic missions. Their zeal for missionary work led them to seize the opportunities for such activity provided by the Spanish and Portuguese explorations in the West and East. They were interested in establishing their order in the centers of intellectual life such as Rome, Paris, and Bologna. This concern was furthered by Dominic's successors—with the result that by the middle of the thirteenth century each province had its own Dominican university. Many of the leaders of European thought in the Middle Ages were Dominicans. They were innovators in the teaching of languages such as Hebrew, Greek and Arabic among the religious. The order is noted for its impressive literary and scholastic output, the works of Thomas Aquinas and Albertus Magnus being famous examples. True to their role as opponents of heresy, the members have produced outstanding works in apologetics. The activity which detracted from their popularity and aroused the hostility of other orders was their involvement in the work of the Inquisition,* which was often staffed by Dominican members. In addition, the rise of new orders, especially the Jesuits, pushed them into the background, but they remain champions of learning and orthodoxy.

DOMITIAN, TITUS FLAVIUS (A.D. 51-96). Roman emperor from A.D. 81. Son of Vespasian, he succeeded his brother Titus and at first ruled well. After the failure of his campaigns (87) against the Dacians and Marcomanni, however, he became cruel and, among other things, demanded that he be worshiped as Dominus et Deus (Lord and God). Christians and Jews were persecuted for their refusal to give him divine honors. Tradition declares that one who was banished for his faith was the Apostle John, who then wrote the Apocalypse on the island of Patmos as a message to his suffering brethren. Domitian's behavior became so intolerable even to pagans that a conspiracy was formed against him, and he was assassinated.

DOMITILLA FLAVIA (c. A.D. 100). A Christian Roman matron of the imperial family, she was married to Titus Flavius Clemens, a first cousin of the emperor Domitian. Her grandmother and mother were the wife and daughter of the emperor Vespasian. According to some early historians, her husband was also a Christian. Possibly for the confession of Christianity, Clemens was put to death and Domitilla banished to the island of Pandateria. Property of Domitilla on the Via Ardeatina was used from the first century onward as a Christian cemetery, being known as the Coemeterrium Domitillae. Domitian's treatment of Clemens and Domitilla is most striking since he had designated their two sons as his heirs.

DONATION OF CONSTANTINE. A document supposedly written by Constantine giving Rome and the western region of the empire to Pope Sylvester. The pope was said to have cured the emperor of leprosy, and Constantine decided to withdraw to a new city, Constantinople, feeling unworthy to live in the same city as the pope. Although this work was a forgery (probably written in the eighth century), not until the Renaissance did scholars such as Nicholas of Cusa and Lorenzo Valla demonstrate the fact. Valla's arguments, indeed, helped to establish the science of textual criticism. He held that Constantine was not the sort of ruler to give away his empire, and that Sylvester would not have accepted such a gift as he was most concerned with his spiritual office as the shepherd of souls. Through philological and critical reasoning Valla showed that the document could not have been written in the fourth century, as it refers to satraps, the stockings of the Roman senators, and the papal crown. None of these terms or items was in use during Constantine's time. Valla's scholarship was so thorough that even the pope accepted his conclusions.

DONATISM. African separatist church. After Caecilian became bishop of Carthage in 312, objectors alleged that one of his consecrators, Felix of Apthungi, had committed traditio, the "surrender, betrayal," of the Scriptures in the recent Great Persecution. Motivated partly by personal grievances, the opposition—including the Numidian bishops (not all guiltless of traditio), affronted at their primate's exclusion from Caecilian's irregular and precipitate consecration—elected as bishop Majorinus, whose successor was Donatus (313).

When Constantine granted compensation and exemptions only to the Caecilianists, the dissenters appealed to him to arrange adjudication of the dispute. Ecclesiastical and imperial inquiries cleared Felix (and Caecilian), and Constantine, with Catholic connivance, vainly attempted a coerced reunification (317-21). The Donatists rapidly multiplied under the able leadership, unmatched among the Catholics (but cf. Optatus of Milevis), of Donatus (d. c.355), his successor Parmenian (c.355-91/2), and others (cf. the "unorthodox" Tyconius), and enjoyed the ascendancy throughout the fourth century except following the "Macarian persecution" under Emperor Constans (347-48). The effects of this imposed "unity" persisted until Julian removed restrictions and repatriated exiles (361).

Only in the era of Augustine and Aurelius did the Catholics begin to prevail, but not without imperial coercion in the Edict of Unity (405) and the decrees proscribing Donatism after a great confrontation of the two episcopates at Carthage in 411 under Marcellinus, the imperial commissioner. Though repressed, Donatism survived until the Moorish conquests eclipsed African Christianity. Under the Vandals, Catholics and Donatists probably suffered alike. Increasing mutual toleration heralded a resurgence of Donatism in the Byzantine era, especially in Numidia, and perhaps even an ecumenical rapprochement. Gregory the Great* repeatedly rebuked the African bishops' complacency towards the Donatists, but the African Church as a whole had now recovered its traditional independence of Rome.

Donatism professed authentic African beliefs. Its rebaptisms enjoyed Cyprian's authority, and its rigorism, puritan ecclesiology, adulation of martyrdom, and apocalyptic rejection of state and society bore an African stamp as old as Tertullian. Its fundamentally religious inspiration is all-pervasive. It was "nationalist" only in its hostility to the ruling (and often persecuting) power. The embarrassing violence of Circumcellions* and Donatists' support for the revolts of Firmus (372-75) and Gildo (397-98) hardly betoken political motivation, although such excesses, e.g., under Primian, Parmenian's successor at Carthage, provoked splinter groups like the Maximianists. Cultural particularism, such as the fostering of a Libyan (Berber) language, was unimportant as cause or consequence. The stronger concentration of Donatism in the Numidian countryside by the fifth century was largely due to more effective imperial and episcopal repression in the cities, but the movement naturally gathered up economic and social discontents. Donatism provoked in fourth- and fifth-century Catholicism an uncharacteristically African alignment with ecclesiastical and imperial Rome.

DONNE, JOHN (1573-1631). English poet and dean of St. Paul's. Born a Catholic and with Jesuit relatives, he did not go abroad to Douai but went instead to Hart Hall, Oxford, then to Trinity College, Cambridge, and afterward studied law at Lincoln's Inn. He joined the household of Egerton, the lord chancellor, with whose niece, Anne More, he eloped in 1601. Their marriage resulted in Donne's dismissal from Egerton's service and his imprisonment. After failure to secure advancement in other directions, he acceded to the king's desire, took orders in 1615, and became dean of St. Paul's six years later.

Donne is the first and greatest of the group known as the Metaphysical poets. His Songs and Sonnets and Elegies are variations on the theme of love, but they are not the conventional outpourings of the usual Elizabethan love-poet. They are surprising, even outrageous, in the range of experience they treat and the language used to describe it. Whether autobiographical or not, both they and the Divine Poems are marked by an unsurpassed intensity of passion, which issues in most elaborate and original "conceits"—lovers compared to compasses or the body to a map, for example.

Donne abounds in paradox, and the imagery of religion is cited in the love-poems, that of sexual experience in the religious. His religious poetry is permeated by his deep sense of sin and his awareness of judgment. As T.S. Eliot has said, he "was much possessed by death," and some of his most powerful sermons, powerful alike in vision and in argument, vividly illustrate Donne's almost medieval awareness of dissolution: "Ask not for whom the bell tolls; it tolls for thee."

DORNER, ISAAC AUGUST (1809-1884). German Lutheran theologian. Born at Neuhausen ob Eck, son of a pastor, Dorner was educated at Tübingen under Baur, became professor of theology there in 1838, and a year later replied to the Life of Jesus of his rationalist colleague Strauss* in a treatise which was expanded into a multivolume work a few years later and translated into English between 1861 and 1865. He became successively professor at Kiel (1829), Königsberg (1843), Bonn (1847), Göttingen (1853), and Berlin (1862). Deeply influenced by Schleiermacher, Hegel, and Kant, he brought these philosophic insights to the study of doctrine, which he interpreted in a traditional Evangelical and historical sense. Among the most distinguished of German christological scholars whose work is still significant, Dorner was the founder and editor of the Jahrbücher für deutsche Theologie from 1856.

IAN SELLERS

DOROTHEUS (sixth century). Ascetic and writer. Initally influenced by Barsanuphius, he founded a monastery near Gaza in Palestine about 540 and became its archimandrite. For the members of the community he wrote Didaskaliai Psychopheleis, instructions on the life of discipline and asceticism. He made use of earlier collections of rules and added to them his own insights. The later standard edition of the Didaskaliai contains further additions to Dorotheus's original rules. He placed great emphasis on humility, maintaining its supremacy over love and its basic relationship to all other virtues.

DOROTHY (d. c.313). Legendary martyr. The earliest mention of her is in the Hieronymian Martyrology. Her emblem is a laden basket. She is reputed to have been a Christian maiden of Caesarea in Cappadocia who was arrested during Diocletian's persecution of the church. On the eve of her arrest she reconverted to Christianity two apostate women who were sent to pervert her. As she was being led to execution she was mocked by a lawyer named Theophilus, who asked her for a basket of flowers and fruit. Soon afterward a child came to Dorothy with a basket of roses and apples. She sent this to Theophilus, who was converted to the faith and later died as a martyr. Gottfried Keller describes her in Sieben Legenden (1872).

PETER TOON

DORT, SYNOD OF. Held in 1618-19 in the Netherlands town of Dort (Dordrecht), the synod produced the Canons of Dort, one of the doctrinal standards of the Dutch Reformed Church. It affirms the orthodox Calvinist position on predestination and related issues, and was directed against the Remonstrants or Arminians, who wanted a statement which allowed some role for the human will. Arminius died in 1609; in 1610 his followers issued the Remonstrance* against the orthodox insistence on unconditioned predestination; in 1611 a Counter-Remonstrance reiterated the orthodox stand; and bitter controversy flared.

Apart from predestination, other issues became involved: the Remonstrants wanted a tolerant church, but one under state supervision, which the Contra-Remonstrants saw as an attack on the independence of the church. Even worse, political issues became entangled with theological passions. After the assassination of William the Silent (1584), two leaders emerged to carry on the fight against Spain: William's son Maurice, the stadhouder and military leader, and Jan van Oldenbarneveldt, the statesman. By 1609 a truce with Spain was arranged, and the two leaders drifted into disagreement. Maurice favored a strong centralized government to carry on the war of liberation; Oldenbarneveldt, controlling the province of Holland, wanted provincial autonomy and peace. Oldenbarneveldt supported the Remonstrants, and Maurice the Contra-Remonstrants. The political struggle escalated, and when Oldenbarneveldt raised a provincial militia under his control, Maurice sent in the army and arrested him (he was later executed for treason). It was in this situation that Dort convened. Maurice's victory meant, among other things, that the churches elected Contra-Remonstrant delegates; the Remonstrants, who had hoped for Oldenbarneveldt's powerful support, faced a synod packed against them.

Called by the Estates-General, the synod included delegates elected by the synods of the various provinces. Also present as advisers were delegates from Calvinist churches in England and Scotland (James I was strongly anti-Remonstrant), and in the German states; French Calvinists were invited, but were forbidden (by Louis XIII) to attend. The Estates-General chose five theological professors and eighteen commissioners, also to give advice. The regular delegates numbered fifty-six. The synod took the position that it was convened to judge whether the Remonstrant position was in accord with the Calvinist confessions, and cited Episcopius and other Remonstrant leaders to appear before it. Despite Remonstrant protests that the issue was whether the confessions should be revised, synod proceeded. Episcopius denounced the synod as unqualified and unrepresentative, and he refused to cooperate.

Judging the Remonstrants by their writings, then, the synod not surprisingly concluded that they were not orthodox. The Canons were written to summarize the orthodox position against the Remonstrants, and affirmed total depravity (i.e., man, after the Fall, cannot choose to serve God), unconditional election (God's choice of the elect is not conditioned on any action by them), limited atonement (Christ died for the elect only, since those He died for are saved), irresistible grace (divine grace cannot be rejected by the elect), and perseverance of the saints (once elect, always elect). The Canons were adopted as one of the standards of the Dutch Reformed Church.

Remonstrant ministers were ousted from their pulpits, and Remonstrant leaders ousted from the country (by the Estates-General, as disturbers of the peace). The synod ended with a banquet 9 May 1619), celebrating the triumph of Calvinist orthodoxy. Oldenbarneveldt was executed shortly afterward.

DOSITHEOS (1641-1707). Patriarch of Jerusalem. Placed in a monastery at the age of eight and educated at Athens, he entered the service of the patriarch of Jerusalem in 1657. Soon he became archdeacon of Jerusalem (1661) and archbishop of Caesarea (1666). When Nectar Pelopides resigned in 1669, a synod at Constantinople appointed Dositheos in his place as patriarch of Jerusalem. In his new position he showed himself to be a great defender of traditional Greek theology and an opponent of Western theology, both Roman and Protestant. In 1680 he established a printing press at Jassy in order to aid this defense.

He is particularly well known for his presidency of the Synod of Jerusalem in 1672. Its decrees were intended to root out all Protestant influence from the Greek Church. He also sought to reform the monasteries and general administrative structure of the Greek Church; in particular he tried to limit the rights of Western religious orders (e.g., Franciscans) in the Holy Places of Palestine. Further, he tried to extend the influence of the Greek Church into the Russian Orthodox Church when the latter was embroiled in controversy surrounding Patriarch Nikon. While his chief literary work was the posthumous History of the Patriarchs in Jerusalem (2 vols., 1715), he wrote also on many other topics, many of them controversial. Though not an original thinker, he displayed wide erudition and learning. PETER TOON

DOSITHEUS. Founder of a Samaritan sect that exercised influence at Nablus until opposed by the priestly school (according to Bowman). He is dated in the second century B.C. by Josephus, the first century A.D. by Origen and the Clementine Recognitions, and the fourth century A.D. (under "Dusis") in the Samaritan Chronicles 3,6,7). His proto-Gnostic sect in the first century A.D. (Hegesippus) supported his claim to be the Christ foretold by Moses, kept the Sabbath strictly, read his books, and claimed he was still alive (Origen). They practiced circumcision, vegetarianism, and possibly chastity (Epiphanius). Epiphanius thought Dositheus taught resurrection but that Sadducean influence made the sect deny it. From this J. Montgomery argues for two Dositheans sects. Dositheans survived to the twelfth century, according to Arabic sources. G.T.D. ANGEL

DOSTOEVSKY, FYODOR (1821-1881). Russian writer. Born in Moscow, son of a doctor, he was educated as an engineer, but early turned to writing. His first novel, Poor Folk (1846), was highly acclaimed by the critics for its penetrating psychological study of the poor. Shortly thereafter, Dostoevsky became involved with an antigovernment socialist group. For this he was arrested and sentenced to death, but at the public execution he was given a last-minute reprieve. He was forced to spend ten years in Siberia in prison and military service instead. Returning to St. Petersburg in 1859, he began to write again. The House of the Dead (1861) offers a realistic account of his prison experiences. Notes from Underground (1864) is an extraordinary picture of a mentally disturbed and alienated man. For a time Dostoevsky was nearly overwhelmed by gambling debts, emotional tensions, and epileptic seizures. In 1866 he won wide acclaim for his superb novel Crime and Punishment, a tale of deep spiritual insights. For years he wandered over Germany, Switzerland, and Italy, often in abject poverty. The Idiot (1868) and The Possessed (1871) added to his stature as one of the greatest Russian novelists. His masterpiece is The Brothers Karamazov (1880), finished the year before his death. Dostoevsky's profound psychological insights have made him in the twentieth century the most influential and most widely read of the older novelists. His works are novels of ideas in which there is brilliant characterization, tense dramatic situations, and a struggle between good and evil. His Russian orthodoxy is represented by characters who seek salvation through suffering. PAUL M. BECHTEL

DOUAI-REIMS BIBLE. Roman Catholic translation of the Bible into English, so called because it was the production of the English College founded by Roman Catholic refugees in the Elizabethan period at Douai, later removing to Reims, and returning to Douai in 1593. The work was begun in 1578 at the instigation of William Allen,* not to promote Bible reading, but "with the object of healthfully counteracting the corruptions whereby the heretics have so long lamentably deluded almost the whole of our countrymen" (i.e., in the Protestant versions).

The chief translator was Gregory Martin, an Oxford scholar, and his daily stint of two chapters was revised by Allen and Richard Bristow. It was a translation of the Latin Vulgate, because of its antiquity and freedom from discrepancies visible in the Greek manuscripts, and because the Council of Trent defined it as exclusively authentic. Martin, however, did use the Greek text, and also the Protestant versions, notably Coverdale's "Diglott" version (1538). The style of the Douai-Reims was strongly Latinate, and it deliberately retained many technical terms in their original form: e.g., neophyte, Paraclete, sancta sanctorum, archysynagogue. The NT translation appeared in 1582 and was extensively used in the preparation of the KJV. The OT was ready at the same time, but did not appear until 1609-10 because of lack of funds. A revision of the Bible was made by Bishop Richard Challoner in 1749-50 and again in 1763-64, and in 1941 it was revised in accordance with Hebrew and Greek sources, and completely modernized. J.G.G. NORMAN

DOUBLE MONASTERIES. Houses used by nuns and canons of the Order of Sempringham, founded by Gilbert of Sempringham.* On his death in 1189 he left nine double houses. The only common portion was the church in which the nuns and canons could neither see nor hear each other. All other buildings were well apart.

DOUBLE PROCESSION, see PROCESSION OF THE SPIRIT

DOUKHOBORS. A group of so-called spiritual or rationalist Christians which arose in Russia some time before the late eighteenth century, when its members first appear as the objects of persecution. Their name "spirit-wrestlers," originally intended by enemies to suggest strife against the Holy Spirit, was taken by them to designate striving by means of the Spirit. Christian doctrines are interpreted by them as manifested in the nature of man. The Trinity is Light, Life, and Peace, with which each man may be linked by Memory, Understanding, and Will. The story of Jesus symbolizes a spiritual development which anyone may undergo. Death is insignificant since the soul migrates. Advance beyond the revelation through Jesus is possible, and others may be called "son of God." Ritual acts of all kinds are rejected. They are pacifist, agrarian, acknowledge no earthly government, and will not own property. Doukhobors were fiercely persecuted from the start, although their upright life was acknowledged. They were exiled first to Siberia, later to "Milky Waters" in Taurida, and again to Georgia. In each case they came into conflict with the authorities. Under the influence of Tolstoy they refused army service. Tolstoy and English Quakers (who felt some affinity) publicized their plight and arranged emigration to Canada in 1898. There also conflict with authority arose over landownership, and registration of births, deaths, and marriages. In protest, extremist Doukhobors (Sons of Freedom) have resorted to parading naked and to arson and dynamiting. The majority have come to compromise with the authorities, buying their land, in the prairies and British Columbia. Many Doukhobors remaining in the Soviet Union were liquidated in the Stalinist era, but some villages remain in Georgia.

DOWIE, JOHN ALEXANDER (1847-1907). Faith healer and founder of the Christian Catholic Church. Born in Edinburgh and taken to Australia in 1860 by his parents, he was in business in Adelaide for seven years, then studied at Edinburgh University. Ordained as a Congregational minister in 1870, he served as pastor of churches in Alma and Sydney. In 1878 he resigned to become an evangelist and faith healer. By 1888 he had built a large independent tabernacle in Melbourne and organized the International Divine Healing Association. He then organized churches along the American Pacific coast for two years. He moved to Chicago and in 1896 founded the Christian Catholic Church, a theocracy headed by himself as "Elijah III, the Restorer." By 1901 he moved his community to what became Zion, Illinois. As First Apostle after 1904, he ruled the theocratic community strictly and banned pork, alcohol, tobacco, and drugs. Failure in a New York Madison Square Garden campaign and fiscal problems led to his deposition in 1906 by his successor W.G. Voliva, a year after Dowie had been stricken with paralysis. EARLE E. CAIRNS

DOWSING, WILLIAM (1596-1679?). Often described as iconoclast. Born of Yeoman parents in Suffolk, he was appointed by the earl of Manchester in 1643 as an official visitor of East Anglian churches in order to remove papistical ornaments such as images and pictures. He did his work with great relish, keeping careful journals of what he and his colleagues accomplished. Robert Loder printed in 1786 part of the journal which described the work in Suffolk; a transcript of the journals describing work in Cambridgeshire survives in Cambridge University Library, and this was printed in 1928, edited by A.C. Moule. The edition of the Cambridgeshire journal published by Zachary Grey in 1739 seems to have been made from a copy now lost. PETER TOON

DOXOLOGY. From the same root as "dogma," the ancient formation doxa, "that which seemed to one," came by the fourth century B.C. to identify the "reputation" or "fame" of another. The extension to gods or God ("His fame") was made in Septuagint translation and in magical Greek papyri, and from this came in the Greek of the patristic period both verbal and nominal forms associated with the uttering of praise in general (doxologia). More specifically, the Gloria in Excelsis (adapted from Luke 2:14, in the *Apostolic Constitutions) and the Gloria Patria (a Trinitarian liturgical conclusion for Psalms, enlarged with an anti-Arian counter-clause) are called greater and lesser, while in English Reformation circles the Doxology refers to a refrain which closed three hymns by Thomas Ken.

CLYDE CURRY SMITH

DRAMA, CHRISTIAN. It is customary to ascribe the beginnings of postclassical drama to the action of the Mass, and even beyond this the first identifiable dramatist is Hroswitha, the tenth-century nun of Gandersheim in Saxony, whose attempts at comedy owe much to Terence but add strict moral and religious teaching in a manner foreign not only to the Roman writer but even to the dramatic mode itself.

The church relied upon visual means—paintings, stained glass, mime, etc.—to convey its message to illiterate congregations, and gradually there grew the practice of dramatizing the events associated with the major festivals, and especially Easter. In due course these representations outgrew the places where they were performed, and so they moved out of the church and into the churchyard. In addition, the range of representation was extended. The churchyard in its turn proved inadequate, and so a further move was made into the open spaces of the town, while in some places there grew up the practice of playing the several episodes on different carts, which might move from one location to another and thus present the possibility of multiple performance.

The Mysteries or Miracle Plays,* as the several sequences came to be known, covered the whole of biblical history and even included nonbiblical material. They were mounted by the several trade guilds and often performed on the Feast of Corpus Christi, especially after 1311 when the Council of Vienne ordered the strict observance of this feast. It is known that these cycles of plays were given in at least a hundred English towns. Those which survive include, in part or whole, the plays performed at Chester (from the early fourteenth century until at least as late as 1600), York (with forty-eight plays—from 1360 to 1579 and revived over the last twenty years), Wakefield (the so-called Towneley cycle of thirty-two plays), and Coventry. Of these the last is least dramatic. The others, however, contain a variety of effort and achievement ranging from such solemn and moving scenes as the Crucifixion to the farcical of Noah's wife railing at what she considers her half-crazy husband, and the thoroughly English sheep-stealing and concealment of the Second Shepherd's play in the Towneley cycle. The whole shows the capacity of medieval man to regard the sacred and the secular in a coalescence which he did not find either irreverent or inappropriate.

The Morality Plays,* by contrast, tend to be more what they say they are. One of the earliest is The Castell of Perseverance (c.1405), tracing the history of Humanum Genus from birth to judgment, assailed by Mundus, Belyal, and Caro and protected by his Good Angel. This is a prolix and tedious play and does not compare with what is doubtless the greatest example of the genre, Everyman (early sixteenth century), which, though presenting basically the same story, does so with effects of psychological tension quite remarkable for its type and time.

The sixteenth century saw the full flowering of the Renaissance with its stress on humanistic learning at the inevitable expense of the religious. There were plays on sacred themes, such as John Bale's God's Promises (1538) with its strong Calvinistic propagandist intent. Later there was George Peele's David and Bethsabe (c.1594), a play first of high erotic sensuality and then of war, revenge, and retribution. The plot is close to the Bible, but the tone owes much to Ovid and Seneca, those models who inspired the Elizabethans to their equivalents of modern Hollywood spectaculars of blood and lust.

It is not plays like these, but rather one like Marlowe's Faustus (c.1590) which best illustrates the secular and religious tension in Renaissance man. Like others of Marlowe's heroes, Faustus is an overreaching egotist; nothing is beyond man's aim and, with Lucifer's help, his attainment; but with figures such as the Good Angel to balance Mephostophilis there is an inescapable morality element which reaches the joys and agonies of high tragedy first in Faustus's intercourse with Helen of Troy and then in his dying speech, a piece of writing unmatched in English for its evocation of torture, remorse, and final damnation.

Hamlet also presents something of the tension —"What a piece of work is a man!" and

> Imperial Caesar, dead and turn'd to clay > Might stop a hole to keep the wind away—but in general Shakespeare is concerned not with religious, but metaphysical questionings. His most explicit treatment of religious problems and attitudes is in Measure for Measure (c.1602), where questions of law and liberty, charity and chastity, justice and mercy are examined with that fulness and subtlety of which Shakespeare alone is capable.

His great successor in English poetry, John Milton* wrote two dramatic pieces, but neither is actable drama. Comus (1634) is a masque and, like Measure for Measure, much concerned with the demands of chastity and the lure of license, seeking to define the nature of responsible freedom. Samson Agonistes (1671) traces the history of fallen Samson and of his restoration to fulfil God's will, even though it be at the cost of his own destruction. Shaped in the Greek tragic manner, Samson lacks dramatic urgency and tension. Dryden dramatized Paradise Lost in his State of Innocence (1677).

The eighteenth century is the age of the opera and the oratorio, and notably of Handel.* When drama reemerges in the nineteenth century, it is represented biblically by Byron with Cain and Heaven and Earth, but now in the age of Romantic individualism the hero is Cain, puzzled and "Satanic," set against an unjust and capricious God—and yet the end with Cain is full of remorse. It shows, in fact, the contrasting polarities of Byron's own disturbed personality. Like most dramas of its century, Cain is all but unactable. In addition, the nineteenth century by its rigid censorship practically annihilated the possibility of religious drama.

At the end of the period a work like Wilde's Salome (1893) is a deliberate flouting of this rigidity. He wrote it in French, and performance was prohibited in England. Despite continuing restraints, writers like Yeats with his own symbolic Calvary (1920) and Resurrection (1931), presenting a strangely dehumanized Christ, and D.H. Lawrence with David (1926), aiming to bring passion into religion, pursued biblical themes. (Lawrence reverently retells the Resurrection story in The Man Who Died.)

The developing freedom allowed Laurence Housman to present his Old Testament Plays (1950) with their bitter hostility to the biblical accounts. A more orthodox approach is represented by Norman Nicholson's The Old Man of the Mountains (1946), with Elijah and Ahab in modern Cumberland. Its producer was E. Martin Browne, who did much for T.S. Eliot* including Murder in the Cathedral (1935), where the dilemma of self and service is explored unto death in Thomas à Becket. Charles Williams* is a lesser figure, but his Seed of Adam (1936) and Thomas Cranmer of Canterbury (1936) should be mentioned. The latter is a story much like that of Becket, while the former is an attempt to put human history into a single act. Finally there is Dorothy Sayers* with The Man Born to be King (1943), a BBC series of twelve plays, and Christopher Fry's treatment of the mystery of human existence through Moses in The Firstborn (1948) and his psychological reinterpretation of biblical story in A Sleep of Prisoners (1951).

DREXEL(IUS), JEREMIAS (1581-1638). German spiritual writer. Born at Augsburg in 1581 of Lutheran parents, he was converted to Catholicism in his youth and educated by the Jesuits, which order he joined in 1598. He was later professor of humanities at Munich and Augsburg, taught at the Jesuit seminary at Dillinger, and was court preacher to the elector of Bavaria. Between 1620 and 1638 he wrote a series of twenty works, mainly of a devotional nature, which were eagerly read and translated into many languages. Among the most popular were Considerations on Eternity, four separate English translations of which had appeared by 1710 and which discusses man's apprehension of the eternal dimension, and the Heliotropium (1627; ET 1682), on the nature of revelation. IAN SELLERS

DRIVER, SAMUEL ROLLES (1846-1914). OT scholar. Born at Southampton, he was educated at Winchester and Oxford, with which university he was connected all his working life, and where he succeeded E.B. Pusey in the regius chair of Hebrew (1883-1914). Influenced by the critical approach to the OT of German scholars, he did much to publicize their views in his teaching and writings. Apart from many commentaries on OT books, his works include Introduction to the Literature of the Old Testament (9th ed., 1913), Notes on the Hebrew Text and the Topography of the Book of Samuel (2nd ed., 1913), and co-editorship of the Hebrew and English Lexicon of the Old Testament (1906). He was a member of the Old Testament Revision Company (1875-84). J.D. DOUGLAS

DROSTE-VISCHERING, CLEMENT AUGUST VON (1773-1845). Archbishop of Cologne. Ordained to the Roman Catholic priesthood in 1798, he became curate to the chapter of Münster and auxiliary bishop of Münster in 1827. When Von Spiegel died in 1835, he was elected archbishop of Cologne at the suggestion of the Prussian government. Soon he came into conflict with the government by refusing to sanction the teachings of the Bonn professor George Hermes, which had been condemned by Gregory XVI in 1835. When he further refused to approve the Prussian policy on mixed marriages between Protestants and Catholics he was imprisoned by Frederick William III in the fortress of Minden in 1837. J.J. Von Görres* wrote his Athanasius (1838) in defense of Droste-Vischering, and the archbishop was restored to his former honor, but the government of the diocese was left to a coadjutor more favorable to the Crown. Among his writings are Über die Religionsfreiheit der Katholiken (1817) and Über den Frieden der Kirche und der Staaten (1843). WAYNE DETZLER

DRUMMOND, HENRY (1786-1860). Politician, writer, and a founder of the Catholic Apostolic Church.* Educated at Harrow and Oxford, he entered the banking profession, was elected to Parliament (1810), where his vote on major issues was uninfluenced by party considerations, and founded a chair of political economy at Oxford (1825). His individualism was carried into his religious activities. Going to Switzerland, he contended strongly against Socinian tendencies in Genevan Protestantism. In later years (during which time he was again in Parliament) he was closely associated with the origin and spread of the Catholic Apostolic Church. Meetings of those in sympathy with the views of Edward Irving* were held for the study of prophecy at his home in Surrey. He became the new body's "angel" for Scotland. His many writings include Social Duties and Christian Principles (1830), The Fate of Christendom (3rd ed., 1854), and Discourses on the True Definition of the Church (1858).

J.W. MEIKLEJOHN

DRUMMOND, HENRY (1851-1897). Scottish writer and evangelist. Born at Stirling and educated at Edinburgh University, he was persuaded by D.L. Moody* to suspend his theological course and to work with him in evangelistic campaigns during the American's first visit to Britain (1873-75). From 1877 he taught natural science at the Free Church College, Glasgow, and in 1883 published the best seller Natural Law in the Spiritual World. In 1884 he was ordained and became professor of theology in the college. He influenced many generations of students through his evangelistic work, visiting also Australia (1887) and the USA (1890). His lectures at Boston were published as The Ascent of Man (1894). His best-known work was, however, The Greatest Thing in the World, a meditation on 1 Corinthians 13. During the last fourteen years of his life he was involved in controversy about the relation of science and religion, and about the authority of the Bible. He might have been a great scientist had not evangelism been the master passion of his life. He died after two years of crippling illness.

J.W. MEIKLEJOHN

DRYDEN, JOHN (1631-1700). Essayist, playwright, and poet. Born in Northamptonshire and educated at Cambridge, he dominated the English literary scene throughout the latter part of the seventeenth century. Johnson considered him "the father of English criticism," and of his influence on English prose said that "he found it brick and left it marble." His satire vigorously supported Charles II's cause against the Whigs. This typifies the chief strain in his thinking, namely, his profound regard for authority, perhaps a legacy from growing up amid the upheaval and uncertainty of the Civil Wars. This search for authority also governed his poems on religion. Religio Laici (1682) is a defense of rational Anglicanism as a via media between extremes, but it is no surprise in Dryden's progress that he eventually became a Roman Catholic and that The Hind and the Panther (1686) is a satiric allegory in which the milk-white hind of Romanism triumphs over the spotted, Anglican panther. Dryden's is an intellectual rather than a spiritual faith.

See his Poems (ed. J. Kinsley, 1962); and C.E. Ward, John Dryden (1962).

DUALISM. When used of a religion, this word implies the doctrine of two divine powers or principles in opposition within the universe. Such is found in Zoroastrianism and Manichaeism. In the field of philosophy the term describes the existence of two essentially different constituents in the world—e.g., the Cartesian bifurcation of reality into material substance and mental substance. Within Christian theology, Nestorians were accused of dualism because they supposedly taught the doctrine that Jesus was two Persons linked together and not truly one Person. In general the word dualism describes any system of belief or thought which contains two opposing principles.

PETER TOON

DUBOURG, ANNE (1520/21-1559). French Protestant martyr. Born at Riom and trained as a lawyer, he became professor of law at Orleans (1547), received his doctorate (1550), and held important posts at the university. In 1558 he became a member of the Parlement de Paris, but in 1559 fell into disfavor with Henry II because, having become a Protestant, he made a violent attack upon the Roman Catholic Church and advocated reform. Arrested for his bold declaration of his position, he was tried for heresy, but used every legal means of escaping punishment through appeals to different courts. Finally his appeal was rejected, and he was condemned, strangled, and burned. His martyrdom caused widespread horror, particularly among university students, some of whom had been responsible for his conversion.

W.S. REID

DUCHESNE, LOUIS MARIE OLIVIER (1843-1922). French archaeologist and church historian. Born in Saint-Servan, he read theology in Rome and developed archaeological and patristic interests under G.B. de Rossi, with whom he edited the Martyrology of St. Jerome. Ordained priest in 1867, he lectured in schools for six years, then served as a member of the French archaeological school of Rome (1874-76), overseeing work in Epirus, Thessaly, Mt. Athos, and Asia Minor. He was to return to the school as director in 1895, a post he held till his death. Holding the chair of church history at the Institut Catholique in Paris (1877-85), he resigned because of opposition to his views on pre-Nicene doctrine and the founding of the French Church. Member of the French Academy from 1910, Duchesne's publications include Histoire ancienne de l'Église chrétienne (3 vols., 1906-10); studies on Macarius Magnes and Liber Pontificalis; Les Fastes épiscopaux de l'ancienne Gaule (3 vols., 1894-1915); and L'Église au sixième siècle (1925).

C.G. THORNE, JR.

DUFAY, GUILLAUME (c.1400-1474). Netherlandish composer. He was the first of a series of great composers coming from the Low Countries (especially from the duchy of Burgundy) who gave leadership to the development of polyphonic music until well into the sixteenth century. As with most composers of the period, he was a singer and took holy orders. Like many of his compatriots, he was drawn to Italy, where he spent two significant periods of his life and sang for a time in the papal choir. He wrote a highly interesting motet for the consecration of the duomo in Florence, Santa Maria del Fiore in 1436. A large amount of his music survives, much secular as well as sacred. He composed a cycle of three-part settings of the office hymns for the church year, as well as motets and other liturgical pieces.

Although earlier examples are known, Dufay was the first great master of the unified setting of the ordinary of the Mass, employing a preexistent melody (cantus firmus) as the tenor part, repeated in each section as a unifying device. He seems to have begun the custom of often using a secular melody for this purpose. Especially famous is his L'Homme armé Mass, using a secular melody of disputed origin. Almost every composer of Masses employed this melody in at least one work until it was banned by the Council of Trent. Beginning with the generation of Dufay, the polyphonic Mass became the most important major form of composition until the end of the sixteenth century. J.B. MAC MILLAN

DUFF, ALEXANDER (1806-1878). Scottish missionary to India. Born in Perthshire and educated at St. Andrews University, he became in 1830 the first church of Scotland missionary in India (he and his wife were twice shipwrecked en route to Calcutta). Realizing the value of a strong educational policy, he opened an English school in which the Bible was the central textbook, but which offered a variety of subjects to university standard. There was some opposition from both Hindus and fellow missionaries, but he had a powerful ally in the (British) governor general, and the school developed notably. Poor health compelled his return home in 1834, but he had recovered sufficiently to see India again in 1840.

When the Disruption* came in 1843, he like most missionaries left the establishment to form the Free Church of Scotland.* Consequently the Indian property had to be relinquished and the building of a new institution begun. In 1844 Duff helped to found the Calcutta Review, and was from 1845 its editor until he left for Scotland again in 1849. Earlier he had declined an invitation to succeed his old teacher Thomas Chalmers as principal and theology professor at New College, Edinburgh. In 1851 he was moderator of his church's general assembly, and in 1854 he impressed his concern for missions on American and Canadian listeners. Another address, delivered at an Evangelical Alliance gathering in 1855 was, said a friend, "like a trump of doom uttered over the worldliness of existing churches and a call to assembled Christendom to turn from luxury and pomp and to remember the perishing nations." A further spell in India (1856-64) was concerned with the advancement of higher education in the country, and with the foundation of the University of Calcutta. Ill health forced him to leave India, but he labored in the missionary cause until his death. From 1867 he occupied the first chair of evangelical theology at New College, Edinburgh.

DU MOULIN (Molinaeus), PIERRE (1568-1658). French Protestant pastor. Born in France and educated at Sedan, he was sent to England in 1588 and acted as tutor to the duke of Rutland. He studied at Cambridge under William Whitaker. In 1593 he became professor at Leyden, lodging with Scaliger,* and having Grotius* as a pupil. Ordained in 1599, he became pastor in the French Reformed Church at Charenton near Paris. His house was the resort of leading Protestants. On a visit to England he was made D.D. by Cambridge and given a prebend at Canterbury by James I. In the latter part of his life he preached and lectured at Sedan. He wrote many books and treatises, mostly of a controversial nature. PETER TOON

DUNCAN, GEORGE SIMPSON (1884-1965). Scottish biblical scholar, one of the translators of the NT in the New English Bible. Duncan is associated with the theory that all Paul's "imprisonment" epistles were written from Ephesus (cf. his St. Paul's Ephesian Ministry, 1929) and with the view that Galatians is the earliest of Paul's extant letters (cf. his Commentary on Galatians, 1934). After acting as chaplain to Earl Haig (1915-19), he spent his teaching life at the University of St. Andrews where he was professor of biblical criticism (1919-54), principal of St. Mary's College (1940-54), and vice-chancellor (1952-53). In 1920 he was one of the founders of the St. Andrews Summer School of Theology which still provides refresher courses for clergy. In 1949 he was moderator of the general assembly of the Church of Scotland. HENRY R. SEFTON

DUNS SCOTUS, JOHN (1266-1308). Scholastic theologian. Born in Scotland, he entered the Franciscan Order at the age of fifteen and was ordained priest in 1291. After studying at Paris (1293-96) he returned to England to lecture on the Sentences of Peter Lombard* at Oxford. Later he taught at Paris and in 1303 was banished by Philip IV (the Fair) because he supported Pope Boniface VIII. In 1304 he again lectured at Paris, but was transferred to Cologne (1307) where he died. Although venerated as a saint in his order, his cult is not universally recognized in the Roman Church. Duns Scotus's thought is so intricate that he has been given the title "the Subtile Doctor" by Roman Catholics, and Protestant Reformers called anyone whose ideas seemed obscure a "duns," hence "dunce." He wrote commentaries on the Sentences of Lombard, explanations of Aristotle, and explanations of Holy Scripture.

Critical of the philosophy of Thomas Aquinas* which attempted to harmonize Aristotle with Christianity, he argued that faith was a matter of will and could not be supported by logical proofs. This division between philosophy and faith was to have far-reaching effects. Although arguing for the existence of God from efficiency, finality, and the degrees of perfection, he taught that all other knowledge of the divine, including the Resurrection and immortality, must be accepted by sheer belief. Creation he believed was the effect of God's love as He extends His goodness to creatures so that they will love Him freely. Grace is identical with love and has its origin in the will. Because of his idea of the superiority of the will over the intellect, Duns Scotus believed that heaven consists of sharing the love of God. Divine love can best be seen in Jesus Christ who would have come, Duns Scotus taught, even if man had not sinned. Thus the incarnation as the center and end of the universe was not determined by original sin. Although much of Duns Scotus's teaching gained wide recognition among theologians, he is especially remembered for championing belief in the Immaculate Conception. Scholars in the Franciscan school, Scotists, who followed him, moved ever further in the separation of faith and reason, leading to the eventual decline of Scholasticism.* His works were edited by Luke Wadding (12 vols., 1639) and reprinted in Paris (26 vols., 1891-95). Recent studies have demonstrated that some of the writings attributed to him are spurious; thus a new edition of his works is now appearing with the title Opera omnia, studio et Cura Commissionis scotisticae ad fidem cadicum edita (Vatican City, 1950- ).

DUNSTABLE, JOHN (d.1453). English composer. Details of his life are meager. He seems to have gone to the Continent with the duke of Bedford during the Hundred Years' War, and to have spent much of his career there. He was known also as a mathematician and astronomer. Several European authorities of his century testify to his great influence and reputation. About sixty of his works survive, mostly sections of the Mass and motets, and are found chiefly in Italian manuscripts. It was through him that the English richness of triadic harmony was communicated to the early masters of the Renaissance, such as Dufay.*

DUNSTAN (c.909-988). Archbishop of Canterbury from 959. After serving at King Aethelstane's court, he became a monk and then abbot (c.943) at Glastonbury, which he made famous for asceticism and learning. In 959 King Edgar of Mercia and Northumbria became king of all England, and appointed Dunstan to Canterbury. Together the two carried out a complete reform of church and state, continued under Edward the Martyr who succeeded to the throne on Edgar's death in 975. When Edward was murdered three years later, Dunstan's star waned. A versatile man, he is remembered for having revived monastic life in England and for making it an influence in the country's affairs. One of his illuminated manuscripts is in the British Museum.

J.D. DOUGLAS

DUNSTER, HENRY (1609-1659). Congregational minister and educator. Born in Bury, England, he was educated at Cambridge, taught school, and served as curate in his hometown. To escape High Church tyranny he fled to Massachusetts in 1640 and was immediately appointed first president of the newly established Harvard College. His reputation and administration gave Harvard a standing and character which persisted throughout the colonial period. Although poorly paid, he was a benefactor to the college. He lost his position in 1654 for advocating anti-paedobaptist views and refusing to have his child baptized. After public admonition he retired to the pastorate in Scituate, where he labored until his death. His revision of Eliot's Bay Psalm Book was used for many years. ALBERT H. FREUNDT, JR.

DUPANLOUP, FÉLIX ANTOINE PHILIBERT (1802-1878). Bishop of Orléans. Born in Savoy, he was educated in Paris and ordained in 1825. He was curate of the Madeleine Church and later became superior of the minor seminary of St. Nicholas (1837-45). A leading educationist, he favored freedom for Catholic secondary schools and was the chief architect of the Falloux Law (1850) as bishop of Orléans. Amid the major quarrels besetting the church of France—Ultramontanism and modern liberties—he initiated many diocesan charities and inspired his subordinates. With the Italian war he moved to the forefront of the European politico-religious scene, writing brochures defending papal temporal power, but he won disfavor at Vatican Council I.* Elected to the French Academy (1854), French National Assembly (1871), and the Senate (1875), he made his way even among unbelievers in French society, and vigorously promoted women's education. Apart from sermons, speeches, and catechetical pieces, his major works are De l'Education (6 vols., 1850-66) and La Femme studieuse (1869).

C.G. THORNE, JR.

DUPERRON, JACQUES DAVY (1556-1618). Archbishop of Sens. Son of a Reformed pastor who had fled to Bern, Duperron went to Paris in 1573 and was converted to Roman Catholicism by his study of Aquinas and Bellarmine. His considerable gifts soon won Henry III's favor. In 1591 he became bishop of Évreux and played an important role in the conversion of Henry IV and his reconciliation with Rome. Though not an original scholar, he was a formidable controversialist, and humiliated P. Duplessis-Mornay* by demonstrating misuse of patristic texts on the Eucharist. Appointed cardinal in 1604, he used his great diplomatic talents to reconcile Venice to the papacy. Returning to France, he became archbishop of Sens and was an important opponent of Gallicanism, also engaging in theological controversy with James I of England. Duperron's great gifts were given unreservedly to the papacy and the French crown. IAN BREWARD

DUPIN, LOUIS ELLIES (1657-1719). French church historian and theologian, he produced an immense history and criticism of theologians and their writings since the first century. It appeared at Paris in forty-seven volumes (1686-1714) as Nouvelle Bibliothèque des auteurs ecclésiastiques, and was placed on the Index.* He was severely attacked by both Rome and Gallicans, especially

Bossuet,* and variously accused of Jansenist, Gallican, and Romanist doctrines, although he fits precisely into none of these categories. He sought reunion of the Catholic, Greek, and Anglican churches, and wrote a sympathetic Histoire des Juifs (7 vols., 1710). He earned a doctorate in theology at the Sorbonne and was professor at the Royal College. C.T. MC INTIRE

DURANDUS OF ST. POURÇAIN (c.1270-1332). Dominican theologian, and bishop successively of Limoux (the only cleric ever to hold this title) in 1317, Le Puy-en-Velay (1318), and Meaux (1326). Known as the Doctor Modernus and the Doctor Resolutissimus, he lectured at Paris until 1313, when he was called to Avignon and entrusted with a diplomatic mission by Pope John XXII. Though a Dominican at a time when Thomas Aquinas was already recognized as the official doctor of the order, Durandus was not a Thomist but a kind of nominalist, maintaining that the universal comes after the thing and that intellection is a psychological rather than a metaphysical operation. His partiality for nominalist solutions did not prevent his serving on the papal commission which condemned fifty-one propositions taken from William Ockham. Under heavy pressure from his own order for his anti-Thomist ideas, Durandus revised his Commentary on the Sentences (before 1308) twice (1310-12, 1317-27), removing some of his more offensive theses. He never repudiated his position, however, and eleven articles from his treatise De Visione Dei were censured by a papal commission in 1333.

DAVID C. STEINMETZ

DÜRER, ALBRECHT (1471-1528). Painter, engraver, and woodcut designer. Son of a Nuremberg goldsmith, he study-lived across Europe during his formative years. During his forties he worked for Emperor Maximilian I. Late in life he consorted with the rich, cultured literati of the day; he was also a friend of Philip Melanchthon.* Deeply taken by the exacting perspective of Mantegna and the Italian search for perfect body proportion, he strove to mate those concerns with the strange, landscape wildness indigenous to his native Gothic training. In technique this led to an astounding, powerful refinement of the woodcut, because Dürer used the detailed subtleties possible with engraving to modulate rough woodcut simplicity. The unnerving line, monumental complexity, yet classic motifs in this Apocalypse series (c.1497-98) transformed woodcut art in Europe. His most famous engravings also juxtaposed erudite humanist motifs and composed forms with curious, moody grotesqueries. Both Fall of Man (1504) and Melancholia (1514) show the unresolved yet compelling hybrid: studied hieroglyphic elements and Reformation directness bursting with Renaissance energy. Dürer spent years probing theoretically the criterion for artistic action, fussing with the concept of qualitative harmony. While his formulation of such a foundational aesthetic was inconclusive, the muscular soldier-angel figures and massive, severe grandeur in the Four Apostles painting (1523-26) indicate his direction. He consciously chose Luther's side; his art, however, has deep affinity with the piety and Christian humanism of Erasmus.

CALVIN SEERVELD

DURIE, JOHN (1596-1680). Scottish ecumenist who devoted much of his life to "ecclesiastical pacification." Both his father and grandfather were militant Presbyterians who incurred the displeasure of James VI*, and Durie accompanied his father into exile at the age of ten. This early experience of controversy helped to form the peacemaker he became soon after his 1624 settlement as minister of a congregation of English and Scottish Presbyterians at Elbing in West Prussia. When Elbing came under Swedish rule, he petitioned Gustavus Adolphus* "for the obtaining of aid and assistance in this seasonable time to seek for and reestablish an ecclesiastical peace among the Evangelical Churches."

In 1634 Durie accepted ordination in the Church of England hoping that this would give support to his schemes for the union of all Protestant churches. He never seems to have doubted the possibility of its early realization but "was always too ready to mistake his own dreams for solid realities of the near future, whenever he was entertained with kindness and friendly words" (Westin). His journeys all over Europe included a short visit to Scotland where the Aberdeen Doctors* warmly supported him. He tried to mediate in the English Civil War and took part in the Westminster Assembly.* After the Restoration he settled at Cassel where he continued his efforts toward church union.

DUTCH REFORMED CHURCH (Hervormde Kerk). The major Protestant church in the Netherlands, Calvinist in theology, presbyterian in church government, organized during the revolt of the Low Countries against Spanish rule in the sixteenth century. The Lowlands (the Netherlands and Belgium), after partial unification under the Burgundian dukes in the 1400s, passed to Hapsburg rule: Charles V, being Luther's sovereign, reigned also over the Lowlands. Anabaptism and Lutheranism spread during the 1520s and 1530s. Thereafter the dominant version of Protestantism was Calvinism.* Under the Spanish son of Charles, Philip II, the Inquisition* was stepped up, and martyrs soon abounded. The "seventeen provinces" revolted against Philip under the leadership of William of Orange (1568), with the Calvinists playing the role of a militant and influential minority. The Belgic Confession* (1561), with the Heidelberg Catechism,* were accepted generally as standards of the Reformed Church. In the "liberated" areas, Calvinism was the religion favored by the state. The first national synod was held in 1578. As the revolt went on, the N Lowlands gradually drove out the Spanish, while the revolt was slowly crushed in the south, which thus remained Catholic. By 1609, when a Twelve Year Truce recognized for all practical purposes the independence of the north, the Calvinists were free to turn to difficulties within their own ranks.

The controversy on the teachings of Arminius* and his followers, the Remonstrants, ended with the triumph of orthodox Calvinism at the Synod of Dort* (1618-19); the Remonstrants were ousted from the Reformed Church.

During the Dutch "golden age" of the 1600s, when the Netherlands was a major power, the Reformed Church, as the established church, played an important role in Dutch life. Its efforts in theology became increasingly defensive. The effort to preserve the orthodoxy of Dort resulted in controversy on doctrinal detail (notably the confrontation between Voetius* and Cocceius,* which caused a great uproar), as well as protest against overstructuralization (Labadie). By the 1700s the great days of scholastic Calvinism were over. Intellectuals turned to the new ideas of the Enlightenment* rather than to theology, and Deism* made some inroads in the church itself. By the 1780s, as the rhetoric of the "Patriot" movement showed, many regarded it as a bulwark of privilege. The storms of the French Revolution affected the Netherlands as well as the rest of Europe. French troops, greeted by many as liberators, occupied the country (1792). The privileges of the Reformed Church were taken away, and full religious freedom granted. The Napoleonic reorganization of the Revolution resulted in a modification: existing churches were recognized by the state, and supported by it, at the price of submitting to some regulation. After Napoleon's defeat and the end of the Revolution (1815), the Dutch Republic was replaced by a kingdom (which for a while, until 1830, included Belgium). William I retained the Napoleonic approach in matters of religion.

The Reformed Church was by now given to a good deal of tolerance in matters of religious dogma. Partly in reaction to this tolerance, a conservative wing emerged, as the "Awakening" (Réveil)* called for a revival of heartfelt religion; Bilderdijk,* Da Costa,* Groen Van Prinsterer, and others opposed the increasing "modernism" of the church. Some conservatives left the church (1834, the Separation or Afscheiding). The tension between evangelical and modernist helped the efforts of the Groningen School* to bridge the gap by stressing way of life rather than dogma; it controlled most of the theological faculties around midcentury. In the 1880s, the revival of a dogmatic Calvinism (notably by Abraham Kuyper*) produced another and larger exodus of conservatives (1886, the Doleantie; they soon joined with the earlier separatist group to form the Gereformeerde Kerk). The Reformed Church remained as it had been, with evangelical and modernist in the same communion, stressing heritage of three centuries, united in desiring a Christian way of life. It remains today by far the largest Protestant church in the Netherlands, with some three million members.

The Reformed Church spread also wherever the Dutch colonized or emigrated: thus, in the 1600s, to the East Indies, the West Indies, Ceylon, South Africa (see following entry), and New Amsterdam (New York). Mission efforts had some success in the Indies and in South Africa. In North America, the Reformed Church* grew out of the early Dutch settlement; emigration to the USA in the 1800s increased its numbers (and also produced the more conservative Christian Reformed Church*).

DUTCH REFORMED CHURCH IN SOUTH AFRICA. With the first Dutch settlement on the Cape (1652, Jan Van Riebeck), the Reformed Church appeared in South Africa. The Cape Colony grew only slowly; it was primarily a way station on the Dutch East India Company route to the Indies. The company paid the pastors, who were under the jurisdiction of the classis of Amsterdam. During the French Revolution, the cape came under British control. The South African Dutch, the "Boers," moved northward, formed their own independent states (Transvaal, Orange Free State), and organized their own Reformed churches. By 1859 these churches had their own seminary at Stellenbosch. Events in the Netherlands had echoes in South Africa, so that the Separation of 1834 produced similar small conservative breakaways, which in turn started a more orthodox seminary, at Pochefstroom (1869). The Boer War at the turn of the century brought the independent trekker states under British control, and the churches united (1909) in the Reformed Church of South Africa, with the conservative splinter churches remaining separate. Characterized by relative orthodoxy in dogma and adherence to traditional morality, the Reformed Church has had some difficulty in defining its role in relation to the mission churches among the natives. It has viewed the problem as one similar to that of relations between whites and Indians in America, and has supported "apartheid," or the independent cultural growth of the two groups. In practice, apartheid has proved a cloak for white supremacy and has thus come under attack from within the church. Total membership is around 1.4 million, with some 150,000 in mission churches.

DWANE, JAMES MATA (1848-1916). South African independent church leader. Born of heathen parents, he entered the Wesleyan Methodist ministry in 1875 and seceded in 1895 to the independent Ethiopian Church. In 1896 he visited the USA to arrange a union with the African Methodist Episcopal Church; a visiting AME bishop consecrated him vicar-bishop in 1898. This action was disputed in the USA, and Dwane began to resent American Negro control. He was also convinced that his orders were invalid, and requested Anglican ordination for his clergy. In 1900 the Anglican bishops agreed to constitute the Order of Ethiopia within the Church of the Province, and Dwane left the AME with some Xhosa followers. He was ordained deacon in 1900, priested in 1911, and held office as provincial of the order, with one break, till his death.

D.G.L. CRAGG

DWIGHT, TIMOTHY (1752-1817). Congregational theologian and educator. Born in Northampton, Massachusetts, he graduated from Yale and taught for some years before ordination as a Congregational pastor in Fairfield, Connecticut (1783-95). There he became famous as an educator, endeavored to establish an American literary tradition in poetry, and was a recognized leader in Connecticut Congregationalism. The College of New Jersey and Harvard both conferred honorary doctorates on him. From 1795 until his death he was president and professor of divinity at Yale, reforming administration and curriculum and tripling enrollment. A religious revival took place under his preaching, which by 1802 converted a third of the students. His chapel sermons, constituting a moderately Calvinistic or Edwardsean system of theology, were posthumously published as Theology, Explained and Defended (five vols., 1818-19). He was a leading conservative force in New England and exerted powerful influence in the Second Great Awakening.*

ALBERT H. FREUNDT, JR.

DYER, MARY (d.1660). Quaker martyr. Wife of William Dyer of Somerset, with whom she came to Massachusetts in 1635, she sympathized with Anne Hutchinson* and others in the Antinomian controversy. Alienated from their orthodox neighbors, the Dyers left Boston in 1638 and helped to found Portsmouth, Rhode Island. During a stay in England (1650-57) Mrs. Dyer became a Quaker. She was arrested in Boston on her return journey, but was soon released. She was expelled from New Haven in 1658 for preaching Quakerism. She was jailed on each of three trips to Boston in 1659-60 to visit imprisoned Quakers and bear witness to her faith. Twice reprieved when entreaty was made for her, the last time she was hanged when she would not promise never to return.

ALBERT H. FREUNDT, JR.

DYKES, JOHN BACCHUS (1823-1876). English composer. While at Cambridge he studied composition under Walmisley. In 1849 he became precentor of Durham Cathedral, and from 1862 he was vicar of St. Oswald's in Durham. He is important for his hymntunes, a large number of which became extremely popular, especially through their inclusion in the influential Hymns, Ancient and Modern. His "Nicaea" for "Holy, holy, Lord God Almighty" and "Lux benigna" for "Lead, Kindly Light" are examples of the many tunes that enjoyed unsurpassed popularity. His style found numerous imitators, and while he has been much criticized, he possessed a remarkable gift for memorable and readily singable melody.

J.B. MAC MILLAN

DYOPHYSITES. In patristic literature diphysites was used by Monophysites* like Timothy Aelurus of Alexandria to describe adherents of the Chalcedonian definitio. The description lampooned the clause "in two natures" for contradicting the Monophysite understanding of the oneness of Christ after the union of the Word and man. Modern writers have used "dyophysite" either in the patristic sense (e.g., Dorner) or to denote the Antiochene tradition of two natures in Christ (e.g., Loofs).

DYOTHELETES. The Greek translates as "two-willers" and signifies those who hold the view that Christ had two wills, a divine and a human. The opposite doctrine was held by the Monothelites.*

EADIE, JOHN (1810-1872). Scottish Secession and United Presbyterian Church minister and NT scholar. Born in Alva, Clackmannanshire (where today one of the two parish churches bears his name), he was the son of an elderly Relief Kirk father and a youthful but pious Antiburgher mother. In 1843 he was appointed professor of biblical literature in the United Presbyterian Divinity Hall; in 1857 he was moderator of his church's general assembly. His Analytical Concordance, Family Bible, and Biblical Cyclopaedia proved very popular, and his widely acclaimed commentaries on several of the Pauline epistles helped to secure for him a place as one of the New Testament Committee engaged in preparing the Revised Version of the Bible in English (1870).

D.P. THOMSON

EADMER (b. c.1055). Anglo-Saxon biographer and theologian. Placed as a boy in the monastery of Christchurch, he grew up there and ultimately became precentor. Meeting Anselm* because the archbishop of Canterbury was also ipso facto abbot of Christchurch, he became Anselm's secretary, chaplain, and constant companion during the latter's dispute with William II and Henry I, even sharing his exile. Eadmer's two books about Anselm deal respectively with his private life (Vita Anselmi) and the disputes (Vita Novorum in Anglia). The books naturally have an eyewitness character about them, and understandably Eadmer presents the issues at dispute in a light favorable to Anselm. The dispute was soon forgotten after the compromise settlement of 1107. Eadmer's writings include also biographies of Wilfred and Dunstan.

EAST AFRICA. The Christian gospel reached Ethiopia* at a very early date (Acts 8:27-39), but took many centuries to reach East Africa. The first contacts were probably through Nestorian and Jacobite merchants from India, followed by Roman Catholic priests who came with the Portuguese in the sixteenth century. All traces of such contacts have now disappeared, and the effective missionary penetration of the area began with the arrival of Protestant missionaries from Europe in the mid-nineteenth century.

(1) Kenya, formerly British East Africa. Effective preparation for the evangelization of Kenya began in 1844 with the arrival of J.L. Krapf,* a German Lutheran sent out by the Anglican Church Missionary Society. He began to work in Mombasa and then moved inland to Rabai, thirty miles from the sea, when he was joined by a colleague John (Johannes) Rebmann* in 1846. By journeys of exploration inland and down the coast, and by study of the local languages, these two prepared the way for missionary occupation. Krapf was forced by ill health to return to Europe in 1853, but he continued his linguistic work. Meanwhile the CMS reinforced its staff at Rabai, but several died from malaria. In 1861 the United Methodist Church from Britain opened a mission station at Ribe, a few miles north of Mombasa, and later extended its work up to the Tana River. In 1873 slavery was legally abolished within the Sultanate of Zanzibar, and the CMS established a colony for freed slaves at Freretown on the mainland just north of Mombasa. This became the main base of the CMS on the coast.

With the consolidation of missionary work at the coast, the next stage was that of penetration of the hinterland which began in 1891. In 1889 the directors of the Imperial British East Africa Company, who were in virtual administrative control of the area now known as Kenya and Uganda, invited the churches of Scotland to send out missionaries to Kenya. An exploratory party arrived in 1891 under James Stewart of Lovedale in South Africa and chose Kibwezi as the first station about 200 miles inland from Mombasa. The choice proved to be a bad one, and in 1898 the Rev. Thomas Watson, sole survivor of the original party, moved the station to Kikuyu near Nairobi. Meanwhile the British government had taken over administrative control of the area from the company in 1895. In that year the Africa Inland Mission was formed by Peter Scott, entered Kenya, and began to work among the Kamba people at Machakos in 1902. Other missions such as the Friends Africa Mission and the Seventh-Day Adventist Church moved up to stations in W Kenya, then called Kavirondo and under the administration of Uganda. Anglican missionaries entered W Kenya from Uganda, and began church, educational, and medical work in that area.

The modern history of Roman Catholic missionary work in Kenya begins with the arrival of the Holy Ghost Fathers, who were French in origin, at Mombasa in 1892. They moved up to Nairobi in 1899 and were at first mainly interested in the Goanese immigrants from India. In 1902 the Consolata Fathers from Turin settled in the Kenya Highlands with their main center at Nyeri, about 100 miles north of Nairobi. The Mill Hill Fathers of London came in 1904, and soon became the largest Roman Catholic missionary agency in the country.

With so many Protestant missions at work in the country, the problem of cooperation arose early and gave rise to a series of joint mission conferences. The main centers and dates at which these were held were Nyanza (1908), Nairobi (1909), and Kikuyu (1913, 1918, 1919, 1922, 1926). The most famous of these was in 1913 (see KIKUYU CONTROVERSY), but much good work was done at all of them. This included agreement on spheres of influence for the different missions, the production of common versions of the decalogue, the creed, and the Lord's Prayer, and the setting up of the Alliance of Missionary Societies as the permanent means of cooperation. In 1924 the Kenya Missionary Council was established, and finally the Christian Council of Kenya in 1943 to which almost all non-Roman churches and missions belong.

The missions established church work and to a varying degree educational, agricultural, and medical work, and pioneered much of the modern development of the country. Most of the missions have now handed over to the indigenous African churches, which have arisen out of their work and have now assumed control of the work formerly carried on by the missions.

(2) Tanzania, formerly German East Africa and then Tanganyika. Tanzania is the political union of Tanganyika and Zanzibar achieved in 1964. The island of Zanzibar was the center of Arab control of the coast and trade routes of East Africa, and was the base of all expeditions to the mainland. In 1864 Bishop Tozer moved the headquarters of the Anglo-Catholic Universities Mission to Central Africa from Malawi to Zanzibar, and in 1868 the Holy Ghost Fathers arrived from the island of Reunion. Soon the various missionary societies began to penetrate the mainland. The UMCA landed at Tanga and worked inland as well as working up the north bank of the Rovuma River in the south.

Before the German occupation of the country, all the missionary societies were British and included the Anglican CMS in the central area and the London Missionary Society along Lake Tanganyika. With declaration of a German protectorate in 1885, Lutheran and Moravian missionaries began to arrive. The Bethel Mission started work in Dar es Salaam in 1887, and in 1891 the Moravians took over part of the work of the LMS south of Lake Victoria. In 1893 the Leipzig Mission took over the work of the CMS among the Chagga people at the foot of Mount Kilimanjaro where the latter society had run into difficulties with the German administration. On the Roman Catholic side, the Holy Ghost Fathers were followed by the White Fathers in 1879, and the Benedictines in 1888.

By 1914 most of the country had been occupied by missionary societies, but under the British occupation most of the German missionaries were interned in World War I, and in 1920 they were all repatriated when the country came under British mandate. Replacements came from America and Scandinavia, and in 1925 the German missionaries were allowed to return. In 1940 they were again interned during World War II, but this time the work was less severely hampered as the local church was more organized, and the German mission stations were leased to the Augustana Synod of the American Lutheran Church. In the postwar period all the churches consolidated their work, and local autonomous churches were established. The largest Protestant body was the Lutheran Church which formed in 1958 the Federation of Lutheran Churches in Tanganyika and then in 1963 the Evangelical Lutheran Church of Tanzania. The Anglican Church set up several dioceses and in 1970 became a separate province of the Anglican Communion. A Christian Council of Tanzania was established to promote cooperation between the Protestant churches.

(3) Uganda. The pioneer of missionary work in Uganda may be said to have been the explorer H.M. Stanley. In April 1875 he had several interviews with Mutesa I, the Kabaka (king) of the Baganda, in which he found the king to be very interested in the Christian faith. The result was Stanley's famous letter to the Daily Telegraph and New York Herald, in which he appealed for "some pious practical missionary" to come to the kingdom of Buganda. The Anglican CMS took up the challenge, and in 1876 a party of eight missionaries led by Lieut. Shergold Smith set out from Britain. Only three reached Buganda, and of these, two were killed in a local dispute, leaving only the Rev. C.T. Wilson, who was alone for the next year or so. In November 1878 Alexander Mackay,* a Scottish Presbyterian, arrived.

Mutesa welcomed the Anglican missionaries and showed more interest in the Gospel than in Islam. Stanley's letter, however, had been read also by Charles Lavigerie, head of the White Fathers (founded in 1874 in North Africa), and in 1878 he sent a party of missionaries to Buganda. He did this in spite of a personal request from the CMS secretary not to do so in order to avoid competition and consequent confusion in the minds of the Baganda. Much unhappiness and even warfare would have been avoided if this request had been heeded. In 1884 Mutesa I died unbaptized, although he had asked for baptism from both Anglican and Roman missionaries. He was succeeded by his eighteen-year-old son Mwanga. Mwanga was a cruel and treacherous ruler, and the infant Christian Church was subjected to a persecution which produced many martyrs both Anglican and Roman. The first Anglican bishop of Eastern Equatorial Africa, James Hannington,* never reached Buganda, but was murdered at Busoga on Lake Victoria in 1885 by Mwanga's orders.

Mwanga's reign was marked by religious war and disorder until finally in 1894 Uganda was declared a British protectorate and its administration taken over by the British government from the East Africa Company. That government also built a railway from Mombasa to Lake Victoria which was a major factor in opening up Uganda to the world. Meanwhile, more Anglican and Roman Catholic missionaries had arrived. Outstanding among the Anglicans was Alfred Tucker, third bishop of Eastern Equatorial Africa, who arrived in 1890. He was the first Anglican bishop to reach Uganda, and he proved an active and able administrator. He had firm views on the need to establish an indigenous church. In 1898 he was installed as the first Anglican bishop of Uganda, but because of ill health was forced to resign in 1911.

On the Roman Catholic side the leader was Father Livinhac, who arrived in 1879 and later became superintendent general of the White Fathers. In 1894 the Mill Hill Fathers came from Britain to work in E Uganda. After the establishment of law and order under the British administration, there was a mass movement among the Baganda into both the Anglican and Roman Catholic churches. From early 1892 the work of evangelization began to extend out from Buganda into the other Uganda kingdoms of Bunyoro, Ankole, and Toro. Much of this work was done by the Christian Baganda. The Protestant influence in Uganda has remained predominantly evangelical and Anglican, and few other Protestant missions have entered the country; thus there has been no need for a Christian Council as in Kenya and Tanzania. In addition there have been few separatist movements in the Uganda Church. The most important was that led by Reuben Spartas in 1929 when he broke away from the Anglican Church to establish the African Orthodox Church, which in 1946 was recognized by the Greek Orthodox Patriarch of Alexandria. The church in Uganda has grown more rapidly than any other church on the African continent, and both the Anglican and Roman Catholic branches have established their own local hierarchies with African archbishops.

(4) Significant movements in the East African Church. In reaction to the spiritual decline in the church in Uganda came the movement of spiritual awakening and renewal known as the "East African Revival." The history of this movement has still to be written, but its origins have been traced to 1929 when an Anglican missionary doctor and a Buganda Christian came together in a newfound spiritual fellowship. Another source was the preaching of Blasio Kigozi, a young Anglican teacher in Ruanda. Other influences may be traced to the Keswick Convention* and the Oxford Group.* The Revival stressed the need for spiritual renewal and refused to admit to its fellowship those whom it did not regard as renewed. This led to the possibility of separation from the church in the early years of the movement, but this fortunately did not occur and the movement became a great source of spiritual strength in all the churches. The Revival soon spread to Kenya and Tanzania, and beyond to Central Africa and to the Sudan and Ethiopia. In Kenya it was a great source of inspiration to the church during the Mau Mau troubles in the 1950s. It continues to be a powerful stimulus in the church life of East Africa.

East Africa was the last region of Africa to become involved in the "Independent Church" movement which first appeared there about 1914. It has been most widespread and numerous in Kenya, and least so in Tanzania. The movement has been represented as an indigenous reaction to the European domination and paternalism of the Christian missions, and as expressing a desire to combine Christianity with features of African traditional religion. It has often been the vehicle of political nationalism. The movement probably has both religious and nonreligious causative factors. It is an important feature of the impact of Christianity on East Africa.

The "Church Union" movement began early in Kenya, but received a setback as a result of the Kikuyu Controversy.* Conversations were resumed and have been actively promoted in recent years between the main Protestant denominations of Kenya and Tanzania, but union seems unlikely in the near future.

EASTER. The celebration of Christ's resurrection. Although the Scriptures make no provision for the observance of Easter as the day of resurrection, all the evidence suggests that the celebration of the death and resurrection of Christ began at a very early date in the history of the church, probably as early as the apostolic age. It would seem also that the Christians of the first century consciously sought to create a Christian parallel to the Jewish Passover, since the close relationship between the significance of that event in the OT and the crucifixion in the NT made a transformation of that Jewish feast into Easter both logical and easy.

After A.D. 100, Easter, Pentecost, and Epiphany became the final parts of the church year. The time of the celebration in those early years is obscure, but during the second and third centuries serious controversies arose between some Catholic churches and the church in Rome concerning the proper time for the celebration of Christ's resurrection from the dead. This eastern group, known as the Quartodecimani,* insisted that Easter be celebrated on the fourteenth of Nisan. Basically the controversy was concerned with the question of whether the Jewish Paschal day or the Christian Sabbath should determine the time for the celebration, and whether the day of crucifixion or the day of resurrection should be the focal point of the celebration. It was a prolonged struggle, and toward the close of the second century it became so bitter that Bishop Victor of Rome denounced the Quartodecimans as heretics. The controversy was finally settled by the Council of Nicea in 325; it was decreed that Easter should be celebrated on the first Sunday after the vernal full moon and never on the fourteenth of Nisan. Because of different calculations, the time of the Eastern Orthodox Churches' celebration varies in relation to that of the Western Churches, and can be as much as five weeks later.

EASTERN ORTHODOX CHURCH. A federation of several self-governing or autocephalous churches. "Orthodox" comes from the Greek words meaning "right believing." Included in the church are the four ancient patriarchates of Constantinople, Alexandria, Antioch, and Jerusalem. Because of their historical significance they rank highest in honor. The heads of these churches are given the title "patriarch." The other autocephalous churches are Russian, Romanian, Serbian, Greek, Bulgarian, Georgian, Cypriot, Czechoslovakian, Polish, Albanian, and Sinaian. The heads of the Russian, Serbian, Bulgarian, and Romanian churches are called "patriarch." The head of the Georgian Church is called "catholicos-patriarch," and the heads of the other churches are referred to as either "archbishop" or "metropolitan."

Besides the churches mentioned above, there are several other churches which are self-governing in many ways, but do not yet have full independence. They are called autonomous, but not autocephalous. These are the churches of Finland, China, Japan, and three administrations among Russians who live outside of Russia. Then there are ecclesiastical provinces which depend on one of the autocephalous churches or on one of the Russian jurisdictions in emigration. These provinces are located in W Europe, North and South America, and Australia.

The major area of distribution of Orthodox Christians is in E Europe, in Russia, and along the coasts of the E Mediterranean. Many of the autocephalous churches are located in countries where Orthodoxy is the predominant Christian faith. Most of the churches are in lands that are either Greek or Slavonic. It is estimated that about one-sixth of all Christians are of the Orthodox faith. Because so many live in Communist-dominated countries, exact statistics on membership are not available. It is usually estimated, however, that Orthodox Christians number about 150 million.

The Orthodox Church claims to be a family of self-governing churches held together, not by a centralized organization or a single prelate, but by a bond of unity in the faith and communion in the sacraments. The patriarch of Constantinople is known as the Ecumenical or Universal Patriarch. He has a position of special honor, but not the right to interfere in the internal affairs of other churches.

Orthodoxy claims to be the unbroken continuation of the Christian Church established by Christ and His apostles. Timothy Ware finds three main stages of fragmentation of Christendom. The first occurred in the fifth and sixth centuries when the Nestorian Church of Persia and the five Monophysite churches of Armenia, Syria, Egypt, Ethiopia, and India divided from the main body of Christianity. The second stage happened in 1054 when the Great Schism* divided the Roman Catholic Church of the West from the Orthodox Church of the East. Thus between the Semitic Eastern churches and the Western Latin Church there was the Greek-speaking world with its Orthodox faith. The third stage in separation came with the Protestant Reformation in the sixteenth century.

In 313 the persecuted Christian Church received its first toleration in Constantine's Edict of Milan. Constantine in 324 decided to move the capital of the Roman Empire to the site of the Greek city, Byzantium, which was now renamed Constantinople. Constantine also presided at the first general council of the Christian Church, held at Nicea in 325. Constantinople grew in wealth and power as Rome declined. It became the center of Greek culture and a center of the Christian Church.

The Orthodox Church often calls itself the Church of the Seven Councils. These councils, held between 325 and 787, clarified the organization and teachings of the Christian Church. They were Nicea* (325), Constantinople* (381), Ephesus* (431), Chalcedon* (451), Constantinople* (553), Constantinople* (680-81), Nicea* (787). These councils condemned as heresy Arianism* and Monophysitism,* and clearly defined the doctrine of the Holy Trinity and the person of Christ. The Nicene Creed* and the Chalcedonian Definition* carefully described Christian doctrine on these vital issues. The councils also decided on the order of priority among the five patriarchal sees. Rome was given the primacy of honor, Constantinople second, and Alexandria, Antioch, and Jerusalem in that order.

In the eighth and ninth centuries the iconoclastic dispute occurred within the Byzantine Empire. Some of the emperors supported iconoclasm and saw the use of icons as a form of idolatry to be suppressed. A bitter struggle arose over this issue, but in the end the Iconodules (venerators of icons) successfully defended the place of icons in church life. The struggle lasted 120 years. The Orthodox consider this far more than a minor dispute over Christian art. They dismiss the charge of idolatry which the Iconoclasts brought against them by saying that the icon is not an idol but a symbol, and that the veneration is not directed toward the object itself but toward the person depicted. The Iconodules then argued the necessity of icons to safeguard the correct doctrine of the Incarnation. Material images can be made of the One who took a material body. With the ending of the Iconoclastic Controversy* and the meeting of the seventh council, the age of the ecumenical councils came to an end. This was the great age of theology and definition of the Christian faith.

Byzantium has often been called "the icon of the heavenly Jerusalem." Religion permeated all aspects of life. Monasticism was a significant form of religious life in the East. Early monasticism took different forms, and we still find these in the Orthodox Church today. First of all, there are the hermits who lead a solitary life. Then there is community life where hermits live together in a monastery under a common rule. Finally there is the semi-eremitic life or middle way where a loosely knit group lives together in a settlement under the guidance of an elder. The elder or starets in Russia is characteristic of Orthodox monasticism. Antony was the most famous of the monastic startsi.

The Eastern Church followed a policy of converting Slavs to Christianity. In the ninth century the patriarch Photius* sent Cyril and Methodius* as missionaries to the Slavs. They not only gave the Slavs a system of Christian doctrine, but also created their written language. The Bulgarians and Serbs were converted to Christianity in the ninth century, and the Russians in the tenth. Greek civilization and culture followed the faith into Slavic lands.

In Byzantium there was no separation of church and state. Although the emperor participated widely in church affairs, Orthodox historians object to the term "Caesaropapism," as they do not believe the church was subordinated to the state, but that they worked in harmony with neither having absolute control over the other.

In 1054 occurred the Great Schism which marked the separation of the Orthodox Church in the East from the Roman Church in the West. The East and West had been growing further apart economically, politically, and culturally, but at the end when the split came doctrinal issues were given as the cause. One of these was the matter of papal claims. The pope was claiming absolute power in the East as well as the West. Greeks were willing to accord honor to the pope, but not universal supremacy. They felt that matters of faith were finally decided by a council with all the bishops of the church, not by papal authority.

The other doctrinal issue was the Filioque. Originally the Nicene-Constantinopolitan Creed read: "I believe ... in the Holy Spirit, the Lord, the Giver of Life, who proceeds from the Father, who with the Father and the Son together is worshipped and together glorified." The West inserted a phrase, so that the creed now read "who proceeds from the Father and the Son." The Greeks objected to this change because they believed the ecumenical councils forbade any changes in the creed, and if a change was to be made, only another ecumenical council could make it. The Greeks also believed the change was doctrinally wrong because it destroyed the balance between the three persons of the Trinity and could lead to an incorrect doctrine of the Spirit and the Church. Besides these major differences between Greeks and Latins there were minor differences such as priestly celibacy in the West (the Greeks allowed married clergy), different rules of fasting, and the use by Greeks of leavened bread in the Eucharist (the Latins used unleavened).

Even after 1054 there were friendly relations between East and West. In 1204, however, Constantinople was captured during the Fourth Crusade. The destruction and sacrilege of the Crusaders shocked the Greeks, and the division between East and West was thereupon final.

In 1453 the Turks attacked Constantinople by land and sea. The Byzantines put up a brave defense, but were hopelessly outnumbered. After seven weeks the city fell and the Church of the Holy Wisdom became a mosque. The Byzantine Empire had come to an end, but not the Orthodox faith. Moscow was becoming increasingly strong in this period, and the claim of a Third Rome was asserted. The marriage of Ivan III and the niece of the last Byzantine emperor helped enhance this claim. The Turks did not treat the Byzantines with undue cruelty and were more tolerant than many Christian groups were toward each other during the Reformation and seventeenth century. Christians under Islam, however, had to pay heavy taxes, were not allowed to serve in the army, and were forbidden to undertake missionary work.

The Orthodox Church did not undergo either a Reformation or Counter-Reformation, but these movements did have some influence upon the East. Through the Poles there were contacts with Roman Catholicism. The Uniat Church* was formed in Poland, recognizing the supremacy of the pope, but keeping many of the traditions of the Orthodox Church, including married clergy. Cyril Lucar,* patriarch of Constantinople, combated Catholicism and turned to Protestant embassies at Constantinople for help. He fell under the influence of Calvinism in matters of theology.

The Orthodox Church of the twentieth century is divided by the Iron Curtain. The four ancient patriarchates and Greece are on the one side, the Slavonic Churches and Romania on the other. It is estimated that eighty-five per cent of Orthodox people live in Communist countries.

In the midst of the many changes that have occurred in the world, the Orthodox claim a living continuity with the church of the past and a strict adherence to its traditions. The three greatest sources of its traditions are the Bible, the ecumenical councils, and the creed. The statements of faith issued by the seven ecumenical councils, used along with the Bible, serve as the basis for the traditions. The Nicene-Constantinopolitan Creed is considered the most important of the ecumenical statements of faith. Other sources of tradition which are also accepted, but not with the same authority as the above, are the statements of later councils, the writings of the Church Fathers, the liturgy, canon law, and icons. The Orthodox believe the traditions of the church are expressed not only in words, but in actions, gestures, and art used in worship. An icon is considered one of the ways whereby God is revealed to man.

Central to the Orthodox faith is the belief in the Holy Trinity. This is best defined as "one essence in three persons." God is described as transcendent, but not cut off from the world which He created. Man was created in the image and likeness of God which indicates rationality, freedom, and assimilation to God through virtue. Included in this is the belief in the free will of man. Although man fell through Adam's sin, the Orthodox do not believe that man is entirely deprived of God's grace, thus the picture of fallen man is not the total depravity of Augustine or Calvin. Jesus Christ is seen as true God and true man. An overwhelming sense of Christ's glory is seen especially in His transfiguration and resurrection. Christ's humanity is not overlooked, however, and is seen in the love for the Holy Land where the incarnate Christ lived and in the veneration of the cross on which he died. The Holy Spirit's work, of sanctification, is emphasized. The true aim of the Christian life is the acquisition of the Holy Spirit of God. This involves the process of deification. The church sees this as something intended for all believers, and that which involves a social process and leads to practical results.

Deification is achieved through the church and the sacraments.

Orthodoxy believes in the hierarchical structure of the church, apostolic succession, the episcopate, and the priesthood. It believes in prayers to the saints and prayers for the dead. In this it agrees with Roman Catholicism, but differs in that it rejects papal infallibility. The church is pictured as the image of the Holy Trinity, the body of Christ, and a continued Pentecost. "The Church is a single reality, earthly and heavenly, visible and invisible, human and divine." The Orthodox view, according to Timothy Ware, is that there is unity in the church, and although there can be schisms from the church, there will be no schisms within the church. The church is held together by the act of communion in the sacraments. The church is infallible, and this is expressed through ecumenical councils.

Religion is approached by the Orthodox through liturgy. Because of this, even the smallest points of ritual are extremely important. The whole basic pattern of worship is the same as in the Roman Catholic Church—the Holy Liturgy, the Divine Office, and the Occasional Offices. Besides these the Orthodox Church has a number of lesser blessings. In the services of the church the language of the people is used. All services are sung or chanted. In most Orthodox churches singing is unaccompanied, and instrumental music is not used. Normally the worshiper stands during the church services, although there are occasions to kneel and sit. In the Orthodox Church the sanctuary is separated from the remainder of the interior by a solid screen known as the iconostasis. There are three doors in the iconostasis—the center one is the Holy Door which gives a view of the altar, the left door leads into the chapel of preparation, and the right door leads into the Diakonikon which is used as a vestry. Orthodox churches are filled with icons which are venerated by the worshipers.

The Orthodox Church accepts seven sacraments: baptism, chrismation (similar to confirmation in the West), the Eucharist, repentance or confession, holy orders, marriage, and anointing of the sick. Of the seven, the Eucharist and baptism have a special position. Baptism is accomplished by threefold immersion. Although both married and unmarried may receive holy orders, bishops are chosen from the unmarried clergy. The Christian year consists of Easter as the central event, twelve great feasts, and a number of other festivals and fasts. In relation to the ecumenical movement of the twentieth century, most Orthodox believe that there must be full agreement in the Faith before there can be reunion among Christians.

EASTON, BURTON SCOTT (1877-1950). American Episcopalian theologian and NT scholar. Educated at the universities of Pennsylvania and Göttingen, and at Philadelphia Divinity School, he taught NT at Nashotah House (1905-11), Western Theological Seminary in Chicago (1911-19), and General Theological Seminary of New York (1919-48). His works include commentaries on Luke (1926) and the Pastorals (1947), and an English translation with notes of The Apostolic Tradition of Hippolytus (1934). A collection of his essays was edited by F.C. Grant and published under the title Early Christianity: The Purpose of Acts and Other Papers (1954); this contains also a memoir and discussion of his work.

W. WARD GASQUE

EBEDJESUS (d.1318). Nestorian theologian. He became bishop of Sigar and Bet Arabaje in 1284/5, and metropolitan of Nisibis and Armenia in 1298. A prolific author, his Syriac writings included treatises on philosophy and science, a Bible, commentary, a polemic against heresy, hymns of praise, and anthems. As bibliographer he cataloged nearly 150 Syrian authors and their works, beginning with Simeon bar Sabbae (third century). He compiled the Nomocanon, the most complete collection of Nestorian canon laws, from three sources: (1) "Western Synods," i.e., before the Schism (e.g., Antioch, 341; Ancyra, 358); (2) "Eastern Synods," i.e., those held by Nestorian Katholikoi down to eighth century; and (3) laws made since the eighth century. Also extant is a theological work, Margaritha (The Pearl), and a series of fifty poems, Paradisus-Eden.

EBERHARD, JOHAN AUGUST (1739-1809). German philosopher and theologian. Born in Helberstedt, he studied philosophy, theology, and classical philology under such teachers as A.G. Baumgarten and J.S. Sember. After 1766 he moved into the Berlin circle of F. Nicolai and M. Mandelssohn. His Neue Apologie des Sokrates (2 vols., 1772-78), a criticism of Kantian philosophy and a critique of such ideas as original sin, caused a controversy, and he was attacked by G.E. Lessing* and others. Eberhard was appointed a professor of philosophy at Halle where he was recognized as being in the tradition of Leibnitz* and Wolff. Later he turned his attention to aesthetics, publishing Handbuch der Ästhetik (4 vols., 1803-5).

PETER TOON

EBERLINN, JOHANN (1470-1533). Reformation preacher and writer. Born at Günsburg-on-the-Danube, he studied at Basle (1490) and Freiburg (1493), and became a Franciscan in Heilsbronn. Thereafter he lived in Tübingen, Ulm, and Freiburg, where he encountered Luther's writings and became a Reformation supporter. Returning to Ulm, he was expelled from his order. He spent a year in Wittenberg, then traveled as an evangelist to Basle, Rheinfelden, Rottenburg, and Ulm. He married, and after some years in Erfurt, and Wertheim (1525-30), he ended his days in Leutershausen, near Ansbach. In 1521 he published a series of fifteen pamphlets, Bunds- gennossen, describing a utopian state called Wolfaria, and attacking, inter alia, the Lenten fast, priestly celibacy, and friars. He also sought to foster radical school changes. The extremities of some radicals and the moral laxity of some German Protestants led him to moderate his views in later writings. As a relaxation he translated into German Tacitus's Germania. EBIONITES. The name is derived from a Hebrew word meaning "poor" (cf. Luke 6:20). It seems clear that after the fall of Jerusalem many of the survivors from Qumran joined the Jewish Christian Church. Their influence caused a split. Some remained orthodox, being distinguished from Gentile Christians by their observance of the Sabbath* and circumcision. The Ebionites exalted the Law, though they considered it contained false pericopes, rejected the Pauline epistles, and regarded Jesus as the son of Joseph and Mary, but elected Son of God at his baptism when he was united with the eternal Christ, who is higher than the archangels, but not divine. This Christ had appeared in various figures from Adam on. His work was that of a teacher rather than savior. From Qumran they learned dualism, vegetarianism, and hatred of sacrifices. They had their own gospel, now called the "Gospel of the Ebionites"; it has survived mainly in quotations in Epiphanius. Apparently it was a developed form of the "Gospel according to the Hebrews," i.e., essentially Matthew. Our main information about their theology is derived from the "Journeys of Peter," which has been recognized in the pseudo-Clementine Homilies and Recognitions. Along with other Jewish Christians they suffered heavily during the Bar-Kochba revolt (132-35), because they would not accept him as Messiah. They then gradually dwindled away, their last remnants being swept away by the Muslim conquest of Syria.

ECK, JOHANN (1486-1543). Roman Catholic scholar and orator. Born in Eck on the Günz in Swabia, his proper name was Johann Mayr or Mai(e)r. He is best known for his opposition to Martin Luther's theological position. Eck attended the universities of Heidelberg, Tübingen, and Freiburg, and was professor in Ingolstadt from 1510 until his death. Scholastic, canonist, dogmatist, humanist, endowed with an excellent memory and oratorical ability, he upheld Roman Catholicism in his writings, disputations, and negotiations. His defense of a 5 percent interest rate on loans in 1514, in opposition to medieval prohibitions, gained him the favor of capitalists such as the Fuggers. In 1519 he opposed Andreas Carlstadt and then Martin Luther in the famous Leipzig Debate. He was largely responsible for procuring the bull Exurge, Domini against Luther (1520). In 1530 he presented 404 propositions against Luther and composed the Confutatio of the Augsburg Confession. He participated in the colloquies at Hagenau (1540), Worms (1541), and Ratisbon (1541). His Enchiridion locorum communium adversus Lutherum et alias hostes ecclesiae (which appeared in forty-six printings between 1525 and 1576) was directed against Luther, Melanchthon, and Zwingli. His earlier De primatu Petri adversus Ludderdum (1520) was a defense of the papacy. His translation of the Bible into German (1537) lacked originality.

CARL S. MEYER

ECKHART VON HOCHHEIM (Meister Eckhart) (c.1260-1327). German mystic. Born in Hochheim near Gotha, he entered the Dominican Order and was prior in Erfurt before becoming vicar of Thuringia. In 1300 he went to Paris, where he graduated in theology. He was made provincial of Saxony, and in 1307 vicar general of Bohemia. The next period of his life is obscure, but he probably spent part of this time in Strasbourg and Cologne. In 1326 he was accused of heresy, tried by the archbishop of Cologne, and convicted. He appealed to Rome, where some of his teachings were judged heretical by John XXII in 1329, two years after his death. He was noted as a preacher; many of his sermons were delivered in convents of nuns.

Eckhart's German writings were classified by Franz Pfeiffer (1857) into 110 sermons, 18 tracts, and 60 Sprüche (brief notices). Since that time other pieces have been found and the authenticity of some of the earlier ones disputed. Questions of higher and lower criticism of the corpus of his works remain. For instance, his "tracts" are probably portions of sermons. His Latin writings are largely expositions of some of the OT books. His writings reveal him as a Scholastic* and as a mystic.

His principles have been interpreted variously. It was said he was pantheistic, but this charge is generally discounted. That he was influenced greatly by Thomism and Neoplatonism can be asserted with considerable confidence. He differentiated between God and the Godhead, and this caused discussion. In man he found a divine remnant which he called Funck or Fünckleín or Fünckleín der Seele. His incarnation theology makes Christ in the first instance the focal point of mankind and also its Redeemer. In his ethical teaching he reached a lofty plane. His followers included Henry Suso* and John Tauler.*

ECLECTICISM. An intellectual procedure involving the taking from various systems of thought of whatever appears to be true or striking or apt, without much regard to method or systematic consistency. Origen's use of classical and pagan sources is an example of eclecticism in Christian theology.

ECSTASY. The term refers to the supernatural state of being beyond reason and self-control, as when obsessed by emotion or overpowering feeling such as joy or rapture. External patterns of behavior such as incoherent speech, insensibility to pain, wild leaping contortions, jerking, and glossolalia (or "speaking in tongues") are examples of the ecstatic state. In the OT there are several instances of ecstasy recorded, usually in connection with the prophets. In the Christian Church, ecstasy has been held to be one of the normal stages in mystic life, although never regarded as normative for the Christian life. The ecstatic state is not sought for its own sake, but rather as an external indication of the union of the human will with the divine. A central characteristic of the ecstatic state is the alienation of the senses, with the individual perhaps becoming immovable and inoperative. WATSON E. MILLS

ECTHESIS (Gr. = "a statement of faith"). A theological formula drafted by Sergius, patriarch of Constantinople, and issued by Emperor Heraclius in 638. It forbade the mention or teaching of one or more principles of energy or modes of activity in the person of Christ, and it claimed that there was only one will in Him. Two councils held at Constantinople in 638 and 639 accepted the Ecthesis, but the Western Church did not. It was finally withdrawn by Emperor Constans II in 648. Eventually the church agreed that there were two wills in Christ, the divine and the human.

ECUMENICAL COUNCILS. Church councils representing the whole church, hence called ecumenical from the Greek word oikoumene (inhabited world). The Roman Catholic Church recognizes twenty-one councils as having been ecumenical. According to canon law, an ecumenical council must be convoked by the pope, and all diocesan bishops of the church must be invited. Its decrees are binding only upon papal ratification, and the rulings of the papacy cannot be appealed to a council. Although in modern Roman Catholic theology councils are held to be subordinate to the papacy, this was not always the case.

Ecumenical councils originated in the Christian Roman Empire, and the early councils were convoked by emperors who summoned the bishops, paid their expenses, and gave their decisions binding force. Whether or not a council was finally accepted as ecumenical was, in fact, based on later recognition by the church rather than on its actual characteristics. Some councils which believed themselves to be ecumenical were later not included in the list of ecumenical councils. Others, such as the Council of Constantinople (381) which was held without the pope's knowledge and which included only Eastern bishops, were later accepted as ecumenical although they did not conform to the modern definition.

There is little agreement among Christians on the number of ecumenical councils. Some churches accept only the first three (Coptic, Armenian, and Syrian). The Eastern Orthodox Church and many Protestants accept the first seven, while Luther regarded only the first four as ecumenical. Luther believed the decisions of councils were not infallible since they were subordinate to the Word of God; however, if those decisions were in harmony with God's Word, they deserved respect since they were the expression of the community of believers guided by the Holy Spirit. He therefore respected the decisions of the early councils, but rejected the medieval ones because he felt they had introduced superstitions and errors into Christian teaching. The councils considered by the Roman Church as ecumenical can be divided into four groups:

(1) The first eight, which were convoked by emperors and normally had representation from both Eastern and Western clergy: Nicea I (325); Constantinople I (381); Ephesus (431); Chalcedon (451); Constantinople II (553); Constantinople III (680-81); Nicea II (787); Constantinople IV (869-70).

(2) The seven medieval councils which were convoked and controlled by the papacy: Lateran I (1123); Lateran II (1139); Lateran III (1179); Lateran V (1215); Lyon I (1245); Lyon II (1274); Vienne (1311-12).

(3) Three late medieval councils which were held during the period when the conciliar movement was challenging the power of the papacy and which witnessed both the initial success of the movement and its final defeat: Constance (1414-18); Basle-Ferrara-Florence (1431-37); Lateran IV (1512-17).

(4) The last three councils which were all convoked by popes and which best fit the characteristics described by modern Roman Catholic theology: Trent (1545-63); Vatican I (1869-70); Vatican II (1962-65).

See entries under individual councils.

RUDOLPH HEINZE

ECUMENICAL MOVEMENT. The original Greek word oikoumene meant "the inhabited world" (as in the decree of Caesar Augustus, Luke 2:1), being derived from the verb oikeo, "I dwell." From this concept of the whole world it was but a short step to the idea of ecumenical councils* such as those of the fourth and fifth centuries. The distinctive feature of these councils was specifically that the bishops of the "whole world" were present, whereas provincial or other councils would involve only the bishops of a small area. In the sixteenth century, when the Roman Catholic Church had convened the "Ecumenical" Council of Trent,* Cranmer wrote to Calvin that the Protestant Churches should arrange their own council to meet (and if necessary oppose) the claims of that council. The appeal to a future council, bringing together representative leaders of all the churches, has been a minor part of the Anglican atmosphere ever since.

It is but a further short step to the twentieth-century use of the word "ecumenical." Any such gathering must bring together not only those who are scattered geographically, but also those who belong to different churches or denominations. The non-Roman churches would be unhappy to allow the title "ecumenical" to the general councils of the Roman Catholic Church just because such councils do not include representatives of all Christians. "Ecumenical" has come to mean "uniting." Indeed, by an etymological paradox, it is possible to have "ecumenical" trends in one small country or area, and in Britain today the British Council of Churches* sponsors "areas of ecumenical experiment."

The ecumenical movement itself is normally dated from the Edinburgh Missionary Conference* of 1910. This was the first really international conference of a multidenominational character, and, although its theme was "mission," it was inevitable that the degree to which the various bodies represented could cooperate, converge, or even merge was never far off the agenda. From this conference sprang further international organizations, which eventually merged into the World Council of Churches* in 1948.
